Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mænalian strains.

Old dotting Nature, change thy course anew,
And let the trembling lamb the wolf pursue:
Let oaks now glitter with Hesperian fruit,
And purple daffodils from alder shoot.
Fat amber let the tamarisk distil:
And hooting howls contend with swans in skill.
Hoarse Tityrus strive with Orpheus in the woods;
And challenge fam'd Arion on the floods.

Or, oh! let nature cease, and chaos reign:
Begin with me, the flute, the sweet Mænalian
strain.

Let earth be sea; and let the whelming tide
The lifeless limbs of luckless Damon hide:
Farewell, ye secret woods and shady groves,
Haunts of my youth, and conscious of my loves!
From yon high cliff I plunge into the main;
Take the last present of thy dying swain:
And cease, my silent flute, the sweet Mænalian
strain.

Now take your turns, ye Muses, to rehearse
His friend's complaints; and mighty magic verse.
Bring running water; bind those altars round
With fillets; and with vervain strow the ground:
Make fat with frankincense the sacred fires,
To re-inflame my Daphnis with desires.
'Tis done, we want but verse. Restore my charms,
My lingering Daphnis to my longing arms.

Pale Phœbe, drawn by verse from Heaven descends;

And Circe chang'd with charms Ulysses' friends.
Verse breaks the ground, and penetrates the brake,
And in the winding cavern splits the snake.
Verse fires the frozen veins: restore my charms,
My lingering Daphnis to my longing arms.

Around his waxen image first I wind
Three woollen fillets, of three colours join'd:
Thrice bind about his thrice-devoted head,
Which round the sacred altar thrice is led.
Unequal numbers please the gods: my charms,
Restore my Daphnis to my longing arms.

Knit with three knots the fillets, knit them
straight;

Then say, These knots to love I consecrate.
Haste, Amaryllis, haste; restore my charms,
My lovely Daphnis to my longing arms.

As fire this figure hardens, made of clay;
And this of wax with fire consumes away;
Such let the soul of cruel Daphnis be;
Hard to the rest of women; soft to me.
Crumble the sacred mole of salt and corn,
Next in the fire the bays with brimstone burn.
And while it crackles in the sulphur, say,
This, I for Daphnis burn; thus Daphnis burn
away.

This laurel is his fate: restore, my charms,
My lovely Daphnis to my longing arms.

As when the raging heifer, through the grove,
Stung with desire, pursues her wandering love;
Faint at the last, she seeks the weedy pools
To quench her thirst, and on the rushes rolls:
Careless of night, unmindful to return;
Such fruitless fires perfidious Daphnis burn.
While I so scorn his love; restore my charms,
My lingering Daphnis to my longing arms.

These garments once were his; and left to me;
The pledges of his promis'd loyalty:
Which underneath my threshold I bestow;
These pawns, O sacred earth! to me my Daphnis owe.

As these were his, so mine is he: my charms,
Restore their lingering lord to my deluded arms.

These poisonous plants, for magic use design'd,
(The noblest and the best of all the baneful kind),
Old Mœris brought me from the Pontic strand,
And cull'd the mischief of a bounteous land.

Smear'd with these powerful juices, on the plain
He howls a wolf among the hungry train:
And oft the mighty necromancer boasts,
With these, to call from tombs the stalking ghosts;
And from the roots to tear the standing corn,
Which, whirl'd aloft, to distant fields is borne.
Such is the strength of spells: restore, my charms,
My lingering Daphnis to my longing arms.

Bear out these ashes; cast them in the brook;
Cast backwards o'er your head, nor turn your look:

Since neither gods, nor godlike verse can move,
Break out, ye smother'd fires, and kindle smother'd
love.

Exert your utmost power, my lingering charms,
And force my Daphnis to my longing arms.

See, while my last endeavours I delay,
The waking ashes rise, and round our altars play!
Run to the threshold, Amaryllis; hark,
Our Hylas opens, and begins to bark. [lieve;
Good heaven! may lovers what they wish be-
Or dream their wishes, and those dreams deceive!
No more, my Daphnis comes; no more, my charms;

He comes, he runs, he leaps, to my desiring arms.

THE NINTH PASTORAL;

OR,

LYCIDAS AND MOERIS.

THE ARGUMENT.

When Virgil, by the favour of Augustus, had recovered his patrimony near Mantua, and went in hope to take possession, he was in danger to be slain by Arius the Centurion, to whom those lands were assigned by the Emperor, in reward of his service against Brutus and Cassius. This Pastoral therefore is filled with complaints of his hard usage; and the persons introduced, are the Bailiff of Virgil, Mœris, and his friend Lycidas.

LYCIDAS.

Ho, Mœris; wither on thy way so fast?
This leads to town,

MOERIS. O Lycidas, at last

The time is come I never thought to see,
(Strange revolution for my farm and me)

When the grim captain, in a furly tone,
Cries out, Pack up, ye rascals! and be gone.
Kick'd out, we set the best face on't we cou'd,
And these two kids t' appease his angry mood
I bear, of which the Furies give him good!

Lyc. Your country friends were told another
That from the sloping mountain to the vale, [tale;
And dodder'd oak, and all the banks along,
Menalcas sav'd his fortune with a song.

MOER. Such was the news, indeed; but songs and rhymes

Prevail as much in these hard iron times,
As would a plump of trembling fowl, that rise
Against an eagle fousing from the skies.

And had not Phœbus warn'd me by the croak
Of an old raven, from a hollow oak,
To shun debate, Menalcas had been slain,
And Mœris not surviv'd him, to complain.

Lyc. Now heaven defend! could barbarous rage induce

The brutal son of Mars t' insult the sacred Muse!
Who then should sing the nymphs, or who rehearse
The waters gliding in a smoother verse!

Or Amaryllis praise, that heavenly lay,
That shorten'd, as we went, our tedious way.
O Tityrus, tend my herd, and see them fed;
To morning pastures, evening waters, led:

MOER. Or what unfinish'd he to Varus read;
Thy name, O Varus (if the kinder Powers Preserve our plains, and shield the Mantuan towers,

(Obnoxious by Cremona's neighbouring crime),
The wings of swans, and stronger pinion'd rhyme,
Shall raise aloft, and soaring bear above
Th' immortal gift of gratitude to Jove.

Lyc. Sing on, sing on, for I can ne'er be cloy'd.
So may thy swarms the baleful yew avoid:
So may thy cows their burden'd bags distend,
And trees to goats their willing branches bend.
Mean as I am, yet have the Muses made
Me free, a member of the tuneful trade:
At least, the shepherds seem to like my lays,
But I discern their flattery from their praise:
I nor to Cinno's ears, nor Varus' dare aspire;
But gabble like a goose, amidst the swan-like
quire.

MOER. 'Tis what I have been conning in my mind:

Nor are the verses of a vulgar kind.

Come, Galatea, come, the seas forsake;
What pleasures can the tides with their hoarse murmurs make?

See, on the shore inhabits purple spring,
Where nightingales their love-sick ditty sing;
See, meads, with purling streams, with flowers
the ground,

The grottos cool, with shady poplars crown'd,
And creeping vines on arbours weav'd around.
Come then, and leave the waves' tumultuous roar,
Let the wild surges vainly beat the shore.

Lyc. Or that sweet song I heard, with such delight;

The fame you sung alone one starry night;
The tune I still retain, but not the words.

MOER. Why, Daphnis, dost thou search in old records,

To know the seasons when the stars arise?

See Cælar's lamp is lighted in the skies:

The star, whose rays the blushing grapes adorn,
And swell the kindly ripening ears of corn.

Under this influence graft the tender shoot;
Thy childrens children shall enjoy the fruit.

The rest I have forgot, for cares and time
Change all things, and untune my soul to rhyme:
I could have once sung down a summer's sun,
But now the chime of poetry is done.

My voice grows hoarse; I feel the notes decay,
As if the wolves had seen me first to-day.

But these, and more than I to mind can bring,
Menalcas has not yet forgot to sing.

Lyc. Thy faint excuses but inflame me more;
And now the waves roll silent to the shore:

Husht winds the topmost branches scarcely bend,
As if thy tuneful song they did attend:

Already we have halt our way o'ercome;
Far off I can discern Bianor's tomb;

Here, where the labourer's hands have form'd a
Of wreathing trees, in singing waste an hour.

Rest here thy weary limbs, thy kids lay down,
We've day before us yet, to reach the town:

Or if, ere night, the gathering clouds we fear,
A song will help the beating storm to bear.

And that thou may'st not be too late abroad,
Singing, I'll ease thy shoulders of thy load.

MOER. Cease to request me; let us mind our Another song requires another day.

When good Menalcas comes, if he rejoice,
And find a friend at court, I'll find a voice.

THE TENTH PASTORAL,

OR,

GALLUS.

THE ARGUMENT.

Gallus, a great Patron of Virgil, and an excellent Poet, was very deeply in love with one Cytheris, whom he calls Lycoris; and who had forsaken him for the company of a soldier. The poet therefore supposes his friend Gallus retired in his height of melancholy into the solitudes of Arcadia (the celebrated scene of Pastorals); where he represents him in a very languishing condition, with all the rural Deities about him, pitying his hard usage, and condoling his misfortune.

THE sacred succour, Arethusa, bring,
To crown my labour: 'tis the last I sing.
Which proud Lycoris may with pity view;
The Muse is mournful, though the numbers few.
Refuse me not a verse, to grief and Gallus due. }
So may thy silver streams beneath the tide,
Unmix'd with briny seas, securely glide.
Sing then, my Gallus, and his hopeless vows;
Sing, while my cattle crop the tender browie.
The vocal grove shall answer to the sound,
And echo, from the vales, the tuneful voice rebound.

What lawns or woods withheld you from his aid, }

Ye nymphs, when Gallus was to love betray'd;
To love, un pity'd by the cruel maid?
Nor steepy Pindus cou'd retard your course,
Nor cleft Parnassus, nor th' Aonian source:
Nothing that owns the Muses cou'd suspend
Your aid to Gallus, Gallus is their friend.
For him the lofty laurel stands in tears,
And hung with humid pearls the lowly shrub appears.

Mænalian pines the godlike swain bemoan;
When spread beneath a rock he sigh'd alone;
And cold Lycæus wept from every drooping stone. }

The sheep surround their shepherd, as he lies:
Blush not, sweet poet, nor the name despise:
Along the streams his flock Adonis fed;
And yet the queen of beauty blest his bed.
The swains and tardy neat-herds came, and last Menalcas, wet with beating winter mast.
Wondering they ask'd from whence arose thy
flame;

Yet more amaz'd, thy own Apollo came.
Flush'd were his cheeks, and glowing were his eyes:

Is she thy care? is she thy care? he cries.
Thy false Lycoris flies thy love and thee:
And for thy rival tempts the raging sea,
The forms of horrid war, and heaven's inclemency. }

Sylvanus came: his brows a country crown
Of fennel, and of nodding lilies, down.
Great Pan arriv'd; and we beheld him too.
His cheeks and temples of vermilion hue.
Why, Gallus, this immoderate grief, he cry'd:
Think'st thou that love with tears is satisfy'd?
The meads are sooner drunk with morning dews;
The bees with flowery shrubs, the goats with browie.

Unmov'd, and with dejected eyes he mourn'd:
He paus'd, and then these broken words return'd.
'Tis past; and pity gives me no relief:
But you, Arcadian swains, shall sing my grief:
And on your hills my last complaints renew;
So sad a song is only worthy you.
How light would lie the turf upon my breast,
If you my sufferings in your songs express?
Ah! that your birth and business had been mine;
To penn the sheep, and press the swelling vine!
Had Phyllis or Amyntas caus'd my pain.
Or any nymph, or any shepherd on the plain,
Though Phyllis brown, though black Amyntas were,

Are violets not sweet, because not fair?

Beneath the fallows, and the shady vine,
My loves had mix'd their pliant limbs with mine;
Phyllis with myrtle wreaths had crown'd my hair,
And soft Amyntas sung away my care.
Come, see what pleasures in our plains abound;
The woods, the fountains, and the flowery ground.
As you are beauteous, were you half so true,
Here could I live, and love, and die with only you.

Now I to fighting fields am sent afar,
And strive in winter camps with toils of war;
While you, (alas, that I should find it so!)
To shun my fight, your native soil forego,
And climb the frozen Alps, and tread th' eternal snow. }

Ye frosts and snows, her tender body spare;
Those are not limbs for icicles to tear.
For me, the wilds and deserts are my choice;
The Muses, once my care; my once harmonious voice.

There will I sing, forsaken and alone,
The rocks and hollow caves shall echo to my moan.

The rind of every plant her name shall know;
And as the rind extends, the love shall grow.
Then on Arcadian mountains will I chafe
(Mix'd with the woodland nymphs) the savage race.

Nor cold shall hinder me, with horns and hounds
To thrid the thickets, or to leap the mounds.
And now methinks o'er steepy rocks I go,
And rush through founding woods, and bend the Parthian bow: .

As if with sports my sufferings I could ease,
Or by my pains the God of love appease.
My frenzy changes, I delight no more
On mountain tops to chafe the tusky boar;
No game but hopeless love my thoughts pursue:
Once more, ye nymphs, and songs, and founding woods, adieu.

Love alters not for us his hard decrees,
Not though beneath the Thracian clime we freeze;

Or Italy's indulgent heaven forego;
And in mid-winter tread Sithonian snow.
Or when the barks of elms are scorch'd, we keep
On Meroe's burning plains the Libyan sheep.
In hell, and earth, and seas, and heav'n above,
Love conquers all; and we must yield to love.
My Muses, here your sacred raptures end:
The verse was what I ow'd my suffering friend.
This while I sung, my sorrows I deceiv'd,
And bending offers into baskets weav'd.
The song, because inspir'd by you, shall shine:
And Gallus will approve, because 'tis mine.
Gallus, for whom my holy flames renew
Each hour, and every moment rise in view:
As alders, in the spring, their boles extend;
And heave so fiercely, that the bark they rend.
Now let us rise, for hoarfeness oft invades
The finger's voice who sings beneath the shades.
From juniper unwholesome dews distil,
That blast the footy corn: the withering herb-age kill; }
Away, my goats, away: for you have brows'd your fill;

VIRGIL'S GEORGICS.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

PHILIP EARL OF CHESTERFIELD.

MY LORD,

I CANNOT begin my address to your lordship, better than in the words of Virgil,

“ — Quod optanti Divum promittere nemo
“ Auderet, volvenda dies, en, attulit ultro.”

Seven years together I have concealed the longing which I had to appear before you : a time as tedious as Æneas passed in his wandering voyage, before he reached the promised Italy. But I considered, that nothing which my meanness could produce, was worthy of your patronage. At last this happy occasion offered, of presenting you the best poem of the best poet. If I sought this opportunity, I was in despair of finding such another; and if I took it, I was still uncertain whether you would vouchsafe to accept it from my hands. It was a bold venture which I made, in desiring your permission to lay my unworthy labours at your feet. But my rashness has succeeded beyond my hopes: and you have been pleased not to suffer an old man to go discontented out of the world, for want of that protection, of which he had so long been ambitious. I have known a gentleman in disgrace, and not daring to appear before King Charles the Second, though he much desired it. At length he took the confidence to attend a fair lady to the court, and told his majesty, that under her protection he had presumed to wait on him. With the same humble confidence I present myself before your lordship, and attending on Virgil, hope a gracious reception. The gentleman succeeded, because the powerful lady was his friend; but I have too much injured my great author, to expect he should intercede for me. I would have translated him; but, according to the literal French and Italian phrases, I fear I have traduced him. It is the fault of many a well-meaning man, to be officious in a wrong place, and do a prejudice, where he had endeavoured to do a service. Virgil wrote his Georgics in the full strength and vigour of his age, when his judgment was at the height, and before his fancy was declining. He had, (according to our homely saying) his full swing at this poem, beginning it about the age of thirty-five; and scarce concluding it before he arrived at forty. It is observed both of him and Horace, and I believe it will hold in all great poets; that though they wrote before with a certain heat of genius which inspired them, yet that heat was not perfectly digested. There is required a continuance of warmth to ripen the best and noblest fruits. Thus Horace, in his First and Second Book of Odes, was still rising, but came not to his meridian till the Third. After which his judgment was an overpoise to his imagination: he grew too cautious to be bold enough, for he descended in his Fourth by slow degrees, and in his Satires and Epistles, was more a philosopher and a critic than a poet. In the beginning of summer the days are almost at a stand, with little variation of length or shortness, because at that time the diurnal motion of the sun partakes more of a right line, than of a spiral. The same is the method of nature in the frame of man. He seems at forty to be fully in his summer tropic; somewhat before, and somewhat after, he finds in his soul but small increases or decays. From fifty to threescore the balance generally holds even, in our colder climates: for he loses not much in fancy; and judgment, which is the effect of observation, still increases: his succeeding years afford him little more than the stubble of his own harvest: yet if his constitution be healthful, his mind may still retain a decent vigour; and the gleanings of that Ephraim, in comparison with others, will surpass the vintage of Abiezer. I have called this somewhere, by a bold metaphor, a green old age; but Virgil has given me his authority for the figure.

Among those few who enjoy the advantage of a latter spring, your lordship is a rare example: who being now arrived at your great climacteric, yet give no proof of the least decay of your excellent judgment, and comprehension of all things which are within the compass of human understanding. Your conversation is as easy as it is instructive; and I could never observe the least vanity or the least assuming in any thing you said: but a natural unaffected modesty, full of good sense, and well digested, — a clearness of notion, expressed in ready and unstudied words. No man has complained, or ever can, that you have discoursed too long on any subject: for you leave in us an eagerness of learning more; pleased with what we hear, but not satisfied, because you will not speak so much as we could wish. I dare not excuse your lordship from this fault; for though it is none in you, it is one to all who have the happiness of being known to you. I must confess the critics make it one of Virgil's beauties, that having said what he thought convenient, he always left somewhat for the imagination of his readers to supply: that they might gratify their fancies, by finding more in what he had written, than at first they could, and think they had added to his thoughts when it was all there before-hand, and he only saved himself the expence of words. However it was, I never went from your lordship, but with a longing to return, or without a hearty curse to him who invented ceremonies in the world, and put me on the necessity of withdrawing when it was my interest, as well as my desire, to have given you a much longer trouble. I cannot imagine (if your lordship will give me leave to speak my thoughts) but you have had a more than ordinary vigour in your youth. For too much of heat is required at first, that there may not too little be left at last. A prodigal fire is only capable of large remains: and yours, my lord, still burns the clearer in declining. The blaze is not so fierce as at the first, but the smoke is wholly vanished; and your friends who stand about you, are not only sensible of a cheerful warmth, but are kept at an awful distance by its force. In my small observations of mankind, I have ever found, that such as are not rather too full of spirit when they are young, degenerate to dullness in their age. Sobriety in our riper years is the effect of a well-cooked warmth; but where the principles are only phlegm, what can be expected from the waterish matter, but an insipid manhood, and a stupid old infancy; discretion in leading strings, and a confirmed ignorance on crutches? Virgil, in his Third Georgic, when he describes a colt, who promises a courier for the race, or for the field of battle, shows him the first to pass the bridge, which trembles under him, and to stem the torrent of the flood. His beginnings must be in rashness; a noble fault: but time and experience will correct that error, and tame it into a deliberate and well-weighed courage; which knows both to be cautious and to dare, as occasion offers. Your lordship is a man of honour, not only so unstained, but so unquestioned, that you are the living standard of that heroic virtue; so truly such, that if I would flatter you, I could not. It takes not from you, that you were born with principles of generosity and probity; but it adds to you, that you have cultivated nature, and made those principles the rule and measure of all your actions. The world knows this, without my telling; yet poets have a right of recording it to all posterity.

Epaminondas, Lucullus, and the two first Cæsars, were not esteemed the worst commanders, for having made philosophy and the liberal arts their study. Cicero might have been their equal, but that he wanted courage. To have both these virtues, and to have improved them both, with a softness of manners, and a sweetness of conversation, few of our nobility can fill that character: one there is, and so conspicuous by his own light, that he needs not

To be nobly born, and of an ancient family, is in the extremes of fortune, either good or bad; for virtue and descent are no inheritance. A long series of ancestors shows the native with great advantage at the first; but if he any way degenerate from his line, the least spot is visible on ermine. But to preserve this whiteness in its original purity, you, my lord, have, like that ermine, forsaken the common track of business, which is not always clean: you have chosen for yourself a private greatness, and will not be polluted with ambition. It has been observed in former times, that none have been so greedy of employments, and of managing the public, as they who have least deserved their stations. But such only merit to be called patriots, under whom we see their country flourish. I have laughed sometimes (for who would always be an Heracclitus?) when I have reflected on those men, who from time to time have shot themselves into the world. I have seen many successions of them; some bolting out upon the stage with vast applause, and others hissed off, and quitting it with disgrace. But while they were in action, I have constantly observed, that they seemed desirous to retreat from business: greatness they said was nauseous, and a crowd was troublesome; a quiet privacy was their ambition. Some few of them I believe said this in earnest, and were making a provision against future want, that they might enjoy their age with ease: they saw the happiness of a private life, and promised to themselves a blessing, which every day it was in their power to possess. But they deferred it, and lingered still at court, because they thought they had not yet enough to make them happy; they would have more, and laid in to make their solitude luxurious. A wretched philosophy, which Epicurus never taught them in his garden: they loved the prospect of this quiet in reversion, but were not willing to have it in possession; they would first be old, and made as sure of health and life, as if both of them were at their disposal. But put them to the necessity of present choice, and they preferred continuance in power: like the wretch who called Death to his assistance, but refused him when he came. The great Scipio was not of their opinion, who indeed sought honours in his youth, and endured the fatigues with which he purchased them. He served his country when it was in need of his courage and conduct, until he thought it was time to serve himself: but dismounted from the saddle when he found the beast which bore him began to grow retive and ungovernable. But your lordship has given us a better example of moderation. You saw betimes that ingratitude is not confined to commonwealths; and therefore, though you were formed alike for the greatest of civil employments, and military commands, yet you pushed not your fortune to rise in either; but contented yourself with being capable, as much as any whosoever, of defending your country with your sword, or assisting it with your counsel, when you were called. For the rest, the respect and love which was paid you, not only in the province where you live, but generally by all who had the happiness to know you, was a wise exchange for the honours of the court: a place of forgetfulness, at the best, for well-deservers. It is necessary for the polishing of manners, to have breathed that air; but it is infectious even to the best morals to live always in it. It is a dangerous commerce, where an honest man is sure at the first of being cheated; and he recovers not his losses, but by learning to cheat others. The undermining smile becomes at length habitual; and the drift of his plausible conversation, is only to flatter one, that he may betray another. Yet it is good to have been a looker-on, without venturing to play; that a man may know false dice another time, though he never means to use them. I commend not him who never knew a court, but him who forsakes it because he knows it. A young man deserves no praise, who out of melancholy zeal leaves the world before he has well tried it, and runs head-long into religion. He who carries a maidenhead into a cloister, is sometimes apt to lose it there, and to repent of his repentance. He only is like to endure austerities, who has already found the inconvenience of pleasures. For almost every man will be making experiments in one part or another of his life: and the danger is the less when we are young; for, having tried it early, we shall not be apt to repeat it afterwards. Your lordship therefore may properly be said to have chosen a retreat, and not to have chosen it until you had maturely weighed the advantages of rising higher with the hazards of the fall. "Res non parva labore, sed relicta," was thought by a poet to be one of the requisites to a happy life. Why should a reasonable man put it in the power of fortune to make him miserable, when his ancestors have taken care to release him from her? let him venture, says Horace, "qui zonam perdidit." He who has nothing, plays securely; for he may win, and cannot be poorer if he loses. But he who is born to a plentiful estate, and is ambitious of offices at court, sets a stake to Fortune, which she can seldom answer: if he gains nothing, he loses all, or part of what was once his own; and if he gets, he cannot be certain but he may refund.

In short, however he succeeds, it is covetousness that induced him first to play, and covetousness is the undoubted sign of ill sense at bottom. The odds are against him, that he loses; and one loss may be of more consequence to him than all his former winnings. It is like the present war of the Christians against the Turk; every year they gain a victory, and by that a town; but if they are once defeated, they lose a province at a blow, and endanger the safety of the whole empire. You, my lord, enjoy your quiet in a garden, where you have not only the leisure of thinking, but the pleasure to think of nothing which can discompose your mind. A good conscience is a port which is land-locked on every side, and where no winds can possibly invade, no tempests can arise. There a man may stand upon the shore, and not only see his own image, but that of his Maker, clearly reflected from the undisturbed and silent waters. Reason was intended for a blessing, and such it is to men of honour and integrity, who desire no more than what they are able to give themselves; like the happy old Coricyan, whom my author describes in his Fourth Georgic; whose fruits and fallads, on which he lived contented, were all of his own growth, and his own plantation. Virgil seems to think that the blessings of a country life are not complete, without an improvement of knowledge by contemplation and reading.

"O fortunatos nimium, bona si sua norint,
"Agricolas!"

It is but half possession not to understand that happiness which we possess: a foundation of good sense, and a cultivation of learning, are required to give a seasoning to retirement, and make us taste the blessing. God has bestowed on your lordship the first of these, and you have bestowed on yourself the second. Eden was not made for beasts, though they were suffered to live in it, but for their master, who studied God in the works of his creation. Neither could the devil have been happy there with all his knowledge, for he wanted innocence to make him so. He brought envy, malice, and ambition, into paradise, which soured to him the sweetness of the place. Wherever inordinate affections are, it is hell. Such only can enjoy the country, who are capable of thinking when they are there, and have left their passions behind them in the town. Then they are prepared for solitude; and in that solitude is prepared for them

"Et secura quies, et nescia fallere vita."

As I began this dedication with a verse of Virgil, so I conclude it with another. The continuance of your health, to enjoy that happiness which you so well deserve, and which you have provided for yourself, is the sincere and earnest wish of

Your lordship's most devoted, and most obedient servant,

JOHN DRYDEN,

ESSAY ON THE GEORGICS,

BY MR. ADDISON.

VIRGIL may be reckoned the first who introduced three new kinds of poetry among the Romans, which he copied after three of the greatest masters of Greece. Theocritus and Homer have still disputed for the advantage over him in pastoral and heroic, but I think all are unanimous in giving him the precedence over Hesiod in his Georgics. The truth of it is, the sweetness and rusticity of a pastoral cannot be so well expressed in any other tongue as in the Greek, when rightly mixed and qualified with the Doric dialect, nor can the majesty of an heroic poem any where appear so well as in this language, which has a natural greatness in it, and can be often rendered more deep and sonorous by the pronunciation of the Ionians. But in the middle style, where the writers in both tongues are on a level, we see how far Virgil has excelled all who have written in the same way with him.

There has been abundance of criticism spent on Virgil's Pastorals and Æneids, but the Georgics are a subject which none of the critics have sufficiently taken into their consideration; most of them passing it over in silence, or casting it under the same head with Pastoral; a division by no means proper, unless we suppose the style of a husbandman ought to be imitated in a Georgic; as that of a shepherd is in a Pastoral. But though the scene of both these poems lies in the same place, the speakers in them are of a quite different character, since the precepts of husbandry are not to be delivered with the simplicity of a ploughman, but with the address of a poet. No rules therefore that relate to Pastoral can any way affect the Georgics, which fall under that class of poetry, which consists in giving plain and direct instructions to the reader; whether they be moral duties, as those of Theognis and Pythagoras; or philosophical speculations, as those of Aratus and Lucretius; or rules of practice; as those of Hesiod and Virgil. Among these different kinds of subjects, that which the Georgics goes upon, is, I think, the meanest and least improving, but the most pleasing and delightful. Precepts of morality, besides the natural corruption of our tempers, which makes us averse to them, are so abstracted from ideas of sense, that they seldom give an opportunity for those beautiful descriptions and images which are the spirit and life of poetry. Natural philosophy has indeed sensible objects to work upon, but then it often puzzles the reader with the intricacy of its notions, and perplexes him with a multitude of its disputes. But this kind of poetry I am now speaking of, addresses itself wholly to the imagination; it is altogether conversant among the fields and woods, and has the most delightful part of nature for its province. It raises in our minds a pleasing variety of scenes and landscapes, whilst it teaches us; and makes the drier of its precepts look like a description. "A Georgic therefore is some part of the science of husbandry put into a pleasing dress, and set off with all the beauties and embellishments of "poetry." Now, since this science of husbandry is of a very large extent, the poet shows his skill in singling out such precepts to proceed on, as are useful, and at the same time most capable of ornament. Virgil was so well acquainted with this secret, that to set off his first Georgic, he has run into a set of precepts, which are almost foreign to his subject, in that beautiful account he gives us of the signs in nature, which precede the changes of the weather.

And if there be so much art in the choice of fit precepts, there is so much more required in the treating of them; that they may fall in after each other by a natural unforced method, and show themselves in the best and most advantageous light. They should all be so finely wrought together in the same piece, that no coarse seam may discover where they join, as in a curious braid of needle-work, one colour falls away by such just degrees, and another rises so insensibly, that we see the variety without being able to distinguish the total vanishing of the one from the first appearance of the other. Nor is it sufficient to range and dispose this body of precepts into a clear and easy method, unless they are delivered to us in the most pleasing and agreeable manner: for there are several ways of conveying the same truth to the mind of man; and to choose the pleasantest of these ways, is that which chiefly distinguishes poetry from prose, and makes Virgil's rules of husbandry pleasanter to read than Varro's. Where the prose-writer tells us plainly what ought to be done, the poet often conceals the precept in a description, and represents his countryman performing the action in which he would instruct his reader. Where the one sets out as fully and distinctly as he can, all the parts of the truth, which he would communicate to us, the other singles out the most pleasing circumstance of this truth, and so conveys the whole in a more diverting manner to the understanding. I shall give one instance out of a multitude of this nature that might be found in the Georgics, where the reader may see the different ways Virgil has taken to express the same thing, and how much pleasanter every manner of expression is, than the plain and direct mention of it would have been. It is in the second Georgic, where he tells us what trees will bear grafting on each other.

Et sæpe alterius ramos impune videmus
Vertere in alterius, mutatamque insita mala
Ferre pyrum, et prunis lapidosa rubescere corna

—Steriles Platani malos gessere valentes,
 Castaneæ fagos, ornique incanuit albo
 Flore pyri: glandenque suis fregere sub ulmis.
 —Nec longum tempus: et ingens
 Exit ad cœlum ramis felicibus arbos:
 Miraturque novas frondes, et non sua poma.

Here we see the poet considered all the effects of this union between trees of different kinds, and took notice of that effect which had the most surprize, and by consequence the most delight in it, to express the capacity that was in them of being thus united. This way of writing is every where much in use among the poets, and is particularly practised by Virgil, who loves to suggest a truth indirectly, and without giving us a full and open view of it; to let us see just so much as will naturally lead the imagination into all the parts that lie concealed. This is wonderfully diverting to the understanding, thus to receive a precept, that enters as it were through a bye-way, and to apprehend an idea that draws a whole train after it. For here the mind, which is always delighted with its own discoveries, only takes the hint from the poet, and seems to work out the rest by the strength of her own faculties.

But since the inculcating precept upon precept, will at length prove tiresome to the reader, if he meets with no entertainment, the poet must take care not to encumber his poem with too much business; but sometimes to relieve the subject with a moral reflection, or let it rest a while, for the sake of a pleasant and pertinent digression. Nor is it sufficient to run out into beautiful and diverting digressions (as it is generally thought) unless they are brought in aptly, and are something of a piece with the main design of the Georgic: for they ought to have a remote alliance at least to the subject, that so the whole poem may be more uniform and agreeable in all its parts. We should never quite lose sight of the country, though we are sometimes entertained with a distant prospect of it. Of this nature are Virgil's descriptions of the original of agriculture, of the fruitfulness of Italy, of a country life, and the like, which are not brought in by force, but naturally rise out of the principal argument and design of the poem. I know no one digression in the Georgics that may seem to contradict this observation, besides that in the latter end of the first book, where the poet launches out into a discourse of the battle of Pharsalia, and the actions of Augustus: but it is worth while to consider how admirably he has turned the course of his narration into its proper channel, and made his husbandman concerned even in what relates to the battle, in those inimitable lines.

Scilicet ex tempus veniet, cum sinibus illis
 Agricola incurvo terram molitus aratro,
 Exesa inveniet scabra rubigine pila:
 Aut gravibus rastris galeas pulsabit inanes,
 Grandaque effossis mirabitur ossa sepulchris.

And afterwards, speaking of Augustus's actions, he still remembers that agriculture ought to be some way hinted at throughout the whole poem,

—Non ullus aratro

Dignus honos: squalent abductis arva colonis:
 Et curvæ rigidum falces conflantur in enses.

We now come to the style which is proper to a Georgic: and indeed this is the part on which the poet must lay out all his strength, that his words may be warm and glowing, and that every thing he describes may immediately present itself, and rise up to the reader's view. He ought in particular to be careful of not letting his subject debase his style, and betray him into a meanness of expression, but every where to keep up his verse in all the pomp of numbers and dignity of words,

I think nothing which is a phrase or saying in common talk, should be admitted into a serious poem; because it takes off from the solemnity of the expression, and gives it too great a turn of familiarity: much less ought the low phrases and terms of art, that are adapted to husbandry, have any place in such a work as the Georgic, which is not to appear in the natural simplicity and nakedness of its subject, but in the pleassest dress that poetry can bestow on it. Thus Virgil, to deviate from the common form of words, would not make use of "tempore" but "fydere" in his first verse, and every where else abounds with metaphors, Grecisms, and circumlocutions, to give his verse the greater pomp, and preserve it from sinking into a plebeian style. And herein consists Virgil's master-piece, who has not only excelled all other poets, but even himself, in the language of his Georgics, where we receive more strong and lively ideas of things from his words, than we could have done from the objects themselves: and find our imaginations more affected by his descriptions, than they would have been by the very sight of what he describes.

I shall now, after this short scheme of rules, consider the different success that Hesiod and Virgil have met with in this kind of poetry, which may give us some further notion of the excellence of the Georgics. To begin with Hesiod; if we may guess at his character from his writings, he had much more of the husbandman than the poet in his temper; he was wonderfully grave, discreet, and frugal; he lived altogether in the country, and was, probably for his great prudence, the oracle of the whole neighbourhood. These principles of good husbandry ran through his works, and directed him to the choice of tillage and merchandize, for the subject of that which is the most celebrated of them. He is every where bent on instruction, avoids all manner of digressions, and does not stir out of the field once in the whole Georgic. His method in describing month after month with its proper seasons and employments, is too grave and simple; it takes off from the surprize and variety of the poem, and makes the whole look but like a modern almanack in verse. The reader is carried through a course of weather, and may beforehand guess whether he is to meet with snow or rain, clouds or sun-shine, in the next description. His descriptions indeed have abundance of nature in them, but then it is nature in her simplicity and dress. Thus, when he speaks of January, "The wild beasts," says he, "run shivering through the woods with their heads stooping to the “ground, and their tails clapt between their legs; the goats and oxen are almost flead with cold; but it is not so bad with the sheep, because they have a thick coat of wool about them. The old men too are bitterly pinched with the weather, but the young girls feel nothing of it, who sit at home with their mothers by a warm fire-side.” Thus does the old gentleman give himself up to a loose kind of tattle, rather than endeavour after a just poetical description. Nor has he shown more of art or judgment in the precepts he has given us, which are sown so very thick, that they clog the poem too much, and are often so minute and full of circumstances, that they weaken and un-nerve his verse. But after all, we are beholden to him for the first rough sketch of a Georgic: where we may still discover something venerable in the antiqueness of the work; but if we would see the design enlarged, the figures reformed, the colouring laid on, and the whole piece finished, we must expect it from a greater master's hands.

Virgil has drawn out the rules of tillage and planting into two books, which Hesiod has dispatched in half a one: but has so raised the natural rudeness and simplicity of his subject, with such a significancy of expression, such a pomp of verse, such variety of transitions, and such a solemn air in his reflections, that if we look on both poets together, we see in one the plainness of a downright countryman, and in the other, something of a rustic majesty, like that of a Roman dictator at the plough-tail. He delivers the meanest of his precepts with a kind of grandeur; he breaks the clods and tosses the dung about with an air of gracefulness. His prognostications of the weather are taken out of Aratus, where we may see how judiciously he has picked out those that are most proper for his husbandman's observation; how he has enforced the expression, and heightened the images which he found in the original.

The second book has more wit in it, and a greater boldness in its metaphors than any of the rest. The poet with a great beauty applies oblivion, ignorance, wonder, desire, and the like, to his trees. The last Georgic has indeed as many metaphors, but not so daring as this; for human thoughts and passions may be more naturally ascribed to a bee, than to an inanimate plant. He who reads over the pleasures of a country life, as they are described by Virgil in the latter end of this book, can scarce be of Virgil's mind in preferring even the life of a philosopher to it.

We may, I think, read the poet's clime in his description, for he seems to have been in a sweat at the writing of it.

—O quis me gelidis sub montibus Hæmi
Sitat, et ingenti ramorum protegat umbra?

And is every where mentioning among his chief pleasures, the coolness of his shades and rivers, vales and grottes, which a more northern poet would have omitted for the description of a sunny hill and fire-side.

The third Georgic seems to be the most labour'd of them all; there is a wonderful vigour and spirit in the description of the horse and chariot-race. The force of love is represented in noble instances, and very sublime expressions. The Scythian winter-piece appears so very cold and bleak to the eye, that a man can scarce look on it without shivering. The murrain at the end has all the expressiveness that words can give. It was here that the poet strained hard to out-do Lucretius in the description of his plague; and if the reader would see what success he had, he may find it at large in Scaliger.

But Virgil seems no where so well pleas'd as when he has got among his bees in the fourth Georgic; and ennobles the actions of so trivial a creature, with metaphors drawn from the most important concerns of mankind. His verses are not in a greater noise and hurry in the battles of Æneas and Turnus, than in the engagement of two swarms. And as in his Æneis he compares the labour of his Trojans to those of bees and pismires, here he compares the labours of the bees to those of the Cyclops. In short, the last Georgic was a good prelude to the Æneis; and very well shew'd what the poet could do in the description of what was really great, by his describing the mock-grandeur of an insect with so good a grace. There is more pleasantness in the little platform of a garden, which he gives us about the middle of this book, than in all the spacious walks and water-works of Kapin. The speech of Proteus, at the end, can never be enough admired, and was indeed very fit to conclude so divine a work.

After this particular account of the beauties in the Georgics, I should, in the next place, endeavour to point out its imperfections, if it has any. But though I think there are some few parts in it that are not so beautiful as the rest, I shall not presume to name them, as rather suspecting my own judgment, that I can believe a fault to be in that poem, which lay so long under Virgil's correction, and had his last hand put to it. The first Georgic was probably burlesqued in the author's lifetime; for we still find in the scholiasts a verse that ridicules part of a line translated from Hesiod; “nudus ara, sere nudus.”—And we may easily guess at the judgment of this extraordinary critic, whoever he was, from his censuring this particular precept. We may be sure Virgil would not have translated it from Hesiod, had he not discovered some beauty in it; and indeed the beauty of it is what I before observ'd to be frequently met with in Virgil, the delivering the precept so indirectly, and angling out the particular circumstances of sowing and ploughing naked, to suggest to us that these employments are proper only in the hot season of the year.

I shall not here compare the style of the Georgics with that of Lucretius, which the reader may see already done in the Preface to the second volume of Miscellaneous Poems; but shall conclude this poem to be the most complete, elaborate and finished piece of all antiquity. The Æneis indeed is of a nobler kind, but the Georgic is more perfect in its kind. The Æneis has a greater variety of beauties in it, but those of the Georgic are more exquisite. In short, the Georgic has all the perfections that can be expected in a poem written by the greatest poet in the flower of his age, when his invention was ready, his imagination warm, his judgment settled, and all his faculties in their full vigour and maturity.

B O O K I.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Poet in the beginning of this Book, propounds the general design of each Georgic: and, after a solemn invocation of all the gods who are any way related to his subject, he addresses himself in particular to Augustus, whom he compliments with divinity; and after strikes into his business. He shews the different kinds of tillage proper to different soils, traces out the original of agriculture, gives a catalogue of the husbandman's tools, specifies the employments peculiar to each season, describes the changes of the weather, with the signs in heaven and earth that forebode them. Intimates many of the prodigies that happened near the time of Julius Cæsar's death. And shuts up all with a supplication to the gods for the safety of Augustus, and the preservation of Rome.

WHAT makes a plenteous harvest, when to turn
The fruitful soil, and when to sow the corn;
The care of sheep, of oxen, and of kine;
And how to raise on elms the teeming vine;
The birth and genius of the frugal bee,
I sing, Mæcenas, and I sing to thee.

Ye Deities! who fields and plains protect,
Who rule the seasons, and the year direct;
Bacchus and fostering Ceres, Powers divine,
Who gave us corn for mast, for water wine:
Ye Fawns, propitious to the rural swains, Ye Nymphs that haunt the mountains and the plains,

Join in my work, and to my numbers bring
Your needful succour, for your gifts I sing.
And thou, whose trident struck the teeming earth,
And made a passage for the courier's birth;
And thou, for whom the Cæan shores sustains
The milky herds, that graze the flowery plains;
And thou, the shepherd's tutelary god,
Leave for a while, O Pan! thy lov'd abode:
And, if Arcadian fleeces be thy care,
From fields and mountains to my song repair.
Inventor, Pallas, of the fattening oil,
Thou founder of the plough and ploughman's toil;

And thou, whose hands the shroud-like cypress
Come all ye gods and goddesses that wear [rear; }
The rural honours, and increase the year.
You, who supply the ground with seeds of grain;
And you, who I well those seeds with kindly rain:
And chiefly thou, whose undetermin'd state
Is yet the business of the gods debate;
Whether in after times to be declar'd
The patron of the world, and Rome's peculiar guard,

Or o'er the fruits and seasons to preside,
And the round circuit of the year to guide;
Powerful of blessings, which thou strew'st around,
And with thy goddess mother's myrtle crown'd.
Or wilt thou, Cæsar, choose the watery reign,
To smooth the surges, and correct the main;
Then mariners, in storms, to thee shall pray,
Evn utmost Thulé shall thy power obey;
And Neptune shall resign the faces of the sea. }
The watery virgins for thy bed shall strive,
And Thetys all her waves in dowry give.
Or wilt thou bless our summers with thy rays,
And, seated near the balance, poise the days:

Where in the void of heaven a space is free,
Betwixt the Scorpion and the Maid, for thee.
The Scorpion, ready to receive thy laws,
Yields half his region, and contracts his claws.
Whatever part of heaven thou shalt obtain;
For let not hell presume of such a reign;
Nor let to dire a thirst of empire move
Thy mind, to leave thy kindred gods above.
Though Greece admires Elysiu's blest retreat,
Though Proserpine affects her silent seat,
And, importun'd by Ceres to remove,
Prefers the fields below to those above.
But thou, propitious Cæsar! guide my course,
And, to my bold endeavours, add thy force.
Pity the Poet's and the Ploughman's cares,
Interest thy greatness in our mean affairs.
And use thyself betimes to hear and grant our prayers.

While yet the spring is young, while earth un-binds
Her frozen bosom to the western winds;
While mountain-snows dissolve against the sun,
And streams, yet new, from precipices run;
Evn in this early dawning of the year,
Produce the plough, and yoke the sturdy steer,
And goad him till he groans beneath his toil,
Till the bright share is bry'd in the soil.
That crop rewards the greedy peasants pains,
Which twice the sun, and twice the cold sustains, (promis'd gains. }
And bursts the crowded barns, with more than
But ere we stir the yet unbroken ground,
The various course of seasons must be found;
The weather, and the setting of the winds,
The culture suiting to the several kinds
Of seeds and plants, and what will thrive and rise,
And what the genius of the soil denies.
This ground with Bacchus, that with Ceres suits;
That other loads the trees with happy fruits;
A fourth with grass, unbidden decks the ground:
Thus Tmolus is with yellow saffron crown'd;
India, black ebon and white ivory bears;
And soft Idume weeps her odorous tears.
Thus Pontus sends her beaver stones from far;
And naked Spanders temper steel for war.
Epirus for th' Elean chariot breeds
(In hopes of palms) a race of nimble steeds.
This is th' original contract; these the laws
Impos'd by Nature, and by Nature's cause, ...

On fundry places, when Deucalion hurl'd
 His mother's entrails on the desert world :
 Whence men, a hard laborious kind, were born.
 Then borrow part of winter for thy corn :
 And early with thy team the giebe in furrows
 turn.

That, while the turf lies open and unbound,
 Succeeding suns may bake the mellow ground.
 But if the soil be barren, only fear
 The surface, and but lightly print the share,
 When cold Arcturus rises with the sun :
 Lest wicked weeds the corn should over-run
 In watery soils ; or left the barren sand
 Should suck the moisture from the thirsty land.
 Both these unhappy soils the swain forbears,
 And keeps a sabbath of alternate years :
 That the spent earth may gather heat again ;
 And, better'd by cessation, bear the grain.
 At least, where vetches, pulse, and tares have flood,

And stalks of lupines grew (a stubborn wood),
 Th' ensuing season, in return, may bear
 The bearded product of the golden year.
 For flax and oats will burn the tender field,
 And sleepy poppies harmful harvests yield.
 But sweet vicissitudes of rest and toil
 Make easy labour, and renew the soil.
 Yet sprinkle fordid ashes all around,
 And load with fattening dung thy fallow ground.
 Thus change of seeds for meagre soils is best ;
 And earth manur'd, not idle, though at rest.

Long practice has a sure improvement found,
 With kindled fires to burn the barren ground ;
 When the light stubble, to the flames resign'd,
 Is driven along, and crackles in the wind.
 Whether from hence the hollow womb of earth
 Is warm'd with secret strength for better birth ;
 Or, when the latent vice is cur'd by fire,
 Redundant humours through the pores expire ;
 Or that the warmth distends the chinks, and makes [takes ;
 New breathings, whence new nourishment she
 Or that the heat the gaping ground constrains,
 New knits the surface, and new strings the veins,
 Lest soaking showers should pierce her secret feat,

Or freezing Boreas chill her genial heat ;
 Or scorching suns too violently beat.

Nor is the profit small, the peasant makes,
 Who smooths with harrows, or who pounds with rakes

The crumbling clods : nor Ceres from on high
 Regards his labours with a grudging eye ;
 Nor his, who plows across the furrow'd grounds,
 And on the back of earth insists new wounds ;
 For he with frequent exercise commands
 Th' unwilling soil, and tames the stubborn lands.
 Ye swains, invoke the Powers who rule the sky,
 For a moist summer, and a winter dry ;
 For winter drought rewards the peasant's pain,
 And broods indulgent on the bury'd grain.
 Hence Myfia boasts her harvests, and the tops
 Of Gargarus admire their happy crops.
 When first the soil receives the fruitful seed,
 Make no delay, but cover it with speed :
 So fenc'd from cold ; the pliant furrows break,
 Before the surly clod resists the rake,

And call the floods from high, to rush again
 With pregnant streams, to swell the teeming grain.

Then when the fiery suns too fiercely play,
 And shrivel'd herbs on withering stems decay,
 The wary ploughman, on the mountain's brow,
 Undams his watery stores, huge torrents flow ;
 And, rattling down the rocks, large moisture
 yield,

Tempering the thirsty fever of the field.
 And lest the stem, too feeble for the freight,
 Should scarce sustain the head's unwieldy weight,
 Sends in his feeding flocks betimes t' invade
 The rising bulk of the luxuriant blade ;
 Ere yet th' aspiring offspring of the grain
 O'ertops the ridges of the furrow'd plain :
 And drains the standing waters, when they yield
 Too large a beverage to the drunken field.
 But most in autumn, and the showery spring,
 When dubious months uncertain weather bring :
 When fountains open, when impetuous rain
 Swells hasty brooks, and pours upon the plain ;
 When earth with slime and mud is cover'd o'er,
 Or hollow places spue their watery store.
 Nor yet the ploughman, nor the labouring steer,
 Sustain alone the hazards of the year ;
 But glutton geese, and the Strymonian crane,
 With foreign troops, invade the tender grain :
 And towering weeds malignant shadows yield ;
 And spreading succory chokes the rising field.
 The fire of gods and men, with hard decrees,
 Forbids our plenty to be bought with ease :
 And wills that mortal men, inur'd to toil,
 Should exercise, with pains, the grudging soil,
 Himself invented first the shining share,
 And whetted human industry by care :
 Himself did handicrafts and arts ordain,
 Nor suffer'd sloth to rust his active reign.
 Ere this, no peasant vex'd the peaceful ground,
 Which only turfs and greens for altars found :
 No fences parted fields, nor marks nor bounds
 Distinguish'd acres of litigious grounds :
 But all was common, and the fruitful earth
 Was free to give her unexact'd birth.
 Jove added venom to the viper's brood, [flood :
 And swell'd, with raging storms, the peaceful
 Commission'd hungry wolves t' infest the fold,
 And shook from oaken leaves the liquid gold.
 Remov'd from human reach the cheerful fire,
 And from the rivers bade the wine retire :
 That studious need might useful arts explore ;
 From furrow'd fields to reap the foodfull store :
 And force the veins of clashing flints t' expire
 The lurking seeds of their celestial fire.
 Then first on seas the hollow'd alder swam ;
 Then sailors quarter'd heaven, and found a name
 For every fix'd and every wandering star :
 The Pleiads, Hyads, and the Northern Car.
 Then tools for beasts, and lime for birds were
 found,

And deep-mouth'd dogs did forest-walks surround :
 And casting nets were spread in shallow brooks,
 Drags in the deep, and baits were hung on hooks.
 Then faws were tooth'd, and founding axes made
 (For wedges first did yielding wood invade)
 And various arts in order did succeed.
 (What cannot endless labour, urg'd by need ?)

First Ceres taught, the ground with grain to sow,

And arm'd with iron shares the crooked plough,
When now Dodonian oaks no more supply'd
Their mast, and trees their forest-fruits deny'd.
Soon was his labour doubled to the swain,
And blasting mildews blacken'd all his grain.
'Tough thistles chok'd the fields, and kill'd the corn,

And an unthrifty crop of weeds was borne.
Then burs and brambles, an unbidden crew
Of graceless guests, th' unhappy field subdue:
And oats unblest, and darnel dimineers,
And shoots its head above the shining ears.
So that unless the land with daily care
Is exercis'd, and with an iron war
Of rakes and harrows the proud foes expell'd,
And birds with clamours frighted from the field;
Unless the boughs are lopp'd that shade the plain,
And heaven involk'd with vows for fruitful rain,
On other crops you may with envy look,
And shake for food the long abandon'd oak.
Nor must we pass untold what arms they wield,
Who labour tillage and the furrow'd field:
Without whose aid the ground her corn denies,
And nothing can be sown, and nothing rise.
The crooked plough, the share, the towering height

Of waggons, and the cart's unwieldy weight;
The sled, the tumbrel, hurdles, and the flail,
The fan of Bacchus, with the flying sail.
These all must be prepar'd, if ploughmen hope
The promis'd blessing of a bounteous crop.
Young elms with early force in copes bow,
Fit for the figure of the crooked plough.
Of eight foot long a fatten'd beam prepare,
On either side the head produce an ear,
And sink a socket for the shining share,
Of beech the plough-tail, and the bending yoke;
Or softer linden harden'd in the smoke.
I could be long in precepts, but I fear
So mean a subject might offend your ear.
Delve of convenient depth your thrashing-floor:
With temper'd clay then fill and face it o'er:
And let the weighty roller run the round,
To smoothe the surface of the unequal ground;
Lest crack'd with summer heats the flooring
flies,

Or sunks, and through the crannies weeds arise.
For sundry foes the rural realms surround:
The field-mouse builds her garner under ground,
For gather'd grain the blind laborious mole
In winding mazes works her hidden hole.
In hollow caverns vermin make abode,
The hissing serpent, and the swelling toad:
The corn-devouring weazel here abides,
And the wife ant her wintry store provides.

Mark well the flowering almonds in the wood;
If odorous blooms the bearing branches load,
The glebe will answer to the sylvan reign,
Great heats will follow, and large crops of grain.
But if a wood of leaves o'ershade the tree,
Such and so barren will thy harvest be:
In vain the hind shall vex the thrashing-floor,
For empty chaff and straw will be thy store.
Some steep their feed, and some in cauldrons boil
With vigorous nitre, and with lees of oil,

O'er gentle fires; th' exuberant joyce to drain,
And swell the flattering husks with fruitful grain.
Yet is not the success for years assur'd,
Though chosen is the seed, and fully cur'd;
Unless the peasant, with his annual pain,
Renews his choice, and culls the largest grain.
Thus all below, whether by Nature's curse,
Or Fate's decree, degenerate still to worse.
So the boat's brawny crew the current item,
And, slow advancing, struggle with the stream:
But if they slack their hands, or cease to strive,
Then down the flood with headlong haste they drive.

Nor must the ploughman less observe the skies,
When the Kids, Dragon, and Arcturus rise,
Than sailors homeward bent, who cut their way Through Helle's stormy straits, and oyster-breed ing sea.

But when Aftrea's balance, hung on high,
Betwixt the nights and days divides the sky,
Then yoke your oxen, sow your winter grain;
Till cold December comes with driving rain,
Linseed and fruitful poppy bury warm,
In a dry season, and prevent the storm.
Sow beans and clover in a rotten soil,
And millet, rising from your annual toil:
When with his golden horns, in full career,
The bull beats down the barriers of the year;
And Argos and the Dog forsake the northern sphere.

But if your care to wheat alone extend,
Let Maia with her sisters first descend,
And the bright Gnosian diadem downward bend;
Before you trust in earth your future hope:
Or else expect a listless lazy crop.

[found
Some swains have sown before, but most have
A husky harvest, from the grudging ground.
Vile vetches would you sow, or lentils lean,
The growth of Egypt, or the kidney-bean;
Begin when the slow Waggoner descends;
Nor cease your sowing till mid-winter ends:
For this, through twelve bright signs Apollo guides
The year, and earth in several climes divides,
Five girdles bind the skies; the torrid zone
Glow with the passing and repassing sun.
Far on the right and left, th' extremes of heaven,
To frosts and snows and bitter blasts are given.
Betwixt the midst and these, the gods assign'd
Two habitable seats for human kind:
And cross their limits cut a sloping way,
Which the twelve signs in beauteous order sway.
Two poles turn round the globe; one seen to rise
O'er Scythian hills, and one in Libyan skies.
The first sublime in heaven, the last in whirl'd
Belov'd the regions of the nether world.
Around our pole the spiry Dragon glides,
And like a winding stream the Beas divides;
The less and greater, who by Fate's decree
Abhor to dive beneath the southern sea;
There, as they say, perpetual night is found
In silence brooding on th' unhappy ground:
Or when Aurora leaves our northern sphere,
She lights the downward heaven, and rises there.
And when on us she breathes the living light,
Red vesper kindles there the tapers of the night.
From hence uncertain seasons we may know;
And when to reap the grain, and when to sow;

Or when to fell the furzes; when 'tis meet
To spread the flying canvas for the fleet.
Observe what stars arise or disappear;
And the four quarters of the rolling year.
But when cold weather, and continued rain,
The labouring husband in his house refrain,
Let him forecast his work with timely care,
Which else is huddled when the skies are fair:
Then let him mark the sheep, or whet the shining share,

Or hollow trees for boats, or number o'er
His sacks, or measure his increasing store;
Or sharpen stakes, or head the forks, or twine
The fallow twigs to tie the straggling vine;
Or wicker baskets weave, or air the corn,
Or grinded grain betwixt two marbles turn.
No laws, divine or human, can refrain
From necessary works the labouring swain.
Ev'n holidays and feasts permission yield,
To float the meadows, or to fence the field,
To fire the brambles, snare the birds, and steep
In wholesome water-falls the woolly sheep.
And oft the drudging ass is driven, with toil,
To neighbouring towns with apples and with oil:
Returning late, and laden home with gain
Of barter'd pitch, and hand-mills for the grain.

The lucky days, in each revolving moon,
For labour choose: the fifth be sure to shun:
That gave the Furies and pale Pluto birth,
And arm'd, against the skies, the sons of earth.
With mountains pil'd on mountains, thrice they rove

To scale the steepy battlements of Jove:
And thrice his lightning and red thunder play'd,
And their demolish'd works in ruin laid.
The seventh is, next the tenth, the best to join
Young oxen to the yoke, and plant the vine.
Then, weavers, stretch your stays upon the west:
The ninth is good for travel, bad for theft.
Some works in dead of night are better done;
Or when the morning dew prevents the sun.
Parch'd meads and stubble mow by Phœbe's light,
Which both require the coolness of the night;
For moisture then abounds, and pearly rains
Descend in silence to refresh the plains.
The wife and husband equally conspire
To work by night, and rake the winter fire:
He sharpens torches in the glimmering room:
She shoots the flying shuttle through the loom:
Or boils in kettles must of wine, and skims
With leaves, the dregs that overflow the brims.
And till the watchful cock awakes the day,
She sings to drive the tedious hours away.
But in warm weather, when the skies are clear,
By day-light reap the product of the year:
And in the sun your golden grain display;
And thresh it out, and winnow it by day.
Plough naked, swain, and naked sow the land,
For lazy winter numbs the labouring hand.
In genial winter, swains enjoy their store,
Forget their hardships, and recruit for more.
The farmer to full bowls invites his friends,
And what he got with pains, with pleasure spends.
So sailors, when escap'd from stormy seas,
First crown their vessels, then indulge their ease.
Yet that's the proper time to thrash the wood
For mast of oak, your father's homely food.

To gather laurel-berries, and the spoil
Of bloody myrtles, and to press your oil.
For stalking cranes to set the guileful snare,
T' inclose the stags in toils, and hunt the hare.
With Balearic slings, or Gnosian bow,
To persecute from far the flying doe.
Then, when the fleecy skies new clothe the wood,
And cakes of rustling ice came rolling down the flood.

Now sing we stormy stars, when autumn weighs
The year, and adds to nights, and shortens days;
And suns declining shine with feeble rays:
What cares must then attend the toiling swain;
Or when the lowering spring, with lavish rain,
Beats down the slender stem and bearded grain,
While yet the head is green, or, lightly swell'd
With milky moisture, overlooks the field!
Ev'n when the farmer, now secure of fear,
Sends in the swains to spoil the finish'd year:
Ev'n while the reaper fills his greedy hands,
And binds the golden sheaves in brittle bands:
Oft have I seen a sudden storm arise,
From all the warring winds that sweep the skies:
The heavy harvest from the root is torn,
And whirl'd aloft the lighter stubble born;
With such a force the flying rack is driven,
And such a winter wears the face of heaven:
And oft whole sheets descend of sluicy rain,
Suck'd by the spongy clouds from off the main:
The lofty ikies at once come pouring down,
The promis'd crop and golden labours drown.
The dikes are fill'd, and with a roaring found
The rising rivers float the nether ground;
And rocks the bellowing voice of boiling seas rebound.

The Father of the Gods his glory shrouds;
Involv'd in tempests, and a night of clouds;
And from the middle darkness flashing out,
By fits he deals his fiery bolts about.
Earth feels the motions of her angry God,
Her entrails tremble, and her mountains nod;
And flying beasts in forests seek abode:
Deep horror seizes every human breast,
Their pride is humbled and their fear confess'd:

While he from high his rolling thunder throws,
And fires the mountains with repeated blows:
The rocks are from their old foundations rent;
The winds redouble, and the rains augment:
The waves on heaps are dash'd against the shore,
And now the woods, and now the billows roar.

In fear of this, observe the starry signs,
Where Saturn houses, and where Hermes joins.
But first to heaven thy due devotions pay,
And annual gifts on Ceres' altars lay.
When winter's rage abates, when cheerful hours
Awake the spring, the spring awakes the flowers.
On the green turf thy careless limbs display,
And celebrate the mighty mother's day.
For then the hills with pleasing shades are crown'd,
And sleeps a sweeter on the silken ground:
With milder beams the sun securely shines;
Fat are the lambs, and luscious are the wines.
Let every swain adore her power divine,
And milk and honey mix with sparkling wine:
Let all the choir of clowns attend the show,
In long processions, shouting as they go.

Invoking her to bleſs their yearly ſtores,
 Inviting plenty to their crowded ſtores.
 Thus in the ſpring, and thus in ſummer's heat,
 Before the ſickles touch the ripening wheat,
 On Ceres call; and let the labouring hind
 With oaken wreaths his hollow temples bind:
 On Ceres let him call, and Ceres praife,
 With uncouth dances, and with country lays.

And that by certain ſigns we may preſage
 Of heats and rains, and wind's impetuous rage,
 The ſovereign of the heavens has ſet on high
 The moon, to mark the changes of the ſky:
 When ſouthern blaſts ſhall ceaſe, and when the ſwain

Should near their folds his feeding flocks refrain.
 For, ere the riſing winds begin to roar,
 The working ſeas advance to waſh the ſhore:
 Soft whiſpers run along the leafy woods,
 And mountains whiſtle to the murmuring floods:
 Ev'n then the doubtful billows ſcarce abſtain
 From the toſ'd veſſel on the troubled main;
 When crying cormorants forſake the ſea,
 And, ſtretching to the covert, wing their way;
 When ſportful coots run ſkimming o'er the ſtrand;
 When what'chful herons leave their watery ſtand;
 And mounting upward with erected flight,
 Gain on the ſkies, and ſoar above the fight.
 And oft before tempeſtuous winds ariſe,
 The ſeeming ſtars fall headlong from the ſkies;
 And, ſhooting through the darkneſs, gild the
 night

With ſweeping glories, and long trails of light:
 And chaff with eddy winds is whirl'd around,
 And dancing leaves are liſted from the ground;
 And floating feathers on the waters play.
 But when the winged thunder takes his way
 From the cold north, and eaſt and weſt engage,
 And at their frontiers meet with equal rage,
 The clouds are cruſh'd, a glut of gather'd rain
 The hollow ditches fills, and floats the plain,
 And failors ſurl their dropping ſheets amain. }
 Wet weather ſeldom hurts the moſt unwiſe,
 So plain the ſigns, ſuch prophets are the ſkies:
 The wary crane foreſees it firſt, and fails
 Above the ſtorm, and leaves the lowly vales:
 The cow looks up, and from afar can find,
 The change of heaven, and ſnuffs it in the wind.
 The ſwallow ſkins the river's watery face,
 The frogs renew the croaks of their loquacious
 race.

The careful ant her ſecret cell forſakes,
 And drags her eggs along the narrow tracks.
 At either horn the rainbow drinks the flood,
 Huge flocks of riſing rooks forſake their food, }
 And, crying, ſee: the ſhelter of the wood.
 Beſides, the ſeveral ſorts of watery fowls,
 That ſwim the ſeas, or haunt the ſtanding pools:
 The ſwans that ſail along the ſilver flood,
 And dive with ſtretching necks to ſearch their food, [vain,
 Then lave their backs with ſprinkling dews in
 And ſtem the ſtream to meet the promis'd rain.
 The crow, with clamorous cries, the ſhower demands,
 And ſingle ſtalks along the deſert ſands.
 The nightly virgin, while her wheel the plies,
 Foreſees the ſtorm impending in the ſkies,

When ſparkling lamps their ſputtering light advance,
 And in the ſockets oily bubbles dance.

Then after ſhowers, 'tis eaſy to deſcry
 Returning ſuns, and a ſererer ſky:
 The ſtars ſhine ſmarter, and the moon adorns,
 As with unborrow'd beams, her ſharpen'd horns.
 The filmy goſſamer now ſlits no more,
 Nor halcyons balk on the ſhort ſunny ſhore:
 Their litter is not toſ'd by fows unclean,
 But a blue draughty miſt deſcends upon the plain.
 And owls, that mark the ſetting-ſun, declare
 A ſtar-light evening, and a morning fair.
 Towering aloft, avenging Niſus flies,
 While dar'd below the guilty Scylla lies.
 Wherever frighted Scylla flies away,
 Swift Niſus follows, and purſues his prey.
 Where injur'd Niſus takes his airy courſe,
 Thence trembling Scylla flies, and ſhuns his force.
 This puniſhment purſues th' unhappy maid,
 And thus the purple hair is dearly paid.
 Then, thrice the ravens rend the liquid air,
 And croaking notes proclaim the ſettled fair.
 Then, round their airy palaces they fly,
 To greet the ſun: and ſeiz'd with ſecret joy,
 When ſtorms are over-blown, with food repair
 To their forſaken neſts, and callow care.
 Not that I think their breſts with heavenly ſouls
 Inſpir'd, as man, who deſtiny controls;
 But with the changeful temper of the ſkies,
 As rains condense, and ſunſhine ratifies;
 To turn the ſpecies in their alter'd minds,
 Compos'd by calms, and diſcompos'd by winds.
 From hence proceeds the birds harmonious voice;
 From hence the cows exult, and friſking lambs rejoice.

Obſerve the daily circle of the ſun,
 And the ſhort year of each revolving moon:
 By them thou ſhalt foreſee the following day;
 Nor ſhall a ſtarry night thy hopes betray.
 When firſt the moon appears, if then the ſhrouds
 Her ſilver creſcent, tipp'd with ſable clouds;
 Conclude ſhe bodes a tempeſt on the main,
 And brews for fields impetuous floods of rain.
 Or if her face with fiery ſhining glow,
 Expect the rattling winds aloft to blow.
 But four nights old, (for that's the ſureſt ſign,)
 With ſharpen'd horns if glorious then ſhe ſhine;
 Next day, not only that, but all the moon,
 Till her revolving race be wholly run,
 Are void of tempeſts both by land and ſea,
 And failors in the port their promis'd vows ſhall
 pay.

Above the reſt, the ſun, who never lies,
 Foretels the change of weather in the ſkies;
 For, if he riſe, unwilling to his race,
 Clouds on his brow, and ſpots upon his face;
 Or if through miſts he ſhoots his ſullen beams,
 Frugal of light, in looſe and ſtragglng ſtreams:
 Suspect a diſtressing day, with ſouthern rain,
 Fatal to fruits, and flocks, and promis'd grain.
 Or if Aurora with half-open'd eyes,
 And a pale ſickly cheek, ſalute the ſkies,
 How ſhall the vine, with tender leaves defend
 Her teeming cluſters, when the ſtorms deſcend;
 When ridgy roofs and tiles can ſcarce avail
 To bar the ruin of the rattling hail?

But, more than all, the setting-sun survey,
 When down the steep of heaven he drives the day.
 For oft we find him finishing his race
 With various colours erring on his face;
 If fiery red his glowing globe defends,
 High winds and furious tempests he portends:
 But if his cheeks are swoln with livid blue,
 He bodes wet weather by his watery hue;
 If dusky spots are vary'd on his brow,
 And streak'd with red a troubled colour show;
 That sullen mixture shall at once declare,
 Winds, rain, and storms, and elemental war.
 What desperate madmen then would venture o'er
 The frith, or haul his cables from the shore?
 But if with purple rays he brings the light,
 And a pure heaven resigns to quiet night;
 No rising winds or falling storms, are nigh:
 But northern breezes through the forests fly;
 And drive the rack, and purge the ruffled sky.
 Th' unerring sun by certain signs declares,
 What the late ev'n, or early morn prepares:
 And when the south projects a stormy day,
 And when the clearing north will puff the clouds
 away

The sun reveals the secrets of the sky;
 And who dares give the source of light the lie?
 The change of empires often he declares,
 Fierce tumults, hidden treasons, open wars.
 He first the fate of Cæsar did foretel,
 And pity'd Rome, when Rome in Cæsar fell.
 In iron clouds conceal'd the public light;
 And impious mortals fear'd eternal night.

Nor was the fact foretold by him alone:
 Nature herself stood forth, and seconded the sun.
 Earth, air, and seas, with prodigies were sign'd,
 And birds obscene, and howling dogs divin'd.
 What rocks did Ætna's bellowing mouth expire
 From her torn entrails; and what floods of fire!
 What clanks were heard, in German skies afar,
 Of arms and armies, rushing to the war!
 Dire earthquakes rent the solid Alps below,
 And from their summits shook th' eternal snow:
 Pale spectres in the close of night were seen;
 And voices heard of more than mortal men.
 In silent groves, dumb sheep and oxen spoke,
 And streams ran backward, and their beds forsook:
 The yawning earth disclos'd th' abyfs of hell:
 The weeping statues did the wars foretel;
 And holy sweat from brazen idols fell.
 Then rising in his might, the king of floods
 Rush'd through the forests, tore the lofty woods;

And rolling onward, with a sweepy sway,
 Bore houses, herds, and labouring hinds away.
 Blood sprang from wells, wolves howl'd in towns
 by night,

And boding victims did the priests affright.
 Such peals of thunder never pour'd from high,
 Nor fork lightning's flash'd from such a fullen
 sky.

Red meteors ran across th' ethereal space;
 Stars disappear'd, and comets took their place.
 For this, th' Emathian plains once more were strow'd

With Roman bodies, and just heaven thought
 To fatten twice those fields with Roman blood.
 Then, after length of time, the labouring swains,
 Who turn the turfs of those unhappy plains,
 Shall rusty piles from the plough'd furrows take,
 And over empty helmets pass the rake,
 Amaz'd at antique titles on the stones,
 And mighty relics of gigantic bones.

Ye homeborn deities, of mortal birth!
 Thou, father Romulus, and mother Earth,
 Goddess unmov'd! whose guardian arms extend O'er Tuscan Tiber's course, and Roman towers defend;

With youthful Cæsar your joint powers engage,
 Nor hinder him to save the sinking age.
 O! let the blood, already spilt, atone
 For the past crimes of curst Laomedon!
 Heaven wants thee there; and long the gods, we know,

Have grudg'd thee, Cæsar, to the world below:
 Where fraud and rapine, right and wrong con-
 found;

Where infamous arms from every part resound,
 And monstrous crimes in every shape are
 crown'd.

The peaceful peasant to the wars is prest;
 The fields lie fallow in inglorious rest:
 The plain no pasture to the flock affords;
 The crooked scythes are straighten'd into swords:
 And there Euphrates her soft offspring arms,
 And here the Rhine re-bellows with alarms;
 The neighbouring cities range on several sides,
 Perfidious Mars long plighted leagues divides,
 And o'er the wafst world in triumph rides.
 So four fierce courfers starting to the race,
 Scour through the plain, and lengthen every pace:
 Nor reins, nor curbs, nor threatening cries they
 fear,

But force along the trembling charioteer.

THE ARGUMENT.

The subject of the following Book is Planting. In handling of which argument, the Poet shews all the different methods of raising trees: describes their variety; and gives rules for the management of each in particular. He then points out the soils in which the several plants thrive best: and thence takes occasion to run out into the praises of Italy. After which he gives some directions for discovering the nature of every soil; prescribes rules for dressing of vines, olives, &c. And concludes the Georgic with a panegyric on a country life.

Thus far of tillage, and of heavenly signs;
Now sing, my Muse, the growth of generous vines:
The shady groves, the woodland progeny;
And the slow product of Minerva's tree.

Great father Bacchus! to my song repair;
For clustering grapes are thy peculiar care:
For thee large bunches load the bending vine,
And the last blessings of the year are thine;
To thee his joys the jolly Autumn owes,
When the fermenting juice the vat o'erflows.
Come sip with me, my god, come drench all o'er Thy limbs in must of wine, and drink at every pore.

Some trees their birth to bounteous Nature
owe;

For some without the pains of planting grow.
With others thus the banks of brooks abound,
Sprung from the watery genius of the ground:
From the same principle gray willows come;
Herculean poplar, and the tender broom.
But some from seeds inclos'd in earth arise;
For thus the mastful chestnut mates the skies.
Hence rise the branching beech and vocal oak,
Where Jove of old oraculously spoke.

Some from the root a rising wood disclose;
Thus elms, and thus the savage cherry grows:
Thus the green bay, that binds the poet's brows,
Shoots, and is shelter'd by the mother's boughs.

These ways of planting, Nature did ordain,
For trees and shrubs, and all the sylvan reign.
Others there are, by late experience found:
Some cut the shoot, and plant in furrow'd ground;
Some cover rooted stalks in deeper mold:
Some cloven stakes, and (wondrous to behold),
Their sharpen'd ends in earth their footing place,
And the dry poles produce a living race.

Some bow their vines, which, bury'd in the plain,
Their tops in distant arches rise again.
Others no root require, the labourer cuts
Young slips, and in the soil securely puts.
Ev'n stumps of olives, bar'd of leaves, and dead,
Revive, and oft redeem their wither'd head.

'Tis usual now, an inmate graft to see
With insolence invade a foreign tree:
Thus pears and quinces from the crab tree come;
And thus the ruddy cornel bears the plum.

Then let the learned gardener mark with care
The kinds of stocks, and what those kinds will bear,

Explore the nature of each several tree;
And known, improve with artful industry;
And let no spot of idle earth be found,
But cultivate the genius of the ground.
For open Ixmarus will Bacchus please;
Faburnus loves the shade of olive trees.

The virtues of the several foils I sing,
Mæcenas, now thy needful succour bring!
O thou! the better part of my renown,
Inspire thy Poet, and thy Poem crown;
Embark with me, while I new tracks explore,
With flying sails, and breezes from the shore:
Not that my song, in such a scanty space,
So large a subject fully can embrace:
Not though I were supply'd with iron lungs,
A hundred mouths, fill'd with as many tongues:
But steer my vessel with a steady hand,
And coast along the shore in sight of land.

Nor will I tire thy patience with a train
Of preface, or what ancient poets feign.
The trees, which of themselves advance in air,
Are barren kinds, but strongly built, and fair:
Because the vigour of the native earth
Maintains the plant, and makes a manly birth.
Yet these, receiving grafts of other kind,
Or thence transplanted, change their savage
mind;

Their wildness lose, and, quitting Nature's part,
Obey the rules and discipline of art.
The same do trees, that, sprung from barren roots
In open fields, transplanted bear their fruits.

For where they grow, the native energy
Turns all into the substance of the tree,
Starves and destroys the fruit, is only made
For brawny bulk, and for a barren shade.
The plant that shoots from seed, a fullen tree
At leisure grows, for late posterity;
The generous flavour lost, the fruits decay,
And savage grapes are made the birds ignoble
Much labour is requir'd in trees, to tame
Their wild disorder, and in ranks reclaim.
Well must the ground be digg'd, and better
dress'd,

New soil to make, and meliorate the rest.
Old stakes of olive-trees in plants revive;
By the same methods Paphian myrtles live:
But nobler vines by propagation thrive.

From roots hard hazles, and from cyons rise
Tall ash, and taller oak that mates the skies:
Palm, poplar, fir, descending from the steep
Of hills, to try the dangers of the deep.

The thin-leav'd arbut, hazle-graffs receives,
And plains huge apples bear, that bore but leaves:
Thus mastful beech the bristly chestnut bears,
And the wild ash is white with blooming pears,
And greedy swine from grafted elms are fed
With falling acorns, that on oaks are bred.

But various are the ways to change the state
Of plants, to bud, to graft, to inoculate.

For where the tender rinds of trees disclose
Their shooting gems, a swelling knot there grows;
Just in that space a narrow slit we make,
Then other buds from bearing trees we take:

Inserted thus, the wounded rind we close,
In whose moist womb th' admitted infant grows.
But when the smoother bole from knots is free,
We make a deep incision in the tree;

And in the solid wood the slip inclose,
The battening bastard shoots again and grows;
And in short space the laden boughs arise,
With happy fruit advancing to the skies.
The mother-plant admires the leaves unknown
Of alien trees, and apples not her own.

Of vegetable woods are various kinds,
And the same species are of several kinds.
Lotes, willows, elms, have different forms allow'd,
So funeral cypress rising like a shroud,
Fat olive trees of sundry sorts appear,

Of sundry shapes their unctuous berries bear.
Radii long olives, Orchites round produce,
And bitter Pausia, pounded for the juice.
Alcinous' orchard various apples bears:

Unlike are bergamotes and pounder pears.
Nor our Italian vines produce the shape,
Or taste, or flavour of the Lesbian grape.

The Thasian vines in richer soils abound,
The Meriotique grow in barren ground.
The Pithian grape we dry : Lagæan juice
Will flaming tongues and staggering feet produce.

Rathe ripe are some, and some of later kind ;
Of golden some, and some of purple rind.
How shall I praise the Ræthian grape divine,
Which yet contends not with Falærian wine !
Th' Aminean many a consulship survives,
And longer than the Lydian vintage lives,
Or high Phanæus king of Chian growth :
But for large quantities and lasting both,
The Ics Argitis bears the prize away.
The Rhodian, sacred to the solemn day,
In second services is pour'd to Jove ;
And best accepted by the gods above.
Nor must Bumastus his old honours lose,
In length and largeness like the dugs of cows.
I pass the rest, whose every race and name,
And kinds, are less material to my theme.
Which who would learn, as soon may tell the sands,
Driven by the western wind on Lybian lands ;
Or number, when the blustering Eurus roars,
The billows beating on Ionian shores.

Nor every plant on every soil will grow :
The fallow loves the watery ground, and low ;
The marshes, alders ; Nature seems t' ordain
The rocky cliff for the wild ash's reign ;
The baleful yew to northern blasts assigns ;
'T' shores the myrtles, and to mounts the vines.

Regard th' extremest cultivated coast,
From hot Arabia to the Scythian frost :
All sorts of trees their several countries know ;
Black ebony only will in India grow :
And odorous frankincense on the Sabæan bough.
Balm slowly trickles through the bleeding veins
Of happy shrubs, in Idumæan plains.
The green Egyptian thorn, for medicine good ;
With Ethiops hoary trees and wooly wood,
Let others tell : and how the Seres spin
Their fleecy forests in a slender twine.
With mighty trunks of trees on Indian shores,
Whose height above the feather'd arrow soars,
Shot from the toughest bow ; and by the brawn
Of expert archers with vast vigour drawn,
Sharp tasted citrons Median climes produce :
Bitter the rind, but generous is the juice :
A cordial fruit, a present antidote
Against the direful stepdame's deadly draught :
Who, mixing wicked deeds with words impure,
The fate of envy'd orphans would procure.
Large is the plant, and like a laurel grows,
And did it not a different scent disclose,
A laurel were : the fragrant flowers contemn
The stormy winds, tenacious of their item.
With this the Medes to labouring age bequeath
New lungs, and cure the founes of the breath.

But neither Median woods (a plenteous land),
Fair Ganges, Hermus rolling golden sand,
Nor Bactria, nor the richer Indian fields,
Nor all the gummy shores Arabia yields ;
Nor any foreign earth of greater name,
Can with sweet Italy contend in fame.
No bulls, whose nostrils breathe a living flame,
Have turn'd our turf ; no teeth of serpents here
Were sown, an armed host, an iron crop to bear.

But fruitful vines, and the fat olives freight,
And harvests heavy with their fruitful weight,
Adorn our fields ; and on the cheerful green,
The grazing flocks and lowing herds are seen:
The warrior-horse, here bred, is taught to train :
There flows Clitumnus through the flowery plain ;
Whose waves for triumphs after prosperous war,
The victim ox and snowy sheep prepare.
Perpetual spring our happy climate sees ;
Twice breed the cattle, and twice bear the trees ;
And summer suns recede by slow degrees.

Our land is from the rage of tigers freed,
Nor nourishes the lion's angry feed ;
Nor poisonous aconite is here produc'd,
Or grows unknown, or is, when known, refus'd.
Nor in so vast a length our serpents glide,
Or rais'd on such a spiry volume ride.

Next add our cities of illustrious name,
Their costly labour and stupendous frame :
Our forts on steepy hills, that far below
See wanton streams in winding valleys flow.
Our two-fold seas, that, washing either side,
A rich recruit of foreign stores provide.
Our spacious lakes ; thee, Larius, first ; and next Benacus, with tempestuous billows vex.
Or shall I praise thy ports, or mention make
Of the vast mound that binds the Lucrian lake ;
Or the disdainful sea, that, shut from thence,
Roars round the structure, and invades the fence ;
There, where secure the Julian waters glide,
Or where Avernus' jaws admit the Tyrrhene tide ?
Our quarries deep in earth, were fam'd of old
For veins of silver, and for ore of gold.
Th' inhabitants themselves their country grace ;
Hence rose the Marfan and Sabellian race :
Strong-limb'd and stout, and to the wars inclin'd,
And hard Ligurians, a laborous kind ;
And Volscians, arm'd with iron-headed darts,
Besides an offspring of undaunted hearts,
The Decii, Marii, great Camillus came
From hence, and greater Scipio's double name :
And mighty Cæsar, whose victorious arms
To farthest Asia carry fierce alarms :
Avert unwarlike Indians from his Rome ;
Triumph abroad, secure our peace at home.

Hail, sweet Saturnian soil ! of fruitful grain
Great Parent, greater of illustrious men ;
For thee my tuneful accents will I raise,
And treat of arts disclos'd in ancient days :
Once more unlock for thee the sacred spring,
And old Africæan verse in Roman cities sing.

The nature of their several soils now see,
Their strength, their colour, their fertility :
And first for heath, and barren hilly ground,
Where meagre clay and flinty stones abound ;
Where the poor soil all succour seems to want,
Yet this suffices the Palladian plant.
Undoubted signs of such a soil are found,
For here wild olive shoots o'erspread the ground,
And heaps of berries strew the fields around.
But where the soil, with fattening moisture fill'd,
Is cloth'd with grass, and fruitful to be till'd ;
Such as in cheerful vales we view from high ;
Which dripping rocks with rolling streams supply,
And feed with ooze, where rising hillocks run
In length, and open to the southern sun ;

Where fern succeeds, ungrateful to the plough,
That gentle ground to generous grapes allow;
Strong flocks of vines it will in time produce,
And overflow the vats with friendly juice;
Such as our priests in golden goblets pour
To gods, the givers of the cheerful hour;
Then when the bloated Thufcan blows his horn,
And reeking entrails are in chargers borne.

If herds or fleecy flocks be more thy care,
Or goats that graze the field, and burn it bare,
Then seek Tarentum's lawns and farthest coast,
Or such a field as hapless Mantua lost:
Where slyer ivans sail down the watery road,
And graze the floating herbage of the flood,
There crystal streams perpetual tenour keep,
Nor food nor springs are wanting to thy sheep.

For what the day devours, the nightly dew
Shall to the morn in pearly drops renew.
Fat crumbling earth is fitter for the plough,
Putrid and loose above, and black below;
For ploughing is an imitative toil,
Resembling nature in an easy soil.

No land for seed like this, no fields afford
So large an income to the village-lord!
No toiling teams from harvest-labour come
So late at night, so heavy laden home.

The like of forest land is understood,
From whence the surly ploughman grubs the wood,

Which had for length of ages idle stood.
Then birds forsake the ruins of their seat,
And flying from their nests their callow young forget.

The coarse lean gravel on the mountain sides,
Scarce dewy beverage for the bees provides:
Nor chalk nor crumbling stones, the food of snakes,

That work in hollow earth their winding tracks.
The soil exhaling clouds of subtle dews,
imbibing moisture which with ease she spews:
Which rusts not iron, and whose mould is clean,
Vell cloth'd with cheerful grass, and ever green,
good for olives, and aspiring vines,
embracing husband elms, in amorous twines!
fit for feeding cattle, fit to sow,
and equal to the pasture and the plough.

Such is the soil of fat Campanian fields, which large increase the land that joins Vefuvius yields;

and such a country could Acerra boast,
ill Clanius overflow'd th' unhappy coast,
teach thee next the differing soils to know;
he light for vines, the heavier for the plough.
hoofe first a place for such a purpose fit,
here dig the solid earth, and sink a pit.

Next fill the hole with its own earth again,
and trample with thy feet, and tread it in;
then if it rise not to the former height of superfluous, conclude that soil is light;
proper ground for pasturage and vines.

But if the sullen earth, so press'd, repines, within its native mansion to retire,
and stays without, a heap of heavy mire;
this good for arable, a glebe that asks,
ough teams of oxen, and laborious tasks.

Salt earth and bitter are not fit to sow,
or will be tam'd and mended by the plough.

Vol. XII.

Sweet grapes degenerate there, and fruits declin'd
From their first flavorful taste, renounce their kind.
This truth by sure experiment is try'd:
For first an oser colander provide Of twigs thick wrought (such toiling peasants twine, (wine);

When through strait passages they strain their
In this close vessel place that earth accurs'd,
But fill'd brimful with wholesome water first:
Then run it through, the drops will rope around,
And by the bitter taste disclose the ground.

The fatter earth by handling we may find,
With ease distinguish'd from the meagre kind:
Poor soil will crumble into dust, the rich
Will to the fingers cleave like clammy pitch:
Moist earth produces corn and grass, but both
Too rank and too luxuriant in their growth.

Let not my land so large a promise boast,
Lest the lank ears in length of stem be lost.
The heavier earth is by her weight betray'd,
The lighter in the poising hand is weigh'd:
'Tis easy to distinguish by the sight,
The colour of the soil, and black from white.

But the cold ground is difficult to know,
Yet this the plants, that prosper there, will show;

Black ivy, pitch trees, and the baleful yew.

These rules consider'd well, with early care

The vineyard destin'd for thy vines prepare:

But, long before the planting, dig the ground,
With furrows deep that cast a rising mound:

The clods, expos'd to winter winds, will bake;
For putrid earth will best in vineyards take,
And hoary frosts, after the painful toil
Of delving hinds will rot the mellow soil.

Some peasants, not to omit the nicest care,
Of the same soil their nursery prepare,

With that of their plantation; lest the tree
Translated, should not with the soil agree.

Beside, to plant it as it was, they mark
The heaven's four quarters on the tender bark;

And to the north or south restore the side,
Which at their birth did heat or cold abide.

So strong is custom, such effects can use
In tender souls of pliant plants produce.

Choose next a province for thy vineyard's reign,
On hills above, or in the lowly plain:

If fertile fields or vallies be thy choice,
Plant thick, for bounteous Bacchus will rejoice

In close plantations there. But if the vine
On rising grounds be plac'd, or hills supine,

Extend thy loose battalions largely wide,
Opening thy ranks and files on either side:

But marshal'd all in order as they stand,
And let no soldier fraggle from his band.

As legions in the field their front display,
To try the fortune of some doubtful day.

And move to meet their foes with sober pace,
Strict to their figure, though in wider space;

Before the battle joins; while from afar
The field yet glitters with the pomp of war,

And equal Mars like an impartial lord,
Leaves all to fortune, and the dint of sword;

So let thy vines in intervals be set,
But not their rural discipline forget:

Indulge their width, and add a roomy space,
That their extremest lines may scarce embrace:

Nor this alone t' indulge a vain delight,
 And make a pleasing prospect for the sight:
 But for the ground itself, this only way
 Can equal vigour to the plants convey;
 Which, crowded, want the room their branches to display.

How deep they must be planted, would't it thou
 In shallow furrows vines securely grow. [know?
 Not so the rest of plants; for Jove's own tree,
 That holds the woods in awful sovereignty,
 Requires a depth of lodging in the ground;
 And, next the lower skies, a bed profound;
 High as his topmast boughs to heaven ascend,
 So low his roots to hell's dominion tend.
 Therefore, nor winds, nor winter's rage o'erthrows
 His bulky body, but unmov'd he grows.
 For length of ages lasts his happy reign,
 And lives of mortal man contend in vain.
 Full in the midst of his own strength he stands,
 Stretching his brawny arms, and leafy hands;
 His shade protects the plains, his head the hills commands.

The hurtful hazle in thy vineyard shun;
 Nor plant it to receive the setting sun:
 Nor break the topmost branches from the tree;
 Nor prune, with blunted knife, the progeny.
 Root up wild olives from thy labour'd lands:
 For sparkling fire, from hinds unwary hands,
 Is often scatter'd o'er their unctuous rinds,
 And after spread abroad by raging winds.
 For first the smould'ring flame the trunk receives,
 Ascending thence, 't crackles in the leaves;
 At length victorious to the top aspires,
 Involving all the wood in smoky fires,
 But most, when driven by winds, the flaming storm
 Of the long files destroys the beauteous form.
 In ashes then th' unhappy vineyard lies,
 Nor will the blasted plants from ruin rise:
 Nor will the wither'd stock be green again,
 But the wild olive shoots, and shades th' ungrateful plain.

Be not seduc'd with wisdom's empty shows,
 To stir the peaceful ground when Boreas blows.
 When winter frosts constrain the field with cold,
 The fainty root can take no steady hold.
 But when the golden spring reveals the year,
 And the white bird returns, whom serpents fear;
 That season deem the best to plant thy vines,
 Next that, is when autumnal warmth declines;
 Ere heat is quite decay'd, or cold begun,
 Or Capricorn admits the winter sun.

The spring adorns the woods, renews the leaves,
 The womb of earth the genial seed receives.
 For then Almighty Jove descends, and pours
 Into his baxom bride his fruitful showers;
 And, mixing his large limbs with hers, he feeds
 Her birth with kindly juice, and fosters teeming feeds.

Then joyous birds frequent the lonely grove,
 And beasts, by nature stung, renew their love.
 Then fields the blades of bury'd corn disclose,
 And, while the balmy western spirit blows,
 Earth to the breath her bosom dares expose.
 With kindly moisture then the plants abound,
 The grafs securely springs above the ground;
 The tender twig shoots upward to the skies,
 And on the faith of the new sun relies.

The swerving vines on the tall elms prevail
 Unhurt by southern showers or northern hail.
 They spread their gems the genial warmth to
 share,

And boldly trust the buds in open air.
 In this soft season (let me dare to sing)
 The world was hatch'd by heaven's imperial king:

In prime of all the year, and holidays of spring.
 Then did the new creation first appear;
 Nor other was the tenour of the year:
 When laughing heaven did the great birth attend,
 And eastern winds their wintery breath suspend:
 Then sheep first saw the sun in open fields;
 And savage beasts were sent to stock the wilds:
 And golden stars flew up to light the skies,
 And man's relentless race from stony quarries rife.
 Nor could the tender, new creation, bear
 Th' excessive heats or coldness of the year;
 But, chill'd by winter, or by summer fir'd,
 The middle temper of the spring requir'd.
 When warmth and moisture did at once abound,
 And heaven's indulgence brooded on the ground.

For what remains, in depth of earth secure
 Thy cover'd plants, and dung with hot manure;
 And shells and gravel in the ground enclose;
 For through their hollow chinks the water flows:
 Which, thus imbib'd, returns in misty dews,
 And, steaming up, the rising plant renews.
 Some husbandmen, of late, have found the way,
 A hilly heap of stones above to lay
 And press the plants with shreds of potter's clay.
 This fence against immoderate rain they found:
 Or when the Dog-star leaves the thirsty ground.
 Be mindful, when thou hast entomb'd the shoot,
 With store of earth around to feed the root;
 With iron teeth of rakes and prongs to move
 The crusted earth, and loosen it above.
 Then exercise thy sturdy steers to plough
 Betwixt thy vines, and teach the feeble row
 To mount on reeds and wands, and, upward led,
 On ashen poles to raise their forky head.
 On these new crutches let them learn to walk,
 Till, swerving upwards, with a stronger stalk,
 They brave the winds, and, clinging to their
 guide,

On tops of elms at length triumphant ride.
 But in their tender nonage, while they spread
 Their springing leaves, and lift their infant head,
 And upward while they shoot in open air,
 Indulge their childhood, and the nursing spare.
 Nor exercise thy rage on new-born life,
 But let thy hand supply the pruning-knife;
 And crop luxuriant stragglers, nor be loth
 To strip the branches of their leafy growth:
 But when the rooted vines, with steady hold,
 Can clasp their elms, then, husbandmen, be bold
 To lop the disobedient bows, that fray'd
 Beyond their ranks: let crooked steel invade
 The lawless troops, which discipline disclaim,
 And their superfluous growth with rigour tame.
 Next, fence'd with hedges and deep ditches round,
 Exclude th' encroaching cattle from thy ground,
 While yet the tender germs but just appear,
 Unable to sustain th' uncertain year;
 Whose leaves are not alone foul winter's prey,
 But oft by summer suns are scorch'd away;

and, worse than both, become th' unworthy browfe,
of buffalos, salt goats, and hungry cows.
or not December's frost that burns the boughs, or Dog-days parching heat that splits the rocks,
are half so harmful as the greedy flocks ;
their venom'd bite, and scars indented on the stocks.

For this the malefactor goat was laid on Bacchus' altar, and his forfeit paid.
At Athens thus old comedy began,
When round the streets the reeling actors ran ;
in country villages, and crossing ways,
contending for the prizes of their plays :
And glad, with Bacchus, on the grassy soil,
capt o'er the skins of goats besmear'd with oil.
Thus Roman youth, deriv'd from ruin'd Troy,
in rude Saturnian rhymes expresses their joy :
With taunts, and laughter loud, their audience
please,

reform'd with vizards, cut from barks of trees :
In jolly hymns they praise the God of wine, whose earthen images adorn the pine ;
and there are hung on high, in honour of the vine :

madness so devout the vineyard fills,
in hollow vallies and on rising hills ;
in whate'er side he turns his honest face, and dances in the wind, those fields are in his grace.

So Bacchus therefore let us tune our lays,
and in our mother tongue rebound his praise.
In casks in chargers, and a guilty goat, ragg'd by the horns, be to his altars brought ;
whose offer'd entrails shall his crime reproach,
and drip their fatness from the hazle broach.
So dress thy vines new labour is requir'd,
or must the painful husbandman be tir'd :
or thrice, at least, in compass of a year,
thy vineyard must employ the sturdy steer,
to turn the glebe ; besides thy daily pain to break the clods, and make the surface plain :
to unload the branches, or the leaves to thin,
that suck the vital moisture of the vine.
Thus in a circle runs the peasant's pain,
and the year rolls within itself again.

When in the lowest mouths, when storms have shed from vines the hairy honours of their head, or then the drudging hind his labour ends,
at to the coming year his care extends :
when then the naked vine he persecutes ;
is pruning-knife at once reforms and cuts.
The first to dig the ground, be first to burn the branches lopt, and first the props return to thy house, that bore the burden'd vines ;
at last to reap the vintage of thy wines ;
twice in the year luxuriant leaves o'er shade his incumbent vine ; rough brambles twice invade ;

ard labour both ! commend the large excess of spacious vineyards ; cultivate the less.
In cludes, in woods the shrubs of prickly thorn, allows and reeds on banks of rivers born,
remain to cut ; for vineyards useful found,
to stay thy vines, and fence thy fruitful ground.
or when thy tender trees at length are bound ;

When peaceful vines from pruning-hooks are free,
When husbands have survey'd the last degree,
And utmost files of plants, and order'd every tree ;

Ev'n when they sing at ease in full content,
Insulting o'er the toils they underwent ;
Yet still they find a future talk remain ;
To turn the soil, and break the clods again :
And after all, their joys are unsincere,
While falling rains on ripening grapes they fear.
Quite opposite to these are olives found,
No dressing they require, and dread no wound ;
No rakes nor harrows need, but fix'd below,
Rejoice in open air, and unconcern'dly grow.
The soil itself due nourishment supplies :
Plough but the furrows, and the fruits arise :
Content with small endeavours till they spring,
Soft peace they figure, and sweet plenty bring :
Then olives plant, and hymns to Pallas sing :

Thus apple-trees, whose trunks are strong to bear

Their spreading boughs, exert themselves in air ;
Want no supply, but stand secure alone,
Not trusting foreign forces, but their own ;
Till with the ruddy freight the bending branches groan.

Thus trees of nature, and each common bush,
Uncultivated thrive, and with red berries blush ;
Vile shrubs are thorn for browfe : the towering height

Of unctuous trees are torches for the night.
And shall we doubt (indulging easy sloth)
To sow, to set, and to reform their growth ?
To leave the lofty plants ; the lowly kind
Are for the shepherd or the sheep design'd.
Ev'n humble broom and osiers have their use,
And shade for sheep, and food for flocks, produce ;
Hedges for corn, and honey for the bees :
Besides the pleasing prospect of the trees.
How goodly looks Cytorus, ever green
With boxen groves ! with what delight are seen
Narycian woods of pitch, whose gloomy shade
Seems for retreat of heavenly Muses made !
But much more pleasing are those fields to see,
That need not ploughs, nor human industry.
Ev'n old Caucasian rocks with trees are spread,
And wear green forests on their hilly head.
Though bending from the blast of eastern storms, Though spent their leaves, and shatter'd are their arms ;

Yet heaven their various plants for use designs :
For houses cedars, and for shipping pines.
Cypress provides for spokes, and wheels of wains :
And all for keels of ships that scour the watery plains.

Willows in twigs are fruitful, elms in leaves ;
The war from stubborn myrtle shafts receives :
From cornels javelins ; and the tougher yew
Receives the bending figure of a bow.
Nor box, nor limes, without their use are made,
Smooth grain'd, and proper for the turner's trade ;
Which curious hands may carve, and steel with ease invade.

Light alder stems the Po's impetuous tide,
And bees in hollow oaks their honey hide,
Now balance, with these gifts the fummy joys
Of wine, attended with eternal noise.

Wine urg'd to lawless lust the Centaurs train, Through wine they quarrel'd, and through wine were slain.

O happy, if he knew his happy state!
The swain, who, free from business and debate
Receives his easy food from nature's hand,
And just returns of cultivated land!
No palace, with a lofty gate, he wants,
T' admit the tides of early visitants,
With eager eyes devouring, as they pass,
The breathing figures of Corinthian brags.
No statues threaten from high pedestals;
No Persian arras hides his homely walls,
With antic vests: which, through their shady fold,
Betray the streaks of ill-dissembled gold.
He boasts no wool, whose native white is dy'd
With purple poison of Assyrian pride.
No costly drugs of Araby desile,
With foreign scents the sweetness of his oil.
But easy quiet, a secure retreat.
A harmless life that knows not how to cheat,
With home-bred plenty the rich owner bleis,
And rural pleasures crown his happiness.
Unvex'd with quarrels, undisturb'd with noise,
The country king his peaceful realm enjoys:
Cool grots, and living lakes, the flowery pride
Of meads and streams that through the valley
glide;

And shady groves that easy sleep invite,
And after toilsome days a soft repose at night.
Wild beasts of nature in his woods abound;
And youth, of labour patient, plough the ground,
Inur'd to hardship, and to homely fare,
Nor venerable age is wanting there,
In great examples to the youthful train:
Nor are the gods ador'd with rites profane.
From hence Astrea took her flight, and here
The prints of her departing steps appear.

Ye sacred Muses, with whose beauty fir'd,
My soul is ravish'd, and my brain inspir'd;
Whose priest I am, whose holy fillets wear,
Would you your poet's first petition hear;
Give me the ways of wandering stars to know:
The depths of heaven above, and earth below.
Teach me the various labours of the moon,
And whence proceed th' eclipses of the sun.
Why flowing tides prevail upon the main,
And in what dark recesses they shrink again.
What shakes the solid earth, what cause delays
The summer nights, and shortens winter days.
But if my heavy blood restrain the flight
Of my free soul, aspiring to the height
Of nature and unclouded fields of light;
My next desire is, void of care and strife,
To lead a soft, secure, inglorious life.

A country cottage near a crystal flood,
A winding valley, and a lofty wood.
Some god conduct me to the sacred shades,
Where bacchanals are sung by Spartan maids,
Or lift me high to Hemus' hilly crown;
Or in the plains of Tempe lay me down:
Or lead me to some solitary place,
And cover my retreat from human race,

Happy the man, who, studying nature's laws,
Through known effects can trace the secret cause.
His mind possessing in a quiet state,
Fearless of Fortune, and resign'd to Fate.

And happy too is he, who decks the bowers
Of sylvans and adores the rural powers:
Whose mind, unmov'd the bribes of courts can see
Their glittering baits and purple slavery.
Nor hopes the people's praise, nor fears their frown,

Nor when contending kindred tear the crown,
Will set up one, or pull another down.
Without concern he hears, but hears from far,
Of tumults and discents, and distant war:
Nor with a superstitious fear is aw'd,
For what befalls at home, or what abroad.
Nor envies he the rich their heapy store,
Nor his own peace disturbs, with pity for the poor.
He feeds on fruits, which, of their own accord,
The willing ground and laden trees afford.
From his lov'd home no lucre him can draw;
The Senate's mad decrees he never saw;
Nor heard, at bawling bars, corrupted law.
Some to the seas and some to camps resort,
And some with impudence invade the court.
In foreign countries others seek renown;
With wars and taxes others waste their own,
And houses burn, and household gods desace,
To drink in bowls which glittering gems enclase:
To loll on couches, rich with Cytron steds,
And lay their guilty limbs on Tyrian beds,
This wretch in earth intombs his golden ore,
Hovering and brooding on his bury'd store.
Some patriot fools to popular praise aspire,
Of public speeches, which worse fools admire.
While from both benches, with redoubled sounds
Th' applause of lords and commoners abounds.
Some through ambition, or through thirst of gold,
Have slain their brothers, or their country sold;
And leaving their sweet homes, in exile run
To lands that lie beneath another sun.

The peasant, innocent of all these ills,
With crooked ploughs the fertile fallows tills;
And the round year with daily labour fills.
And hence the country-markets are supply'd:
Enough remains for household charge beside;
His wife and tender children to sustain,
And gratefully to feed his dumb deserving train.
Nor cease his labours, till the yellow field
A full return of bearded harvest yield;
A crop so plenteous as the land to load,
O'ercome the crowded barns, and lodge on ricks abroad.

Thus every several season is employ'd:
Some spent in toil, and some in ease enjoy'd.
The yeaning ewes prevent the springing year;
The laden boughs their fruits in autumn bear:
'Tis then the vine her liquid harvest yields,
Bak'd in the sun-shine of ascending fields.
The winter comes, and then the falling mast
For greedy swine provides a full repast.
Then olives, ground in mills, their fatness boast,
And winter fruits are mellow'd by the frost.
His cares are eas'd with intervals of bliss;
His little children climbing for a kiss,
Welcome their father's late return at night;
His faithful bed is crown'd with chaste delight.
His kiné, with swelling udders, ready stand,
And lowering for the pail, invite the milker's hand.
His wanton kids, with budding horns prepar'd,
Fight harmless battles in his homely yard:

himself in rustic pomp, on holidays,
 To rural Powers a just oblation pays ;
 And on the green his careless limbs displays. }
 The hearth is in the midst ; the herdsmen round
 The cheerful fire, provoke his health in goblets
 crown'd.
 He calls on Bacchus, and propounds the prize ;
 The groom his fellow groom at butts defies ; }
 And bends his bows, and levels with his eyes.
 For stript for wrestling, smears his limbs with oil,
 And watches with a trip his foe to foil.
 Such was the life the frugal Sabines led ;
 Who Remus and his brother god were bred :
 For whom th' austere Etrurian virtue rose,
 And this rude life our homely fathers chose.

Old Rome from such a race deriv'd her birth,
 (The feat of empire, and the conquer'd earth ;)
 Which now on seven high hills triumphant reigns,
 And in that compass all the world contains.
 Ere Saturn's rebel son usurp'd the skies,
 When beasts were only slain for sacrifice,
 While peaceful Crete enjoy'd her ancient lord,
 Ere founding hammers forg'd th' inhuman sword :
 Ere hollow drums were beat, before the breath
 Of brazen trumpets rung the peals of death ;
 The good old god his hunger did assuage
 With roots and herbs, and gave the golden age ;
 But, over-labour'd with so long a course,
 'Tis time to rest at ease the smoking horse.

B O O K III.

THE ARGUMENT.

This Book begins with the invocation of some rural Deities, and a compliment to Augustus : after which Virgil directs himself to Mæcenas, and enters on his subject. He lays down rules for the breeding and management of horses, oxen, sheep, goats, and dogs ; and interweaves several pleasant descriptions of a chariot-race, of the battle of the bulls, of the force of love, and of the Scythian winter. In the latter part of the Book he relates the diseases incident to cattle ; and ends with the description of a fatal murrian that formerly raged among the Alps.

My fields, propitious Pales, I rehearse ;
 And sing thy pastures in no vulgar verse.
 Amphrysian shepherd ; the Lycæan woods ;
 Arcadia's flowery plains, and pleasing floods.
 All other themes that careless minds invite,
 Are worn with use, unworthy me to write.
 Jovis' altars, and the dire decrees
 Of hard Eurusæus, every reader sees :
 Lylas the boy, Latona's erring isle,
 And Pelops' ivory shoulder, and his toil
 For fair Hippodame, with all the rest
 Of Grecian tales, by poets are express'd ;
 Few ways I must attempt, my groveling name
 To raise aloft, and wing my flight to fame.
 I, first of Romans, shall in triumph come
 From conquer'd Greece, and bring her trophies home :
 With foreign spoils adorn my native place ;
 And with Idume's palms my Mantua grace.
 Of Parian stone a temple will I raise,
 Where the slow Mincius through the valley strays :
 Where cooling streams invite the flocks to drink :
 And reeds defend the winding water's brink.
 Full in the midst shall mighty Cæsar stand :
 Hold the chief honours ; and the dome command.
 When I, conspicuous in my Tyrian gown,
 Submitting to his godhead my renown)
 A hundred coursers from the goal will drive ;
 The rival chariots in the race shall strive.
 All Greece shall flock from far, my games to see ; }
 The whorlbat and the rapid race shall be Refer'd for Cæsar, and ordain'd by me. }
 Myself, with olive crown'd, the gifts will bear ; }
 Ev'n now methinks the public shouts I hear ; }
 The passing pageants and the pomps appear.

I, to the temple will conduct the crew ;
 The sacrifice and sacrificers view ;
 From thence return, attended with my train,
 Where the proud theatres disclose the scene :
 Which interwoven Britons seem to raise,
 And show the triumph which their shame displays.
 High o'er the gate, in elephant and gold,
 The crowd shall Cæsar's Indian war behold ;
 The Nile shall flow beneath ; and on the side
 His shatter'd ships on brazen pillars ride,
 Next him, Niphates, with inverted urn,
 And dropping sage, shall his Armenia mourn ; }
 And Asian cities in our triumph borne.
 With backward bows the Parthian shall be
 there ;
 And, spurring from the fight, confess their fear.
 A double wreath shall crown our Cæsar's brows,
 Two differing trophies, from two differing foes.
 Europe with Africa in his fame shall join ;
 But neither shore his conquest shall confine.
 The Parian marble, there, shall seem to move,
 In breathing statues, not unworthy Jove ;
 Resembling heroes, whose ethereal root
 Is Jove himself, and Cæsar is the fruit,
 Tros and his race the sculptor shall employ ;
 And he the god, who built the walls of Troy.
 Envy herself, at last grown pale and dumb,
 (By Cæsar combated and overcome)
 Shall give her hands ; and fear the curling snakes
 Of lashing furies, and the burning lakes :
 The pains of famish'd Tantalus shall feel ; }
 And Sisyphus that labours up the hill
 The rolling rock in vain ; and curst Ixion's wheel.

Mean time we must pursue the Sylvan lands, (Th' abode of nymphs untouch'd by former
hands;

For such, Mæcenas, are thy hard commands.
Without thee nothing lofty can I sing;
Come then, and with thyself thy genius bring;
With which inspir'd, I brook no dull delay,
Cytheron loudly calls me to my way;
Thy hounds, Taygetus, open, and pursue their prey.

High Epidaurus urges on my speed,
Fam'd for his hills and for his horses breed:
From hills and dales the cheerful cries rebound:
For echo hunts along and propagates the sound.

A time will come, when my maturer muse
In Cæsar's wars, a nobler theme shall choose.
And through more ages bear my sovereign's praise,
Than hath from Tithon past to Cæsar's days.

The generous youth, who, studious of the prize,
The race of running courfers multiplies;
Or to the plough the sturdy bullock breeds,
May know that from the dam the worth of each proceeds.

The mother cow must wear a lowering look,
Sour-headed, strongly neck'd to bear the yoke.
Her double dew-lap from her chin descends:
And at her thighs the ponderous burden ends.
Long as her sides and large, her limbs are great;
Rough are her ears, and broad her horny feet.
Her colour shining black, but fleck'd with white;
She tosses from the yoke: provokes the sight:
She rises in her gait, is free from fears,
And in her face a bull's resemblance bears:
Her ample forehead with a star is crown'd;
And with her length of tail she sweeps the ground.
The bull's insult at four the may sustain;
But, after ten, from nuptial rites refrain.
Six seasons use; but then release the cow,
Unfit for love, and for the labouring plough.

Now while their youth is fill'd with kindly fire,
Submit thy females to the lusty fire;
Watch the quick motions of the striking tail,
Then serve their fury with the rushing male,
Indulging pleasure lest the breed should fail.

In youth alone, unhappy mortals live;
But, ah! the mighty blits is fugitive!
Discolour'd sickness, anxious labour come.
And age, and death's inexorable doom.
Yearly thy herds in vigour will impair;
Recruit and mend them with thy yearly care:
Still propagate, for still they fall away,
'Tis prudence to prevent th' entire decay.

Like diligence require the courser's race;
In early choice, and for a longer space.
The colt, that for a stallion is design'd,
By sure presages shows his generous kind,
Of able body, sound of limb and wind.
I might he walks on pasterns firm and straight,
His motions easy; prancing in his gait.
The first to lead the way, to tempt the flood;
To pass the bridge unknown, nor fear the trembling wood.

Dauntless at empty noises; lofty-neck'd;
Sharp-headed, barrel-belly'd, broadly-back'd,
Erwny his chest, and deep: his colour gray;
For beauty dappled, or the brightest bay:
Haint white and dun will scarce the rearing pay.

The fiery courser, when he hears from far
The sprightly trumpets and the shouts of war,
Pricks-up his ears, and, trembling with delight,
Shifts place, and paws; and hopes the promis'd
fight,

On his right shoulder his thick main reclin'd,
Ruffles at speed, and dances in the wind.
His horny hoofs are jetty black and round,
His chine is double; starting with a bound,
He turns the turf, and shakes the solid ground.
Fire from his eyes, clouds from his nostrils flow:
He bears his rider headlong on the foe.

Such was the steed in Grecian poets fam'd,
Proud Cyllarus, by Spartan Pollux tam'd;
Such courfers bore to fight the god of Thrace;
And such, Achilles, was thy warlike race.
In such a shape, grim Saturn did restrain
His heavenly limbs, and flow'd with such a mane;
When, half-surpris'd, and fearing to be seen,
The letcher gallop'd from his jealous queen;
Ran up the ridges of the rocks amain,
And with shrill neighings fill'd the neighbouring plain.

But worn with years when dire diseases come,
Then hide his not ignoble age at home:
In peace t' enjoy his former palms and pains:
And gratefully be kind to his remains.
For when his blood no youthful spirits move,
He languishes and labours in his love.
And when the sprightly feed should swiftly come,
Dribbling he drudges, and defrauds the womb.
In vain he burns like hasty stubble fires;
And in himself his former self requires.

His age and courage weigh: nor those alone,
But note his father's virtues and his own;
Observe, if he dilaits to yield the prize,
Of loss impatient, proud of victories.

Hast thou beheld, when from the goal they start,
The youthful charioteers with heaving heart
Rush to the race; and panting, scarcely bear
Th' extremes of ferv'ish hope, and chilling fear;
Stoop to the reigns, and lash with all their force;
The flying chariot kindles in the course:
And now a-low, and now aloft they fly,
As borne through air, and seem to touch the sky.
No stop, no stay, but clouds of sand arise,
Spurn'd and cast backward on the follower's eyes.
The hindmost blows the foam upon the first;
Such is the love of praise, an honourable thirst.

Bold Ericthonius was the first, who join'd
Four horses for the rapid race design'd;
And o'er the dusty wheels presiding fate;
The Lapithæ to chariots, add the state
Of bits and bridles; taught the steed to bound;
To run the ring, and trace the mazy round.
To stop, to fly, the rules of war to know:
I' obey the rider, and to dare the foe.

To choose a youthful steed, with courage fir'd;
To breed him, break him, back him, are requir'd
Experienc'd masters, and in sundry ways:
Their labours equal, and alike their praise.
But once again the batter'd horse beware,
The weak old stallion will deceive thy care.
Though famous in his youth for force and
Or was of Argos or Epirian breed, [speed]
Or did from Neptune's race, or from himself proceed.

These things promis'd, when now the nuptial
Approaches for the stately steed to climb; [time
With food enable him to make his court;
Defend his chine, and pamper him for sport.
Feed him with herbs, whatever thou canst find,
Of generous warmth, and of salacious kind.
Then water him, and (drinking what he can)
Encourage him to thirst again, with bran.
Instructed thus, produce him to the fair:
And join in wedlock to the longing mare.
For, if the fire be faint, or out of case,
He will be copied in his famish'd race:
And sink beneath the pleasing task assign'd:
(For all's too little for the craving kind.)

As for the females, with industrious care
Take down their mettle, keep them lean and bare;
When conscious of their past delight, and keen
To take the leap, and prove the sport again;
With scanty measure then supply their food;
And, when athirst, restrain them from the flood;
Their bodies harrafs, sink them when they run;
And fry their melting marrow in the sun.
Starve them, when barns beneath their burden
groan;

And winnow'd chaff by western winds is blown;
For fear the rankness of the swelling womb
Should scant the passage, and confine the room.
Left the fat furrows should the sense destroy
Of genial lust, and dull the feat of joy.
But let them suck the seed with greedy force,
And close involve the vigour of the horse.

The male has done; thy care must now proceed

To teeming females, and the promis'd breed.
First let them run at large, and never know
The taming yoke, or draw the crooked plough,
Let them not leap the ditch, or swim the flood,
Or lumber o'er the meads or cross the wood:
But range the forest, by the silver side
Of some cool stream, where nature shall provide
Green grafs, and fattening clover for their fare,
And mossy caverns for their noon-tide lair:
With rocks above to shield the sharp nocturnal air.

About th' Alburnian groves, with holly green,
Of winged insects mighty swarms are seen:
This flying plague (to mark its quality)
Oestros the Grecians call: A flyus, we:
A fierce loud buzzing breeze; their stings draw
blood,

And drive the cattle gadding through the wood.
Seiz'd with unusual pains, they loudly cry;
Tanagrus hastens thence, and leaves his channel
This curse the jealous Juno did invent, [dry.
And first employ'd for Io's punishment.
To thum this ill, the cunning leach ordains
In summer's sultry heats (for then it reigns)
To feed the females, ere the sun arise,
Or late at night, when stars adorn the skies.
When she has calv'd, then set the dam aside;
And for the tender progeny provide.
Distinguish all betimes, with branding fire;
To note the tribe, the lineage, and the fire.
Whom to reserve for husband of the herd,
Or who shall be to sacrifice preferr'd;
Or whom thou shalt to turn thy glebe allow;
To smooth the furrows, and sustain the plough:

The rest, for whom no lot is yet decreed,
May run in pastures, and at pleasure feed,
The calf, by nature and by genius made
To turn the glebe, breed to the rural trade;
Set him betimes to school, and let him be Instructed there in rules of husbandry:
While yet his youth is flexible and green,
Nor bad examples of the world has seen.
Early begin the stubborn child to break;
For his soft neck a supple collar make
Of bending officers; and (with time and care Inur'd that easy servitude to bear)
Thy flattering method on the youth pursue:
Join'd with his school-fellows by two and two,
Persuade them first to lead an empty wheel,
That scarce the dust can raise, or they can feel:
In length of time produce the labouring yoke
And shining shares, that make the furrow smoke.
Ere the licentious youth be thus restrain'd,
Or moral precepts on their minds have gain'd;
Their wanton appetites not only feed
With delicacies of leaves, and marshy weed,
But with thy sickle reap the rankest land:
And minister the blade with bounteous hand.
Nor be with harmful parsimony won
To follow what our homely fires have done;
Who fill'd the pail with beefstings of the cow:
But all her udder to the calf allow,

If to the warlike steed thy studies bend,
Or for the prize in chariots to contend;
Near Pisa's flood the rapid wheels to guide,
Or in Olympian groves aloft to ride,
The generous labours of the courser, first Must be with sight of arms and sound of trumpets
nurs'd:

Inur'd the groaning axle-tree to bear;
And let him clashing whips in stables hear.
Sooth him with praise, and make him understand
The loud applauses of his master's hand:
This from his weaning let him well be taught;
And then betimes in a soft snaffle wrought:
Before his tender joints with nerves are knit;
Untry'd in arms, and trembling at the bit,
But when to four full springs his years advance,
Teach him to run the round, with pride to prance;
And (rightly manag'd) equal time to beat;
To turn, to bound in measure, and curvet.
Let him, to this, with easy pains be brought:
And seem to labour, when he labours not.
Thus, form'd for speed, he challenges the wind;
And leaves the Scythian arrow far behind:
He scours along the field, with loosen'd reins;
And treads so light, he scarcely prints the plains.
Like Boreas in his race, when rushing forth,
He sweeps the skies, and clears the cloudy north:
The waving harvest bends beneath his blast;
The forest shakes, the groves their honours cast;
He flies aloft, and with impetuous roar
Pursues the foaming surges to the shore.
Thus o'er th' Elean plains, thy well-breath'd horse
Impels the flying car, and wins the course.
Or, bred to Belgian waggons, leads the way;
Untr'd at night, and cheerful all the day.

When once he's broken, feed him full and high:
Indulge his growth, and his gaunt sides supply.
Before his training, keep him poor and low;
For his stout stomach with his food will grow;

The pamper'd colt will discipline disdain,
Impatient of the lash, and resist to the rein.

Wouldst thou their courage and their strength improve,

Too soon they must not feel the stings of love.
Whether the bull or courser be thy care,
Let him not leap the cow, or mount the mare.
The youthful bull must wander in the wood;
Behind the mountain, or beyond the flood:
Or, in the stall at home his fodder find;
Far from the charms of that alluring kind.
With two fair eyes his mistress burns his breast;
He looks, and languishes, and leaves his rest;
Forfeaks his food and pining for the lass,
Is joyless of the grove, and spurns the growing grass.

The soft seducer, with enticing looks,
The bellowing rivals to the fight provokes.

A beauteous heifer in the wood is bred,
The stooping warriors, aiming head to head,
Engage their clashing horns; with dreadful sound
The forest rattles, and the rocks rebound.*
They fence, they push, and pushing loudly roar;
Their dewlaps and their sides are bath'd in gore.
Nor when the war is over, is it peace;
Nor will the vanquish'd bull his claim release:
But, feeding in his breast his ancient fires,
And cursing fate, from his proud foe retires.
Driven from his native land, to foreign grounds,
He with a generous rage resents his wounds;
His ignominious flight, the victor's boast,
And more than both, the loves, which unreveng'd
he loit.

Often he turns his eyes, and with a groan,
Surveys the pleasing kingdoms once his own.

And therefore to repair his strength he tries:
Hardening his limbs with painful exercise,

And rough upon the stony rock he lies.
On prickly leaves and on sharp herbs he feeds,
Then to the prelude of a war proceeds.

His horns, yet sore, he tries against a tree:
And meditates his absent enemy.

He snuffs the wind, his heels the sand excite,
But, when he stands collected in his might,

He roars, and promises a more successful fight.
Then, to redeem his honour at a blow,

He moves his camp, to meet his careless foe.
Not with more madness, rolling from afar,

The spumy waves proclaim the watery war,
And, mounting upwards with a mighty roar,

March onwards, and insult the rocky shore.
They mate the middle region with their height;

And fall no less than with a mountain's weight:
The waters boil, and belching from below

Black sands, as from a forceful engine throw.
Thus every creature, and of every kind,

The secret joys of sweet coition find:
Not only man's imperial race, but they

That wing the liquid air, or swim the sea,
Or haunt the desert, rush into the flame;

For love is lord of all, and is in all the same.
'Tis with this rage, the mother lion stung,

Scours o'er the plain, regardless of her young;
Demanding rites of love; she sternly stalks;

And hunts her lover in his lonely walks.
'Tis then the shapeless bear his den forsakes,
In woods and fields a wild destruction makes.

Boars whet their tusks, to battle tigers move;
Enrag'd with hunger, more enrag'd with love.
Then woe to him, that in the desert land
Of Libya travels, o'er the burning sand.

The stallion snuffs the well-known scent afar,
And snorts and trembles for the distant mare:

Nor bits nor bridles can his rage restrain;
And rugged rocks are interpos'd in vain:

He makes his way o'er mountains, and contemns
Unruly torrents and unforded streams.

The bristled boar, who feels the pleasing ground,
New grinds his arming tusks, and digs the wound:

The sleepy leacher shuts his little eyes;
About his churning chaps the frothy bubbles rise:

He rubs his sides against a tree; prepares
And hardens both his shoulders for the wars.

What did the youth, when love's unerring dart
Transfix'd his liver, and inflam'd his heart?

Alone, by night, his watery way he took;
Above him, and above, the billows broke;

The flumes of the sky were open spread,
And rolling thunder rattled o'er his head.

The raging tempest call'd him back in vain,
And every boding omen of the main

Nor could his kindred, nor the kindly force
Of weeping parents, change his fatal course.

No, not the dying maid, who must deplore
His floating carcase on the Sestian shore.

I pass the wars that spotted linxes make
With their fierce rivals, for the females' sake:

The howling wolves, the mastiffs' amorous rage;
When ev'n the fearful stag dares for his hind en-

But, far above the rest, the furious mare, [gaged
Barr'd from the male, is frantic with despair.

For when her pouting vent declares her pain,
She tears the harness, and she rends the rein;

For this (when Venus gave them rage and power),

Their masters' mangled members they devour;
Of love defrauded in their longing hour.

For love they force through thickets of the wood,
They climb the steepy hills, and stem the flood.

When at the spring's approach their marrow
burns

(For with the spring their genial warmth returns),
The mares to cliffs of rugged rocks repair,

And with wide nostrils snuff the western air:
When (wondrous to relate) the parent wind,

Without the stallion, propagates the kind.
Then, first with amorous rage, they take their

flight
Thro' plains, and mount the hills unequal height;

Nor to the north, nor to the rising sun,
Nor southward to the rainy regions run;

But boring to the west, and hovering there,
With gaping mouths, they draw prolific air:

With which impregnate, from their groins they
A slimy juice, by false conception bred. [shed

The shepherd knows it well; and calls by name
Hippomanes, to note the mother's flame.

This, gathered in the planetary hour,
With noxious weeds, and spell'd with words of

Dire stepdames in the magic bowl infuse; [power,
And mix, for deadly draughts, the poisonous juice.

But time is lost, which never will renew,
While we too far the pleasing path pursue;

Surveying nature with too nice a view.

Let this suffice for herds: our following care
 Shall woolly flocks and shaggy goats declare.
 Nor can I doubt what oil I must bestow,
 To raise my subject from a ground so low:
 And the mean matter which my theme affords,
 I'll embellish with magnificence of words.
 But the commanding Muse my chariot guides:
 Which o'er the dubious cliff securely rides:
 And pleas'd I am, no beaten road to take:
 But first the way to new discoveries make.

Now, sacred Pales, in a lofty strain
 I sing the rural honours of thy reign.
 First, with assiduous care, from winter keep
 Well fodder'd in the stalls, thy tender sheep:
 Then spread with straw, the bedding of thy fold;
 With fern beneath, to fend the bitter cold.
 That free from gouts thou may'st preserve thy care,

And clear from scabs, produc'd by freezing air.
 Next let thy goats officiously be nurs'd:
 And led to living streams, to quench their thirst.
 Feed them with winter-browse, and for their lare
 A cote that opens to the south prepare:
 Where, basking in the sunshine, they may lie,
 And the short remnants of his heat enjoy.
 This during winter's drizzly reign be done:
 Till the new ram receives th' exalted sun:
 For hairy goats of equal profit are
 With woolly sheep, and ask an equal care.
 'Tis true, the fleece, when drunk with Tyrian juice

Is dearly sold: but not for needful use:
 For the salacious goat increases more;
 And twice as largely yields her milky store.
 The still-distended udders never fail;
 But, when they seem exhausted, swell the pail.
 Mean time the pastor shears their hoary beards;
 And eases of their hair, the loaden herds.
 Their camelots, warm in tents, the soldier hide;
 And shield the shivering mariner from cold.

On shrubs they browse, and on the bleak top
 Of rugged hills, the thorny bramble crop.
 Attended with their bleating kids they come
 At night unask'd, and mindful of their home;
 And scarce their swelling bags the threshold overcome.

So much the more thy diligence bestow
 In depth of winter to defend the snow:
 By how much less the tender helpless kind,
 For their own ills, can fit provision find.
 Then minister the browse, with bounteous hand;
 And open let thy stacks all winter stand.
 But when the western winds with vital power
 Call forth the tender grass, and budding flower;
 Then, at the last, produce in open air
 Both flocks, and send them to their summer fare.
 Before the sun, while Heiperus appears;
 First let them sip from herbs the pearly tears
 Of morning dews; and after break their fast
 On green-sward ground (a cool and grateful taste):
 But when the day's fourth hour has drawn the dews,

And the sun's sultry heat their thirst renews;
 When creaking grasshoppers on shrubs complain,
 Then lead them to their watering-troughs again.
 In summer's heat some bending valley find,
 Clos'd from the sun, but open to the wind:

Or seek some ancient oak, whose arms extend
 In ample breadth thy cattle to defend:
 Or solitary grove, or gloomy glade,
 To shield them with its venerable shade.
 Once more to watering lead; and feed again
 When the low sun is sinking to the main.
 When rising Cynthia sheds her silver dews,
 And the cool evening-breeze the meads renews:
 When linnets fill the woods with tuneful sound,
 And hollow shores the halcyon's voice rebound.
 Why should my Muse enlarge on Libyan swains;
 Their scatter'd cottages, and ample plains?
 Where oft the flocks without a leader stray;
 Or through continued deserts take their way;
 And, feeding, add the length of night to day.
 Whole months they wander, grazing as they go;
 Nor folds, nor hospitable harbour know;
 Such an extent of plains, so vast a space
 Of wilds unknown, and of untafed grass,
 Allures their eyes: the shepherd last appears,
 And with him all his patrimony bears:
 His house and household gods! his trade of war,
 His bow and quiver; and his trusty cur.
 Thus, under heavy arms, the youth of Rome
 Their long, laborious marches overcome:
 Cheerly their tedious travels undergo;
 And pitch their sudden camp before the foe.

Not for the Scythian shepherd tends his fold;
 Nor he who bears in Thrace the bitter cold:
 Nor he who treads the bleak Meotian strand;
 Or where proud Iber rolls his yellow sand.
 Early they stall their flocks and herds; for there
 No grass the fields, no leaves the forests wear:
 The frozen earth lies buried there below
 A hilly heap, seven cubits deep in snow:
 And all the West allies of stormy Boreas blow.
 The sun from far peeps with a sickly face;
 Too weak the clouds and mighty fogs to chase;
 When up the skies he shoots his roly head,
 Or in the rudy ocean seeks his bed.
 Swift rivers are with sudden ice constrain'd;
 And studded wheels are on its back sustain'd.
 An hoftry now for waggons, which before
 Tall ships of burden on its bosom bore.
 The brazen cauldrons with the frost are flaw'd;
 The garment, stiff with ice, at hearths is thaw'd;
 With axes first they cleave the wine, and thence
 By weight, the solid portions they dispense.
 From locks uncomb'd, and from the frozen beard,
 Long icicles depend, and crackling sounds are heard,

Mean time perpetual sleet, and driving snow,
 Obscure the skies, and hang on herds below.
 The starving cattle perish in their stalls,
 Huge oxen stand enclos'd in wintery walls
 Of snow congeal'd; whole herds are bury'd there;
 Of mighty stags, and scarce their horns appear.
 The dextrous huntsman wounds not these afar,
 With shafts or darts, or makes a distant war
 With dogs, or pitches toils to stop their flight:
 But close engages in unequal fight.
 And while they strive in vain to make their way
 Through hills of snow, and pitiully bray;
 Assaults with dint of sword, or pointed spears:
 And homeward, on his back, the joyful burden
 The men to subterranean caves retire;
 Secure from cold, and crowd the cheerful fire;

With trunks of elms and oaks the hearth they load,

Nor tempt th' inclemency of heaven abroad.
Their jovial nights in frolics and in play
They pass, to drive the tedious hours away.
And their cold stomachs with crown'd goblets
Of windy cyder, and of barmy beer. [cheer

Such are the cold Riphean race; and such
The savage Scythian, and unwarlike Dutch.
Where skins of beasts the rude barbarians wear,
The spoils of foxes, and the furry bear.

Is wool thy care? Let not thy cattle go
Where bashes are, where burs and thistles grow;
Nor in too rank a pasture let them feed:
Then of the purest white select thy breed,
Ev'n though a snowy ram thou shalt behold,
Prefer him not in haste for husband to thy fold.
But search his mouth; and if a swarthy tongue
Is underneath his humid palate hung,
Reject him, lest he darken all the flock;
And substitute another from thy flock.

'Twas thus with fleeces milky white (if we May trust report), Pan god of Arcady
Did bribe thee, Cynthia; nor didst thou disdain,
When call'd in woody shades, to cure a lover's pain.

If milk be thy design; with plenteous hand
Bring clover-grass; and from the marshy land
Salt herbage for the foddering-rack provide
To fill their bags, and swell the milky tide:
These raise their thirst, and to the taste restore
The flavour of the salt, on which they fed before.

Some, when the kids their dams too deeply drain,

With gags and muzzles their soft mouths restrain.
Their morning milk, the peasants press at night:
Their evening meal before the rising light
To market bear; or sparingly they steep
With seasoning salt, and stor'd, for winter keep.

Nor last, forget thy faithful dogs; but feed
With fattening whey the mastiff's generous breed;
And Spartan race; who, for the fold's relief,
Will prosecute with cries the nightly thief:
Repulse the prouling wolf, and hold at bay
The mountain robbers, rushing to the prey,
With cries of hounds, thou may'st pursue the fear
Of flying hares, and chase the fallow deer;
Roulev from their desert dens the bristled rage
Of boars, and beamy stags in toils engage.

With smoke of burning cedar scent thy walls,
And fume with stinking galbanum thy stalls:
With that rank odour from thy dwelling-place
To drive the viper's brood, and all the venom'd
For often under stalls unmov'd they lie, [racc.
Obscure in shades, and shunning heaven's broad
And snakes, familiar to the hearth succeed, [eye.
Disclose their eggs, and near the chimney breed.

Whether to rooify houses they repair,
Or sun themselves abroad in open air,
In all abodes of pestilential kind
To sheep and oxen, and the painful hind.
Take, shepherd, take, a plant of stubborn oak;
And labour him with many a sturdy stroke:
Or with hard stones, demolish from afar
His haughty crest, the feat of all the war;
Invade his hissing throat, and winding spires;
'Till, stretch'd in length, th' unfolded foe retires.

He drags his tail, and for his head provides:
And in some secret cranny slowly glides;
But leaves expos'd to blows, his back and bat-ter'd sides.

In fair Calabria's woods a snake is bred,
With curling crest, and with advancing head:
Waving he rolls, and makes a winding track;
His belly spotted, burnish'd is his back:
While springs are broken, while the southern air
And dropping heavens the moisten'd earth repair,
He lives on standing lakes and trembling bogs;
He fills his maw with fish, or with loquacious frogs.

But when, in muddy pools, the water sinks;
And the chapp'd earth is furrow'd o'er with chinks;

He leaves the fens, and leaps upon the ground;
And hissing, rolls his glaring eyes around.
With thirst inflam'd, impatient of the heats,
He rages in the fields, and wide destruction threats.

O let not sleep my closing eyes invade
In open plains, or in the secret shade,
When he, renew'd in all the speckled pride
Of pompous youth, has cast his slough aside,
And in his summer livery rolls along,
Erect, and brandishing his forky tongue,
Leaving his nest, and his imperfect young;
And thoughtless of his eggs, forgets to rear
The hopes of poison, for the following year.

The causes and the signs shall next be told,
Of every sickness that infects the fold.
A scabby tetter on their pelts will stick,
When the raw rain has pierc'd them to the quick:
Or searching frosts have eaten through the skin;
Or burning icicles are lodg'd within:
Or when the fleece is shorn, if sweat remains
Unwash'd, and soaks into their empty veins:
When their defenceless limbs the brambles tear;
Short of their wool, and naked from the shear.

Good shepherds, after sheering, drench their sheep, [leap]

And their flock's father (forc'd from high to Swims down the stream, and plunges in the deep.)
They oint their naked limbs with mother'd oil;
Or from the founts where living sulphurs boil,
They mix a medicine to foment their limbs;
With scum that on the molten silver swims,
Fat pitch, and black bitumen, add to these
Besides the waxen labour of the bees:
And hellebore, and squills deep rooted in the fens,

Receipts abound, but, searching all thy store,
The best is still at hand--- to lance the sore,
And cut the head, for till the core be found,
The secret vice is fed, and gathers ground:
While, making fruitless moan, the shepherd
stands,

And, when the lanc'ing knife requires his hands,
Vain help, with idle prayers, from heaven demands.

Deep in their bones when fevers fix their seat,
And rack their limbs, and lick the vital heat;
The ready cure to cool the raging pain,
Is underneath the foot to breathe a vein.
This remedy the Scythian shepherds found:
Th' inhabitants of Thracia's hilly ground,

The Gelons use it, when for drink and food
They mix their cruddled milk with horses blood.

But, when thou see'st a single sheep remain
In shades aloof, or crouch'd upon the plain;
Or listlessly to crop the tender grafs;
Or late to lag behind, with truant pace;
Revenge the crime, and take the traitor's head,
Ere in the faultless flock the dire contagion spread.

On winter seas we fewer storms behold,
Than foul diseases that infect the fold.
Nor do those ills on single bodies prey;
But oftener bring the nation to decay; [away. }
And sweep the present flock and future hope }

A dire example of this truth appears:
When, after such a length of rolling years,
We fee the naked Alps, and thin remains
Of scatter'd cots, and yet unpeopled plains:
Once fill'd with grazing flocks, the shepherd's } happy reigns. }

Here from the vicious air, and sickly skies,
A plague did on the dumb creation rise:
During th' autumnal heats th' infection grew,
Tame cattle, and the beasts of nature flew.
Poisoning the standing lakes, and pools impure:
Nor was the foodful grafs in fields secure.
Strange death! For when the thirsty fire had drunk
Their vital blood, and the dry nerves were shrunk;
When the contracted limbs were cramp'd, even then

A waterish humour swell'd and ooz'd again;
Converting into bane the kindly juice,
Ordain'd by nature for a better use.
The victim ox, that was for altars prest,
Trim'd with white ribbons, and with garlands
dress'd,

Sunk of himself, without the gods command:
Preventing the slow sacrificer's hand.
Or, by the holy butcher if he fell,
Th' inspected entrails could no fates foretel:
Nor, laid on altars, did pure flames arise;
But clouds of smouldering smoke forbade the sacrifice,

Scarcely the knife was reddend' with his gore,
Or the black poison stain'd the sandy floor.
The thriven calves in meads their food forsake,
And render their sweet souls before the plenteous rack.

The fawning dog runs mad, the weasling swine
With coughs is chok'd, and labours from the
The victor horse, forgetful of his food, [chine:
The palm renounces, and abhors the food.

He paws the ground, and, on his hanging ears, }
A doubtful sweat in clammy drops appears: }
Parch'd is his hide, and rugged are his hairs. }
Such are the symptoms of the young disease;
But in time's process, when his pains increase,
He rolls his mournful eyes, he deeply groans
With patient sobbing, and with manly moans.
He heaves for breath; which from his lungs sup-
ply'd,

And fetch'd from far, distends his labouring side.
To his rough palate, his dry tongue succeeds,
And roapy gore he from his nostrils bleeds.
A drench of wine has with success been us'd;
And through a horn the generous juice infus'd:
Which timely taken op'd his closing jaws;
But, if too late, the patient's death did cause.

For the too vigorous dose too fiercely wrought;
And added fury to the strength it brought.
Recruited into rage, he grinds his teeth
In his own flesh, and feels approaching death.
Ye gods, to better fate good men dispose,
And turn that impious error on our foes!

The steer, who to the yoke was bred to bow,
(Studious of tillage, and the crooked plough)
Falls down and dies; and dying spews a flood
Of foamy madness, mix'd with clotted blood.
The clown, who, cursing Providence, repines,
His mournful fellow from the team disjoins:
With many a groan forsakes his fruitless care,
And in th' unfinished furrow leaves the share.
The pining steer no shades of lofty woods,
Nor flowery meads, can ease; nor franks floods
Roll'd from the rock: his flabby flanks decrease;
His eyes are settled in a stupid peace.
His bulk too weighty for his thighs is grown;
And his unwieldy neck hangs drooping down.
Now what avails his well-deserving toil,
To turn the glebe, or smooth the rugged soil!
And yet he never suppd in solemn state,
Nor undigested feasts did urge his fate;
Nor day to night luxuriously did join;
Nor forfeited on rich Campanian wine.
Simple his beverage, homely was his food;
The wholesome herbage, and the running flood.
No dreadful dreams awak'd him with affright;
His pains by day secur'd his rest by night.

'Twas then that buffaloes, ill-pair'd, were seen
To draw the car of Jove's imperial queen,
For want of oxen; and the labouring swain
Scratch'd with a rake a furrow for his grain:
And cover'd with his hand the shallow feed
again.

He yokes himself, and up the hilly height,
With his own shoulders draws the waggon's weight.
The nightly wolf, that round th' enclosure proul'd

To leap the fence, now plots not on the fold:
Tam'd with a sharper pain, the fearful doe
And flying stag, amidst the greyhounds go:
And round the dwellings roam of man, their fiercer foe.

The scaly nations of the sea profound,
Like shipwreck'd carcases are driven aground:
And mighty Phocæ, never seen before
In shallow streams, are stranded on the shore.
The viper dead within her hole is found;
Defenceless was the shelter of the ground.
The water-snake, whom fish and paddocks fed,
With staring scales lies poison'd in his bed:
To birds their native heavens contagious prove,
From clouds they fall, and leave their souls above.

Besides, to change their pasture 'tis in vain;
Or trust to physic; physic is their bane.
The learned leaches in despair depart:
And shake their heads, depending of their art.

Tisiphone, let loose from under ground,
Majestically pale, now treads the round;
Before her drives diseases and affright;
And every moment rises to the fight:
Aspiring to the skies, encroaching on the light. }
The rivers and their banks, and hills around, }
With lowings, and with dying bleats resound.

At length, she strikes an universal blow;
 To death at once whole herds of cattle go:
 Sheep, oxen, horses fall; and, heap'd on high,
 The differing species in confusion lie.
 Till, warn'd by frequent ills, the way they found,
 To lodge their loathsome carrion under ground,
 For, useless to the carrier were their hides:
 Nor could their tainted flesh with ocean tides
 Be freed from filth: nor could Vulcanian flame
 The stench abolish, or the favour tame.

Nor safely could they shear their fleecy store (Made drunk with poisonous juice, and stiff with gore);
 Or touch the web: but if the vest they wear,
 Red blisters rising on their paps appear,
 And flaming carbuncles and noisome sweat,
 And clammy dews, that loathsome lice beget:
 Till the slow creeping evil eats his way,
 Consumes the parching limbs, and makes the life his prey.

B O O K I V.

THE ARGUMENT.

Virgil has taken care to raise the subject of the Georgic: In the first he has only dead matter on which to work. In the second he just steps on the world of life, and describes that degree of it which is to be found in vegetables. In the third he advances to animals: and in the last singles out the bee, which may be reckoned the most sagacious of them, for his subject.

In this Georgic he shows us what station is most proper for the bees, and when they begin to gather honey: how to call them home when they swarm; and how to part them when they are engaged in battle. From hence he takes occasion to discover their different kind; and, after an excursion, relates their prudent and politic administration of affairs, and the several diseases that often rage in their hives, with the proper symptoms and remedies of each disease. In the last place he lays down a method of repairing their kind, supposing their whole breed lost, and gives at large the history of its invention.

THE gifts of heaven my following song pursues,
 Aërial honey, and ambrosial dews.

Mæcenas, read this other part, that sings
 Embattled squadrons and adventurous kings;
 A mighty pomp, though made of little things,
 Their arms, their arts, their manners I disclose,
 And how they war, and whence the people rose:
 Slight is the subject, but the praise not small,
 If heaven assist, and Phœbus hear my call.

First, for thy bees a quiet station find,
 And lodge them under covert of the wind:
 For winds, when homeward they return, will drive

The loaded carriers from their evening hive.
 Far from the cows and goats insulting crew,
 That trample down the flowers, and brush the dew:

The painted lizard, and the birds of prey,
 Foes of the frugal kind, be far away.
 The titmouse, and the pecker's hungry brood,
 And Progne, with her bosom stain'd in blood:
 These rob the trading citizens, and bear
 The trembling captives through the liquid air;
 And for their callow young a cruel feast prepare.

But near a living stream their mansion place,
 Edg'd round with moss, and tufts of matted grass:
 And plant (the wind's impetuous rage to stop),
 Wild olive trees, or palms, before the busy shop.
 That when the youthful prince, with proud alarm,
 Calls out the venturesome colony to swarm;
 When first their way through yielding air they wing,

New to the pleasures of their native spring;

The banks of brooks may make a cool retreat
 For the raw soldiers from the scalding heat:
 And neighbouring trees, with friendly shade, in-
 The troops, unus'd to long laborious flight. [vite
 Then o'er the running stream, or standing lake,
 A passage for thy weary people make;
 With osier floats the standing water strow;
 Of massy stones make bridges, if it flow:
 That basking in the sun thy bees may lie,
 And resting there, their flaggy pinions dry:
 When, late returning home, the laden host
 By raging winds is wreck'd upon the coast.
 Wild thyme and savory set around their cell;
 Sweet to the taste, and fragrant to the smell;
 Set rows of rosemary with flowering stem,
 And let the purple violets drink the stream.

Whether thou build the palace of thy bees
 With twisted osiers, or with barks of trees;
 Make but a narrow mouth: for as the cold
 Congeals into a lump the liquid gold;
 So 'tis again dissolv'd by summer's heat,
 And the sweet labours both extremes defeat.
 And therefore, not in vain, th' industrious kind
 With dawby wax and flowers the chinks have lin'd.

And with their stores of gather'd glue, contrive
 To stop the vents and crannies of their hive.
 Not birdlime, or Idæan pitch, produce
 A more tenacious mass of clammy juice.

Nor bees are lodg'd in hives alone, but found
 In chambers of their own, beneath the ground:
 Their vaulted roofs are hung in pumices,
 And in the rotten trunks of hollow trees.

But plaster thou the chinky lives with clay,
 And leafy branches o'er their lodging lay,

Nor place them where too deep a water flows,
Or where the yew their poisonous neighbour grows: [their nose.]

Nor roast red crabs t' offend the niceness of Nor near the steaming stench of muddy ground:
Nor hollow rocks that render back the sound,
And doubled images of voice rebound.

For what remains, when golden suns appear,
And under earth have driven the winter year:
The winged nation wanders through the skies,
And o'er the plains and shady forest flies:
Then, stooping on the meads and leafy bowers,
They skim the floods, and sip the purple flowers.
Exalted hence, and drunk with secret joy,
The young succession all their cares employ:
They breed, they brood, instruct, and educate,
And make provision for the future state:
They work their waxen lodgings in their hives,
And labour honey to sustain their lives.
But when thou seest a swarming cloud arise,
That sweeps aloft, and darkens all the skies,
The motions of their hasty flight attend;
And know to floods, or woods, their airy march they bend.

Then melloil beat, and honey-suckles pound,
With these alluring favours strew the ground,
And mix with tinkling bras, the cymbal's droning found.

Straight to their ancient cells, recall'd from air,
The reconcil'd deserters will repair.
But if intestine broils alarm the hive,
(For two pretenders oft for empire strive)
The vulgar in divided factions jar;
And murmuring sounds proclaim the civil war.
Inflam'd with ire, and trembling with disdain,
Scarce can their limbs their mighty souls contain,
With shouts the coward's courage they excite,
And martial clangors call them out to fight:
With hoarse alarms the hollow camp rebounds,
That imitates the trumpet's angry sounds:
Then to their common standard they repair;
The nimble horsemen scour the fields of air.
In form of battle drawn, they issue forth,
And every knight is proud to prove his worth.
Prest'd for their country's honour, and their king's, [stings]

On their sharp beaks they whet their pointed
And exercise their arms, and tremble with their wings.
Full in the midst the haughty monarchs ride,
The trusty guards come up, and close the side;
With shouts the daring foe to battle is defy'd.
Thus in the season of unclouded spring,
To war they follow their undaunted king:
Crowd through their gates, and in the fields of
light,

The shocking squadrons meet in mortal fight:
Headlong they fall from high, and wounded
wound,

And heaps of slaughter'd soldiers bite the ground.
Hard hailstones lie nor thicker on the plain,
Nor shaken oaks such showers of acorns rain.
With gorgeous wings, the marks of sovereign sway,

The two contending princes make their way;
Intrepid through the midst of danger go;
Their friends encourage, and amaze the foe.

With mighty souls in narrow bodies prest,
They challenge, and encounter breast to breast;
So fix'd on fame, unknowing how to fly,
And obstinately bent to win or die;
That long the doubtful combat they maintain,
Till one prevails (for one can only reign).
Yet all those dreadful deeds, this deadly fray,
A cast of scatter'd dust will soon allay;
And undecided leave the fortune of the day.
When both the chiefs are sunder'd from the fight,
Then to the lawful king restore his right.
And let the wasteful prodigal be slain,
That he, who best deserves, alone may reign.
With ease distinguish'd is the regal race:
One monarch wears an honest open face:
Shap'd to his size, and godlike to behold,
His royal body shines with specks of gold,
And ruddy scales; for empire he design'd,
Is better born, and of a nobler kind.
That other looks like nature in disgrace,
Gaunt are his sides, and fullen is his face:
And like their grisly prince appears his gloomy
race:

Grim, ghastly, rugged, like a thirsty train
That long have travel'd through a desert plain.
And spit from their dry chaps the gather'd dust
again.

The better brood, unlike the bastard crew,
Are mark'd with royal streaks of shining hue;
Glittering and ardent, though in body leis:
From these, at 'pointed seasons, hope to press
Huge heavy honeycombs, of golden juice,
Not only sweet, but pure, and fit for use:
T' allay the strength and hardness of the wine,
And with old Bacchus, new metheglin join:

But when the swarms are eager of their play,
And loathe their empty hives, and idly fray,
Restrain the wanton fugitives, and take
A timely care to bring the truants back.
The task is easy, but to clip the wings
Of their high-flying arbitrary kings:
At their command, the people swarm away;
Confine the tyrant, and the slaves will stay.
Sweet gardens, full of saffron flowers, invite
The wandering gluttons, and retard their flight.
Besides the god obscene, who frights away,
With his lath sword, the thieves and birds of prey.

With his own hand, the guardian of the bees,
For slips of pines, may search the mountain trees:
And with wild thyme and savory plant the plain,
Till his hard horny fingers ache with pain:
And deck with fruitful trees the fields around,
And with refreshing waters drench the ground.

Now, did I not so near my labours end,
Strike sail, and hastening to the harbour tend,
My song to flowery gardens might extend.
To teach the vegetable arts to sing
The Præstan roses, and their double spring:
How succory drinks the running stream, and how Green beds of parsley near the river grow;
How cucumbers along the surface creep,
With crooked bodies, and with bellies deep.
The late Narcissus, and the winding trail
Of bears-foot, myrtles green, and ivy pale.
For where with stately towers Tarentum stands,
And deep Galefus soaks the yellow sands,

I chanc'd an old Corycian swain to know,
 Lord of few acres, and those barren too;
 Unfit for sheep or vines, and more unfit to sow:
 Yet, labouring well his little spot of ground,
 Some scattering pot-herbs here and there he found:

Which, cultivated with his daily care,
 And bruist with vervain, were his frugal fare.
 Sometimes white lilies did their leaves afford,
 With wholesome poppy-flowers to mend his homely board:

For late returning home he supp'd at ease,
 And wisely deem'd the wealth of monarchs less:
 The little of his own, because his own, did please.

To quit his care, he gather'd first of all
 In spring the roses, apples in the fall:
 And when cold winter split the rocks in twain,
 And ice the running rivers did restrain,
 He stripp'd the bears-foot of its leafy growth,
 And, calling western winds, accus'd the spring of sloth;

He therefore first among the swains was found,
 To reap the product of his labour'd ground,
 And squeeze the combs with golden liquor crown'd.

His limes were first in flowers; his lofty pines,
 With friendly shade, secur'd his tender vines.
 For every bloom his trees in spring afford,
 An autumn apple was by tale restor'd.
 He knew to rank his elms in even rows:
 For fruit the grafted pear-tree to dispose:
 And tame to plumbs, the fourness of the sloes.
 With spreading planes he made a cool retreat,
 To shade good fellows from the summer's heat.
 But, straiten'd in my space, I must forsake
 This task; for others afterwards to take.

Describe me next the nature of the bees,
 Bestow'd by Jove for secret services:
 When, by the tinkling sound of timbrels led,
 The King of heaven in Cretan caves they fed.
 Of all the race of animals, alone

The bees have common cities of their own,
 And common sons, beneath one law they live,
 And with one common stock their traffic drive.
 Each has a certain home, a several stall:

All is the state's, the state provides for all.
 Mindful of coming cold, they share the pain:
 And hoard, for winter's use, the summer's gain.
 Some o'er the public magazines preside,
 And some are sent new forage to provide:
 These drudge in fields abroad, and those at home
 Lay deep foundations for the labour'd comb,
 With dew, Narcissus' leaves, and clammy gum.
 To pitch the waxen flooring some contrive;
 Some nurse the future nation of the hive:

Sweet honey some condense, some purge the grout;

The rest, in cells apart, the liquid nectar slaut.
 All, with united force, combine to drive
 The lazy drones from the laborious hive.

With envy stung, they view each other's deeds:
 With diligence the fragrant work proceeds.
 As when the Cyclops, at th' almighty nod,
 New thunder hasten for their angry god:
 Subdued in fire the stubborn metal lies,
 One brawny smith the puffing bellows pities;

And draws, and blows reciprocating air:
 Others to quench the hissing mass prepare:
 With lifted arms they order every blow,
 And chime their sounding hammers in a row:
 With labour'd anvils Ætna groans below.
 Strongly they strike, huge flakes of flames expire,
 With tongs they turn the steel, and vex it in the fire.

If little things with great we may compare,
 Such are the bees, and such their busy care:
 Studious of honey, each in his degree,
 The youthful swain, the grave experienc'd bee:
 That in the field; this in affairs of state,
 Employ'd at home, abides within the gate:
 To fortify the combs, to build the wall,
 To prop the ruins left the fabric fall:

But late at night, with weary pinions come
 The labouring youth, and heavy laden home.
 Plains, meads, and orchards, all the day he plies;
 The gleams of yellow thyme distend his thighs:
 He spoils the saffron flowers, he sips the blues
 Of violets, wilding blooms, and willow dews.
 Their toil is common, common is their sleep;
 They shake their wings when morn begins to peep;

Rush through the city-gates without delay,
 Nor ends their work but with declining day:
 Then, having spent the last remains of light,
 They give their bodies due repose at night:
 When hollow murmurs of their evening bells
 Dismiss the sleepy swains, and toll them to their cells.

When once in beds their weary limbs they sleep,
 No buzzing sounds disturb their golden sleep,
 'Tis sacred silence all. Nor dare they stay,
 When rain is promis'd, or a stormy day:
 But near the city walls their watering take,
 Nor forage far, but short excursions make.
 And as when empty barks on billows float,
 With sandy ballast sailors trim the boat,
 So bees bear gravel-stones, whose poising weight
 Steers through the whistling winds their steady flight.

But, what's more strange, their modest appearance
 From Venus, fly the nuptial rites.
 No lust enervates their heroic mind,
 Nor wastes their strength on wanton woman-kind,
 But in their mouths reside their genial powers,
 They gather children from the leaves and flowers.
 Thus make they kings to fill the regal seat:
 And thus their little citizens create:
 And waxy cities build, the palaces of state.
 And oft on rocks their tender wings they tear,
 And sink beneath the burdens which they bear.
 Such rage of honey in their bosom beats:
 And such a zeal they have for flowery sweets.

Thus through the race of life they quickly run;
 Which in the space of seven short years is done;
 Th' immortal line in sure succession reigns,
 The fortune of the family remains:
 And grandfires grandsons the long list contains.

Besides, not Egypt, India, Media, more
 With servile awe, their idol king adore:
 While he survives, in concord and content
 The commons live, by no divisions rent;
 But the great monarch's death dissolves the government.

All goes to ruin, they themselves contrive
To rob the honey, and subvert the hive.
The king presides, his subjects' toil surveys;
The servile rout their careful Cæsar praise:
Him they extol, they worship him alone:
They crowd his levees, and support his throne:
They raise him on their shoulders with a shout:
And when their sovereign's quarrel calls them out,
His foes to mortal combat they defy,
And think it honour at his feet to die.

Induc'd by such examples, some have taught
That bees have portions of ethereal thought:
Endu'd with particles of heavenly fires:
For God the whole created mass inspires;
Through heaven, and earth, and ocean's depth
he throws

His influence round, and kindles as he goes.
Hence flocks, and herds, and men, and beasts, and fowls,

With breath are quicken'd, and attract their souls.
Hence take the forms his prescience did ordain,
And into him at length resolve again.
No room is left for death, they mount the sky;
And to their own congenial planets fly.

Now when thou hast decreed to seize their
And by prerogative to break their doors: [stores,
With sprinkled water first the city choke,
And then pursue the citizens with smoke.
Two honey-harvests fall in every year:
First, when the pleasing Pleiades appear,
And springing upward spurn the briny seas:
Again, when their affrighted quire surveys
The watery Scorpion mend his pace behind,
With a black train of storms, and winter wind,
They plunge into the deep, and safe protection find.

Prone to revenge, the bees, a wrathful race,
When once provok'd, assault th' aggressor's face:
And through the purple veins a passage find;
There fix their stings, and leave their souls behind.

But if a pinching winter thou foresee,
And would preserve thy famish'd family;
With fragrant thyme the city fumigate,
And break the waxen walls to save the state.
For lurking lizards often lodge, by stealth,
Within the suburbs, and purloin their wealth.
And lizards, shunning light, a dark retreat
Have found in combs, and undermin'd the seat.
Or lazy drones, without their share of pain,
In winter-quarters free, devour the gain:
Or wasps infest the camp with loud alarms,
And mix in battle with unequal arms:
Or secret moths are there in silence fed;
Or spiders in the vault their snary webs have
spread.

The more oppress'd by foes, or famine pin'd,
The more increase thy care to save the sinking kind,

With greens and flowers recruit their empty hives,
And seek fresh forage to sustain their lives.

But since they share with man one common fate,
In health and sickness, and in turns of state;
Observe the symptoms when they fall away,
And languish with insensible decay.
They change their hue, with haggard eyes they stare,

Lean are their looks, and shagged is their hair:

And crowds of dead, that never must return
To their lov'd hives, in decent pomp are borne:
Their friends attend the hearse, the next relations mourn.

The sick, for air, before the portal gasp,
Their feeble legs within each other clasp,
Or idle in their empty hives remain,
Berumb'd with cold, or little's of their gain.
Soft whisp'ers then and broken sounds are heard;
As when the woods by gentle winds are stirr'd;
Such stifled noise as the close furnace hides,
Or dying murmurs of departing tides.
This when thou seest, Galbanæan odours use,
And honey in the sickly hive infuse.
Through reeden pipes convey the golden flood;
T' invite the people to their wonted food:
Mix it with thicken'd juice of foddren wines,
And raisins from the grapes of Pnythian vines:
To these add pounded galls, and roses dry,
And with Cæcropian thyme, strong scented cen-taury.

A flower there is that grows in meadow ground,
Amellus call'd, and easy to be found:
For from one root the rising stem bestows
A wood of leaves, and violet-purple boughs.
The flower itself is glorious to behold,
And shines on altars like resplendent gold:
Sharp to the taste, by shepherds near the stream
Of Mella found, and thence they gave the name.
Boil this restoring root in generous wine,
And set beside the door the sickly stock to dine.
But if the labouring kind be wholly lost,
And not to be retriev'd with care or cost,
'Tis time to touch the precepts of an art,
Th' Arcadian master did of old impart:
And how he stock'd his empty hives again;
Renew'd with putrid gore of oxen slain.
An ancient legend I prepare to sing,
And upward follow Fame's immortal spring:

For where; with seven-fold horns, mysterious
Surrounds the skirts of Ægypt's fruitful isle, [Nile
And where in pomp the sun-burnt people ride,
On painted barges, o'er the teeming tide,
Which, pouring down from Ethiopian lands,
Makes green the soil with slime, and black prolific sands;

That length of region, and large tract of ground,
In this one art a sure relief have found.
First, in a place, by nature close, they build
A narrow flooring, gutter'd, wall'd, and til'd.
In this, four windows are contriv'd, that strike
To the four winds oppos'd, their beams oblique.
A steer of two years old they take, whose head
Now first with burnish'd horns begins to spread:
They stop his nostrils, while he strives in vain
To breathe free air, and struggles with his pain.
Knock'd down, he dies: his bowels bruis'd with-Betray no wound on his unbroken skin. [in,
Extended thus, in his obscene abode,
They leave the beast; but first sweet flowers are strow'd

Beneath his body, broken boughs and thyme,
And pleasing cassia just renew'd in prime.
This must be done, ere spring makes equal day,
When western winds on curling waves play:
Ere painted meads produce their flowery crops,
Or swallows twitter on the chimney-tops.

The tainted blood, in this close prison pent,
 Begins to boil, and through the bones ferment.
 Then, wondrous to behold, new creatures rise,
 A moving mast at first, and short of thighs;
 Till shooting out with legs, and imp'd with wings,
 The grubs proceed to bees with pointed stings:
 And more and more affecting air, they try
 Their tender pinions, and begin to fly. [clouds,
 At length, like summer storms from spreading
 That burst at once, and pour impetuous floods,
 Or flights of arrows from the Parthian bows,
 When from afar they gall embattled foes,
 With such a tempest through the skies they steer,
 And such a form the winged squadrons bear.

What God, O Muse! this useful science taught?
 Or by what man's experience was it brought?
 Sad Aristæus from fair Tempe fled,
 His bees with famine, or diseases, dead; [head. }
 On Peneus' banks he stood, and near his holy }
 And while his falling tears the stream supply'd,
 Thus mourning, to his mother goddess cry'd :
 Mother Cyrene, mother, whose abode
 Is in the depth of this immortal flood :
 What boots it, that from Phæbus' loins I spring,
 The third, by him and thee, from heaven's high
 King?

O! where is all thy boasted pity gone,
 And promise of the skies to thy deluded son?
 Why didst thou me, unhappy me, create?
 Odious to gods, and born to bitter fate.
 Whom, scarce my sheep, and scarce my painful
 plough

The needful aids of human life allow :
 So wretched is thy son, so hard a mother thou.
 Proceed, inhuman parent, in thy scorn;
 Root up my trees, with blights destroy my corn;
 My vineyards ruin, and my sheepsfolds burn. }
 Let loose thy rage, let all thy spite be shown,
 Since thus thy hate pursues the praises of thy son.
 But from her mossy bower below the ground,
 His careful mother heard the plaintive sound,
 Encompass'd with her sea-green sisters round. }
 One common work they plid : their distaffs full
 With carded locks of blue Milesian wool.
 Spio with Drymo brown, and Xanthe fair,
 And sweet Phyllodoce with long dishevel'd hair :
 Cydippe with Licorias, one a maid,
 And one that once had call'd Lucina's aid.
 Clio and Beroe, from one father both, [cloth.
 Both girt with gold, and clad in party-colour'd
 Opis the meek, and Deiopeia proud;
 Nisæa lofty with Ligæa loud;
 Thalia joyous, Ephyre the sad,
 And Arethusa once Diana's maid, }
 But now, her quiver left, to love betray'd.
 To these, Clymene the sweet thief declares
 Of Mars, and Vulcan's unavailing cares :
 And all the rapes of gods, and every love,
 From ancient Chaos down to youthful Jove.

Thus while she sings, the sisters turn the wheel,
 Empty the woolly rack, and fill the reel.
 A mournful sound again the mother hears;
 Again the mournful sound invades the sister's ears:
 Starting at once from their green seats they rise;
 Fear in their heart, amazement in their eyes,
 But Arethusa, leaping from her bed,
 First lifts above the waves her beauteous head; }
 And, crying from afar, thus to Cyrene said :

O sister! not with causeless fear possess,
 No stranger voice disturbs thy tender breast.
 'Tis Aristæus, 'tis thy darling son,
 Who to his careless mother makes his moan.
 Near his paternal stream he sadly stands, [hands :
 With down-cast eyes, wet cheeks, and folded Upbraiding heaven from whence his lineage
 came,

And cruel calls the gods, and cruel thee, by name.
 Cyrene, mov'd with love, and seiz'd with fear,
 Cries out, Conduct my son, conduct him here :
 'Tis lawful for the youth, deriv'd from gods,
 To view the secrets of our deep abodes.
 At once she wav'd her hand on either side,
 At once the ranks of swelling streams divide.
 Two rising heaps of liquid crystal stand,
 And leave a space betwixt, of empty sand.
 Thus safe receiv'd, the downward track he treads,
 Which to his mother's watery palace leads.
 With wondering eyes he views the secret store
 Of lakes, that pent in hollow caverns rear.
 He hears the crackling sound of coral woods,
 And sees the secret source of subterranean floods.
 And where, distinguish'd in their several cells,
 The fount of Phæis and of Lycus dwells;
 Where swift Enipeus in his bed appears,
 And Tiber his majestic forehead rears.
 Whence Anio flows, and Hypanis, profound,
 Breaks thro' th' opposing rocks with raging sound.
 Where Po first issues from his dark abodes,
 And, awful in his cradle, rules the floods,
 Two golden horns on his large front he wears,
 And his grim face a bulls resemblance bears.
 With rapid course he seeks the sacred main,
 And fattens, as he runs, the fruitful plain.

Now to the court arriv'd, th' admiring son
 Beholds the vaulted roofs of pory stone,
 Now to his mother goddess tells his grief,
 Which she with pity hears, and promises relief.
 Th' officious nymphs, attending in a ring,
 With water drawn from their perpetual spring,
 From earthly dregs his body purify,
 And rub his temples, with fine towels, dry :
 Then load the tables with a liberal feast,
 And honour with full bowls their friendly guest.
 The sacred altars are involv'd in smoke,
 And the bright quire their kindred gods invoke.
 Two bowls the mother fills with Lydian wine;
 Then thus, let these be pour'd, with rites divine, }
 To the great author of our watery line.
 To father Ocean, this; and this she said,
 Be to the nymphs his sacred sisters paid,
 Who rule the watery plains, and hold the woodland shade.

She sprinkled thrice, with wine, the vestal fire,
 Thrice to the vaulted roof the flames aspire.
 Rais'd with so blest an omen, she begun,
 With words like these to cheer her drooping son.
 In the Carpathian bottom makes abode
 The shepherd of the seas, a prophet and a god;
 High o'er the main in watery pomp he rides,
 His azure car and sinny couriers guides :
 Proteus his name : to his Pallenian port
 I see from far the weary god resort,
 Him, not alone, we river-gods adore,
 But aged Nereus hearkens to his lore.
 With sure foresight, and with unerring doom,
 He sees what is, and was, and to come.

This Neptune gave him, when he gave to keep
 His scaly flocks, that graze the watery deep.
 Implore his aid, for Proteus only knows
 The secret cause, and cure of all thy woes.
 But first the wily wizard must be caught,
 For unconstrain'd he nothing tells for naught;
 Nor is with prayers, or bribes, or flattery bought.
 Surprise him first, and with hard fetters bind;
 Then all his frauds will vanish into wind.
 I will myself conduct thee on thy way,
 When next the fouthing sun inflames the day:
 When the dry herbage thirsts for dews in vain,
 And sheep, in shades, avoid the parching plain;
 Then will I lead thee to his secret feat;
 When, weary with his toil, and scorch'd with heat,

The wayward fire frequents his cool retreat.
 His eyes with heavy slumber overcast;
 With force invade his limbs, and bind him fast:
 Thus surely bound, yet be not over bold,
 The slippery god will try to loose his hold:
 And various forms assume to cheat thy sight;
 And with vain images of beasts affright.
 With foamy tufts will seem a bristly boar,
 Or imitate the lion's angry roar;
 Break out in crackling flames to shun thy snare,
 Or hiss a dragon, or a tiger stare:
 Or with a wile thy caution to betray,
 In fleeting streams attempt to slide away.
 But thou, the more he varies forms, beware
 To strain his fetters with a stricter care:
 Till, tiring all his arts, he turns again
 To his true shape, in which he first was seen.

This said, with nectar she her son anoints:
 Infusing vigour through his mortal joints;
 Down from his head the liquid odours ran;
 He breath'd of heaven, and look'd above a man,
 Within a mountain's hollow womb there lies
 A large recess, conceal'd from human eyes;
 Where heaps of billows, driven by wind and tide,
 In form of war, their watery ranks divide;
 And there, like sentries set, without the mouth abide;

A station safe for ships, when tempests roar,
 A silent harbour, and a cover'd shore.
 Secure within resides the various god,
 And draws a rock upon his dark abode.
 Hither with silent steps, secure from sight,
 The goddess guides her son, and turns him from the light: flight.

Herself, involv'd in clouds, precipitates her
 'Twas noon; the sultry dog-star from the sky
 Scorch'd Indian swains, the rival'd grass was dry;
 The sun, with flaming arrows, pierc'd the flood,
 And, darting to the bottom, back'd the mud:
 When weary Proteus, from the briny waves,
 Retir'd for shelter to his wonted caves:
 His sinny flocks about their shepherd play,
 And, rolling round him, spirt the bitter sea.
 Unwieldily they wallow first in ooze,
 Then in the shady covert seek repose.

Himself their herdsman, on the middle mount,
 Takes of his muster'd flocks a just account.
 So, seated on a rock, a shepherd's groom
 Surveys his evening flocks returning home:
 When lowing calves, and bleating lambs, from far,
 Provoke the prouling wolf to nightly war,

Th' occasion offers, and the youth complies:
 For scarce the weary god had clos'd his eyes,
 When rushing on, with shouts' he binds in chains
 The drowly prophet, and his limbs constricts.
 He, not unmindful of his usual art,
 First in dissembled fire attempts to part:
 Then roaring beasts and running streams he tries,
 And wearies all his miracles of lies:
 But, having shifted every form to 'scape,
 Convinc'd of conquest, he resum'd his shape;
 And thus, at length, in human accent spoke:
 Audacious youth, what madnes could provoke
 A mortal man to invade a sleeping god?
 What business brought thee to my dark abode?
 To this th' audacious youth: 'Thou know'st full well

My name, and business, god, nor need I tell:
 No man can Proteus cheat; but, Proteus, leave
 Thy fraudulent arts, and do not thou deceive.
 Following the gods' command, I come to implore
 Thy help, my perish'd people to restore.
 The fear, who could not yet his wrath assuage,
 Roll'd his green eyes, that sparkled with his rage;
 And gasp'd his teeth, and cry'd, No vulgar god
 Pursues thy crimes, nor with a common rod.
 Thy great misdeeds have met a due reward,
 And Orpheus' dying prayers at length are heard:
 For crimes, not his, the lover lost his life,
 And at thy hands requires his murder'd wife,
 Nor (if the Fates assist not) canst thou 'scape
 The just revenge of that intended rape.
 To shun thy lawless lust, the dying bride,
 Unwary, took along the river's side:
 Nor at her heels perceiv'd the deadly snake,
 That keeps the bank, in covert of the brake.
 But all her fellow-nymphs the mountains tear
 With loud laments, and break the yielding air:
 The realms of Mars remurmur'd all around,
 And echoes to th' Athenian shores rebound,
 Th' unhappy husband, husband now no more,
 Did on his tuneful harp his loss deplore,
 And sought, his mournful mind with music to restore.

On thee, dear wife, in deserts all alone,
 He call'd, sigh'd, sung, his griefs with day begun,
 Nor were they finish'd with the setting sun.
 Ev'n to the dark dominions of the night
 He took his way, through forests void of light:
 And dar'd amidst the trembling ghosts to sing,
 And stood before the inexorable king.
 Th' infernal troops like passing shadows glide,
 And, listening, crowd the sweet musician's side.
 Nor flocks of birds when driven by storms or night,
 Stretch to the forest with so thick a flight,
 Men, matrons, children, and th' unmarried maid,
 * The mighty heroes more majestic shade;
 And youths on funeral piles before their parents laid.

All these Cocytus bounds with squalid reeds,
 With muddy ditches, and with deadly weeds:
 And baleful Styx encompasses around,
 With nine slow circling streams, th' unhappy
 ground.

Ev'n from the depths of hell the damn'd advance,
 The infernal mansions nodding seem to dance:

* This whole line is taken from the Marquis of Norfolk's translation,

The gaping three-mouth'd dog forgets to snarl,
The Furies hearken, and their snakes uncurl:
Ixion seems no more his pain to feel,
But leans attentive on his standing wheel.

All dangers past, at length the lovely bride
In safety goes with her melodious guide;
Longing the common light again to share,
And draw the vital breath of upper air:
He first, and close behind him followed she,
For such was Proserpine's severe decree.
When strong desires th' impatient youth invade;
By little caution and much love betray'd;
A fault which easy pardon might receive,
Were lovers judges, or could hell forgive.
For near the confines of etherial light,
And longing for the glimmering of a sight,
Th' unwary lover cast his eyes behind,
Forgetful of the law, nor master of his mind.
Straight all his hopes exhal'd in empty smoke;
And his long toils were forfeit for a look.
Three flashes of blue lightning gave the sign
Of covenants broke, three peals of thunder join.
Then thus the bride: What fury seiz'd on thee,
Unhappy man, to lose thyself and me?
Dragg'd back again by cruel destinies,
An iron slumber shut my swimming eyes.
And now farewell, involv'd in shades of night,
For ever I am ravish'd from thy sight.
In vain I reach my feeble hands to join
In sweet embraces; ah! no longer thine;
She said, and from his eyes the fleeting fair
Retir'd like subtle smoke dissolv'd in air;
And left her hopeless lover in despair.
In vain, with folding arms, the youth essay'd
To stop her flight, and strain the flying shade:
He prays, he raves, all means in vain he tries,
With rage inflam'd, astonish'd with surpris:
But the return'd no more, to bless his longing
eyes.

Nor would th' infernal Ferry-man once more
Be brib'd, to waft him to the farther shore.
What should he do, who twice had lost his love?
What notes invent, what new petitions move?
Her soul already was consign'd to fate,
And shivering in the leaky sculler fate.
For seven continued months, if fame say true,
The wretched swain his sorrows did renew;
By Strymon's freezing streams he sat alone,
The rocks were mov'd to pity with his moan:
Trees bent their heads to hear him sing his wrongs:
Fierce tigers couch'd around, and loll'd their fawning tongues.

So close in poplar shades, her children gone,
The mother nightingale laments alone: [thence,
Whose nest some prying churl had found, and
By stealth, convey'd th' unfeather'd innocence.
But she supplies the night with mournful strains,
And melancholy music fills the plains.

Sad Orpheus thus his tedious hours employs,
Averse from Venus, and from nuptial joys,
Alone he tempts the frozen floods, alone
Th' unhappy climes, where spring was never known;
He mourn'd his wretched wife, in vain restor'd,
And Pluto's unavailing boon deplor'd.

The Thracian matrons, who the youth accus'd
Of love disdain'd, and marriage rites refus'd,

With furies and nocturnal orgies fir'd,
At length, against his sacred life conspir'd,
Whom ev'n the savage beasts had spar'd, they kill'd,
And strew'd his mangled limbs about the field,
Then, when his head from his fair shoulders torn,
Wash'd by the waters, was on Hebrus borne;
Ev'n then his trembling tongue invoc'd his bride;
With his last voice, Eurydice, he cry'd,
Eurydice, the rocks and river banks reply'd.
This answer Proteus gave, nor more he said,
But in the billows plung'd his hoary head;
And where he leap'd the waves in circles widely spread.

The nymph return'd, her drooping son to cheer
And bade him banish his superfluous fear;
For now, said she, the cause is known, from whence
Thy woe succeeded, and for what offence:
The nymphs, companions of the unhappy maid,
This punishment upon thy crimes have laid;
And sent a plague among thy thriving bees.
With vows and suppliant prayers their power
The soft Napæan race will soon repent [appeal
Their anger, and remit the punishment:
The secret in an easy method lies;
Select four brawny bulls for sacrifice,
Which on Lycaeus graze, without a guide;
Add four fair heifers yet in yoke untry'd:
For these, four altars in their temple rear,
And then adore the woodland powers with prayer
From the slain victims pour the streaming blood
And leave their bodies in the shady wood:
Nine mornings thence, Lethæan poppy bring,
To appease the manes of the poets king:
And, to propitiate his offended pride,
A fatted calf, and a black ewe provide:
This finish'd, to the former woods repair.
His mother's precepts he performs with care;
The temple visits, and adores with prayer.
Four altars raises, from his herd he culls,
For slaughter, four the fairest of his bulls;
Four heifers from his female store he took,
All fair, and all unknowing of the yoke.
Nine mornings thence, with sacrifice and prayer
The powers aton'd, he to the grove repairs.
Behold a prodigy! for, from within
The broken bowels, and the bloated skin,
A buzzing noise of bees his ears alarms,
Straight issue thro' the sides assembling swarms,
Dark as a cloud they make a wheeling flight,
Then on a neighbouring tree, descending light:
Like a large cluster of black grapes they show,
And make a large dependence from the bough.
Thus have I sung of fields, and flocks, and trees
And of the waxen work of labouring bees:
While mighty Cæsar, thundering from afar,
Seeks on Euphrates' banks the spoils of war;
With conquering arts asserts his country's cause,
With arts of peace the willing people draws:
On the glad earth the golden age renews,
And his great father's path to heaven pursues,
While I at Naples pass my peaceful days,
Affecting studies of less noisy praise:
And bold, through youth, beneath the beech-
shade,
The lays of shepherds, and their loves, have play'd

TO THE MOST HONOURABLE

J O H N

LORD MARQUIS OF NORMANBY, EARL OF MULGRAVE, &c.

AND

Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter.

AN Heroic Poem, truly such, is undoubtedly the greatest work which the soul of a man is capable to perform. The design of it is to form the mind to heroic virtue by example; it is conveyed in verse, that it may delight while it instructs: the action of it is always one, entire, and great. The least and most trivial episodes, or under actions, which are interwoven in it, are parts either necessary, or convenient, to carry on the main design. Either so necessary, that without them the poem must be imperfect; or so convenient, that no others can be imagined more suitable to the place in which they are. There is nothing to be left void in a firm building; even the cavities ought not to be filled with rubbish, which is of a perishable kind, destructive to the strength; but with brick or stone, though of less pieces, yet of the same nature, and fitted to the crannies. Even the least portions of them must be of the epic kind; all things must be grave, majestic and sublime: nothing of a foreign nature, like the trifling novels, which Aristotle and others have inserted in their poems; by which the reader is misled into another sort of pleasure, opposite to that which is designed in an epic poem. One raises the soul and hardens it to virtue; the other softens it again, and unbends it into vice. One conduces to the poet's aim, the completing of his work; which he is driving on, labouring and hastening in every line: the other slackens his pace, diverts him from his way, and locks him up like a knight-errant in an enchanted castle, when he should be pursuing his first adventure. Statius, as Boſſu has well observed, was ambitious of trying his strength with his master Virgil, as Virgil had before tried his with Homer. The Grecian gave the two Romans an example, in the games which were celebrated at the funerals of Patroclus. Virgil imitated the invention of Homer, but changed the sports. But both the Greek and Latin poet took their occasions from the subject; though, to confess the truth, they were both ornamental, or, at best, convenient parts of it, rather than of necessity arising from it. Statius, who through his whole poem, is noted for want of conduct and judgment, instead of staying, as he might have done, for the death of Capaneus, Hippomedon, Tydeus, or some other of his seven champions (who are heroes all alike), or more properly for the tragical end of the two brothers, whose exequies the next successor had leisure to perform, when the siege was raised, and in the interval betwixt the poet's first action and his second, went out of his way, as it were on propense malice, to commit a fault: for he took his opportunity to kill a royal infant, by the means of a serpent (that author of all evil), to make way for those funeral honours which he intended for him. Now if this innocent had been of any relation to his Thebais; if he had either furthered or hindered the taking of the town, the poet might have found some sorry excuse at least for the detaining the reader from the promised siege. On these terms, this Capaneus of a poet engaged his two immortal predecessors, and his success was answerable to his enterprise.

If this economy must be observed in the minutest parts of an epic poem, which, to a common reader, seem to be detached from the body, and almost independent of it, what soul, though sent into the world with great advantages of nature, cultivated with the liberal arts and sciences, conversant with histories of the dead, and enriched with observations on the living, can be sufficient to inform the whole body of so great a work? I touch here but transiently, without any strict method, on some few of those many rules of imitating nature, which Aristotle drew from Homer's Iliads and Odyssees, and which he fitted to the drama; furnishing himself also with observations from the practice of the theatre, when it flourished under Æschylus, Eurypides, and Sophocles. For the original of the stage was from the epic poem. Narration, doubtless, preceded acting, and gave laws to it: what at first was told artfully, was, in process of time, represented gracefully to the sight and hearing. Those episodes of Homer, which were proper for the stage, the poets amplified each into an action: out of his limbs they formed their bodies: what he had contracted they enlarged: out of one Hercules were made infinity of pygmies; yet all endued with human souls; for from him their great Creator, they have each of them the "divinæ particulæ auræ." They flowed from him at first, and are at last resolved into him. Nor were they only animated by him, but their measure and symmetry was owing to him. His one, entire, and great action, was copied by them according to the proportions of the drama: if he finished his orb within the year, it sufficed to teach them, that their action being less, and being also less diversified with incidents, their orb of consequence, must be circumscribed in a less compass, which they reduced within the limits either of a natural or an artificial day: so that as he taught them to amplify what he had shortened, by the same rule applied the contrary way, he taught them to shorten what he had amplified. Tragedy is the miniature of human life: an epic poem is the draught at length. Here, my Lord, I must contract also; for, before I was aware, I was almost running into a long digression, to prove that there is no such absolute necessity that the time of a stage-action should so strictly be confined to twenty-four hours, as never to exceed them, for which Aristotle contends, and the Grecian stage has practised. Some longer space, on some occasions, I think may be allowed, especially for the English theatre, which requires more variety of incidents than the French. Corneille himself, after long practice, was inclined to think, that the time allotted by the ancients was too short to raise and finish a great action: and better a mechanic rule were stretched or broken, than a great beauty were omitted. To raise, and afterwards to calm the passions, to purge the soul from pride, by the examples of human miseries, which befall the greatest; in few words, to expel arrogance, and introduce compassion, are the great effects of tragedy. Great, I must confess, if they were altogether as true as they are pompous. But are habits to be introduced at three hours warning? Are radical diseases so suddenly removed? A mountebank may promise such a cure, but a skilful physician will not undertake it. An epic poem is not so much in haste: it works leisurely; the changes which it makes are slow; but the cure is likely to be more perfect. The effects of tragedy, as I said, are too violent to be lasting. If it be answered, that for this reason tragedies are often to be seen, and the dose to be repeated; this is tacitly to confess, that there is more virtue in one heroic poem, than in many tragedies. A man is humbled one day, and his pride returns the next. Chemical medicines are observed to relieve oftener than to cure; for it is the nature of spirits to make swift impressions, but not deep. Galenical decoctions, to which I may properly compare an epic poem, have more of body in them: they work by their substance and weight. It is one reason of Aristotle's to prove that tragedy is the more noble, because it turns in a shorter compass: the whole action being circumscribed within the space of four and twenty hours. He might prove as well that a mushroom is to be preferred before a peach, because it shoots up in the compass of a night. A chariot may be driven round the pillar in less space than a large machine, because the bulk is not so great: is the Moon a more noble planet than Saturn, because she makes her revolution in less than thirty days, and he in little less than thirty years? Both their orbs are in proportion to their several magnitudes; and, consequently, the quickness or slowness of their motion, and the time of their circumvolutions, is no argument of the greater or less perfection. And besides, what virtue is there in a tragedy, which is not contained in an epic poem; where pride is humbled, virtue rewarded, and vice punished; and those more amply treated, than the narrowness of the drama can admit? The shining quality of an epic hero, his magnanimity, his constancy, his patience, his piety, or whatever characteristical virtue his poet gives him, raises first our admiration: we are naturally prone to imitate what we admire: and frequent acts produce a habit. If the hero's chief quality be vicious, as for example, the choleric and obstinate desire of vengeance in Achilles, yet the moral is instructive: and besides, we are informed in the very proposition of the Iliads, that his anger was pernicious; that it brought a thousand ills on the Grecian camp. The courage of Achilles is proposed to imitation, not his pride and disobedience to his general, nor his brutal cruelty to his dead enemy, nor the selling his body to his father. We abhor these actions while we read them, and what we abhor we never imitate: the poet only shows them like rocks or quick-sands, to be shunned.

By this example, the critics have concluded that it is not necessary the manners of the hero should be virtuous. They are poetically good if they are of a piece. Though where a character of perfect virtue is set before us, it is more lovely: for there the whole hero is to be imitated. This is the Æneas of our author: this is that idea of perfection in an epic poem, which painters and statuaries have only in their minds; and which no hands are able to express. These are the beauties of a god in a human body. When the picture of Achilles is drawn in tragedy, he is taken with those warts, and moles, and hard features, by those who represent him on the stage, or he is no more Achilles: for his creator Homer has so described him. Yet even thus he appears a perfect hero, though an imperfect character of virtue. Horace paints him after Homer, and delivers him to be copied on the stage with all those imperfections. Therefore they are either not faults in an heroic poem, or faults common to the drama. After all, on the whole merits of the cause, it must be acknowledged that the epic poem is more for the manners, and tragedy for the passions. The passions, as I have said, are violent: and acute distempers require medicines of a strong and speedy operation. Ill habits of the mind are, like chronic diseases, to be corrected by degrees, and cured by alteratives: wherein though purges are sometimes necessary, yet diet, good air, and moderate exercise, have the greatest part. The matter being thus stated, it will appear that both sorts of poetry are of use for their proper ends. The stage is more active, the epic poem works at greater leisure, yet is acted too, when need requires. For dialogue is imitated by the drama, from the more active parts of it. One puts off a fit like the quinquina, and relieves us only for a time; the other roots out the distemper, and gives a healthful habit. The sun enlightens and cheers us, dispels fogs, and warms the ground with his daily beams; but the corn is sowed, increases, is ripened, and is reaped for use in process of time, and in its proper season. I proceed from the greatness of the action, to the dignity of the actors, I mean the persons employed in both poems. There likewise tragedy will be seen to borrow from the epopee; and that which borrows is always of less dignity, because it has not of its own. A subject, it is true, may lend to his sovereign; but the act of borrowing makes the king inferior, because he wants, and the subject supplies. And suppose the persons of the drama wholly fabulous, or of the poet's invention, yet heroic poetry gave him the examples of that invention, because it was first, and Homer the common father of the stage. I know not of any one advantage which tragedy can boast above heroic poetry, but that it is represented to the view, as well as read: and instructs in the closet, as well as on the theatre. This is an uncontended excellence, and a chief branch of its prerogative: yet I may be allowed to say, without partiality, that herein the actors share the poet's praise. Your Lordship knows some modern tragedies which are beautiful on the stage, and yet I am confident you would not read them. Triphon, the stationer, complains they are seldom asked for in his shop. The poet who flourished in the scene, is damned in the Ruelle; nay more, he is not esteemed a good poet by those who see and hear his extravagancies with delight. They are a sort of stately fustian, and lofty childishness. Nothing but nature can give a sincere pleasure; where that is not imitated, it is grotesque painting, the fine woman ends in a fish's tail.

I might also add, that many things, which not only please, but are real beauties in the reading, would appear absurd upon the stage: and those not only the "speciosa miracula," as Horace calls them, of transformations, of Scylla, Antiphanes, and the Lestrignons, which cannot be represented even in operas, but the profews of Achilles, or Æneas, would appear ridiculous in our dwarf-heroes of the theatre. We can believe they routed armies in Homer, or in Virgil; but "ne Hercules contra duos" in the drama. I forbear to instance in many things, which the stage cannot, or ought not to represent. For I have said already more than I intended on this subject, and should fear it might be turned against me; that I plead for the pre-eminence of epic poetry, because I have taken some pains in translating Virgil; if this were the first time that I had delivered my opinion in this dispute. But I have more than once already maintained the rights of my two masters against their rivals of the scene, even while I wrote tragedies myself, and had no thoughts of this present undertaking. I submit my opinion to your judgment, who are better qualified than any man I know to decide this controversy. You come, my Lord, instructed in the cause, and need not that I should open it. Your Essay of Poetry, which was published without a name, and of which I was not honoured with the confidence, I read over and over with much delight, and as much instruction: and, without flattering you, or making myself more moral than I am, not without some envy. I was loth to be informed how an epic poem should be written, or how a tragedy should be contrived and managed, in better verse, and with more judgment than I could teach others. A native of Parnassus, and bred up in the studies of its fundamental laws, may receive new lights from his contemporaries; but it is a grudging kind of praise which he gives his benefactors. He is more obliged than he is willing to acknowledge; there is a tincture of malice in his commendations. For where I own I am taught, I confess my want of knowledge. A judge upon the bench may, out of good nature, or at least interest, encourage the pleadings of a puny counsellor; but he does not willingly commend his brother-ferjeant at the bar; especially when he controls his law, and exposes that ignorance which is made sacred by his place. I gave the unknown author his due commendation, I must confess: but who can answer for me, and for the rest of the poets, who heard me read the poem, whether we should not have been better pleased to have seen our own names at the bottom of the title-page? Perhaps we commended it the more, that we might seem to be above the censure. We are naturally displeas'd with an unknown critic, as the ladies are with a lampooner; because we are bitten in the dark, and know not where to fasten our revenge. But great excellencies will work their way through all sorts of opposition. I applauded rather out of decency than affection; and was ambitious, as some yet can witness, to be acquainted with a man with whom I had the honour to converse, and that almost daily, for so many years together. Heaven knows, if I have heartily forgiven you this deceit. You extorted a praise, which I should willingly have given had I known you. Nothing had been more easy than to commend a patron of a long standing. The world would join with me, if the encomiums were just; and if unjust, would excuse a grateful flatterer. But to come anonymous upon me, and force me to commend you against my interest, was not altogether so fair, give me leave to say, as it was politic. For, by concealing your quality, you might clearly understand how your work succeeded; and that the general approbation was given to your merit, not your titles. Thus, like Apelles, you stood unseen behind your own Venus, and received the praises of the passing multitude: the work was commended, not the author: and I doubt not, this was one of the most pleasing adventures of your life.

I have detained your Lordship longer than I intended in this dispute of preference betwixt the epic poem and the drama; and yet have not formally answered any of the arguments which are brought by Aristotle on the other side, and set in the fairest light by Dacier. But I suppose, without looking on the book, I may have touched on some of the objections. For, in this address to your Lordship, I design not a treatise of heroic poetry, but write in a loose epistolary way, somewhat tending to that subject, after the example of Horace, in his first epistle of the second book to Augustus Cæsar, and of that to the Pisos, which we call his Art of Poetry. In both of which he observes no method that I can trace, whatever Scaliger the father, or Heinsius, may have seen, or rather think they had seen. I have taken up, laid down, and resumed, as often as I pleased, the same subject: and this loose proceeding I shall use through all this prefatory Dedication. Yet all this while I have been sailing with some side-wind or other toward the point I proposed in the beginning; the greatness and excellency of an heroic poem, with some of the difficulties which attend that work. The comparison, therefore, which I made betwixt the epopee and the tragedy, was not altogether a digression; for it is concluded on all hands, that they are both the master pieces of human wit.

In the mean time, I may be bold to draw this corollary from what has been already said, That the stile of heroic poets is very short; all are not such who have assumed that lofty title in ancient or modern ages, or have been so esteemed by their partial and ignorant admirers.

There have been but one great Ilias, and one Æneis, in so many ages. The next, but the next with a long interval betwixt, was the Jerusalem: I mean not so much in distance of time, as in excellency. After these three are entered, some Lord Chamberlain should be appointed, some critic of authority should be set before the door, to keep out a crowd of little poets, who press for admission, and are not of quality. Mævius would be deafening your Lordship's ears, with his

Mere sustian, as Horace would tell you from behind, without pressing forward, and more smoke than fire. Pulci, Boyardo, and Ariosto, would cry out, Make room for the Italian poets, the descendants of Virgil in a right line. Father Le Moin, with his Saint Louis; and Scudery with his Alaric, for a godly king, and a Gothic conqueror; and Chapelain would take it ill that his maid should be refused a place with Helen and Lavinia. Spenser has a better plea for his Fairy Queen, had his action been finished, or had been one. And Milton, if the devil had not been his hero, instead of Adam, if the giant had not foiled the knight, and driven him out of his strong hold, to wander through the world with his lady-errant; and if there had not been more machining persons than human, in his poem. After these, the rest of our English poets shall not be mentioned. I have that honour for them which I ought to have; but if they are worthies, they are not to be ranked amongst the three whom I have named, and who are established in their reputation.

Before I quitted the comparison betwixt epic poetry and tragedy, I should have acquainted my judge with one advantage of the former over the latter, which I now casually remember out of the preface of Segrais before his translation of the Æneis, or out of Bossu, no matter which. The style of the heroic poem is, and ought to be, more lofty than that of the drama. The critic is certainly in the right, for the reason already urged: the work of tragedy is on the passions; and, in a dialogue, both of them abhor strong metaphors, in which the epopee delights. A poet cannot speak too plainly on the stage: for, “Volat irrevocabile verbum;” the sense is lost, if it be not taken flying; but what we read alone, we have leisure to digest. There an author may beautify his sense by the boldness of his expression, which, if we understand not fully at the first, we may dwell upon it, till we find the secret force and excellence. That which cures the manners by alterative physic, as I said before, must proceed by insensible degrees; but that which purges the passions, must do its business all at once, or wholly fail of its effect, at least in the present operation; and without repeated doses. We must beat the iron while it is hot, but we may polish it at leisure. Thus, my Lord, you pay the fine of my forgetfulness; and yet the merits of both causes are where they were, and undecided, till you declare whether it be more for the benefit of mankind to have their manners in general corrected, or their pride and hard-heartedness removed.

I must now come closer to my present business; and not thinking of making more invasive wars abroad, when, like Hannibal, I am called back to the defence of my own country. Virgil is attacked by many enemies: he has a whole confederacy against him, and I must endeavour to defend him as well as I am able. But their principal objections being against his moral, the duration or length of time taken up in the action of the poem, and what they have to urge against the manners of his hero; I shall omit the rest as mere cavils of grammarians; at the worst but casual slips of a great man's pen, or inconsiderable faults of an admirable poem, which the author had not leisure to review before his death. Macrobius has answered what the ancients could urge against him; and some things I have lately read in Tanneguy, le Fevre, Valois, and another whom I name not, which are scarce worth answering. They begin with the moral of his poem, which I have elsewhere confessed, and still must own, not to be so noble as that of Homer. But let both be fairly stated; and, without contradicting my first opinion, I can show that Virgil's was as useful to the Romans of his age, as Homer's was to the Grecians of his; in what time soever he may be supposed to have lived and flourished. Homer's moral was to urge the necessity of union, and of a good understanding betwixt confederate states and princes engaged in a war with a mighty monarch; as also of discipline in an army, and obedience in their several chiefs, to the supreme commander of the joint forces. To inculcate this, he sets forth the ruinous effects of discord in the camp of those allies, occasioned by the quarrel betwixt the general, and one of the next in office under him. Agamemnon gives the provocation, and Achilles represents the injury. Both parties are faulty in the quarrel, and accordingly they are both punished: the aggressor is forced to sue for peace to his inferior on dishonourable conditions; the deserter refuses the satisfaction offered, and his obstinacy costs him his best friend. This works the natural effect of choler, and turns his rage against him by whom he was last affronted, and most sensibly. The greater anger expels the less; but his character is still preserved. In the mean time the Grecian army receives loss on loss, and is half destroyed by a pestilence into the bargain.

“Quicquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi.”

As the poet, in the first part of the example had shown the bad effects of discord, so after the reconciliation he gives the good effects of unity. For Hector is slain, and then Troy must fall. By this it is probable, that Homer lived when the Median monarchy was grown formidable to the Grecians; and that the joint endeavours of his countrymen were little enough to preserve their common freedom from an encroaching enemy. Such was his moral, which all critics have allowed to be more noble than that of Virgil, though not adapted to the times in which the Roman poet lived. Had Virgil flourished in the age of Ennius, and addressed to Scipio, he had probably taken the same moral, or some other not unlike it. For then the Romans were in as much danger from the Carthaginian commonwealth, as the Grecians were from the Assyrian or Median monarchy. But we are to consider him as writing his poem in a time when the old form of government was subverted, and a new one just established by Octavius Cæsar; in effect by force of arms, but seemingly by the consent of the Roman people. The commonwealth had received a deadly wound in the former civil wars betwixt Marius and Sylla. The commons, while the first prevailed, had almost shaken off the yoke of the nobility; and Marius and Cinna, like the captains of the mob, under the specious pretence of the public good, and of doing justice on the oppressors of their liberty, revenged themselves, without form of law, on their private enemies. Sylla, in his turn, proscribed the heads of the adverse party: he, too, had nothing but liberty and reformation in his mouth (for the cause of religion is but a modern motive to rebellion, invented by the Christian priesthood, resigning on the Heathen). Sylla, to be sure, meant no more good to the Roman people than Marius before, whatever he declared; but sacrificed the lives, and took the estates of all his enemies, to gratify those who brought him into power: such was the reformation of the government by both parties. The senate and the commons were the two bases on which it stood; and the two champions of either faction, each destroyed the foundations of the other side: so the fabric of consequence must fall betwixt them, and tyranny must be built upon their ruins. This comes of altering fundamental laws and constitutions. Like him, who, being in good health, lodged himself in a physician's house, and was over-persuaded by his landlord to take physic, of which he died, for the benefit of his doctor: “Stavo ben (was written on his monument) ma, perfar meglio, sto qui.”

After the death of those two usurpers, the commonwealth seemed to recover, and held up its head for a little time. But it was all the while in a deep consumption, which is a flattering disease. Pompey, Crassus, and Cæsar, had found the sweets of arbitrary power; and, each being a check to the others growth, struck up a false friendship amongst themselves, and divided the government betwixt them, which none of them was able to assume alone. These were the public-spirited men of their age, that is, patriots of their own interest. The commonwealth looked with a florid countenance in their management, spread in bulk, and all the while was wasting in the vitals. Not to trouble your Lordship with the repetition of what you know: after the death of Crassus, Pompey found himself outwitted by Cæsar; broke with him, overpowered him in the senate, and caused many unjust decrees to pass against him: Cæsar, thus injured, and unable to resist the faction of the nobles, which was now uppermost (for he was a Marian) had recourse to arms; and his cause was just against Pompey, but not against his country; whose constitution ought to have been sacred to him; and never to have been violated on the account of any private wrong. But he prevailed; and heaven declaring for him, he became a providential monarch, under the title of Perpetual Dictator. He being murdered by his own son, whom I neither dare commend, nor can justly blame (though Dante, in his Inferno, has put him and Cassius, and Judas Iscariot betwixt them, into the great devil's mouth) the commonwealth popped up its head for the third time, under Brutus and Cassius, and then sunk for ever.

Thus the Roman people were grossly gulled, twice or thrice over; and as often enslaved in one century, and under the same pretence of reformation. At last the two battles of Philippi gave the decisive stroke against liberty; and not long after the commonwealth was turned into a monarchy, by the conduct and good fortune of Augustus. It is true, that the despotic power could not have fallen into better hands, than those of the first and second Cæsar. Your Lordship well knows what obligations Virgil had to the latter of them: he saw, beside, that the commonwealth was left without resource: the heads of it destroyed; the senate new moulded, grown degenerate; and either bought off, or thrusting their own necks into the yoke, out of fear of being forced. Yet I may safely affirm for our great author (as men of good sense are generally honest) that he was still of republican principles in his heart—

“Secretisque piis, his dantem jura Catonem.”

I think; I need use no other argument to justify my opinion, than that of this one line, taken from the eighth book of the Æneis. If he had not well studied his patron's temper, it might have ruined him with another prince. But Augustus was not discontented, at least that we can find, that Cato was placed, by his own poet, in Elysium; and there giving laws to the holy Souls, who deserved to be separated from the vulgar sort of good spirits. For his conscience could not but whisper to the arbitrary monarch, that the kings of Rome were at first elective, and governed not without a senate: that Romulus was no hereditary prince, and though, after his death, he received divine honours, for the good he did on earth, yet he was but a god of their own making: that the last Tarquin was expelled justly for overt acts of tyranny, and male-administration; for such are the conditions of an elective kingdom: and I meddle not with others: being, for my own opinion, of Montaign's principles, That an honest man ought to be contented with that form of government, and with those fundamental constitutions of it, which he received from his ancestors, and under which himself was born. Though at the same time he confessed freely, that if he could have chosen his place of birth, it should have been at Venice: which, for many reasons, I dislike, and am better pleased to have been born an Englishman.

But to return from my long rambling: I say that Virgil having maturely weighed the condition of the times in which he lived; that an entire liberty was not to be retrieved: that the present settlement had the prospect of a long continuance in the same family, or those adopted into it: that he held his paternal estate from the bounty of the conqueror, by whom he was likewise enriched, esteemed, and cherished: that this conqueror, though of a bad kind, was the very best of it: that the arts of peace flourished under him: that all men might be happy, if they would be quiet: that now he was in possession of the whole, yet he shared a great part of his authority with the senate: that he would be chosen into the ancient offices of the commonwealth, and ruled by the power which he derived from them; and prorogued his government from time to time: still, as it were, threatening to dismiss himself from public cares, which he exercised more for the common good, than for any delight he took in greatness: these things, I say, being considered by the poet, he concluded it to be the interest of his country to be so governed: to infuse an awful respect into the people towards such a prince: by that respect to confirm their obedience to him: and by that obedience to make them happy. This was the moral of his divine poem: honest in the poet: honourable to the emperor, whom he derives from a divine extraction; and reflecting part of that honour on the Roman people, whom he derives also from the Trojans; and not only profitable, but necessary to the present age; and likely to be such to their posterity. That it was the received opinion that the Romans were descended from the Trojans, and Julius Cæsar from Iulus the son of Æneas, was enough for Virgil; though perhaps he thought not so himself: or that Æneas ever was in Italy, which Bochartus manifestly proves. And Homer, where he says that Jupiter hated the house of Priam, and was resolved to transfer the kingdom to the family of Æneas, yet mentions nothing of his leading a colony into a foreign country, and settling there: but that the Romans valued themselves on their Trojan ancestry, is so undoubted a truth, that I need not prove it. Even the seals which we have remaining of Julius Cæsar, which we know to be antique, have the star of Venus over them, though they were all graven after his death, as a note that he was deified. I doubt not but one reason, why Augustus should be so passionately concerned for the preservation of the Æneis, which its author had condemned to be burnt, as an imperfect poem, by his last will and testament, was, because it did him a real service, as well as an honour; that a work should not be lost, where his divine original was celebrated in verse, which had the character of immortality stamped upon it.

Neither were the great Roman families which flourished in his time, less obliged to him than the emperor. Your Lordship knows with what address he makes mention of them, as captains of ships, or leaders in the war; and even some of Italian extraction are not forgotten. These are the single stars which are sprinkled through the Æneis: but there are whole constellations of them in the fifth book. And I could not but take notice, when I translated it, of some favourite families to which he gives the victory, and awards the prizes, in the person of his hero, at the funeral games which were celebrated in honour of Anchises. I insist not on their names; but am pleased to find the Memmii amongst them, derived from Mnethus, because Lucretius dedicates to one of that family, a branch of which destroyed Corinth. I likewise either found or formed an image to myself of the contrary kind; that those who lost the prizes, were such as disoblinded the poet, or were in disgrace with Augustus, or enemies to Mæcenias: and this was the poetical revenge he took. For "genus irritabile Vatum," as Horace says. When a poet is thoroughly provoked, he will do himself justice, however dear it cost him. "Animamque in vulnere ponit." I think these are not bare imaginations of my own, though I find no trace of them in the commentators: but one poet may judge of another, by himself. The vengeance we defer, is not forgotten. I hinted before, that the whole Roman people were obliged by Virgil, in deriving them from Troy; an ancestry which they affected. We, and the French, are of the same humour: they would be thought to descend from a son, I think, of Hector: and we would have our Britain both named and plauted by a descendant of Æneas. Spenser favours this opinion what he can. His prince Arthur, or whoever he intends by him, is a Trojan. Thus the hero of Homer was a Grecian, of Virgil a Roman, and of Tasso an Italian.

I have transgressed my bounds, and gone farther than the moral leads me. But if your Lordship is not tired, I am safe enough.

Thus far, I think, my author is defended. But as Augustus is still shadowed in the person of Æneas, of which I shall say more when I come to the manners which the poet gives his hero, I must prepare that subject, by showing how dextrously he managed both the prince and people, so as to displease neither, and to do good to both;

which is the part of a wife and an honest man : and proves, that it is possible for a courtier not to be a knave. I shall continue still to speak my thoughts like a free-born subject, as I am ; though such things perhaps, as no Dutch commentator could, and I am sure no Frenchman durst. I have already told your Lordship my opinion of Virgil ; that he was no arbitrary man : obliged he was to his master for his bounty ; and he repays him with good counsel, how to behave himself in his new monarchy, so as to gain the affections of his subjects, and deserve to be called the father of his country. From this consideration it is, that he chose the ground-work of his poem, one empire destroyed, and another raised from the ruins of it. This was the just parallel. Æneas could not pretend to be Priam's heir, in a lineal succession : for Anchises, the hero's father, was only of the second branch of the royal family ; and Helenus, a son of Priam, was yet surviving, and might lawfully claim before him. It may be, Virgil mentions him on that account. Neither has he forgotten Priamus, in the fifth of his Æneis, the son of Polites, youngest son to Priam ; who was slain by Pyrrhus, in the second book. Æneas had only married Creüsa, Priam's daughter, and by her could have no title, while any of the male issue were remaining. In this case, the poet gave him the next title, which is that of an elective king. The remaining Trojans chose him to lead them forth, and settle them in some foreign country. Ilioneus, in his speech to Dido, calls him expressly by the name of king. Our poet, who all this while had Augustus in his eye, had no desire he should seem to succeed by any right of inheritance, derived from Julius Cæsar ; such a title being but one degree removed from conquest. For what was introduced by force, by force may be removed. It was better for the people that they should give, than he should take. Since that gift was indeed no more at bottom than a trust ; Virgil gives us an example of this, in the person of Mezentius. He governed arbitrarily ; he was expelled, and came to the deserved end of all tyrants. Our author shows us another sort of kingship, in the person of Latinus : he was descended from Saturn, and, as I remember, in the third degree. He is described a just and gracious prince ; solicitous for the welfare of his people ; always consulting with his senate, to promote the common good. We find him at the head of them, when he enters into the council-hall. Speaking first, but still demanding their advice, and steering by it, as far as the iniquity of the times would suffer him. And this is the proper character of a king by inheritance, who is born a father of his country. Æneas, though he married the heiress of the crown, yet claimed no title to it during the life of his father-in-law. " Pater arma Latinus habeto," &c. are Virgil's words. As for himself, he was contented to take care of his country gods, who were not those of Latium : wherein our divine author seems to relate to the after-practice of the Romans, which was to adopt the gods of those they conquered, or received as members of their commonwealth. Yet withal, he plainly touches at the office of the high priesthood, with which Augustus was invested : and which made his person more sacred and inviolable, than even the tribunitial power. It was not therefore for nothing, that the most judicious of all poets made that office vacant, by the death of Pantheus, in the second book of the Æneis, for his hero to succeed in it ; and consequently for Augustus to enjoy. I know not that any of the commentators have taken notice of that passage. If they have not, I am sure they ought ; and if they have, I am not indebted to them for the observation ; the words of Virgil are very plain,

" Sacra, suoque tibi commendat Troja Penates."

As for Augustus, or his uncle Julius, claiming by descent from Æneas ; that title is already out of doors, Æneas succeeded not, but was elected. Troy was fore-doomed to fall for ever.

" Postquam res Asiæ, Priamique evertere regnum

" Immeritum visum Superis, — Æneis, Lib. III. 1."

Augustus, it is true, had once resolved to rebuild that city, and there to make the seat of empire : but Horace writes an ode on purpose to deter him from that thought ; declaring the place to be accursed, and that the gods would as often destroy it, as it should be raised. Hereupon the emperor laid aside a project so ungrateful to the Roman people. But by this, my Lord, we may conclude, that he had still his pedigree in his head ; and had an itch of being thought a divine king, if his poets had not given him better counsel.

I will pass by many less material objections, for want of room to answer them : what follows next is of great importance, if the critics can make out their charge ; for it is levelled at the manners which our poet gives his hero, and which are the same which were eminently seen in his Augustus : those manners were, piety to the gods, and a dutiful affection to his father ; love to his relations ; care of his people ; courage and conduct in the wars ; gratitude to those who had obliged him, and justice in general to mankind.

Piety, as your Lordship sees, takes place of all, as the chief part of his character : and the word in Latin is more full than it can possibly be expressed in any modern language ; for there it comprehends not only devotion to the gods, but filial love and tender affection to relations of all sorts. As instances of this, the deities of Troy, and his own Penates, are made the companions of his flight : they appear to him in his voyage, and advise him ; and at last he replaces them in Italy, their native country. For his father, he takes him on his back ; he leads his little son ; his wife follows him ; but, losing his footsteps through fear or ignorance, he goes back into the midst of his enemies to find her ; and leaves not his pursuit till her ghost appears, to forbid his farther search. I will say nothing of his duty to his father while he lived, his sorrow for his death ; of the games instituted in honour of his memory ; or seeking him, by his command, even after his death, in the Elysian fields. I will not mention his tenderness for his son, which every where is visible: of his raising a tomb for Polydorus, the obsequies for Misenus, his pious remembrance of Deiphobus; the funeral of his nurse; his grief for Pallas, and his revenge taken on his murderer, whom otherwise, by his natural compassion, he had forgiven; and then the poem had been left imperfect; for we could have had no certain prospect of his happiness, while the last obstacle to it was unremoved. Of the other parts which compose his character, as a king, or as a general, I need say nothing; the whole Æneis is one continued instance of some one or other of them; and where I find any thing of them taxed, it should suffice me, as briefly as I can, to vindicate my divine master to your Lordship, and by you to the reader. But herein, Segrais, in his admirable preface to his translation of the Æneis, as the author of the Dauphin's Virgil justly calls it, has prevented me. Him I follow, and what I borrow from him, am ready to acknowledge to him. For, impartially speaking, the French are as much better critics than the English, as they are worse poets. Thus we generally allow, that they better understand the management of a war, than our islanders; but we know we are superior to them in the day of battle. They value themselves on their generals, we on our soldiers. But this is not the proper place to decide that question, if they make it one. I shall perhaps say as much of other nations, and their poets, excepting only Tasso; and hope to make my assertion good, which is but doing justice to my country; part of which honour will reflect on your Lordship, whose thoughts are always just; your numbers harmonious, your words chosen, your expressions strong and manly, your verse flowing, and your turns as happy as they are easy. If you would set us more copies, your examples would make all precepts needless. In the mean time, that little you have written is owned, and that particularly by the poets (who are a nation not over lavish of praise to their contemporaries), as a principal ornament of our language: but the sweetest effences are always confined in the smallest glasses.

When I speak of your Lordship, it is never a digression, and therefore I need beg no pardon for it; but take up Segrais where I left him, and shall use him less often than I have occasion for him. For his preface is a perfect piece of criticism, full and clear, and digested into an exact method; mine is loose, and, as I intended it, epistolary. Yet I dwell on many things which he durst not touch: for it is dangerous to offend an arbitrary master; and every patron who has the power of Augustus, has not his clemency. In short, my Lord, I would not translate him, because I would bring you somewhat of my own. His notes and observations on every book are of the same excellency; and, for the same reason, I omit the greater part.

He takes no notice that Virgil is arraigned for placing piety before valour; and making that piety the chief character of his hero. I have already said, from Boſſu, that a poet is not obliged to make his hero a virtuous man: therefore neither Homer nor Tasso are to be blamed, for giving what predominant quality they pleased to their first character. But Virgil, who designed to form a perfect prince, and would insinuate that Augustus, whom he calls Æneas in his poem, was truly such, found himself obliged to make him without blemish; thoroughly virtuous: and a thorough virtue both begins and ends in piety. Tasso, without question, observed this before me; and therefore split his hero in two: he gave Godfrey piety, and Rinaldo fortitude, for their chief qualities or manners. Homer, who had chosen another moral, makes both Agamemnon and Achilles vicious; for his design was, to instruct in virtue, by showing the deformity of vice. I avoid repetition of what I have said above. What follows is translated literally from Segrais.

Virgil had considered, that the greatest virtues of Augustus consisted in the perfect art of governing his people; which caused him to reign above forty years in great felicity. He considered that his emperor was valiant, civil, popular, eloquent, politic, and religious; he has given all these qualities to Æneas. But, knowing that piety alone comprehends the whole duty of man towards the gods, towards his country, and towards his relations, he judged that this ought to be his first character, whom he would let for a pattern of perfection. In reality, they who believe that the praises which arise from valour, are superior to those which proceed from any other virtues, have not considered (as they ought) that valour, destitute of other virtues, cannot render a man worthy of any true esteem. That quality, which signifies no more than an intrepid courage, may be separated from many others which are good, and accompanied with many which are ill. A man may be very valiant, and yet impious and vicious. But the same cannot be said of piety, which excludes all ill qualities, and comprehends even valour itself, with all other qualities which are good. Can we, for example, give the praise of valour to a man who should see his gods profaned, and should want the courage to defend them? to a man who should abandon his father, or desert his king in his last necessity?

Thus far Segrais, in giving the preference to piety, before valour. I will now follow him where he considers this valour, or intrepid courage, singly in itself; and this also Virgil gives to his Æneas, and that in an heroic degree.

Having first concluded that our poet did for the best in taking the first character of his hero from that essential virtue on which the rest depend, he proceeds to tell us, that in the ten years war of Troy, he was considered as the second champion of his country; allowing Hector the first place; and this, even by the confession of Homer, who took all occasions of setting up his own countrymen the Grecians, and of undervaluing the Trojan chiefs. But Virgil (whom Segrais forgot to cite) makes Dioneda give him a higher character for strength and courage. His testimony is this, in the eleventh book:

—Stetimus tela aspera contra;

Contulimusque manus: experto credite, quantus
In clypeum assurgat, quo turbine torquat
"hastam.

Si duo præterea tales Idæa tulisset

Terra viros; ultro Inachias venisset ad urbes

"armis:

"Hic pietate prior."——

I give not here my translation of these verses; because I think I have not ill succeeded in them; though your Lordship is so great a master of the original, that I have no reason to desire that you should see Virgil and me so near together. But you may please, my Lord, to take notice, that the Latin author refines upon the Greek, and insinuates, that Homer has done his hero wrong, in giving the advantage of the duel to his own countryman; though Diomedes was manifestly the second companion of the Grecians; and Ulysses referred him before Ajax, when he chose him for the champion of his nightly expedition; for he had a head-piece of his own; and wanted only the fortitude of another, to bring him off with safety; and that he might compass his design with honour.

The French translator thus proceeds: they who accuse Æneas for want of courage, either understand not Virgil, or have read him slightly; otherwise they would not raise an objection so easy to be answered. Hereupon he gives so many instances of the hero's valour, that to repeat them after him would tire your Lordship, and put me to the unnecessary trouble of transcribing the greatest part of the three last Æneids. In short, none could not be expected from an Amadis, a Sir Lancelot, or a whole round table, than he performs. "Proxima quæque metit gladio," is the perfect account of a knight-errant. If it be replied, continued Segrais, that it was not difficult for him to undertake and achieve such hardy enterprises, because he wore enchanted arms; that accusation, in the first place, must fall on Homer, ere it can reach Virgil. Achilles was as well provided with them as Æneas, though he was invulnerable without them: and Ariosto, the two Tasso's, Bernardo, and Torquato, even our own Spenser; in a word, all modern poets have copied Homer, as well as Virgil; he is neither the first nor last; but in the midst of them; and therefore is safe, if they are so. Who knows, says Segrais, but that his famed armour was only an allegorical defence, and signified no more than that he was under the peculiar protection of the gods? born, as the astrologers will tell us, out of Virgil (who was well versed in the Chaldean mysteries), under the favourable influence of Jupiter, Venus, and the Sun. But I insist not on this, because I know you believe not there is such an art; though not only Horace and Persius, but Augustus himself thought otherwise. But, in defence of Virgil, I dare positively say, that he has been more cautious in this particular, than either his predecessor or his descendants. For Æneas was actually wounded in the twelfth of the Æneis; though he had the same goldsmith to forge his arms, as had Achilles. It seems he was no war-luck, as the Scots commonly call such men, who, they say, are iron-free or lead-free. Yet after this experiment, that his arms were not impenetrable, when he was cured indeed by his mother's help; because he was that day to conclude the war by the death of Turnus, the poet durst not carry the miracle too far, and restore him wholly to his former vigour: he was still too weak to overtake his enemy; yet we see with what courage he attacks Turnus, when he faces and renews the combat. I need say no more: for Virgil defends himself without needing my assistance; and proves his hero truly to deserve that name. He was not then a second-rate champion, as they would have him, who think fortitude the first virtue in a hero. But being beaten from this hold, they will not yet allow him to be valiant; because he wept more often, as they think, than well becomes a man of courage.

In the first place, if tears are arguments of cowardice, what shall I say of Homer's hero? Shall Achilles pass for timorous, because he wept, and wept on less occasions than Æneas? Herein Virgil must be granted to have excelled his master. For once both heroes are described, lamenting their lost loves: Briseis was taken away by force from the Grecian; Creûsa was lost for ever to her husband. But Achilles went roaring along the salt-sea shore; and, like a booby, was complaining to his mother, when he should have revenged his injury by his arms. Æneas took a nobler course; for, having secured his father and son, he repeated all his former dangers to have found his wife, if she had been above ground. And here your Lordship may observe the address of Virgil: it was not for nothing that this passage was related with all these tender circumstances. Æneas told it; Dido heard it. That he had been so affectionate a husband, was no ill argument to the coming dowager, that he might prove as kind to her. Virgil has a thousand secret beauties, though I have not leisure to remark them.

Segrais, on this subject of a hero shedding tears, observes, that historians commend Alexander for weeping, when he read the mighty actions of Achilles. And Julius Cæsar is likewise praised, when, out of the same noble envy, he wept at the victories of Alexander. But, if we observe more closely, we shall find, that the tears of Æneas were always on a laudable occasion. Thus he weeps out of compassion, and tenderness of nature, when in the temple of Carthage he beholds the pictures of his friends, who sacrificed their lives in defence of their country. He deplores the lamentable end of his pilot Palinurus; the untimely death of young Pallas his confederate; and the rest, which I omit. Yet even for these tears, his wretched critics dare condemn him. They make Æneas little better than a kind of St. Swithin-hero, always raining. One of these censors is bold enough to arraign him of cowardice; when, in the beginning of the first book, he not only weeps, but trembles at an approaching storm.

“ Extemplò Æneæ solvuntur frigore membra :
“ Ingemit, et duplices tendens ad sidera palmas,”
&c.

But to this I have answered formerly; that his fear was not for himself, but for his people. And what can give a sovereign a better commendation, or recommend a hero more to the affection of the reader? They were threatened with a tempest, and he wept; he was promised Italy, and therefore he prayed for the accomplishment of that promise. All this in the beginning of a storm; therefore he showed the more early piety, and the quicker sense of compassion. Thus much I have urged elsewhere in the defence of Virgil; and since I have been informed, by Mr. Moyle, a young gentleman whom I can never sufficiently commend, that the ancients accounted drowning an accursed death. So that, if we grant him to have been afraid, he had just occasion for that fear, both in relation to himself and to his subjects. I think our adversaries can carry this argument no farther, unless they tell us that he ought to have had more confidence in the promise of the gods: but how was he assured that he had understood their oracles aright? Helenus might be mistaken, Phoebus might speak doubtfully; even his mother might flatter him, that he might prosecute his voyage, which, if it succeeded happily, he should be the founder of an empire. For that she herself was doubtful of his fortune, is apparent by the address she made to Jupiter on his behalf. To which the god makes answer in these words:

“ Parce metu, Cytheræa; manent immota tuorum
“ Fata tibi,” &c.

Notwithstanding which, the goddess, though comforted, was not assured: for even after this, through the course of the whole Æneis, she still apprehends the interest which Juno might make with Jupiter against her son. For it was a moot point in heaven, whether he could alter fate or not. And indeed, some passages in Virgil would make us suspect that he was of opinion Jupiter might defer fate, though he could not alter it. For, in the latter end of the tenth book, he introduces Juno begging for the life of Turnus, and flattering her husband with the power of changing destiny. “ Tna qua potes, orsa reflectas.” To which he graciously answers:

“ Si mora præsentis lethi tempusque caduco
“ Oratur juveni, meque hoc ita ponere sentis; “ Tolle fugâ Turnum, atque instantibus eripe fatis.
“ Hactenus indulsisse vacat. Sin altior istis “ Sub precibus venia ulla latet, totumque moveri
“ Mutarive putas bellum, spes pacis inanes.”

But that he could not alter those decrees, the King of gods himself confesses, in the book above cited: when he comforts Hercules, for the death of Pallas, who had invoked his aid before he threw his lance at Turnus;

“ ———Trojæ sub Mœnibus altis,
“ Tot nati cecidere Deum; quin occidit una “ Sarpedon mea progenies: etiam sua Turnum
“ Fata manent, metaque dati pervenit ad ævi.”

Where he plainly acknowledges, that he could not save his own son, or prevent the death which he foresaw. Of his power to defer the blow, I once occasionally discoursed with that excellent person Sir Robert Howard; who is better conversant, than any man that I know, in the doctrine of the Stoics, and he set me right, from the concurrent testimony of philosophers and poets, that Jupiter could not retard the effects of fate, even for a moment. For when I cited Virgil, as favouring the contrary opinion in that verse,

he replied, and I think with exact judgment, that when Jupiter gave Juno leave to withdraw Turnus from the present danger, it was because he certainly foreknew that his fatal hour was not come: that it was in destiny for Juno at that time to save him; and that himself obeyed destiny, in giving her that leave.

I need say no more in justification of our hero's courage, and am much deceived if he ever be attacked on this side of his character again. But he is arraigned with more show of reason by the ladies; who will make a numerous party against him, for being false to love, in forsaking Dido. And I cannot much blame them; for, to say the truth, it is an ill precedent for their gallants to follow. Yet, if I can bring him off with flying colours, they may learn experience at her cost; and, for her sake, avoid a cave, as the worst shelter they can choose from a shower of rain, especially when they have a lover in their company.

In the first place, Segrain observes, with much acuteness, that they who blame Æneas for his insensibility of love, when he left Carthage, contradict their former accusation of him, for being always crying, compassionate, and effeminately sensible of those misfortunes which befall others. They give him two contrary characters; but Virgil makes him of a piece, always grateful, always tender-hearted. But they are impudent enough to discharge themselves of this blunder, by laying the contradiction at Virgil's door. He, say they, has shown his hero with these inconsistent characters: acknowledging and ungrateful, compassionate and hard-hearted; but, at the bottom, fickle and self-interested. For Dido had not only received his weather-beaten troops before she saw him, and given them her protection, but had also offered them an equal share in her dominion.

“ Vultis & his mecum pariter confidere Regnis?
“ Urbem quam statuo, vestra est.”

This was an obligation never to be forgotten; and the more to be considered, because antecedent to her love. That passion, it is true, produced the usual effects of generosity, gallantry, and care to please; and thither we refer them. But when she had made all these advances, it was still in his power to have refused them: after the intrigue of the cave, call it marriage, or enjoyment only, he was no longer free to take or leave, he had accepted the favour; and was obliged to be content, if he would be grateful.

My Lord, I have set this argument in the best light I can, that the ladies may not think I write booty: and perhaps it may happen to me, as it did to Dr. Cudworth, who has raised such strong objections against the being of a God and Providence, that many think he has not answered them. You may please at least to hear the adverse party. Segrais pleads for Virgil, that no less than an absolute command from Jupiter could excuse this insensibility of the hero, and this abrupt departure, which looks so like extreme ingratitude. But, at the same time, he does wisely to remember you, that Virgil had made piety the first character of Æneas: and this being allowed, as I am afraid it must, he was obliged, antecedent to all other considerations, to search an asylum for his gods in Italy, for those very gods, I say, who had promised to him the universal empire. Could a pious man dispense with the commands of Jupiter, to satisfy his passion; or, take it in the strongest sense, to comply with the obligations of his gratitude? Religion, it is true, must have moral honesty for its ground-work, or we shall be apt to suspect its truth; but an immediate revelation dispenses with all duties of morality. All casuists agree, that theft is a breach of the moral law: yet, if I might presume to mingle things sacred with profane, the Israelites only spoiled the Egyptians, not robbed them; because the property was transferred by a revelation to their lawgiver. I confess, Dido was a very infidel in this point; for she would not believe, as Virgil makes her say, that ever Jupiter would send Mercury on such an immortal errand. But this needs no answer, at least no more than Virgil gives it:

“Fata obstant, placidaque viri Deus obfruit aures.”

This, notwithstanding, as Segrais confesses, he might have shown a little more sensibility, when he left her; for that had been according to his character.

But let Virgil answer for himself. He still loved her, and struggled with his inclinations to obey the gods:

“———Curam subcorde premebat,

“Multa gemens, magnoque animo labefactus
“amore.”

Upon the whole matter, and humanely speaking, I doubt there was a fault somewhere; and Jupiter is better able to bear the blame than either Virgil or Æneas. The poet, it seems, had found it out, and therefore brings the deserting hero and the forsaken lady to meet together in the lower regions; where he excuses himself when it is too late, and accordingly she will take no satisfaction, nor so much as hear him. Now Segrais is forced to abandon his defence, and excuses his author, by saying that the Æneis is an imperfect work, and that death prevented the divine poet from reviewing it, and for that reason he had condemned it to the fire: though, at the same time, his two translators must acknowledge, that the sixth book is the most correct of the whole Æneis. Oh, how convenient is a machine sometimes in an heroic poem! This of Mercury is plainly one, and Virgil was constrained to use it here, or the honesty of his hero would be ill defended. And the fair sex, however, if they had the deserter in their power, would certainly have shown him no more mercy than the Bacchanals did Orpheus. For if too much constancy may be a fault sometimes; then want of constancy and ingratitude, after the last favour, is a crime that never will be forgiven. But of machines, more in their proper place; where I shall show; with how much judgment they have been used by Virgil: and, in the mean time, pass to another article of his defence, on the present subject; where, if I cannot clear the hero, I hope at least to bring off the poet; for here I must divide their causes. Let Æneas trust to his machine, which will only help to break his fall, but the address is incomparable. Plato, who borrowed so much from Homer, and yet concluded for the banishment of all poets, would at least have rewarded Virgil, before he sent him into exile. But I go farther, and say, that he ought to be acquitted; and deserved, beside, the bounty of Augustus, and the gratitude of the Roman people. If, after this, the ladies will stand out, let them remember, that the jury is not all agreed; for Octavia was of his party, and was of the first quality in Rome: she was also present at the reading of the sixth Æneid, and we know not that she condemned Æneas; but we are sure she presented the poet, for his admirable elegy on her son Marcellus.

But let us consider the secret reasons which Virgil had, for thus framing this noble episode, wherein the whole passion of love is more exactly described than in any other poet: love was the theme of his fourth book; and though it is the shortest of the whole Æneis, yet there he has given its beginning, its progress, its traverses, and its conclusion: and had exhausted so entirely this subject, that he could resume it but very slightly in the eight ensuing books.

She was warmed with the graceful appearance of the hero, she smothered those sparkles out of decency, but conversation blew them up into a flame. Then she was forced to make a confidant of her whom the best might trust, her own sister, who approves the passion, and thereby augments it; then succeeds her public owning it; and, after that, the consummation. Of Venus and Juno, Jupiter and Mercury, I say nothing, for they were all machining work: but possession having cooled his love, as it increased her's, she soon perceived the change, or at least grew suspicious of a change: this suspicion soon turned to jealousy, and jealousy to rage; then she disdains and threatens, and again is humble and entreats: and, nothing availing, despairs, curses, and at last becomes her own executioner. See here the whole process of that passion, to which nothing can be added. I dare go no farther, lest I should lose the connection of my discourse.

To love our native country, and to study its benefit and its glory, to be interested in its concerns, is natural to all men, and is indeed our common duty. A poet makes a farther step; for, endeavoring vouring to do honour to it, it is allowable in him even to be partial in its cause: for he is not tied to truth, or fettered by the laws of history. Homer and Tasso are justly praised, for choosing their heroes out of Greece and Italy. Virgil indeed made his a Trojan, but it was to derive the Romans and his own Augustus from him; but all the three poets are manifestly partial to their heroes, in favour of their country: for Dares Phrygius reports of Hector, that he was slain cowardly; Æneas, according to the best account, slew not Mezentius, but was slain by him; and the Chronicles of Italy tell us little of that Rinaldo d'Este, who conquers Jerusalem in Tasso. He might be a champion of the church; but we know not that he was so much as present at the siege. To apply this to Virgil, he thought himself engaged in honour to espouse the cause and quarrel of his country against Carthage. He knew he could not please the Romans better, or oblige them more to patronize his poem, than by disgracing the founders of that city. He shows her ungrateful to the memory of her first husband; doting on a stranger; enjoyed, and afterwards forsaken by him. This was the original, says he, of the immortal hatred betwixt the two rival nations. It is true he colours the falsehood of Æneas by an express command from Jupiter, to forsake the queen, who had obliged him; but he knew the Romans were to be his readers, and them he bribed, perhaps at the expence of the hero's honesty, but he gained his cause however, as pleading before corrupt judges. They were content to see their founder false to love, for still he had the advantage of the amour: it was their enemy whom he forsook, and she might have forsaken him if he had not got the start of her; she had already forgotten her vows to her Sicheus: and "varium & mutabile semper femina," is the sharpest satire in the fewest words that ever was made on womankind; for both the adjectives are neuter, and animal must be understood to make them grammar. Virgil does well to put those words into the mouth of Mercury: if a god had not spoken them, neither durst he have written them, nor I translated them. Yet the deity was forced to come twice on the same errand: and the second time, as much a hero as Æneas was, he frighted him. It seems he feared not Jupiter so much as Dido. For your Lordship may observe, that as much intent as he was upon his voyage, yet he still delayed it, until the messenger was obliged to tell him plainly, that if he weighed not anchor in the night, the queen would be with him in the morning. "Notumque furens quid femina possit;" she was injured, she was revengeful, she was powerful. The poet had likewise before hinted, that the people were naturally perfidious: for he gives their character in the queen, and makes a proverb of "Punica fides," many ages before it was invented.

Thus I hope, my Lord, that I have made good my promise, and justified the poet, whatever becomes of the false knight. And sure a poet is as much privileged to lie, as an ambassador, for the honour and interest of his country; at least as Sir Henry Wotton has defined.

This naturally leads me to the defence of the famous anachronism, in making Æneas and Dido contemporaries. For it is certain that the hero lived almost two hundred years before the building of Carthage. One who imitates Bocaline, says, that Virgil was accused before Apollo for this error. The god soon found that he was not able to defend his favourite by reason, for the case was clear: he therefore gave this middle sentence; that any thing might be allowed to his son Virgil, on the account of his other merits; that, being a monarch, he had a dispensing power, and pardoned him. But, that this special act of grace might never be drawn into example, or pleaded by his puny successors in justification of their ignorance, he decreed for the future, no poet should presume to make a lady die for love two hundred years before her birth. To moralize this story, Virgil is the Apollo, who has this dispensing power. His great judgment made the laws of poetry, but he never made himself a slave to them: chronology, at best, is but a cobweb-law, and he broke through it with his weight. They who will imitate him wisely, must choose, as he did, an obscure and a remote æra, where they may invent at pleasure, and not be easily contradicted. Neither he, nor the Romans, had ever read the Bible, by which only his false computation of times can be made out against him. This Segrais says in his defence, and proves it from his learned friend Bochartus, whose letter on this subject he has printed at the end of the fourth Æneid, to which I refer your Lordship and the reader. Yet the credit of Virgil was so great, that he made this fable of his own invention pass for an authentic history, or, at least, as credible as any thing in Homer. Ovid takes it up after him, even in the same age, and makes an ancient heroine of Virgil's new-created Dido; dictates a letter for her, just before her death, to the ingrateful fugitive; and, very unluckily for himself, is for measuring a sword with a man so much superior in force to him on the same subject. I think I may be judge of this, because I have translated both. The famous author of the Art of Love has nothing of his own: he borrows all from a greater master in his own profession; and, which is worse, improves nothing which he finds. Nature fails him, and, being forced to his old shift, he has recourse to witticism. This passes indeed with his soft admirers, and gives him the preference to Virgil in their esteem. But let them like for themselves, and not prescribe to others; for our author needs not their admiration.

The motives that induced Virgil to coin this fable, I have shown already; and have also begun to show that he might make this anachronism, by superseding the mechanic rules of poetry, for the same reason that a monarch may dispense with, or suspend his own laws, when he finds it necessary to do so; especially if those laws are not altogether fundamental. Nothing is to be called a fault in poetry, says Aristotle, but what is against the art; therefore a man may be an admirable poet, without being an exact chronologer. Shall we dare, continues Segrais, to condemn Virgil, for having made a fiction against the order of time, when we commend Ovid and other poets who have made many of their fictions against the order of nature? For what are the splendid miracles of the Metamorphoses? Yet these are beautiful as they are related; and have also deep learning and instructive mythologies couched under them: but to give, as Virgil does in this episode, the original cause of the long wars betwixt Rome and Carthage, to draw truth out of fiction, after so probable a manner, with so much beauty, and so much for the honour of his country, was proper only to the divine wit of Maro; and Tasso, in one of his discourses, admires him for this particularly. It is not lawful, indeed, to contradict a piece of history which is known to all the world; as, for example, to make Hannibal and Scipio contemporaries with Alexander; but, in the dark recesses of antiquity, a great poet may and ought to feign such things as he finds not there, if they can be brought to embellish that subject which he treats. On the other side, the pains and diligence of ill poets is but thrown away, when they want the genius to invent and feign agreeably. But if the fictions be delightful (which they always are, if they be natural); if they be of a piece; if the beginning, the middle, and the end, be in their due places, and artfully united to each other, such works can never fail of their deserved success. And such is Virgil's episode of Dido and Æneas; where the sourest critic must acknowledge, that if he had deprived his Æneis of so great an ornament, because he found no traces of it in antiquity, he had avoided their unjust censure, but had wanted one of the greatest beauties of his poem. I shall say more of this in the next article of their charge against him, which is, want of invention. In the mean time, I may affirm, in honour of this episode, that it is not only now esteemed the most pleasing entertainment of the Æneis, but was so accounted in his own age; and before it was melted into that reputation which time has given it; for which I need produce no other testimony than that of Ovid, his contemporary.

"Nec pars ulla magis legitur de corpore toto,
"Quam non legitimo fœdere junctus amor."

Where, by the way, you may observe, my Lord, that Ovid in those words, "non legitimo fœdere" junctus amor," will by no means allow it to be a lawful marriage betwixt Dido and Æneas: he was in banishment when he wrote these verses, which I cite from his letter to Augustus: You, Sir, saith he, have sent me into exile for writing my Art of Love, and my wanton elegies; yet your own poet was happy in your good graces, though he brought Dido and Æneas into a cave, and left them there not over-honestly together: may I be so bold to ask your majesty, is it a greater fault to teach the art of unlawful love, than to show it in the action? But was Ovid, the court poet, so bad a courtier as to find no other plea to excuse himself than by a plain accusation of his matter? Virgil confessed it was a lawful marriage betwixt the lovers; that Juno, the goddess of matrimony, had ratified it by her presence; for it was her business to bring matters to that issue: that the ceremonies were short, we may believe, for Dido was not only amorous, but a widow. Mercury himself, though employed on a quite contrary errand, yet owns it a marriage by an innuendo.—"Pulchramque uxorius urbem" extruis."—He calls Æneas not only a husband, but upbraids him for being a fond husband, as the word "uxorius" implies. Now mark a little, if your Lordship please, why Virgil is so much concerned to make this marriage (for he seems to be the father of the bride himself, and to give her to the bridegroom), it was to make way for the divorce which he intended afterwards; for he was a finer flatterer than Ovid: and I more than conjecture, that he had in his eye the divorce, which not long before had passed betwixt the emperor and Scribonia. He drew this dimple in the cheek of Æneas, to prove Augustus of the same family, by so remarkable a feature in the same place. Thus, as we say in our homeipua English proverb, "He killed two birds with one stone;" pleased the emperor, by giving him the resemblance of his ancestor, and gave him such a resemblance as was not scandalous in that age. For to leave one wife and take another, was but a matter of gallantry at that time of day among the Romans. "Neque hæc in fœdera" veni," is the very excuse which Æneas makes when he leaves his lady. I made no such bargain with you at our marriage, to live always drudging on at Carthage; my business was Italy, and I never made a secret of it. If I took my pleasure, had not you your share of it? I leave you free at my departure, to comfort yourself with the next stranger who happens to be shipwrecked on your coast: be as kind an hostess as you have been to me, and you can never fail of another husband. In the mean time, I call the gods to witness, that I leave your shore unwillingly; for though Juno made the marriage, yet Jupiter commands me to forsake you. This is the effect of what he saith, when it is dishonoured out of Latin verse into English prose. If the poet argued not aright, we must pardon him for a poor blind heathen, who knew no better morals.

I have detamed your Lordship longer than I intended on this objection, which would indeed weigh something in a spiritual court; but I am not to defend our poet there. The next, I think, is but a cavil, though the cry is great against him, and hath continued from the time of Macrobius to this present age: I hinted it before. They lay no less than the want of invention to his charge: a capital crime, I must acknowledge: for a poet is a maker, as the word signifies: and he who cannot make, that is, invent, hath his name for nothing. That which makes this accusation look so strange at the first sight, is, that he has borrowed so many things from Homer, Apollonius Rhodius, and others who preceded him. But, in the first place, if invention is to be taken in so strict a sense, that the matter of a poem must be wholly new, and that in all its parts, then Scaliger hath made out, saith Segrais, that the history of Troy was no more the invention of Homer, than of Virgil. There was not an old woman, or almost a child, but had it in their mouths, before the Greek poet or his friends digested it into this admirable order in which we read it. At this rate, as Solomon hath told us, there is nothing new beneath the sun. Who then can pass for an inventor, if Homer, as well as Virgil, must be deprived of that glory? Is Versailles the less a new building, because the architect of that palace hath imitated others which were built before it? Walls, doors and windows, apartments, offices, rooms of convenience and magnificence, are in all great houses. So descriptions, figures, fables, and the rest, must be in all heroic poems; they are the common materials of poetry, furnished from the magazine of nature; every poet hath as much right to them, as every man hath to air or water. "Quid prohibetis aquas? usus communis aquarum est." But the argument of the work, that is to say, its principal action, the economy and disposition of it; these are the things which distinguish copies from originals. The poet, who borrows nothing from others, is yet to be born; he and the Jews Messias will come together. There are parts of the Æneis which resemble some parts both of the Ilias and of the Odyssees: as, for example, Æneus descended into hell, and Ulysses had been there before him: Æneus loved Dido, and Ulysses loved Calypso: in few words, Virgil hath imitated Homer's Odyssees in his first six books, and in his six last the Ilias. But from hence can we infer, that the two poets write the same history? Is there no invention in some other parts of Virgil's Æneis? The disposition of so many various matters, is not that his own? From what book of Homer had Virgil his episode of Nisus and Uryalus, of Mezentius and Lausus? From whence did he borrow his design of bringing Æneus into Italy? of establishing the Roman empire on the foundations of a Trojan colony: to say nothing of the honour he did his patron, not only in his descent from Venus, but in making him so like her in his best features, that the goddess might have mistaken Augustus for her son. He had indeed the story from common fame, as Homer had his from the Egyptian priests. "Æneadum Genitrix" was no more unknown to Lucretius, than to him. But Lucretius taught him not to form his hero; to give him piety or valour for his manners: and both in so eminent a degree, that, having done what was possible for man to save his king and country, his mother was forced to appear to him and restrain his fury, which hurried him to death in their revenge. But the poet made his piety more successful; he brought off his father and his son; and his gods witnessed to his devotion, by putting themselves under his protection, to be replaced by him in their promised Italy. Neither the invention nor the conduct of this great action were owing to Homer, or any other poet. It is one thing to copy, and another thing to imitate from nature. The copier is that servile imitator, to whom Horace gives no better a name than of animal; he will not so much as allow him to be a man. Raphael imitated nature; they who copy one of Raphael's pieces, imitate but him, for his work is their original. They translate him, as I do Virgil; and fall as short of him, as I of Virgil. There is a kind of invention in the imitation of Raphael: for though the thing was in nature, yet the idea of it was his own. Ulysses travelled, so did Æneus; but neither of them were the first travellers: for Cain went into the land of Nod, before they were born: and neither of the poets ever heard of such a man. If Ulysses had been killed at Troy, yet Æneus must have gone to sea, or he could never have arrived in Italy. But the designs of the two poets were as different as the courses of their heroes; one went home, and the other sought a home. To return to my first similitude: Suppose Apelles and Raphael had each of them painted a burning Troy; might not the modern painter have succeeded as well as the ancient, though neither of them had seen the town on fire? For the draughts of both were taken from the ideas which they had of nature. Cities have been burnt, before either of them were in being. But, to close the simile as I began it, they would not have designed it after the same manner: Apelles would have distinguished Pyrrhus from the rest of all the Grecians, and showed him forcing his entrance into Priam's palace; there he had let him in the fairest light, and given him the chief place of all his figures; because he was a Grecian, and he would do honour to his country. Raphael, who was an Italian, and descended from the Trojans, would have made Æneus the hero of his piece; and perhaps not with his father on his back; his son in one hand, his bundle of gods in the other; and his wife following (for an act of piety is not half so graceful in a picture as an act of courage): he would have rather drawn him killing Androgeus, or some other, hand to hand; and the blaze of the fires should have darted full upon his face, to make him conspicuous amongst his Trojans. This, I think, is a just comparison betwixt the two poets, in the conduct of their several designs. Virgil cannot be said to copy Homer; the Grecian had only the advantage of writing first. If it be urged, that I have granted a resemblance in some parts, yet therein Virgil has excelled him. For what are the tears of Calypso, for being left, to the fury and death of Dido? Where is there the whole process of her passion, and all its violent effects to be found, in the languishing episode of the Odyssees? If this be a copy, let the critics show us the same disposition, features, or colouring, in their original. The like may be said of the descent to hell, which was not of Homer's invention neither; he had it from the story of Orpheus and Eurydicē. But to what end did Ulysses make that journey? Æneus undertook it by the express commandment of his father's ghost: there he was to show him all the succeeding heroes of his race: and, next to Romulus (mark, if you please, the address of Virgil), his own patron Augustus Cæsar. Anchises was likewise to instruct him how to manage the Italian war, and how to conclude it with his honour; that is, in other words, to lay the foundations of that empire which Augustus was to govern. This is the noble invention of our author; but it hath been copied by so many sign-post daubers, that now it is grown fulsome; rather by their want of skill, than by the commonness.

In the first place, I may safely grant; that by reading Homer, Virgil was taught to imitate his invention; that is, to imitate like him: which is no more than if a painter studied Raphael, that he might learn to design after his manner. And thus I might imitate Virgil, if I were capable of writing an heroic poem, and yet the invention be my own: but I should endeavour to avoid a servile copying. I would not give the same story under other names, with the same characters, in the same order, and with the same sequel; for every common reader to find me out at the first sight for a plagiarist, and cry, This I read before in Virgil, in a better language, and in better verse. This is like Merry-Andrew on the low rope, copying lubberly the same tricks which his master is so dextrously performing on the high.

I will trouble your Lordship but with one objection more, which I know not whether found in Le Fevre or Valais; but I am sure I have read it in another French critic, whom I will not name, because I think it is not much for his reputation. Virgil, in the heat of action, suppose for example, in describing the fury of his hero in a battle, when he is endeavouring to raise our concerns to the highest pitch, turns short on the sudden into some similitude, which diverts, say they, your attention from the main subject, and mingles it on some trivial image. He pours cold water into the cauldron, when his business is to make it boil.

This accusation is general against all who would be thought heroic poets; but I think it touches Virgil less than any. He is too great a master of his art to make a blot which may so easily be hit. Similitudes, as I have said, are not for tragedy, which is all violent, and where the passions are in a perpetual ferment; for there they deaden where they should animate; they are not of the nature of dialogue, unless in comedy: a metaphor is almost all the stage can suffer, which is a kind of similitude comprehended in a word. But this figure has a contrary effect in heroic poetry; there it is employed to raise the admiration, which is its proper business. And admiration is not of so violent a nature as fear or hope, compassion or horror, or any concernment we can have for such or such a person on the stage. Not but I confess, that similitudes and descriptions, when drawn into an unreasonable length, must needs nauseate the reader. Once I remember, and but once, Virgil makes a similitude of fourteen lines; and his description of Fame is about the same number. He is blamed for both; and I doubt not but he would have contracted them, had he lived to have reviewed his work: but faults are no precedents. This I have observed of his similitudes in general, that they are not placed, as our unobserving critics tell us, in the heat of any action, but commonly in its declining: when he has warmed us in his description as much as possibly he can, then, lest that warmth should languish, he renews it by some apt similitude, which illustrates his subject, and yet palls not his audience. I need give your Lordship but one example of this kind, and leave the rest to your observation, when next you review the whole Æneis in the original, unblemished by my rude translation. It is in the first book, where the poet describes Neptune composing the ocean, on which Æolus had raised a tempest, without his permission. He had already chidden the rebellious winds for obeying the commands of their usurping master: he had warned them from the seas: he had beaten down the billows with his mace; dupelled the clouds, restored the sunshine, while Triton and Cymothœ were heaving the ships from off the quicksands, before the poet would offer at a similitude for illustration.

“Ac, veluti magno in populo cum saepe coorta est
“Seditio, sævitque animis ignobile vulgus, “Jamque faces, et saxa volant, furor arma mi“nistrat;
“Tum pietate gravem, ac meritis si forte virum “quem “Conspexere, silent, arrectisque auribus adstant:
“Ille regit dictis animos, et pectora mulcet:
“Sic cunctus pelagi accidit fragor, æquora post-
“quam
“Proficiens genitor, cœloque invecus aperto
“Flectit equos, curruque volans dat lora secundo.”

This is the first similitude which Virgil makes in this poem, and one of the longest in the whole, for which reason I the rather cite it. While the storm was in its fury, any allusion had been improper; for the poet could have compared it to nothing more impetuous than itself; consequently he could have made no illustration. If he could have illustrated, it had been an ambitious ornament out of season, and would have diverted our concernment: “Nunc, non erat his locus:” and therefore he deferred it to its proper place.

These are the criticisms of most moment which have been made against the Æneis, by the ancients or moderns. As for the particular exceptions against this or that passage, Macrobius and Pontanus have answered them already. If I desired to appear more learned than I am, it had been as easy for me to have taken their objections and solutions, as it is for a country parson to take the explications of the fathers out of Junius and Tremellius. Or not to have named the authors from whence I had them: for so Ruæus, otherwise a most judicious commentator on Virgil's works, has used Pontanus, his greatest benefactor; of whom he is very silent, and I do not remember that he once cites him.

What follows next, is no objection; for that implies a fault: and it had been none in Virgil, if he had extended the time of his action beyond a year. At least Aristotle has set no precise limits to it. Homer's, we know, was within two months; Tasso, I am sure, exceeds not a summer: and, if I examined him, perhaps he might be reduced into a much less compass. Boffu leaves it doubtful whether Virgil's actions were within the year, or took up some months beyond it. Indeed the whole dispute is of no more concernment to the common reader, than it is to a ploughman, whether February this year had twenty-eight or twenty-nine days in it. But, for the satisfaction of the more curious, of which number I am sure your Lordship is one, I will translate what I think convenient out of Segrais, whom perhaps you have not read: for he has made it highly probable, that the action of the Æneis began in the spring, and was not extended beyond the autumn. And we have known campaigns that have begun sooner, and have ended later.

Ronsard, and the rest whom Segrais names, who are of opinion that the action of this poem takes up almost a year and a half, ground their calculation thus: Anchises died in Sicily at the end of winter, or beginning of the spring. Æneas, immediately after the interment of his father, puts to sea for Italy: he is surpris'd by the tempest described in the beginning of the first book; and there it is that the scene of the poem opens, and where the action must commence. He is driven by this storm on the coasts of Afric: he stays at Carthage all that summer, and almost all the winter following: sets sail again for Italy just before the beginning of the spring; meets with contrary winds, and makes Sicily the second time: this part of the action completes the year. Then he celebrates the anniversary of his father's funeral, and shortly after arrives at Cumæ, and from thence his time is taken up in his first treaty with Latinus; the overture of the war; the siege of his camp by Turnus; his going for succours to relieve it; his return; the raising of the siege by the first battle; the twelve days truce; the second battle; the assault of Laurentum, and the single fight with Turnus; all which, they say, cannot take up less than four or five months more; by which account we cannot suppose the entire action to be contained in a much less compass than a year and half.

Segrais reckons another way; and his computation is not condemned by the learned Rucæus, who compiled and published the commentaries on our poet, which we call the Dauphin's Virgil.

He allows the time of the year when Anchises died, to be in the latter end of winter, or in the beginning of the spring; he acknowledges, that when Æneas is first seen at sea afterwards, and is driven by the tempest on the coast of Afric, is the time when the action is naturally to begin: he confesses farther, that Æneas left Carthage in the latter end of winter; for Dido tells him in express terms, as an argument for his longer stay,

“Quinetiam hiberno moliris fidere classem.”

But whereas Ronsard's followers suppose that when Æneas had buried his father, he set sail immediately for Italy (though the tempest drove him on the coast of Carthage), Segrais will by no means allow that supposition, but thinks it much more probable that he remained in Sicily till the midst of July, or the beginning of August, at which time he places the first appearance of his hero on the sea, and there opens the action of the poem. From which beginning, to the death of Turnus, which concludes the action, there need not be supposed above ten months of intermediate time: for, arriving at Carthage in the latter end of summer, staying there the winter following, departing thence in the very beginning of the spring, making a short abode in Sicily the second time, landing in Italy, and making the war, may be reasonably judged the business but of ten months. To this the Ronsardians reply, that having been for seven years before in quest of Italy, and having no more to do in Sicily than to inter his father, after that office was performed, what remained for him, but, without delay, to pursue his first adventure? To which Segrais answers, that the obsequies of his father, according to the rites of the Greeks and Romans, would detain him for many days: that a longer time must be taken up in the refitting of his ships, after so tedious a voyage, and in refreshing his weather-beaten soldiers on a friendly coast. These, indeed, are but suppositions on both sides, yet those of Segrais seem better grounded. For the feast of Dido, when she entertained Æneas first, has the appearance of a summer's night, which seems already almost ended when he begins his story: therefore the love was made in autumn; the hunting followed properly, when the heats of that scorching country were declining: the winter was passed in jollity, as the season and their love required: and he left her in the latter end of winter, as is already proved. This opinion is fortified by the arrival of Æneas at the mouth of the Tiber, which marks the season of the spring; that season being perfectly described by the singing of the birds, setting the dawn; and by the beauty of the place: which the poet seems to have painted expressly in the seventh Æneid:

“Aurora in roseis fulgebant lutea bigis, “Cùm venti posuere; variæ circumque, su- “præque
“Aëretæ ripis volucres, & fluminis alveo,
“Æthera mulcebant cantu.”

The remainder of the action required but three months more; for when Æneas went for succour to the Tuscans, he found their army in a readiness to march, and wanting only a commander: so that, according to this calculation, the Æneis takes not up above a year complete, and may be comprehended in less compass.

This, amongst other circumstances, treated more at large by Segrais, agrees with the rising of Orion, which caused the tempest described in the beginning of the first book. By some passages in the Pastorals, but more particularly in the Georgics, our poet is found to be an exact astronomer according to the knowledge of that age. Now Ilioneus (whom Virgil twice employs in embassies, as the best speaker of the Trojans) attributes that tempest to Orion, in his speech to Dido:

“Cum subito assurgens fluctu nimbofus Orion.”

He must mean either the heliacal or achronical rising of that sign. The heliacal rising of a constellation is when it comes from under the rays of the sun, and begins to appear before day-light. The achronical rising, on the contrary, is when it appears at the close of the day, and in opposition of the sun's diurnal course.

The heliacal rising of Orion is at present computed to be about the sixth of July; and about

That time it is, that he either causes or presages tempests on the seas.

Sgrais has observed farther, that when Anna counsels Dido to stay Æneas during winter, she speaks also of Orion:

“Dum pelago desævit hyems, & aquosus
 “Orion.”

If therefore Ilioneus, according to our supposition, understand the heliacal rising of Orion; Anna must mean the achronical, which the different epithets given to that constellation seem to manifest. Ilioneus calls him “nimbosus:” Anna “aquosus.” He is tempestuous in the summer when he rises heliacally, and rainy in the winter when he rises achronically. Your Lordship will pardon me for the frequent repetition of these cant words, which I could not avoid in this abbreviation of Sgrais, who, I think, deserves no little commendation in this new criticism. I have yet a word or two to say of Virgil’s machines, from my own observation of them. He has imitated those of Homer, but not copied them. It was established long before this time, in the Roman religion as well as in the Greek, that there were gods; and both nations, for the most part, worshipped the same deities, as did also the Trojans; from whom the Romans, I suppose, would rather be thought to derive the rites of their religion, than from the Grecians, because they thought themselves descended from them. Each of those gods had his proper office, and the chief of them their particular attendants. Thus Jupiter had, in propriety, Ganymede and Mercury, and Juno had Iris. It was not for Virgil then to create new ministers; he must take what he found in his religion. It cannot therefore be said that he borrowed them from Homer, any more than Apollo, Diana, and the rest, whom he uses as he finds occasion for them, as the Grecian poet did: but he invents the occasions for which he uses them. Venus, after the destruction of Troy, had gained Neptune entirely to her party; therefore we find him busy in the beginning of the Æneis, to calm the tempest raised by Æolus, and afterwards conducting the Trojan fleet to Cumæ in safety, with the loss only of their pilot, for whom he bargains. I name those two examples amongst a hundred which I omit: to prove that Virgil, generally speaking, employed his machines in performing those things which might possibly have been done without them. What more frequent than a storm at sea, upon the rising of Orion? what wonder, if amongst so many ships, there should one be overtaken, which was commanded by Orontes, though half the winds had not been there which Æolus employed? Might not Palinurus, without a miracle, fall asleep, and drop into the sea, having been over-wearied with watching, and secure of a quiet passage, by his observation of the skies? at least Æneas, who knew nothing of the machine of Somnus, takes it plainly in this sense:

“O nimium cœlo & pelago confisse fereno,
 “Nudus in ignotâ Palinure jacebis arenâ.”

But machines sometimes are specious things to amuse the reader, and give a colour of probability to things otherwise incredible. And besides, it foothed the vanity of the Romans, to find the gods so visibly concerned in all the actions of their predecessors. We who are better taught by our religion, yet own every wonderful accident which befalls us for the best, to be brought to pass by some special providence of Almighty God, and by the care of guardian angels: and from hence I might infer, that no heroic poem can be writ on the Epicurean principles; which I could easily demonstrate, if there were need to prove it, or I had leisure.

When Venus opens the eyes of her son Æneas, to behold the gods who combated against Troy in that fatal night when it was surpris’d, we share the pleasure of that glorious vision (which Tasso has not ill copied in the sacking of Jerusalem). But the Greeks had done their business; though neither Neptune, Juno, or Pallas, had given them their divine assistance. The most crude machine which Virgil uses, is in the episode of Camilla, where Opis, by the command of her mistress, kills Aruns. The next is in the twelfth Æneid, where Venus cures her son Æneas. But in the last of these, the poet was driven to a necessity; for Turnus was to be slain that very day; and Æneas, wounded as he was, could not have engaged him in single combat, unless his hurt had been miraculously healed. And the poet had considered, that the dittany, which she brought from Crete, could not have wrought so speedily an effect, without the juice of ambrosia, which she mingled with it. After all, that his machine might not seem too violent, we see the hero limping after Turnus. The wound was skinned; but the strength of his thigh was not restored. But what reason had our author to wound Æneas at so critical a time? And how came the cuisses to be worse tempered than the rest of his armour, which was all wrought by Vulcan and his journeymen? These difficulties are not easily to be solved, without confessing that Virgil had not life enough to correct his work; though he had reviewed it, and found those errors which he resolved to mend; but being prevented by death, and not willing to leave an imperfect work behind him, he ordained, by his last testament, that his Æneis should be burned. As for the death of Aruns, who was shot by a goddess, the machine was not altogether so outrageous as the wounding Mars and Venus by the sword of Diomedes. Two divinities, one would have thought, might have pleaded their prerogative of impassibility, or at least not have been wounded by any mortal hand. Beside that the scutum which they shed, were so very like our common blood, that it was not to be distinguished from it, but only by the name and colour. As for what Horace says in his Art of Poetry, that no machines are to be used, unless on some extraordinary occasion,

“Nec deus interfit, nisi dignus vindice no“dus;”

that rule is to be applied to the theatre, of which he is then speaking; and means no more than this, that when the knot of the play is to be untied, and no other way is left for making the discovery, then, and not otherwise, let a god descend upon a rope, and clear the business to the audience: but this has no relation to the machines which are used in an epic poem.

In the last place, for the Dira, or flying peft, which flapping on the shield of Turnus, and fluttering about his head, disheartened him in the duel, and prefiged to him his approaching death, I might have placed it more properly amongst the objections. For the critics, who lay want of courage to the charge of Virgil's hero, quote this passage as a main proof of their assertion. They say our author had not only secured him before the duel, but also, in the beginning of it, had given him the advantage in impenetrable arms, and in his sword: that of Turnus was not his own (which was forged by Vulcan for his father) but a weapon which he had snatched in haste, and, by mistake, belonging to his charioteer Metiscus. That, after all this, Jupiter, who was partial to the Trojan, and distrustful of the event, though he had hung the balance, and given it a jog of his hand to weigh down Turnus, thought convenient to give the fates a collateral security by sending the screech-owl to discourage him. For which they quote these words of Virgil:

“—Non me tua turbida virtus
Terret, ait; Dii me terrent, & Jupiter hostis.”

In answer to which, I say, that this machine is one of those which the poet uses only for ornament, and not out of necessity. Nothing can be more beautiful, or more poetical, than this description of the three Diræ, or the setting of the balance, which our Milton has borrowed from him, but employed to a different end: for first he makes God Almighty set the scales for St. Gabriel and Satan, when he knew no combat was to follow: then he makes the good angel's scale descend, and the devil's mount; quite contrary to Virgil, if I have translated the three verses according to my author's sense.

“ Jupiter ipse duas æquato examine lances
“ Sustinet; & fata imponit diversa duorum:
“ Quem damnet labor, & quo vergat pondere
“ lethum.”

For I have taken these words, “ Quem damnet labor,” in the sense which Virgil gives them in another place; “ Damnabis tu quoque votis;” to signify a prosperous event. Yet I dare not condemn so great a genius as Milton: for I am much mistaken if he alludes not to the text in Daniel, where Balthazar was put into the balance, and found too light. This is digression, and I return to my subject. I said above, that these two machines of the balance and the Dira were only ornamental, and that the success of the duel had been the same without them: for, when Æneas and Turnus stood facing each other before the altar, Turnus looked dejected, and his colour faded in his face, as if he depended of the victory before the fight; and not only he, but all his party, when the strength of the two champions was judged by the proportion of their limbs, concluded it was “ impar pugna,” and that their chief was over-matched. Whereupon Juturna (who was of the same opinion) took this opportunity to break the treaty and renew the war. Juno herself had plainly told the nymph before hand, that her brother was to fight;

“ Imparibus fatis; nec Diis, nec viribus æquis;”

so that there was no need of an apparition to fright Turnus: he had the preface within himself of his impending destiny. The Dira only served to confirm him in his first opinion, that it was his destiny to die in the ensuing combat. And in this sense are those words of Virgil to be taken;

“ —Non mea tua, turbida virtus
“ Terret, ait; Dii me terrent, & Jupiter hostis.”

I doubt not but the adverb (sollus) is to be understood, it is not your valour only that gives me this concernment; but I find also, by this portent, that Jupiter is my enemy. For Turnus fled before when his first sword was broken, till his sister supplied him with a better; which indeed he could not use; because Æneas kept him at a distance with his spear. I wonder Ruzæ saw not this, where he charges his author so unjustly, for giving Turnus a second sword, to no purpose. How could he fasten a blow, or make a thrust, when he was not suffered to approach? Besides, the chief errand of the Dira was, to warn Juturna from the field, for she could have brought the chariot again, when she saw her brother worsted in the duel. I might further add, that Æneas was so eager in the fight that he left the city, now almost in his possession, to decide his quarrel with Turnus by the sword: whereas Turnus had manifestly declined the combat, and suffered his sister to convey him as far from the reach of his enemy as she could. I say, not only suffered her, but consented to it; for it is plain he knew her by these words:

“ O horror & dudum agnovi, cum prima per artem
“ Fœdera turbasti, teque hæc in bella dedisti;
“ Et nunc nequicquam fallis Dea.”

I have dwelt so long on this subject, that I must contract what I have to say, in reference to my translation: unless I would swell my preface into a volume, and make it formidable to your Lordship, when you see so many pages yet behind. And indeed what I have already written, either in justification or praise of Virgil, is against myself; for presuming to copy, in my coarse English, the thoughts and beautiful expressions of this inimitable poet, who flourished in an age when his language was brought to its last perfection, for which it was particularly owing to him and Horace, I will give your Lordship my opinion, that those two friends had consulted each other's judgment, wherein they should endeavour to excel; and they seem to have pitched on propriety of thought, elegance of words, and harmony of numbers. According to this model, Horace writ his Odes and Epods: for his Satires and Epistles, being intended wholly for instruction, required another style;

And, therefore, as he himself professes, are "fermoni propria," nearer prose than verse. But Virgil, who never attempted the lyric verse, is every where elegant, sweet, and flowing, in his hexameters. His words are not only chosen, but the places in which he ranks them for the sound; he who removes them from the situation wherein their master set them, spoils the harmony. What he says of the Sibyl's prophecies, may be as properly applied to every word of his: they must be read, in order as they lie; the least breath discomposes them, and somewhat of their divinity is lost. I cannot boast that I have been thus exact in my verses, but I have endeavoured to follow the example of my master: and am the first Englishman, perhaps, who made it his design to copy him in his numbers, his choice of words, and his placing them for the sweetness of the sound. On this last consideration, I have shunned the Cæsura as much as possibly I could. For wherever that is used, it gives a roughness to the verse; of which we can have little need, in a language which is over-stocked with consonants. Such is not the Latin, where the vowels and consonants are mixed in proportion to each other: yet Virgil judged the vowels to have somewhat of an over-balance, and therefore tempers their sweetness with Cæsuras. Such difference there is in tongues, that the same figure which roughens one, gives majesty to another: and that was it which Virgil studied in his verses. Ovid uses it but rarely; and hence it is that this verification cannot so properly be called sweet, as luscious. The Italians are forced upon it, once or twice in every line, because they have a redundancy of vowels in their language. Their metal is so soft, that it will not coin without alloy to harden it. On the other side, for the reason already named, it is all we can do to give sufficient sweetness to our language: we must not only choose our words for elegance, but for sound; to perform which, a mastery in the language is required, the poet must have a magazine of words, and have the art to manage his few vowels to the best advantage, that they may go the farther. He must also know the nature of the vowels, which are more sonorous, and much more soft and sweet; and so dispose them as his present occasions require: all which, and a thousand secrets of verification beside, he may learn from Virgil, if he will take him for his guide. If he be above Virgil, and is resolved to follow his own verve (as the French call it) the proverb will fall heavily upon him: Who teaches himself, has a fool for his master.

Virgil employed eleven years upon his Æneis; yet he left it, as he thought himself, imperfect. Which when I seriously consider, I wish, that instead of three years which I have spent in the translation of his works, I had four years more allowed me to correct my errors, that I might make my version somewhat more tolerable than it is; for a poet cannot have two great a reverence for his readers, if he expects his labours should survive him. Yet I will neither plead my age nor sickness, in excuse of the faults which I have made: that I wanted time, is all that I have to say: for some of my subscribers grew so clamorous, that I could no longer defer the publication. I hope, from the candour of your Lordship, and your often experienced goodness to me, that, if the faults are not too many, you will make allowances with Horace:

"Si plura nitent in carmine, non ego paucis
"Offendar maculis, quas aut incuria fudit
"Aut humanam parum cavita natura."

You may please also to observe, that there is not, to the best of my remembrance, one vowel gaping on another for want of a Cæsura, in this whole poem: but where a vowel ends a word, the next begins either with a consonant, or what is its equivalent; for our W and H aspirate, and our diphthongs are plainly such; the greatest latitude I take is in the letter Y, when it concludes a word, and the first syllable of the next begins with a vowel. Neither need I have called this a latitude, which is only an explanation of this general rule: that no vowel can be cut off before another, when we cannot sink the pronunciation of it; as He, She, Me, I, &c. Virgil thinks it sometimes a beauty to imitate the licence of the Greeks, and leave two vowels opening on each other, as in that verse of the third Pastoral:

"Et fœcibus pecori, & lac subducitur agnis."

But, "nobis non licet esse tam disertis:" at least if we study to refine our numbers. I have long had by me the materials of an English Prosodia, containing all the mechanical rules of verification, wherein I have treated with some exactness of the feet, the quantities and the pauses. The French and Italians know nothing of the two first; at least their best poets have not practised them. As for the pauses, Malherbe first brought them into France, within this last century; and we see how they adorn their Alexandrians. But, as Virgil propounds a riddle which he leaves unsolved,

"Dic quibus in terris, inscripti nomina regum
"Nascantur flores, & Phyllida solus habeto," so will I give your Lordship another, and leave the exposition of it to your acute judgment. I am sure there are few who make verses, have observed the sweetness of these two lines in Cooper's-Hill;

"Tho' deep yet, clear; tho' gentle, yet not dull;
"Strong without rage, without overflowing full."

And there are yet fewer who can find the reason of that sweetness. I have given it to some of my friends in conversation, and they have allowed the criticism to be just. But, since the evil of false quantities is difficult to be cured in any modern language; since the French and the Italians, as well as we, are yet ignorant what feet are to be used in heroic poetry; since I have not strictly observed those rules myself, which I can teach others; since I pretend to no dictatorship among my fellow-poets; since if I should instruct some of them to make well-running verses, they want genius to give them strength as well as sweetness; and above all, since your Lordship has advised me not to publish that little which I know, I look on your counsel as your command, which I shall observe inviolably, till you shall please to revoke it, and leave me at liberty to make my thoughts public. In the mean time, that I may arrogate nothing to myself, I must acknowledge that Virgil in Latin, and Spenser in English, have been my masters. Spenser has also given me the boldness to make use sometimes of the Alexandrian line; which we call, though improperly, the Pindaric, because Mr. Cowley has often employed it in his Odes. It adds a certain majesty to the verse, when it is used with judgment, and stops the sense from overflowing into another line. Formerly the French, like us, and the Italians, had but five feet, or ten syllables, in their heroic verse; but since Ronsard's time, as I suppose, they found their tongue too weak to support their epic poetry, without the addition of another foot. That indeed has given it somewhat of the run and measure of a trimeter; but it runs with more activity than strength: their language is not strung with finews like our English: it has the nimbleness of a greyhound, but not the bulk and body of a mastiff. Our men and our verses overbear them by their weight; and "pondero non numero," is the British motto. The French have set up purity for the standard of their language; and a masculine vigour is that of ours. Like their tongue is the genius of their poets, light and trifling in comparison of the English; more proper for sonnets, madrigals, and elegies, than heroic poetry. The turn on thoughts and words is their chief talent; but the epic poem is too stately to receive those little ornaments. The painters draw their nymphs in thin and airy habits, but the weight of gold and of embroideries is reserved for queens and goddesses. Virgil is never frequent in those turns, like Ovid; but much more sparing of them in his Æneis, than in his Pastorals and Georgics:

"Ignoscenda quidem, scirent, si ignoscere manes."

That turn is beautiful indeed; but he employs it in the story of Orpheus and Eurydice, not in his great poem. I have used that licence in his Æneis sometimes; but I own it as my fault. It was given to those who understand no better. It is like Ovid's

"Semivirumque bovem, semivobemque virum."

The poet found it before his critics, but it was a darling sin which he would not be persuaded to reform. The want of genius, of which I have accused the French, is laid to their charge by one of their own great authors, though I have forgotten his name, and where I read it. If rewards could make good poets, their great master has not been wanting on his part in his bountiful encouragements: for he is wise enough to imitate Augustus, if he had a Maro. The Triumvir and Proferiber had descended to us in a more hideous form than they now appear, if the emperor had not taken care to make friends of him and Horace. I confess the banishment of Ovid was a blot in his escutcheon: yet he was only banished; and who knows but his crime was capital, and then his exile was a favour. Ariosto, who, with all his faults, must be acknowledged a great poet, has put these words into the mouth of an evangelist; but whether they will pass for gospel now, I cannot tell:

"Non fu si santo ni benigno Augusto,

"Come la tuba di Virgilio suona;

"L'haver havuto in poesia buon gusto,

"La proscrittione iniqua gli pardona."

But heroic poetry is not of the growth of France, as it might be of England, if it were cultivated. Spenser wanted only to have read the rules of Bossu; for no man was ever born with a greater genius, or had more knowledge to support it. But the performance of the French is not equal to their skill: and hitherto we have wanted skill to perform better. Segrais, whose preface is so wonderfully good, yet is wholly destitute of elevation; though his version is much better than that of the two brothers, or any of the rest who have attempted Virgil. Hannibal Caro is a great name amongst the Italians; yet his translation of the Æneis is most scandalously mean, though he has taken the advantage of writing in blank verse, and freed himself from the shackles of modern rhyme (if it be modern, for Le Clerc has told us lately, and I believe has made it out, that David's Psalms were written in as arrant rhyme as they are translated). Now if a Muse cannot run when she is unfetter'd, it is a sign she has but little speed. I will not make a digression here, though I am strangely tempted to it; but will only say, that he who can write well in rhyme, may write better in blank verse. Rhyme is certainly a constraint even to the best poets, and those who make it with most ease: though perhaps I have as little reason to complain of that hardship as any man, excepting Quarles and Withers. What it adds to sweetness, it takes away from sense: and he who loses the least by it, may be called a gainer: it often makes us swerve from an author's meaning. As if a mark be set up for an archer at a great distance, let him aim as exactly as he can, the least wind will take his arrow, and divert it from the white. I return to our Italian translator of the Æneis: he is a foot-poet, he lacques by the side of Virgil at the best, but never mounts behind him. Doctor Morelli, who is no mean critic in our poetry, and therefore may be presumed to be a better in his own language, has confirmed me in this opinion by his judgment, and thinks withal, that he has often mistaken his master's sense. I would say so, if I durst, but am afraid I have committed the same fault more often, and more grossly: for I have forsaken Ruæus (whom generally I follow) in many places, and made expositions of my own in some, quite contrary to him: of which I will give but two examples, because they are so near each other, in the tenth Æneid.

"—Sorti pater æquus utriquo."

Pallas says it to Turnus, just before they fight. Ruæus thinks the word pater is to be referred to Evander the father of Pallas. But how could he imagine that it was the same thing to Evander, if his son were slain, or if he overcame? The poet certainly intended Jupiter, the common father of mankind; who, as Pallas hoped, would stand in impartial spectator of the combat, and not be more favourable to Turnus, than to him. The second is not long after it, and both before the duel is begun. They are the words of Jupiter, who comforts Hercules for the death of Pallas, which was immediately to ensue, and which Hercules could not hinder (though the young hero had address'd his prayers to him for his assistance): because the gods cannot control destiny.—The verse follows:

Which the same Ruæus thus construes: Jupiter, after he had said this, immediately turns his eyes to the Rutilian fields, and beholds the duel. I have given this place another exposition, that he turned his eyes from the field of combat, that he might not behold a sight so unpleasing to him. The word rejicit, I know, will admit of both senses; but Jupiter having confessed that he could not alter fate, and being grieved he could not, in consideration of Hercules, it seems to me that he should avert his eyes, rather than take pleasure in the spectacle. But of this I am not so confident as the other, though I think I have followed Virgil's sense.

What I have said, though it has the face of arrogance, yet it is intended for the honour of my country; and therefore I will boldly own, that this English translation has more of Virgil's spirit in it, than either the French, or the Italian. Some of our countrymen have translated episodes, and other parts of Virgil, with great success. As particularly your Lordship, whose version of Orpheus and Eurydice is eminently good. Amongst the dead authors, the Silenus of my Lord Roscommon cannot be too much commended. I say nothing of Sir John Denham, Mr. Waller, and Mr. Cowley; it is the utmost of my ambition to be thought their equal, or not to be much inferior to them, and some others of the living. But it is one thing to take pains on a fragment, and translate it perfectly, and another thing to have the weight of a whole author on my shoulders. They who believe the burden light, let them attempt the fourth, sixth, or eight Pastoral; the first or fourth Georgic; and amongst the Æneids, the fourth, the fifth, the seventh, the ninth, the tenth, the eleventh, or the twelfth; for in these I think I have succeeded best.

Long before I undertook this work, I was no stranger to the original. I had also studied Virgil's design, his disposition of it, his manners, his judicious management of the figures, the sober retrenchments of his sense, which always leaves somewhat to gratify our imagination, on which it may enlarge at pleasure; but, above all, the elegance of his expression, and the harmony of his numbers. For, as I have said in a former dissertation, the words are in poetry, what the colours are in painting. If the design be good, and the draught be true, the colouring is the first beauty that strikes the eye. Spenser and Milton are the nearest in English to Virgil and Horace in the Latin; and I have endeavour'd to form my style in imitating their masters. I will further own to you, my Lord, that my chief ambition is to please those readers who have discernment enough to prefer Virgil before any other poet in the Latin tongue. Such spirits as he desired to please, such would I choose for my judges, and would stand or fall by them alone. Segrais has distinguished the readers of poetry, according to their capacity of judging, into three classes (he might have said the same of writers too, if he had pleased). In the lowest form he places those whom he calls Les Petits Esprits: such things as are our upper-gallery audience in a play-house: who like nothing but the husk and rind of wit; prefer a quibble, a conceit, an epigram, before solid sense, and elegant expression: these are mob-readers: if Virgil and Martial stood for parliament-men, we know already who would carry it. But though they make the greatest appearance in the field, and cry the loudest, the best on it is, they are but a sort of French Hugonots, or Dutch boors, brought over in herds, but not naturalized: who have not land of two pounds per annum in Parnassus, and therefore are not privileged to poll. Their authors are of the same level; fit to represent them on a montebank's stage, or to be masters of the ceremonies in a bear-garden. Yet these are they who have the most admirers. But it often happens, to their mortification, that as their readers improve their stock of sense (as they may by reading better books, and by conversation with men of judgment) they soon forsake them: and when the torrent from the mountains falls no more, the swelling writer is reduced into his shallow bed, like the Mancares at Madrid, with scarce water to moisten his own pebbles. There are a middle sort of readers (as we hold there is a middle state of souls) such as have a farther insight than the former, yet have not the capacity of judging right (for I speak not of those who are bribed by a party, and know better if they were not corrupted); but I mean a company of swarm young men, who are not yet arrived so far as to discern the difference betwixt sustain, or ostentatious sentences, and the true sublime. These are above liking Martial or Owen's epigrams; but they would certainly set Virgil below Statius or Lucan. I need not say their poets are of the same taste with their admirers. They affect greatness in all they write, but it is a bladder'd greatness, like that of the vain man whom Seneca describes—an ill habit of body, full of humours, and swelled with dropsy. Even these too desert their authors, as their judgment ripens. The young gentlemen themselves are commonly misled by their pedagogue at school, their tutor at the university, or their governor in their travels: and many of those three sorts are the most positive blockheads in the world. How many of those stultent writers have I known, who have sunk in their reputation, after seven or eight editions of their works! for indeed they are poets only for young men. They had great success at their first appearance; but not being of God, as a wit said formerly, they could not stand.

I have already named two sorts of judges, but Virgil wrote for neither of them: and, by his example, I am not ambitious of pleasing the lowest or the middle form of readers.

He chose to please the most judicious; souls of the highest rank, and truest understanding: these are few in number; but whoever is so happy as to gain their approbation, can never lose it, because they never give it blindly. Then they have a certain magnetism in their judgment, which attracts others to their sense. Every day they gain some new profelyte, and in time become the church. For this reason, a well-weighed, judicious poem, which, at its first appearance, gains no more upon the world than to be just received, and rather not blamed, than much applauded, insinuates itself by insensible degrees into the liking of the reader: the more he studies it, the more it grows upon him; every time he takes it up, he discovers some new graces in it. And whereas poems, which are produced by the vigour of imagination only, have a gloss upon them at first, which time wears off; the works of judgment are like the diamond, the more they are polished, the more lustre they receive. Such is the difference betwixt Virgil's Æneis, and Marini's Adone: and if I was allowed to change the metaphor, I would say, that Virgil is like the Fame which he describes!

Such a sort of reputation is my aim, though in a far inferior degree, according to my motto in the title-page; “Sequiturque patrem non passim bus æquis.” and therefore I appeal to the highest court of judicature, like that of the peers, of which your Lordship is so great an ornament.

Without this ambition which I own, of desiring to please the “Judices Natos,” I could never have been able to have done any thing at this age, when the fire of poetry is commonly extinguished in other men. Yet Virgil has given me the example of Entellus for my encouragement: when he was well heated, the younger champion could not stand before him: and we find the elder contended not for the gift, but for the honour; “Nec dona moror.” For Dampier has informed us, in his voyages, that the air of the country which produces gold is never wholesome.

I had, long since, considered, that the way to please the best judges, is not to translate a poet literally; and Virgil least of any other; for his peculiar beauty lying in his choice of words, I am excluded from it by the narrow compass of our heroic verse, unless I would make use of monosyllables only, and those clogged with consonants, which are the dead weight of our mother tongue. It is possible, I confess, though it rarely happens, that a verse of monosyllables may sound harmoniously; and some examples of it I have seen. My first line of the Æneis is not harsh:

Arms, and the man I sing, who, forc'd by fate, &c.

But a much better instance may be given from the last line of Manilius, made English by our learned and judicious Mr. Creech:

Nor could the world have borne so fierce a flame,
Where the many liquid consonants are placed so artfully, that they give a pleasing sound to the words, though they are all of one syllable.

It is true, I have been sometimes forced upon it in other places of this work, but I never did it out of choice: I was either in haste, or Virgil gave me no occasion for the ornament of words: for it seldom happens, but a monosyllable line turns verse to prose, and even that prose is rugged and unharmonious. Philarchus, I remember, taxes Balzac for placing twenty monosyllables in file, without one disyllable betwixt them. The way I have taken is not so strait as metaphrase, nor so loose as paraphrase; some things too I have omitted, and sometimes have added of my own; yet the omissions, I hope, are but of circumstances, and such as would have no grace in English; and the additions, I also hope, are easily deduced from Virgil's sense. They will seem (at least I have the vanity to think so) not stuck into him, but growing out of him. He studies brevity more than any other poet; but he had the advantage of a language wherein much may be comprehended in a little space. We, and all the modern tongues, have more articles and pronouns, besides signs of tenses and cases, and other barbarities on which our speech is built by the faults of our forefathers. The Romans founded theirs upon the Greek: and the Greeks, we know, were labouring many hundred years upon their language, before they brought it to perfection. They rejected all those signs, and cut off as many articles as they could spare; comprehending in one word, what we are constrained to express in two; which is one reason why we cannot write so concisely as they have done. The word “pater,” for example, signifies not only a father, but your father, my father, his or her father, all included in a word.

This inconvenience is common to all modern tongues; and this alone constrains us to employ more words than the ancients needed. But having before observed, that Virgil endeavours to be short and at the same time elegant, I pursue the excellence, and forsake the brevity; for there is he like ambergis, a rich perfume, but of so close and glutinous a body, that it must be opened with inferior scents of musk or civet, or the sweetness will not be drawn out into another language.

On the whole matter, I thought fit to steer betwixt the two extremes of paraphrase and literal translation, to keep as near my author as I could, without losing all his graces, the most eminent of which are in the beauty of his words, and those words, I must add, are always figurative. Such of these as would retain their elegance in our tongue, I have endeavoured to graft on it; but most of them are of necessity to be lost, because they will not shine in any but their own. Virgil has, sometimes, two of them in a line; but the scantiness of our heroic verse is not capable of receiving more than one: and that too must expiate for many others which have none. Such is the difference of the languages, or such my want of skill in choosing words. Yet I may presume to say, and I hope with as much reason as the French translator, that, taking all the materials of this divine author, I have endeavoured to make Virgil speak such English, as he would himself have spoken, if he had been born in England, and in this present age. I acknowledge with Segrais, that I have not succeeded in this attempt according to my desire; yet I shall not be wholly without praise, if, in some sort I may be allowed to have copied the clearness, the purity, the easiness, and the magnificence of his style. But I shall have occasion to speak farther on this subject, before I end the preface.

When I mentioned the Pindaric line, I should have added, that I take another licence in my verses; for I frequently make use of triplet rhymes, and for the same reason, because they bound the sense: and therefore I generally join these two licences together, and make the last verse of the triplet a Pindaric: for, besides the majesty which it gives, it confines the sense within the barriers of three lines, which would languish if it were lengthened into four. Spenser is my example for both these privileges of English verses: and Chapman hath followed him in his translation of Homer. Mr. Cowley has given into them after both, and all succeeding writers after him. I regard them now as the Magna Charta of heroic poetry; and am too much an Englishman to lose what my ancestors have gained for me. Let the French and Italians value themselves on their regularity: strength and elevation are our standard. I said before, and I repeat it, that the affected purity of the French has insinuated their heroic verse. The language of an epic poem is almost wholly figurative; yet they are so fearful of a metaphor, that no example of Virgil can encourage them to be bold with safety. Sure they might warm themselves by that sprightly blaze, without approaching it so close as to singe their wings: they may come as near it as their master: not that I would discourage that purity of diction in which he excels all other poets. But he knows how far to extend his franchises; and advances to the verge, without venturing a foot beyond it. On the other side, without being injurious to the memory of our English Pindar, I will presume to say, that his metaphors are sometimes too violent, and his language is not always pure: but, at the same time, I must excuse him; for, through the iniquity of the times, he was forced to travel, at an age, when, instead of learning foreign languages, he should have studied the beauties of his mother-tongue, which, like all other speeches, is to be cultivated early, or we shall never write it with any kind of elegance. Thus, by gaining abroad, he lost at home: like the painter in the Arcadia, who, going to see a skirmish, had his arms lopped off: and returned, says Sir Philip Sidney, well instructed how to draw a battle, but without a hand to perform his work.

There is another thing in which I have presumed to deviate from him and Spenser. They both make hemistichs (or half verses) breaking off in the middle of a line. I confess there are not many such in the Faery Queen: and even those few might be occasioned by his unhappy choice of so long a stanza. Mr. Cowley had found out, that no kind of staff is proper for an heroic poem, as being all too lyrical: yet though he wrote in couplets, where rhyme is freer from constraint, he frequently affects half verses; of which we find not one in Homer, and I think not in any of the Greek poets, or the Latin, excepting only Virgil; and there is no question but he thought he had Virgil's authority for that licence. But, I am confident, our poet never meant to leave him, or any other, such a precedent; and I ground my opinion on these two reasons: first, we find no example of a hemistich in any of his Pastorals or Georgics: for he had given the last finishing strokes to both these poems. But his Æneis he left so uncorrect, at least so short of that perfection at which he aimed, that we know how hard a sentence he passed upon it; and, in the second place, I reasonably presume, that he intended to have filled up all those hemistichs, because, in one of them, we find the sense imperfect.

“Quem tibi jam Trojâ—”

which some foolish grammarian has ended for him with a line of nonsense;

“peperit fumante Creûsa.”

For Ascanius must have been born some years before the burning of that city, which I need not prove. On the other side, we find also, that he himself filled up one line of the sixth Æneid, the enthusiasm seizing him while he was reading to Augustus:

“*Misenum Æolidem, quo non præstantior alter
Ære ciere viros.*”

To which he added in that transport “Martemque accendere cantu:” and never was a line more nobly finished, for the reasons which I have given in the book of Painting. On these considerations I have shunned hemistichs; not being willing to imitate Virgil to a fault; like Alexander's courtiers, who affected to hold their necks awry, because he could not help it. I am confident your Lordship is, by this time, of my opinion; and that you would look on those half lines hereafter, as the imperfect products of a hasty Muse: like the frogs and serpents in the Nile; part of them kindled into life, and part a lump of unformed unanimated mud.

I am sensible that many of my whole verses are as imperfect as those halves, for want of time to digest him better: but give me leave to make the excuse of Boccace, who, when he was upbraided that some of his novels had not the spirit of the rest, returned this answer: that Charlemain, who made the Palladins, was never able to raise an army of them. The leaders may be heroes, but the multitude must consist of common men.

I am also bound to tell your Lordship, in my own defence, that, from the beginning of the first Georgic to the end of the last Æneid, I found the difficulty of translation growing on me in every succeeding book: for Virgil, above all poets, had a stock which I may call almost inexhaustible, of figurative, elegant, and sounding words. I, who inherit but a small portion of his genius, and write in a language so much inferior to the Latin, have found it very painful to vary phrases, when the same sense returns upon me. Even he himself, whether out of necessity or choice, has often expressed the same thing in the same words; and often repeated two or three whole verses, which he had used before. Words are not so easily coined as money; and yet we see that the credit not only of banks, but of exchequers, cracks, when little comes in, and much goes out. Virgil called upon me in every line for some new word; and I paid so long, that I was almost bankrupt: so that the latter end must needs be more burdensome than the beginning or the middle; and consequently the twelfth Æneid cost me double the time of the first and second. What had become of me, if Virgil had taxed me with another book? I had certainly been reduced to pay the public in hammered money for want of milled; that is, in the same old words which I had used before. And the receivers must have been forced to have taken any thing, where there was so little to be had.

Befides this difficulty (with which I have struggled, and made a shift to pass it over) there is one remaining, which is insuperable to all translators. We are bound to our author's sense, though with the latitudes already mentioned (for I think it not so sacred, as that one iota must not be added or diminished, on pain of an anathema). But slaves we are, and labour on another man's plantation: we dress the vineyard, but the wine is the owner's: if the soil be sometimes barren, then we are sure of being scourged: if it be fruitful, and our care succeeds, we are not thanked; for the proud reader will only say, the poor drudge has done his duty. But this is nothing to what follows; for, being obliged to make his sense intelligible, we are forced to untune our own verses, that we may give his meaning to the reader. He who invents, is master of his thoughts and words: he can turn and vary them as he pleases, till he renders them harmonious. But the wretched translator has no such privilege: for being tied to thoughts, he must make what music he can in the expression; and for this reason it cannot always be so sweet as that of the original. There is a beauty of sound, as Segrais has observed, in some Latin words, which is wholly lost in any modern language. He instances in that "mollis amarus," on which Venus lays Cupid in the first Æneid. If I should translate it sweet-marjoram, as the word signifies, the reader would think I had mistaken Virgil: for those village words, as I may call them, give us a mean idea of the thing; but the sound of the Latin is so much more pleasing, by the just mixture of the vowels with the consonants, that it raises our fancies, to conceive somewhat more noble than a common herb; and to spread roses under him, and strew lilies over him—a bed not unworthy the grandson of the goddesses.

If I cannot copy his harmonious numbers, how shall I imitate his noble sights, where his thoughts and words are equally sublime?

"Quem quisquis studet æmulari,
 ——— ceratis ope Dedalæâ
 "Nititur pennis, vitreo daturus
 "Nomina ponto."

What modern language, or what poet can express the majestic beauty of this one verse amongst a thousand others?

"Aude hospes contemnere opes, et te quoque
 "dignum
 "Finge Deo."

For my part, I am lost in the admiration of it: contemn the world when I think on it, and my self when I translate it.

Lay by Virgil, I beseech your Lordship, and al my better sort of judges, when you take up my version, and it will appear a passable beauty when the original Muse is absent: but, like Spenser's false Florimel, made of snow, it melts and vanishes when the true one comes in sight. I will not excuse but justify myself for one pretended crime with which I am liable to be charged by false critics, not only in this translation, but in many of my original poems, that I Latinize too much. It is true, that when I find an English word significant and sounding, I neither borrow from the Latin, or any other language: but when I want at home, I must seek abroad.

If sounding words are not of our growth and manufacture, who shall hinder me to import them from a foreign country? I carry not out the treasure of the nation, which is never to return; but what I bring from Italy I spend in England: here it remains, and here it circulates; for, if the coin be good, it will pass from one hand to another. I trade both with the living and the dead, for the enrichment of our native language. We have enough in England to supply our necessity; but it we will have things of magnificence and splendor, we must get them by commerce. Poetry requires ornament, and that is not to be had from our old Teuton monosyllables; therefore if I find any elegant word in a classic author, I propose it to be naturalized, by using it myself; and, if the public approves of it, the bill passes. But every man cannot distinguish betwixt pedantry and poetry: every man, therefore, is not fit to innovate. Upon the whole matter, a poet must first be certain that the word he would introduce is beautiful in the Latin; and is to consider, in the next place, whether it will agree with the English idiom: after this, he ought to take the opinion of judicious friends, such as are learned in both languages; and, lastly, since no man is infallible, let him use this licence very sparingly; for if too many foreign words are poured in upon us, it looks as if they were designed, not to assist the natives, but to conquer them.

I am now drawing towards a conclusion, and suspect your Lordship is very glad of it. But permit me first to own what helps I have had in this undertaking. The late earl of Lauderdale sent me over his new translation of the Æneis, which he had ended before I engaged in the same design; neither did I then intend it: but some proposals being afterwards made me by my bookseller, I desired his Lordship's leave that I might accept them, which he freely granted; and I have his letter yet to show for that permission. He resolved to have printed his work, which he might have done two years before I could publish mine; and had performed it, if death had not prevented him. But having his manuscript in my hands, I consulted it as often as I doubted of my author's ense: for no man understood Virgil better than that learned nobleman. His friends, I hear, have got another and more correct copy of that translation by them; which had they pleased to have given the public, the judges must have been convinced that I have not flattered him. Besides his help, which was not inconsiderable, Mr. Conreve has done me the favour to review the Æneis, and compare my version with the original. I shall never be ashamed to own that this excellent young man has showed me many faults, which I have endeavoured to correct. It is true, he might have easily found more, and then my translation had been more perfect.

Two other worthy friends of mine, who desire to have their names concealed, seeing me straitened in my time, took pity on me, and gave me the use of Virgil; the two prefaces to the Pastorals and the Georgics, and all the arguments in prose to the whole translation; which, perhaps, has caused a report that the two first poems are not mine. If it had been true that I had taken their verses for my own, I might have gloried in their aid; and, like Terence, have fathered the opinion that Scipio and Lælius joined with me. But the same style being continued through the whole, and the same laws of verification observed, are proofs sufficient that this is one man's work: and our Lordship is too well acquainted with my manner, to doubt that any part of it is another's.

That your Lordship may see I was in earnest when I promised to hasten to an end, I will not give the reasons why I write not always in the proper terms of navigation, land-service, or in the apt of any profession. I will only say, that Virgil has avoided those proprieties, because he writes to mariners, soldiers, astronomers, gardeners, easants, &c. but to all in general, and in particular to men and ladies of the first quality, who have been better bred than to be too nicely knowing the terms. In such cases, it is enough for a poet to write so plainly that he may be understood by his readers; to avoid impropriety, and not affect to be thought learned in all things.

I have omitted the four preliminary lines of the first Æneid, because I think them inferior to any others in the whole poem, and consequently believe they are not Virgil's. There is too great a gap betwixt the adjective "vicina" in the second line, and the substantive "arva" in the latter end of the third, which keeps his meaning in obscurity too long; and is contrary to the clearness of his style.

"Ut quamvis avido,"

is too ambitious an ornament to be his; and,

"Gratum opus agricolis,"

are all words unnecessary, and independent of what he said before.

"Horrentia Martis arma,"

is worse than any of the rest. "Horrentia" is such a flat epithet as Tully would have given us in his verses. It is a mere filler to stop a vacancy in the hexameter, and connect the preface to the work of Virgil. Our author seems to found a charge, and begins like the clangor of a trumpet:

"Arma, virumque cano; Trojæ qui primus ab oris,"

Scarce a word without an R, and the vowels for the greater part sonorous. The prefacer began with "Ille ego," which he was constrained to patch up in the fourth line with "At nunc," to make the sense cohere. And if both those words are not notorious botches, I am much deceived, though the French translator thinks otherwise. For my own part, I am rather of the opinion, that they were added by Tucca and Varius, than retrenched.

I know it may be answered by such as think Virgil the author of the four lines, that he asserts his title to the Æneis, in the beginning of this work, as he did to the two former, in the last lines of the fourth Georgic. I will not reply otherwise to this, than by desiring them to compare these four lines with the four others, which we know are his, because no poet but he alone could write them. If they cannot distinguish creeping from flying, let them lay down Virgil, and take up Ovid de Ponto in his stead. My master needed not the assistance of that preliminary poet to prove his claim. His own majestic mien discovers him to be the King, amidst a thousand courtiers. It was a superfluous office, and therefore I would not set those verses in the front of Virgil, but have rejected them to my own preface:

"I, who before, with shepherds in the groves,
"Sung to my oaten pipe their rural loves,
"And issuing thence, compell'd the neighbouring
"field
"A plenteous crop of rising corn to yield,
"Manur'd the glebe, and stock'd the fruitful
"plain,
"(A poem grateful to the greedy swain)," &c.

If there be not a tolerable line in all these six, the prefacer gave me no occasion to write better. This is a just apology in this place. But I have done great wrong to Virgil in the whole translation: want of time, the inferiority of our language, the inconvenience of rhyme, and all the other excuses I have made, may alleviate my fault, but cannot justify the boldness of my undertaking. What avails it me to acknowledge freely, that I have not been able to do him right in any line! For even my own confession makes against me; and it will always be returned upon me, Why then did you attempt it? to which no other answer can be made, than that I have done him less injury than any of his former libellers.

What they called his picture, had been drawn at length so many times by the daubers of almost all nations, and still so unlike him, that I snatched up the pencil with disdain; being satisfied beforehand that I could make some small resemblance of him, though I must be content with a worriselike likeness. A sixth Pastoral, a Pharmaceutria, a single Orpheus, and some other features, have been exactly taken; but those holiday-authors write for pleasure, and only showed us what they could have done, if they would have taken pains to perform the whole.

Be pleas'd, my Lord, to accept, with your wonted goodness, this unworthy present which I make you. I have taken off one trouble from you, of defending it, by acknowledging its imperfections: and, though some part of them are covered in the verse (as Ericthonius rode always in a chariot to hide his lameness), such of them as cannot be concealed you will please to connive at, though, in the strictness of your judgment, you cannot pardon. If Homer was allowed to nod sometimes, in so long a work, it will be no wonder if I often fall asleep. You took my Aurengzebe into your protection, with all his faults; and I hope here cannot be so many, because I translate an author who gives me such examples of correctness. What my jury may be, I know not; but it is good for a criminal to plead before a favourable judge; if I had said partial, would your Lordship have forgiven me? Or will you give me leave to acquaint the world, that I have many times been oblig'd to your bounty since the Revolution? Though I never was reduced to beg a charity, nor ever had the impudence to ask one, either of your Lordship or your noble kinsman the earl of Dorset, much less of any other; yet, when I least expected it, you have both remembered me: so inherent it is in your family not to forget an old servant. It looks rather like ingratitude on my part, that where I have been so often oblig'd, I have appear'd so seldom to return my thanks, and where I was also so sure of being well received. Somewhat of laziness was in the case, and somewhat too of modesty, but nothing of disrespect or unthankfulness. I will not say that your Lordship has encouraged me to this presumption, lest if my labours meet with no success in public, may expose your judgment to be censured. As for my own enemies, I shall never think them worth an answer; and if your Lordship has any they will not dare to arraign you for want of knowledge in this art, till they can produce some what better of their own, than your Essay or Poetry. It was on this consideration that I have drawn out my preface to so great a length. Had I not address'd to a poet and a critic of the first magnitude, I had myself been taxed for want of judgment, and shamed my patron for want of understanding. But neither will you, my Lord, soon be tired as any other, because the discourse is on your art: neither will the learned reader think it tedious, because it is "ad clerum." At least, when he begins to be weary, the church-doors are open. That I may pursue the allegory with a short prayer, after a long sermon,

May you live happily and long, for the service of your country, the encouragement of good letters, and the ornament of poetry! which cannot be wish'd more earnestly by any man, than by most humble, most oblig'd,

Your Lordship's

and most obedient servant,

JOHN DRYDEN.

BOOK I.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Trojans, after a seven years voyage, set sail for Italy; but are overtaken by the dreadful storm, which Æolus raises at Juno's request. The tempest sinks one, and scatters the rest. Neptune drives off the winds, and calms the sea. Æneas, with his own ship, and six more, arrives safe at an African port. Venus complains to Jupiter of her son's misfortunes. Jupiter comforts her, and sends Mercury to procure him a kind reception among the Carthaginians. Æneas, going out to discover the country, meets his mother in the shape of an huntress, who conveys him in a cloud to Carthage; where he sees his friends whom he thought lost, and receives a kind entertainment from the queen. Dido, by a device of Venus, begins to have a passion for him, and, after some discourse with him, desires the history of his adventures since the siege of Troy, which is the subject of the two following books.

ARMS and the man I sing, who forc'd by fate,
 And haughty Juno's unrelenting hate;
 Spell'd and exil'd, left the Trojan shore;
 Long labours, both by sea and land, he bore;
 And in the doubtful war, before he won
 The Latian realm, and built the destin'd town:
 His banish'd gods restor'd to rites divine,
 And settled sure succession in his line:
 From whence the race of Alban fathers come,
 And the long glories of majestic Roine.
 O, Muse! the causes and the crimes relate,
 That goddess was provok'd, and whence her hate;
 Or what offence the queen of heaven began
 To persecute so brave, so just a man!
 Howvolv'd his anxious life in endless cares,
 How expos'd to wants, and hurry'd into wars!
 How in heavenly minds such high resentment shew;
 How exercise their spite in human woe?
 Against the Tiber's mouth, but far away,
 An ancient town was seated on the sea:
 A Tyrian colony; the people made
 Out for the war, and studious of their trade.
 Carthage the name, belov'd by Juno more
 Than her own Argos, or the Samian shore.
 Here stood her chariot, here, if heaven were kind,
 Her feat of awful empire she design'd.
 Yet she had heard an ancient rumour fly
 Long cited by the people of the sky;
 That times to come should see the Trojan race
 In Carthage ruin, and her towers deface;
 For, thus confin'd, the yoke of sovereign sway
 Would hold on the necks of all the nations lay.
 He ponder'd this, and fear'd it was in fate;
 For could he forget the war she wag'd of late,
 Or conquering Greece against the Trojan state.
 How she defides, long causes working in her mind,
 And secret seeds of envy, lay behind.
 Deep graven in her heart, the doom remain'd
 Of partial Paris, and her form disdain'd:
 The grace bestow'd on ravisht Ganymed,
 And Hector's glories, and her injur'd bed;

Each was a cause alone, and all combin'd
 To kindle vengeance in her haughty mind.
 For this, far distant from the Latian coast,
 She drove the remnants of the Trojan host:
 And seven long years th' unhappy wandering train
 Were toss'd by storms, and scatter'd through the main.

Such time, such toil, requir'd the Roman name,
 Such length of labour for so vast a frame.

Now icarce the Trojan fleet with sails and
 Had left behind the fair Sicilian shores; [oars
 Entering with cheerful shouts the watery reign,
 And ploughing frothy furrows in the main;
 When, labouring still with endless discontent,
 The queen of heaven did thus her fury vent.

Then am I vanquish'd, must I yield, said she,
 And must the Trojans reign in Italy?
 So fate will have it, and Jove adds his force;
 Nor can my power divert their happy course.
 Could angry Pallas, with revengeful spleen,
 The Grecian navy burn, and drown the men?
 She, for the fault of one offending foe,
 The bolts of Jove himself presum'd to throw:
 With whirlwinds from beneath she toss'd the ship,
 And bare expos'd the bosom of the deep:
 Then, as an eagle gripes the trembling game,
 The wretch yet hissing with her father's flame
 She strongly seiz'd, and, with a burning wound,
 Transfix'd and naked, on a rock the bound.
 But I, who walk in awful state above,
 The majesty of heaven, the sister-wife of Jove,
 For length of years my fruitless force employ
 Against the thin remains of ruin'd Troy.
 What nations now to Juno's power will pray,
 Or offerings on my slighted altars lay?

Thus rag'd the goddess, and, with fury fraught,
 The restless regions of the storms she sought;
 Where, in a spacious cave of living stone,
 The tyrant Æolus from his airy throne,
 With power imperial curbs the struggling winds,
 And sounding tempests in dark prisons binds,

This way, and that, th' impatient captives tend,
 And, pressing for release, the mountains rend :
 High in his hall, th' undaunted monarch stands,
 And shakes his sceptre, and their rage commands :
 Which did he not, their unresist'd sway
 Would sweep the world before them in their way :
 Earth, air, and seas, through empty space would roll,

And heaven would fly before the driving soul !
 In fear of this, the father of the gods
 Confin'd their fury to those dark abodes,
 And lock'd them safe within, oppress'd with mountain loads :

Impos'd a king, with arbitrary sway,
 To loose their fetters, or their force ally.
 To whom the suppliant queen her prayers address,
 And thus the tenor of her suit express'd.

O Æolus ! for to thee the king of heaven
 The power of tempests and of winds has given :
 Thy force alone their fury can restrain,
 And smooth the waves, or swell the troubled main :
 A race of wandering slaves abhorr'd by me,
 With prosperous passage cut the Thufcan sea :
 To fruitful Italy their course they steer,
 And for their vanquish'd gods design new temples
 there.

Raise all thy winds, with night-involve the skies ;
 Sink or disperse my fatal enemies.
 Twice venen, the charming daughters of the main,
 Around my person wait, and bear my train :
 Succeed my wish, and second my design,
 The fairest, Deiopeia, shall be thine ;
 And make thee father of a happy line.

To this the god—Tis yours, O queen ! to will
 The work, which duty binds me to fulfil.
 These airy kingdoms, and the wide command,
 Are all the presents of your bounteous hand ;
 Yours is my sovereign's grace, and as your guest,
 I sit with gods at their celestial feast ;
 Raise tempests at your pleasure, or subdue ;
 Dispose of empire, which I hold from you !
 He said, and hurl'd against the mountain side
 His quivering spear, and all the god apply'd !
 The raging winds rush through the hollow wound,
 And dance aloft in air, and skim along the ground :

Then, settling on the sea, the furies sweep ;
 Raise liquid mountains, and disclose the deep !
 South, east, and west, with mix'd confusion roar,
 And roll the foaming billows to the shore.
 The cables crack, the sailors' fearful cries
 Ascend ; and sable night involves the skies ;
 And heaven itself is ravish'd from their eyes !
 Loud peals of thunder from the poles ensue,
 Then flashing fires the transient light renew ;
 The face of things a frightful image bears,
 And present death in various forms appears !
 Struck with unusual fright, the Trojan chief,
 With lifted hands and eyes, invokes relief !
 And thrice, and four times happy those, he cry'd,
 That under Ilian walls before their parents dy'd !
 Tydides, bravest of the Grecian train,
 Why could not I by that strong arm be slain,
 And lie by noble Hector on the plain :

O great Sarpedon, in those bloody fields,
 Where Simois rolls the bodies and the shields
 Of heroes, whose dismember'd hands yet bear
 The dart aloft, and clench the pointed spear !

Thus while the pious prince his fate bewails,
 Fierce Boreas drove against his flying sails,
 And rent the sheets : the raging billows rise,
 And mount the tossing vessel to the skies :
 Nor can the shivering oars sustain the blow ;
 The galley gives her side, and turns her prow :
 While those atern descending down the steep,
 Through gaping waves behold the boiling deep !
 Three ships were hurry'd by the southern blast,
 And on the secret shelves with fury cast !
 Those hidden rocks, th' Aulonian sailors knew,
 They call'd them altars, when they rose in view,
 And show'd their spacious backs above the flood !
 Three more fierce Eurus in his angry mood
 Dash'd on the shallows of the moving sand,
 And in mid ocean left them moor'd a-land :
 Orontes' bark that bore the Lycian crew,
 (A horrid sight) ev'n in the hero's view,
 From stem to stern, by waves was overborne :
 The trembling pilot, from his rudder torn, [toft,
 Was headlong hurl'd : thrice round, the ship was Then bulg'd at once, and in the deep was lost !
 And here and there above the waves were seen
 Arms, pictures, precious goods, and floating men !
 The stoutest vessel to the storm gave way,
 And suck'd thro' loosen'd planks the rushing sea !
 Ilieneus was her chief ; Aethes old,
 Achates faithful, Abas young and bold,
 Endur'd not less : their ships, with gaping seams,
 Admit the deluge of the briny streams !

Mean time imperial Neptune heard the sound
 Of raging billows breaking on the ground :
 Displeas'd, and fearing for his watery reign,
 He rear'd his awful head above the main :
 Serene in majesty, then roll'd his eyes
 Around this space of earth, and seas, and skies.
 He saw the Trojan fleet dispers'd, distress'd,
 By stormy winds and wintry heaven oppress'd.
 Full well the god his sister's envy knew,
 And what her aims, and what her arts pursue :
 He summon'd Eurus and the western blast,
 And first an angry glance on both he cast :
 Then thus rebuk'd ; Audacious winds ! from whence

This bold attempt, this rebel insolence ?
 Is it for you to ravage seas and land,
 Unauthoris'd by my supreme command ?
 To raise such mountains on the troubled main ?
 Whom I—But first 'tis fit the billows to restrain, [reign,
 And then you shall be taught obedience to my
 Hence, to your Lord my royal mandate bear,
 The realms of ocean and the fields of air
 Are mine, not his ; by fatal lot to me
 The liquid empire fell, and trident of the sea.
 His power to hollow caverns is confin'd,
 There let him reign, the jailer of the wind :
 With hoarse commands his breathing subjects call,
 And boast and bluster in his empty hall ! [sea,
 He spoke ; and while he spoke, he smooth'd the Dispell'd the darkness, and restor'd the day :
 Cymothœ, Triton, and the sea-green train
 Of beauteous nymphs, and daughters of the main,
 Clear from the rocks the vessels with their hands ;
 The god himself with ready trident stands,
 And opes the deep, and spreads the moving sands ;

hen heaves them off the shoals; where'er he guides
 s finny courfers, and in triumph rides, he waves unruffle, and the sea subsides.
 when in tumults rise the ignoble crowd,
 and are their motions, and their tongues are loud;
 id stones and brands in rattling volleys fly,
 and all the rustic arms that fury can supply;
 then some grave and pious man appear,
 hey hush their noise, and lend a listening ear;
 e sooths with sober words their angry mood,
 nd quenches their innate desire of blood:
 when the father of the flood appears,
 nd o'er the seas his sovereign trident rears,
 heir fury fails: he skims the liquid plains,
 igh on his chariot, and with loosen'd reins ajestic moves along, and awful peace maintains.

he weary Trojans ply their shatter'd oars nearest land, and make the Libyan shores.

Within a long recess there lies a bay,
 n island shades it from the rolling sea,
 nd forms a port secure for ships to ride,
 roke by the jutting land on either side:
 double streams the briny waters glide.
 etwixt two rows of rocks, a sylvan scene ppears above, and groves for ever green:
 grot is form'd beneath, with mossy seats,
 o rest the Nereids, and exclude the heats.
 own through the crannies of the living walls
 he crystal streams descend in murmuring falls.
 o hawfers need to bind the vessels here,
 or bearded anchors, for no storms they fear.
 even ships within this happy harbour meet,
 he thin remainders of the scatter'd fleet.
 he Trojans, worn with toils, and spent with woes,
 eap on the welcome land, and seek their wish'd repose.

first, good Achates, with repeated strokes of clashing flints, their hidden fire provokes;
 hort flame succeeds a bed of wither'd leaves
 he dying sparkles in their fall receives:
 aught into life, in fiery fumes they rise,
 and, fed with stronger food, invade the skies.
 The Trojans, dropping wet, or stand around he cheerful blaze, or lie along the ground;
 ome dry their corn infected with the brine,
 hen grind with marbles, and prepare to dine.
 Eneas climbs the mountain's airy brow,
 And takes a prospect of the seas below:
 f Capys thence, or Antheus he could spy;
 Or see the streamers of Cæicus fly.
 No vessels there in view: but, on the plain,
 Three beamy stags commands a lordly train of branching heads; the more ignoble throng
 Attend their stately steps, and slowly graze along.
 He stood; and while secure they fed below,
 He took the quiver, and the trusty bow
 Achates us'd to bear; the leaders first
 He laid along, and then the vulgar pierc'd;
 Nor ceas'd his arrows, till the shady plain
 Seven mighty bodies with their blood distain.
 For the seven ships he made an equal share,
 And to the port return'd, triumphant from the
 The jars of generous wine (Acestes' gift, [war.
 When his Trinacrian shores the navy left)

He set abroach, and for the feast prepar'd,
 In equal portions with the ven'ison shar'd.
 Thus while he dealt it round, the pious chief,
 With cheerful words, allay'd the common grief:
 Endure, and conquer; Jove will soon dispose
 To future good, our past and present woes.
 With me, the rocks of Scylla you have try'd;
 Th'inhuman Cyclops, and his den defy'd.
 What greater ills hereafter can you bear?
 Resume your courage, and dismiss your care.
 An hour will come, with pleasure to relate
 Your sorrows past, as benefits of fate.
 Through various hazards and events we move
 To Latium, and the realms foredoom'd by Jove:
 Call'd to the feat (the promise of the skies)
 Where Trojan kingdoms once again may rise.
 Endure the hardships of your present state,
 Live, and reserve yourselves for better fate.

These words he spoke; but spoke not from his heart:

His outward smiles conceal'd his inward smart.
 The jolly crew, unmindful of the past,
 The quarry share, there plenteous dinner haste:
 Some strip the skin, some portion out the spoil;
 The limbs, yet trembling, in the cauldrons boil:
 Some on the fire the reeking entrails broil.
 Stretch'd on the grassy turf, at ease they dine;
 Restore their strength with meat, and cheer their souls with wine.

Their hunger thus appeas'd, their care attends
 The doubtful fortune of their absent friends;
 Alternate hopes and fears their minds possess,
 Whether to deem them dead, or in distress.
 Above the rest, Æneas mourns the fate
 Of brave Orontes, and th' uncertain state
 Of Gyas, Lycus, and of Amycus:

The day, but not their sorrows, ended thus.
 When, from aloft, almighty Jove surveyed
 Earth, air, and shores, and navigable seas,
 At length on Libyan realms he fix'd his eyes:
 Whom, pondering thus on human miseries,
 When Venus saw, she with a lively lock,
 Not free from tears, her heavenly fire bespoke:

O king of gods and men, whose awful hand
 Disperes thunder on the seas and land;
 Disposes all with absolute command:
 How could my pious son thy power incense?
 Or what, alas! is vanish'd Troy's offence?
 Our hope of Italy not only lost
 On various seas, by various tempests tost, [coast.
 But shut from every shore, and barr'd from every
 You promis'd once, a progeny divine,
 Of Romans, rising from the Trojan line,
 In after-times should hold the world in awe,
 And to the land and ocean give the law.
 How is your doom revers'd, which eas'd my care
 When Troy was ruin'd in that cruel war!
 Then fates to fates I could oppose; but now,
 When fortune still pursues her former blow,
 What can I hope? What worse can still succeed?
 What end of labours has your will decreed?
 Antenor, from the midst of Grecian hosts,
 Could pass secure, and pierce the Illyrian coasts:
 Where, rolling down the steep, Timavus raves,
 And through nine channels diembogues his waves,
 At length he founded Padua's happy seat,
 And gave his Trojans a secure retreat:

There fix'd their arms, and there renew'd their name,
 And there in quiet rules, and crown'd with fame:
 But we, descended from your sacred line,
 Entitled to your heaven and rites divine,
 Are banish'd earth, and for the wrath of one,
 Remov'd from Latium, and the promis'd throne.
 Are these our sceptres? these our due rewards?
 And is it thus that Jove his plighted faith regards?
 To whom, the father of immortal race,
 Smiling with that serene indulgent face,
 With which he drives the clouds and clears the
 First gave a holy kiss; then thus replies: [skies,
 Daughter, diminish thy fears: to thy desire
 The fates of thine are fix'd, and stand entire.
 Thou shalt behold thy wish'd Lavinian walls,
 And, ripe for heaven, when fate Æneas calls,
 Then shalt thou bear him up, sublime, to me:
 No councils have revers'd my firm decree.
 And, left new fears disturb thy happy state,
 Know, I have search'd the mystic rolls of fate:
 Thy son (nor is th' appointed season far)
 In Italy shall wage successful war;
 Shall tame fierce nations in the bloody field,
 And sovereign laws impose, and cities build.
 Till, after every foe subdued, the sun
 Thrice through the signs his annual race shall run:
 This is his time prefix'd. Ascanius then,
 Now call'd Iulus, shall begin his reign.
 He thirty rolling years the crown shall wear:
 Then from Lavinium shall the seat transfer:
 And, with hard labour, Alba-longa build;
 The throne with his succession shall be fill'd,
 Three hundred circuits more: then shall be seen,
 Iliä the fair, a priestess and a queen.
 Who, full of Mars, in time, with kindly throws
 Shall, at a birth, two goodly boys disclose.
 The royal babes a tawny wolf shall drain,
 Then Romulus his grandfire's throne shall gain,
 Of martial towers the founder shall become,
 The people Romans call, the city Rome.
 To them, no bounds of empire I assign;
 Nor term of years to their immortal line.
 Ev'n haughty Juno, who, with endless broils,
 Earth, seas, and heaven, and Jove himself turmoils;
 At length aton'd, her friendly power shall join,
 To cherish and advance the Trojan line.
 The subject world shall Rome's dominion own,
 And, prostrate, shall adore the nation of the gown.
 An age is ripening in revolving fate,
 When Troy shall overturn the Grecian state:
 And sweet revenge her conquering sons shall call,
 To crush the people that conspir'd her fall.
 Then Cæsar from the Julian stock shall rise,
 Whose empire ocean, and whose fame the skies,
 Alone shall bound; whom, fraught with Eastern spoils,
 Our heaven, the just reward of human toils,
 Securely shall repay with rites divine;
 And incense shall ascend before his sacred shrine.
 Then dire debate, and impious war shall cease,
 And the stern age be soften'd into peace:
 Then banish'd faith shall once again return,
 And vestal fires in hallow'd temples burn,
 And Remus with Quirinus shall sustain
 The righteous laws, and fraud and force restrain.

Janus himself before his face shall wait,
 And keep the dreadful issues of his gate,
 With bolts and iron bars: within remains
 Imprison'd fury, bound in brazen chains:
 High on a trophy rais'd, of useless arms,
 He sits, and threatens the world with vain alarms.
 He said, and sent Cylleus with command
 To free the ports, and open the Punic land
 To Trojan guests; left, ignorant of fate,
 The queen might force them from her town and
 state:
 Down from the steep of heaven Cylleus flies,
 And cleaves, with all his wings, the yielding skies.
 Soon on the Libyan shore descends the god,
 Performs his message, and displays his rod;
 The surly murmurs of the people cease,
 And, as the fates requir'd, they give the peace:
 The queen herself suspends the rigid laws,
 The Trojans pities, and protects their cause.
 Mean time, in shades of night Æneas lies;
 Care seiz'd his soul, and sleep forsook his eyes:
 But when the sun restor'd the cheerful day,
 He rose, the coast and country to survey,
 Anxious and eager to discover more:
 It look'd a wild uncultivated shore:
 But whether human kind, or beasts alone
 Possess'd the new-found region, was unknown.
 Beneath a ledge of rocks his fleet he hides;
 Tall trees surround the mountains shady sides:
 The bending brow above a safe retreat provides.
 Arm'd with two pointed darts, he leaves his friends,
 And true Achates on his steps attends.
 Lo, in the deep recesses of the wood,
 Before his eyes his goddess's mother stood:
 A huntress in her habit and her mien;
 Her dress a maid, her air confess'd a queen.
 Bare were her knees, and knots her garments
 bind;
 Loose was her hair, and wanton'd on the wind;
 Her hand sustain'd a bow, her quiver hung behind.
 She seem'd a virgin of the Spartan blood:
 With such array Harpalice bestrode [pid flood.
 Her Thracian courier, and out-stripp'd the ra-
 Ho! strangers! have you lately seen, she said,
 One of my sisters, like myself array'd;
 Who cross'd the lawn, or in the forest stray'd?
 A painted quiver at her back the bore,
 Vary'd with spots, a lynx's hide she wore:
 And at full cry pursu'd the tusk'd boar?
 Thus Venus: Thus her son reply'd again,
 None of your sisters have we heard or seen,
 O Virgin! Or what other name you bear
 Above that style; O more than mortal fair!
 Your voice and mien celestial birth betray!
 If, as you seem, the sister of the day;
 Or one, at least, of chaste Diana's train.
 Let not an humble suppliant sue in vain:
 But tell a stranger, long in tempests tofs'd,
 What earth we tread, and who commands th'
 coast?
 Then on your name shall wretched mortals call,
 And offer'd victims at your altars fall.
 I dare not, she reply'd, assume the name
 Of goddess, or celestial honours claim:
 For Tyrian Virgins bows and quivers bear,
 And purple bulkins o'er their ancles wear.

now, gentle youth, in Libyan lands you are :
 people rude in peace, and rough in war.
 he rising city, which from far you see,
 Carthage, and a Tyrian colony.
 Æneian Dido rules the growing state,
 'ho fled from Tyre, to shun her brother's hate :
 reat were her wrongs, her story full of fate,
 'hich I will sum in short. Sichæus, known of wealth, and brother to the Punic throne, possess'd fair Dido's bed : and either heart
 t once was wounded with an equal dart.
 er father gave her, yet a spotless maid ;
 ygmalion then the Tyrian sceptre sway'd :
 ne who contemn'd divine and human laws.
 hea strife ensu'd, and curs'd gold the cause.
 he monarch, blinded with desire of wealth ;
 ith steel invades his brother's life by stealth ;
 efore the sacred altar made him bleed,
 nd long from her conceal'd the cruel deed :
 ome tale, some new pretence, he daily coin'd,
 o soothe his sister, and delude her mind.
 t length, in dead of night, the ghost appears
 f her unhappy lord : the spectre stares, nd with erect'd eyes his bloody bosom bares.
 he cruel altars and his fate he tells,
 nd the dire secret of his house reveals :
 hen warns the widow and her household gods
 o seek a refuge in remote abodes.
 ast, to support her in so long a way,
 le shows her where his hidden treasure lay.
 dmonish'd thus, and seiz'd with mortal fright,
 he queen provides companions of her flight :
 hey meet, and all combine to leave the state,
 Who hate the tyrant, or who fear his hate.
 hey seize a fleet, which ready rigg'd they find ;
 or is Pygmalion's treasure left behind.
 he vessels, heavy laden, put to sea,
 With prosperous winds, a woman leads the way.
 know not, if by strels of weather driven,
 or was their fatal course dispos'd by heaven !
 at last they landed, where from far your eyes
 May view the turrets of new Carthage rise :
 here bought a space of ground, which, Byrsa
 call'd
 'rom the bull's hide, they first inclos'd, and wall'd.
 ut whence are you ? what country claims your birth ?
 What seek you, strangers, on our Libyan earth ?
 To whom, with sorrow streaming from his
 And deeply sighing, thus her son replies : [eyes, ould you with patience hear, or I relate,
 O nymph ! the tedious annals of our fate !
 Through such a train of woes if I should run,
 The day would sooner than the tale be done !
 From ancient Troy, by force expell'd, we came,
 If you by chance have heard the Trojan name :
 On various seas, by various tempests toils'd,
 At length we landed on your Libyan coast :
 The good Æneas am I call'd, a name,
 While fortune favour'd, not unknown to fame :
 My household gods, companions of my woes,
 With pious care I rescued from our foes ;
 To fruitful Italy my course was bent,
 And from the king of heaven is my descent.
 With twice ten sail I cross'd the Phrygian sea ;
 Fate and my mother goddess led my way.
 Scarce seven, the thin remainder of my fleet,
 From storms preserv'd, within your harbour meet :

VOL. XII.

Myself distress'd, an exile, and unknown,
 Debarr'd from Europe, and from Asia thrown,
 In Libyan deserts wander thus alone.

His tender parent could no longer bear ;
 But, interposing, fought to soothe his care.
 Whoe'er you are, not unbelov'd by heaven,
 Since on our friendly shore your ships are driven,
 Have courage : to the gods permit the rest ;
 And to the queen expose your just request.
 Now take this earnest of success, for more :
 Your scatter'd fleet is join'd upon the shore ;
 The winds are chang'd, your friends from danger
 Or I renounce my skill in augury. [free,
 Twelve swans behold, in hauteous order move,
 And stoop, with closing pinions, from above :
 Whom late the bird of Jove had driven along,
 And, through the clouds, pursu'd the scattering
 Now all united in a goodly team, [throng :
 They skim the ground, and seek the quiet stream.
 As they, with joy returning, clap their wings,
 And ride the circuits of the skies in rings :
 Not otherwise your ships, and every friend,
 Already hold the port, or with swift sails descend.
 No more advice is needful, but pursue
 The path before you, and the town in view.
 Thus having said, the turn'd, and made appear
 Her neck resurgent, and dishevel'd hair ; [ground,
 Which, flowing from her shoulders, reach'd the
 And widely spread ambrosial scents around :
 In length of train descends her sweeping gown,
 And, by her graceful walk, the queen of love is
 The prince pursu'd the parting deity, [known.
 With words like these : Ah ! whither dost thou
 Unkind and cruel, to deceive your son [sily ?
 In borrow'd shapes, and his embrace to shun ;
 Never to bless my fight, but thus unknown ;
 And still to speak in accents not your own !
 Against the goddess these complaints he made ;
 But took the path ; and her commands obey'd.
 They march obscure, for Venus kindly shrouds,
 With mists, their persons, and involves in clouds :
 That, thus unseen, their passage none might stay,
 Or force to tell the causes of their way.
 This part perform'd, the goddess flies sublime,
 To visit Paphos, and her native clime :
 Where garlands ever green, and ever fair,
 With vows are offer'd, and with solemn prayer,
 A hundred altars in her temple smoke,
 A thousand bleeding hearts her power invoke.
 They climb the next ascent, and, looking down,
 Now, at a nearer distance, view the town :
 The prince, with wonder, sees the stately towers,
 Which late were huts, and shepherds' homely
 bowers ;
 The gates and streets ; and hears from every part
 The noise and busy concourse of the mart.
 The toiling Tyrians on each other call,
 To ply their labour : some extend the wall ;
 Some build the citadel ; the brawny throng
 Or dig, or push unwieldy stones along.
 Some for their dwellings choose a spot of ground,
 Which first design'd, with ditches they surround.
 Some laws ordain, and some attend the choice
 Of holy senates, and elect by voice.
 Here some design a mole, while others there
 Lay deep foundations for a theatre :
 From marble quarries mighty columns hew,
 For ornaments of scenes, and future view.

D d

Such is their toil, and such their busy pains,
 As exercise the bees in flowery plains:
 When winter past, and summer scarce begun,
 Invites them forth to labour in the sun: [dense
 Some lead their youth abroad, while some con-
 Their liquid store, and some in cells dispense.
 Some at the gate stand ready to receive
 The golden burlen, and their friends relieve.
 All, with united force, combine to drive
 The lazy drones from the laborious hive;
 With envy stung, they view each other's deeds;
 The fragrant work with diligence proceeds.
 Thrice happy you, whose walls already rise;
 Æneas said; and view'd, with lifted eyes,
 Their lofty towers: then entering at the gate,
 Conceal'd in clouds (prodigious to relate),
 He mix'd, unmark'd, among the busy throng,
 Borne by the tide, and pass'd unseen along.
 Full in the centre of the town there stood,
 Thick set with trees, a venerable wood:
 The Tyrians landed near this holy ground,
 And, digging here, a prosperous cmen found:
 From under earth a counfer's head they drew,
 Their growth and future fortune to foreshow:
 This fated sign their foundress Juno gave,
 Of a soil fruitful, and a people brave.
 Sidonian Dido here with solemn state
 Did Juno's temple build and consecrate:
 Enrich'd with gifts, and with a golden shrine;
 But more the goddess made the place divine.
 On brazen steps the marble threshold rose,
 And brazen plates the cedar beams inclose:
 The rafters are with brazen coverings crown'd,
 The lofty doors on brazen hinges found.
 What first Æneas in this place beheld,
 Reviv'd his courage, and his fear expell'd.
 For while, expecting there the queen, he rais'd
 His wandering eyes, and round the temple gaz'd;
 Admir'd the fortune of the rising town,
 The striving artists and their arts renown:
 He saw, in order painted on the wall,
 Whatever did unhappy Troy befall:
 The wars that fame around the world had blown,
 All to the life, and every leader known.
 There Agamemnon, Priam here he spies,
 And fierce Achilles who both kings defies.
 He stopp'd, and weeping said, O friend! ev'n here
 The monuments of Trojan woes appear:
 Our known disasters fill ev'n foreign lands:
 See there, where old unhappy Priam stands?
 Ev'n the mute walls relate the warrior's fame,
 And Trojan griefs the Tyrians' pity claim.
 He said: 'tis hears a ready passage find,
 Devouring what he saw so well design'd;
 And with an empty picture fed his mind. }
 For there he saw the fainting Grecians yield,
 And here the trembling Trojans quit the field,
 Pursu'd by fierce Achilles through the plain,
 On his high chariot driving o'er the slain.
 The tents of Rhesus next his grief renew,
 By their white sails betray'd to nightly view.
 And wafeful Diomede, whose cruel sword [lord.
 The centries slew, nor spar'd their slumbering
 Then took the fiery steeds, ere yet the food
 Of Troy they taste, or drink the Xanthian flood.
 Elsewhere he saw where Troilus defy'd
 Achilles, and unequal combat try'd.

Then, where the boy disarm'd, with loosen
 Was by his horses hurry'd o'er the plains: [rein
 Hung by the neck and hair, and dragg'd around,
 The hostile spear yet sticking in his wound;
 With tracks of blood inscrib'd the dusty ground.

Mean time the Trojan dames, oppress'd with
 To Pallas' fane in long procession go, [woe,
 In hopes to reconcile their heavenly foe:
 They weep, they beat their breasts, they rend their hair;

And rich embroider'd vests for presents bear:
 But the stern goddess stands unmov'd with prayer.
 Thrice round the Trojan walls Achilles drew
 The corpse of Hector, whom in fight he slew.
 Here Priam sues; and there, for sums of gold,
 The lifeless body of his son is sold.
 So sad an object, and so well express'd,
 Drew sighs and groans from the griev'd hero
 To see the figure of his lifeless friend, [breast
 And his old fire, his helpless hand extend.
 Himself he saw amidst the Grecian train,
 Mix'd in the bloody battle on the plain?
 And swarthy Memnon in his arms he knew,
 His pompous ensigns, and his Indian crew.
 Penthesilea, there, with haughty grace,
 Leads to the wars an Amazonian race;
 In their right hands a pointed dart they wield;
 The left, for ward, sustains the lunar shield.
 Athwart her breast a golden belt she throws,
 Amidst the press alone provokes a thousand foes:
 And dares her maiden arms to manly force oppose.

Thus while the Trojan prince employs his eyes,
 Fix'd on the walls with wonder and surprize,
 The beautiful Dido with a numerous train,
 And pomp of guards, ascends the sacred fane.
 Such on Eurotas' banks, or Cynthus' height,
 Diana seems; and so the charms the sight,
 When in the dance the graceful goddess leads
 The choir of nymphs, and overtops their heads.
 Known by her quiver and her lofty mien,
 She walks majestic, and she looks their queen:
 Latona sees her shine above the rest,
 And feeds with secret joy her silent breast.
 Such Dido was; with such becoming state,
 Amidst the crowd, she walks serenely great.
 Their labour to her future sway she speeds,
 And, passing with a gracious glance proceeds:
 Then mounts the throne, high plac'd before the shrine;

In crowds around the swarming people join.
 She takes petitions, and dispenses laws,
 Hears and determines every private cause.
 Their talks, in equal portions, she divides,
 And, where unequal, there by lots decides.
 Another way, by chance, Æneas bends
 His eyes, and unexpected sees his friends:
 Antheus, Sergestus grave, Cleanthus strong,
 And, at their backs, a mighty Trojan throng;
 Whom late the tempest on the billows toss'd,
 And widely scatter'd on another coast.
 The prince, unseen, surpris'd with wonder stands
 And longs, with joyful haste, to join their hands:
 But, doubtful of the wish'd event, he stays,
 And, from the hollow cloud, his friends surveys:
 Impatient till they told their present state, [late
 And where they left their ships, and what the

And why they came, and what was their request;
 For these were sent, commission'd by the rest,
 To sue for leave to land their sickly men,
 And gain admision to the gracious queen.
 Entering, with cries they fill'd the holy tane;
 Then thus, with lowly voice, Ilioneus began:
 O queen! indulg'd by favour of the gods,
 To found an empire in these new abodes;
 To build a town, with statutes to restrain
 The wild inhabitants beneath thy reign:
 We wretched Trojans, tosd' on every shore,
 From sea to sea, thy clemency implore:
 Forbid the fires our shipping to deface,
 Receive th' unhappy fugitives to grace,
 And spare the remnant of a pious race.
 We come not with design of wasteful prey,
 To drive the country, forte the swains away:
 Nor such our strength, nor such is our desire,
 The vanquish'd dare not to such thoughts aspire.
 A land there is, Hesperia nam'd of old,
 The soil is fruitful, and the men are bold:
 Th' Oenotrians held it once, by common fame,
 Now call'd Italia, from the leader's name.
 To that sweet region was our voyage bent,
 When winds, and every warring element
 Disturb'd our course, and, far from sight of land,
 Cast our torn vessels on the moving sand:
 The sea came on; the south with mighty roar,
 Hisper'd and dash'd the rest upon the rocky shore.
 Those few you see escap'd the storm, and fear,
 Unless you interpose, a shipwreck here;
 What men, what monsters, what inhuman race,
 What laws, what barbarous customs of the place,
 What up a desert shore to drowning men,
 And drive us to the cruel seas again!
 Our hard fortune no compassion draws,
 For hospitable rites, nor human laws,
 The gods are just, and will revenge our cause.
 Eneas was our prince; a juster lord,
 A noble warrior, never drew a sword:
 A servant of the right, religious of his word,
 Yet he lives, and draws this vital air,
 Or we his friends of safety shall despair;
 For you, great queen, these offices repent,
 Which he will equal, and perhaps augment.
 We want not cities, nor Sicilian coasts,
 Where king Acastes Trojan lineage boasts.
 Permit our ships a shelter on your shores,
 Exist'd from your woods with planks and oars;
 That, if our prince be safe, we may renew
 Our destin'd course, and Italy pursue.
 Ut if, O best of men! the fates ordain
 That thou art swallow'd in the Libyan main;
 And if our young Iulus be no more,
 Dismiss our navy from your friendly shore;
 That we to good Acastes may return,
 And with our friends our common losses mourn.
 He spoke Ilioneus; the Trojan crew
 With cries and clamours his request renew.
 He modest queen a while, with down-cast eyes,
 Under'd the speech; then briefly thus replies:
 Trojans, dismiss your fears: my cruel fate,
 And doubts attending an unsettled state,
 Once me to guard my coast from foreign foes:
 Who has not heard the story of your woes?
 He name and fortune of your native place,
 He fame and valour of the Phrygian race?

We Tyrians are not so devoid of sense,
 Nor so remote from Phæbus' influence.
 Whether to Latian shores your course is bent,
 Or, driven by tempests from your first intent,
 You seek the good Acastes' government;
 Your men shall be receiv'd, your fleet repair'd,
 And sail, with ships of convoy for your guard:
 Or, would you stay, and join your friendly powers,
 To raise and to defend the Tyrian towers.
 My wealth, my city, and myself are yours.
 And would to heaven the storm, you felt, would bring
 On Carthaginian coasts your wandering king.
 My people shall, by my command, explore
 The ports and creeks of every winding shore,
 And towns, and wilds, and shady woods, in quest
 Of so renown'd and so desir'd a guest.
 Rais'd in his mind the Trojan hero stood,
 And long'd to break from out his ambient cloud;
 Achates found it; and thus urg'd his way:
 From whence, O goddess-born, this long delay?
 What more can you desire, your welcome sure
 Your fleet in safety, and your friends secure?
 One only wants: and him we saw in vain
 Oppose the storm, and swallow'd in the main!
 Orontes in his fate our forfeit paid,
 The rest agrees with what your mother said.
 Scarce had he spoken, when the cloud gave way,
 The mists flew upward, and dissolv'd in day.
 The Trojan chief appear'd in open sight,
 August in visage, and serenely bright.
 His mother goddess, with her hands divine,
 Had form'd his curling locks, and made his temples shine;
 And given his tolling eyes a sparkling grace;
 And breath'd a youthful vigour on his face:
 Like polish'd ivory, beauteous to behold,
 Or Parian marble, when enchas'd in gold,
 Thus radiant from the circling cloud he broke,
 And thus with manly modesty he spoke:
 He whom you seek am I: by tempests tost,
 And sav'd from shipwreck on your Libyan coast:
 Presenting, gracious queen, before your throne,
 A prince that owes his life to you alone.
 Fair majesty, the refuge and redress
 Of those whom fate pursues, and wants oppress.
 You, who your pious offices employ
 To save the relics of abandon'd Troy,
 Receive the shipwreck'd on your friendly shore;
 With hospitable rites relieve the poor;
 Associate in your town a wandering train,
 And strangers in your palace entertain.
 What thanks can wretched fugitives return,
 Who scatter'd through the world in exile mourn?
 The gods, if gods to goodness are inclin'd,
 If acts of mercy touch their heavenly mind;
 And more than all the gods, your generous heart,
 Conscious of worth, requite its own desert:
 In you this age is happy, and this earth:
 And parents more than mortal gave you birth.
 While rolling rivers into seas shall run,
 And round the space of heaven the radiant sun;
 While trees the mountain-tops with shades supply,
 Your honour, name, and praise, shall never die.
 Whate'er abode my fortune has assign'd,
 Your image shall be present in my mind.

Thus having said; he turn'd with pious haste,
 And joyful his expecting friends embrac'd:
 With his right hand Ilioneus was grac'd,
 Serestus with his left; then to his breast,
 Cloanthus and the noble Gyas press'd;
 And so by turns descended to the rest.

The Tyrian queen stood fix'd upon his face;
 Pleas'd with his motions, ravish'd with his grace:
 Admir'd his fortunes, more admir'd the man;
 Then recollected good; and thus began:
 What fate, O goddess-born, what angry powers
 Have cast you shipwreck'd on our barren shores?
 Are you the great Æneas, known to fame,
 Who from celestial seed your lineage claim?
 The same Æneas, whom fair Venus bore
 To fam'd Anchises on th' Idean shore?
 It calls into my mind, though then a child,
 When Teucer came from Salamis exil'd;
 And fought my father's aid, to be restor'd:
 My father Belus then with fire and sword
 Invaded Cyprus, made the region bare,
 And conquering, finish'd the successful war.
 From him the Trojan siege I understand,
 The Grecian chiefs, and your illustrious blood.
 Your foe himself the Dardan valour prais'd,
 And his own ancestry from Trojans rais'd,
 Enter, my noble guest; and you shall find,
 If not a costly welcome, yet a kind.

For I myself, like you, have been distress'd;
 Till heaven afforded me this place of rest.
 Like you, an alien in a land unknown,
 I learn to pity woes, so like my own.
 She said, and to the palace led her guest,
 Then offer'd incense, and proclaim'd a feast.
 Nor yet less careful, for her absent friends,
 Twice ten fat oxen to the ships he sends:
 Besides a hundred boars, a hundred lambs,
 With bleating cries, attend their milky dams.
 An jars of generous wine, and spacious bowls,
 She gives to cheer the sailors drooping souls.
 Now purple hangings clothe the palace walls,
 And sumptuous feasts are made in splendid halls:
 On Tyrian carpets, richly wrought, they dine;
 With loads of massy plate the side-boards shine.
 And antic vases all of gold emboss'd
 (The gold itself inferior to the cost):
 Of curious work, where on the sides were seen
 The fights and figures of illustrious men;
 From their first founder to the present queen.

The good Æneas, whose paternal care
 Æneas' absence could no longer bear,
 Dispatch'd Achates to the ships in haste,
 To give a glad relation of the past;
 And, fraught with precious gifts, to bring the boy
 Snatch'd from the ruins of unhappy Troy:
 A robe of tissue, stiff with golden wire;
 An upper vest, once Helen's rich attire;
 From Argos by the fam'd adulteress brought:
 With golden flowers and winding foliage wrought;
 Her mother Leda's present, when she came
 To ruin Troy, and set the world on flame.
 The sceptre Priam's eldest daughter bore,
 Her orient necklace, and the crown she wore;
 Of double texture, glorious to behold;
 One order set with gems, and one with gold.
 Instructed thus, the wife Achates goes:
 And in his diligence his duty shows.

But Venus, anxious for her son's affairs,
 New counsels tries: and new designs prepares:
 That Cupid should assume the shape and face
 Of sweet Alcanius, and the sprightly grace:
 Should bring her presents, in her nephew's stead,
 And in Eliza's veins the gentle poison shed.
 For much she fear'd the Tyrian's, double-tongued,
 And knew the town to Juno's care belong'd.
 These thoughts by night her golden slumbers broke;

And thus alarm'd to winged love she spoke:
 My son, my strength, whose mighty power alone
 Controls the thunderer on his awful throne
 To thee thy much-afflicted mother flies,
 And on thy succour, and thy faith relies.
 Thou know'st my son, how Jove's revengeful
 wife,

By force and fraud, attempts thy brother's life.
 And often hast thou mourn'd with me his pains;
 Him Dido now with blandishment detains:
 But I suspect the town where Juno reigns.
 For this, 'tis needful to prevent her art.
 And fire with love the proud Phœnician's heart.
 A love so violent, so strong, so sure,
 As neither age can change, nor art can cure.
 How this may be perform'd, now take my mind:
 Alcanius, by his father, is design'd
 To come, with presents, laden from the port,
 To gratify the queen, and gain the court.
 I mean to plunge the boy in pleasing sleep,
 And, ravish'd, in Idalian bowers to keep.
 Or high Cythera: that the sweet deceit
 May pass unseen, and none prevent the cheat,
 Take thou his form and shape. I beg the grace
 But only for a night's revolving space;
 Thyself a boy, assume a boy's dissembled face.
 That when, amidst the fervour of the feast,
 The Tyrian hugs, and fondles thee on her breast,
 And with sweet kisses in her arms constrains,
 Thoa mayst insafe thy venom in her veins.
 The god of love obeys, and sets aside
 His bow and quiver, and his plummy pride:
 He walks Iulus in his mother's sight;
 And in the sweet resemblance takes delight.

The goddess then to young Alcanius flies,
 And, in a pleasing slumber, seals his eyes;
 Lull'd in her lap, amidst a train of loves,
 She gently bears him to her blissful groves:
 Then with a wreath of myrtle crowns his head,
 And softly lays him on a flowery bed.
 Cupid, mean time, assum'd his form and face,
 Following Achates with a shorter pace,
 And brought the gifts. The queen already sat,
 Amidst the Trojan lords, in shining state,
 High on a golden bed: her princely guest
 Was next her side, in order fate the rest.
 Then canisters with bread are heap'd on high;
 Th' attendants water for their hands supply;
 And, having wash'd, with silken towels dry.
 Next, lively handmaids in long order bore
 The censers, and with fumes the gods adore.
 Then youths, and virgins, twice as many, join
 To place the dishes, and to serve the wine.
 The Tyrian train, admitted to the feast,
 Approach, and on the painted couches rest.
 All on the Trojan gifts with wonder gaze;
 But view the beautiful boy with more amaze!

His rosy-colour'd cheeks, his radiant eyes,
His motions, voice, and shape, and all the gods disguise.

Nor pass unprais'd the vest and veil divine,
Which wandering foliage and rich flowers entwine.
But, far above the rest, the royal dame,
(Already doom'd to love's disastrous flame)
With eyes insatiate, and tumultuous joy,
Beholds the presents, and admires the boy.
The guileful god, about the hero long,
With children's play, and false embraces, hung;
Then fought the queen: she took him to her arms
With greedy pleasure, and devour'd his charms.
Unhappy Dido little thought what guest,
How dire a god she drew to near her breast.
But he, not mindless of his mother's prayer,
Works in the pliant bosom of the fair;
And moulds her heart anew, and blots her former care.

The dead is to the living love resign'd,
And all Æneas enters in her mind.

Now, when the rage of hunger was appeas'd,
The meat remov'd, and every guest was pleas'd,
The golden bowls with sparkling wine are crown'd,
And through the palace cheerful cries resound,
From gilded roofs depending lamps display
Nocturnal beams, that emulate the day.
A golden bowl, that shone with gems divine,
The queen commanded to be crown'd with wine,
The bowl that Belus us'd, and all the Tyrian line.
Then, silence through the hall proclaim'd, she
O hospitable Jove! we thus invoke, [spoke:
With solemn rites, thy sacred name and power?
Bless to both nations this auspicious hour!
So may the Trojan and the Tyrian line,
In lasting concord, from this day combine.
Thou, Bacchus, god of joys and friendly cheer,
And gracious Juno, both be present here:
And you, my lords of Tyre, your vows address
To heaven with mine, to ratify the peace.

The goblet then she took, with nectar crown'd
(Sprinkling the first libations on the ground),
And rais'd it to her mouth with sober grace,
Then, sipping, offer'd to the next in place.
'Twas Bitias, whom she call'd, a thirsty soul,
He took the challenge, and embrac'd the bowl:
With pleasure swill'd the gold, nor ceas'd to draw,
Till he the bottom of the brimser saw.
The goblet goes around: Iopas brought His golden lyre, and sung what ancient Atlas taught.

The various labours of the wandering moon,
And whence proceed th' eclipses of the sun.
Th' original of men and beasts; and whence
The rains arise, and fires their warmth dispense;
And fix'd and erring stars dispose their influence.

What shakes the solid earth, what cause delays
The summer nights, and shortens winter days.
With peals of shouts the Tyrians praise the song;
Those peals are echo'd by the Trojan throng.
Th' unhappy queen with talk prolong'd the night,
And drank large draughts of love with vast delight.
Of Priam much inquir'd, of Hector more;
Then ask'd what arms the swarthy Memnon
wore;

What troops he landed on the Trojan shore.
The steeds of Diomed' vary'd the discourse,
And fierce Achilles, with his matchless force.
At length, as fate and her ill stars requir'd,
To hear the series of the war desir'd:
Relate at large, my godlike guest, she said,
The Grecian stratagems, the town betray'd;
The fatal issue of so long a war, [clare.
Your flight, your wanderings, and your woes, de-
For, since on every sea, on every coast,
Your men have been distress'd, your navy tofs'd,
Seven times the sun has either tropic view'd,
The winter banish'd, and the spring renew'd.

B O O K II.

THE ARGUMENT.

Æneas relates how the city of Troy was taken, after a ten years siege, by the treachery of Sinon, and the stratagem of a wooden horse. He declares the fixed resolution he had taken, not to survive the ruins of his country, and the various adventures he met with in the defence of it: at last, having been before advis'd by Hector's ghost, and now by the appearance of his mother Venus, he is prevail'd upon to leave the town, and settle his household gods in another country. In order to this, he carries off his father on his shoulders, and leads his little son by the hand, his wife following him behind. When he comes to the place appointed for the general rendezvous, he finds a great confluence of people, but misses his wife, whose ghost afterwards appears to him, and tells him the land which was design'd for him.

ALL were attentive to the godlike man,
When, from his lofty couch, he thus began:
Great queen! what you command me to relate,
Renews the sad remembrance of our fate,
An empire from its old foundations rent,
And every woe the Trojans underwent:

A peopled city made a desert place;
All that I saw, and part of which I was:
Not ev'n the hardest of our foes could hear,
Nor stern Ulysses tell without a tear.
And now the latter watch of waiting night,
And setting stars, to kindly rest invite.

But, since you take such interest in our woe,
And Troy's disastrous end desire to know,
I will restrain my tears, and briefly tell
What in our last and fatal night befel.

By destiny compell'd, and in despair,
The Greeks grew weary of the tedious war:
And, by Minerva's aid, a fabric rear'd,
Which, like a steed of monstrous height, appear'd:
The sides were plank'd with pine, they feign'd it
made

For their return, and this the vow they paid.
Thus they pretend; but in the hollow side
Selected numbers of their soldiers hide;
With inward arms the dire machine they load,
And iron bowels stuff the dark abode.
In fight of Troy lies Tenedos, an isle
(While fortune did on Priam's empire smile)
Renown'd for wealth; but since a faithless bay,
Where ships expos'd to wind and weather lay,
There was their fleet conceal'd: we thought for Greece

The sails were hoisted, and our fears release.
The Trojans coop'd within their walls so long,
Unbar their gates, and issue in a throng,
Like swarming bees, and, with delight, survey
The camp deserted where the Grecians lay:
The quarters of the several chiefs they show'd,
Here Phœnix, here Achilles made abode,
Here join'd the battles, there the navy rode.
Part on the pile their wondering eyes employ
(The pile by Pallas rais'd to ruin Troy).
Thymætes first ('tis doubtful whether hir'd,
Or to the Trojan destiny requir'd)
Mov'd that the ramparts might be broken down,
To lodge the monster fabric in the town.
But Capys, and the rest of founder mind,
The fatal present to the flames design'd;
Or to the watery deep: at least to bore
The hollow sides, and hidden frauds explore:
The giddy vulgar, as their fancies guide,
With noise say nothing, and in parts divide.
Laocoon, followed by a numerous crowd,
Ran from the fort; and cry'd, from far, aloud;
O wretched countrymen! what fury reigns?
What more than madness has possess'd your brains?

Think you the Grecians from your coasts are gone,

And are Ulysses' arts no better known?
This hollow fabric either must inclose,
Within its blind recess, our secret foes;
Or 'tis an engine rais'd above the town,
T' o'erlook the walls, and then to batter down.
Somewhat is sure design'd; by fraud or force;
Trust not their presents, nor admit the horse.
Thus having said, against the steed he threw
His forceful spear, which, hissing as it flew,
Pierc'd through the yielding planks of jointed wood,
And trembling in the hollow belly stood.
The sides transpierc'd return a rattling sound,
And groans of Greeks inclos'd come issuing thro'
the wound.

And had not heaven the fall of Troy design'd,
Or had not men been fated to be blind,
Enough was said and done, t' inspire a better
mind:

Then had our lances pierc'd the treacherous wood,
A Trojan towers and Priam's empire stood.

Mean time, with shouts, the Trojan shepherds
bring

A captive Greek in bands, before the king:
Taken, to take; who made himself their prey,
T' impose on their belief, and Troy betray.
Fix'd on his aim, and obstinately bent
To die undaunted, or to circumvent.
About the captive, tides of Trojans flow;
All press to see, and some insult the foe.
Now hear how well the Greeks their wives dif-
Behold a nation in a man compris'd. [guis'd,
Trembling the miscrænt stood, unarm'd and bound;
He start'd, and roll'd his haggard eyes around;
Then said, Alas! what earth remains, what sea
Is open to receive unhappy me!
What fate a wretched fugitive attends,
Scorn'd by my foes, abandon'd by my friends!
He said, and sigh'd, and cast a useful eye:
Our pity kindles, and our passions die.
We cheer the youth to make his own defence,
And freely tell us what he was, and whence:
What news he could impart, we long to know,
And what to credit from a captive foe.

His fear at length dismiss'd, he said, whatever
My fate ordains, my words shall be sincere:
I neither can, nor dare, my birth disclaim;
Greece is my country, Sinon is my name:
Though plung'd by fortune's power in misery,
'Tis not in fortune's power to make me lye.
If any chance has hither brought the name
Of Palamedes, not unknown to fame,
Who suffer'd from the malice of the times;
Accus'd and sentenc'd for pretended crimes:
Because the fatal wars he would prevent; [ment;
Whose death the wretched Greeks too late
Me, then a boy, my father, poor and bare
Of other means, committed to his care:
His kinsman and companion in the war.
While fortune favour'd, while his arms support
The cause, and rul'd the counsels of the court,
I made some figure there: nor was my name
Obscure, nor I without my share of fame.
But when Ulysses, with fallacious arts,
Had made impression in the peoples' hearts;
And forg'd a treason in my patron's name
(I speak of things too far divulg'd by fame),
My kinsman fell; then I, without support,
In private mourn'd his loss, and left the court.
Mad as I was, I could not bear his fate
With silent grief, but loudly blam'd the state:
And curs'd the direful author of my woes.
'Twas told again, and hence my ruin rose.
I threaten'd, if indulgent heaven once more
Would land me safely on my native shore,
His death with double vengeance to restore.
This mov'd the murderer's hate, and soon ensu'd
Th' effects of malice from a man so proud.
Ambiguous rumours through the camp he spread,
And fought, by treason, my devoted head:
New crimes invented, left unreturn'd no stone,
To make my guilt appear, and hide his own,
Till Calchas was by force and threatening wrought:
But why—why dwell I on that anxious thought?
If on my nation just revenge you seek,
And 'tis t' appear a foe, t' appear a Greek;
Already you my name and country know,
Assuage your thirst of blood, and strike the blow.

My death will both the kingly brothers please,
And set insatiate Ithacæ at ease.

This fair unfinish'd tale, these broken hearts,
Rais'd expectations on our longing starts;

Unknowing as we were in Grecian arts.
His former trembling once again renew'd,

With acted fear, the villain thus pursu'd :
Long had the Grecians (tir'd with fruitless care,

And weary'd with an unsuccessful war)
Relov'd to raise the siege, and leave the town ;

And, had the gods permitted, they had gone.
But oft the wintry seas and southern winds Withstood their passage home and chang'd their minds.

Portents and prodigies their souls amaz'd ;
But most, when this stupendous pile was rais'd :

Then flaming meteors, hung in air, were seen,
And thunders rattled through a sky serene :

Dismiss'd, and fearful of some dire event,
Eurypylos, t' enquire their fate, was sent ;

He from the gods this dreadful answer brought ;
O Grecians! when the Trojan shores you fought,

Your passage with a virgin's blood was bought !
So must your safe return be bought again,

And Grecian blood once more atone the main !
The spreading rumour round the people ran ;

All fear'd, and each believ'd himself the man.
Ulysses took th' advantage of their fright ;

Sail'd Calchas, and produc'd in open sight :
Then bade him name the wretch, ordain'd by fate

The public victim, to redeem the state.
Already some presag'd the dire event,

And saw what sacrifice Ulysses meant.
For twice five days the good old seer withstood

The intended treason, and was dumb to blood,
Till, tir'd with endless clamours, and pursuit

Of Ithacæ, he stoop'd no longer mute :
But, as it was agreed, pronounc'd that I

Was destin'd by the wrathful gods to die !
All prais'd the sentence, pleas'd the storm should

In one alone, whose fury threaten'd all. [fall
The dismal day was come, the priests prepare

Their leaven'd cakes, and fillets for my hair.
I follow'd nature's laws, and must avow

I broke my bonds, and fled the fatal blow.
I hid in a weedy lake all night I lay,

Secure of safety when they sail'd away.
But now what further hopes for me remain,

To see my friends or native soil again?
My tender infants, or my careful sire,

Whom they returning will to death require?
Will perpetrate on them their first design,

And take the forfeit of their heads for mine !
Which, O, if pity mortal minds can move,

If there be faith below, or gods above,
If innocence and truth can claim desert,

Let Trojans, from an injur'd wretch avert.
False tears true pity move : the king commands

To loose his fetters, and unbind his hands :
Then adds these friendly words ; Dismiss thy fears,

Forget the Greeks, be mine as thou wert theirs :
But truly tell, was it for force or guile,

Or some religious end, you rais'd this pile?
Thus said the king. He, full of fraudulent arts,

This well-invented tale for truth imports :
Ye lamps of heaven! he said, and lifted high

His hands now free, thou venerable sky,

Inviolable powers, ador'd with dread,
Ye fatal fillets, that once bound this head,

Ye sacred altars, from whose flames I fled,
Be ail of you abjur'd ; and grant I may,

Without a crime, th' ungrateful Greeks betray !
Reveal the secrets of the guilty state,

And justly punish whom I justly hate !
But you, O king! preserve the faith you gave,

If I, to save myself, your empire save.
The Grecian hopes, and all th' attempts they

Were only founded on Minerva's aid. [made,
But from the time when impious Diomede,

And false Ulysses, that inventive head,
Her fatal image from the temple drew,

The sleeping guardians of the cattle slew,
Her virgin itaue with their bloody hands

Polluted, and profan'd her holy bands :
From thence the tide of fortune left their shore,

And ebb'd much faster than it flow'd before :
Their courage languish'd as their hopes decay'd,

Nor Pallas, usy avenger, refus'd her aid.
And did the goddess doubtfully declare

Her alter'd mind, and alienated care :
When first her fatal image touch'd the ground,

She sternly cast her glaring eyes around ;
That sparkled as they roll'd, and seem'd to threat :

Her heavenly limbs distill'd a briny sweat, Thrice from the ground she leap'd, was seen to wield

Her brandish'd lance, and shake her horrid shield :

Then Calchas bade our hoit for flight prepare,
And hope no conquest from the tedious war :

Till first they sail'd for Greece ; with prayers besought

Her injur'd power, and better omens brought :
And now their navy ploughs the watery main,

Yet, soon expect it on your shores again,
With Pallas pleas'd ; as Calchas did ordain.

But first, to reconcile the blue-ey'd maid,
For her stolen statue, and her tower betray'd ;

Warn'd by the seer, to her offended name
We rais'd, and dedicate this wondrous frame :

So lofty, left through your forbidden gates
It pass, and intercept our better fates.

For, once admitted there, our hopes are lost ;
And Troy may then a new Palladium boast.

For so religion and the gods ordain ;
That if you violate with hands profane

Minerva's gift, your town in flames shall burn,
(Which omen, O ye gods, on Græcia turn) !

But if it climb, with your adorning hands,
The Trojan walls, and in the city stands,

Then Troy shall Argos and Mycenæ burn,
And the reverse of fate on us return.

With such deceits he gain'd their easy hearts,
Too prone to credit his perfidious arts,

What Diomede, nor Thetis' greater son,
A thousand ships, nor ten years siege had done :

False tears and fawning words the city won.
A greater omen, and of worse portent,

Did our unwary minds with fear torment :
Concurring to produce the dire event.

Laocoon, Neptune's priest by lot that year,
With solemn pomp then sacrific'd a steer.

When, dreadful to behold, from sea we spy'd
Two serpents rank'd abreast, the seas divide,

And smoothly sweep along the swelling tide.

Their flaming crests above the waves they show,
Their bellies seem to burn the seas below :
Their speckled tails advance to steer their course,
And, on the founding shore, the flying billows force.

And now the strand, and now the plain they held,
Their ardent eyes with bloody streaks were fill'd :
Their nimble tongues they brandish'd as they came,
And lick'd their hissing jaws that sputter'd flame.
We fled amaz'd ; their destin'd way they take,
And to Laocoon and his children make :
And first around the tender boys they wind,
Then with their sharpen'd fangs their limbs and bodies grind.

The wretched father, running to their aid
With pious haste, but vain, they next invade :
Twice round his waist their winding volumes
roll'd,

And twice about his gasping throat they fold.
The priest, thus doubly chok'd, their crests divide,
And, towering o'er his head, in triumph ride.

With both his hands he labours at the knots,
His holy fillets the blue venom blots :
His roaring fills the sitting air around.

Thus, when an ox receives a glancing wound,
He breaks the bands, the fatal altar flies, [skies.
And, with loud bellowings, breaks the yielding
Their tasks perform'd, the serpents quit their prey,
And to the tower of Pallas make their way :

Couch'd at her feet, they lie protected there,
By her large buckler, and protended spear.
Amazement seizes all ; the general cry
Proclaims Laocoon justly doom'd to die,
Whole hand the will of Pallas had withstood,
And dar'd to violate the sacred wood.

All vote t' admit the steed, that vows be paid,
And incense offer'd, to th' offended maid.
A spacious breach is made, the town lies bare,
Some hoisting levers, some the wheels prepare,
And fasten to the horses feet : the rest
With cables hawl along th' unwieldy beast.
Each on his fellow for assistance calls :
At length the fatal fabric mounts the walls,
Big with destruction. Boys with chaplets crown'd,
And choirs of virgins, sing and dance around.
Thus rais'd aloft, and then descending down,
It enters o'er our heads, and threatens the town.

O sacred city ! built by hands divine !
O valiant heroes of the Trojan line !
Four times he suck'd ; as oft the clashing sound
Of arms was heard, and inward groans rebound.
Yet, mad with zeal, and blinded with our fate,
We hawl along the horse in solemn state ;
Then place the dire portent within the tower.
Cassandra cry'd, and curs'd the unhappy hour ;
Foretold our fate ; but, by the gods decree,
All heard, and none believ'd, the prophecy.
With branches we the fanes adorn, and waste
In jollity the day ordain'd to be the last.

Mean time the rapid heavens roll'd down the light,
And on the shaded ocean rush'd the night :
Our men secure, nor guards nor centries held,
But easy sleep their weary limbs compell'd.
The Grecians had embark'd their naval powers
From Tenedos, and fought our well-known shores :
Safe under covert of the silent night,
And guided by th' imperial galley's light,

When Sinon, favour'd by the partial gods,
Unlock'd the horse, and op'd his dark abodes ;
Restor'd to vital air our hidden foes,
Who joyful from their long confinement rose.
Tylander bold, and Sthenelus their guide,
And dire Ulysses, down the cable slide :
Then Thoas, Athmas, and Pyrrhus haste ;
Nor was the Podalyrian hero last :
Nor injur'd Menelaus, nor the fam'd
Epeus, who the fatal engine fram'd.
A nameless crowd succeed ; their forces join
T' invade th' town, oppress'd with sleep and wine.
Those few they find awake, first meet their fate,
Then to their fellows they unbar the gate.
'Twas in the dead of night, when sleep repairs
Our bodies worn with toils, our minds with cares,
When Hector's ghost before my sight appears :
A bloody shroud he seem'd, and bath'd in tears.
Such as he was, when, by Pelides slain,
Theſſalian couriers dragg'd him o'er the plain.
Swoln were his feet, as when the thongs were thrust

Thro' the bor'd holes, his body black with dust.
Unlike that Hector, who return'd from toils
Of war triumphant, in Æacian spoils :
Or him, who made the fainting Greeks retire,
And launch'd against their navy Phrygian fire.
His hair and beard stood stiffen'd with his gore ;
And all the wounds, he for his country bore,
Now stream'd afresh, and with new purple ran :
I wept to see the visionary man :
And, while my trance continu'd, thus began :
O light of Trojans, and support of Troy,
Thy father's champion, and thy country's joy !
O, long expected by thy friends ! from whence
Art thou so late return'd for our defence ?
Do we behold thee, weary'd as we are,
With length of labours, and with toils of war ?
After so many funerals of thy own ?
Are thou restor'd to thy declining town ?
But say, what wounds are these ? What new disgrace

Deforms the manly features of thy face ?
To this the spectre no reply did frame ;
But answer'd to the cause for which he came :
And, groaning from the bottom of his breast,
This warning, in these mournful words, express'd :
O goddess-born ! escape, by timely flight,
The flames and horrors of this fatal night.
The foes, already, have possess'd the wall,
Troy nods from high, and totters to her fall.
Enough is paid to Priam's royal name,
More than enough to duty and to fame.
If by a mortal hand my father's throne
Could be defended, 'twas by mine alone :
Now Troy to thee commends her future state,
And gives her gods companions of thy fate :
From their assistance happier walls expect,
Which, wandering long, at last thou shalt erect.
He said, and brought me, from their blest abodes,
The venerable itames of the gods :
With ancient Vesta, from the sacred choir
The wreaths and relics of th' immortal fire.

Now peals of shouts come thundering from afar,
Cries, threats, and loud laments, and mingled war !
The noise approaches, through our palace flood
Aloof from streets, encompasses with a wood.

Louder, and yet more loud, I hear th' alarms
 Of human cries distinct, and clashing arms!
 Fear broke my slumbers: I no longer stay,
 But mount the terraces, thence the town survey:
 And hearken what the fruitful sounds convey! }
 Thus when a flood of fire by wind is borne,
 Crackling it rolls and mows the standing corn:
 Or deluges descending on the plains,
 Sweep o'er the yellow year, destroy the pains
 Of labouring oxen, and the peasant's gains:
 Unroot the forest oaks, and bear away
 Flocks, folds, and trees, an undistinguish'd prey!
 The shepherd climbs the cliff, and sees, from far,
 The wasteful ravage of the watery war.
 Then Hector's faith was manifestly clear'd;
 And Grecian frauds in open light appear'd!
 The palace of Deiphobus ascends
 In smoky flames, and catches on his friends.
 Ucalegon burns next; the seas are bright
 With splendor not their own; and shine with Trojan light.

New clamours and new clangors now arise,
 The found of trumpets mix'd with fighting cries!
 With frenzy seiz'd, I run to meet th' alarms,
 Resolv'd on death, resolv'd to die in arms!
 But first to gather friends, with them to oppose,
 If fortune favour'd, and repel the foes.
 Spurr'd by my courage, by my country fir'd;
 With sense of honour, and revenge inspir'd!
 Pantheus, Apollo's priest, a sacred name,
 Had escap'd the Grecian swords, and pass'd the
 With relics loaden to my doors he fled, [flame;
 And, by the hand, his tender grandson led.
 What hope, O Pantheus! whither can we run?
 Where make a stand? and what may yet be done?
 Scarce had I said, when Pantheus with a groan,
 Troy is no more, and Ilium was a town!
 The fatal day, th' appointed hour, is come,
 When wrathful Jove's irrevocable doom
 Transfers the Trojan state to Grecian hands.
 The fire consumes the town, the foe commands!
 And armed hosts, an unexpected force,
 Break from the bowels of the fatal horse!
 Within the gates proud Sinon throws about
 The flames, and foes for entrance press without.
 With thousand others, whom I fear to name,
 More than from Argos or Mycenæ came.
 To several posts their parties they divide;
 Some block the narrow streets, some scour the wide.
 The bold they kill, th' unwary they surprize;
 Who fights finds death, and death finds him who
 flies.
 The warders of the gate but scarce maintain
 Th' unequal combat, and resist in vain.
 I heard; and heaven, that well-born souls inspires,
 Prompts me, through lifted swords and rising fires,
 To run, where clashing arms and clamour calls,
 And rush undaunted to defend the walls!
 Ripheus and Iphitus by my side engage,
 For valour one renown'd, and one for age.
 Dymas and Hypanis by moonlight knew
 My motions and my mien, and to my party drew;
 With young Chorcebus, who by love was led
 To win renown, and fair Cassandra's bed;
 And lately brought his troops to Priam's aid:
 Forewarn'd in vain by the prophetic maid.

Whom, when I saw, resolv'd in arms to fall,
 And that one spirit animated all;
 Brave souls, said I, but brave, alas! in vain:
 Come, finish what our cruel fates ordain.
 You see the desperate state of our affairs; [ers.
 And heaven's protecting powers are deaf to pray-
 The passive gods behold the Greeks defile
 Their temples, and abandon to the spoil
 Their own abodes: we, feeble few, conspire
 To save a sinking town involv'd in fire.
 Then let us fall, but fall amidst our foes:
 Despair of life, the means of living flows.
 So bold a speech encourag'd their desire
 Of death, and added fuel to their fire!

As hungry wolves, with raging appetite,
 Scour through the fields, nor fear the stormy
 night,

Their whelps at home expect the promis'd food,
 And long to temper their dry chaps in blood,
 So rush'd we forth at once, resolv'd to die,
 Resolv'd in death the last extremes to try!
 We leave the narrow lanes behind, and dare
 Th' unequal combat in the public square: }
 Night was our friend, our leader was Despair.
 What tongue can tell the slaughter of that night!
 What eyes can weep the sorrows and affright!
 An ancient and imperial city falls,
 The streets are fill'd with frequent funerals:
 Houses and holy temples float in blood,
 And hostile nations make a common food.
 Not only Trojans fall, but, in their turn,
 The vanquish'd triumph, and the victors mourn;
 Ours take new courage from despair and night;
 Confus'd the fortune is, confus'd the fight.
 All parts resound with tumults, plaints, and fears,
 And grisly death in sundry shapes appears!
 Androgeos fell among us, with his band,
 Who thought us Grecians newly come to land:
 From whence, said he, my friends, this long de-
 You loiter, while the spoils are borne away. [lay?
 Our ships are laden with the Trojan store,
 And you, like truants, come too late ashore,
 He said, but soon corrected his mistake,
 Found by the doubtful answers which we make:
 Amaz'd he would have shunn'd th' unequal fight,
 But we, more numerous, intercept his flight.
 As when some peasant in a bushy brake,
 Has, with unwary footing, press'd a snake,
 He starts aside, astonish'd, when he spies
 His rising crest, blue neck, and rolling eyes; }
 So from our arms surpris'd Androgeos flies!
 In vain; for him and his we compass round,
 Possess'd with fear, unknowing of the ground; }
 And of their lives an easy conquest found.
 Thus fortune on our first endeavour smil'd;
 Chorcebus then, with youthful hopes beguil'd,
 Swoln with success, and of a daring mind,
 This new invention fatally design'd.
 My friends, said he, since fortune shows the way,
 'Tis fit we should the auspicious guide obey.
 For what has the these Grecian arms bestow'd,
 But their destruction, and the Trojans good?
 Then change we shields, and their devices bear,
 Let fraud supply the want of force in war.
 They find us arms. This said, himself he dress'd
 In dead Androgeos' spoils, his upper vest,
 His painted buckler, and his plummy crest.

Thus Rypheus, Dymas, all the Trojan train,
Lay down their own attire, and strip the slain.
Mix'd with the Greeks, we go with ill preface,
Flatter'd with hopes to glut our greedy rage:
Unknown, assailing whom we blindly meet,
And strew, with Grecian carcasses, the street.
Thus while their straggling parties we defeat,
Some to the shore and safer shores retreat:
And some, oppress'd with more ignoble fear,
Remount the hollow horse and pant in secret there.

But ah! what use of valour can be made,
When heaven's propitious powers refuse their aid
Behold the royal prophets, the fair
Cassandra, dragg'd by her dishevell'd hair;
Whom not Minerva's shrine, nor sacred bands,
In safety could protect from sacrilegious hands:
On heaven she cast her eyes, the sigh'd, the cry'd,
( 'Twas all she could ), her tender arms were ty'd.
So sad a sight Choroebus could not bear;
But, fir'd with rage, distracted with despair,
Amid the barbarous ravishers he flew;
Our leader's rash example we pursue;
But storms of stones, from the proud temple's
height,

Pour down, and on our batter'd helmets alight:
We from our friends receiv'd this fatal blow,
Who thought us Grecians, as we seem'd in show.
They aim at the mistaken crests, from high,
And ours beneath the ponderous ruin lie.
Then, mov'd with anger and disdain to see
Their troops dispers'd, the royal virgin free:
The Grecians rally, and their powers unite,
With fury charge us, and renew the fight.
The brother-kings with Ajax join their force,
And the whole squadron of Theſſalian horse.

Thus, when the rival winds their quarrel try,
Contending for the kingdom of the sky,
South, east, and west, on airy couriers borne,
The whirlwind gathers, and the woods are torn:
Then Nercus strikes the deep, the billows rise,
And, mix'd with ooze and sand, pollute the skies.
The troops we squander'd first, again appear
From several quarters, and inclose the rear.
They first observe, and to the rest betray,
Our different speech; our borrow'd arms survey.
Oppress'd with odds, we fall; Choroebus first,
At Pallas' altar, by Peneleus pierc'd.
Then Rypheus follow'd, in th' unequal fight;
Just of his word, observant of the right: [tends,
Heaven thought not so: Dymas their fate at-
With Hypanis, mistaken by their friends.
Nor Pantheus, thee, thy mire nor the bands
Of awful Phæbus, sav'd from impious hands.
Ye Trojan flames, your testimony bear
What I perform'd, and what I suffer'd there:
No sword avoiding in the fatal strife,
Expos'd to death, and prodigal of life.
Witness, ye heavens! I live not by my fault
I strove to have deserv'd the death I sought.
But when I could not fight, and would have dy'd,
Borne off to distance by the growing tide,
Old Iphitus and I were hurry'd thence,
With Pelias wounded, and without defence.
New clamours from th' invested palace ring;
We run to die, or disengage the king.
So hot th' assault, so high the tumult rose,
While ours defend, and while the Greeks oppose,

As all the Dardan and Argolic race
Had been contracted in that narrow space:
Or as all Ilium else were void of fear,
And tumult, war, and slaughter only there.
Their targets in a tortoise cast, the foes
Secure advancing, to the turrets rose:
Some mount the scaling-ladders; some, more bold,
Swerve upwards, and by posts and pillars hold:
Their left hand gripes their bucklers in th' ascent,
While with the right they seize the battlement.
From the demolish'd towers the Trojans throw
Huge heaps of stones, that, falling, crush the foe:
And heavy beams and rafters from the sides
(Such arms their last necessity provides):
And gilded roofs come tumbling from on high,
The marks of state and ancient royalty.
The guards below, fix'd in the pass, attend
I he charge undaunted, and the gate defend.
Renew'd in courage, with recover'd breath,
A second time we ran to tempt our death:
To clear the palace from the foe, succeed
The weary living, and revenge the dead.
A postern door, yet unobscur'd and free,
Join'd by the length of a blind gallery,
To the king's closet led, a way well known
To Hector's wife, while Priam held the throne:
Through which the brought Astyanax, unseen,
To cheer his grandfire and his grandfire's queen.
Through this we pass, and mount the tower, from whence,

With unavailing arms, the Trojans make defence.
From this the trembling king had oft deserv'd
The Grecian camp, and saw their navy ride.
Beams from his lofty height with swords we hew;
Then, wrenching with our hands, th' assault renew.

And, where the rafters on the columns meet,
We push them headlong with our arms and feet:
The lightning flies not swifter than the fall,
Nor thunder louder than the ruin'd wall:
Down goes the top at once; the Greeks beneath
Are peace-meal torn, or pounded into death.
Yet more succeed, and more to death are sent;
We cease not from above, nor they below relent.
Before the gate stood Pyrrhus, threatening loud,
With glittering arms conspicuous in the crowd.
So shines, renew'd in youth, the crested snake,
Who slept the winter in a thorny brake:
And, casting off his slough, when spring returns,
Now looks aloft, and with new glory burns:
Restor'd with poisonous herbs, his ardent sides
Reflect the sun, and, rais'd on spires, he rides;
High o'er the grass, hissing he rolls along,
And brandishes, by fits, his forked tongue.
Proud Periphas, and fierce Antemedon,
His father's charioteer, together run
To force the gate: the Scyrian infantry
Rush on in crowds, and the barr'd passage free.
Entering the court, with shouts the skies they rend,

And flaming firebrands to the roofs ascend.
Himself, among the foremost, deals his blows,
And, with his ax, repeated strokes bestows
On the strong doors: then all their shoulders ply,
Till from the posts the brazen hinges fly.
He hews apace, the double bars at length
Yield to his ax, and uncrested strength.

mighty breach is made; the rooms conceal'd appear, and all the palace is reveal'd.
 He calls of audience, and of public state,
 And where the lonely queen in secret fate.
 Arm'd soldiers now by trembling maids are seen,
 With not a door, and scarce a space between.
 The house is fill'd with loud laments and cries,
 And shrieks of women rend the vaulted skies.
 The fearful matrons run from place to place,
 And kiss the thresholds, and the posts embrace.
 The fatal work inhuman Pyrrhus plies,
 And all his father sparkles in his eyes.
 No bars, nor fighting guards, his force sustain;
 His bars are broken, and the guards are slain.
 He rushes the Greeks, and all th' apartments fill;
 Whose few defendants whom they find they kill.
 Not with so fierce a rage, the foaming flood
 Boars, when he finds his rapid course withstood:
 Hears down the dams with unresisted sway,
 And sweeps the cattle and the cots away.
 These eyes beheld him, when he march'd between

The brother-kings: I saw th' unhappy queen,
 The hundred wives, and where old Priam stood,
 To stain his hallow'd altar with his blood.
 The fifty nuptial beds (such hopes had he,
 So large a promise of a progeny).
 The posts of plated gold, and hung with spoils,
 Sell the reward of the proud victor's toils.
 Where'er the raging fire had left a space,
 The Grecians enter, and possess the place.
 Perhaps you may of Priam's fate inquire:
 He, when he saw his regal town on fire,
 His ruin'd palace, and his entering foes,
 On every side inevitable woes;
 In arms diffus'd, invests his limbs decay'd
 Like them, with age; a late and useless aid.
 His feeble shoulders scarce the weight sustain:
 Loaded, not arm'd, he creeps along with pain;
 Despairing of success: ambitious to be slain!
 Uncover'd but by heaven, there stood in view
 An altar; near the hearth a laurel grew,
 Dodder'd with age, whose boughs encompass
 round

The household gods, and shade the holy ground.
 Here Hecuba, with all her helpless train
 Of dames, for shelter sought, but fought in vain.
 Driven like a flock of doves along the sky,
 Their images they hug, and to their altars fly.
 The queen, when she beheld her trembling lord,
 And hanging by his side a heavy sword,
 What rage, she cry'd, has seiz'd my husband's mind;

What arms are these, and to what use design'd?
 These times want other aids: were Hector here,
 Ev'n Hector now in vain, like Priam, would appear.

With us, one common shelter thou shalt find,
 Or in one common fate with us be join'd.
 She said, and with a last salute embrac'd
 The poor old man, and by the laurel plac'd.
 Behold Polites, one of Priam's sons,
 Pursued by Pyrrhus, there for safety runs. [flies
 Through swords and foes, amaz'd and hurt he
 Through empty courts, and open galleries:
 Him Pyrrhus, urging with his lance, pursues,
 And often reaches, and his thrusts renews.

The youth transfix'd, with lamentable cries,
 Expires, before his wretched parents' eyes.
 Whom, gasping at his feet, when Priam saw,
 The fear of death gave place to nature's law.
 And, shaking more with anger than with age,
 The gods, said he, requite thy brutal rage:
 As sure they will Barbarian! sure they must,
 If there be gods in heaven, and gods be just:
 Who tak'st in wrongs an insolent delight,
 With a son's death t' infect a father's sight.
 Not he, whom thou and lying fame conspire
 To call thee his: not he, thy vaunted fire,
 Thus us'd my wretched age: the gods he fear'd,
 The laws of nature and of nations heard.
 He cheer'd my sorrows, and, for sums of gold,
 The bloodless carcase of my Hector fold.
 Pity'd the woes a parent underwent,
 And sent me back in safety from his tent.

This said, his feeble hand a javelin threw,
 Which, fluttering, seem'd to loiter as it flew:
 Just, and but barely, to the mark it held,
 And faintly tinkled on the brazen shield.

Then Pyrrhus thus: Go thou from me to fate;
 And to my father my foul deeds relate. [fire
 Now die: with that he dragg'd the trembling
 Sliddering through clotted blood and holy mire
 (The mingled paste his murder'd son had made),

Haul'd from beneath the violated shade,
 And on the sacred pile the royal victim laid.
 His right hand held his bloody saulchion bare;
 His left he twisted in his hoary hair:
 Then, with a speeding thrust, his heart he found: [wound,

The lukewarm blood came rushing through the
 And fanguine streams distain'd the sacred
 ground.

Thus Priam fell, and shar'd one common fate
 With Troy in ashes, and his ruin'd state:
 He, who the sceptre of all Asia sway'd,
 Whom monarchs, like domestic slaves, obey'd,
 On the bleak shore now lies th' abandon'd king.
 * A headless carcase, and a nameless thing.

Then, not before, I felt my curdled blood
 Congeal with fear, my hair with horror stood:
 My father's image fill'd my pious mind,
 Left equal years might equal fortune find.
 Again I thought on my forsaken wife,
 And trembled for my son's abandon'd life.
 I look'd about, but found myself alone,
 Deserted at my need, my friends were gone.
 Some spent with toil, some with despair oppress'd, Leap'd headlong from the heights; the flames
 consum'd the rest.

Thus, wandering in my way, without a guide,
 The graceless Helen in the porch I spy'd
 Of Vesta's temple; there she lurk'd alone;
 Muffled she sat, and, what she could, unknown:
 But, by the flames, that cast their blaze around,
 That common bane of Greece and Troy, I found.
 For Ilium burnt, she dreads the Trojan's sword;
 More dreads the vengeance of her injur'd lord;
 Ev'n by those gods, who refus'd her, abhorr'd.
 Trembling with rage, the strumpet I regard;
 Resolv'd to give her guilt the due reward.

* This whole line is taken from Sir John Denham;

Shall she triumphant fall before the wind,
 And leave in flames unhappy Troy behind?
 Shall she her kingdom and her friends review,
 In state attended with a captive crew;
 While unreveng'd the good old Priam falls,
 And Grecian fires consume the Trojan walls?
 For this the Phrygian fields and Xanthian flood Were swell'd with bodies, and were drunk with blood!

'Tis true, a soldier can small honour gain,
 And boast no conquest from a woman slain;
 Yet shall the fact not pass without applause,
 Of vengeance taken in so just a cause.
 The punish'd crime shall let my soul at ease:
 And murmuring manes of my friends appease.
 Thus while I rave, a gleam of pleasant light Spread o'er the place, and, shining heavenly bright,

My mother stood reveal'd before my sight.
 Never so radiant did her eyes appear;
 Nor her own star confess'd a light so clear.
 Great in her charms, as when the gods above
 She looks, and breathes herself into their love.
 She held my hand, the destin'd blow to break:
 Then, from her rosy lips, began to speak:
 My son, from whence this madness, this neglect
 Of my commands, and those whom I protect?
 Why this unmanly rage? recal to mind
 Whom you forsake, what pledges leave behind.
 Look if your hapless father yet survive;
 Or if Afcanius, or Creüsa, live.

Around your house the greedy Grecians err;
 And these had perish'd in the nightly war,
 But for my presence and protecting care.
 Not Helen's face, nor Paris, was in fault:
 But by the gods was this destruction brought.
 Now cast your eyes around; while I dissolve
 The mists and fogs that mortal eyes involve:
 Purge from your sight the dross, and make you see
 The shape of each avenging deity.

Enlighten'd thus, my just commands fulfil:
 Nor fear obedience to your mother's will.
 Where you disorder'd heap of ruin lies, [arise,
 Stones rent from stones, where clouds of dust
 Amid that smother, Neptune holds his place:
 Below the wall's foundation drives his mace:
 And heaves the building from the solid base.
 Look where, in arms, imperial Juno stands,
 Full in the Scæan gate, with loud commands,
 Urging on shore the tardy Grecian bands.
 See Pallas, of her snaky buckler proud,
 Bestrides the tower, resurgent through the cloud:
 See Jove new courage to the foe supplies,
 And arms against the town the partial deities.
 Haste hence, my son; this fruitless labour end:
 Haste where your trembling spouse and fire attend: [besfriend.

Haste, and a mother's care your passage shall
 She said: and swiftly vanish'd from my sight,
 Obscure in clouds, and gloomy shades of night.
 I look'd, I listen'd: dreadful sounds I hear;
 And the dire forms of hostile gods appear.
 Troy sunk in flames I saw, nor could prevent;
 And Ilium from its old foundations rent.
 Rent like a mountain ash, which dar'd the winds;
 And stood the sturdy strokes of labouring hinds:

About the roots the cruel ax resounds,
 The stumps are pierc'd with oft-repeated wound:
 The war is felt on high, the nodding crown
 Now threatens a fall, and throws the leafy honour
 down.

To their united force it yields, though late;
 And mourns, with mortal groans, th' approaching
 fate:

The roots no more their upper load sustain;
 But down she falls, and spreads a ruin through the plain. [fire

Descending thence, I 'scape through foes, and
 Before the goddesses, foes and flames retire.

Arriv'd at home, he for whose only sake,
 Or most for his, such toils I undertake,
 The good Anchises, whom, by timely flight,
 I purpos'd to secure on Ida's height,
 Refus'd the journey; resolute to die,
 And add his funerals to the fate of Troy:
 Rather than exile and old age sustain.
 Go you, whose blood runs warm in every vein:
 Had heaven decreed that I should life enjoy,
 Heaven had decreed to save unhappy Troy.
 'Tis sure enough, if not too much for one,
 Twice to have seen our Ilium overthrow'n.
 Make haste to save the poor remaining crew;
 And give this useless corpse a long adieu.
 These weak old hands suffice to stop my breath:
 At least the pitying foes will aid my death,
 To take my spoils: and leave my body bare:
 As for my sepulchre let heaven take care.
 'Tis long since I, for my celestial wife,
 Loath'd by the gods, have dragg'd a lingering life:

Since every hour and moment I expire,
 Blasted from heaven by Jove's avenging fire.

This oft repeated, he stood fix'd to die:
 Myself, my wife, my son, my family,
 Entreat, pray, beg, and raise a doleful cry.
 What, will he still persist, on death resolve,
 And in his ruin all his house involve?
 He still persists his reasons to maintain;
 Our prayers, our tears, our loud lamentations, are vain.

Urg'd by despair, again I go to try
 The fate of arms, resolv'd in fight to die.
 What hope remains, but what my death must
 Can I without so dear a father live? [give?]
 You term it prudence, what I baseness call:
 Could such a word from such a parent fall?
 If fortune please, and so the gods ordain,
 That nothing should of ruin'd Troy remain;
 And you conspire with fortune, to be slain;
 The way to death is wide, th' approaches near:
 For soon relentless Pyrrhus will appear,
 Reeking with Priam's blood: the wretch who flew

The son (inhuman) in the father's view,
 And then the fire himself to the dire altar drew.

O goddess-mother, give me back to fate;
 Your gift was undesir'd, and came too late.
 Did you for this, unhappy me convey
 Through foes and fires to see my house a prey?
 Shall I, my father, wife, and son, behold
 Weltering in blood, each other's arms infold?
 Haste! gird my sword, though spent and overcome:

'Tis the last summons to receive your doom.

I hear thee, fate, and I obey thy call:
 Not unreveng'd the foe shall see my fall.
 Restore me yet to the unfinished fight:
 My death is wanting to conclude the night.
 Arm'd once again, my glittering sword I wield! [shield: }
 While th' other hand sustains my weighty
 And forth I rush to seek th' abandon'd field. }
 I went; but sad Creüsa stopp'd my way,
 And, cross the threshold, in my passage lay;
 Embrac'd my knees; and when I would have
 gone,

Show'd me my feeble sire, and tender son.
 If death be your design, at least, said she,
 Take us along to share your destiny.
 If any further hopes in arms remain,
 This place, these pledges of your love maintain.
 To whom do you expose your father's life,
 Your son's, and mine, your now-forgotten wife!
 While thus she fills the house with clamorous cries,
 Our hearing is diverted by our eyes;
 For while I held my son, in the short space,
 Betwixt our kisses and our last embrace,
 Strange to relate, from young Iulus' head
 A lambent flame arose, which gently spread Around his brows, and on his temples fed. }
 Amaz'd, with running water we prepare
 To quench the sacred fire, and shake his hair;
 But old Anchises, vers'd in omens, rear'd
 His hand to heaven, and this request preferr'd:
 If any vows, almighty Jove, can bend
 Thy will, if piety can prayers commend,
 Confirm the glad presage which thou art pleas'd to send. }

Scarce had he said, when, on our left, we hear
 A peal of rattling thunder roll in air:
 There shot a streaming lamp along the sky,
 Which on the winged lightning seem'd to fly;
 From o'er the roof the blaze began to move;
 And trailing vanish'd in th' Idean grove.
 It swept a path in heaven, and shone a guide;
 Then in a steaming fench of sulphur dy'd.
 "The good old man with suppliant hands im-plor'd

The gods protection, and their star ador'd.
 Now, now, said he, my son, no more delay,
 I yield, I follow where heaven shows the way.
 Keep (O my country gods) our dwelling-place,
 And guard this relic of the Trojan race:
 This tender child; these omens are your own;
 And you can yet restore the ruin'd town.
 At least accomplish what your signs foreshow;
 I stand resign'd, and am prepar'd to go.

He said; the crackling flames appear on high,
 And driving sparkles dance along the sky.
 With Vulcan's rage the rising winds conspire;
 And near our palace rolls the flood of fire.
 Haste, my dear father ('tis no time to wait),
 And load my shoulders with a willing freight.
 What'e'r befalls, your life shall be my care,
 My death, or one deliverance, we will share.
 One hand shall lead our little son; and you,
 My faithful consort, shall our steps pursue.
 Next, you, my servants, heed my strict commands:
 Without the walls a ruin'd temple stands,
 To Ceres hallow'd once; a cypress high
 Shoots up her venerable head on high;

By long religion kept: there bend your feet;
 And, in divided parties, let us meet.
 Our country gods, the relics, and the bands,
 Hold you, my father, in your guiltless hands:
 In me 'tis impious holy things to bear,
 Red as I am with slaughter, new from war:
 Till, in some living stream, I cleanse the guilt
 Of dire debate, and blood in battle spilt.
 Thus, ordering all that prudence could provide,
 I clothe my shoulders with a lion's hide,
 And yellow spoils: then, on my bending back,
 The welcome load of my dear father take.
 While, on my better hand, Acanus hung.
 And, with unequal paces, tript along.
 Creüsa kept behind: by choice we stray
 Through every dark and every devious way.
 I, who so bold and dauntless, just before,
 The Grecian darts and shocks of lances bore,
 At every shadow now am seiz'd with fear:
 Not for myself, but for the charge I bear.
 Till near the ruin'd gate arriv'd at last,
 Secure, and deeming all the danger past,
 A frightful noise of trampling feet we hear;
 My father, looking through the shades with fear,
 Cry'd out, Haste, haste, my son, the foes are nigh;
 Their swords and shining armour I descry.
 Some hostile god, for some unknown offence,
 Had fur bereft my mind of better sense:
 For while, through winding ways, I took my
 flight,
 And sought the shelter of the gloomy night,
 Alas! I lost Creüsa: hard to tell
 If by her fatal destiny she fell,
 Or weary fate, or wander'd with affright;
 But she was lost for ever to my sight.
 I knew not, or reflected, till I meet
 My friends, at Ceres' now-deserted seat:
 We met: not one was wanting, only she
 Deceiv'd her friends, her son, and wretched me.
 What mad expressions did my tongue refuse!
 Whom did I not of gods or men accuse?
 This was the fatal blow, that pain'd me more
 Than all I felt from ruin'd Troy before.
 Stung with my loss, and raving with despair,
 Abandoning my now-forgotten care,
 Of counsel, comfort, and of hope bereft,
 My fire, my son, my country gods, I left.
 In shining armour once again I sheath
 My limbs, not feeling wounds, nor fearing death.
 Then headlong to the burning walls I run,
 And seek the danger I was forc'd to shun.
 I tread my former tracks: through night explore
 Each passage, every street I cross'd before.
 All things were full of horror and affright,
 And dreadful ev'n the silence of the night.
 Then to my father's house I make repair,
 With some small glimpse of hope to find her there:
 Instead of her, the cruel Greeks I met:
 The house was fill'd with foes, with flames beset.
 Driven on the wings of winds, whole sheets of fire,
 Through air transported, to the roofs aspire.
 From thence to Priam's palace I resort,
 And search the citadel, and desert court.
 Then, unobser'd, I pass'd by Juno's church;
 A guard of Grecians had possess'd the porch:
 There Phoenix and Ulysses watch the prey,
 And thither all the wealth of Troy convey.

The spoils which they from ransack'd houses brought,
And golden bowls from burning altars caught:
The tables of the gods, the purple vests,
The peoples' treasure, and the pomp of priests.
A rank of wretched youths, with pinion'd hands;
And captive matrons in long order stands.
Then, with ungovern'd madness, I proclaim,
Through all the silent streets, Creüsa's name.
Creüsa still I call: at length she hears:
And, sudden, through the shades of night appears.
Appears no more Creüsa, nor my wife,
But a pale spectre, larger than the life.
Aghast; astonish'd, and struck dumb with fear,
I stood; like bristles rose my stiffen'd hair,
Then thus the ghost began to soothe my grief:
Nor tears, nor cries, can give the dead relief;
Desist, my much-lov'd lord, t' indulge your pain:
You hear no more than what the Gods ordain.
My fates permit me not from hence to fly;
Nor he, the great comptroller of the sky.
Long wandering ways for you the powers decree:
On land hard labours; and a length of sea.
Then; after many painful years are past,
On Latium's happy shore you shall be cast:
Where gentle Tiber from his bed beholds
The flowery meadows, and the feeding folds.
There end your toils: and there your fates provide
A quiet kingdom; and a royal bride:

There fortune shall the Trojan line restore;
And you for lost Creüsa weep no more.
Fear not that I shall watch, with servile shame,
Th' imperious looks of some proud Grecian dame:
Or, stooping to the victor's lust, disgrace
My goddess-mother, or my royal race.
And now, farewell: the parent of the gods
Restrains my fleeting soul in her abodes:
I trust our common issue to your care.
She said: and gliding pass'd unseen in air:
I strove to speak, but horror ty'd my tongue;
And thrice about her neck my arms I flung:
And, thrice deceiv'd, on vain embraces hung.
Light as an empty dream at break of day,
Or as a blast of wind, she rush'd away.
Thus, having pass'd the night in fruitless pain,
I to my longing friends return again.
Amaz'd th' augmented number to behold,
Of men and matrons mix'd, of young and old:
A wretched exil'd crew together brought,
With arms appointed, and with treasure fraught.
Resolv'd, and willing under my command,
To run all hazards both of sea and land.
The morn began, from Ida, to display
Her rosy cheeks, and Phosphor led the day:
Before the gates the Grecians took their post:
And all pretence of late relief were lost.
I yield to fate, unwillingly retire,
And; loaded, up the hill convey my fire:

BOOK III.

THE ARGUMENT.

Aeneis proceeds in his relation: he gives an account of the fleet with which he sailed, and the success of his first voyage to Thrace; from thence he directs his course to Delos, and asks the oracle what place the Gods had appointed for his habitation? By a mistake of the oracle's answer, he settles in Crete: his household Gods give him the true sense of the oracle in a dream: he follows their advice, and makes the best of his way for Italy: he is cast on several shores, and meets with very surprising adventures, till at length he lands on Sicily; where his father Anchises dies. This is the place he was sailing from; when the tempest rose, and threw him upon the Carthaginian coast.

WHEN heaven had overturn'd the Trojan state,
And Priam's throne, by too severe a fate:
When ruin'd Troy became the Grecians prey,
And Ilium's lofty towers in ashes lay:
Warn'd by celestial omens, we retreat,
To seek in foreign lands a happier seat
Near old Antandros, and at Ida's foot,
The timber of the sacred groves we cut;
And build our fleet: uncertain yet to find
What place the gods for our repose assign'd.
Friends daily flock, and scarce the kindly spring
Began to clothe the ground, and birds to sing:
When old Anchises summon'd all to sea:
The crew, my father, and the fates obey.
With sighs and tears I leave my native shore,
And empty fields, where Ilium stood before.
My fire, my son, our leas, and greater gods,
All sail at once, and cleave the briny floods.

Against our coast appears a spacious land,
Which once the fierce Lycurgus did command:
Thracia the name; the people bold in war;
Vast are their fields, and tillage is their care.
A hospitable realm, while Fate was kind;
With Troy in friendship and religion join'd.
I land, with luckless omens; then adore
Their gods, and draw a line along the shore:
I lay the deep foundations of a wall:
And Enos, nam'd from me, the city call.
To Dionæan Venus vows are paid,
And all the powers that rising labours aid;
A bull on Jove's imperial altar laid.
Not far, a rising hillock stood in view;
Sharp myrtles, on the sides, and cornels grew.
There, while I went to crop the sylvan scenes,
And shade our altar with their leafy greens,

I pull'd a plant (with horror I relate
 A prodigy so strange, and full of fate);
 The rooted fibres rose; and from the wound
 Black bloody drops distill'd upon the ground.
 Mute, and amaz'd, my hair with terror stood;
 Fear shrank my sinews, and congeal'd my blood:
 Man'd once again, another plant I try,
 That other gush'd with the same sanguine dye.
 Then, fearing guilt for some offence unknown,
 With prayers and vows the Dryads I atone;
 With all the sisters of the woods, and most
 The god of arms, who rules the Thracian coast:
 That they, or he, these omens would avert;
 Release our fears, and better signs impart.
 Clear'd, as I thought, and fully fix'd; at length
 To learn the cause, I tugg'd with all my strength:
 I bent my knees against the ground; once more
 The violated rhytle ran with gore.
 Scarce dare I tell the sequel: from the womb
 Of wounded earth, and caverns of the tomb,
 A groan as of a troubled ghost renew'd
 My fright, and then these dreadful words ensued:
 Why dost thou thus my bury'd body rend?
 O spare the corpse of thy unhappy friend!
 Spare to pollute thy pious hands with blood:
 The tears distil not from the wounded wood;
 But every drop this living tree contains
 Is kindred blood, and ran in Trojan veins:
 O fly from this un hospitable shore,
 Warn'd by my fate; for I am Polydore!
 Here loads of lances in my blood embued,
 Again shoot upward, by my blood renew'd.

My faultering tongue and shivering limbs declare

My horror, and in bristles rose my hair.

When Troy with Grecian arms was closely
 pent,

Old Priam, fearful of the war's event,
 This hapless Polydore to Thracia sent.
 Loaded with gold, he sent his darling far
 From noise and tumults, and destructive war:
 Committed to the faithless tyrant's care:
 Who, when he saw the power of Troy decline,
 Forsook the weaker, with the strong to join:
 Broke every bond of nature and of truth:
 And murder'd, for his wealth, the royal youth.
 O sacred hunger of pernicious gold,
 What bands of faith can impious lucre hold!
 Now, when my soul had shaken off her fears,
 I call my father, and the Trojan peers:
 Relate the prodigies of heaven, require
 What he commands, and their advice desire.
 All vote to leave that execrable shore,
 Polluted with the blood of Polydore.
 But ere we sail, his funeral rites prepare;
 Then, to his ghost, a tomb and altars rear.
 In mournful pomp the matrons walk the round:
 With baleful cypress and blue fillets crown'd;
 With eyes dejected, and with hair unbound.
 Then bowls of tepid milk and blood we pour,
 And thrice invoke the soul of Polydore.

Now when the raging storms no longer reign;
 But southern gales invite us to the main;
 We launch our vessels with a prosperous wind;
 And leave the cities and the shores behind.

An island in th' Ægean main appears;
 Neptune and watery Doris claim it theirs.

It floated once, till Phœbus fix'd the sides
 To rooted earth, and now it braves the tides.
 Here, borne by friendly winds, we come ashore,
 With needful ease our weary limbs restore:
 And the sun's temple and his town adore.

Anius the priest, and king, with laurel crown'd,
 His hoary locks with purple fillets bound,
 Who saw my fire the Delian shore ascend,
 Came forth with eager haste to meet his friend:
 Invites him to his palace: and in sign
 Of ancient love, their plighted hands they join:
 Then to the temple of the god I went;
 And thus before the shrine my vows present:
 Give, O Thymbræus, give a resting-place
 To the sad relics of the Trojan race:
 A seat secure, a region of their own,
 A lasting empire, and a happier town.
 Where shall we fix, where shall our labours end,
 Whom shall we follow, and what fate attend?
 Let not my prayers a doubtful answer find,
 But in clear auguries unveil thy mind.
 Scarce had I said; he shook the holy ground,
 The laurels, and the lofty hills around:
 And from the tripos rush'd a bellowing sound.
 Prostrate we fell, confess'd the present god;
 Who give this answer from his dark abode:
 Undaunted youths, go seek that mother earth
 From which your ancestors derive their birth,
 The soil that sent you forth, her ancient race,
 In her old bosom, shall again embrace.
 Through the wide world th' Æneian house shall reign,

And childrens children shall the crown sustain.

Thus Phœbus did our future fates disclose:
 A mighty tumult, mix'd with joy, arose.

All are concern'd to know what place the god
 Assign'd, and where determin'd our abode.
 My father, long revolving in his mind
 The race and lineage of the Trojan kind,
 Thus answer'd their demands: ye princes, hear
 Your pleasing fortune; and dispel your fear.
 The fruitful isle of Crete, well known to fame,
 Sacred of old to Jove's imperial name,
 In the mid ocean lies with large command;
 And on its plains a hundred cities stand.
 Another Ida rises there; and we
 From thence derive our Trojan ancestry.
 From thence, as 'tis divulg'd by certain fame,
 To the Rhætean shores old Teucer came:
 There fix'd, and there the seat of empire chose,
 Ere Ilium and the Trojan towers arose.
 In humble vales they built their soft abodes,
 Till Cybele, the mother of the gods,
 With tinkling cymbals, charm'd th' Idæan
 woods.

She secret rites and ceremonies taught,
 And to the yoke the savage lions brought.
 Let us the land, which heaven appoints, explore;
 Appease the winds, and seek the Gnosian shore.
 If Jove assist the passage of our fleet,
 The third propitious dawn discovers Crete.
 Thus having said, the sacrifices laid
 On smoking altars to the gods he paid.
 A bull to Neptune, an oblation due,
 Another bull to bright Apollo slew:
 A milk-white ewe the western winds to please;
 And one coal black to calm the stormy seas.

Ere this, a flying rumour had been spread,
That fierce Idomencus from Crete was fled;
Expell'd and exil'd; that the coast was free
From foreign or domestic enemy:
We leave the Delian ports, and put to sea:
By Naxos, fam'd for vintage, make our way:
Then green Donyfa pass; and sail in sight
Of Paros isle, with marble quarries white.
We pass the scatter'd isles of Cyclades,
That scarce distinguish'd seem to stud the seas,
The shoats of sailors double near the shores;
They stretch their canvas, and they ply their oars.

All hands aloft; for Crete; for Crete, they cry,
And swiftly through the foamy billows fly.
Full on the promis'd land at length we bore,
With joy descending on the Cretan shore.
With eager haste a rising town I frame,
Which from the Trojan Pergamus I name:
The name itself was grateful; I exhort
To found their houses, and erect a fort.
Our ships are haul'd upon the yellow strand.
The youth begin to till the labour'd land.
And I myself new marriages promote,
Give laws; and dwellings I divide by lot.
When rising vapours choke the wholesome air,
And blasts of noisome winds corrupt the year:
The trees, devouring caterpillars burd:
Parch'd was the grais, and blighted was the corn.
Nor scape the beasts: for Sirius from on high
With pestilential heat infects the sky:
My men, some fall, the rest in fevers fry.
Again my father bids me seek the shore
Of sacred Delos and the god implore:
To learn what end of woes we might expect,
And to what clime our weary course direct.

'Twas night, when every creature, void of cares,

The common gift of balmy slumber shares:
The statues of my gods (for such they seem'd)
Those gods whom I from flaming Troy redeem'd,
Before me stood; majestically bright,
Full in the beams of Phœbe's entering light.
Then thus they spoke; and eas'd my troubled
mind:

What from the Delian god thou go'st to find,
He tells thee here; and sends us to relate:
Those powers are we, companions of thy fate,
Who from the burning town by thee were
brought;

Thy fortune follow'd, and thy safety wrought.
Through seas and lands as we thy steps attend,
So shall our care thy glorious race besield.
An ample realm for thee thy fates ordain;
A town, that o'er the conquer'd world shall reign.
Thou mighty walls for mighty nations build;
Nor let thy weary mind to labours yield:
But change thy seat; for not the Delian god,
Nor we, have given thee Crete for our abode.
A land there is, Hesperia call'd of old,
The soil is fruitful, and the natives bold.
Th' Oenotrians held it once, thy later fame,
Now call'd Italia from the leader's name.
Talus there, and Dardanus were born:
From thence we came, and thither must return.
Rise, and thy sire with these glad tidings greet;
Sear'd Italy, for Jove denies thee Crete.

Agonish'd at their voices, and their sight,
(Nor were they dreams, but visions of the night)
I saw, I knew their faces, and descri'd
In perfect view their hair with fillets ty'd;
I started from my couch, and clammy sweat
On all my limbs and shivering body sate.
To heaven I lift my hands with pious haste,
And sacred incense in the flames I cast.
Thus to the gods their perfect honours done,
More cheerful to my good old sire I run,
And tell the pleasing news: in little space
He found his error of the double race.

Not, as before he deem'd, deriv'd from Crete
No more deluded by the doubtful seat.
Then said, O son! turmoil'd in Trojan fate,
Such things as these Cassandra did relate:
This day revives within my mind, what she Foretold of Troy renew'd in Italy, And Latian lands: but who could then have thought

That Phrygian gods to Latium should be brought?
Or who believ'd what mad Cassandra taught?
Now let us go, where Phœbus leads the way,
He said, and we with glad consent obey;
For sake the feat; and, leaving few behind;
We spread our sails before the willing wind.
Now from the sight of land our gallees move,
With only seas around, and skies above.
When o'er our heads descends a burst of rain,
And night, with sable clouds, involves the main;
The rustling winds the foamy billows raise;
The scatter'd fleet is forc'd to several ways;
The face of heaven is ravish'd from our eyes,
And, in redoubled peals, the roaring thunder flies.
Cast from our course, we wander in the dark;
No stars to guide, no point of land to mark.

Ev'n Palinurus no distinction found [around.
Betwixt the night and day, such darkness reign'd
Three starless nights the doubtful navy frays
Without distinction, and three sunless days.
The fourth renews the light, and, from our shrouds,
We view a rising land like distant clouds:
The mountain-tops confirm the pleasing sight,
And curling smoke ascending from their height.
The canvas falls, their oars the sailors ply,
From the rude strokes the whirling waters fly.
At length I land upon the Strophades,
Safe from the danger of the stormy seas:
Those isles are compass'd by th' Ionian main,
The dire abode where the foul harpies reign:
Forc'd by the winged warriors to repair
To their old homes, and leave their costly fare,
Monsters more fierce, offended heaven ne'er sent
From hell's abyss, for human punishment.
With virgin-faces, but with wombs obscene,
Foul panaches, and with ordure still unclean:
With claws for hands, and looks for ever lean.
We landed at the port, and soon beheld
Fat herds of oxen graze the flowery field:
And wanton goats without a keeper stray'd;
With weapons we the welcome prey invade.
Then call the gods for partners of our feast:
And Jove himself the chief invitèd guest.
We spread the tables on the greenward ground:
We feed with hunger, and the bowls go round:
When from the mountain tops, with hideous cry,
And clattering wings, the hungry harpies fly:

They snatch the meat, desiling all they find;
 And, parting, leave a loathsome stench behind.
 Lose by a hollow rock again we sit,
 Few dress the dinner, and the beds rest;
 Secure from sight, beneath a pleasing shade,
 Where tasted trees a native arbour made.
 Again the holy fires on altars burn,
 And once again the ravenous birds return:
 From the dark recesses where they lie,
 From another quarter of the sky;
 With filthy claws their odious meal repeat,
 And mix their loathsome ordures with their meat.
 Bid my friends for vengeance then prepare,
 And with the hellish nation wage the war.
 Hey, as commanded, for the fight provide,
 And in the grass their glittering weapons hide:
 When, along the crooked shore we hear
 Their clattering wings, and saw the foes appear,
 Alas! our tongues a charge: we take th' alarm,
 And our strong hands with swords and bucklers arm.

This new kind of combat all employ
 Their utmost force the monsters to destroy.
 In vain; the fated skin is proof to wounds:
 And, from their plumes, the shining sword rebounds.

Length, rebuff'd, they leave their mangled
 And their stretch'd pinions to the skies display.
 Yet one remain'd the messenger of Fate,
 High on a craggy cliff Cæleus fate,
 And thus her dismal errand did relate:
 That, not contented with our oxen slain,
 Are you with heaven an impious war maintain,
 And drive the harpies from their native reign?
 And, therefore, what I say, and keep in mind
 What Jove decrees, what Phœbus has design'd:
 And I, the Fury's queen, from both relate;
 Do seek th' Italian shores, fore doom'd by fate:
 If Italian shores are granted you to find,
 And a safe passage to the port assign'd.
 I know, that ere your promis'd walls you build,
 And curses shall severely be fulfill'd.

And since famine is your lot, for this misdeed,
 Due'd to grind the plates on which you feed.
 As said, and to the neighbouring forest flew:
 Your courage fails us, and our fears renew.
 We seek to win by war, to prayers we fall,
 And on th' offended harpies humbly call.
 And whether gods or birds obscene they were,
 We pray for pardon and for peace prefer.
 And old Anchises, offering sacrifice,
 And lifting up to heaven his hands and eyes,
 And the greater gods: Avert, said he,
 These omens; render vain this prophecy;
 And, from th' impending curse, a pious people
 free.

As having said, he bids us put to sea;
 And loose from shore our haufers and obey,
 And soon, with swelling sails, pursue our watery way.

And next our course Zacynthian woods appear;
 And next by rocky Neritos we steer:
 And fly from Ithaca's detested shore,
 And curse the land which dire Ulysses bore.
 Length Leucate's cloudy top appears,
 And the sun's temple, which the sailor fears.

Resolv'd to breathe a while from labour past,
 Our crooked anchors from the prow we cast,
 And joyful to the little City haste.
 Here safe, beyond our hopes, our vows we pay
 To Jove, the guide and patron of our way.
 The customs of our country we pursue,
 And Trojan games on Ælian shores renew.
 Our youth their naked limbs besmeared with oil,
 And exercise the wrestlers noble toil.
 Pleas'd to have sail'd so long before the wind,
 And left so many Grecian towns behind.
 The sun had now fulfill'd his annual course,
 And Boreas on the seas display'd his force:
 I fix'd upon the temple's lofty door
 The brazen shield which vanquish'd Abas bore:
 The verse beneath my name and action speaks,
 These arms Æneas took from conquering Greeks.
 Then I command to weigh; the seamen ply
 Their sweeping oars, the smoking billows fly.
 The sight of high Phœacia soon we lost,
 And skim'd along Epirus' rocky coast.
 Then to Chaonia's port our course we bend,
 And, landed, to Buthrotus' heights ascend.
 Her wondrous things were loudly blaz'd by fame,
 How Helenus feign'd the Trojan name,
 And reign'd in Greece: That Priam's captive son
 Succeeded Pyrrhus in his bed and throne.
 And fair Andromache, restor'd by fate;
 Once more was happy in a Trojan mate.
 I leave my gallees riding in the port,
 And long to see the new Dardanian court.
 By chance, the mournful queen, before the gate,
 Then solemniz'd her former husband's fate.
 Green altars, rais'd of turf, with gifts she crown'd
 And sacred priests in order stand around,
 And thrice the name of hapless Hector sound.
 The grove itself resembles Ida's wood,
 And Simois seem'd the well-dissembled flood.
 But when, at nearer distance, she beheld
 My shining armour, and my Trojan shield,
 Astonish'd at the sight, the vital heat
 Forsakes her limbs, her veins no longer beat:
 She faints, she falls; and, scarce recovering
 strength,

Thus, with a faltering tongue, she speaks at

Are you alive, O goddess-born! she said,
 Or if a ghost, then where is Hector's shade?
 At this she cast a loud and frightful cry:
 With broken words I made this brief reply:
 All of me that remains appears in sight.
 I live; if living be to loath the light.
 No phantom; but I drag a wretched life;
 My fate resembling that of Hector's wife.
 What have you suffer'd since you lost your lord?
 By what strange blessings are you now restor'd?
 Still are you Hector's, or is Hector fled,
 And his remembrance lost in Pyrrhus' bed?
 With eyes dejected, in a lowly tone,
 After a modest pause, she thus began:
 Oh only happy maid of Priam's race,
 Whom death deliver'd from the foes embrace!
 Commanded on Achilles' tomb to die,
 Not forc'd, like us, to hard captivity;
 Or in a haughty master's arms to lie
 In Grecian ships unhappy we were borne:
 Endur'd the victor's lust; sustain'd the scorn:

Thus I submitted to the lawless pride
 Or Pyrrhus, more a handmaid than a bride.
 Cloy'd with possession, he forsook my bed,
 And Helen's lovely daughter bought to wed.
 Then me to Trojan Helenus resign'd
 And his two slaves in equal marriage join'd.
 Till young Ortesus, pierc'd with deep despair,
 And longing to redeem the promis'd fair,
 Before Apollo's altar slew the ravisher.
 By Pyrrhus' death the kingdom we regain'd :
 At least one half with Helenus remain'd ;
 Our part, from Chaon, he Chaonia calls :
 And names, from Pergamus, his rising walls.
 But you, what Fates have landed on our coast,
 What gods have sent you, or what storms have tois'd ?

Does young Ascanius life and health enjoy,
 Sav'd from the ruins of unhappy Troy ?
 O tell me how his mother's loins he bears,
 What hopes are promis'd from his blooming years,
 How much of Hector in his face appears ?
 She spoke : and mix'd her speech with mournful
 cries :

And fruitless tears came trickling from her eyes.
 At length her lord descends upon the plain,
 In pomp attended with a numerous train :
 Receives his friends, and to the city leads,
 And tears of joy amidst his welcome sheds.
 Proceeding on, another Troy I see ;
 Or, in less compass, Troy's epitome.
 A rivulet by the name of Xanthus ran :
 And I embrace the Scæan gate again.
 My friends in porticos were entertain'd,
 And feasts and pleasures through the city reign'd.
 The tables fill'd the spacious halls around,
 And golden bowls with sparkling wine were
 crown'd.

Two days we pass'd in mirth, till friendly gales,
 Blown from the south, supply'd our swelling sails.

Then to the royal seer I thus began :
 O thou who know'st, beyond the reach of man,
 The laws of heaven, and what the stars decree,
 Whom Phœbus taught unerring prophecy,
 From his own tripod, and his holy tree :
 Skill'd in the wing'd inhabitants of air,
 What auspices their notes and flights declare :
 O say ; for all religious rites portend
 A happy voyage and a prosperous end ;
 And every power and omen of the sky
 Direct my course for destin'd Italy.
 But only dire Celeno, from the gods,
 A dismal famine fatally forebodes :
 O say what dangers I am first to shun,
 What toils to vanquish, and what course to run.

The prophet first with sacrifice adores
 The greater gods ; their pardon then implores :
 Unbinds the fillet from his holy head ;
 To Phœbus next my trembling steps he led,
 Full of religious doubts and awful dread.
 Then, with his god possess'd, before the shrine,
 These words proceeded from his mouth divine :
 O goddess-born (for heaven's appointed will,
 With greater auspices of good than ill,
 Fore-shows thy voyage, and thy course directs ;
 Thy fates conspire, and Jove himself protects) :

Of many things, some few I shall explain,
 Teach thee to shun the dangers of the main,
 And how at length the promis'd shore to gain.
 The rest the Fates from Helenus conceal ;
 And Juno's angry power forbids to tell.
 First then, that happy shore, that seems so nigh,
 Will far from you deluded wishes fly :
 Long tracts of seas divide your hopes from Italy.
 For you must cruise along Sicilian shores,
 And stem the currents with your struggling oars :
 Then round th' Italian coast your navy steer,
 And, after this, to Circe's island veer.
 And last, before your new foundations rise, [skies
 Must pass the Stygian lake, and view the nether
 Now mark the signs of future ease and rest,
 And bear them safely treasur'd in thy breast.
 When, in the shady shelter of a wood,
 And near the margin of a gentle flood,
 Thou shalt behold a fow upon the ground,
 With thirty sucking young encompass'd round ;
 The dam and offspring, white as falling snow :
 These on thy city shall their name bestow,
 And there shall end thy labour and thy woe.
 Nor let the threaten'd famine fright thy mind,
 For Phœbus will assist, and fate the way will find.
 Let not thy course to that ill coast be bent,
 Which fronts from far th' Epirian continent ;
 Those parts are all by Grecian foes possess'd :
 The savage Locrians here the shores infest.
 There fierce Idomenus his city builds,
 And guards, with arms, the Salentinian fields.
 And on the mountain's brow Petilia stands,
 Which Philoctetes with his troops commands.
 Ev'n when thy fleet is landed on the shore,
 And priests with holy vows the gods adore ;
 Then with a purple veil involve your eyes ;
 Let hostile faces blast the sacrifice.
 These rites and customs to the rest commend,
 That to your pious race they may descend.

When parted hence, the wind that ready waits
 For Sicily, shall bear you to the straits :
 Where proud Pelorus opens a wider way,
 Tack to the larboard, and stand off to sea :
 Veer starboard sea and land. Th' Italian shore,
 And fair Sicilia's coast were one, before
 An earthquake caus'd the flaw, the roaring tides
 The passage broke, that land from land divides :
 And where the lands retir'd, the rushing ocean rides.

Distinguish'd by the straits, on either hand,
 Now rising cities in long order stand,
 And fruitful fields (so much can time invade
 The mouldering work that beauteous nature
 made).

Far on the right, her dogs foul Scylla hides :
 Charybdis roaring on the left presides ;
 And in her greedy whirlpool sucks the tides :
 Then spouts them from below ; with fury driven,
 The waves mount up, and wall the face of heaven.
 But Scylla from her den, with open jaws,
 The sinking vessel in her eddy draws ;
 Then dashes on the rocks : a human face,
 And virgin-bosom, hides her tail's disgrace.
 Her parts obscene below the waves descend,
 With dogs inclos'd, and in a dolphin end.
 'Tis safer, then, to bear aloof to sea,
 And coast Pachynus, though with more delay :

chance to view mishapen Scylla near,
 and the loud yell of watery wolves to hear.
 Besides, if faith to Helenus be due,
 and if prophetic Phœbus tell me true,
 I not this precept of your friend forget :
 which therefore more than once I must repeat.
 Above the rest, great Juno's name adore :
 thy vows to Juno ; Juno's aid implore.
 thy gifts be to the mighty queen design'd ;
 and mollify with prayers her haughty mind,
 thus, at the length, your passage shall be free,
 and you shall safe descend on Italy.
 arriv'd at Cumæ ; when you view the flood,
 of black Avernus, and the sounding wood,
 he mad prophetic sibyl you shall find,
 who in a cave, and on a rock reclin'd,
 she sings the fates, and in her frantic fits,
 she notes and names inscrib'd, to leaves commits.
 that she commits to leaves, in order laid,
 before the cavern's entrance are display'd :
 remov'd they lie : but if a blast of wind without, or vapours issue from behind,
 she leaves are borne aloft in liquid air,
 and she resumes no more her useful care :
 or gathers from the rocks her scatter'd verse :
 or sets in order what the winds disperse.
 thus, many not succeeding, most upbraid her madness of the visionary maid ; and, with loud curses, leave the mystic shade. }
 Think it not loss of time a while to stay ;
 though thy companions chide thy long delay :
 though summon'd to the seas, though pleasing gales
 invite thy course, and stretch thy swelling sails, let beg the sacred priestess to relate with swelling words, and not to write thy fate.
 see fierce Italian people she will show ;
 and all thy wars and all thy future woe ;
 and what thou may'st avoid, and what must } undergo.
 she shall direct thy course ; instruct thy mind ;
 and teach thee how the happy shores to find,
 as is what heaven allows me to relate :
 how part in peace ; pursue thy better fate, } and raise, by strength of arms, the Trojan
 state ;
 This when the priest with friendly voice de-clar'd,
 he gave me license, and rich gifts prepar'd :
 bounteous of treasure, he supply'd my want with heavy gold, and polish'd elephant.
 when Dodonæan caldrons put on board,
 and every ship with sums of silver stor'd.
 a trusty coat of mail to me he sent,
 a price chain'd with gold, for use and ornament :
 he helm of Pyrrhus added to the rest,
 when flourish'd with a plume and waving crest.
 when was my fire forgotten, nor my friends ;
 and large recruits he to my navy sends ;
 men, horses, captains ; arms, and warlike stores :
 supplies new pilots, and new sweeping oars.
 when time my fire commands to hoist our sails ;
 if we should lose the first auspicious gales.
 he prophet blest the parting crew : and last,
 with words like these, his ancient friend emphatically happy man, the care of gods above, [brac'd :
 whom heavenly Venus honour'd with her love,

And twice preserv'd thy life when Troy was lost ;
 Behold from far the wish'd Aonian coast :
 There land ; but take a larger compass round ;
 For that before is all forbidden ground.
 The shore that Phœbus has design'd for you,
 At farther distance lies, conceal'd from view.
 Go happy hence, and seek your new abodes ;
 Blest in a son, and favour'd by the gods :
 For I with useless words prolong your stay ;
 When southern gales have summon'd you away.
 Nor less the queen our parting thence deplor'd ;
 Nor was less bounteous than her Trojan lord.
 A noble present to my son she brought,
 A robe with flowers on golden tissue wrought ;
 A Phrygian vest ; and loads, with gifts beside
 Of precious texture, and of Asian pride.
 Accept, she said, these monuments of love ;
 Which in my youth with happier hands I wove :
 Regard these trifles for the giver's sake ;
 'Tis the last present Hector's wife can make.
 Thou call'st my lost Astyanax to mind :
 In thee his features and his form I find.
 His eyes so sparkled with a lively flame ;
 Such were his motions, such was all his frame ;
 And, ah ! had heaven so pleas'd, his years had been the same. }

With tears I took my last adieu, and said,
 Your fortune, happy fair, already made,
 Leaves you no farther wish : my different state,
 Avoiding one, incurs another fate.
 To you a quiet seat the gods allow,
 You have no shores to search, no seas to plow,
 Nor fields of flying Italy to chase :
 (Deluding visions, and a vain embrace !)
 You see another Simois, and enjoy
 The labour of your hands, another Troy ;
 With better auspice than her ancient towers ;
 And less obnoxious to the Grecian powers.
 If e'er the gods, whom I with vows adore,
 Conduct my steps to Tiber's happy shore :
 If ever I ascend the Latian throne,
 And build a city I may call my own,
 As both of us our birth from Troy derive,
 So let our kindred lines in concord live ;
 And both in acts of equal friendship strive.
 Our fortunes, good or bad, shall be the same,
 The double Troy shall differ but in name :
 That what we now begin, may never end ;
 But long, to late posterity descend.

Near the Ceraunian rocks our course we bore
 (The shortest passage to th' Italian shore).
 Now had the sun withdrawn his radiant light,
 And hills were hid in dusky shades of night,
 We land : and, on the bosom of the ground,
 A safe retreat and a bare lodging found ;
 Close by the shore we lay ; the sailors keep
 Their watches, and the rest securely sleep.
 The night, proceeding on with silent pace,
 Stood in her noon, and view'd with equal face
 Her steepy rise, and her declining race.
 Then wretched Palinurus rose, to spy
 The face of heaven, and the nocturnal sky ;
 And listen'd every breath of air to try :
 Observes the stars, and notes their sliding course,
 The Pleiads, Hyads, and their watery force ;
 And both the bears is careful to behold ;
 And bright Orion arm'd with burnish'd gold.

Then, when he saw no threatening tempest nigh,
 But a sure promise of a fettle sky;
 He gave the sign to weigh: we break our sleep;
 Forake the pleasing shore, and plow the deep.
 And now the rising morn, with rosy light,
 Adorns the skies, and puts the stars to flight:
 When we from far, like bluish mists, descry
 The hills, and then the plains of Italy.
 Achates first pronounc'd the joyful sound;
 Then Italy the cheerful crew rebound;
 My sire Anchises crown'd a cup with wine,
 And offering, thus implor'd the powers divine:
 Ye gods, presiding over lands and seas,
 And you who raging winds and waves appease,
 Breathe on our swelling sails a prosperous wind,
 And smooth our passage to the port assign'd.
 The gentle gales their flagging force renew;
 And now the happy harbour is in view.
 Minerva's temple then salutes our sight;
 Plac'd as a land-mark, on the mountain's height;
 We furl our sails, and turn the prows to shore;
 The curling waters round the galleys roar;
 The land lies open to the raging east,
 Then, bending like a bow, with rocks compress'd,
 Shuts out the storms; the winds and waves com-
 And vent their malice on the cliffs in vain. [plain,
 The port lies hid within; on either side
 To distance flies, and seems to shun the shore.
 Scarce landed, the first omens I beheld. [field.
 Were four white steeds that cropp'd the flowery
 War, war is threaten'd from this foreign ground,
 (My father cry'd) where warlike steeds are found.
 Yet, since reclaim'd to chariots they submit,
 And bend to stubborn yokes, and champ the bit,
 Peace may succeed to war Our way we bend
 To Pallas, and the sacred hills ascend.
 There prostrate to the fierce virago pray;
 Whose temple was the land-mark of our way.
 Each with a Phrygian mantle veil'd his head; }
 And all commands of Helenus obey'd; }
 And pious rites to Grecian Juno paid. }
 These dues perform'd, we stretch our sails, and
 To sea, forsaking that suspected land. [strand
 From hence Tarentum's bay appears in view;
 For Hercules renown'd, if fame be true.
 Just opposite, Lacinian Juno stands:
 Caulonian towers, and Scylacæan straits [spy,
 For shipwrecks fear'd: Mount Ætna thence we Known by the smoky flames which cloud the sky.
 Far off we hear the waves with furly sound
 Invade the rocks, the rocks their groans rebound.
 The billows break upon the sounding strand;
 And roll the rising tide, impure with sand.
 Then thus Anchises, in experience old,
 'Tis that Charybdis which the seer foretold:
 And those the promis'd rocks; bear off to sea:
 With haste the frighted mariners obey.
 First Palinurus to the larboard veer'd:
 Then all the fleet by his example steer'd.
 To heaven aloft on ridgy waves we ride;
 Then down to hell descend, when they divide.
 And thrice our gallees knock'd the stony ground,
 And thrice the hollow rocks return'd the sound, }
 And thrice we saw the stars, that stood with dew around.

The flagging winds forsook us with the sun;
 And, weary'd, on Cyclopean shores we run.
 The port capacious, and secure from wind,
 Is to the foot of thundering Ætna join'd.
 By turns a pitchy cloud the rolls on high;
 By turns hot embers from her entrails fly;
 And flakes of mounting flames, that lick the sky.
 Oft from her bowels massy rocks are thrown,
 And shiver'd by the force come piece-meal down
 Oft liquid lakes of burning sulphur flow,
 Fed from the fiery springs that boil below.
 Enceladus, they say, transix'd by Jove,
 With blasted limbs came trembling from above
 And where he fell, th' avenging father drew
 This flaming hill, and on his body threw:
 As often as he turns his weary sides, [hid
 He shakes the solid idle, and smoke the heave
 In shady woods we pass the tedious night,
 Where bellowing sounds and groans our souls af-
 Of which no cause is offer'd to the sight, [fright;
 For not one star was kindled in the sky;
 Nor could the moon her borrow'd light supply:
 For mighty clouds involv'd the firmament;
 The stars were muffled, and the moon was pent.
 Scarce had the rising sun the day reveal'd;
 Scarce had his heat the pearly dews dispell'd;
 When from the woods their bolts, before our sight
 Somewhat betwixt a mortal and a fright.
 So thin, so ghastly meagre, and so wan,
 So bare of flesh, he scarce resembled man,
 This thing, all tatter'd, seem'd from far t' implo
 Our pious aid, and pointed to th' shore.
 We look behind; then view his saggy beard;
 His clothes were tagg'd with thorns, and silt limbs besmear'd;
 The rest, in mien, in habit, and in face,
 Appear'd a Greek, and such indeed he was.
 He cast on us, from far, a frightful view,
 Whom soon for Trojans and for foes he knew:
 Stood still, and paus'd; thence all at once began
 To stretch his limbs, and trembled as he ran.
 Soon as approach'd, upon his knees he falls,
 And thus, with tears and sighs, for pity calls:
 Now by the powers above, and what we share
 From nature's common gift, this vital air,
 O Trojans, rake me hence; I beg no more,
 But bear me far from this unhappy shore!
 'Tis true, I am a Greek, and farther own,
 Among your foes besieg'd th' imperial town;
 For such demerits if my death be due,
 No more for this abandon'd life I sue:
 This only favour let my tears obtain,
 To throw me headlong in the rapid main:
 Since nothing more than death my crime demands
 I die content, to die by human hands.
 He said, and on his knees my knees embrac'd:
 I bade him boldly tell his fortune past;
 His present state, his lineage, and his name;
 Th' occasion of his fears, and whence he came.
 The good Anchises rais'd him with his hand;
 Who, thus encourag'd, answer'd our demand:
 From Ithaca my native soil I came
 To Troy, and Achæmenides my name.
 Me, my poor father with Ulysses sent;
 (Oh had I stay'd with poverty content )
 But, fearful for themselves, my countrymen
 Left me forsaken in the Cyclops' den,

the cave, though large, was dark; the dismal floor
 as pav'd with mangled limbs and putrid gore.
 A monstrous hoit, of more than human size,
 reflects his head, and stares within the skies,
 Following his voice, and horrid is his hue.
 O gods, remove this plague from mortal view!
 The joints of slaughter'd wretches are his food:
 And for his wine he quaffs the streaming blood.
 These eyes beheld, when with his spacious hand
 He seiz'd two captives of our Grecian band;
 Stretch'd on his back, he dash'd against the stones
 Their broken bodies, and their crackling bones:
 With spouting blood the purple pavement swims,
 While the dire glutton grinds the trembling limbs.
 Not unreng'd, Ulysses bore their fate,
 Or thoughtless of his own unhappy state;
 Or, gorg'd with flesh, and drunk with human Milk fast asleep the giant lay supine: [wine, roaring aloud, and belching from his maw
 His indigested foam, and morsels raw:
 He pray, we cast the lots, and then surround
 The monstrous body, stretch'd along the ground:
 As he could approach him, lends a hand
 To bore his eye-ball with a flaming brand:
 Beneath his frowning forehead lay his eye
 (Or only one did the vast frame supply);
 That a globe so large, his front it fill'd,
 Like the sun's disk, or like a Grecian shield.
 The stroke succeeds; and down the pupil bends;
 His vengeance follow'd for our slaughter'd friends.
 It haste, unhappy wretches, haste to fly;
 Our cables cut, and on your oars rely.
 Rich and so vast as Polypheme appears,
 A hundred more this hated island bears:
 Like him, in caves they shut their woolly sheep;
 Like him, their herds on tops of mountains keep;
 Like him, with mighty strides, they stalk from Sleep to sleep. }
 And now three moons their sharpen'd horns renew,
 Since thus in woods and wilds, obscure from view,
 I drag my loathsome days with mortal fright;
 And, in deserted caverns, lodge by night.
 From the rocks a dreadful prospect see
 Of the huge Cyclops, like a walking tree:
 As soon as I hear his thundering voice rebound;
 And trampling feet that shake the solid ground.
 Ornel and savage berries of the wood,
 And roots and herbs, have been my meagre food.
 While all around my longing eyes are cast,
 I saw my happy ships appear at last:
 In those I fix'd my hopes, to these I run,
 'Tis all I ask, this cruel race to shun:
 What other death you please yourselves, bestow.
 I scarce had he said, when, on the mountains brow,
 I saw the giant-shepherd stalk before
 A following flock, and leading to the shore.
 A monstrous bulk, deform'd, depriv'd of sight,
 Is staff a trunk of pine to guide his steps aright.
 A ponderous whistle from his neck descends;
 Is woolly care their pensive lord attends: }
 His only solace his hard fortune sends.
 As soon as he reach'd the shore, and touch'd the Waves,
 From his bor'd eye the guttering blood he laves:
 He gnash'd his teeth and groan'd; through seas
 He strides,
 And scarce the topmast billows touch his sides.

Seiz'd with a sudden fear, we run to sea,
 The cables cut, and silent haste away:
 The well-deserving stranger entertain;
 Then, buckling to the work, our oars divide the
 main.

The giant hearken'd to the dashing sound:
 But when our vessels out of reach he found,
 He strided onward; and in vain essay'd
 Th' Ionian deep, and durst no farther wade.
 With that he roar'd aloud: the dreadful cry
 Shakes earth, and air, and seas; the billows fly, }
 Before the bellowing noise, to distant Italy.
 The neighbouring Ætna trembling all around:
 The winding caverns echo to the sound.
 His brother Cyclops hear the yelling roar;
 And, rushing down the mountains, crowd the shore.

We saw their stern distorted looks from far.
 And one-ey'd glance, that vainly threaten'd war.
 A dreadful council with their heads on high;
 The misty clouds about their foreheads fly:
 Not yielding to the towering tree of Jove,
 Or tallest cypress of Diana's grove.
 New pangs of mortal fear our minds assail,
 We tug at every oar, and hoist up every sail; }
 And take th' advantage of the friendly gale.
 Forewarn'd by Helenus, we strive to shun
 Charybdis' gulf, nor dare to Scylla run.
 An equal fate on either side appears;
 We, tacking to the left, are free from fears:
 For from Pelorus' point, the north arose,
 And drove us back where swift Pantagias flows.
 His rocky mouth we pass, and make our way
 By Thapsus, and Megara's winding bay;
 This passage Achæmenides had shown,
 Tracing the course, which he before had run.
 Right o'er against Plemmyrium's watery strand
 There lies an isle, once call'd th' Ortygian land:
 Alpheus, as old fame reports, has found
 From Greece a secret passage under ground:
 By love to beautiful Arethusa led,
 And mingling here, they roll in the same sacred bed.

As Helenus enjoin'd, we next adore
 Diana's name, protectress of the shore.
 With prosperous gales we pass the quiet sounds
 Of still Elorus, and his fruitful bounds.
 Then doubling Cape Pachynus, we survey
 The rocky shore extended to the sea.
 The town of Camarine from far we see:
 And fenny lake undrain'd by fates decree.
 In sight of the Geloan fields we pass,
 And the large walis, where mighty Gela was:
 Then Agragas with lofty summits crown'd;
 Long for the race of warlike steeds renown'd:
 We pass'd Selinus, and the palmy land,
 And widely shun the Lilybean strand, }
 Unsafe, for secret rocks, and moving sand.
 At length on shore the weary fleet arriv'd:
 Which Drepanum's unhappy port receiv'd.
 Here, after endless labours, often tott'ring
 By raging storms, and driven on every coast, }
 My dear, dear father, spent with age, I lost.
 Ease of my cares and solace of my pain,
 Sav'd through a thousand toils, but sav'd in vain.
 The prophet, who my future woes reveal'd,
 Yet this, the greatest and the worst conceal'd.

And dire Cæano, whose foreboding skill
Denounc'd all else, was silent of this ill:
This my last labour was. Some friendly god
From thence convey'd us to your blest abode.

Thus, to the listening queen, the royal guest
His wandering course, and all his toils express'd.
And here concluding, he retir'd to rest.

B O O K I V.

THE ARGUMENT.

Dido discovers to her sister her passion for Æneas, and her thoughts of marrying him: she prepares a hunting-match for his entertainment. Juno, by Venus's consent, raises a storm, which separates the hunters, and drives Æneas and Dido into the same cave, where their marriage is supposed to be completed. Jupiter dispatches Mercury to Æneas, to warn him from Carthage: Æneas secretly prepares for his voyage: Dido finds out his design; and, to put a stop to it, makes use of her own sister's entreaties, and discovers all the variety of passions that are incident to a neglected lover when nothing would prevail upon him, she contrives her own death, with which this book concludes.

But anxious cares already seiz'd the queen:
She fed within her veins a flame unseen:
The hero's valour, acts, and birth, inspire
Her soul with love, and fan the secret fire.
His words, his looks, imprinted in her heart,
Improve the passion, and increase the smart.
Now when the purple morn had chas'd away
The dewy shadows, and restor'd the day,
Her sister first with early care she sought,
And thus, in mournful accents, eas'd her thought:
My dearest Anna, what new dreams affright
My labouring soul; what visions of the night
Disturb my quiet, and distract my breast
With strange ideas of our Trojan guest?
His worth, his actions, and majestic air,
A man descended from the gods declare.
Fear ever argues a degenerate kind,
His birth is well asserted by his mind.
Then what he suffer'd, when by Fate betray'd,
What brave attempts for falling Troy he made!
Such were his looks, so gracefully he spoke,
That, were I not resolv'd against the yoke
Of hapless marriage, never to be curs'd
With second love, so fatal was my first,
To this one error I might yield again:
For since Sichæus was untimely slain,
This only man is able to subvert
The fix'd foundations of my stubborn heart.
And, to confess my frailty, to my shame,
Somewhat I find within, if not the same,
Too like the sparkles of my former flame.
But first, let yawning earth a passage rend,
And let me through the dark abyss descend:
First let avenging Jove, with flames from high,
Drive down this body to the nether sky,
Condemn'd with ghosts in endless night to lie,
Before I break the plighted faith I gave:
No; he who had my vows, shall ever have;
For whom I lov'd on earth, I worship in the grave.

She said: the tears ran gushing from her eyes,
And stopp'd her speech. Her sister thus replies:
O dearer than the vital air I breathe,
Will you to grief your blooming years bequeath?
Condemn'd to waste in woes your lonely life,
Without the joys of mother or of wife?

Think you these tears, this pompous train of w
Are known or valued by the ghost below?
I grant, that while your sorrows yet were green
It well became a woman and a queen
The vows of Tyrian princes to neglect,
To scorn Tārbas, and his love reject;
With all the Libyan lords of mighty name;
But will you fight against a pleasing flame?
This little spot of land, which heaven bestows,
On every side is hemm'd with warlike foes:
Getulian cities here are spread around;
And fierce Numidians there your frontiers bound.
Here lies a barren waste of thirly land,
And there the Syrtes raise the moving sand:
Bæcæan troops besiege the narrow shore,
And from the sea Pygmalion threatens more.
Propitious heaven, and gracious Juno, lead
This wandering navy to your needful aid;
How will your empire spread, your city rise
From such an union, and with such allies!
Implore the favour of the powers above,
And leave the conduct of the rest to love.
Continue still your hospitable way,
And still invent occasions of their stay;
Till storms and winter winds shall cease threat,
And planks and oars repair their shatter'd fleet
These words, which from a friend and sister
came,
With ease resolv'd the scruples of her fame,
And added fury to the kindled flame.
Inspir'd with hope, the project they pursue;
On every altar sacrifice renew:
A chosen ewe of two-years old they pay
To Ceres, Bacchus, and the god of day:
Preferring Juno's power: for Juno ties
The nuptial knot, and makes the marriage joy
The beauteous queen before her altar stands,
And holds the golden goblet in her hands.
A milk-white heifer she with flowers adorns,
And pours the ruddy wine betwixt her horns;
And while the priests with prayer the gods
voke,
She feeds their altars with Sæbæan smoke.
With hourly care the sacrifice renews,
And anxiously the panting entrails views.

What priestly rites, alas! what pious art,
 What vows avail to cure a bleeding heart!
 A gentle fire she feeds within her veins,
 Where the soft god secure in silence reigns.
 Sick with desire, and seeking him she loves,
 From street to street the raving Dido roves.
 So when the watchful shepherd from the blind,
 Wounds with a random shaft the careless hind,
 Distracted with her pain she flies the woods,
 Bounds o'er the lawn, and seeks the silent floods;
 With fruitless care; for still the fatal dart
 Sticks in her side, and rankles in her heart.
 And now she leads the Trojan chief along
 The lofty walls, amidst the busy throng;
 Displays her Tyrian wealth and rising town,
 Which love, without his labour, makes his own.
 This pomp she shows to tempt her wandering
 guest;

Her faltering tongue forbids to speak the rest.
 When day declines, and seas renew the night,
 Still on his face she feeds her famish'd sight:
 She longs again to hear the prince relate
 His own adventures, and the Trojan fate:
 He tells it o'er and o'er: but still in vain;
 For still he begs to hear it once again.
 The hearer on the speaker's mouth depends;
 And thus the tragic story never ends. [light

Thus, when they part, when Phœbe's paler
 Withdraws, and falling stars to sleep invite,
 She last remains, when every guest is gone,
 Sits on the bed he press'd, and sighs alone;
 Absent, her absent hero sees and hears,
 Or in her bosom young Ascanius bears:
 And seeks the father's image in the child,
 If love by likeness might be so beguil'd.
 Mean time the rising towers are at a stand:
 No labours exercise the youthful band:
 Nor use of arts nor toils of arms they know;
 The mole is left unfinish'd to the foe.
 The mounds, the works, the walls, neglected lie,
 Short of their promis'd height that seem'd to threaten the sky.

But when imperial Juno, from above,
 Saw Dido fetter'd in the chains of love,
 Hot with the venom which her veins inflam'd,
 And by no sense of shame to be reclaim'd,
 With soothing words to Venus she begun:
 High praises, endless honours you have won,
 And mighty trophies with your worthy son:
 Two gods a silly woman have undone.
 Nor am I ignorant, you both suspect
 This rising city, which my hands erect:
 But shall celestial discord never cease?
 'Tis better ended in a lasting peace.
 You stand possess'd of all your soul desir'd;
 Poor Dido with consuming love is fir'd:
 Your Trojan with my Tyrian let us join,
 So Dido shall be yours, Æneas mine:
 One common kingdom, one united line.
 Eliza shall a Dardan lord obey,
 And lofty Carthage for a dowry convey.
 Then Venus, who her hidden fraud descri'd, (Which would the sceptre of the world mis-
 guide
 To Libyan shores), thus artfully reply'd;
 Who but a fool would wars with Juno choose,
 And such alliance and such gifts refuse?

If fortune with our joint desires comply:
 The doubt is all from Jove and destiny;
 Lest he forbid with absolute command,
 To mix the people in one common land,
 Or will the Trojan and the Tyrian line,
 In lasting leagues and sure succession join?
 But you, the partner of his bed and throne,
 May move his mind; my wishes are your own.
 Mine, said imperial Juno, be the care;
 Time urges now to perfect this affair:
 Attend my counsel, and the secret share.
 When next the sun his rising light displays,
 And gilds the world below with purple rays;
 The queen, Æneas, and the Tyrian court,
 Shall to the shady woods, for sylvan game, resort.
 There, while the huntsmen pitch their toils around,
 And cheerful horns, from side to side, resound,
 A pitchy cloud shall cover all the plain
 With hail and thunder, and tempestuous rain:
 The fearful train shall take their speedy flight,
 Dispers'd, and all involv'd in gloomy night:
 One cave a grateful shelter shall afford
 To the fair prince and the Trojan lord.
 I will myself the bridal bed prepare,
 If you, to bless the nuptials, will be there:
 So shall their loves be crown'd with due delights,
 And Hymen shall be present at the rites.
 The queen of love consents, and closely smiles
 At her vain project, and discover'd wiles.

The rosy morn was risen from the main,
 And horns and hounds awake the princely train:
 They issue early through the city gate,
 Where the more wakeful huntsmen ready wait,
 With nets, and toils, and darts, beside the force
 Of Spartan dogs, and swift Massylian horse.
 The Tyrian peers and officers of state
 For the slow queen in anti-chambers wait:
 Her lofty courier in the court below
 (Who his majestic rider seems to know),
 Proud of his purple trappings, paws the ground,
 And champs the golden bit, and spreads the foam
 around.

The queen at length appears: on either hand
 The brawny guards in martial order stand.
 A flower'd cymarr, with golden fringe she wore;
 And at her back a golden quiver bore:
 Her flowing hair a golden caul restrains;
 A golden clasp the Tyrian robe sustains.
 Then young Ascanius, with a sprightly grace,
 Leads on the Trojan youth to view the chase.
 But far above the rest in beauty shines
 The great Æneas, when the troop he joins:
 Like fair Apollo, when he leaves the frost
 Of wintery Xanthus, and the Lycian coast:
 When to his native Delos he resorts,
 Ordains the dances, and renews the sports:
 Where painted Scythians, mix'd with Cretan
 bands,

Before the joyful altars join their hands.
 Himself, on Cynthus walking, sees below
 The merry madnels of the sacred show.
 Green wreaths of bays his length of hair enclose;
 A golden fillet binds his awful brows;
 His quiver sounds: not leis the prince is seen
 In manly presence or in lofty mien. [seat
 Now had they reach'd the hill, and storm'd the
 Of savage beasts in dens, their last retreat:
 E e iij

The cry pursues the mountain-goats; they bound
From rock to rock, and keep the craggy ground:
Quite otherwise the stags, a trembling train,
In herds unfingled, scour the dusty plain;
And a long chafe, in open view, maintain. }
The glad Ascanius, as his courser guides,
Spurs thro' the vale, and these and those outrides.
His horse's flanks and sides are forc'd to feel
The clanking lash, and goring of the steel.
Impatiently he views the feeble prey,
Wishing some nobler beast to cross his way;
And rather would the tusky boar attend,
Or see the tawny lion downward bend. [skies:

Mean time the gathering clouds obscure the
From pole to pole the forky lightning flies;
The rattling thunder rolls: and Juno pours
A wintry deluge down, and founding showers.
The company dispers'd, to coverts ride,
And seek the homely cots, or mountains hollow
The rapid rains, descending from the hills, [side.
To rolling torrents raise the creeping rills.
The queen and prince, as love or fortune guides,
One common cavern in her bosom hides.
Then first the trembling earth the signal gave;
And flashing fires enlighten all the cave:
Hell from below, and Juno from above,
And howling nymphs were conscious to their love.
From this ill-omen'd hour, in time arose
Debate and death, and all succeeding woes.
The queen, whom sense of honour could not move,
No longer made a secret of her love;
But call'd it marriage, by that specious name
To veil the crime, and sanctify the shame.
The loud report through Libyan cities goes;
Fame, the great ill, from small beginnings grows.
Swift from the first; and every moment brings
New vigour to her flights, new pinions to her
Soon grows the pigmy to gigantic size: [wings.
Her feet on earth, her forehead in the skies:
Enrag'd against the gods revengeful earth
Produc'd her last of the Titanian birth.
Swift in her walk, more swift her winging haste:
A monstrous phantom, horrible and vast;
As many plumes as raise her lofty flight,
So many piercing eyes enlarge her sight:
Millions of opening mouths to fame belong;
And every mouth is furnish'd with a tongue:
And round with listening ears the flying plague is hung.

She fills the peaceful universe with cries;
No slumbers ever close her wakeful eyes.
By day from lofty towers her head she shows:
And spreads, through trembling crowds disastrous news.

With court-informers baunts, and royal spies,
This done relates, nor done she feigns; and mingles truth with lies.

Talk is her business; and her chief delight
To tell of prodigies, and cause affront.
She fills the people's ears with Dido's name;
Who, lost to honour, and the sense of shame,
Admits into her throne and nuptial bed
A wandering guest, who from his country fled:
Whole days with him she passes in delights;
And wastes in luxury long winter nights,
Forgetful of her fame, and royal trust;
Dissolv'd in ease, abandon'd to her lust.

The goddess widely spreads the loud report;
And flies at length to king Hiarba's court.
When first possess'd with this unwelcome news,
Whom did he not of men and gods accuse?
This prince, from ravish'd Garamantis born,
A hundred temples did with spoils adorn,
An Ammon's honour, his celestial fire,
A hundred altars fed with wakeful fire;
And through his vast dominions priests ordain'd,
Whose watchful care these holy rites maintain'd.
The gates and columns were with garlands
crown'd,

And blood of victim beasts enrich the ground.
He, when he heard a fugitive could move
The Tyrian princes, who disdain'd his love,
His breast with fury burn'd, his eyes with fire;
Mad with despair, impatient with desire.
Then on the sacred altars pouring wine,
He thus with prayers implor'd his fire divine:
Great Jove, propitious to the Moorish race,
Who seat on painted beds, with offerings grace
Thy temples, and adore thy power divine
With blood of victims, and with sparkling wine;
Seest thou not this? or do we fear in vain
Thy boasted thunder, and thy thoughtless reign?
Do thy broad hands the forky lightning's lance,
Thine are the bolts, or the blind work of chance;

A wandering woman builds, within our state,
A little town bought at an easy rate;
She pays me homage, and my grants allow.
A narrow space of Libyan lands to plough.
Yet, scorning me, by passion blindly led,
Admits a banish'd Trojan to her bed:
And now this other Paris, with his train
Of conquer'd cowards, must in Afric reign! [sefs:
(Whom, what they are, their looks and garb con-
Their locks with oil perfum'd, their Libyan dress.)
He takes the spoil, enjoys the princely dame;
And I, rejected I, adore an empty name.

His vows, in haughty terms, he thus prefer'd,
And held his altars horns: the mighty thunderer
heard,

Then cast his eyes on Carthage, where he found
The lustful pair, in lawless pleasure drown'd.
Lost in their loves, insensible of shame,
And both forgetful of their better fame.
He calls Cyllenius; and the god attends;
By whom his menacing command he sends:
Go, mount the western winds, and cleave the sky;
Then, with a swift descent, to Carthage fly:
There find the Trojan chief, who wastes his days
In slothful riot and inglorious ease,
Nor minds the future city, giv'n by fate;
To him this message from my mouth relate:
Not so, fair Venus hop'd, when twice the won
Thy life with prayers; nor promis'd such a son.
Her's was a hero, destin'd to command
A martial race; and rule the Latian land.
Who should his ancient line from Teucer draw;
And, on the conquer'd world, impose the law.
If glory cannot move a mind so mean,
Nor future praise from fading pleasure wean,
Yet why should he defraud his son of fame;
And grudge the Romans their immortal name!
What are his vain designs? what hopes he more,
From his long lingering on a hostile shore?

Regardless to redeem his honour lost,
And for his race to gain th' Ausonian coast!
Bid him with speed the Tyrian court forsake;
With this command the slumbering warrior wake.

Hermes obeys; with golden pinions binds
His flying feet, and mounts the western winds:
And whether o'er the seas or earth he flies,
With rapid force they bear him down the skies.
But first he grasps within his awful hand,
The mark of sovereign power, his magic wand:
With this he draws the ghosts from hollow graves,
With this he drives them down the Stygian
waves;

With this he seals in sleep the wakeful sight;
And eyes, though clos'd in death, restores to light.
Thus arm'd, the god begins his airy race, [space.
And drives the racking clouds along the liquid
Now sees the tops of Atlas, as he flies,
Whose bravny back supports the starry skies;
Atlas, whose head, with piny forests crown'd,
Is beaten by the winds, with foggy vapours bound.
Snows hide his shoulders; from beneath his chin
The founts of rolling streams their race begin:
A beard of ice on his large breast depends:
Here, pois'd upon his wings, the god descends:
Then, rested thus, he from the towering height
Plung'd downward, with precipitated flight:
Lights on the seas, and skims along the flood:
As water-fowl, who seek their fishy food,
Lefs, and yet lefs, to distant prospect show,
By turns they dance aloft, and dive below:
Like these, the steerage of his wings he plies,
And near the surface of the water flies;
Till, having pais'd the seas, and cross'd the sands,
He clos'd his wings, and stoop'd on Libyan lands:
Where shepherds once were hous'd in homely
fleds, [heads.

Now thers within the clouds advance their Arriving there, he found the Trojan prince
New ramparts raising for the town's defence:
A purple scarf, with gold embroider'd o'er (Queen Dido's gift), about his waste he wore;
A sword with glittering gems diversify'd,
For ornament, not use, hung idly by his side.
Then thus, with winged words, the god began (Resuming his own shape): Degenerate man,
Thou woman's property, what mak'st thou here,
These foreign walls and Tyrian towers to rear?
Forgetful of thy own? All-powerful Jove,
Who sways the world below, and heaven above,
Has sent me down, with this severe command:
What means thy lingering in the Libyan land!
If glory cannot move a mind so mean,
Nor future praise, from sitting pleasure wean,
Regard the fortunes of thy rising heir;
The promis'd crown let young Alcanius wear;
To whom th' Ausonian sceptre and the state
Of Rome's imperial name is own'd by fate.
So spake the god; and speaking took his flight,
Involv'd in clouds; and vanish'd out of sight.

The pious prince was seiz'd with sudden fear;
Mute was his tongue, and upright stood his hair;
Revolving in his mind the stern command,
He longs to fly, and lothes the charming land.
What should he say, or how should he begin,
What course, alas! remains, to steer between
Th' offended lover, and the powerful queen!

This way, and that, he turns his anxious mind,
And all expedients tries and none can find:
Fix'd on the deed, but doubtful of the means;
After long thought to this advice he leans:
Three chiefs he calls, commands them to repair
The fleet, and ship their men with silent care:
Some plausible pretence he bids them find,
To colour what in secret he design'd.
Himself, mean time, the softest hours would choofe,
Before the love-sick lady heard the news;
And move her tender mind, by slow degrees,
To suffer what the sovereign power decrees:
Jove will inspire him, when, and what to say.
They hear with pleasure, and with haste obey.

But soon the queen perceives the thin disguise:
(What arts can blind a jealous woman's eyes?)
She was the first to find the secret fraud,
Before the fatal news was blaz'd abroad:
Love the first motions of the lover hears,
Quick to preface, and ev'n in safety fears.
Nor impious fame was wanting, to report
The ships repair'd; the Trojans thick resort,
And purpose to forsake the Tyrian court. }
Frantic with fear, impatient of the wound,
And impotent of mind, she roves the city round:
Lefs wild the Bacchanalian dames appear,
When, from afar, their nightly god they hear, }
And howl about the hills, and shake the wreathy spear.

At length she finds the dear perfidious man,
Prevents his form'd excuse, and thus began:
Base and ungrateful, could you hope to fly,
And undiscover'd 'scape a lover's eye?
Nor could my kindnefs your compassion move,
Nor plighted vows, nor dearer bands of love?
Or is the death of a despairing queen
Not worth preventing, though too well foreseen, Ev'n when the wintery winds command your stay,

You dare the tempest, and defy the sea.
False as you are, suppose you were not bound
To lands unknown, and foreign coasts to sound;
Were Troy restor'd, and Priam's happy reign,
Now durst you tempt, for Troy, the ... main?
See whom you fly; am I the foe you shun?
Now, by those holy vows so late begun,
By this right hand (since I have nothing more
To challenge, but the faith you gave before),
I beg you by these tears too truly shed,
By the new pleasures of our nuptial bed;
If ever Dido, when you most were kind,
Were pleasing in your eyes, or touch'd your mind;
By these my prayers, if prayers may yet have place;
Pity the fortunes of a falling race.
For you I have provok'd a tyrant's hate;
Incens'd the Libyan and the Tyrian state;
For you alone I suffer in my fame;
Bereft of honour, and expos'd to shame:
Whom have I now to trust? (ungrateful guest!
That only name remains of all the rest!)
What have I left, or whither can I fly;
Must I attend Pygmalion's cruelty?
Or till Hiärbas shall in triumph lead
A queen, that proudly scorn'd his proffer'd bed?
Had you desert'd, at least, your hasty flight,
And left behind some pledge of our delight, }
Some babe to bless the mother's mournful sight;

Some young Æneas to supply your place;
Whose features might expreis his father's face;
I should not then complain, to live bereft
Of all my husband, or be wholly left!

Here paus'd the queen; unmov'd he holds his
eyes,
By Jove's command; nor suffer'd love to rise, Though heaving in his heart; and thus at length replies:

Fair queen, you never can enough repeat,
Your boundless favours, or I own my debt;
Nor can my mind forget Eliza's name,
While vital breath inspires this mortal frame.

This only let me speak in my defence;
I never hop'd a secret flight from hence:
Much less pretended to the lawful claim
Of sacred nuptials, or a husband's name.

For if indulgent heaven would leave me free,
And not submit my life to fate's decree,
My choice would lead me to the Trojan shore,
Those relics to review, their dust adore;
And Priam's ruin'd palace to restore.

But now the Delphian oracle commands,
And fate invites me to the Latian lands.
That is the promis'd place to which I steer,
And all my vows are terminated there.

If you, a Tyrian, and a stranger born,
With walls and towers a Libyan town adorn;
Why may not we, like you a foreign race,
Like you seek shelter in a foreign place?

As often as the night obscures the skies
With humid shades, or twinkling stars arise,
Anchises' angry ghost in dreams appears,
Chides my delay, and fills my soul with fears;
And young Ascanius justly may complain,
Of his defrauded fate, and destin'd reign.
Ev'n now the herald of the gods appear'd,
Waking I saw him, and his message heard.

From Jove he came commission'd, heavenly bright
With radiant beams, and manifest to sight.
The sander and the sent, I both attest,
These walls he enter'd, and those words express'd:
Fair queen, oppose not what the gods command;

Forc'd by my fate, I leave your happy land.

Thus while he spoke, already she began,
With sparkling eyes, to view the guilty man:
From head to foot survey'd his person o'er,
Nor longer these outrageous threats forbore;
False as thou art, and more than false, forsworn;
Not sprung from noble blood, nor goddess-born,
But hewn from harden'd entrails of a rock;
And rough Hyrcanian tigers gave thee suck.

Why should I fawn? what have I worse to fear?
Did he once look, or lent a listening ear;
Sigh'd, when I sobb'd, or shed one kindly tear?
All symptoms of a base ungrateful mind,
So foul, that which is worie, 'tis hard to find.

Of man's injustice, why should I complain?
The gods, and Jove himself, behold in vain
Triumphphant treason, yet no thunder flies:
Nor Juno views my wrongs with equal eyes;
Faithless is earth, and faithless are the skies!
Justice is fled, and truth is now no more;
I sav'd the shipwreck'd exile on my shore.

With needful food his hungry Trojans fed:
I took the traitor to my throne and bed:

Fool that I was!—'tis little to repeat
The rest, I stor'd and rigg'd his ruin'd fleet.
I rave, I rave! A gods command he pleads!
And makes heaven accessory to his deeds.
Now Lycian lots, and now the Delian god,
Now Hermes is employ'd from Jove's abode,
To warn him hence; as if the peaceful state
Of heavenly powers were touch'd with human
But go; thy flight no longer I detain; [fate!
Go seek thy promis'd kingdom through the main:
Yet, if the heavens will hear my pious vow,
The faithless waves, not half so false as thou,
Or secret sands, shall sepulchres afford
To thy proud vessels and their perjurd lord,
Then shalt thou call on injur'd Dido's name:
Dido shall come, in a black sulphury flame;
When death has once dissolv'd her mortal
frame:

Shall smile to see the traitor vainly weep;
Her angry ghost, arising from the deep,
Shall haunt thee waking, and disturb thy sleep.
At least my shade thy punishment shall know;
And fame shall spread the pleasing news below.

Abruptly here she stops: then turns away,
Her loathing eyes, and shuns the sight of day.
Amaz'd he stood, revolving in his mind
What speech to frame, and what excuse to find.
Her fearful maids their fainting mistress led;
And softly laid her on her ivory bed.

But good Æneas, though he much desir'd
To give that pity, which her grief requir'd,
Though much he mourn'd and labour'd with his Resolv'd at length, obeys the will of Jove: [love,
Reviews his forces; they with early care
Unmoor their vessels, and for sea prepare.

The fleet is soon afloat, in all its pride;
And well-cank'd galleies in the harbour ride.

Then oaks for oars they fell'd; or, as they stood
Of its green arms despoil'd the growing wood,
Studios of flight: the beach is cover'd o'er
With Trojan bands that blacken all the shore:
On every side are seen, descending down,
Thick swarms of soldiers loaden from the town.

Thus, in battalia, march embodied ants,
Fearful of winter, and of future wants,
T' invade the corn, and to their cells convey
The plunder'd forage of their yellow prey.
The sable troops, along the narrow tracks,
Scarce bear the weighty burden on their backs:
Some set their shoulders on the ponderous grain;
Some guard the spoil; some lash the lagging
train;

All ply their several tasks, and equal toil sustain.
What pangs the tender breast of Dido tore,
When, from the tower, she saw the cover'd shore;
And heard the shouts of sailors from afar,
Mix'd with the murmurs of the watery war!

All-powerful love, what changes canst thou cause
In human hearts, subjected to thy laws!
Once more her haughty soul the tyrant bends;
To prayers and mean submissions she descends.

No female arts or aids she left untry'd,
Nor counsels unexplor'd, before she dy'd.
Look, Anna, look; the Trojans crowd to sea:
They spread their canvas, and their anchors weigh,
The shouting crew, their ships with garlands bind,
Invoke the sea-gods, and invite the wind.

Could I have thought this threat'ning blow so near,

My tender soul had been forewarn'd to bear.
But do not you my last request deny,
With yon perfidious man your interest try;
And bring me news, if I must live or die.
You are his favourite, you alone can find
The dark recesses of his inmost mind:
In all his trusty secrets you have part,
And know the soft approaches to his heart.
Haste then, and humbly seek my haughty foe;
Tell him, I did not with the Grecians go;
Nor did my fleet against his friends employ,
Nor swore the ruin of unhappy Troy;
Nor mov'd with hands profane his father's dust;
Why should he then reject a suit so just!
Whom does he shun, and whither would he fly?
Can he this last, this only prayer deny?

Let him at least his dangerous flight delay,
Wait better winds, and hope a calmer sea.
The nuptials he disclaims, I urge no more;
Let him pursue the promis'd Latian shore.
A short delay is all I ask him now,
A pause of grief, an interval from woe:
Till my soft soul be temper'd to sustain
Accustom'd sorrows, and inur'd to pain.
If you in pity grant this one request,
My death shall glut the hatred of his breast.
This mournful message pious Anna bears,
And seconds, with her own, her sister's tears:
But all her arts are still employ'd in vain;
Again she comes, and is refus'd again. [move;

His harden'd heart nor prayers nor threatenings
Fate, and the god, had stopp'd his ears to love.
As when the winds their airy quarrel try,
Jussling from every quarter of the sky,
This way and that, the mountain oak they bend,
His boughs they shatter, and his branches rend;
With leaves, and falling mast they spread the
The hollow valleys echo to the sound; [ground,
Unmov'd, the royal plant their fury mocks,
Or, shaken, clings more closely to the rocks:
Far as he shoots his towering head on high,
So deep in earth his fix'd foundations lie:
No less a storm the Trojan hero bears;
Thick messages and loud complaints he hears,
And bandy'd words still beating on his ears.
Sighs, groans, and tears, proclaim his inward pains,
But the firm purpose of his heart remains.

The wretched queen, pursu'd by cruel fate,
Begins at length the light of heaven to hate;
And loaths to live: then dire portents she sees,
To hasten on the death her soul decrees;
Strange to relate: for when, before the shrine,
She pours, in sacrifice, the purple wine,
The purple wine is turn'd to putrid blood,
And the white offer'd milk converts to mud.
This dire presage, to her alone reveal'd,
From all, and ev'n her sister, she conceal'd.
A marble temple stood within the grove,
Sacred to death, and to her murder'd love;
That honour'd chapel she had hung around
With snowy fleeces, and with garlands crown'd:
Of, when she visited this lonely dome,
Strange voices issued from her husband's tomb:
She thought she heard him summon her away,
Invite her to his grave, and chide her stay.

Hourly 'tis heard, when, with a boding note,
The solitary screech-owl strains her throat:
And on a chimney's top, or turret's height,
With songs obscene, disturbs the silence of the night.

Besides, old prophecies augment her fears,
And stern Æneas in her dreams appears
Disdainful as by day: she seems alone
To wander in her sleep, through ways unknown,
Guideless and dark: or, in a desert plain,
To seek her subjects, and to seek in vain.
Like Pentheus, when, distracted with his fear,
He saw two Iuns, and double Thebes appear:
Or mad Orestes, when his mother's ghost
Full in his face infernal torches tofs'd;
And shook her snaky locks: he shuns the sight,
Flies o'er the stage, surpris'd with mortal fright;
The furies guard the door, and intercept his
flight.

Now, sinking underneath a load of grief,
From death alone she seeks her last relief:
The time and means resolv'd within her breast,
She to her mournful sister thus address'd,
(Dissembling hope, her cloudy front she clears,
And a false vigour in her eyes appears):
Rejoice, she said, instructed from above,
My lover I shall gain, or lose my love.
Nigh rising Atlas, next the falling sun,
Long tracks of Æthiopian climates run:
There a Maffylian princefs I have found,
Honour'd for age, for magic arts renown'd;
Th' Hesperian temple was her trusted care;
'Twas the supply'd the wakeful dragon's fare.
She poppy-seeds in honey taught to steep,
Reclaim'd his rage, and sooth'd him into sleep.
She watch'd the golden fruit; her charms unbind
The chains of love, or fix them on the mind.
She stops the torrents, leaves the channel dry;
Repels the stars, and backward bears the sky.
The yawning earth rebellows to her call,
Pale ghosts ascend, and mountain ashes fall.
Witness, ye gods, and thou my better part,
How lothe I am to try this impious art!
Within the secret court with silent care,
Erect a lofty pile, expos'd in air;
Hang on the topmost part the Trojan vest,
Spoils, arms, and presents of my faithless guest.
Next, under these, the bridal bed be plac'd,
Where I my ruin in his arms embrac'd:
All relics of the wretch are doom'd to fire,
For so the priestesses and her charms require.
Thus far she said, and farther speech forbears;
A moral paleness in her face appears:
Yet the mistrustful Anna could not find
The secret funeral in these rites design'd,
Nor thought so dire a rage possess'd her mind.
Unknowing of a train conceal'd so well,
She fear'd no worse than when Sichæus fell:
Therefore obeys. The fatal pile they rear
Within the secret court, expos'd in air.
The cloven holms and pines are heap'd on high;
And garlands on the hollow spaces lie.
Sad cypress, vervain, yew, compose the wreath,
And every baleful green denoting death,
The queen, determin'd to the fatal deed,
The spoils and sword he lost, in order spread:
And the man's image on the nuptial bed.

And now, (the sacred altars plac'd around)
The priestess enters, with her hair unbound,
And thrice invokes the pow'rs below the
ground.

Night, Erebus, and Chaos, she proclaims,
And threefold Hecate, with her hundred names,
And three Dianæ: next she sprinkles round,
With feign'd Averman drops, the hallow'd
ground:

Culls hoary wrinkles, found by Phœbe's light,
With brazen sickles reap'd at noon of night.
Then mixes baleful juices in the bowl,
And cuts the forehead of a new-born foal;
Robbing the mother's love. The defin'd queen
Observes, assisting at the rites obscene:
A leaven'd cake, in her devoted hands
She holds, and next the highest altar stands:
One tender foot was shod, her other bare,
Girt was her gather'd gown, and loose her hair.
Thus dress'd, the summon'd, with her dying
breath,

The heav'ns and planets, conscious of her death;
And every power, if any rules above,
Who minds, or who revenges, injur'd love.

'Twas dead of night, when weary bodies close
Their eyes in balmy sleep and soft repose:
The winds no longer whisper through the woods,
Nor murmuring tides disturb the gentle floods.
The stars in silent order mov'd around,
And peace, with downy wings, was brooding on
the ground.

The flocks and herds, and party colour'd fowl,
Which haunt the woods, or swim the weedy pool,
Stretch'd on the quiet earth securely lay,
Forgetting the past labours of the day.
All else of nature's common gift partake;
Unhappy Dido was alone awake.
Nor sleep, nor ease, the furious queen can find;
Sleep fled her eyes, as quiet fled her mind.
Despair, and rage, and love, divide her heart:
Despair and rage had some, but love the greater part.

Then thus she said within her secret mind:
What shall I do; what succour can I find?
Become a suppliant to Hiarba's pride,
And take my turn, to court and be deny'd!
Shall I with this ungrateful Trojan go,
For sake an empire, and attend a foe?
Himself I refus'd, and his train reliev'd;
'Tis true: but am I sure to be receiv'd?
Can gratitude in Trojan souls have place?
Laomedon still lives in all his race!
Then, shall I seek alone the churlish crew,
And with my fleet their flying sails pursue?
What force have I but those, whom scarce before
I drew reluctant from their native shore?
Will they again embark at my desire,
Once more sustain the seas, and quit their second Tyre?

Rather with steel thy guilty breast invade,
And take the fortune thou thyself hast made.
Your pity, sister, first seduc'd my mind;
Or seconded too well what I design'd.
These dear-bought pleasures had I never known,
Had I continued free, and still my own;
Avoiding love, I had not found despair:
But star'd, with savage beasts, the common air;

Like them, a lonely life I might have led,
Not mourn'd the living, nor disturb'd the dead.
These thoughts she brooded in her anxious breast;
On board, the Trojan found more easy rest.
Resolv'd to fail, in sleep he pass'd the night,
And order'd all things for his early flight.
To whom, once more, the winged god appears:
His former youthful mien and shape he wears,
And, with this new alarm, invades his ears:
Sleep'st thou, O goddess-born! and canst thou drown

Thy needful cares, so near a hostile town,
Beset with foes? nor hear'st the western gales
Invite thy passage, and inspire thy sails?
She harbours in her heart a furious hate;
And thou shalt find the dire effects too late;
Fix'd on revenge, and obstinate to die;
Haste swiftly hence, while thou hast power to fly.
The sea, with ships, will soon be cover'd o'er,
And blazing firebrands kindle all the shore.
Prevent her rage, while night obscures the skies;
And sail before the purple morn arise.
Who knows what hazards thy delay may bring?
Woman's a various, and a changeful thing
Thus Hermes in the dream; then took his flight,
Aloft in air unseen, and mix'd with night.

Twice warn'd by the celestial messenger,
The pious prince arose with hasty fear:
Then rous'd his drowsy train without delay,
Haste to your banks; your crooked anchors weigh;

And spread your flying sails, and stand to sea.
A god commands; he stood before my sight;
And urg'd us once again to speedy flight.
O sacred power, what power foe'er thou art,
To thy blest orders I resign my heart:
Lead thou the way; protect thy Trojan bands;
And prosper the design thy will commands.
He said, and, drawing forth his flaming sword,
His thundering arm divides the many-twisted cord:

An emulating zeal inspires his train;
They run, they snatch, they rush into the main.
With headlong haste they leave the desert shores,
And brush the liquid seas with labouring oars.

Aurora now had left her saffron bed,
And beams of early light the heavens o'erspread,
When from a tower the queen, with wakeful eyes,
Saw day point upward from the rosy skies:
She look'd to seaward, but the sea was void,
And scarce in ken the sailing ships descri'd:
Stung with despight, and furious with despair,
She struck her trembling breast, and tore her hair.
And shall th' ungrateful traitor go, she said,
My land forsaken, and my love betray'd?
Shall we not arm, not rush from every fleet,
To follow, sink, and burn his perjurd fleet?
Haste; haul my gallees out; pursue the foe:
Bring flaming brands; set sail, and swiftly row.
What have I said? Where am I? Fury turns
My brain, and my distemper'd bosom burns.
Then, when I gave my perion and my throne,
This hate, this rage, had been more timely shown.
See now the promis'd faith, the vaunted name,
The pious man, who, rushing through the flame,
Preserv'd his gods, and to the Phrygian shore
The burden of his feeble father bore!

I should have torn him piece-meal; frow'd in floods

His scatter'd limbs, or left expos'd in woods:
Destroy'd his friends and son; and, from the fire,

Have set the reeking boy before the fire.

Events are doubtful, which on battle wait;
Yet where's the doubt to souls secure of fate!
My Tyrians, at their injur'd queen's command,
Had tofs'd their fires amid the Trojan band:
At once extinguish'd all the faithless name;
And I myself, in vengeance of my shame,
Had fall'n upon the pile to mend the funeral
flame.

Thou sun, who view'st at once the world below,
Thou Juno, guardian of the nuptial vow,
Thou Hecate, hearken from thy dark abodes;
Ye furies, fiends, and violated gods,
All powers invoc'd with Dido's dying breath,
Attend her curses, and avenge her death.
If to the Fates ordain, and Jove commands,
Th' ungrateful wretch should find the Latian lands,

Yet let a race untam'd, and haughty foes,
His peaceful entrance with dire arms oppose;
Oppress'd with numbers in th' unequal field,
His men discourag'd, and himself expell'd;
Let him for succour sue from place to place,
Torn from his subjects, and his son's embrace:
First let him see his friends in battle slain,
And their untimely fate lament in vain:
And when, at length, the cruel war shall cease,
On hard conditions may he buy his peace.
Nor let him then enjoy supreme command,
But fall untimely by some hostile hand,
And lie unbury'd on the barren sand.

These are my prayers, and this my dying will:
And you, my Tyrians, every curse fulfil;
Perpetual hate, and mortal wars proclaim
Against the prince, the people, and the name.
These grateful offerings on my grave bestow,
Nor league, nor love, the hostile nations know:
Now, and from hence in every future age,
When rage excites your arms, and strength supplies the rage,

Rise some avenger of our Libyan blood;
With fire and sword, pursue the perjur'd brood:
Our arms, our seas, our shores oppos'd to theirs,
And the same hate descend on all our heirs.

This said, within her anxious mind she weighs
The means of cutting short her odious days.
Then to Sichæus' nurse she briefly said
(For when the left her country her's was dead),
Go, Barce, call my sister; let her care
The solemn rites of sacrifice prepare:
The sheep, and all the atoning offerings bring,
Sprinkling her body from the crystal spring
With living drops: then let her come, and thou
With sacred fillets bind thy hoary brow.
Thus will I pay my vows to Stygian Jove,
And end the cares of my disastrous love.
Then cast the Trojan image on the fire,
And, as that burns, my passion shall expire.

The nurse moves onward, with officious care,
And all the speed her aged limbs can bear.
But furious Dido, with dark thoughts involv'd,
Shook at the mighty mischief she resolv'd.

With livid spots, distinguish'd was her face,
Red were her rolling eyes, and discompos'd her pace:

Ghastly she gaz'd, with pain she drew her breath,
And nature thiver'd at approaching death.

Then swiftly to the fatal place she pass'd,
And mounts the funeral pile, with furious haste:
Unsheaths the sword the Trojan left behind
(Not for so dire an enterprise design'd).
But when the view'd the garments loosely spread,
Which once he wore, and saw the conscious bed,
She paus'd, and, with a sigh, the robes em-brac'd;

Then on the couch her trembling body cast,
Repress'd the ready tears, and spoke her last:
Dear pledges of my love, while heaven so pleas'd,
Receive a soul, of mortal anguish eas'd:
My fatal courte is finish'd, and I go,
A glorious name, among the ghotts below.

A lofty city by my hands is rais'd;
Pygmalion punish'd, and my lord appeas'd.
What could my fortune have afforded more,
Had the false Trojan never touch'd my shore?
Then kiss'd the couch; and must I die, she said,
And unreveng'd? 'tis doubly to be dead!
Yet ev'n this death with pleasure I receive;
On any terms, 'tis better than to live.

I these flames from far may the false Trojan view;
These boding omens his base flight pursue.
She said, and struck. Deep enter'd in her side
The piercing steel, with reeking purple dy'd:
Clogg'd in the wound, the cruel weapon stands;
The spouting blood came streaming on her hands.
Her sad attendants saw the deadly stroke.
And, with loud cries, the sounding palace shook.
Distracted from the fatal sight they fled,
And through the town, the dismal rumours spread.
First from the sighted court the yell began,
Redoubled thence from house to house it ran:
The groans of men, with shrieks, laments, and
cries

Of mixing women, mount the vaulted skies.
Not less the clamour, than if ancient Tyre,
Or the new Carthage, set by foes on fire,
The rolling ruin, with their lov'd abodes,
Involv'd the blazing temples of their gods.
Her sister hears, and, furious with despair,
She beats her breast, and rends her yellow hair:
And, calling on Eliza's name aloud, [crowd.
Runs breathless to the place, and breaks the
Was all that pomp of woe for this prepar'd,
These fires, this funeral pile, these altars rear'd?
Was all this train of plots contriv'd, said she,
All only to deceive unhappy me?
Whose is the worst? Didst thou in death pretend
To scorn thy sister, or delude thy friend?
Thy summon'd sister, and thy friend, had come;
One sword had serv'd us both, one common tomb.
Was I to raise the pile, the powers invoke,
Not to be present at the fatal stroke?
At once thou hast destroy'd thyself and me;
Thy town, thy senate, and thy colony!
Bring water, bathe the wound; while I in death
Lay close my lips to her's, and catch the flying breath.

This said, she mounts the pile with eager haste,
And in her arms the gazing queen embrac'd:

Her temples chaff'd, and her own garments tore,
To staunch the streaming blood, and cleanse the
gore.

Thrice Dido try'd to raise her drooping head,
And fainting thrice, fell grov'ling on the bed.
Thrice op'd her heavy eyes, and saw the
light,

But, having found it, sicken'd at the sight,
And clos'd her lids at last in endless night.

Then Juno, grieving that she should sustain
A death so ling'ring, and so full of pain,
Sent Iris down, to free her from the strife
Of labouring nature, and dissolve her life.

For, since she dy'd, not doom'd by heaven's decree;
Or her own crime, but human casualty
And rage of love, that plung'd her in despair,
The sisters had not cut the topmost hair,
Which Proserpine and they can only know,
Nor made her sacred to the shades below.
Downward the various goddesses took her flight,
And drew a thousand colours from the light:
Then stood above the dying lover's head,
And said, I thus devote thee to the dead.
This offering to th' infernal gods I bear:
Thus while she spoke she cut the fatal hair:
The struggling soul was loos'd, and life dissolv'd in air.

B O O K V.

THE ARGUMENT.

Æneas, setting sail from Afric, is driven by a storm on the coast of Sicily: where he is hospitably received by his friend Acestes, king of part of the island, and born of Trojan parentage. He applies himself to celebrate the memory of his father with divine honours: and accordingly institutes funeral games, and appoints prizes for those who should conquer in them. While the ceremonies were performing, Juno sends Iris to persuade the Trojan women to burn the ships; who, upon her instigation, set fire to them, which burnt four, and would have consumed the rest, had not Jupiter, by a miraculous shower, extinguish'd it. Upon this, Æneas, by the advice of one of his generals, and a vision of his father, builds a city for the women, old men, and others, who were either unfit for war, or weary of the voyage, and sails for Italy: Venus procures of Neptune a safe voyage for him and all his men, excepting only his pilot Palinurus, who was unfortunately lost.

MEAN time the Trojan cuts his wat'ry way,
Fix'd on his voyage through the curling sea:
Then, casting back his eyes with dire amaze,
Sees, on the Punic shore, the mounting blaze.
The cause unknown; yet his presaging mind
The fate of Dido from the fire divin'd:
He knew the stormy souls of woman-kind,
What secret springs their eager passions move,
How capable of death for injur'd love.
Dire auguries from hence the Trojans draw,
Till neither fires nor shining shores they saw.
Now seas and skies their prospect only bound,
An empty space above, a floating field around.
But soon the heavens with shadows were o'er-
spread;

A swelling cloud hung hovering o'er their head:
Livid it look'd, the threatening of a storm;
Then night and horrôr ocean's face deform.
The pilot, Palinurus, cry'd aloud,
What gusts of weather from that gathering cloud
My thoughts preface? Ere yet the tempest roars
Stand to your tackle, mates, and stretch your oars;
Contract your swelling sails, and luff to wind:
The frighted crew perform the task assign'd.
Then to his fearless chief, Not heaven, said he,
Though Jove himself should promise Italy,
Can stem the torrent of this raging sea!
Mark how the shifting winds from west arise,
And what collected night involves the skies!
Nor can our shaken vessels live at sea;
Much less against the tempest force their way;
'Tis fate diverts our course, and fate we must obey.

Not far from hence, if I observe aright
The southing of the stars, and polar light;
Sicilia lies; whose hospitable shores
In safety we may reach, with struggling oars.
Æneas then reply'd: Too sure I find,
We strive in vain, against the seas and wind:
Now shift your sails: what place can please me
more

Than what you promise, the Sicilian shore;
Whose hallow'd earth Anchises' bones contains,
And where a prince of Trojan lineage reigns!
The course resolv'd, before the western wind
They scud amain, and make the port assign'd.

MEAN time, Acestes, from a lofty stand,
Beheld the fleet descending on the land;
And, not unmindful of his ancient race,
Down from the cliff he ran with eager pace,
And held the hero in a strict embrace.
Of a rough Libyan bear the spoils he wore;
And either hand a pointed javelin bore.
His mother was a dame of Dardan blood;
His sire Criniscus, a Sicilian flood;
He welcomes his returning friends ashore
With plenteous country cates, and homely store.

Now, when the following morn had chac'd
away
The flying stars, and light restor'd the day,
Æneas call'd the Trojan troops around,
And thus bespoke them from a rising ground:
O'spring of heaven, divine Dardanian race,
The sun revolving through th' ethereal space,
The shining circle of the year has fill'd,
Since first this isle my father's ashes held:

And now, the rising day renews the year
 (A day for ever sad, for ever dear).
 This would I celebrate with annual games,
 With gifts on altars pil'd, and holy flames,
 Though banish'd to Getulia's barren sands,
 Caught on the Grecian seas, or hostile lands:
 But since thus happy storm our fleet has driven
 (Not, as I deem, without the will of heaven)
 Upon these friendly shores and flowery plains,
 Which hide Anchises, and his best remains,
 Let us with joy perform his honours due,
 And pray for prosperous winds, our voyage to renew.

Pray, that in towns, and temples of our own, }
 The name of great Anchises may be known,
 And yearly games may spread the gods renown. }
 Our sports, Acestes, of the Trojan race,
 With royal gifts ordain'd, is pleas'd to grace:
 Two steers on every ship the king bestows;
 His gods and ours shall share your equal vows.
 Besides, if nine days hence, the rosy morn
 Shall, with unclouded light, the skies adorn,
 That day with solemn sports I mean to grace:
 Light galleys on the seas shall run a watery race.
 Some shall in swiftness for the goal contend,
 And others try the twanging bow to bend:
 The strong, with iron gauntlets arm'd, shall stand,
 Oppos'd in combat on the yellow sand.
 Let all be present at the games prepar'd,
 And joyful victors wait the just reward.
 But now assist the rites, with garlands crown'd;
 He said, and first his brows with myrtle bound.
 Then Helymus, by his example led,
 And old Acestes, each adorn'd his head;
 Thus young Ascanius, with a sprightly grace,
 His temples tied, and all the Trojan race.

Æneas then advanc'd amidst the train,
 By thousands follow'd through the flowery plain,
 To great Anchises' tomb: which, when he
 found,

He pour'd to Bacchus on the hallow'd ground,
 Two bowls of sparkling wine, of milk two more,
 And two from offer'd bulls of purple gore.
 With roses then, the sepulchre he strow'd;
 And thus his father's ghost bespoke aloud:
 Hail, O ye holy manes! hail again
 Paternal ashes, now review'd in vain!
 The gods permitted not that you, with me
 Should reach the promis'd shores of Italy;
 Or Tyber's flood, what flood fo'er it be. }
 Scarce had he finish'd, when, with speckled pride,
 A serpent from the tomb began to glide;
 His huge bulk on seven high volumes roll'd;
 Blue was his breadth of back, but streak'd with scaly gold:

Thus, riding on his curls, he seem'd to pass
 A rolling fire along, and singe the grass.
 More various colours through his body run,
 Than Iris, when her bow imbibes the sun:
 Betwixt the rising altars, and around,
 The sacred monster shot along the ground;
 With harmless play amidst the bowls he pass'd,
 And, with his lolling tongue, assay'd the taste:
 Thus fed with holy food, the wondrous guest
 Within the hollow tomb retir'd to rest.
 The pious prince, surpris'd at what he view'd,
 The funeral honours with more zeal renew'd:

Doubtful if this, the place's genius were,
 Or guardian of his father's sepulchre.
 Five sheep, according to the rites, he slew;
 As many twine, and steers of fable hue;
 New generous wine he from the goblets pour'd,
 And call'd his father's ghost, from hell restor'd.
 The glad attendants, in long order come,
 Offering their gifts at great Anchises' tomb;
 Some add more oxen; some divide the spoil;
 Some place the chargers on the grassy foil;
 Some blow the fires, and offer'd entrails broil. }

Now came the day desir'd: the skies were
 bright,

With rosy lustre of the rising light:
 The bordering people, rous'd by sounding fame
 Of Trojan feasts, and great Acestes' name,
 The crowded shore, with acclamations fill,
 Part to behold, and part to prove their skill.
 And first the gifts in public view they place,
 Green laurel wreaths, and palm (the victor's
 grace):

Within the circle, arms and tripods lie,
 Ingots of gold, and silver heap'd on high,
 And vests embroider'd of the Tyrian dye. }
 The trumpet's clangor then the feast proclaims,
 And all prepare for their appointed games.
 Four galleys first, with equal rowers bear,
 Advancing, in the watery lifts appear.
 The speedy dolphin, that outstrips the wind,
 Bore Mneſtheus, author of the Memmian kind:
 Gyas the vast chimæra's bulk commands,
 Which rising like a towering city stands:
 Three Trojans tug at every labouring oar;
 Three banks in three degrees the sailors bore. }
 Beneath their sturdy strokes the billows roar;
 Sergesthus, who began the Sergian race,
 In the great centaur took the leading place
 Cloanthus, on the sea-green Scylla stood,
 From whom Cluentius draws his Trojan blood.

Far in the sea, against the foaming shore,
 There stands a rock; the raging billows roar
 Above his head in storms; but, when 'tis clear,
 Uncurl their ridgy backs, and at his foot appear.
 In peace below the gentle waters run;
 The cormorants above lie basking in the sun.
 On this the hero fix'd an oak in sight,
 The mark to guide the mariners aright.
 To bear with this, the seamen stretch their oars;
 They round the rock they steer, and seek the former shores.

The lots decide their place: above the rest,
 Each leader shining in his Tyrian vest:
 The common crew, with wreaths of poplar
 boughs,
 Their temples crown, and shade their sweaty
 brows.

Besmear'd with oil, their naked shoulders shine:
 All take their seats, and wait the sounding sign.
 They gripe their oars, and every panting breast
 Is rais'd by turns with hope, by turns with fear, depress'd.

The clangor of the trumpet gives the sign;
 At once they start, advancing in a line.
 With shouts, the sailors rend the starry skies;
 Lash'd with their oars, the smoky vex'd ocean
 Sparkles the briny main, and the vex'd ocean fries. }

Exact in time, with equal strokes they row:
At once the brushing oars and brazen prow
Dash up the sandy waves, and ope the depths
below

Not fiery courfers, in a chariot race,
Invade the field with half so swift a pace.
Not the fierce driver with more fury lends
The sounding lash; and, ere the stroke descends,
Low to the wheels his pliant body bends.
The partial crowd their hopes and fears divide,
And aid, with eager shouts, the favour'd side.
Cries, murmurs, clamours, with a mixing sound,
From woods to woods, from hills to hills, rebound

Amidst the loud applauses of the shore,
Gyas outstripp'd the rest, and sprung before;
Cloanthus, better mann'd, pursu'd him fast;
But his o'ermailed galley check'd his haste.
The centaur, and the dolphin brush the brine
With equal oars, advancing in a line:
And now the mighty centaur seems to lead,
And now the speedy dolphin gets a-head:
Now board to board the rival vessels row;
The billows lave the skies, and ocean groans
below.

They reach'd the mark: proud Gyas and his train
In triumph rode the victors of the main:
But steering round, he charg'd his pilot stand
More close to shore, and skim along the sand.
Let others bear to sea. Menates heard,
But secret shelves too cautiously he fear'd:
And, fearing, fought the deep; and still aloof
he steer'd.

With louder cries the captain call'd again;
Bear to the rocky shore, and shun the main.
He spoke, and speaking at his stern, he saw
The bold Cloanthus near the shelves draw:
Betwixt the mark and him the Scylla stood,
And, in a closer compass, plough'd the flood:
He pass'd the mark, and wheeling got before:
Gyas blasphem'd the gods, devoutly swore,
Cry'd out for anger, and his hair he tore.
Mindless of others lives (so high was grown
His rising rage) and careless of his own,
The trembling dotard to the deck he drew,
And hoisted up, and over board he threw:
This done, he seiz'd the helm, his fellows cheer'd,
Turn'd short upon the shelves, and madly steer'd.

Hardly his head the plunging pilot rears, Clogg'd with his clothes, and cumber'd with his
years:

Now dropping wet, he climbs the cliff with pain;
The crowd, that saw him fall, and float again,
Shout from the distant shore, and loudly laugh'd,
To see his heaving breast discharge the briny
draught

The following centaur, and the dolphin's crew,
Their vanish'd hopes of victory rene:
While Gyas lags, they kindle in the race,
To reach the mark: Sergethus takes the place:
Mnefthus pursues; and, while around they wind,
Comes up, not half his galley's length behind.
Then on the deck, amidst his mates appear'd,
And thus their drooping courages he cheer'd:
My friends, and Hector's followers heretofore,
Exert your vigour; tug the labouring oar;
Stretch to your strokes, my still-unconquer'd crew,
Whom, from the flaming walls of Troy, I drew.

In this, our common interest, let me find
That strength of hand, that courage of the mind,
As when you stemm'd the strong Malæan flood,
And o'er the Syrtis broken billows row'd.
I seek not now the foremost palm to gain;
Though yet—but ah, that haughty wish is vain!
Let those enjoy it whom the gods ordain.
But to be last, the lags of all the race,
Redeem yourselves and me from that disgrace.
Now one and all, they tug amain; they row
At the full stretch, and shake the brazen prow.
The sea beneath them sinks: their labouring sides
Are swell'd, and sweat runs guttering down in tides.

Chance aids their daring with unhop'd success;
Sergethus, eager with his beak, to press
Betwixt the rival galley and the rock,
Shuts the unwieldy centaur in the lock.
The vessel struck; and, with the dreadful shock,
Her oars she sliver'd, and her head she broke.
The trembling rowers, from their banks arise,
And, anxious for themselves, renounce the prize.
With iron poles they heave her off the shores;
And gather, from the sea, their floating oars.
The crew of Mnefthus, with elated minds,
Urge their success, and call the willing winds:
Then ply their oars, and cut their liquid way
In larger compass on the roomy sea.
As when the dove her rocky hold forakes,
Rous'd in a fright, her founding wings she shakes,
The cavern rings with clattering; out she flies,
And leaves her callow care, and cleaves the skies;
At first she flutters; but at length she springs
To smoother flight, and shoots upon her wings;
So Mnefthus in the dolphin cuts the sea,
And, flying with a force, that force assists his
way.

Sergethus in the centaur soon he pass'd,
Wedge'd in the rocky shoals, and sticking fast.
In vain the victor he with cries implores,
And practises to row with shatter'd oars.
Then Mnefthus bears with Gyas, and out-flies:
The ship without a pilot yields the prize.
Unvanquish'd Scylla now alone remains;
Her he pursues, and all his vigour strains,
Shouts from the favouring multitude arise,
Applauding echo to the shouts replies;
Shouts, wishes, and applause, run rattling through the skies.

These clamours with disdain the Scylla heard,
Much grudg'd the praise, but more the robb'd reward:

Resolv'd to hold their own, they mend their pace;
All obstinate to die, or gain the race.
Rais'd with success, the dolphin swiftly ran (For they can conquer who believe they can):
Both urge their oars, and fortune both supplies,
And both perhaps had shar'd an equal prize:
When to the seas Cloanthus holds his hands,
And succour from the watery powers demands:
Gods of the liquid realms, on which I row,
If, giv'n by you, the laurel bind my brow,
Assist to make me guilty of my vow.
A snow-white bull shall on your shore be slain,
His offer'd entrails cast into the main:
And ruddy wine! from golden goblets thrown,
Your graceful gift and my return shall own.

The choir of nymphs, and Phorcus from below,
 With virgin Panopea, heard his vow;
 And old Fortunus, with his breadth of hand,
 Push'd on, and sped the galley to the land.
 Swift as a shaft, on winged wind, she flies;
 And, darting to the port, obtains the prize.
 The herald summons all, and then proclaims
 Cloanthus, conqueror of the naval games.
 The prince with laurel crowns the victor's head,
 And three fat steers are to his vessel led;
 The ship's reward: with generous wine beside,
 And sums of silver, which the crew divide.
 The leaders are distinguish'd from the rest,
 The victor honour'd with a nobler vest:
 Where gold and purple strive in equal rows,
 And needle-work its happy cost bestows.
 There, Ganymede is wrought with living art,
 Chasing through Ida's groves the trembling hart;
 Breathless he seems, yet eager to pursue:
 When from aloft descends, in open view,
 The bird of Jove; and, fousing on his prey,
 With crooked talons bears the boy away.
 In vain, with lifted hands, and gazing eyes,
 His guards behold him soaring through the skies,
 And dogs pursue his flight, with imitated cries.

Mneſtheus the second victor was declar'd;
 And summon'd there, the second prize he shar'd:
 A coat of mail, which brave Demoleus bore,
 More brave Æneas from his shoulders tore,
 In single combat on the Trojan shore.
 This was ordain'd for Mneſtheus to possess
 In war for his defence; for ornament in peace:
 Rich was the gift, and glorious to behold;
 But yet, so ponderous with its plates of gold,
 That scarce two servants could the weight sus-tain,
 Yet, loaded thus, Demoleus o'er the plain
 Pursued, and lightly seiz'd the Trojan train.
 The third succeeding to the last reward,
 Two goodly bowls of massy silver shar'd;
 With figures prominent, and richly wrought,
 And two brass cauldrons from Dodona brought.
 Thus, all rewarded by the hero's hands,
 Their conquering temples bound with purple
 bands.
 And now Sergeſthus, clearing from the rock,
 Brought back his galley shatter'd with the shock.
 Forsorn the look'd without an aiding oar,
 And, hooted by the vulgar, made to shore.
 As when a snake, surpris'd upon the road,
 Is crush'd athwart her body by the load
 Of heavy wheels; or with a mortal wound
 Her belly bruis'd, and trodden to the ground,
 In vain, with loosen'd curls, she crawls along,
 Yet fierce above, she brandishes her tongue:
 Glares with her eyes, and bristles with her scales,
 But, groveling in the dust, her parts unfound she trails!

So slowly to the port the Centaur tends,
 But what she wants in oars with sails amends:
 Yet, for his galley sav'd, the grateful prince
 Is pleas'd th' unhappy chief to recompense.
 Pholoe, the Cretan slave, rewards his care,
 Beauteous herself, with lovely twins, as fair.
 From thence his way the Trojan hero bent,
 Into the neighbouring plain, with mountains
 pent,

Whose sides were shaded with surrounding
 wood:
 Full in the midst of this fair valley stood
 A native theatre, which rising slow,
 By just degrees, o'erlook'd the ground below.
 High on a sylvan throne the leader sat,
 A numerous train attend in solemn state;
 Here those, that in the rapid course delight,
 Desire of honour and the prize invite:
 The rival runners without orders stand,
 The Trojans, mix'd with the Sicilian band,
 First Nisus with Euryalus appears,
 Euryalus a boy of blooming years;
 With sprightly grace, and equal beauty crown'd;
 Nisus, for friendship to the youth renown'd.
 Diore next, of Priam's royal race,
 Then Salius, join'd with Patron, took their place:
 But Patron in Arcadia had his birth,
 And Salius his from Acarnanian earth:
 Then two Sicilian youths, the names of these Swift Helymus, and lovely Panopes;
 Both jolly huntsmen, both in forest-bred,
 And owning old Acestes for their head.
 With several others of ignobler name,
 Whom time has not deliver'd o'er to fame:
 To these the hero thus his thoughts explain'd:
 In words, which general approbation gain'd:
 One common largess is for all design'd;
 The vanquish'd and the victor shall be join'd.
 Two darts of polish'd steel and Gnosian wood,
 A silver-studded ax alike bestow'd.
 The foremost three have olive wreaths decreed;
 The first of these obtains a stately steed
 Adorn'd with trappings: and the next in fame,
 The quiver of an Amazonian dame,
 With feather'd Thracian arrows well supply'd;
 A golden belt shall girt his manly side,
 Which with a sparkling diamond shall be ty'd:
 The third this Grecian helmet shall content,
 He said: to their appointed base they went:
 With beating hearts th' expected sign receive,
 And, starting all at once, the barrier leave.
 Spread out, as on the winged winds; they flew,
 And seiz'd the distant goal with greedy view.
 Shot from the crowd, swift Nisus all o'er-pass'd;
 Nor storms, nor thunder, equal half his haste.
 The next, but though the next yet far disjoint'd,
 Came Salius, and Euryalus behind;
 Then Helymus, whom young Diore ply'd,
 Step after step, and almost side by side:
 His shoulders pressing, and in longer space
 Had won, or left at least a dubious race.
 Now spent, the goal they almost reach at last;
 When eager Nisus, hapless in his haste,
 Slipp'd first, and, slipping fell upon the plain,
 Soak'd with the blood of oxen newly slain
 The careless victor had not mark'd his way;
 But, treading where the treacherous puddle lay,
 His heels flew up; and on the grassy floor,
 He fell, besmear'd with silt and holy gore.
 Not mindless then, Euryalus, of thee,
 Nor of the sacred bonds of amity,
 He strove th' immediate rival's hope to cross,
 And caught the foot of Salius as he rose:
 So Salius lay extended on the plain;
 Euryalus springs out, the prize to gain,

And leaves the crowd: applauding peals attend
The victor to the goal, who vanquish'd by his friend.

Next Helymus, and then Diore came,
By two misfortunes made the third in fame.

But Salius enters; and, exclaiming loud
For justice, defends and disturbs the crowd;
Urges his cause may in the court be heard;
And pleads; the prize is wrongfully conferr'd.
But favour for Euryalus appears;
His blooming beauty, with his tender years,
Had brib'd the judges for the promis'd prize;
Besides, Diore fills the court with cries:
Who vainly reaches at the last reward,
If the first palm on Salius be conferr'd.

Then thus the prince: Let no disputes arise:
Where fortune plac'd it, I award the prize:
But fortune's errors give me leave to mend,
At least to pity my deserving friend.

He said: and, from among the spoils, he draws (Ponderous with shaggy mane and golden paws)
A lion's hide, to Salius this he gives;
Nisus with envy sees the gift, and grieves.
If such rewards to vanquish'd men are due,
He said, and falling is to rise by you,
What prize may Nisus from your bounty claim,
Who merited the first rewards and fame?
In falling, both an equal fortune try'd;
Would fortune for my fall so well provide!
With this he pointed to his face, and show'd
His hands, and all his habit smear'd with blood.
Th' indulgent father of the people smil'd,
And caus'd to be produc'd an ample shield
Of wondrous art by Didymaon wrought,
Long since from Neptune's bars in triumph
brought.

This giv'n to Nisus, he divides the rest;
And equal justice, in his gifts exprest'd.
The race thus ended, and rewards bestow'd,
Once more the prince bespeaks the attentive
crowd:

If there be here, whose dauntless courage dare
In gauntlet fight, with limbs and body bare,
His opposite sustain in open view,
Stand forth the champion, and the games renew.
Two prizes I propose, and thus divide;
A bull with gilded horns, and sillets ty'd,
Shall be the portion of the conquering chief;
A sword and helm shall cheer the loser's grief.
Then haughty Dares in the lists appears;
Stalking he strides, his head erected bears:
His nervous arms the weighty gauntlet wield,
And loud applauses echo through the field.
Dares alone in combat us'd to stand,
The match of mighty Paris hand to hand;
The fame at Hector's funerals undertook Gigantic Butes, of th' Amician flock;
And, by the stroke of his resolute hand,
Stretch'd the vast bulk upon the yellow sand.
Such Dares was; and such he strode along,
And drew the wonder of the gazing throng.
His brawny back, an ample breast he shows?
His lifted arms around, his head he throws;
And deals in whistling air his empty blows.
His match is fought; but through the trembling
band,
Not one dares answer to the proud demand.

Prefuming of his force, with sparkling eyes,
Already he devours the promis'd prize.
He claims the bull with awless insolence;
And, having seiz'd his horns, accosts the prince:
If none my matchless valour dares oppose,
How long shall Dares wait his dastard foes?
Permit me, chief, permit without delay,
To lead this uncontended gift away.
The crowd assents; and, with redoubled cries,
For the proud challenger demands the prize.
Acestes, fir'd with just disdain, to see
The palm usurp'd without a victory,
Reproach'd Entellus thus; who late beside,
And heard, and saw unmov'd, the Trojan's pride:
Once, but in vain, a champion of renown,
So tamely can you bear the ravish'd crown?
A prize in triumph, borne before your fight,
And shun for fear the danger of the fight;
Where is our Eryx now, the boasted name,
The god who taught your thundering arm the game?

Where now your baffled honour, where the spoil
That fill'd your house, and fame that fill'd our isle?

Entellus, thus: My soul is still the same;
Unmov'd with fear, and mov'd with martial fame:
But my chill blood is curdled in my veins,
And scarce the shadow of a man remains.
Oh, could I turn to that fair prime again,
That prime, of which this boaster is so vain!
The brave who this decrepit age defies,
Should feel my force, without the promis'd prize.
He said, and, rising at the word, he threw
Two ponderous gauntlets down, in open view;
Gauntlets, which Eryx went in fight to wield,
And sheath his hands within the luted field.
With fear and wonder seiz'd, the crowd beholds
The gloves of death, with seven distinguish'd folds

Of tough bull hides; the space within is spread
With iron, or with loads of heavy lead.
Dares himself was daunted at the sight,
Renounc'd his challenge, and refus'd to fight.
Astonish'd at their weight the hero stands,
And pois'd the ponderous engines in his hands.
What had your wonder, said Entellus, been,
Had you the gauntlets of Alcides seen,
Or view'd the stern debate on this unhappy
green!

These which I bear, your brother Eryx bore,
Still mark'd with batter'd brains and mingled
gore.

With these he long sustain'd th' Herculean arm;
And these I wielded while my blood was warm:
This languish'd frame while better spirits fed,
Ere age unstrung my nerves, or time o'erinow'd my head.

But, if the challenger these arms refuse,
And cannot wield their weight, or dare not use;
If great Æneas and Acestes join
In his request, these gauntlets I resign:
Let us with equal arms perform the fight,
And let him leave to fear, since I resign my right.
This said, Entellus for the strife prepares;
Strip'd of his quilted coat, his body bares:
Compos'd of mighty bones and brawn he stands,
A godly towering object on the sands.

Then just Æneas equal arms supply'd, [ty'd ;
Which round their shoulders to their wrists they loth on the tiptoe stand, at full extent ;
Their arms aloft, their bodies inly bent ;
Their heads from aiming blows they bear afar ;
With clashing gauntlets then provoke the war.
One on his youth and pliant limbs relies ;
One on his sinews and his giant size.

The last is stiff with age, his motion slow,
He heaves for breath : he staggers to and fro ;
And clouds of issuing smoke his nostrils loudly
blow.

Yet, equal in success, they ward, they strike ;
Their ways are different, but their art alike.
Before, behind, the blows are dealt ; around
Their hollow sides the rattling thumps rebound :
A storm of strokes well-meant with fury flies,
And errs about their temples, ears, and eyes :
Nor always errs ; for oft the gauntlet draws
A sweeping stroke along the crackling jaws.

Leavy with age, Entellus stands his ground,
but, with his warping body, wards the wound :
his hand and watchful eye keep even pace ;
While Dares traverses, and shifts his place ;
And, like a captain, who beleaguers round
some strong-built castle, on a rising ground,
Views all th' approaches with observing eyes,
This, and that other part, in vain he tries ;
And more on industry than force relies.
With hands on high, Entellus threatens the foe ;
but Dares watch'd the motion from below,
and slipt aside, and shunn'd the long-descending blow.

Entellus waxes his forces on the wind ;
And thus deluded of the stroke design'd,
Headlong and heavy fell : his ample breast,
And weighty limbs his ancient mother preis'd.
So falls a hollow pine, that long had stood
On Ida's height, or Erymanthus' wood,
Born from the roots : the differing nations rise,
And shouts, and mingled murmurs, rend the skies.
Acestes runs, with eager haste, to raise
The fall'n companion of his youthful days :
Dauntless he rose, and to the fight return'd,
With shame his glowing cheeks, his eyes with fury burn'd :

Disdain and conscious virtue fir'd his breast,
And, with redoubled force, his foe he press'd.
He lays on load with either hand, amain,
And headlong drives the Trojan o'er the plain,
Nor stops, nor stays ; nor rest nor breath allows,
But storms of strokes descend about his brows ;
A rattling tempest, and a hail of blows,
But now the prince, who saw the wild increase
Of wounds, commands the combatants to cease :
And bounds Entellus' wrath, and bids the peace.

First to the Trojan, spent with toil, he came,
And sooth'd his sorrow for the suffer'd shame.
What fury seiz'd my friend? the gods, said he,
To him propitious, and averse to thee,
Have giv'n his arm superior force to thine ;
'Tis madness to contend with strength divine.
The gauntlet fight thus ended, from the shore
His faithful friends unhappy Dares bore :
His mouth and nostrils pour'd a purple flood
And pounded teeth came rushing with his blood.

Faintly he stagger'd through the hissing throng ;
And hung his head, and trail'd his legs along.
The sword and casque are carry'd by his train ;
But with his foe the palm and ox remain.

The champion, then, before Æneas came ;
Proud of his prize, but prouder of his fame :
O goddess-born ! and you Dardanian host,
Mark with attention, and forgive my boast :
Learn what I was, by what remains ; and know
From what impending fate you sav'd my foe.
Sternly he spoke ; and then confronts the bull ;
And, on his ample forehead aiming full,
The deadly stroke, descending, pierc'd the skull.

Down drops the beast ; nor needs the second wound ; [ground.

But sprawls in pangs of death, and spurns the Then thus. In Dares' stead I offer this ;
Eryx, accept a nobler sacrifice :
Take the last gift my wither'd arms can yield ;
Thy gauntlets I resign, and here renounce the field.

This done, Æneas orders, for the close,
The strife of archers with contending bows.
The mast, Sergethus' shatter'd galley bore,
With his own hands he raises on the shore :
A fluttering dove upon the top they tie,
The living mark at which their arrows fly.
The rival archers in a line advance ;
Their turn of shooting to receive from chance.
A helmet holds their names. The lots are drawn ;
On the first scroll was read Hippocoon :
The people shout ; upon the next was found
Young Mæstheus, late with naval honours
crown'd :

The third contain'd Eurytian's noble name,
Thy brother, Pandarus, and next in fame :
Whom Pallas urg'd the treaty to confound,
And send among the Greeks a feather'd wound.
Acestes in the bottom last remain'd ;
Whom not his age from youthful sports restrain'd.
Soon all with vigour bend their trusty bows,
And, from the quiver, each his arrow chose :
Hippocoon's was the first : with forceful sway
It flew, and, whizzing, cut the liquid way.
Fix'd in the mast the feather'd weapon stands
The fearful pigeon flutters in her bands ;
And the tree trembled ; and the shouting cries
Of the pleas'd people rend the vaulted skies.
Then Mæstheus to the head his arrow drove,
With lifted eyes, and took his aim above ;
But made a glancing shot, and mis'd the dove.
Yet mis'd so narrow, that he cut the cord
Which fasten'd, by the foot, the sitting bird.
The captive thus releas'd, away she flies,
And beats, with clapping wings, the yielding
skies.

His bow already bent, Eurytian stood,
And, having first invoc'd his brother god,
His winged shaft with eager haste he sped ;
The fatal message reach'd her as she fled :
She leaves her life aloft : she strikes the ground,
And renders back the weapon in the wound.
Acestes, grudging at his lot, remains
Without a prize to gratify his pains.
Yet shooting upward, sends his shaft, to show
An archer's art, and boast his twanging bow.

The feather'd arrow gave a dire portent :
 And latter augurs judge from this event.
 Chaf'd by the speed, it fir'd; and, as it flew,
 A trail of following flames ascending drew :
 Kindling their mount, and mark the shiny way
 Across the skies, as falling meteors play,
 And vanish into wind, or in a blaze decay. }
 The Trojans and Sicilians wildly stare ;
 And, trembling, turn their wonder into prayer.
 The Dardan prince put on a smiling face,
 And strain'd Acestes with a close embrace :
 Then, honouring him with gifts above the rest,
 Turn'd the bad omen, nor his fears confests'd.
 The gods, said he, this miracle have wrought ;
 And order'd you the prize without the lot.
 Accept this goblet rough with figur'd gold,
 Which Thracian Cisseus gave my fire of old :
 This pledge of ancient amity receive,
 Which to my second fire I justly give.
 He said, and, with the trumpet's cheerful sound,
 Proclaim'd him victor, and with laurel crown'd.
 Nor good Eurytan envy'd him the prize ;
 Though he transix'd the pigeon in the skies.
 Who cut the line, with second gifts was grac'd ;
 The third was his, whose arrow pierc'd the mast.
 The chief, before the games were wholly done,
 Call'd Periphantes, tutor to his son ;
 And whisper'd thus : With speed Ascanius find,
 And if his childish troop be ready join'd,
 On horseback let him grace his grandfire's day ;
 And lead his equals arm'd in juit array.
 He said, and, calling out, the cirque he clears :
 The crowd withdrawn, an open plain appears,
 And now the noble youths, of form divine,
 Advance before their fathers in a line :
 The riders grace the steeds ; the steeds with glory shine. }
 Thus marching on, in military pride,
 Shouts of applause resound from side to side.
 Their casques, adorn'd with laurel wreaths, they wear,
 Each brandishing aloft a cornel spear.
 Somè at their backs their gilded quivers bore ;
 Their chains of burnish'd gold hung down before :
 Three graceful troops they form'd upon the
 green ;
 Three graceful leaders at their head were seen ;
 Twelve follow'd every chief, and left a space between. }
 The first young Priam led ; a lovely boy,
 Whose grandfire was th' unhappy king of Troy :
 His race, in after-time, was known to fame,
 New honours adding to the Latian name ;
 And well the royal boy his Thracian steed became. }
 White were the fetlocks of his feet before,
 And on his front a snowy star he bore :
 Then beauteous Atis, with Iulus bred,
 Of equal age, the second squadron led.
 The last in order, but the first in place,
 First in the lovely features of his face,
 Rode fair Ascanius on a fiery steed,
 Queen Dido's gift, and of the Tyrian breed.
 Sure courfers for the rest the king ordains,
 With golden bits adorn'd, and purple reins.
 The pleas'd spectators peals of shouts renew,
 And all the parents in the children view :

Their make, their motions, and their spright
 grace :
 And hopes and fears alternate in their face.
 Th' unledg'd commanders, and their martir
 First make the circuit of the sandy plain, [train
 Around their fires : and at th' appointed sign,
 Drawn up in beauteous order, form a line.
 The second signal sounds : the troop divides
 In three distinguish'd parts, with three distinguish'd guides.
 Again they close, and once again disjoin,
 In troop to troop oppos'd, and line to line. [aft
 They meet, they wheel, they throw their dar
 With harmless rage, and well-diffembled war.
 Then in a round the mingled bodies run ;
 Flying they follow, and pursuing shun.
 Broken they break, and rallying, they renew
 In other forms the military show.
 At last, in order, undiscern'd they join ;
 And march together, in a friendly line.
 And, as the Cretan labyrinth of old,
 With wandering ways, and many a winding fold
 Involv'd the weary feet, without redrefs,
 In a round error, which deny'd redcs ;
 So fought the Trojan boys in warlike play,
 Turn'd, and return'd, and still a different way.
 Thus dolphins, in the deep, each other chase,
 In circles, when they swim around the watery race
 This game, these carousals, Ascanius taught ;
 And, building Alba, to the Latins brought.
 Show'd what he learn'd : the Latin fires impart
 To their succeeding sons, the graceful art :
 From these imperial Rome receiv'd the game ;
 Which Troy, the youths the Trojan troop, the Thus far the sacred sports they celebrate : [nan
 But Fortune soon resum'd her ancient hate,
 For while they pay the dead his annual dues,
 Those envy'd rites Saturnian Juno views ;
 And sends the goddess of the various bow,
 To try new methods of revenge below :
 Supplies the winds to wing her airy way ;
 Where in the port secure the navy lay.
 Swiftly fair Iris down her arch descends ;
 And, undiscern'd, her fatal voyage ends.
 She saw the gathering crowd ; and gliding thenc
 The desert shore, and fleet without defence.
 The Trojan matrons on the sands alone,
 With sighs, and tears, Anchises' death bemoan.
 Then, turning to the sea their weeping eyes,
 Their pity to themselves, renews their cries.
 Alas ! said one, what oceans yet remain
 For us to fail ; what labours to sustain !
 All take the word ; and, with a general groan, Implore the gods for peace ; and places of the
 own.
 The goddess, great in mischief, views their pains
 And, in a woman's form, her heavenly limbs restrains.
 In face and shape, old Beroë she became,
 Doriclus' wife, a venerable dame ;
 Once blest'd with riches, and a mother's name.
 Thus chang'd, amidst the crying crowd she ran,
 Mix'd with the matrons, and these words began
 O wretched we, whom not the Grecian power,
 Nor flames destroy'd, in Troy's unhappy hour !
 O wretched we, reserv'd by cruel fate,
 Beyond the ruins of the sinking state !

Now seven revolving years are wholly run,
 Since this improper voyage we begun:
 Since tois'd from shores to shores, from lands to Inhabitable rocks and barren sands; [lands,
 Wandering in exile, through the stormy sea,
 We search in vain for flying Italy.
 Now cast by fortune on this kindred land,
 What should our rest, and rising walls with- }
 Or hinder here to fix our banish'd band? [stand? }
 O, country lost! and gods redeem'd in vain,
 If still in endless exile we remain!
 Shall we no more the Trojan walls renew,
 Or streams of some resembling Simois view?
 Haste, join with me, th' unhappy fleet consume:
 Cassandra bids, and I declare her doom.
 In sleep I saw her; she supply'd my hands
 (For this I more than dreamt) with flaming brands:
 With these, said she, these wandering ships de- } stroy;
 These are your fatal seats, and this your Troy. }
 Time calls you now, the precious hour employ.
 Slack not the good presage, while heaven inspires
 Our minds to dare, and gives the ready fires.
 See Neptune's altars minister their brands;
 The god is pleas'd; the god supplies our hands.
 Then, from the pile, a flaming fir she drew,
 And, tois'd in air, amidst the gallees threw.
 Wrap'd in amaze, the matrons wildly stare:
 Then Pyrgo, reverenc'd for her hoary hair,
 Pyrgo, the nurse of Priam's numerous race,
 No Beroë this, though she belies her face:
 What terrors from her frowning front arise;
 Behold a goddess in her ardent eyes!
 What rays around her heavenly face are seen,
 Mark her majestic voice, and more than mortal mien!
 Beroë but now I left; whom, pin'd with pain,
 Her age and anguish from their rites detain.
 She said; the matrons, seiz'd with new amaze,
 Roll their malignant eyes, and on the navy gaze:
 They fear, and hope, and neither part obey:
 They hope the fated land, but fear the fatal way.
 The goddess, having done her task below,
 Mounts up on equal wings, and bends her painted bow.
 Struck with the sight, and seiz'd with rage divine,
 The matrons prosecute their mad design:
 They shriek aloud, they snatch, with impious
 hands,
 The food of altars, firs, and flaming brands.
 Green boughs, and saplings, mingled in their haste;
 And smoking torches on the ships they cast.
 The flame, untopp'd at first, more fury gains;
 And Vulcan rides at large with loosen'd reins:
 Triumphant to the painted sterns he soars,
 And seizes in his way the banks and crackling oars.
 Eumelus was the first the news to bear,
 While yet they crowd the rural theatre.
 Then what they hear, is witness'd by their eyes:
 A storm of sparkles and of flames arise.
 Æscanius took th' alarm, while yet he led
 His early warriors on his prancing steed.
 And spurring on, his equals soon o'erpass'd,
 Nor could his frighted friends reclaim his haste.
 Soon as the royal youth appear'd in view,
 He sent his voice before him as he flew;

What madness moves you, matrons, to destroy
 The last remainders of unhappy Troy?
 Not hostile fleets, but your own hopes you burn,
 And on your friends your fatal fury turn,
 Behold your own Æscanius; while he said
 He drew his glittering helmet from his head; }
 In which the youths to sportful arms he led. }
 By this, Æneas and his train appear;
 And now the women, seiz'd with shame and fear,
 Dispers'd, to woods and caverns take their flight;
 Abhor their actions, and avoid the light:
 Their friends acknowledge, and their error find;
 And shake the goddesses from the altar's mind.
 Not to the raging fires their fury cease;
 But lurking in the seams, with seeming peace,
 Work on their way, amid the smouldering tow,
 Sure in destruction, but in motion slow.
 The silent plague through the green timber eats,
 And vomits out a tardy flame by fits.
 Down to the keels, and upward to the sails,
 The fire descends, or mounts; but still prevails:
 Nor buckets pour'd, nor strength of human hand,
 Can the victorious element withstand.
 The pious hero rends his robe, and throws
 To heaven his hands, and with his hands his vows:
 O Jove, he cry'd, if prayers can yet have place;
 If thou abhor'st not all the Dardan race;
 If any spark of pity still remain;
 If gods are gods, and not invok'd in vain; }
 Yet spare the relics of the Trojan train. }
 Yet from the flames our burning vessels free:
 Or let thy fury fall alone on me.
 At this devoted head thy thunder throw,
 And send the willing sacrifice below.
 Scarce had he said, when southern storms arise;
 From pole to pole the forky lightning flies;
 Loud rattling shakes the mountains and the plain;
 Heaven bellies downward, and descends in rain;
 Whole sheets of water from the clouds are sent,
 Which, hissing through the planks, the flames prevent:
 And stop the fiery pest: four ships alone
 Burn to the waste, and for the fleet atone.
 But doubtful thoughts the hero's heart divide;
 If he should still in Sicily reside,
 Forgetful of his fates; or tempt the main,
 In hope the promis'd Italy to gain.
 Then Nautes, old and wise, to whom alone
 The will of heaven by Pallas was fore-shown;
 Vers'd in portents, experienc'd and inspir'd
 To tell events, and what the Fates requir'd:
 Thus while he stood, to neither part inclin'd,
 With cheerful words reliev'd his labouring mind.
 O goddess-born, resign'd in every state,
 With patience bear, with prudence push your fate.
 By suffering well, our fortune we subdue;
 Fly when she frowns, and when she calls pursue.
 Your friend Æcetes is of Trojan kind;
 To him disclose the secrets of your mind:
 Trust in his hands your old and useless train,
 Too numerous for the ships which yet remain:
 The feeble, old, indulgent of their ease,
 The dames who dread the dangers of the seas,
 With all their dastard crew, who dare not stand
 The flock of battle with your foes by land;
 Here you may build a common town for all;
 And, from Æcetes' name, Æceta call.

The reasons, with his friend's experience join'd,
 Encourag'd much, but more disturb'd his mind.
 'Twas dead of night; when to his slumbering eyes,
 His father's shade descended from the skies;
 And thus he spake: O more than vital breath,
 Lov'd while I liv'd, and dear ev'n after death;
 O son, in various toils and troubles tuis'd,
 The king of heaven employs my careful ghost
 On his commands; the God who sav'd from fire
 Your flaming fleet, and heard your just desire:
 The wholesome counsel of your friend receive;
 And here the coward train, and women leave:
 The chosen youth, and those who nobly dare
 Transport, to tempt the dangers of the war.
 The stern Italians with their courage try;
 Rough are their manners, and their minds are high.
 But first to Pluto's palace you should go,
 And seek my shade among the blest below.
 For not with impious ghosts my soul remains,
 Nor suffers, with the damn'd, perpetual pains,
 But breathes the living air of soft Elysian plains.
 The chaste Sibylla shall your steps convey;
 And blood of offer'd victims free the way;
 There shall you know what realms the gods assign;
 And learn the fates and fortunes of your line.
 But now, farewell: I vanish with the night;
 But breathes the blast of heaven's approaching light:
 He said, and mix'd with shades, and took his airy
 flight.

Whither to fast, the filial duty cry'd,
 And why, ah why, the wish'd embrace deny'd!
 He said, and rose: as holy zeal inspires,
 He rakes hot embers, and renews the fires.
 His country gods and Vesta then adores
 With cakes and incense; and their aid implores.
 Next for his friends and royal host he sent,
 Reveald his vision and the gods intent,
 With his own purpose. All, without delay,
 The will of Jove and his desires obey.
 They sit with women each degenerate name,
 Who dares not hazard life, for future fame.
 These they cashier: the brave remaining few,
 Oars, banks, and cables half consum'd renew.
 The prince designs a city with the plough;
 The lots their several tenements allow.
 This part is nam'd from Ilium, that from Troy;
 And the new king ascends the throne with joy.
 A chosen senate from the people draws;
 Appoints the judges, and ordains the laws.
 Then on the top of Eryx, they begin
 A rising temple to the Pamphian queen:
 Anchises, last, is honour'd as a god;
 A priest is added, annual gifts bestow'd;
 And groves are planted round his blest abode.
 Nine days they pass in feasts, their temples
 crown'd;
 And fumes of incense in the fanes abound.
 Then, from the south arose a gentle breeze,
 That curl'd the smoothness of the glad seas:
 The rising winds a ruffling gale afford,
 And call the merry mariners aboard.
 Now loud laments along the shores resound,
 Of parting friends in close embraces bound.
 The trembling women, the degenerate train,
 Who shunn'd the frightful dangers of the main,
 Ev'n those desire to sail, and take their share
 Of the rough passage, and the promis'd war.

Whom good Æneas cheers; and recommends
 To their new master's care, his fearful friends.
 On Eryx' altars three fat calves he lays;
 A lamb new fallen to the stormy seas;
 Then slips his haufers, and his anchors weighs.
 High on the deck the godlike hero stands;
 With olive crown'd; a charger in his hands;
 Then cast the reeking entrails in the brine,
 And pour'd the sacrifice of purple wine.
 Fresh gales arise, with equal strokes they vie,
 And brush the buxom seas, and o'er the billows fly.

Mean time the nother goddess, full of fears,
 To Neptune thus address'd, with tender tears:
 The pride of Jove's imperious queen, the rage,
 The malice which no sufferings can assuage,
 Compel me to these prayers: since neither fate,
 Nor time, nor pity, can remove her hate.
 Ev'n Jove is thwarted by his haughty wife;
 And vanquish'd, yet she still renews the strife.
 As if 'twere little to consume the town [crown:
 Which av'd the world, and wore th' imperial
 She prosecutes the ghost of Troy with pains;
 And gnaws, ev'n to the bones, the last remains.
 Let her the causes of her hatred tell;
 But you can witness its effects too well.
 You saw the storms the rais'd on Libyan floods,
 That mix'd the mountain billows with the clouds;
 When, bribing Æolus, she strook the main;
 And mov'd rebellion in your watery reign.
 With fury she possess'd the Dardau dames'
 To burn their fleet with execrable flames:
 And forc'd Æneas, when his ships were lost,
 To leave his followers on a foreign coast:
 For what remains, your godhead I implore;
 And trust my son to your protecting power.
 If neither Jove's nor fate's decree withhold,
 Secure his passage to the Latian land.

Then thus the mighty ruler of the main:
 What may not Venus hope, from Neptune's reign?
 My kingdom claims your birth: my late defence
 Of your endanger'd fleet, may claim your confidence,
 Nor less by land than sea, my deeds declare,
 How much your lov'd Æneas is my care.
 Thee, Xanthus, and thee, Simois, I attest:
 Your Trojan troops when proud Achilles press'd,
 And drove before him headlong on the plain,
 And dash'd against their walls the trembling
 train,
 When floods were fill'd with bodies of the slain:
 When crimson Xanthus, doubtful of his way,
 Stood-up on ridges to behold the sea; [way,
 New heaps came tumbling in, and chok'd his
 When your Æneas fought, but fought with odds,
 Of force unequal; and unequal gods;
 I spread a cloud before the victor's sight,
 Suitain'd the vanquish'd, and secur'd his flight.
 Ev'n then secur'd him, when I fought with joy
 The vow'd destruction of ungrateful Troy.
 My will's the same: fair goddess, fear no more,
 Your fleet shall safely gain the Latian shore:
 Their lives are given; one destin'd head alone
 Shall perish, and for multitudes atone.
 Thus having arm'd with hopes her anxious mind,
 His sinny team Satarnian Neptune join'd.
 Then adds the foamy bride to their jaws,
 And to the loosen'd reins permits the laws.

High on the waves his azure car he guides;
 At axles thunder, and the sea subsides;
 And the smooth ocean rolls her silent tides.
 The tempests fly before her father's face;
 Fraims of inferior gods his triumph grace;
 And monster whales before their master play,
 And choirs of tritons crowd the watery way.
 The martial'd powers in equal troops divide
 To right and left: the gods his better side Encloie, and on the worse the nymphs and nereids ride.

Now smiling hope, with sweet vicissitude,
 Within the hero's mind, his joys renew'd.
 He calls to raise the masts, the sheets display;
 The cheerful crew with diligence obey;
 They scud before the wind, and sail in open sea.

A-head of all the master pilot steers,
 And, as he leads, the following navy veers,
 The steeds of night had travell'd half the sky,
 The drowsy rowers on their benches lie;
 When the soft god of sleep, with easy flight,
 Descends, and draws behind a trail of light.
 Thou, Palinurus, art his destin'd prey;
 To thee alone he takes his fatal way.
 Dire dreams to thee, and iron sleep he bears;
 And, lighting on thy prow, the form of Phorbas wears.

Then thus the traitor god began his tale:
 The winds, my friend, inspire a pleasing gale;
 The ships, without thy care, securely sail.
 Now steal an hour of sweet repose; and I
 Will take the rudder, and thy room supply.
 To whom the yawning pilot, half asleep
 Me dost thou bid to trust the treacherous deep!

The harlot-smiles of her dissembling face,
 And to her faith commit the Trojan race?
 Shall I believe the syren south again,
 And, oft betray'd, not know the monster main?
 He said, his fasten'd hands the rudder keep,
 And, fix'd on heaven, his eyes repel invading sleep.
 The god was wroth, and at his temples threw
 A branch in Lethe dipp'd, and drunk with Stygian dew:

The pilot, vanquish'd by the power divine,
 Soon clos'd his swimming eyes, and lay supine.
 Scarce were his limbs extended at their length,
 The god, insulting with superior strength,
 Fell heavy on him, plung'd him in the sea,
 And, with the stern, the ruddier tore away.
 Headlong he fell, and, struggling in the main,
 Cry'd out for helping hands, but cry'd in vain:
 The victor dæmon mounts obscure in air;
 While the ship sails without the pilot's care.

On Neptune's faith the floating fleet relies:
 But what the man forsook, the god supplies;
 And o'er the dangerous deep secure the navy
 flies:

Glides by the syren's cliffs, a shelly coast,
 Long infamous for ships and sailors lost;
 And white with bones: th' impetuous ocean roars;
 And rocks rebel from the sounding shores.
 The watchful hero felt the knocks; and found
 The tossing vessel sail'd on shoaly ground.
 Sure of his pilot's loss, he takes himself
 The helm, and steers aloof, and swims the shelf.
 Inly he griev'd, and, groaning from the breast,
 Deplor'd his death; and thus his pain express'd:
 For faith repos'd on seas, and on the flattering sky,
 Thy naked corpse is doom'd on shores unknown to lie.

B O O K VI.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Sibyl foretels Æneas the adventures he should meet with in Italy: she attends him to hell: describing to him the various scenes of that place, and conducting him to his father Anchises: who instructs him in those sublime mysteries of the soul of the world, and the transmigration: and shows him that glorious race of heroes which was to descend from him and his posterity.

HE said, and wept: then spread his sails before
 The winds, and reach'd at length the Cuman
 shore:

Their anchors dropt, his crew the vessels moor.
 Then turn their heads to sea, their stern to land;
 And greet, with greedy joy, th' Italian strand.
 Some strike from clashing flints their fiery seed;
 Some gather sticks the kindled flames to feed;
 Or search for hollow trees, and fell the woods,
 Or trace through vallies the discover'd floods.
 Thus, while their several charges they fulfil,
 The pious prince ascends the sacred hill
 Where Phœbus is ador'd; and seeks the shade
 Which hides from sight his venerable maid.
 Deep in a cave the Sibyl makes abode;
 Thence full of fate returns, and of the god.
 Thro' Trivia's grove they walk; and now behold,
 And enter now the temple roof'd with gold.

When Dædalus, to fly the Cretan shore,
 His heavy limbs on jointed pinions bore
 (The first who fail'd in air), 'tis sung by fame,

To the Cumean coast at length he came;
 And here alighting, built this costly frame.
 Inscrib'd to Phœbus, here he hung on high
 The steerage of his wings, that cuts the sky;
 Then o'er the lofty gate his heart emboss'd
 Androgeos' death, and offerings to his ghost:
 Seven youths from Athens yearly sent, to meet
 The fate appointed by revengeful Crete.
 And next to those the dreadful urn was plac'd,
 In which the destin'd names by lots were cast:
 The mournful parents stand around in tears;
 And rising Crete against their shore appears.
 There too, in living sculpture, might be seen
 And mad affection of the Cretan queen:

Then how she cheats her bellowing lover's eye :
 The rushing leap, the doubtful progeny,
 The lower part a beast, a man above,
 The monument of their polluted love.
 Nor far from thence he grav'd the wondrous maze ;
 A thousand doors, a thousand winding ways ;
 Here dwells the monster, hid from human view,
 Not to be found but by the faithful clue :
 Till the kind artist, mov'd with pious grief,
 Lent to the loving maid this last relief ;
 And all those erring paths describ'd so well,
 That Theseus conquer'd, and the monster fell.
 Here hapless Icarus had found his part ;
 Had not the father's grief restrain'd his art.
 He twice essay'd to cast his son in gold ;
 Twice from his hands he drop'd the forming mould.

All this with wondering eyes Æneas view'd :
 Each varying object his delight renew'd.
 Eager to read the rest, Achates came,
 And by his side the mad divining dame ;
 The priestess of the god, Deiphobe her name. }
 Time suffers not, she said, to feed your eyes
 With empty pleasures : haste the sacrifice.
 Seven bullocks yet unyok'd, for Phœbus choose,
 And for Diana seven unspotted ewes.
 This said, the servants urge the sacred rites ;
 While to the temple she the prince invites.
 A spacious cave, within its farthest part,
 Was hew'd and fashion'd by laborious art
 Through the hills hollow sides : before the place,
 A hundred doors, a hundred entries grace :
 As many voices issue ; and the sound
 Of Sibyls' words as many times rebound.
 Now to the mouth they come : Aloud he cries,
 This is the time ; inquire your destinies.
 He comes, behold the god ! Thus while she said
 (And shivering at the sacred entry staid),
 Her colour chang'd, her face was not the same,
 And hollow groans from her deep spirit came.
 Her hair stood up ; convulsive rage possess'd
 Her trembling limbs, and heav'd her labouring breast.

Greater than human-kind the seem'd to look :
 And, with an accent more than mortal, spoke,
 Her staring eyes with sparkling fury roll ;
 When all the god came rushing on her soul.
 Swiftly she turn'd, and foaming as she spoke,
 Why this delay ? she cried ; the powers invoke :
 Thy prayers alone can open this abode,
 Else vain are my demands, and dumb the god.
 She said no more : the trembling Trojans hear :
 O'erspread with a damp sweat, and holy fear :
 The prince himself, with awful dread possess'd,
 His vows to great Apollo thus address'd :
 Indulgent god, propitious power to Troy,
 Swift to relieve, unwilling to destroy ;
 Directed by whose hand, the Dardan dart
 Pierc'd the proud Grecian's only mortal part :
 Thus far, by fate's decrees, and thy commands,
 Through ambient seas, and through devouring
 sands,
 Our exil'd crew has sought th' Ausonian ground ;
 And now, at length, the flying coast is found ;
 Thus far the fate of Troy, from place to place,
 With fury has pursued her wandering race :
 Here cease, ye powers, and let your vengeance
 Troy is no more, and can no more offend. [end

And thou, O sacred maid ! inspir'd to see
 Th' event of things in dark futurity,
 Give me, what heaven has promis'd to my fate,
 To conquer and command the Latian state :
 To fix my wandering gods, and find a place
 For the long exiles of the Trojan race.
 Then shall my grateful hands a temple rear
 To the twin gods, with vows and solemn prayer
 And annual rites, and festivals, and games,
 Shall be perform'd to their auspicious names ;
 Nor shalt thou want thy honours in my land,
 For there thy faithful oracles shall stand,
 Preserv'd in shrines : and every sacred lay,
 Which, by thy mouth, Apollo shall convey :
 All shall be treasur'd, by a chosen train
 Of holy priests, and ever shall remain.
 But, Oh ! commit not thy prophetic mind
 To sitting leaves, the sport of every wind,
 Left they disperse in air our every fate :
 Write not, but, what the powers ordain, relate.

Struggling in vain, impatient of her load,
 And labouring underneath the ponderous god,
 The more she strove to shake him from her breast,
 With more, and far superior force he press'd :
 Commands his entrance, and, without control,
 Usurps her organs, and inspires her soul.
 Now, with a furious blast, the hundred doors
 Ope of themselves, a rushing whirlwind roars
 Within the cave ; and Sibyl's voice restores :

Escap'd the dangers of the watery reign,
 Yet more and greater ills, by land remain ;
 The coast so long desir'd (nor doubt th' event)
 Thy troops shall reach, but having reach'd, repent.
 Wars, horrid wars I view ; a field of blood ;
 And Tyber rolling with a purple flood.
 Simois nor Xanthus shall be wanting there ;
 A new Achilles shall in arms appear :
 And he, too, goddes-born : fierce Juno's hate,
 Added to hostile force, shall urge thy fate.
 To what strange nations shalt thou resort !
 Driven to solicit aid at every court !
 The cause the same which Ilium once oppress'd,
 A foreign mistress and a foreign guest :
 But thou, secure of soul, unbent with woes,
 The more thy fortune frowns, the more oppose.
 The dawns of thy safety shall be shown,
 From whence thou least shalt hope, a Grecian
 town.

Thus, from the dark recess, the Sibyl spoke,
 And the resiting air the thunder broke :
 The cave rebellow'd, and the temple shook. }
 Th' ambiguous god, who rul'd her labouring
 breast,
 In these mysterious words his mind express'd :
 Some truths reveal'd, in terms involv'd the rest.
 At length her fury fell, her foaming ceas'd,
 And, ebbing in her soul, the god decreas'd.
 Then thus the chief : No terror to my view,
 No frightful face of danger can be new :
 Inur'd to suffer, and resolv'd to dare, [my care.
 The fates, without my power, shall be without This let me crave, since near your grove the road
 To hell lies open, and the dark abode.
 Which Acheron surrounds, th' innavigable flood :
 Conduct me through the regions void of light,
 And lead me longing to my father's sight :

For him, a thousand dangers I have fought;
 And, rushing where the thickest Grecians fought,
 I safe on my back the sacred burden brought.
 He, for my sake, the raging ocean try'd,
 And wrath of heaven; my still auspicious guide,
 And bore beyond the strength decrepit age sup-
 ply'd.

Of since he breath'd his last, in dead of night,
 His reverend image stood before my sight;
 Enjoin'd to seek below his holy shade;
 Conducted there by your unerring aid:
 But you, if pious minds by prayers are won,
 Oblige the father, and protect the son.
 Yours is the power; nor Proserpine in vain
 Has made you priestesses of her nightly reign.
 If Orpheus, arm'd with his enchanting lyre,
 The ruthless king with pity could inspire,
 And from the shades below redeem his wife;
 If Pollux, offering his alternate life,
 Could free his brother; and can daily go
 By turns aloft, by turns descend below;
 Why name I Theseus, or his greater friend,
 Who trod the downward path, and upward could ascend!

Not less than theirs, from Jove my lineage came:
 My mother greater, my descent the same.
 So pray'd the Trojan prince; and, while he pray'd,
 His hand upon the holy altar laid.
 Then thus reply'd the prophetess divine:
 O goddess-born! of great Anchises' line,
 The gates of hell are open night and day:
 Smooth the descent, and easy is the way:
 But, to return, and view the cheerful skies,
 In this the task and mighty labour lies.
 To few great Jupiter imparts this grace,
 And those of shining worth, and heavenly race.
 Betwixt those regions, and our upper light,
 Deep forests and impenetrable night
 Possess the middle space. Th' infernal bounds
 Cocytus, with his sable waves furrows:
 But, if so dire a love your soul invades,
 As twice below to view the trembling shades;
 If you so hard a toil will undertake,
 As twice to pass th' innavigable lake,
 Receive my counsel. In the neighbouring grove
 There stands a tree: the queen of Stygian Jove
 Claims it her own; thick woods and gloomy night
 Conceal the happy plant from human sight.
 One bough it bears; but, wondrous to behold,
 The ductile rind, and leaves, of radiant gold:
 This from the vulgar branches must be torn,
 And to fair Proserpine the present borne,
 Ere leave be given to tempt the nether skies:
 The first thus rent, a second will arise,
 And the same metal the same room supplies.
 Look round the wood, with lifted eyes to see
 The lurking gold upon the fatal tree:
 Then rend it off, as holy rites command;
 The willing metal will obey thy hand,
 Following with ease, if favour'd by thy fate,
 Thou art foredoom'd to view the Stygian state:
 If not, no labour can the tree constrain.
 And strength of stubborn arms, and steel are vain,
 Besides, you know not, while you here attend,
 Th' unworthy fate of your unhappy friend:
 Breathless he lies, and his unbury'd ghost,
 Depriv'd of funeral rites, pollutes your host.

Pay first his pious dues: and, for the dead,
 Two sable sheep around his herse be led:
 Then, living turfs upon his body lay;
 This done, securely take the destin'd way,
 To find the regions destitute of day.
 She said: and held her peace. Æneas went
 Sad from the cave, and full of discontent;
 Unknowing whom the sacred Sibyl meant.
 Achates, the companion of his breast,
 Goes grieving by his side with equal cares oppress'd.
 Walking they talk'd, and fruitlessly divin'd
 What friend the priestess, by those words, design'd:
 But soon they found an object to deplore;
 Misenus lay extended on the shore.
 Son of the god of winds; none so renown'd,
 The warrior trumpet in the field to sound:
 With breathing brass to kindle fierce alarms;
 And rouse to dare their fate, in honourable arms.
 He serv'd great Hector; and was ever near,
 Not with his trumpet only, but his spear,
 But, by Pelides' arm when Hector fell,
 He chose Æneas, and he chose as well.
 Sworn with applause, and aiming still at more,
 He now provokes the sea-gods from the shore;
 With envy Triton heard the martial sound,
 And the bold champion, for his challenge, drown'd.
 Then cast his mangled carcase on the strand;
 The gazing crowd around the body stand.
 All weep, but most Æneas mourns his fate,
 And hastens to perform the funeral state.
 In altar-wife a stately pile they rear;
 The basis broad below, and top advanc'd in air.
 An ancient wood, fit for the work design'd
 (The shady covert of the savage kind)
 The Trojans found: the founding ax is ply'd:
 Firs, pines, and pitch-trees, and the towering pride
 Of forest ashes, feel the fatal stroke,
 And piercing wedges cleave the stubborn oak.
 Huge trunks of trees, fell'd from the steepy crown
 Of the bare mountains, roll with ruins down.
 Arm'd like the rest the Trojan prince appears,
 And, by his pious labour, urges theirs.
 Thus while he wrought, revolving in his mind
 The ways to compass what his wish design'd,
 He cast his eyes upon the gloomy grove,
 And then, with vows, implor'd the queen of love:
 O may thy power, propitious still to me,
 Conduct my steps to find the fatal tree,
 In this deep forest; since the Sibyl's breath
 Foretold, alas! too true, Misenus' death.
 Scarce had he said, when, full before his sight,
 Two doves, descending from their airy flight,
 Secure upon the grassy plain alight.
 He knew his mother's birds; and thus he pray'd:
 Be you my guides, with your auspicious aid;
 And lead my footsteps, till the branch be found,
 Whose glittering shadow gilds the sacred ground:
 And thou, great parent! with celestial care,
 In this distress, be present to my prayer.
 Thus having said, he stopp'd: with watchful sight
 Observing still the motions of their flight,
 What course they took, what happy signs they
 show;
 They fed, and, fluttering by degrees, withdrew
 Still farther from the place, but still in view:
 Hopping, and flying, thus they led him on
 To the slow lake: whose baleful stench to shun,

They wing'd their flight aloft; then swooping low,
Perch'd on the double tree, that bears the golden bough. [glow;

Through the green leaves the glittering shadows
As on the sacred oak, the wint'ry mistleto:

Where the proud mother views her precious brood;
And happier branches, which she never sow'd.

Such was the glittering, such the ruddy rind,
And dancing leaves, that wanton'd in the wind.

He seiz'd the shining bough with gripping hold,
And rent away, with ease, the lingering gold:

Then to the Sibyl's palace bore the prize.

Mean time, the Trojan troops, with weeping
To dead Misenus pay his obsequies. [eyes.]

First from the ground a lofty pile they rear,
Of pitch-trees, oaks, and pines, and unctuous fir:

The fabric's front, with cypress twigs they strew,
And stick the sides with boughs of baleful yew.

The topmast part, his glittering arms adorn;
Warm waters, then, in brazen cauldrons borne,

Are pour'd to wash his body, joint by joint:
And fragrant oils the stiffen'd limbs anoint.

With groans and cries Misenus they deplore:
Then on a bier, with purple cover'd o'er,

The breathless body, thus bewail'd, they lay,
And fire the pile, their faces turn'd away

(Such reverend rites their fathers us'd to pay.)
Pure oil and incense on the fire they throw,

And fat of victims, which his friends bestow.
These gifts, the greedy flames to dust devour;

Then, on the living coals, red wine they pour:
And last, the relics by themselves dispose,

Which in a brazen urn the priests enclote.
Old Chlorineus compass'd thrice the crew,

And dipp'd an olive branch in loly dew;
Which thrice he sprinkled round, and thrice aloud

Invok'd the dead, and then dismiss'd the crowd.
But good Æneas order'd on the shore

A stately tomb; whose top a trumpet bore;
A soldier's Faulchion, and a seaman's oar.

This was his friend interr'd: and deathless fame
Still to the lofty cape consigns his name.

These rites perform'd, the prince, without delay,
Hastes to the nether world his destin'd way.

Deep was the cape; and downward as it went
From the wide mouth, a rocky rough descent;

And here th' access a gloomy grove defends:
And here th' unnavigable lake extends.

O'er whose unhappy waters, void of light,
No bird presumes to steer his airy flight;

Such deadly stench from the deep arise,
And steaming sulphur, that infects the skies.

From hence the Grecian bards their legends make,
And give the name Avernus to the lake.

Four sable bullocks, in the yoke untaught,
For sacrifice the pious hero brought;

The priestess pours the wine betwixt their horns;
Then cuts the curling hair; that first oblation

burns,

Invoking Hecate hither to repair
(A powerful name in hell, and upper air).

The sacred priests with ready knives bereave
The beasts of life, and in full bowls receive

The streaming blood: a lamb to hell and night
(The sable woad without a streak of white)

Æneas offers: and, by fates decree,
A barren heifer, Proserpine, to thee.

With holocausts he Pluto's altar fills:

Seven brawny bulls with his own hand he kills:
Then, on the broiling entrails, oil he powers;

Which, ointed thus, the raging flame devours:
Late, the nocturnal sacrifice begun;

Nor ended, till the next returning sun.
Then earth began to bellow, trees to dance,

And howling dogs in glimmering light advance,
Ere Hecate came: Far hence be souls profane,

The Sibyl cry'd, and from the grove abstain.
Now, Trojan, take the way thy fates afford,

Assume thy courage, and unsheath thy sword.
She said, and pass'd along the gloomy space,

The prince pursu'd her steps with equal pace.
Ye realms, yet unreveal'd to human sight,

Ye gods, who rule the regions of the night,
Ye-gliding ghosts, permit me to relate

The mystic wonders of your silent state.
Obscure they went through dreary shades, that

Along the waste dominions of the dead: [led
Thus wander travellers in woods by night,

By the moon's doubtful and malignant light:
When Jove in dusky clouds involves the skies,

And the faint crescent shoots by fits before their
Just in the gate, and in the jaws of hell, [eyes.

Revengeful cares and sullen sorrows dwell;
And pale diseases, and repining age;

Want, fear, and famine's unrelisted rage: [sleep,
Here toils, and death, and death's half-brother,

Forms terrible to view, their centry keep:
With anxious pleasures of a guilty mind,

Deep frauds before, and open force behind:
The furies iron beds, and strife that shakes

Her hissing tresses, and unfolds her snakes.
Full in the midit of this infernal road,

An elm displays her dusky arms abroad:
The god of sleep there hides his heavy head,

And empty dreams on every leaf are spread,
Of various forms unnumber'd spectres more;

Centaur's, and double shapes, besiege the door:
Before the passage horrid Hydra stands,

And Briareus with all his hundred hands:
Gorgons, Geryon with his triple frame,

And vain Chimæra vomits empty flame.
The chief unsheath'd his shining steel, prepar'd,

Though seiz'd with sudden fear, to force the guard,
Offering his brandish'd weapon at their face,

Had not the Sibyl stopp'd his eager pace,
And told him what those empty phantoms were;

Forms without bodies, and impassive air.
Hence to deep Acheron they take their way,

Whose troubled eddies, thick with ooze and clay,
Are whirl'd aloft, and in Cocytus-lost:

There Charon stands, who rules the dreary coast;
A sordid god: down from his hoary chin

A length of beard descends; uncomb'd, unclean:
His eyes, like hollow furnaces on fire:

A girdle, foul with grease, binds his obscene attire.
He spreads his canvas, with his pole he steers;

The freights of sitting ghosts in his thin bottom
bears.

He look'd in years; yet in his years were seen
A youthful vigour, and autumnal green.

An airy crowd came rushing where he stood,
Which fill'd the margin of the fatal flood,

Husbands and wives, boys and unmarried maids,
And mighty heroes more majestic shades,

And youths intomb'd before their father's eyes.
 With hollow groans, and shrieks, and feeble cries,
 Thick as the leaves in autumn strow the woods:
 Or fowls, for winter forc'd, forsake the floods,
 And wing their hasty flight to happier lands:
 Such, and so thick, the shivering army stands;
 And press for passage with extended hands.

Now these, now those, the surly boatman bore:
 The rest he drove to distance from the shore.
 The hero, who beheld, with wondering eyes,
 The tumult mix'd with shrieks, laments, and cries,
 Ask'd of his guide, what the rude concourse meant?
 Why to the shore the thronging people bent?
 What forms of law among the ghosts were us'd?
 Why some were ferry'd o'er, and some refus'd?

Son of Anchises, offspring of the gods,
 The Sibyl said, you see the Stygian floods,
 The sacred streams, which heaven's imperial state
 Attends in oaths, and fears to violate.

The ghosts rejected, are th' unhappy crew
 Depriv'd of sepulchres, and funeral due.

The boatman Charon; those the bury'd host,
 He ferries over to the farther coast,
 Nor dares his transport vessel cross the waves,
 With such whose bones are not compos'd in graves.

A hundred years they wander on the shore,
 At length, their penance done, are wafted o'er.
 The Trojan chief his forward pace repress'd;
 Revolving anxious thoughts within his breast.

He saw his friends, who, whelm'd beneath the waves, [quiet graves.

Their funeral honours claim'd, and ask'd their
 The lost Leucaspis in the crowd he knew;
 And the brave leader of the Lycian crew:
 Whom, on the Tyrrhene seas the tempests met;
 The sailors master'd, and the ship o'erlet.

Amidst the spirits Palinurus press'd;
 Yet fresh from life; a new admitted guest.

Who, while he steering, view'd the stars, and bore
 His course from Africa, to the Latian shore,
 Fell headlong down. The Trojan fix'd his view,
 And scarcely through the gloom the fullen shad-dow knew. [friend.

Then thus the prince: What envious power, O
 Brought your lov'd life to this disastrous end?

For Phœbus, ever true in all he said,
 Has, in your fate alone, my faith betray'd.

The god foretold, you should not die, before
 You reach'd, secure from seas, the Italian shore.

Is this th' unerring power? The ghost reply'd,
 Nor Phœbus flatter'd, nor his answers ly'd;

Nor envious gods have sent me to the deep:
 But while the stars, and course of heaven I keep,

My weary'd eyes were seiz'd with fatal sleep.
 I fell; and, with my weight, the helm constrain'd
 Was drawn along, which yet my gripe retain'd.

Now by the winds, and raging waves, I swear,
 Your safety, more than mine, was then my care:

Left, of the guide bereft, the rudder lost,
 Your ship should run against the rocky coast.

Three blustering nights, borne by the southern blast,

I floated, and discover'd land at last:
 High on a mountain wave my head I bore;

Forcing my strength, and gathering to the shore:

Panting, but past the danger, now I seiz'd
 The craggy cliffs, and my tir'd members eas'd.
 While, cumber'd with my dropping clothes, I lay,
 The cruel nation, covetous of prey,
 Stain'd with my blood th' unhospitable coast:
 And now, by winds and waves, my lifeless limbs
 are tost:

Which O avert, by yon ethereal light
 Which I have lost, for this eternal night:

Or, if by dearer ties you may be won,
 By your dead fire, and by your living son,
 Redeem from this reproach my wandering ghost,
 Or with your navy seek the Velin coast;

And in a peaceful grave my corpse compose:
 Or, if a nearer way your mother shows,
 Without whose aid, you durst not undertake
 This frightful passage o'er the Stygian lake;

Send to this wretch your hand, and waft him o'er
 To the sweet banks of yon forbidden shore.
 Scarce had he said, the prophetess began,
 What hopes delude thee, miserable man?

Think't thou, thus uninter'd, to cross the
 floods,

To view the furies, and infernal gods;
 And visit, without leave, the dark abodes?

Attend the term of long revolving years:
 Fate, and the dooming gods, are deaf to tears.

This comfort of thy dire misfortune take;
 The wrath of heaven, inflict for thy sake,
 With vengeance shall pursue th' inhuman coast,
 Till they propitiate thy offended ghost,

And raise a tomb, with vows, and solemn prayer;
 And Palinurus' name the place shall bear.

This calm'd his cares, sooth'd with his future
 fame,

And pleas'd to hear his propagated name.

Now nearer to the Stygian lake they draw,
 Whom, from the shore, the surly boatman saw:

Observ'd their passage through the shady wood,
 And mark'd their near approaches to the flood:

Then thus he call'd aloud, inflam'd with wrath;
 Mortal, whate'er, who this forbidden path

In arms presump't to tread, I charge thee stand,
 And tell thy name, and business in the land.

Know this, the realm of night; the Stygian
 shore:

My boat conveys no living bodies o'er:
 Nor was I pleas'd great Theseus once to bear,

Who forc'd a passage with his pointed spear;
 Nor strong Alcides, men of mighty fame;

And from th' immortal gods their lineage came.
 In fetters one the barking porter ty'd,
 And took him trembling from his sovereign's side: [bride.]

Two fought by force to seize his beauteous
 To whom the Sibyl thus: Compose thy mind:

Nor frauds are here contriv'd, nor force design'd.
 Still may the dog the wandering troops con-
 strain

Of airy ghosts; and vex the guilty train:
 And with her grisly lord his lovely queen re-mainia.

The Trojan chief, whose lineage is from Jove,
 Much fam'd for arms, and more for filial love,

Is sent to seek his fire in yon Elysian grove.
 If neither piety, nor heaven's command,
 Can gain his passage to the Stygian strand,

This fatal present shall prevail at least ;
 Then show'd the shining bough, conceal'd within her vest.

No more was needful, for the gloomy god
 Stood mute with awe, to see the golden rod :
 Admir'd the destin'd offering to the queen
 (A venerable gift so rarely seen).
 His fury thus appeas'd, he puts to land ;
 The ghosts forsake their seats at his command :
 He clears the deck, receives the mighty freight,
 The leaky vessel groans beneath the weight.
 Slowly she sails, and scarcely stems the tides :
 The pressing water pours within her sides.
 His passengers, at length, are wafted o'er ;
 Expos'd in muddy weeds upon the miry shore.
 No sooner landed, in his den they found
 The triple porter of the Stygian fount,
 Grim Cerberus ; who soon began to rear
 His crested snakes, and arm'd his bristling hair.
 The prudent Sibyl had before prepar'd
 A sop in honey steep'd to charm the guard.
 Which, mix'd with powerful drugs, she cast before
 His greedy, grinding jaws, just op'd to roar :
 With three enormous mouths he gapes, and
 straight,
 With hunger press'd, devours the pleasing bait.
 Long draughts of sleep his monstrous limbs enflave ;

He reels, and, falling, fills the spacious cave.
 The keeper charm'd, the chief without delay
 Pass'd on, and took th' irremovable way.
 Before the gates, the cries of babes new born,
 Whom fate had from their tender mothers torn,
 Assault his ears : then those whom form of laws Condemn'd to die, when traitors judg'd their cause.

Nor want they lots, nor judges to review
 The wrongful sentence, and award a new.
 Minos, the strict inquisitor, appears,
 And lives and crimes, with his assessors, hears.
 Round, in his urn, the blended balls he rolls,
 Absolves the just, and dooms the guilty souls.
 The next in place, and punishment, are they
 Who prodigally throw their souls away ;
 Fools, who repining at their wretched state,
 And loathing anxious life, stubborn'd their fate.
 With late repentance now they would retrieve
 The bodies they forsook, and wish to live.
 Their pains and poverty desire to bear,
 To view the light of heaven, and breathe the vital air.

But fate forbids ; the Stygian floods oppose,
 And, with nine circling streams, the captive soul
 enclose.

Not far from thence, the mournful fields appear ;

So call'd, from lovers that inhabit there.
 The souls, whom that unhappy flame invades,
 In secret solitude, and myrtle shades,
 Make endless moans, and, pining with desire,
 Lament too late their unextinguish'd fire.
 Here Procris, Eriphyle here, be found
 Baring her breast, yet bleeding with the wound
 Made by her son. He saw Paliphaë there,
 With Phœdra's ghost, a soul incestuous pair.
 There Laodamia, with Evadne moves :
 Unhappy both, but loyal in their loves.

Cæneus, a woman once, and once a man ;
 But ending in the sex she first began.
 Not far from these Phœnician Dido stood,
 Fresh from her wound, her bosom bath'd in
 blood.

Whom, when the Trojan hero hardly knew,
 Obscure in shades, and with a doubtful view (Doubtful as he who runs through dusky night,
 Or thinks he sees the moon's uncertain light) ;
 With tears he first approach'd the fallen shade,
 And, as his love inspir'd him, thus he said :
 Unhappy queen ! then is the common breath
 Of rumour true, in your reported death,
 And I, alas, the cause ! By heaven, I vow,
 And all the powers that rule the realms below,
 Unwilling I forsook your friendly state :
 Commanded by the gods, and forc'd by fate.
 Those gods, that fate, whose unresisted might
 Have sent me to these regions, void of light :
 Through the vast empire of eternal night.

Nor dar'd I to presume, that press'd with grief,
 My flight should urge you to this dire relief.
 Stay, stay your steps, and listen to my vows,
 'Tis the last interview that fate allows !
 In vain he thus attempts her mind to move,
 With tears and prayers, and late repenting love :
 Disdainfully she look'd ; then turning round,
 But fix'd her eyes unmov'd upon the ground :
 And what he says, and swears, regards no more,
 Than the deaf rocks, when the loud billows roar.
 But whirl'd away, to shun his hateful sight,
 Hid in the forest, and the shades of night.
 Then sought Sichæus, through the shady grove,
 Who answer'd all her cares, and equal'd all her love.

Some pious tears the pitying hero paid,
 And follow'd with his eyes the flitting shade.
 Then took the forward way, by fate ordain'd,
 And, with his guide, the farther fields attain'd,
 Where, sever'd from the rest, the warrior souls remain'd.

Tideus he met, with Meleager's race,
 The pride of armies, and the soldiers' grace ;
 And pale Adraftus with his ghastly face.
 Of Trojan chiefs he view'd a numerous train :
 All much lamented, all in battle slain.
 Glaucus and Medon, high above the rest,
 Antenor's sons, and Ceres' sacred priest :
 And proud Idæus, Priam's charioteer,
 Who shakes his empty reins, and aims his airy spear.

The gladsome ghosts, in circling troops, attend,
 And, with unwear'd eyes, behold their friend.
 Delight to hover near, and long to know
 What business brought him to the realms below.

But Argive chiefs, and Agamemnon's train,
 When his resplendent arms flash'd through the shady plain,
 Fled from his well-known face, with wonted
 fear,
 As when his thundering sword and pointed spear Drove headlong to their ships, and glean'd the routed rear,
 They rais'd a feeble cry, with trembling notes ;
 But the weak voice deceiv'd their gasping throats.
 Here Priam's son, Deiphobus he found,
 Whose face and limbs were one continued wound.

Dishonest, with lopp'd arms, the youth appears,
 Spoil'd of his nose, and shorten'd of his ears.
 He scarcely knew him, striving to disown
 His blotted form, and blushing to be known.
 And therefore first began: O Teucer's race,
 Who durst thy faultless figure thus deface?
 What heart could with, what hand inflict, this dire disgrace?

'Twas fam'd, that in our last and fatal night,
 Your single prowess long sustain'd the fight:
 Till, tir'd, not forc'd, a glorious fate you chose,
 And fell upon a heap of slaughter'd foes.
 But, in remembrance of so brave a deed,
 A tomb and funeral honours I decreed:
 Thrice call'd your manes on the Trojan plains:
 The place your armour and your name retains.
 Your body too I fought; and, had I found,
 Design'd for burial in your native ground.

The ghost reply'd: Your piety has paid
 All needful rites to rest my wandering shade:
 But cruel fate, and my more cruel wife,
 To Grecian swords betray'd my sleeping life.
 These are the monuments of Helen's love:
 The shame I bear below, the marks I bore above.
 You know in what deluding joys we part
 The night, that was by heaven decreed our last.
 For, when the fatal horse descending down,
 Pregnant with arms, o'erwhelm'd th' unhappy
 town,

She feign'd nocturnal orgies; left my bed,
 And, mix'd with Trojan dames, the dances led;
 Then, waving high her torch, the signal made,
 Which rous'd the Grecians from their ambushade.
 With watching overworn, with cares oppress'd,
 Unhappy I had laid me down to rest;
 And heavy sleep my weary limbs possess'd.
 Mean time my worthy wife our arms mislay'd;
 And, from beneath my head, my sword convey'd:
 The door unlatch'd; and, with repeated calls,
 Invites her former lord within my walls.
 Thus in her crime her confidence she plac'd,
 And with new treasons would redeem the past.
 What need I more? Into the room they ran,
 And meanly murder'd a defenceless man.

Ulysses, basely born, first led the way:
 Avenging power! with justice if I pray,
 That fortune be their own another day!
 Bot answer you; and in your turn relate,
 What brought you, living, to the Stygian sate?
 Driven by the winds and errors of the sea,
 Or did you heaven's superior doom obey?
 Or tell what other chance conducts your way?

To view with mortal eyes our dark retreats,
 Tumults and torments of th' infernal seats?
 While thus, in talk, the flying hours they pass,
 The sun had finish'd more than half his race:
 And they, perhaps, in words and tears had spent
 The little time of stay, which heaven had lent.
 But thus the Sibyl chides their long delay;
 Night rushes down, and headlong drives the day:
 'Tis here, in different paths, the way divides:
 The right, to Pluto's golden palace guides;
 The left to that unhappy region tends,
 Which to the depth of Tartarus descends;
 The seat of night profound, and punish'd fiends.
 Then thus Deiphobus: O sacred maid!
 Forbear to chide; and be your will obey'd:

Lo to the secret shadows I retire,
 To pay my penance till my years expire.
 Proceed, auspicious prince, with glory crown'd,
 And born to better fates than I have found.
 He said; and while he said, his steps he turn'd
 To secret shadows, and in silence mourn'd.
 The hero, looking on the left, esp'y'd
 A lofty tower, and strong on every side
 With treble walls, which Phlegethon surrounds,
 Whose fiery flood the burning empire bounds:
 And, press'd betwixt the rocks, the bellowing noise resounds.

Wide is the fronting gate, and, rais'd on high
 With adamantine columns, threatens the sky.
 Vain is the force of man, and heaven's as vain,
 To crush the pillars which the pile sustain.
 Sublime on these a tower of steel is rear'd,
 And dire Tiphone there keeps the ward.
 Girt in her sanguine gown, by night and day,
 Observant of the souls that pass the downward
 way:

From hence are heard the groans of ghosts, the pains
 Of sounding lashes, and of dragging chains.
 The Trojan stood astonish'd at their cries,
 And ask'd his guide, from whence those yells arise?
 And what the crimes and what the tortures were,
 And loud laments that rent the liquid air?
 She thus reply'd: The chaste and holy race
 Are all forbidden this polluted place.

But Hecate, when she gave to rule the woods,
 Then led me trembling through these dire
 abodes,
 And taught the tortures of th' avenging gods.
 These are the realms of unrelenting fate:
 And awful Rhadamanthus rules the state:
 He hears and judges each committed crime;
 Inquires into the manner, place, and time.
 The conscious wretch must all his acts reveal:
 Loth to confess, unable to conceal:
 From the first moment of his vital breath,
 To this last hour of unrepenting death.

Straight, o'er the guilty ghost, the fury shakes
 The sounding whip, and brandishes her snakes:
 And the pale sinner, with her sisters, takes
 Then, of itself, unfolds th' eternal door:
 With dreadful sounds the brazen hinges roar.
 You see, before the gate, what stalking ghost
 Commands the guard, what centries keep the post.
 More formidable Hydra stands within;
 Whose jaws with iron teeth severely grin.
 The gaping gulf, low to the centre lies;
 And twice as deep as earth is distant from the skies.

The rivals of the gods, the Titan race,
 Here sing'd with lightning, roll within th' unfathom'd space.

Here lie th' Alæan twins (I saw them both),
 Enormous bodies, of gigantic growth;
 Who dar'd in sight the thunderer to defy;
 Affect his heaven, and force him from the sky.
 Salmoeneus, suffering cruel pains I found,
 For emulating Jove; the rattling sound
 Of mimic thunder, and the glittering blaze
 Of pointed lightnings, and their forky rays.
 Through Elis and the Grecian towns he flew;
 Th' audacious wretch four fiery coursers drew;

He wav'd a torch aloft, and, madly vain,
Sought godlike worship from a servile train.
Ambitious fool, with horny hoofs to pass
O'er hollow arches, of resounding brass;
To rival thunder, in its rapid course,
And imitate inimitable force.
But he, the king of heaven, obscure on high,
Bar'd his red arm, and launching in the sky
His written bolt, not shaking empty smoke,
Down to the deep abyss the flaming felon strook.
There Tityus was to see, who took his birth
From heaven; his nursing from the foodful earth.
Here his gigantic limbs, with large embrace,
Infold nine acres of infernal space.
A ravenous vulture in his open'd side,
Her crooked beak and cruel talons try'd:
Still for the growing liver digg'd his breast;
The growing liver still supply'd the feast.
Still are his entrails fruitful to their pains:
Th' immortal hunger lasts, th' immortal food re-maines.

Ixion and Pirithous I could name;
And more Theffalian chiefs of mighty fame.
High o'er their heads a mouldering rock is plac'd,
That promises a fall, and shakes at every blast.
They lie below, on golden beds display'd,
And genial feasts, with regal pomp, are made.
The queen of furies by their sides is set,
And snatches from their mouths th' untasted
meat.

Which if they touch, her hissing snakes she rears:
Tossing her torch, and thundering in their ears.
Then they, who brothers better claim disown,
Expel their parents, and usurp the throne;
Defraud their clients, and to lucre fold,
Sit brooding on unprofitable gold:
Who dare not give, and ev'n refuse to lend
To their poor kindred, or a wanting friend;
Vast is the throng of these; nor less the train
Of lustful youths, for foul adultery slain.
Hosts of deserters, who their honours fold,
And basely broke their faith for bribes of gold:
All these within the dungeon's depth remain,
Despairing pardon, and expecting pain.
Ask not what pains, nor farther seek to know
Their process, or the forms of law below.
Some roll a mighty stone; some laid along,
And, bound with burning wires, on spokes of wheels are hung.

Unhappy Theseus, doom'd for ever there,
Is fix'd by fate on his eternal chair:
And wretched Phlegias warns the world with
cries }
(Could warning make the world more just or } Learn righteousness, and dread th' avenging } deities. }

To tyrants others have their country fold,
Imposing foreign lords, for foreign gold:
Some have old laws repeal'd, new statutes made;
Not as the people pleas'd, but as they paid.
With incest some their daughters bed profan'd.
All dar'd the worst of ills, and what they dar'd, attain'd.

Had I a hundred mouths, a hundred tongues,
And throats of brass, inspir'd with iron lungs,
I could not half those horrid crimes repeat,
Nor half the punishments those crimes have met.

But let us haste our voyage to pursue:
The walls of Pluto's palace are in view:
The gate, and iron arch above it, stands
On anvils, labour'd by the Cyclops hands.
Before our farther way, the fates allow,
Here must we fix on high the golden bough.
She said; and through the gloomy shades they pass,
And chose the middle path: arriv'd at last,
The prince, with living water, sprinkled o'er
His limbs and body, then approach'd the door.
Possess'd the porch, and on the front above
He fix'd the fatal bough, requir'd by Pluto's love.
These holy rites perform'd, they took their way,
Where long-extended plains of pleasure lay.
The verdant fields with those of heaven may vie;
With æther vested, and a purple sky:
The blissful seats of happy souls below:
Stars of their own, and their own funs they know.
Their airy limbs in sports they exercise,
And, on the green, contend the wrestler's prize.
Some in heroic verie, divinely sing,
Others in artful measures lead the ring.
The Thracian bard, surrounded by the rest,
There stands conspicuous in his flowing vest.
His flying fingers, and harmonious quill,
Strike seven distinguish'd notes, and seven at once they fill.

Here found they Teucer's old heroic race;
Born better times, and happier years to grace.
Astarac and Ilius here enjoy
Perpetual fame with him who founded Troy.
The chief beheld their chariots from afar,
Their shining arms, and coursers train'd to war:
Their lances fix'd in earth, their steeds around,
Free from their harness, graze the flowery ground.
The love of horses which they had, alive,
And care of chariots, after death survive.
Some cheerful souls were feasting on the plain;
Some did the song, and some the choir maintain:
Beneath a laurel shade, where mighty Po
Mounts up to woods above, and hides his head
below.

Here patriots live, who for their country's good,
In fighting fields, were prodigal of blood;
Priests of unblemish'd lives here made abode,
And poets worthy their aspiring god:
And searching wits of more mechanic parts,
Who grac'd their age with new invented arts.
Those who, to worth, their bounty did extend;
And those who knew that bounty to commend.
The heads of these with holy fillets bound,
And all their temples were with garlands crown'd.

To these, the Sibyl thus her speech address'd;
And first to him surrounded by the rest;
Towering his height, and ample was his breast:
Say, happy souls, divine Muses say,
Where lives Anchites, and where lies our way
To find the hero, for whose only sake
We sought the dark abodes, and cross'd the bitter lake?

To this the sacred poet thus reply'd,
In no fix'd place the happy souls reside;
In groves we live, and lie on mossy beds,
By crystal streams, that murmur through the meads:

But pass you easy hill, and thence descend,
The path conducts you to your journey's end.

Thus said, he led them up the mountain's brow,
And shows them all the shining fields below;
They wind the hill, and through the blissful meadows go.

But old Anchises, in a flowery vale,
Review'd his muster'd race, and took the tale.
Those happy spirits, which, ordain'd by fate,
For future being, and new bodies wait,
With studious thought observ'd th' illustrious in nature's order as they pass'd along. [through,
Their names, their fates, their conduct, and their
care,

In peaceful senates, and successful war.
He, when Æneas on the plain appears,
Meets him with open arms, and falling tears.
Welcome, he said, the gods undoubted race,
I long expected to my dear embrace;
Once more 'tis given me to behold your face!
The love and pious duty which you pay,
Have pass'd the perils of so hard a way.
Tis true, computing times I now believ'd
The happy day approach'd, nor are my hopes deceiv'd. [pass'd,
What length of lands, what oceans have you
What storms sustain'd, and on what shores been cast?

How have I fear'd your fate! But fear'd it most
When love assail'd you on the Libyan coast:
To this, the filial duty thus replies:
Your sacred ghost before my sleeping eyes
Appear'd, and often urg'd this painful enterprise.

After long toiling on the Tyrrhene sea,
My navy rides at anchor in the bay.
But reach your hand, oh parent shade, nor shun
The dear embraces of your longing son!
He said: and falling tears his face bedew:
Then thrice around his neck his arms he threw:
And thrice the sitting shadow slipp'd away,
Like winds, or empty dreams that fly the day.
Now, in a secret vale the Trojan sees
A separate grove, through which a gentle breeze Plays with a passing breath, and whispers through the trees.

And just before the confines of the wood,
The gliding Lethe leads her silent flood.
About the boughs an airy nation flew,
Thick as the humming bees, that hunt the golden
dew;
In summer's heat, on tops of lilies feed,
And creep within their bells, to suck the balmy feed.

The winged army roams the field around;
The rivers and the rocks remarkur to the sound.
Æneas wondering stood: then ask'd the cause,
Which to the stream the crowding people draws.
Then thus the sire: The souls that throng the flood [ow'd:

Are those, to whom, by fate, are other bodies
In Lethe's lake they long oblivion taste;
Of future life secure, forgetful of the past.
Long has my soul desir'd this time and place,
To set before your sight your glorious race.
That this presaging joy may fire your mind,
To seek the shores by destiny design'd.
O father, can it be, that souls sublime
Return to visit our terrestrial clime?

And that the generous mind, releas'd by death,
Can covet lazy limbs, and mortal breath?
Anchises then in order thus begun
To clear those wonders to his godlike son:
Know first, that heaven and earth's compacted
frame,

And flowing waters, and the starry flame,
And both the radiant lights, one common soul
Inspires and feeds, and animates the whole.
This active mind infus'd through all the ipace,
Unites and mingles with the mighty mass.
Hence men and beasts the breath of life obtain;
And birds of air, and monsters of the main.
Th' ethereal vigour is in all the same,
And every soul is fill'd with equal flame:
As much as earthy limbs and gross allay
Of mortal members, subject to decay,
Blunt not the beams of heaven and edge of day.
From this coarse mixture of terrestrial parts,
Desire and fear by turns possess their hearts:
And grief and joy, nor can the groveling mind,
In the dark dungeon of the limbs confin'd,
Assert the native skies, or own its heavenly kind.
Nor death itself can wholly wash their stains:
But long-contracted filth, e'en in the soul, remains.

The relics of inveterate vice they wear:
And spots of sin obscene in every face appear.
For this are various penances injoin'd;
And some are hung to bleach upon the wind;
Some plung'd in waters, others purg'd in fires,
Till all the dregs are drain'd, and all the rust expires!

All have their manes, and those manes bear:
The few, so cleans'd, to these abodes repair.
And breathe, in ample fields, the soft Elysian
air.

Then are they happy, when, by length of time,
The scurf is worn away of each committed crime.
No speck is left of their habitual stains;
But the pure æther of the soul remains.
But when a thousand rolling years are past
(So long their punishments and penance last);
Whole droves of minds are, by the driving god,
Compell'd to drink the deep Lethæan flood:
In large forgetful draughts to steep the cares
Of their past labours, and their irksome years.
That, unremembering of its former pain,
The soul may suffer mortal flesh again.
Thus having said; the father spirit leads
The priestess and his son through swarms of shades,
And takes a rising ground, from thence to see
The long procession of his progeny.
Survey (pursu'd the fire) this airy throng;
As, offer'd to the view, they pass along.
These are th' Italian names, which fate will join
With ours, and graft upon the Trojan line.
Observe the youth who first appears in sight,
And holds the nearest station to the light,
Already seems to snuff the vital air,
And leans just forward on a shining spear;
Siivius is he: thy last-begotten race,
But first in order sent, to fill thy place.
An Alban name, but mix'd with Dardan blood:
Born in the covert of a shady wood:
Him fair Lavinia, thy surviving wife,
Shall breed in groves, to lead a solitary life.

In Alba he shall fix his royal seat :
 And, born a king, a race of kings beget.
 Then Procas, honour of the Trojan name,
 Capys' and Numitor, of endless fame.
 And second Silvius after these appears ;
 Silvius Æneas, for thy name he bears,
 For arms and justice equally renown'd :
 Who, late restor'd, in Alba shall be crown'd.
 How great they look, how vigorously they wield
 Their weighty lances, and sustain the shield !
 But they, who crown'd with oaken wreaths appear,

Shall Gabian walls and strong Fidenæ rear :
 Nomentum, Bola, with Pometia found ;
 And raise Colatian towers on rocky ground.
 All these shall then be towns of mighty fame,
 Though now they lie obscure, and lands without a name.

See Romulus the great, born to restore
 The crown that once his injur'd grandfire wore.
 This prince, a priestess of your blood shall bear ;
 And, like his fire, in arms he shall appear.
 Two rising crests his royal head adorn ;
 Born from a god, himself to godhead born.
 His fire, already, signs him for the skies,
 And marks the seat amidst the deities.
 Auspicious chief ! thy race in times to come
 Shall spread the conquest of imperial Rome.
 Rome, whose ascending towers shall heaven involving earth and ocean in her shade. [vade
 High as the mother of the gods in place ;
 And proud, like her, of an immortal race.
 Then when in pomp she makes the Phrygian
 round,

With golden turrets on her temples crown'd,
 A hundred gods her sweeping train supply ;
 Her offspring all, and all command the sky.
 Now fix your sight, and stand intent, to see
 Your Roman race, and Julian progeny.

The mighty Cæsar waits his vital hour,
 Impatient for the world, and grasps his promis'd
 power.

But next behold the youth of form divine,
 Cæsar himself, exalted in his line ;
 Augustus, promis'd oft, and long foretold,
 Sent to the realm that Saturn rul'd of old ;
 Born to restore a better age of gold. }
 Afric and India shall his power obey,
 He shall extend his propagated sway }
 Beyond the solar year, without the starry way. }
 Where Atlas turns the rolling heavens around :
 And his broad shoulders with their lights are
 crown'd.

At his fore-seen approach, already quake
 The Caspian Kingdoms, and Mæotian lake.
 Their fears behold the tempests from afar,
 And threatening oracles denounce the war.
 Nile hears him knocking at his seven-fold gates,
 And seeks his hidden spring, and fears his nephew
 Nor Hercules more lands or labours knew, [fates.
 Not though the brazen-footed hind he flew ;
 Freed Erymanthus from the foaming boar,
 And dipp'd his arrows in Lernæan gore.
 Nor Bacchus, turning from his Indian war,
 By tigers drawn triumphant in his car,
 From Nisus' top descending on the plains,
 With curling vines around his purple reins.

And doubt we yet through dangers to pursue
 The paths of honour, and a crown in view ?
 But what's the man, who from afar appears,
 His head with olive crown'd, his hand a censer
 bears ?

His hoary head and holy vestments bring
 His lost idea back : I know the Roman king.
 He shall to peaceful Rome new laws ordain :
 Call'd from his mean abode, a sceptre to sustain,
 Him Tullus next in dignity succeeds ;
 An active prince, and prone to martial deeds.
 He shall his troops for fighting fields prepare,
 Difus'd to toils, and triumphs of the war.
 By dint of sword, his crown he shall increase,
 And scour his armour from the rust of peace.
 Whom Ancus follows, with a fawning air
 But vain within, and proudly popular.
 Next view the Tarquin kings : th' avenging sword
 Of Brutus justly drawn, and Rome restor'd.
 He first renews the rods, and ax severe ;
 And gives the consuls royal robes to wear.
 His sons, who seek the tyrant to sustain,
 And long for arbitrary lords again,
 With ignominy scourg'd, in open sight,
 He dooms to death deserv'd : asserting public right.
 Unhappy man, to break the pious laws
 Of nature, pleading in his children's cause !
 Howe'er the doubtful fact is understood,
 'Tis love of honour, and his country's good : }
 The consul, not the father, sheds the blood. }
 Behold Torquatus the same track pursue ;
 And next, the two devoted Decii view.
 The Drusian line, Camillus loaded home
 With standards well redeem'd, and foreign foes overcome.

The pair you see in equal armour shine ;
 (Now, friends below, in close embraces join :
 But when they leave the shady realms of night,
 And, cloth'd in bodies, breathe your upper light),
 With mortal heat each other shall pursue : [sic,
 What wars, what wounds, what slaughter, shall en-
 From Alpine heights the father first descends ;
 His daughter's husband in the plain attends :
 His daughter's husband arms his eastern friends. }
 Embrace again, my sons ; be foes no more :
 Nor stain your country with her children's gore.
 And thou, the first, lay down thy lawless claim ;
 Thou, of my blood, who bear'st the Julian name.
 Another comes, who shall in triumph ride,
 And to the capitol his chariot guide ;
 From conquer'd Corinth, rich with Grecian spoils.
 And yet another, fam'd for warlike toils,
 On Argos shall impose the Roman laws ;
 And, on the Greeks, revenge the Trojan cause :
 Shall drag in chains their Achillean race ;
 Shall vindicate his ancestors disgrace : }
 And Pallas, for her violated name.
 Great Cato there, for gravity renown'd,
 And conquering Cossus goes with laurels crown'd.
 Who can omit the Gracchi, who declare
 The Scipios' worth, those thunderbolts of war,
 The double bane of Carthage ? Who can see,
 Without esteem for virtuous poverty,
 Severe Fabricus, or can cease t' admire
 The ploughman consul in his coarse attire !
 Tir'd as I am, my praise the Fabii claim ;
 And thou, great hero, greatest of thy name,

ordain'd in war to save the sinking state,
 And, by delays, to put a stop to fate!
 Let others better mould the running mass
 Of medals, and inform the breathing brass;
 And, soften into flesh a marble face:
 Lead better at the bar; describe the skies,
 And when the stars descend, and when they rise.
 Out, Rome, 'tis thine alone with awful sway,
 To rule mankind, and make the world obey;
 Disposing peace and war thy own majestic way:
 To tame the proud, the fetter'd slave to free;
 To these are imperial arts, and worthy thee,
 To pause: and while with wondering eyes they View'd

The passing spirits, thus his speech renew'd:
 O great Marcellus! how, untir'd in toils,
 Thou moves with manly grace, how rich with regal
 Spoils!

See, when his country (threaten'd with alarms)
 Requires his courage; and his conquering arms,
 Shall more than once the Punic bands affright:
 Shall kill the Gaulish king in single fight:
 Then, to the capitol in triumph move,
 And the third spoils shall grace Feretrian Jove.
 Æneas, here, beheld of form divine
 Godlike youth, in glittering armour shine;
 With great Marcellus keeping equal pace;
 But gloomy were his eyes, dejected was his face:
 He saw, and, wondering, ask'd his airy guide,
 What, and of whence was he, who press'd the Hero's side?

It is my son, or one of his illustrious name,
 Now like the former, and almost the same:
 Observe the crowds that compass him around:
 All gaze, and all admire, and raise a shouting
 Sound:

But hovering mists around his brows are spread,
 And night, with sable shades, involves his head.
 Seek not to know (the ghost reply'd with tears)
 The sorrows of thy sons in future years.
 His youth (the blissful vision of a day)
 Shall just be shown on earth, and snatch'd away.
 He gods too high had rais'd the Roman state;
 'Tis but their gifts as permanent as great.
 What groans of men shall fill the Martian field!
 How fierce a blaze his flaming pile shall yield!

What funeral pomp shall floating Tiber see,
 When, rising from his bed, he views the sad solemnity!

No youth shall equal hopes of glory give:
 No youth afford so great a cause to grieve.
 The Trojan honour, and the Roman boast;
 Admir'd when living, and ador'd when lost!
 Mirror of ancient faith in early youth!
 Undaunted worth, inviolable truth!
 No foe unpunish'd in the fighting field;
 Shall dare thee foot to foot, with sword and
 shield:

Much less in arms oppose thy matchless force,
 When thy sharp spurs shall urge thy foaming horse.

Ah, couldst thou break through fate's severe decree,

A new Marcellus shall arise in thee!
 Full canisters of fragrant lilies bring,
 Mix'd with the purple roses of the spring:
 Let me with funeral flowers his body strow,
 This gift which parents to their children owe,
 This unavailing gift, at least I may bestow!

Thus having said, he led the hero round
 The confines of the blest Elysian ground,
 Which, when Anchises to his son had shown,
 And fir'd his mind to mount the promis'd throne,
 He tells the future wars ordain'd by fate;
 The strength and customs of the Latian state:
 The prince, and people: and fore-arms his care
 With rules, to push his fortune, or to bear.

Two gates the silent house of sleep adorn;
 Of polish'd ivory this, that of transparent horn;
 True visions through transparent horn arise;
 Through polish'd ivory pass deluding lies.
 Of various things discoursing as he pass'd,
 Anchises hither bends his steps at last.
 Then, through the gate of ivory, he dismiss'd
 His valiant offspring, and divining guest:
 Straight to the ships Æneas took his way;
 Embark'd his men, and skim'd along the sea:
 Still coasting, till he gain'd Cajeta's bay:
 At length on oozy ground his gallies moor;
 Their heads are turn'd to sea, their sterns to shore.

B O O K VII.

THE ARGUMENT.

King Latinus entertains Æneas, and promises him his only daughter, Lavinia, the heiress of his crown. Turnus, being in love with her, favoured by her mother, and stirred up by Juno and Alecto, breaks the treaty which was made, and engages in his quarrel Mezentius, Camilla, Messapus, and many other of the neighbouring princes; whose forces, and the names of their commanders, are particularly related.

AND thou, O matron of immortal fame!
 Ere dying, to the shore hast left thy name;
 Cajeta still the place is called from thee,
 The nurse of great Æneas' infancy.

Here rest thy bones in rich Hesperia's plains,
 Thy name ('tis all a ghost can have) remains.
 Now, when the prince her funeral rites had paid,
 He plough'd the Tyrrhene seas with sail display'd.

From land a gentle breeze arose by night,
Serenely shone the stars, the moon was bright,
And the sea trembled with her silver light.
Now near the shelves of Circe's shores they run (Circe the rich, the daughter of the sun),
A dangerous coast: the goddess wastes her days
In joyous songs, the rocks resound her lays,
In spinning, or the loom, she spends the night,
And cedar brands supply her father's light.
From hence were heard (rebellowing to the
main)

The roars of lions that refuse the chain,
The grunts of bristled boars; and groans of bears,
And herds of howling wolves that stun the sailors ears.

These from their caverns, at the close of night,
Fill the sad isle with horror and affright.
Darkling they mourn their fate, whom Circe's
power

(That watch'd the moon and planetary)
With words and wicked herbs, from human kind
Had alter'd, and in wicked shapes confin'd.
Which monsters, left the Trojans pious host
Should bear or touch upon th' enchanted coast;
Propitious Neptune steer'd their course by night,
With rising gales, that sped their happy flight.
Supply'd with these, they skim the sounding
shore,

And hear the swelling surges vainly roar.
Now when the rosy morn began to rise,
And weav'd her saffron streamer through the
skies;

When Thetis blush'd in purple, not her own,
And from her face the breathing winds are blown.
A sudden silence fate upon the sea, [way.
And sweeping oars, with strugling, urge their
The Trojan, from the main, beheld a wood,
Which thick with shades and a brown horror stood:

Betwixt the trees the Tiber took his course,
With whirlpools dimpled; and with downward
force

That drove the sand along, he took his way,
And roll'd his yellow billows to the sea.
About him, and above, and round the wood,
The birds that haunt the borders of his flood;
That bath'd within, or bask'd upon his side,
'To tuneful songs their narrow throats apply'd,
The captain gives command; the joyful train Glide through the gloomy shade, and leave the
main.

Now, Erato, thy poet's mind inspire,
And fill his soul with thy celestial fire.
Relate what Latium was: her ancient kings:
Declare the past, and present state of things:
When first the Trojan fleet Ausonia fought;
And how the rivals lov'd, and how they fought,
These are my theme, and how the war began,
And how concluded by the godlike man.
For I shall sing of battles, blood, and rage,
Which princes and their people did engage:
And haughty souls, that, mov'd with mutual hate,
In fighting fields pursu'd and found their fate:
That rous'd the Tyrrhene realm with loud a-
And peaceful Italy involv'd in arms. [larins,
A larger scene of action is display'd,
And, rising hence; a greater work is weigh'd.

Latinus, old and mild, had long possess'd
The Latium sceptre, and his people bless'd:
His father Faunus; a Laurentium dame
His mother, fair Marica was her name.
But Faunus came from Picus, Picus drew
His birth from Saturn, in records be true.
Thus King Latinus, in the third degree,
Had Saturn author of his family.
But this old peaceful prince, as heaven decreed,
Was bless'd with no male issue to succeed:
His sons in blooming youth were snatch'd b
fate;

One only daughter heir'd the royal state.
Fir'd with her love, and with ambition led,
The neighbouring princes court her nuptial bed.
Among the crowd, but far above the rest,
Young Turnus to the beauteous maid address'd.
Turnus, for high descent and graceful mien,
Was first, and favour'd by the Latian queen:
With him she strove to join Lavinia's hand;
But dire portents the purpos'd match withstand.

Deep in the palace, of long growth, there stood
A laurel's trunk, a venerable wood;
Where rites divine were paid; whose holy hair
Was kept, and cut with superstitious care.
This plant Latinus, when his town he wall'd,
Then found, and from the tree Laurentum call'd
And last, in honour of his new abode,
He vow'd the laurel to the laurel's god.

It happen'd once (a boding prodigy)
A swarm of bees that cut the liquid sky,
Unknown from whence they took their airy flight
Upon the topmost branch in clouds alight:
There, with their clasping feet together clung,
And a long cluster from the laurel hung.
An ancient augur prophesy'd from hence:
Behold on Latian shores a foreign prince!
From the same parts of heaven his navy stands,
To the same parts on earth: his army lands:
The town he conquers, and the tower commands.

Yet more, when fair Lavinia fed the fire
Before the gods, and stood beside her fire;
Strange to relate, the flames involv'd the smoke
Of incense, from the sacred altar broke:
Caught her dishevel'd hair and rich attire;
Her crowns and jewels crackled in the fire:
From thence the fuming trail began to spread,
And lambent glories danc'd about her head.
This new portent the seer with wonder views;
Then pausing thus, his prophecy renews:
The nymph who scatters flaming fires around,
Shall shine with honour, shall herself be crown'd
But, caus'd by her irrevocable fate,
War shall the country waste, and change the state
Latinus frighted with this dire oment,
For counsel to his father Faunus went:
And sought the shades renew'd for prophecy,
Which near Albunea's sulphurous fountain lie.
To those the Latian and the Sabine laid
Fly, when distress'd, and thence relief demand.
The priest on skins of offerings takes his ease;
And nightly visions in his slumber sees:
A swarm of thin aerial shapes appears,
And, fluttering round his temples, deaf his ears:
These he consults, the future fates to know,
From powers above, and from the fiends below.

Ere, for the god's advice, Latinus flies,
 Cering a hundred sheep for sacrifice:
 Their woolly fleeces, as the rites requir'd,
 Laid beneath him, and to rest retir'd.
 Sooner were his eyes in slumber bound,
 When, from above, a more than mortal sound
 Jades his ears: and thus the vision spoke:
 Gk not, my seed, in Latian bands to yoke
 O' saif Lavinia, nor the gods provoke.
 Foreign son upon the shore descends,
 Whose martial fame from pole to pole extends.
 He race in arms, and arts of peace renown'd,
 Latium shall contain nor Europe bound:
 'Tis theirs whate'er the sun surveys around:
 These answers in the silent night receiv'd,
 The king himself divulg'd, the land believ'd:
 Fame through all the neighbouring nations
 flew,
 When now the Trojan navy was in view.
 Beneath a shady tree the hero spread
 A table on the turf, with cakes of bread;
 And, with his chiefs, on forest fruits he fed.
 Try fate, and (not without the god's command)
 Their homely fare dispatch'd: the hungry band
 Made their trenchers next, and soon devour,
 To mend the scanty meal; their cakes of flower.
 Anius this observ'd, and, smiling said,
 See, we devour the plates on which we fed.
 The speech had omen, that the Trojan race
 Should find repose, and this the time and place.
 Heas took the word, and thus replies:
 (Unseeing fate with wonder in his eyes)
 Hail, O earth! all hail, my household gods,
 Hold the destin'd place of your abodes!
 Thus Anchiſes prophecy'd of old,
 And this our fatal place of rest foretold.
 When on a foreign shore, instead of meat,
 Thy famine forc'd, your trenchers you shall eat,
 Then ease your weary Trojans will attend:
 And the long labours of your voyage end.
 Remember on that happy coast to build:
 And with a trench enclose the fruitful field."
 'Tis was that famine, this the fatal place,
 Which ends the wandering of our exil'd race.
 Then, on to-morrow's dawn, your care employ
 To search the land, and where the cities lie,
 And what the men: but give this day to joy.
 Now pour to Jove, and after Jove is blest,
 O great Anchiſes to the genial feast:
 Crown them the goblets with a cheerful draught;
 Enjoy the present hour; adjourn the future
 thought.
 Thus having said, the hero bound his brows
 With leafy branches, then perform'd his vows:
 Calling first the genius of the place,
 Then earth, the mother of the heavenly race;
 The nymphs, and native godheads yet unknown,
 And night, and all the stars that gild her fable
 And ancient Cybel, and Idæan Jove; [throne:
 And last his fire below, and mother queen above.
 Then heaven's high monarch thunder'd thrice aloud;
 And thrice he shook aloft a golden cloud.
 Then through the joyful camp a rumour flew:
 The time was come their city to renew:
 On every brow with cheerful green is crown'd,
 The feasts are doubled, and the bowls go round.

When next the rosy morn disclos'd the day,
 The scouts to several parts divide their way,
 To learn the natives names, their towns, explore
 The coast, and trendings of the crooked shore:
 Here Tiber flows, and here Numicus stands,
 Here warlike Latins hold the happy lands.
 The pious chief, who fought by peaceful ways
 To found his empire, and his town to raise,
 A hundred youths from all his train selects,
 And to the Latian court their course directs
 (The spacious palace where the prince resides):
 And all their heads with wreaths of olives hides.
 They go commission'd to require a peace;
 And carry presents to procure access.
 Thus while they speed their pace, the prince designs
 The new-elected seat, and draws the lines:
 The Trojans round the place a rampart cast,
 And palisades about the trenches plac'd.
 Meantime the train, proceeding on their way,
 From far the town, and lofty towers survey:
 At length approach the walls: without the gate
 They see the boys and Latian youth debate
 The martial prizes on the dusty plain:
 Some drive the cars, and some the courier's
 rein;
 Some bend the stubborn bow for victory:
 And some with darts their active sinews try.
 A posting messenger dispatch'd from hence,
 Of this fair troop, advis'd their aged prince;
 That foreign men, of mighty stature, came;
 Uncouth their habit, and unknown their name;
 The king ordains their entrance, and ascends
 His regal seat, surrounded by his friends.
 The palace built by Picus, vast and proud,
 Supported by a hundred pillars stood!
 And round encompass'd with a rising wood.
 The pile o'erlook'd the town, and drew the sight,
 Surpris'd at once with reverence and delight.
 There kings receiv'd the marks of sovereign
 power:
 In state the monarch march'd, the lictors bore
 Their awful axes, and the rods before.
 Here the tribunal stood, the house of prayer;
 And here the sacred senators repair;
 All at large tables, in long order set,
 A ram their offering, and a ram their meat.
 Above the portal, carv'd in cedar wood,
 Plac'd in their ranks, their godlike grandfire
 stood.
 Old Saturn, with his crooked scythe, on high;
 And Italus, that led the colony:
 And ancient Janus, with his double face,
 And bunch of keys; the porter of the place.
 There stood Sabinus, planter of the vines;
 On a short pruning-hook his head reclines:
 And studiously surveys his generous wines.
 Then warlike kings, who for their country fought,
 And honourable wounds from battle brought,
 Around the posts hung helmets, darts, and spears,
 And captive chariots, axes, shields, and bars,
 And broken beaks of ships, the trophies of their wars.
 Above the rest, as chief of all the band.
 Was Picus plac'd, a buckler in his hand;
 His other wav'd a long divining wand.

Girt in his gabin gown the hero fate :
 Yet could not with his art avoid his fate.
 For Circe long had lov'd the youth in vain,
 Till love, refus'd, converted to disdain ;
 Then mixing powerful herbs, with magic art,
 She chang'd his form, who could not change his heart.

Constrain'd him in a bird, and made him fly
 With party-colour'd plumes, a chattering pye.
 In this high temple, on a chair of state,
 The feat of audience, old Latinus fate ;
 Then gave admission to the Trojan train,
 And thus, with pleasing accents, he began :
 Tell me, ye Trojans, for that name you own ;
 Nor is your course upon our coasts unknown ;
 Say what you seek, and whither were you bound ?
 Were you by streis of weather cast a-ground ?
 Such dangers of the sea are often seen,
 And oft besal to miserable men.

Or come, your shipping in our ports to lay,
 Spent and disabled in so long a way ?
 Say what you want ; the Latians you shall find
 Not forc'd to goodness, but by will inclin'd ;
 For since the time of Saturn's holy reign,
 His hospitable customs we retain.
 I call to mind (but time the tale has worn)
 Th' Arunci told ; that Dardanus, though born
 On Latian plains, yet fought the Phrygian shore,
 And Samothracia, Samos call'd before :
 From Tuscan Coritum he claim'd his birth.
 But after, when exempt from mortal earth,
 From thence ascended to his kindred skies,
 A god, and as a god augments their sacrifice.

He said. Ilioneus made this reply :
 O king, of Faunus' royal family !
 Nor wintery winds to Latium forc'd our way,
 Nor did the stars our wandering course betray.
 Willing we fought your shores, and hither bound,
 The port so long desir'd, at length we found.
 From our sweet homes and ancient realms ex-
 Great as the greatest that the sun beheld. [scell'd ;
 The god began our line, who rules above,
 And as our race, our king descends from Jove :
 And hither are we come, by his command,
 To crave admission in your happy land.

How dire a tempest, from Mycenæ pour'd.
 Our plains, our temples, and our town devour'd ;
 What was the waste of war, what dire alarms
 Shook Asia's crown with European arms ;
 Ev'n such have heard, if any such there be,
 Whose earth is bounded by the frozen sea :
 And such as born beneath the burning sky,
 And sultry sun betwixt the tropics lie.
 From that dire deluge, through the watery waste,
 Such length of years, such various perils pass :
 At last escap'd, to Latium we repair,
 To beg what you without your want may } spare ;

The common water, and the common air.
 Sheds which ourselves will build, and mean a-
 Fit to receive and serve our banish'd gods. [bodes,
 Nor our admission shall your realm disgrace,
 Nor length of time our gratitude efface.
 Besides what endless honour you shall gain
 To save and shelter Troy's unhappy train.
 Now, by my sovereign, and his fate, I swear,
 Renown'd for faith in peace, for force in war ;

Of our alliance other lands desir'd,
 And what we seek of you, of us requir'd.
 Despise not then, that in our hands we bear
 These holy boughs, and sue with words of prayer
 Fate and the gods, by their supreme command,
 Have doom'd our ships to seek the Latian land.
 To these abodes our fleet Apollo sends,
 Here Dardanus was born, and hither tends.
 Where Thufcan Tiber rolls with rapid force,
 And where Numicus opens his holy source.
 Besides, our prince presents, with his request,
 Some small remains of what his fire possess'd.
 This golden charger, snatch'd from burning Troy
 Anchises did in sacrifice employ ;
 This royal robe and this tiara wore
 Old Priam, and this golden sceptre bore
 In full assemblies, and in solemn games ;
 These purple vests were weav'd by Dardan dames

Thus while he spoke, Latinus roll'd around
 His eyes, and fix'd awhile upon the ground.
 Intent he seem'd, and anxious in his breast ;
 Not by the sceptre mov'd, or kingly vest :
 But pondering future things of wonderous weight
 Succession, empire, and his daughter's fate :
 On these he mus'd within his thoughtful mind ;
 And then resolv'd what Faunus had divin'd.
 This was the foreign prince, by fate decreed
 To share his sceptre, and Lavinia's bed.
 This was the race that sure portents foreshow
 To sway the world, and land and sea lubdue.
 At length he rais'd his cheerful head and spoke :
 The powers, said he, the powers we both invoke,
 To you, and yours, and mine, propitious be,
 And firm our purpose with their augury.
 Have what you ask : your presents I receive ;
 Land where, and when you please, with ample leave ;

Partake and use my kingdom as your own ;
 It shall be yours, while I command the crown.
 And if my wish'd alliance please your king,
 Tell him he should not send the peace, but bring :
 Then let him not a friend's embraces fear ;
 The peace is made when I behold him here.
 Besides this answer, tell my royal guest,
 I add to his commands my own request :
 One only daughter heirs my crown and state,
 Whom, not our oracles, nor heaven, nor fate,
 Nor frequent prodigies, permit to join
 With any native of th' Ausonian line.
 A foreign son-in-law shall come from far
 (Such is our doom), a chief renown'd in war :
 Whose race shall bear aloft the Latian name,
 And through the conquer'd world diffuse our fame.
 Himself to be the man the fates require,
 I firmly judge, and what I judge, desire.
 He said, and then on each bestow'd a steed ;
 Three hundred horses, in high stables fed,
 Stood ready, shining all, and smoothly dress'd ;
 Of these he chose the fairest and the best,
 To mount the Trojan troop ; at his command,
 The steeds caparison'd with purple stand :
 With golden trappings, glorious to behold,
 And champ, betwixt their teeth, the foaming gold.
 Then in his absent guest the king decreed
 A pair of coursers born of heavenly breed :
 Who from their nostrils breath'd ethereal fire ;
 Whom Circe stole from her celestial fire ;

substituting mares, produc'd on earth,
 whose wombs conceiv'd a more than mortal
 birth.
 These draw the chariot which Latinus sends;
 and the rich present to the prince commends.
 To blime on stately steeds the Trojans borne,
 to their expecting lord with peace return.
 But jealous Juno, from Pachymas' height,
 she from Argos took her airy flight,
 held, with envious eyes, this hateful sight. }
 She saw the Trojan and his joyful train descend upon the shore, desert the main!
 Sign a town, and, with unhop'd success,
 the ambassadors return with promis'd peace.
 When, pierc'd with pain, she shook her haughty
 head,
 She said from her inward soul, and thus she said:
 O hateful offspring of my Phrygian foes!
 O fate of Troy, which Juno's fates oppose!
 Could they not fall unspite'd, on the plain,
 to slain revive, and taken, 'scape again?
 When execrable Troy in ashes lay, through fires, and swords, and seas, they forc'd their way.
 When vanquish'd Juno must in vain contend,
 Her rage disarm'd, her empire at an end.
 Deathless and tir'd, is all my fury spent,
 does my glutted spleen at length relent?
 If 'twere little from their town to chafe,
 through the seas pursued their exil'd race:
 I gag'd the heavens, oppos'd the stormy main;
 At billows roar'd, and tempests rag'd in vain.
 What have my Scylla's and my Syrtes done,
 when these they overpass, and those they shun?
 At Tiber's shores they land, secure of fate,
 triumphant o'er the storm's and Juno's hate.
 Mars could in mutual blood the centaurs bathe,
 and Jove himself gave way to Cynthia's wrath:
 Who sent the tusky boar to Calydon:
 What great offence had either people done?
 At I, the consort of the thunderer,
 I've wag'd a long and unsuccessful war:
 With various arts and arms in vain have toil'd,
 and by a mortal man at length am foil'd.
 My native power prevail not, shall I doubt to seek for needful succour from without?
 Jove and heaven my just desires deny,
 All shall the power of Heaven and Jove supply.
 Grant that the fates have firm'd by their decree,
 the Trojan race to reign in Italy:
 At least I can defer the nuptial day,
 and, with protracted wars, the peace delay:
 With blood the dear alliance shall be bought:
 And both the people near destruction brought.
 I shall the son-in-law and father join,
 with ruin, war, and waste of either line.
 A fatal maid! thy marriage is endow'd with Phrygian, Latian, and Rutilian blood!
 Iliona leads thee to thy lovers hand,
 another queen brings forth another brand: }
 To burn with foreign fires her native land!
 Second Paris, differing but in name,
 shall fire his country with a second flame.
 Thus having said, she sinks beneath the ground with furious haste, and shoots the Stygian fount;
 to rouse Alceto from th' infernal seat of her dire sisters, and their dark retreat.

This fury fit for her intent she chose,
 One who delights in wars, and human woes:
 Ev'n Pluto hates his own mis-shapen race
 Her sister-furies fly her hideous face:
 So frightful are the forms the monster takes,
 So fierce the hissings of her speckled snakes.
 Her Juno finds, and thus inflames her spite:
 O virgin daughter of eternal night,
 Give me this once thy labour, to sustain
 My right, and execute my just disdain.
 Let not the Trojans, with a feign'd pretence
 Of proffer'd peace, delude the Latian prince:
 Expel from Italy that odious name,
 And let not Juno suffer in her fame.
 'Tis thine to ruin realms, o'erturn a state,
 Betwixt the dearest friends to raise debate,
 And kindle kindred blood to mutual hate. }
 Thy hand o'er towns the funeral torch displays,
 And forms a thousand ills ten thousand ways:
 Now shake from out thy fruitful breast the seeds
 Of envy, discord, and of cruel deeds:
 Confound the peace establish'd, and prepare
 Their souls to hatred, and their hands to war.
 Smear'd as she was with black Gorgonean blood,
 The fury sprang above the Stygian flood:
 And on her wicker wings, sublime through night,
 She to the Latian palace took her flight.
 There fought the queen's apartments, stood before
 The peaceful threshold, and besieg'd the door.
 Restless Amata lay, her swelling breast
 Fir'd with disdain for Turnus dispossess, }
 And the new nuptials of the Trojan guest.
 From her black, bloody locks the fury shakes
 Her darling plague, the favourite of her snakes:
 With her full force she threw the poisonous dart,
 And fix'd it deep within Amata's heart:
 That thus envenom'd she might kindle rage,
 And sacrifice to strife her house and husband's age.
 Unseen, unfelt, the fiery serpent skims
 Betwixt her linen, and her naked limbs.
 His baleful breath inspiring as he glides,
 Now like a chain around her neck he rides;
 Now like a fillet to her head repairs,
 And, with her circling volumes, folds her hairs.
 At first the silent venom slides with ease,
 And seiz'd her cooler senses by degrees;
 Then ere th' infected mass was fir'd too far,
 In plaintive accents she began the war:
 And thus bespoke her husband: Shall, she said,
 A wandering prince enjoy Lavinia's bed?
 If nature plead not in a parent's heart,
 Pity my tears, and pity her desert:
 I know, my dearest lord, the time will come,
 You would, in vain, reverse your cruel doom:
 The faithless pirate soon will set to sea,
 And bear the royal virgin far away!
 A guest like him, a Trojan guest before,
 In show of friendship, sought the Spartan shore; }
 And ravish'd Helen from her husband's bore.
 Think on a king's inviolable word:
 And think on Turnus, her once-plighted lord:
 To this false foreigner you give your throne,
 And wrong a friend, a kinsman, and a son.
 Resume your ancient care: and if the god,
 Your fire, and you, resolve on foreign blood,
 Know all are foreign, in a larger sense,
 Not born your subjects, or deriv'd from hence.

Then if the line of Turnus you retrace ;
 He springs from Inachus of Argive race.
 But when she saw her reason ill spent,
 And could not move him from his fix'd intent,
 She flew to rage ; for now the snake possess'd
 Her vital parts, and poison'd all her breast ;
 She raves, she runs, with a distracted pace,
 And fills with horrid howls the public place.
 And, as young striplings whip the top for sport,
 On the smooth pavement of an empty court,
 The wooden engine flies and whirls about,
 Admir'd, with clamours, of the beardless rout,
 They lash aloud, each other they provoke,
 And lend their little souls at every stroke :
 Thus fares the queen, and thus her fury blows
 Amidst the crowds, and kindles as the goës.
 Not yet content, she strains her malice more,
 And adds new ills to those contriv'd before :
 She flies the town, and, mixing with the throng
 Of madding matrons, bears the bride along :
 Wandering through woods and wilds, and devious ways,

And with these arts the Trojan match delays.
 She feign'd the rites of Bacchus ! cry'd aloud,
 And to the buxom god the virgin vow'd.
 Evoc, O Bacchus ! thus began the song,
 And Evoc ! answer'd all the female throng :
 O virgin ! worthy thee alone, she cry'd ;
 O worthy thee alone, the crew reply'd ;
 For thee she feeds her hair, she leads thy dance,
 And with the winding ivy wreaths her lance.
 Like fury seiz'd the rest ; the progress known,
 All seek the mountains and forsake the town :
 All clad in skins of beasts the javelin bare,
 Give to the wanton winds their flowing hair :
 And shrieks and shoutings rend the suffering air. }
 The queen, herself, inspir'd with rage divine,
 Shook high above her head a flaming pine :
 Then roll'd her haggard eyes around the throng,
 And sung, in Turnus' name, the nuptial song !
 To ye Latian dames, if any here
 Hold your unhappy queen, Amata, dear :
 If there be here, she said, who dare maintain
 My right, nor think the name of mother vain,
 Unbind your fillets, loose your flowing hair,
 And orgies and nocturnal rites prepare.
 Amata's breast the fury thus invades,
 And fires with rage, amid the sylvan shades,
 Then when she found her venom spread so far,
 The royal house embroil'd in civil war,
 Rais'd on her dusky wings she cleaves the skies,
 And seeks the palace where young Turnus lies.
 His town, as fame reports, was built of old
 By Danaë, pregnant with almighty gold :
 Who fled her father's rage, and with a train
 Of following Argives, through the stormy main, Driv'n by the southern blasts, was fated here to reign.

'Twas Ardua once, now Ardea's name it bears
 Once a fair city, now consum'd with years.
 Here in his lofty palace Turnus lay,
 Fetwixt the confines of the night and day,
 Secure in sleep : the fury laid aside {try'd}
 Her looks and limbs, and with new methods
 The foulness of the infernal form to hide.
 Propp'd on a staff, she takes the trembling mein,
 Her face is furrow'd, and her front obscene :

Deep-dinted wrinkles on her cheek she draws,
 Sunk are her eyes, and toothless are her jaws :
 Her hoary head, with holy fillets bound,
 Her temples with an olive wreath are crown'd.
 Old Calibe, who kept the sacred fane,
 Of Juno, now she seem'd, and thus began :
 Appearing in a dream, to rouse the careless man,
 Shall Turnus then such endless toil sustain,
 In fighting fields, and conquer towns in vain ?
 Win, for a Trojan head to wear the prize ?
 Usurp thy crown, enjoy thy victories ?
 The bride and sceptre which thy blood has bought
 The king transfers, and foreign heirs are sought
 Go now, deluded man, and seek again
 New toils, new dangers, on the dusty plain.
 Repel the Tuscan foes, their city seize ;
 Protect the Latians in luxurious ease.
 This dream all-powerful Juno sends ; I bear
 Her mighty mandates, and her words you hear.
 Haste, arm your Ardeans, issue to the plain,
 With faith to friend, assault the Trojan train :
 Their thoughtless chiefs, their painted ships
 In Tiber's mouth, with fire and sword destroy.
 The Latian king, unless he shall submit,
 Own his old promise, and his new forget ;
 Let him, in arms, the power of Turnus prove,
 And learn to fear whom he disdains to love.
 For such is heaven's command. The youth prince

With scorn reply'd ; and made this bold defence
 You tell me, mother, what I knew before ;
 The Phrygian fleet is landed on the shore :
 I neither fear, nor will provoke, the war :
 My fate is Juno's most peculiar care,
 But time has made you dote, and vainly tell
 Of arms imagin'd, in your lonely cell :
 Go, be the temple and the gods your care ;
 Permit the men the thought of peace and war.
 These haughty words Alecto's rage provoke,
 And frighted Turnus trembled as she spoke.
 Her eyes grew stiffen'd and with sulphur burn,
 Her hideous looks and hellish form return :
 Her curling snakes with hissing fill the place,
 And open all the furies of her face !
 Then, darting fire from her malignant eyes,
 She cast him backward as he strove to rise,
 And, lingering, fought to frame some new replies.

High on her head she rears two twisted snakes ;
 Her chain she rattles, and her whip she shakes ;
 And, churning bloody foam, thus loudly speaks :
 Behold whom time has made to dote, and tell
 Of arms, imagin'd in her lonely cell :
 Behold the fates' infernal minister ;
 War, death, destruction, in my hand I bear.

Thus having said, her smouldering torch in press'd
 With her full force, she plung'd into his breast.
 Aghast he wak'd, and, starting from his bed,
 Cold sweat, in clammy drops, his limbs o'erspread
 Arms, arms, he cries, my sword and shield prepare ;
 He breathes defiance, blood, and mortal war.
 So when with crackling flames a cauldron fries,
 The bubbling waters from the bottom rise :
 Above their brims they force their fiery way ;
 Black vapours climb aloft, and cloud the day.

The peace polluted thus, a chosen band
 In first commissions to the Latian land,
 In threatening embassy: then rais'd the rest,
 To meet in arms th' intruding Trojan guest:
 To force the foes from the Lavinian shore,
 And Italy's endanger'd peace restore;
 Himself alone, an equal match he boasts,
 To fight the Phrygian and Ausonian hosts.
 The gods invoc'd, the Rutili prepare
 Their arms, and warm each other to the war.
 His beauty these, and those his blooming age,
 The rest his house, and his own fame engage.

While Turnus urges thus his enterprise,
 The Stygian fury to the Trojans flies:
 New frauds invents, and takes a steepy stand,
 Which overlooks the vale with wide command;
 Where fair Afcanius and his youthful train,
 With horns and bounds, a hunting match ordain,
 And pitch their toils around the shady plain. }
 The fury fires the pack; they snuff they vent,
 And feed their hungry nostrils with the scent.
 'Twas of a well-grown stag, whose antlers rise
 High o'er his front, his beams invade the skies:
 From this light cause, th' infernal maid prepares
 The country churls to mischief, hate, and wars.

The stately beast, the two Tyrrhædæ bred,
 Snatch'd from his dam, and the tame youngling fed.

Their father Tyrrheus did their fodder bring;
 Tyrrheus chief ranger to the Latian king:
 Their sister Sylvia cherish'd with her care
 The little wanton, and did wreaths prepare
 To hang his budding horns: with ribbons ty'd
 His tender neck, and comb'd his silken hide;
 And bath'd his body. Patient of command,
 In time he grew, and growing us'd to hand.
 He waited at his master's board for food;
 Then sought his savage kindred in the wood:
 Where, gazing all the day, at night he came
 To his known lodgings, and his country dame.

This household beast, that us'd the woodland grounds,

Was view'd at first by the young hero's hounds;
 As down the stream he swam, to seek retreat
 In the cool waters, and to quench his heat,
 Afcanius, young, and eager of his game,
 Soon bent his bow, uncertain in his aim:
 But the dire fiend the fatal arrow guides,
 Which pierc'd his bowls through his panting sides.
 The bleeding creature issues from the floods,
 Possess'd with fear, and seeks his known abodes; }
 His old familiar hearth, and household gods. }
 He falls, he fills the house with heavy groans;
 Implores their pity, and his pain bemoans.
 Young Sylvia beats her breast, and cries aloud
 For succour from the clownish neighbourhood:
 The churls assemble; for the fiend who lay
 In the close woody covert urg'd their way.
 One with a brand, yet burning from the flame;
 Arm'd with a knotty club, another came:
 Whate'er they catch or find, without their care,
 Their fury makes an instrument of war.
 Tyrrheus, the foster-father of the beast,
 Then clench'd a hatchet in his horny fist:
 But held his hand from the descending stroke,
 And left his wedge within the cloven oak, }
 To wet their courage, and their rage provoke. }

And now the goddess, exercis'd in ill,
 Who watch'd an hour to work her impious will,
 Ascends the roof, and to her crooked horn,
 Such as was then by Latian shepherds borne,
 Adds all her breath; the rocks and woods around,
 And mountains, tremble at th' infernal sound.
 The sacred lake of Trivia from afar

The Veline fountains, and sulphureous Nar,
 Shake at the baleful blast, the signal of the war. }
 Young mothers wildly stare, with fear possess'd,
 And strain their helpless infants to their breast.

The clowns, a boisterous, rude, ungovern'd crew,
 With furious haste to the loud summons flew.
 The powers of Troy, then issuing on the plain,
 With fresh recruits their youthful chief sustain:
 Nor theirs a raw and unexperienc'd train,
 But a firm body of embattled men.

At first, while fortune favour'd neither side,
 The fight with clubs and burning brands was
 try'd:

But now, both parties reinforc'd, the fields
 Are bright with flaming swords and brazen shields.
 A shining harvest either host displays,
 And shoots against the sun with equal rays.

Thus when a black-brow'd gulf begins to rise, }
 White foam at first on the curl'd ocean fries;
 Then roars the main, the billows mount the
 skies: }

Till, by the fury of the storm full blown,
 The muddy bottom o'er the clouds is thrown.

First Almon falls, old Tyrrheus' eldest care,
 Pierc'd with an arrow from the distant war:
 Fix'd in his throat the flying weapon stood,
 And stopp'd his breath, and drank his vital blood.
 Huge heaps of slain around the body rise;
 Among the rest, the rich Galeus lies:
 A good old man, while peace he preach'd in vain,
 Amidst the madness of th' unruly train:
 Five herds, five bleating flocks, his pastures fill'd;
 His lands a hundred yoke of oxen till'd.

Thus, while in equal scales their fortune stood,
 The fury bath'd them equal in each others blood.
 Then, having fix'd the fight, exulting flies,
 And bears fulfill'd her promise to the skies,
 To Juno thus she speaks: Behold 'tis done;
 The blood already drawn, the war begun;
 The discord is complete, nor can they cease
 The dire debate, nor you command the peace.
 Now since the Latian and the Trojan brood
 Have tasted vengeance, and the sweets of blood,
 Speak, and my power shall add this office more;
 The neighbouring nations of th' Ausonian shore
 Shall hear the dreadful rumour from afar,
 Of arm'd invasion, and embrace the war.

Then Juno thus: The grateful work is done;
 The seeds of discord sow'd, the war begun;
 Frauds, fears, and fury, have possess'd the state,
 And fix'd the causes of a lasting hate:
 A bloody Hymen shall th' alliance join
 Betwixt the Trojan and Ausonian line:
 But thou with speed to night and hell repair.
 For not the gods nor angry Jove will bear
 Thy lawless wandering walks in upper air. }
 Leave what remains to me, Saturnia said:
 The fullen fiend her sounding wings display'd,
 Unwilling left the light, and sought the nether
 shade. }

In midst of Italy, well known to fame,
 There lies a lake, Amfanctus is the name,
 Below the lofty mounts, on either side
 Thick forests the forbidden entrance hide:
 Full in the centre of the sacred wood
 An arm arises of the Stygian flood; [found,
 Which, breaking from beneath with bellowing
 Whirls the black waves and rattling stones around.
 Here Pluto pants for breath from out his cell,
 And opens wide the grinning jaws of hell.
 To this infernal lake the fury flies; [ing skies.
 Here hides her hated head, and frees the labour-
 Saturnian Juno, now, with double care,
 Attends the fatal process of the war.
 The clowns return'd from battle bear the slain,
 Implore the gods, and to their king complain.
 The corpse of Almon and the rest are shown,
 Shrieks, clamours, murmurs, fill the frighted town.
 Ambitious Turnus in the press appears,
 And, aggravating crimes, augments their fears:
 Proclaims his private injuries aloud,
 A solemn promise made, and disavow'd;
 A foreign foe is fought, and a mix'd mongrel
 brood.
 Then they, whose mothers, frantic with their
 fear

In woods and wilds the flags of Bacchus bear,
 And lead his dances with dishevell'd hair;
 Increase the clamour, and the war demand,
 (Such was Amata's interest in the land).
 Against the public sanctions of the peace;
 Against all omens of their ill success;
 With fates averfe, the rout in arms resort,
 To force their monarch, and insult the court.
 But, like a rock unmov'd, a rock that braves
 The raging tempest and the rising waves,
 Propp'd on himself he stands: his solid sides
 Wash off the sea-weeds, and the founding tides:
 So stood the pious prince unmov'd: and long
 Sustain'd the madness of the noisy throng.
 But when he found that Juno's power prevail'd,
 And all the methods of cool counsel fail'd,
 He calls the gods to witness their offence,
 Disclaims the war, asserts his innocence.
 Hurry'd by fate, he cries, and borne before
 A furious wind, we leave the faithful shore:
 O more than madmen! you yourselves shall bear
 The guilt of blood and sacrilegious war:
 Thou Turnus, shalt atone it by thy fate,
 And pray to heaven for peace; but pray too late.
 For me, my stormy voyage at an end,
 I to the port of death securely tend.
 The funeral pomp which to your kings you pay,
 Is all I want, and all you take away.
 He said no more, but, in his walls confin'd,
 Shut out the woes which lie too well divin'd:
 Nor with the rising storm would vainly strive,
 But left the helm, and let the vessel drive.
 A solemn custom was observ'd of old,
 Which Latium held, and now the Romans hold:
 Their standard when, in fighting fields, they rear
 Against the fierce Hyrcanians, or declare
 The Scythian, Indian, or Arabian war:
 Or from the boasting Parthians would regain
 Their eagles lost in Carthæ's bloody plain:
 Two gates of steel (the name of Mars they bear)
 And still are worshipp'd with religious fear,

Before his temple stand: the dire abode,
 And the fear'd issues of the furious god,
 Are fenc'd with brazen bolts; without the gates,
 The wary guardian Janus doubly waits.
 Then, when the sacred senate votes the wars,
 The Roman consul their decree declares,
 And in his robes the founding gates unbars.
 The youth in military shouts arise,
 And the loud trumpets break the yielding skies.
 These rites, of old by sovereign princes us'd,
 Were the king's office, but the king refus'd:
 Deaf to their cries, nor would the gates unbar
 Of sacred peace, or loose the imprison'd war:
 But hid his head, and, safe from loud alarms,
 Abhorrd the wicked ministry of arms.
 Then heaven's imperious queen shot down from
 At her approach the brazen hinges fly; [high;
 The gates are forc'd, and every falling bar,
 And, like a tempest, issues out the war.
 The peaceful cities of th' Ausonian shore,
 Lull'd in their ease, and undisturb'd before,
 Are all on fire; and some, with studious care,
 Their restive steeds in sandy plains prepare:
 Some their soft limbs in painful marches try, [cry.
 And war is all their wish, and arms the general
 Part scour the rusty shields with seam, and part
 New grind the blunted axe, and point the dart:
 With joy they view the waving ensigns fly,
 And hear the trumpet's clangor pierce the sky.
 Five cities forge their arms: th' Atinian powers,
 Antemnæ, Tibur with her lofty towers,
 Ardea the proud, the Crustumian town:
 All these of old were places of renown.
 Some hammer helmets for the fighting field;
 Some twine young fallows to support the shield;
 The croset some, and some the cushions mould,
 With silver plated, and with ductile gold.
 The rustic honours of the scythe and share,
 Give place to swords and plumes, the pride of war.
 Old faulchions are new temper'd in the fires:
 The founding trumpet every soul inspires.
 The word is given, with eager speed they lace
 The shining head-piece, and the shield embrace.
 The neighing steeds are to the chariots ty'd;
 The trusty weapon fits on every side.

And now the mighty labour is begun,
 Ye Muses, open all your Helicon.
 Sing you the chiefs that sway th' Ausonian land,
 Their arms, and armies under their command:
 What warriors in our ancient clime were bred;
 What soldiers follow'd, and what heroes led.
 For well you know, and can record alone, [down.
 What fame to future times conveys but darkly
 Mezentius first appear'd upon the plain;
 Scorn fate upon his brows, and sour disdain:
 Defying earth and heaven: Etruria lost,
 He brings to Turnus' aid his baffled host.
 The charming Lanfus, full of youthful fire,
 Rode in the rank, and next his sullen fire:
 To Turnus only second in the grace
 Of manly mien, and features of the face;
 A skilful horseman, and a huntman bred,
 With fates averfe a thousand men he led:
 His fire unworthy of so brave a son;
 Himself well worthy of a happier throne.
 Next Aventinus drives his chariot round
 The Latian plains, with palms and laurels crown'd

Proud of his steeds, he smokes along the field,
His father's hydra fills the ample shield.
A hundred serpents hiss about the brims;
The son of Hercules he justly seems,
By his broad shoulders and gigantic limbs. }
Of heavenly part, and part of earthly blood,
A mortal woman mixing with a god.
For strong Alcides, after he had slain
The triple Geryon, drove from conquer'd Spain
His captive herds, and thence in triumph led;
On Tuscan Tiber's flowery banks they fed.
Then on Mount Aventine, the son of Jove
The priestess Rhea found, and forc'd to love.

For arms his men long piles and javelins bore,
And poles with pointed steel their foes in battle
Like Hercules himself, his fon appears, [gore.
In savage pomp: a lion's hide he wears;
About his shoulders hangs the skaggy skin,
The teeth and gaping jaws severely grin.
Thus like the god his father, homely drest,
He strides into the hall, a horrid guest.

Then two twin-brothers from fair Tiber came (Which from their brother Tiburs took the name);
Fierce Coras, and Catillus, void of fear,
Arm'd Argive horse they led, and in the front appear. [height,

Like cloud-born centaurs, from the mountain's
With rapid course descending to the fight,
They rush along; the rattling woods give way;
The branches bend before their sweepy sway.

Nor was Præneste's founder wanting there,
Whom Æne reports the son of Mulciber:
Found in the fire, and foster'd in the plains, shepherd and a king at once he reigns, }
And leads to Turnus' aid his country swains.

His own Præneste sends a chosen band,
With those who plough Saturnia's Sabine land:
Besides the succour which old Anian yields,
The rocks of Hernicus, and dewy fields,
Anagnia fat, and father Amafene,
A numerous rout, but all of naked men:
Nor arms they wear, nor swords and bucklers
wield,

Nor drive the chariot through the dusty field;
But whirl from lethern strings huge balls of lead:
And spoils of yellow wolves adorn their head:
The left foot naked, when they march to fight;
But in a bulls raw hide they sheath the right.

Mefappus next (great Neptune was his fire),
Secure from steel, and fated from the fire,
In pomp appears; and with his ardour warms
A heartless train, unexercis'd in arms:
The just Falicians he to battle brings.

And those who live where lake Ciminia springs;
And where Feronia's grove and temple stands,
Who till Fescennian or Flavian lands:
All these in order march, and marching sing
The warlike actions of their sea-born king.
Like a long team of snowy swans on high,
Which clap their wings, and cleave the liquid sky,
Which homeward from their watery pastures
bore,

They sing, and Asia's lakes their notes return.
Not one who heard their music from afar,
Would think these troops an army train'd to war:
But flocks of fowl, that when the tempests roar,
With their hoarse gabbling seek the silent shore.

Then Clausus came, who led a numerous band
Of troops embody'd, from the Sabine land:
And in himself alone an army brought.

'Twas he the noble Claudian race begot:
The Claudian race, ordain'd, in times to come,
To share the greatness of imperial Rome.
He led the Cures forth of high renown,
Mutucans from their olive-bearing town;
And all th' Eretian powers: besides a band
That followed from Velinum's dewy land:
And Amiternian troops, of mighty fame,
And mountaineers, that from Severus came.
And from the craggy cliffs of Tetrica,
And those where yellow Tiber takes his way, }
And where Himella's wanton waters play.
Casperia sends her arms, with those that lie
By Fabaris, and fruitful Foruli:

The warlike aids of Horta next appear,
And the cold Nursians come to close the rear:
Mix'd with the natives born of Latine blood,
Whom Allia washes with her fatal flood.
Not thicker billows beat the Libyan main,
When pale Orion sets in wintery rain;
Nor thicker harvest on rich Hermes rise,
Or Lycian fields, when Phœbus burns the skies;
Than stand these troops: their bucklers ring
around;

Their trampling turns the turf, and shakes the solid ground.

High in his chariot then Halesus came,
A foe by birth to Troy's unhappy name:
From Agamemnon born: to Turnus' aid,
A thousand men the youthful hero led;
Who till the Mæssic soil, for wine renown'd,
And fierce Aruncans from their hilly ground:
And those who live by Sidicinian shores,
And where, with shoaly fords, Voltumnus roars;
Cales and Ofea's old inhabitants,
And rough Saticulans inur'd to wants:
Light demi-lances from afar they throw,
Fasten'd with leather thongs, to gally the foe.
Short crooked swords in closer fight they wear,
And, on their warding arms, like bucklers bear.

Nor, Oebalus, shalt thou be left unsung,
From nymph Semethis and old Telon sprung:
Who then in Teleboan Capri reign'd;
But that short isle th' ambitious youth disdain'd;
And o'er Campania stretch'd his ample sway;
Where swelling Sarnus seeks the Tyrrhene sea:
O'er Batulum, and where Abella fees,
From her high towers, the harvest of her trees.
And these (as was the Teuton use of old)
Wield brazen swords, and brazen bucklers hold;
Sling weighty stones when from afar they fight:
Their calques are cork, a covering thick and light.

Next these in rank, the warlike Usens went,
And led the mountain-troops that Nursia sent.
The rude Equicolæ his rule obey'd;
Hunting their sport, and plundering was their trade.

In arms they plough'd, to battle still prepar'd:
Their soil was barren, and their hearts were hard.

Umbro the priest, the proud Marrubians led,
By king Archippus sent to Turnus' aid; }
And peaceful olives crown'd his hoary head.
His wand and holy words, the viper's rage,
And venom'd wound of serpents, could assuage.

He, when he pleas'd with powerful juice to steep
 Their temples, shut their eyes in pleasing sleep.
 But vain were Marſian herbs, and magic art,
 To cure the wound given by the Dardan dart.
 Yet his untimely fate, th' Angitian woods
 In ſighs remurmur'd to the Fucine floods.
 The ſon of fam'd Hippolytus was there ;
 Fam'd as his fire, and as his mother fair,
 Whom in Egerian groves Aricia bore,
 And nurs'd his youth along the marſhy ſhore :
 Where great Diada's peaceful altars flame
 In fruitful fields, and Virbius was his name.
 Hippolytus, as old records have ſaid,
 Was by his ſtepdame fought to ſhare her bed :
 But when no female arts his mind could move,
 She turn'd to furious hate her impious love.
 Torn by wild horſes on the ſandy ſhore,
 Another's crimes th' unhappy hunter bore ;
 Glutting his father's eyes with guiltleſs gore. }
 But chaſte Diana, who his death deplor'd,
 With Æſculapian herbs his life reſtor'd.
 When Jove, who ſaw from high, with juſt diſdain
 The dead inſpir'd with vital breath again,
 Struck to the centre with his flaming dart,
 Th' unhappy founder of the godlike art.
 But Trivia kept in ſecret ſhades alone,
 Her care, Hyppolytus, to fate unknown ;
 And call'd him Virbius in th' Egerian grove :
 Where then he liv'd obſcure, but ſafe from Jove.
 For this, from Trivia's temple and her wood,
 Are courſers driven, who ſhed their maſter's }
 Affrighted by the monſters of the flood. { blood ; }
 His ſon, the ſecond Virbius, yet retain'd
 His father's art, and warrior ſteeds he rein'd.
 Amid the troops, and like the leading god,
 High o'er the reit in arms the graceful Turnus rode :
 A triple pile of plumes his creſt adorn'd,
 On which, with belching flames, Chimæra burn'd :

The more the kindled combat riſes higher,
 The more with fury burns the blazing fire.
 Fair Iſo grac'd his ſhield, but Iſo now
 With horns exalted ſtands, and ſeems to lowe :
 (A noble charge) her keeper by her ſide,
 To watch her walks, his hundred eyes apply'd.
 And on the brims her fire, the watery god,
 Roll'd from a ſilver urn his cryſtal flood :
 A cloud of foot ſucceeds, and fills the fields
 With ſwords and pointed ſpears, and clattering
 Of Argives, and of old Sicanian bands, [ſhields :
 And thoſe who plough the rich Satulian lands ;
 Auruncan youth, and thoſe Sacrana yields,
 And the proud Labicans, with painted ſhields,
 And thoſe who near Numician ſtreams reſide,
 And thoſe whom Tiber's holy foreſts hide ; }
 Or Circe's hills from the main land divide :
 Where Uſens glide along the lowly lands,
 Or the black water of Pomptina ſtands.
 Laſt, from the Volcians fair, Camilla came ;
 And led her warlike troops, a warrior dame :
 Unbred to ſpinning, in the loom unſkill'd,
 She choſe the nobler Pallas of the field,
 Mix'd with the firſt, the fierce Virago fought,
 Sustain'd the toils of arms, the dangers fought :
 Outſtripp'd the winds in ſpeed upon the plain,
 Flew o'er the fields, nor hurt the bearded grain :
 She ſwept the ſeas, and as the ſkim'd along,
 Her flying feet unbaſh'd on billows hung.
 Men, boys, and women, ſtupid with ſurpriſe,
 Where'er ſhe paſſes, fix their wandering eyes :
 Longing their look, and gaping at her ſight,
 Devour her o'er and o'er with vaſt delight.
 Her purple habit ſits with ſuch a grace
 On her ſmooth ſhoulders, and ſo ſuits her face :
 Her head with ringlets of her hair is crown'd ;
 And in a golden caul the curls are bound.
 She ſhakes her myrtle javelin ; and, behind,
 Her Lycian quiver dances in the wind.

B O O K VIII.

THE ARGUMENT.

The war being now begun, both the generals make all poſſible preparations. Turnus ſends to Diomedes. Æneas goes in perſon to beg ſuccours from Evander, and the Tuſcans. Evander receives him kindly, furniſhes him with men, and ſends his own ſon Pallas with him. Vulcan, at the requeſt of Venus, makes arms for her ſon Æneas, and draws on his ſhield the moſt memorable actions of his poſterity.

WHEN Turnus had aſſembled all his powers ;
 His ſtandard planted on Laurentum's towers ;
 When now the ſprightly trumpet, from afar,
 Had given the ſignal of approaching war,
 Had rous'd the neighing ſteeds to ſcour the fields,
 While the fierce riders clatter'd on their ſhields,
 Trembling with rage, the Latian youth prepare
 To join th' allies, and headlong ruſh to war.
 Fierce Uſens, and Meſſapus, led the crowd ;
 With bold Mezentius, who blaſphem'd aloud.
 Theſe, thro' the country took their waſteful courſe ;
 The fields to forage, and to gather force.

Then Venulus to Diomede they ſend,
 To beg his aid Auſonia to defend :
 Declare the common danger, and inform
 The Grecian leader of the growing ſtorm :
 Æneas landed on the Latian coaſt,
 With baniſh'd gods, and with a baſſed hoſt :
 Yet now inſpir'd to conqueſt of the ſtate ;
 And claim'd a title from the gods and fate.
 What numerous nations in his quarrel came,
 And how they ſpread his formidable name :
 What he deſign'd, what miſchiefs might ariſe,
 If fortune favour'd his firſt enterpriſe,

Was left for him to weigh, whose equal fears,
And common interest was involv'd in theirs,
While Turnus and th' allies thus urge the war,
The Trojan, floating in a flood of care,
Beholds the tempests which his foes prepare,
This way and that he turns his anxious mind ;
Thinks, and rejects the counsels he design'd ;
Explores himself, in vain, in every part,
And gives no rest to his distracted heart.

So when the sun by day, or moon by night,
Strike on the polish'd brafs their trembling light,
The glittering species here and there divide,
And cast their dubious beams from side to side :
Now on the walls, now on the pavement play,
And to the cieling flash the glaring day.
'Twas night : and weary nature lull'd asleep
The birds of air, and fishes of the deep ;
And beast and mortal men : the Trojan chief
Was laid on Tiber's banks, oppress'd with grief,
And found in silent slumber late relief.
Then through the shadows of the poplar wood
Arose the father of the Roman flood :
An azure robe was o'er his body spread,
A wreath of shady reeds adorn'd his head :
Thus, manifest to fight, the god appear'd,
And with these pleading words his sorrow cheer'd :
Undoubted offspring of ethereal race,
O long expected in this promis'd place,
Who through the foes, hast born thy banish'd gods,
Restor'd them to their hearths, and old abodes ;
This is thy happy home ! The clime where fate
Ordains thee to restore the Trojan state.
Fear not, the war shall end in lasting peace ;
And all the rage of haughty Juno cease.

And that this nightly vision may not seem
Th' effect of fancy, or an idle dream,
A sow beneath an oak shall lie along,
All white herself, and white her thirty young.
When thirty rolling years have run their race,
Thy son, Æscanius, on this empty space
Shall build a royal town, of lasting fame ;
Which from this omen shall receive the name.
Time shall approve the truth. For what remains,
And how with sure success to crown thy pains,
With patience next attend. A banish'd band,
Driven with Evander from th' Arcadian land,
Have planted here ; and plac'd on high their walls ;

Their town the founder Palanteum calls :
Deriv'd from Pallas, his great grandfire's name :
But the fierce Latians old possession claim,
With war infesting the new colony ;
These make thy friends, and on their aid rely.
To thy free passage I submit my streams :
Wake, son of Venus, from thy pleasing dreams :
And, when the setting stars are lost in day,
To Juno's power thy just devotion pay.
With sacrifice the wrathful queen appease :
Her pride at length shall fall, her fury cease :
When thou return'st victorious from the war,
Perform thy vows to me with grateful care.
The god am I, whose yellow water flows
Around these fields, and fattens as it goes :
Tiber my name : among the rolling floods
Renown'd on earth, esteem'd among the gods.
This is my certain feat : in times to come,
My waves shall wash the walls of mighty Rome.

He said ; and plung'd below, while yet he spoke,
His dream Æneas, and his sleep forsook.
He rose, and looking up, beheld the skies
With purple blushing and the day arise.
Then, water in his hollow palm he took
From Tiber's flood ; and thus the powers bespoke :
Laurentian nymphs, by whom the streams are fed,
And father Tiber, in thy sacred bed
Receive Æneas ; and from danger keep.
Whatever fount, whatever holy deep,
Conceals thy watery stores ; where'er they rise,
And, bubbling from below, salute the skies,
Thou king of horned floods, whose plenteous
Suffices fainest to the fruitful corn, [ura
For this thy kind compassion of our woes,
Shall share my morning song, and evening vows.
But, oh ! be present to thy people's aid ;
And firm the gracious promise thou hast made :
Thus having said, two gallees, from his stores,
With care he chooses ; mans, and fits with oars.
Now on the shore the fatal swine is found :
Wondrous to tell ; she lay along the ground :
Her well-fed offspring at her udders hung ;
She white herself, and white her thirty young ;
Æneas takes the mother, and her brood,
And all on Juno's altar are bestow'd.

The following night, and the succeeding day,
Propitious Tiber smooth'd his watery way :
He roll'd his river back, and pois'd he stood :
A gentle swelling, and a peaceful flood. [shore :
The Trojans mount their ships ; they put from Borne on the waves, and scarcely dip an oar.
Shouts from the land give omen to their course,
And the pitch'd vessels glide with easy force,
The woods and waters wonder at the gleam
Of shields, and painted ships, that stem the stream.
One summer's night, and one whole day they pass
Betwixt the green-wood shades, and cut the liquid glass.

The fiery sun had finish'd half his race,
Look'd back, and doubted in the middle space,
When they from far beheld the rising towers,
The tops of sheds, and shepherds lowly bowers :
Thin as they stood, which then of homely clay,
Now rise in marble, from the Roman sway.
These cots (Evander's kingdom, mean and poor)
The Trojan saw, and turn'd his ships to shore.
'Twas on a solemn day : th' Arcadian states,
The king and prince without the city gates,
Then paid their offerings in a sacred grove
To Hercules, the warrior son of Jove.
Thick clouds of rolling smoke involve the skies ;
And fat of entrails on his altar fries.

But when they saw the ships that stem'd the
flood,
And glitter'd through the covert of the wood,
They rose with fear, and left th' unfinished feat :
Till dauntless Pallas re-assur'd the rest
To pay the rites. Himself, without delay,
A javelin seiz'd, and singly took his way.
Then gain'd a rising ground ; and call'd from far : [are ;
Resolve me, strangers, whence, and what you
Your business here, and bring you peace or war ?

High on the stern, Æneas took his stand,
And held a branch of olive in his hand,

While thus he spoke: The Phrygian arms you see,
Expell'd from Troy, provok'd in Italy.
By Latian foes, with war unjustly made:
At first affianc'd, and at last betray'd,
This message bear: the Trojans and their chief,
Bring holy peace, and beg the king's relief.
Struck with so great a name, and all on fire,
The youth replies, Whatever you require,
Your fame exacts: upon our shores descend,
A welcome guest, and, what you wish, a friend.
He said; and downward hastening to the strand,
Embrac'd the stranger prince, and join'd his hand.
Conducted to the grove, Æneas broke
The silence first, and thus the king bespoke:
Best of the Greeks, to whom, by fate's command,
I bear these peaceful branches in my hand,
Undaunted I approach you; though I know
Your birth is Grecian, and your land my foe:
From Atreus though your ancient lineage came,
And both the brother-kings your kindred claim,
Yet, my self-conscious worth, your high renown,
Your virtue, through the neighbouring nations blown.

Our fathers mingled blood, Apollo's voice,
Have led me hither, less by need than choice.
Our founder Dardanus, as fame has sung,
And Greeks acknowledge, from Electra sprung:
Electra from the loins of Atlas came;
Atlas whose head sustains the starry frame.
Your sire is Mercury; whom long before
On cold Cyllene's top fair Maja bore.
Maja the fair, on fame if we rely,
Was Atlas' daughter, who sustains the sky:
Thus from one common source our streams divide:

Ours is the Trojan, yours th' Arcadian side.
Rais'd by these hopes, I sent no news before,
Nor ask'd your leave, nor did your faith implore; } [fador;
But come, without a pledge, my own ambas- }
The same Rutilians, who with arms pursue
The Trojan race, are equal foes to you.

Our host expell'd, what farther force can stay
The victor troops from universal sway?
Then will they stretch their power athwart the
land;

And either sea from side to side command.
Receive our offer'd faith; and give us thine:
Ours is a generous and experienc'd line:
We want not hearts nor bodies for the war;
In council cautious, and in fields we dare.
He said; and while he spoke, with piercing eyes
Evander view'd the man with vast surprise,
Pleas'd with his action, ravish'd with his face,
Then answer'd briefly, with a royal grace:
O valiant leader of the Trojan line,
In whom the features of thy father shine,
How I recall Anchises, how I see
His motions, mien, and all my friend in thee!
Long though it be, 'tis fresh within my mind,
When Priam to his sister's court design'd
A welcome visit, with a friendly stay,
And through th' Arcadian kingdom took his way.
Then, pass a boy, the callow down began
To shade my chin, and call me first a man.
I saw the shining train, with vast delight,
And Priam's goodly person pleas'd my sight:

But great Anchises, far above the rest,
With awful wonder fir'd my youthful breast.
I long'd to join, in friendship's holy bands,
Our mutual hearts, and plight our mutual hands.
I first accosted him: I sued, I sought,
And, with a loving force, to Pheneus brought.
He gave me, when at length constrain'd to go,
A Lycian quiver, and a Gouffian bow;
A vest embroider'd, glorious to behold,
And two rich bridles, with their bits of gold,
Which my son's couriers in obedience hold.
The league you ask I offer, as your right:
And when to-morrow's sun reveals the light,
With swift supplies you shall be sent away:
Now celebrate, with us, this solemn day:
Whose holy rites admit no long delay.
Honour our annual feast; and take your seat
With friendly welcome, at a homely treat.
Thus having said, the bowls (remov'd for fear)
The youths replac'd; and soon restor'd the cheer.

On sods of turf he set the soldiers round;
A maple throne, rais'd higher from the ground,
Receiv'd the Trojan chief: and o'er the bed,
A lion's shaggy hide for ornament they spread.
The loaves were serv'd in canisters, the wine
In bowls, the priest renew'd the rites divine:
Broil'd entrails are their food; and beefs continued chine. }

But, when the rage of hunger was repress'd,
Thus spoke Evander to his royal guest:
These rites, these altars, and this feast, O king,
From no vain fears, or superstition, spring;
Or blind devotion, or from blinder chance;
Or heady zeal, or brutal ignorance:
But (sav'd from danger, with a grateful sense,
The labours of a god we recompense.
See, from afar, yon rock that mates the sky,
About whose feet such heaps of rubbish lie:
Such indigested ruin; bleak and bare,
How desert now it stands, expos'd in air!
'Twas once a robber's den; inclos'd around
With living stone, and deep beneath the ground.
The monster Cæus, more than half a beast,
This hold, impervious to the sun, possess'd.
The pavement ever foul with human gore;
Heads, and their mangled members, hung the door.

Vulcan this plague begot: and, like his fire,
Black clouds he belch'd, and flakes of livid fire.
Time, long expected, eas'd us of our load:
And brought the needful presence of a god.
Th' avenging force of Hercules, from Spain,
Arriv'd in triumph, from Geryon slain; }
Thrice liv'd the giant, and thrice liv'd in vain.
His prize, the lowing herds, Alcides drove Near Tiber's bank, to graze the shady grove.
Allur'd with hope of plunder, and intent
By force to rob, by fraud to circumvent.
The brutal Cæus, as by chance they stray'd,
Four oxen thence, and four fair kine convey'd:
And, lest the printed footsteps might be seen,
He dragg'd them backwards to his rocky den:
The tracks averse, a lying notice gave,
And led the searcher backward from the cave:
Mean time the herdsmen hero shifts his place,
To find fresh pasture, and untrodden grafs.

The beasts, who mis'd their mates, fill'd all around

With bellowings, and the rocks restor'd the found.
One heifer, who had heard her love complain,
Roar'd from the cave, and made the project vain.
Alcides found the fraud: with rage he took,
And tofs'd about his head his knotted oak.
Swift as the winds, or Scythian arrows flight,
He clomb, with eager haite, th' aerial height.
Then first we saw the monster mend his pace:
Fear in his eyes, and paleness in his face,
Confess'd the god's approach: trembling he springs,

As terror had increas'd his feet with wings:
Nor stay'd for stairs; but down the depth he
His body; on his back the door he drew. [threw
The door, a rib of living rock; with pains
His father hew'd it out, and bound with iron chains.

He broke the heavy links: the mountain clos'd,
And bars and levers to his foe oppos'd.
The wretch had hardly made his dungeon fast;
The fierce avenger came with bounding haste:
Survey'd the mouth of the forbidden hold;
And here and there his raging eyes he roll'd.
He gnash'd his teeth; and thrice he compass'd
round

With winged speed, the circuit of the ground.
Thrice at the cavern's mouth he pul'd in vain,
And, panting, thrice desist'd from his pain.
A pointed flinty rock, all bare, and black,
Grew gibbous from behind the mountain's back:
Owls, ravens, all ill omens of the night,
Here built their nests, and hither wing'd their flight.

The leaning head hung threatening o'er the flood,
And nodded to the left: the hero stood
Averie, with planted feet, and, from the right,
Tugg'd at the solid stone with all his might.
Thus heav'd, the fix'd foundations of the rock
Gave way: heaven echo'd at the rattling shock.
Tumbling it chok'd the flood: on either side
The banks leap backward, and the streams divide:

The sky shrunk upward with unusual dread;
And trembling Tiber div'd beneath his bed.
The court of Cacus stands reveal'd to sight;
The cavern glares with new-admitted light.
So pent the vapours with a rumbling sound
Heave from below, and rend the hollow ground:
A founding flaw succeeds: and, from on high,
The gods with bate beheld the nether sky:
The ghosts repine at violated night,
And curse th' invading sun, and sicken at the flight.

The gracle's monster, caught in open day,
Enclos'd, and in despair to fly away,
Howls horrible from underneath, and fills
His hollow palace with unmanly yells.
The hero stands above; and from afar
Plies him with darts, and stones, and distant war.
He, from his nostrils and huge mouth, expires
Black clouds of smoke, amidst his father's fires.
Gathering, with each repeated blast, the night:
To make uncertain aim, and erring flight.
The wrathful god then plunges from above,
And where in thickest waves the sparkles drove,

There lights; and wades through fumes, and gropes his way;
Half sing'd, half stifled, till he grasp'd his prey.
The monster, spewing fruitless flames, he
found;

He squeez'd his throat, he writh'd his neck
around,
And in a knot his crippled members bound.
Then, from their sockets, tore his burning eyes;
Roll'd on a heap the breathless robber lies.
The doors, unbarr'd, receive the rushing day,
And thorough lights disclose the ravish'd prey.
The bulls redeem'd, breathe open air again:
Next, by the feet, they drag him from his den.
The wondering neighbourhood, with glad surprise,

Beheld his shagged breast, his giant size,
His mouth that flames no more, and his extinguish'd eyes.
From that auspicious day, with rites divine,
We worship at the hero's holy shrine.
Potitius first ordain'd these annual vows,
As priests, were added the Pinarian house:
Who rais'd this altar in the sacred shade,
Where honours, ever due, for ever shall be paid.
For these deserts, and this high virtue shown,
Ye warlike youths, your heads with garlands
crown.

Fill high the goblets with a sparkling flood:
And, with deep draughts, invoke our common god.
This said, a double wreath Evander twin'd:
And poplars, black and white, his temples bind.
Then brims his ample bowl: with like design
The rest invoke the god, with sprinkled wine.
Mean time the sun descended from the skies;
And the bright evening-star began to rise,
And now the priests, Potitius at their head,
In skins of beasts involv'd, the long procession led:
Held high the flaming tapers in their hands,
As custom had prescrib'd their holy bands:
Then with a second course the tables load;
And with full chargers offer to the god.
The Sali sing, and cense his altars round
With Saban smoke; their heads with poplar
bound.

One choir of old, another of the young;
To dance, and bear the burden of the song.
The lay records the labour, and the praise,
And all th' immortal acts of Hercules. [bands,
First, how the mighty babe, when swath'd in
The serpents strangled with his infant hands.
Then, as in years and matchless force he grew,
Th' Oechalian walls, and Trojan overthrow.
Besides a thousand hazards they relate,
Procur'd by Juno's and Euristheus' hate.
Thy hands, unconquer'd hero, could subdue
The cloud-born Centaurs, and the monster crew,
Nor thy resistless arm the bull withstood:
Nor he the roaring terror of the wood.
The triple porter of the Stygian feat,
With lolling tongue, lay fawning at thy feet:
And, seiz'd with fear, forgot thy mangled
meat.

Th' infernal waters trembled at the sight;
Thee, god, no face of danger could affright;
Not huge Typhceus, nor th' unnumber'd snake,
Increas'd with hissing heads, in Lerna's lake.

Hail Jove's undoubted son! an added grace
 To heaven, and the great author of thy race,
 Receive the grateful offerings, which we pay,
 And smile propitious on thy solemn day.
 In numbers, thus, they sung: above the rest,
 The den, and death of Cacus crown the feast.
 The woods to hollow vales convey the found;
 The vales to hills, and hills the notes rebound.
 The rites perform'd, the cheerful train retire.
 Betwixt young Pallas, and his aged fire
 The Trojan pass'd, the city to survey;
 And pleasing talk beguill'd the tedious way.
 The stranger cast around his curious eyes:
 New objects viewing still with new surprise.
 With greedy joy inquires of various things:
 And acts and monuments of ancient kings.
 Then thus the founder of the Roman towers:
 These woods were first the seat of sylvan powers,
 Of nymphs and fawns, and savage men, who took
 Their birth from trunks of trees and stubborn oak.
 Nor law they knew, nor manners, nor the care
 Of labouring oxen, nor the shining share:
 Nor arts of gain, nor what they gain'd to spare. }
 Their exercise the chase: the running flood
 Supply'd their thirst; the trees supply'd their food.
 Then Saturn came, who fled the power of Jove,
 Robb'd of his realms, and banish'd from above.
 The men, dispers'd on hills, to towns he brought;
 And laws ordain'd, and civil customs taught:
 And Latium call'd the land where safe he lay
 From his unduteous son, and his usurping sway.
 With his mild empire peace and plenty came:
 And hence the golden times deriv'd their name.
 A more degenerate and discolour'd age
 Succeeded this, with avarice and rage.
 Th' Ausonians, then, and bold Sicilians came;
 And Saturn's empire often chang'd the name.
 Then kings, gigantic Tiberis, and the rest,
 With arbitrary sway, the land oppress'd.
 For Tiber's flood was Albua before;
 Till, from the tyrant's fate, his name it bore.
 I last arriv'd, driv'n from my native home,
 By fortune's power, and fate's resistless doom.
 Long told on seas, I fought this happy land:
 Warn'd by my mother nymph, and call'd by heaven's command. [gate,

Thus walking on, he spoke: and show'd the
 Since call'd Carmental by the Roman state;
 Where stood an altar, sacred to the name
 Of old Carmenta, the prophetic dame:
 Who to her son foretold th' Æthenean race,
 Sublime in fame, and Rome's imperial place.
 Then shows the forest, which in after-times,
 Fierce Romulus, for perpetrated crimes,
 A sacred refuge made: with this, the shrine
 Where Pan below the rocks had rites divine.
 Then tells of Argus' death, his murder'd guest,
 Whose grave and tomb his innocence attest.
 Thence, to the steep Tarpeian rock he leads;
 Now roof'd with gold; then thatch'd with homely reeds.

A reverend fear (such superstition reigns
 Among the rude) ev'n then possess'd the swains.
 Some god they knew, what god they could not
 Did there amidst the sacred horror dwell. [tell,
 Th' Arcadians thought him Jove; and said they
 The mighty thunderer with majestic awe; [saw

Who took his shield, and dealt his bolts around;
 And scatter'd tempests on the teeming ground.
 Then saw two heaps of ruins; once they stood
 Two lately towns, on either side the flood.
 Saturnia's and Janicula's remains:
 And either place the founder's name retains.
 Discouring thus together, they resort
 Where poor Evander kept his country court.
 They view'd the ground of Rome's litigious hall,
 Once oxen low'd, where now the lawyers bawl.
 Then, stooping, through the narrow gates they
 press'd,

When thus the king address'd his Trojan guest:
 Mean as it is, this palace, and this door,
 Receiv'd Alcides; then a conqueror.
 Dare to be poor: accept our homely food
 Which feasted him; and emulate a god.
 Then underneath a lowly roof he led
 The weary prince, and laid him on a bed:
 The stuffing leaves, with hides of bears o'er-
 spread.

Now night had shed her silver dews around,
 And with her fable wings embrac'd the ground,
 When love's fair goddess, anxious for her son,
 (New tumults rising, and new wars begun)
 Couch'd with her husband, in his golden bed,
 With these alluring words invokes his aid;
 And, that her pleasing speech his mind may move,

Inspires each accent with the charms of love:
 While cruel fate conspir'd with Grecian powers;
 To level with the ground the Trojan towers;
 I ask not aid th' unhappy to restore;
 Nor did the succour of thy skill implore;
 Nor urg'd the labours of my lord in vain,
 A sinking empire longer to sustain.
 Though I much ow'd to Priam's house; and more
 The danger of Æneas did deplore.
 But now, by Jove's command, and fate's decree,
 His race is doom'd to reign in Italy;
 With humble suit I beg thy needful art;
 O still propitious power that rules my heart!
 A mother kneels a suppliant for her son:
 By Thetis and Aurora thou wert won
 To forge impenetrable shields; and grace,
 With fatal arms, a less illustrious race.
 Behold, what haughty nations are combin'd
 Against the relics of the Phrygian kind:
 With fire and sword my people to destroy;
 And conquer Venus twice, in conquering Troy.
 She said; and straight her arms, of snowy hue,
 About her unresolving husband threw.
 Her soft embraces soon infuse desire:
 His bones and marrow sudden warmth inspire:
 And all the godhead feels the wanted fire.
 Not half so swift the rattling thunder flies,
 Or forked lightnings flash along the skies.
 The goddess, proud of her successful wiles,
 And conscious of her form, in secret smiles.
 Then thus, the power obnoxious to her charms,
 Panting, and half dissolving in her arms:
 Why seek you reasons for a cause so just:
 Or your own beauties, or my love distrust?
 Long since, had you requir'd my helpful hand,
 Th' artificer and art you might command,
 To labour arms for Troy; nor Jove, nor Fate,
 Confin'd their empire to so short a date:

And, if you now desire new wars to wage,
 My skill I promise, and my pains engage.
 Whatever melting metals can conspire,
 Or breathing bellows, or the forming fire,
 Is freely your's: your anxious fears remove:
 And think no task is difficult to love.
 Trembling he spoke: and, eager of her charms,
 He snatch'd the willing goddess to his arms;
 Till in her lap infus'd, he lay possess'd
 Of full desire, and sunk to pleasing rest.
 Now when the night her middle race had rode,
 And his first slumber had refresh'd the god;
 The time when early housewives leave the bed;
 When living embers on the hearth they spread;
 Supply the lamp and call the maids to rise,
 With yawning mouths, and with half-open'd eyes;
 They ply the distaff by the twinkling light;
 And to their daily labour add the night.
 Thus frugally they earn their children's bread:
 And uncorrupted keep their nuptial bed.
 Not less concern'd, nor at a later hour,
 Rose from his downy couch the forging power.

Sacred to Vulcan's name an isle there lay,
 Betwixt Sicilia's coasts and Lipara,
 Rais'd high on smoking rocks; and deep below,
 In hollow caves, the fires of Ætna glow.
 The Cyclops here their heavy hammers deal;
 Loud strokes and hissings of tormented steel
 Are heard around: the boiling waters roar;
 And smoky flames through fuming tunnels soar.
 Hither, the father of the fire, by night,
 Through the brown air precipitates his flight.
 On their eternal anvils here he found
 The brethren beating, and the blows go round:
 A load of pointless thunder now there lies:
 Before their hands, to ripen for the skies:
 These darts for angry Jove they daily cast;
 Consum'd on mortals with prodigious waste.
 Three wrays of writhin rain, of fire three more,
 Of winged southern winds, and cloudy fore
 As many parts, the dreadful mixture train:
 And fears are added, and avenging flame.
 Inferior ministers for Mars repair
 His broken axle-trees and blunted war:
 And send him forth again with furbish'd arms,
 To wake the lazy war with trumpets loud alarms.
 The rest refresh the scaly snakes that fold
 The shield of Pallas, and renew their gold.
 Full on the crest the Gorgon's head they place,
 With eyes that roll in death, and with distorted face.

My sons, said Vulcan, set your tasks aside;
 Your strength and master-skill must now be try'd.
 Arms for a hero forge: arms that require
 Your force, your speed, and all your forming fire.
 He said: they set their former work aside,
 And their new toils with eager haste divide.
 A flood of molten silver, brass, and gold,
 And deadly steel in the large furnace roll'd;
 Of this their artful hands a shield prepare;
 Alone sufficient to sustain the war.
 Seven orbs within a spacious round they close!
 One stirs the fire, and one the bellows blows.
 The hissing steel is in the smithy drown'd;
 The grot with beaten anvils groans around.
 By turns their arms advance, in equal time:
 By turns their hands descend, and hammers chime.

They turn the glowing ma's with crooked tongs:
 The fiery work proceeds with rustic songs.
 While, at the Lemnian god's command, they urge
 Their labours thus, and ply'd th' Æolian forge,
 The cheerful morn salutes Evander's eyes;
 And songs of chirping birds invite to rise.
 He leaves his lowly bed; his buskins meet
 Above his ancles; sandals sheath his feet:
 He sets his trusty sword upon his side;
 And o'er his shoulder throws a panther's hide;
 Two menial dogs before their master press'd:
 Thus clad, and guarded thus, he seeks his kingly
 guest.

Mindful of promis'd aid, he mends his pace;
 But meets Æneas in the middle space.
 Young Pallas did his father's steps attend;
 And true Achates waited on his friend.
 They join their hands: a secret feat they chose;
 Th' Arcadian first their former talk renews.
 Undaunted prince, I never can believe
 The Trojan empire lost, while you survive.
 Command th' assistance of a faithful friend:
 But feeble are the succours I can send.
 Our narrow kingdom here the Tiber bounds;
 That other side the Latian state surrounds;
 Insults our walls, and wastes our fruitful grounds. }
 But mighty nations I prepare to join
 Their arms with yours, and aid your just design.
 You come, as by your better genius sent;
 And fortune seems to favour your intent.
 Not far from hence there stands a hilly town,
 Of ancient buildings and of high renown;
 Torn from the Tuscans by the Lydian race;
 Who gave the name of Cære to the place.
 Once Agyllina call'd: it flourish'd long
 In pride of wealth, and warlike strong:
 Till curs'd Mezentius, in a fatal hour,
 Assum'd the crown, with arbitrary power.
 What words can paint those execrable times;
 The subjects sufferings, and the tyrant's crimes!
 That blood, those murders, O ye gods! replace
 On his own head, and on his impious race:
 The living and the dead at his command
 Were coupled, face to face, and hand to hand:
 Till, chok'd with stench, in loath'd embraces ty'd
 The lingering wretches pin'd away, and dy'd.
 Thus plung'd in ills, and meditating more;
 The people's patience try'd, no longer bore
 The raging monster: but with arms beset
 His house, and vengeance and destruction threat.
 They fire his palace: while the flame ascends,
 They force his guards, and execute his friends.
 He cleaves the crowd; and, favour'd by the night,
 To Turnus friendly court directs his flight.
 By just revenge the Tuscans set on fire,
 With arms their king to punishment require:
 Their numerous troops, now muster'd on the strand,
 My counsel shall submit to your command.
 Their navy swarms upon the coast: they cry
 To hoist their anchors; but the gods deny.
 An ancient augur, skill'd in future fate,
 With those foreboding words restrains their hate;
 Ye brave in arms, ye Lydian blood, the flower
 Of Tusan youth, and choice of all their power,
 Whom just revenge against Mezentius arms,
 To seek your tyrant's death by lawful arms;

Know this; no native of our land may lead
This powerful people: seek a foreign head.

Aw'd with these words, in camps they still abide;
And wait, with longing looks, their promis'd
guide.

Torchan, the Tuscan chief, to me has sent
Their crown, and every regal ornament:
The people join their own with his desire;
And all, my conduct, as their king, require.
But the chill blood that creeps within my veins,
And age, and listless limbs unfit for pains,
And a soul conscious of its own decay,
Have forc'd me to refuse imperial sway.
My Pallas were more fit to mount the throne;
And should, but he's a Sabine mother's son;
And half a native: but in you combine
A manly vigour, and a foreign line.
Where fate, and smiling fortune show the way,
Pursue the ready path to sovereign sway.
The staff of my declining days, my son,
Shall make your good or ill success his own.
In fighting fields from you shall learn to dare:
And serve the hard apprenticeship of war.
Your matchless courage and your conduct view;
And early shall begin t' admire and copy you.
Besides, two hundred horse he shall command:
Though few, a warlike and well-chosen band.
These in my name are list'd: and my son
As many more has added in his own.
Scarce had he said: Achates and his guest,
With downcast eyes, their silent grief express'd:
Who, short of succours, and in deep despair,
Shook at the dismal prospect of the war.
But his bright mother, from a breaking cloud,
To cheer her issue, thunder'd thrice aloud.
Thrice forky lightning flash'd along the sky,
And Tyrrhene trumpets thrice were heard on high.
Then, gazing up, repeated peals they hear:
And, in a heaven serene, resplendent arms appear;
Reddening the skies, and glittering all around,
The temper'd metals clash, and yield a silver
found.

The rest stood trembling, struck with awe divine.
Æneas only conscious to the sign,
Presag'd th' event; and joyful view'd, above,
Th' accomplish'd promise of the queen of love.
Then, to th' Arcadian king: This prodigy
(Dismiss your fear) belongs alone to me:
Heaven calls me to the war: th' expected sign
Is given of promis'd aids, and arms divine.
My goddess-mother, whose indulgent care
Foretold the dangers of the growing war,
This omen gave; when bright Vulcanian arms,
Fated from force of steel by Stygian charms,
Suspended, shone on high: she then foreshow'd
Approaching fights, and fields to float in blood.
Turnus shall dearly pay for faith forsworn:
And corpse and swords, and shields on Tiber borne,
Shall choke his flood: now sound the loud alarms,
And Latian troops prepare your perjur'd arms.
He said, and, rising from his homely throne,
The solemn rites of Hercules begun:
And, on his altars wak'd the sleeping fires:
Then cheerful to his household gods retires.
There offers chosen sheep: th' Arcadian king
And Trojan youth the same oblations bring.

Next of his men, and ships, he makes review,
Draws out the best and ablest of the crew.
Down with the falling stream the refuse run,
To raise with joyful news his drooping son.
Steeds are prepar'd to mount the Trojan band,
Who wait their leader to the Tyrrhene land:
A sprightly courser, fairer than the rest,
The king himself presents his royal guest.
A lion's hide his back and limbs infold,
Precious with studded works, and paws of gold.
Fame through the little city spreads aloud:
Th' intended march, amid the fearful crowd:
The matrons beat their breasts; dissolve in tears;
And double their devotion in their fears.
The war at hand appears with more affright:
And rises every moment to the sight.
Then, old Evander, with a close embrace,
Strain'd his departing friend; and tears o'erflow his face.

Would heaven, said he, my strength and youth
Such as I was beneath Præneste's wall, [recall,
Then when I made the foremost foes retire,
And set whole heaps of conquer'd shields on fire;
When Herilus in single fight I slew,
Whom with three lives Feronia did endure:
And thrice I lent him to the Stygian shore;
Till the last ebbing soul return'd no more:
Such if I stood renew'd, not these alarms,
Nor death, should rend me from my Pallas'
arms:

Nor proud Mezentius thus unpunish'd boast,
His rapés and murders on the Tuscan coast.
Ye gods! and mighty Jove, in pity bring Relief, and hear a father, and a king,
If fate and you reserve those eyes to see
My son return with peace and victory;
If the lov'd boy shall bliss his father's sight;
If we shall meet again with more delight;
Then draw my life in length, let me sustain,
In hopes of his embrace, the worst of pain.
But if your hard decrees, which, O! I dread,
Have doom'd to death his undeserving head,
This, O this very moment, let me die;
While hopes and fears in equal balance lie.
While yet possess'd of all his youthful charms,
I strain him close within these aged arms:
Before that fatal news my soul shall wound!
He said, and swooning, sunk upon the ground:
His servants bore him off; and softly laid
His languish'd limbs upon his homely bed.
The horsemen march; the gates are open'd wide;
Æneas at their head, Achates by his side.
Next these the Trojan leaders rode along,
Last, follows in the rear, th' Arcadian throng.
Young Pallas shone conspicuous o'er the rest;
Gilded his arms, embroider'd was his vest.
So, from the seas, exerts his radiant head
The star, by whom the lights of heaven are led:
Shakes from his rosy locks the pearly dew;
Dispels the darkness, and the day renews.
The trembling wives, the walls and turrets
crowd;

And follow, with their eyes, the dusty cloud:
Which winds disperse by fits; and show from far
The blaze of arms, and shields, and shining war.
The troops, drawn up in beautiful array,
O'er healthy plains pursue the ready way.

Repeated peals of shouts are heard around :
 The neighing courfers answer to the found ;
 And shake with horny hoofs the folid ground. }
 A greenwood shade, for long religion known,
 Stands by the streams that wash the Tufcan town ;
 Encompafs'd round with gloomy hills above,
 Which add a holy horror to the grove.
 The first inhabitants, of Grecian blood,
 That sacred forest to Sylvanus vow'd :
 The guardian of their flocks and fields ; they pay
 Their due devotions on his annual day.
 Not far from hence, along the river's fide,
 N tents secure, the Tufcan troops abide !
 By Tarchon led. Now, from a rifing ground,
 Æneas caft his wondering eyes around ;
 And all the Tyrrhene army had in fight,
 Stretch'd on the fpacious plains from left to right.
 Either his warlike train the Trojan led :
 Refresh'd his men, and weary hories fed.
 Meantime the mother-goddefs, crown'd with charms, [arms.
 Breaks through the clouds, and brings the fated
 Within a winding vale ſhe finds her fon,
 On the cool river's banks, retir'd alone.
 ſhe ſhows her heavenly form without difguife,
 And gives herſelf to his defiring eyes.
 Behold, ſhe ſaid, perform'd in every part,
 My promiſe made ; and Vulcan's labour'd art.
 Now ſeek, ſecure, the Lætan enemy ;
 And haughty Turnus to the field deſy.
 ſhe ſaid ; and having firſt her fon embrac'd,
 The radiant arms beneath an oak ſhe plac'd.
 Proud of the gift, he roll'd his greedy fight
 Around the work, and gaz'd with waſt delight.
 He liſts, he turns, he poſes, and admires
 The creſted helm, that vomits radiant fires :
 His hands the fatal ſword and corſlet hold :
 One keen with temper'd ſteel, one ſtiff with gold.
 Both ample, flaming both, and beamy bright :
 So ſhines a cloud, when edg'd with adverſe light.
 He ſhakes the pointed ſpear : and longs to try
 The plaited cuiffes on his manly thigh :
 But moſt admires the ſhield's myſterious mould,
 And Roman triumphs riſing on the gold.
 For theſe, embos'd, the heavenly ſmith had wrought
 (Not in the rolls of future time untaught)
 The wars in order, and the race divine
 Of warriors, iſſuing from the Julian line.
 The cave of Mars was drefs'd with moſſy greens :
 There, by the wolf, was laid the martial twins :
 Intrepid on her ſwelling dugs they hung ;
 The fofter-dam loll'd out her fawning tongue :
 They fuck'd ſecure, while bending back her head,
 She lick'd their tender limbs ; and form'd them
 as they fed.
 Not far from hence new Rome appears, with games
 Projected for the rape of Sabine dames.
 The pit reſounds with ſhricks : a war ſucceeds,
 For breach of public faith, and unexampled deeds.
 Here for revenge the Sabine troops contend :
 The Romans there with arms the prey defend.
 Weary'd with tedious war, at length they ceaſe ;
 And both the kings and kingdoms plight the peace.
 The friendly chiefs, before Jove's altar ſtand ;
 Both arm'd, with each a charger in his hand :
 A fatt'd ſow for ſacrifice is led ;
 With imprecations on the perjurd head.

Near this the traitor Mætiſ, ſtretch'd between Four fiery ſteeds, is dragg'd along the green ;
 By Tullus' doom : the brambles drink his blood ;
 And his torn limbs are left, the vultures' food.
 There Porſenna to Rome proud Tarquin brings ;
 And would by force reſtore the baniſh'd kings.
 One tyrant for his fellow tyrant fights :
 The Roman youth aſſert their native rights,
 Before the town the Tufcan army lies :
 To win by famine, or by fraud ſurpriſe.
 Their king, half threatening, half diſdaining, ſtood :
 While Cocles broke the bridge ; and ſtemm'd the
 flood.
 The captive maids there tempt the raging tide :
 Spac'd from their chains, with Clelia for their guide.
 High on a rock heroic Manlius ſtood ;
 To guard the temple, and the temple's god.
 Then Rome was poor ; and there you might behold [gold
 The palace thatch'd with ſtraw, now roof'd with
 The ſilver gooſe before the ſhining gate
 There flew ; and, by her cackle, fav'd the ſtate.
 She told the Gauls approach : th' approaching
 Gauls,
 Obſcure in night, aſcend, and ſeize the walls.
 The gold, diſſembled well their golden hair :
 And golden chains on their white necks they wear.
 Gold are their veſts : long Alpine ſpears they
 wield ;
 And their left arm ſuſtains a length of ſhield.
 Hard by, the leaping Salian prieſts advance :
 And naked through the ſtreets the oak Luperci dance
 In caps of wool. The targets dropt from heaven :
 Here modeſt matrons in ſoft litters driven,
 To pay their vows in ſolemn pomp appear :
 And odorous gums in their chaſte hands they bear.
 Far hence remov'd, the Stygian ſeats are ſeen :
 Pains of the damn'd, and puniſh'd Cataline :
 Hung on a rock the traitor ; and around
 The furies hisſing from the nether ground.
 Apart from theſe, the happy ſouls he draws,
 And Cato's holy gholt diſpenſing laws.
 Betwixt the quarters flows a golden ſea :
 But foaming ſurges, there, in ſilver play.
 The dancing dolphins, with their tails, divide
 The glittering waves, and cut the precious tide.
 Amid the main, two mighty fleets engage
 Their brazen beaks oppoſ'd with equal rage.
 Actium ſurveys the well-diſputed prize :
 Leucate's watery plain with foamy billows fries.
 Young Cæſar, on the ſtern, in armour bright,
 Here leads the Romans and their gods to fight :
 His beamy temples ſhoot their flames afar ;
 And o'er his head is hung the Julian ſtar.
 Agrippa ſeconds him, with proſperous gales ;
 And, with propitious gods, his foes aſſails.
 A naval crown, that binds his manly brows,
 The happy fortune of the fight foreſhows.
 Rang'd on the line oppoſ'd, Antonius brings Barbarian aids, and troops of eaſtern kings.
 Th' Arabians near, and Baſtrians from afar,
 Of tongues diſcordant, and a mingled war.
 And, rich in gaudy robes, amidſt the ſtriſe,
 His ill fate follows him ; th' Egyptian wife,
 Moving they fight : with oars, and forky prows,
 The froth is gather'd ; and the water glows.

It seems as if the Cyclades again
 Were rooted up, and justled in the main;
 Or floating mountains, floating mountains meet:
 Such is the fierce encounter of the fleet.
 Fire-balls are thrown; and pointed javelins fly:
 The fields of Neptune take a purple dye.
 The queen herself, amidst the loud alarms,
 With cymbals tofs'd her fainting soldiers warms.
 Fool as she was; who had not yet divin'd
 Her cruel fate; nor saw the snakes behind.
 Her country gods, the monsters of the sky,
 Great Neptune, Pallas, and love's queen, defy.
 The dog Anubis barks, but barks in vain;
 Nor longer dares oppose th' ethereal train.
 Mars, in the middle of the shining shield,
 Is grav'd, and strides along the liquid field.
 The Diræ fouse from heaven, with swift descent:
 And Discord, dy'd in blood, with garments rent,
 Divides the peace: her steps Bellona treads,
 And shakes her iron rod above their heads.
 This seen, Apollo, from his Actian height,
 Pours down his arrows: at whose winged flight
 The trembling Indians and Egyptians yield:
 And soft Sabæans quit the watery field.
 The fatal mistress hoists her silken sails:
 And, shrinking from the sight, invokes the gales.
 Aghast she looks; and heaves her breast for breath:
 Panting, and pale with fear of future death,
 The god had figur'd her, as driven along
 By winds and waves, and scudding through the
 Just opposite, sad Nilus opens wide [through.
 His arms, and ample bosom, to the tide,

And spreads his mantle o'er the winding coast;
 In which he wraps his queen, and hides the flyer
 The victor, to the god his thanks express'd: [he
 And Rome triumphant, with his presence bleis'
 Three hundred temples in the town he plac'd;
 With spoils and altars every temple grac'd.
 Three shining nights, and three succeeding days,
 The fields resound with shouts, the streets with praise,

The domes with songs, the theatres with plays.
 All altars flame: before each altar lies,
 Drench'd in his gore, the destin'd sacrifice.
 Great Cæsar sits sublime upon his throne;
 Before Apollo's porch, of Parian stone:
 Accepts the presents vow'd for victory;
 And hangs the monumental crown on high.
 Vast crowds of vanquish'd nations march along,
 Various in arms, in habit, and in tongue.
 Here Mulciber assigns the proper place
 For Carians, and th' ungrit Numidian race:
 Then ranks the Thracians in the second row;
 And Scythians, expert in dart and bow.
 And here the tam'd Euphrates humbly glides:
 And there the Rhine submits her swelling tides.
 And proud Araxes, whom no bridge could bind,
 The Danes' unconquer'd offspring march behind;
 And Morini, the last of human kind.

These figures, on the field divinely wrought,
 By Vulcan labour'd, and by Venus brought,
 With joy and wonder fill the hero's thought.
 Unknown the names, he yet admires the grace;
 And bears aloft the fame and fortune of his race.

B O O K IX.

THE ARGUMENT.

Turnus takes advantage of Æneas's absence, fires some of his ships (which are transformed into sea nymphs) and assaults his camp. The Trojans, reduced to the last extremities, send Nisus and Euryalus to recal Æneas; which furnishes the poet with that admirable episode of their friendship, generosity, and the conclusion of their adventures.

WHILE these affairs in distant places pass'd,
 The various Iris Juno sends with haste,
 To find bold Turnus, who, with anxious thought,
 The secret shade of his great grandfire sought.
 Retir'd alone she found the daring man:
 And op'd her rosy lips, and thus began:
 What none of all the gods could grant thy vows;
 That, Turnus, this auspicious day bestows!
 Æneas, gone to seek th' Arcadian prince,
 Has left the Trojan camp without defence;
 And, short of succours there, employs his pains
 In parts remote to raise the Tuscan swains:
 Now snatch an hour that favours thy designs,
 Unite thy forces, and attack their lines.
 This said, on equal wings she pois'd her weight,
 And form'd a radiant rainbow in her flight.
 The Dannian hero lifts his hands and eyes,
 And thus invokes the goddesses as she flies:
 Iris, the grace of heaven, what power divine
 Has sent thee down, through dusky clouds to shine?

See they divide! immortal day appears;
 And glittering planets dancing in their spheres!
 With joy, these happy omens I obey;
 And follow to the war, the god that leads the way.
 Thus having said, as by the brook he stood,
 He scoop'd the water from the crystal flood;
 Then, with his hands, the drops to heaven he throws,
 And loads the powers above with offer'd vows.
 Now march the bold confederates through the
 plain;
 Well hors'd, well clad, a rich and shining train:
 Messapus leads the van; and in the rear,
 The sons of Tyrrhæus in bright arms appear.
 In the main battle, with his flaming crest,
 The mighty Turnus towers above the rest:
 Silent they move; majestically slow,
 Like ebbing Nile, or Ganges in his flow.
 The Trojans view the dusty cloud from far
 And the dark menace of the distant war.

icus from the rampire saw it rise, ackening the fields, and thickening through the skies.

en, to his fellows thus aloud he calls: [walls?
hat rolling clouds, my friends, approach the m, arm, and man the works: prepare your spears
d pointed darts; the Latian host appears!
us warn'd, they shut their gates: with shouts
ascend

ie bulwarks, and, secure, their foes attend.
r their wife general, with foreseeing care, d charg'd them, not to tempt the doubtful war:
or, though provok'd, in open fields advance;
t close within their lines attend their chance:
willing, yet they keep the strict command;
d loudly wait in arms the hostile band.

ie fiery Turnus flew before the rest, eye-ball'd steed of Thracian strain he press'd; }
s helm of massy gold; and crimson was his crest.

With twenty horse to second his designs,
an unexpected foe, he fac'd the lines.
Is there, he said, in arms who bravely dare
s leader's honour, and his danger, share;
en, spurring on, his brandish'd dart he threw,
sign of war; applauding shouts ensue.

Amaz'd to find a daftard race that run hind the rampires, and the battle shun, rides around the camp, with rolling eyes,
d stops at every post; and every passage tries.
roams the nightly wolf about the fold;
et with descending showers, and stiff with cold;
s howls for hunger, and he grins for pain;
s gnashing teeth are exercis'd in vain:

nd, impotent of anger, finds no way his distended paws to grasp the prey.
e mothers listen; but the bleating lambs
urely swig the dug beneath the dams.
us ranges eager Turnus o'er the plain,
arp with desire, and furious with disdain:
veys each passage with a piercing sight.
force his foes in equal field to fight.
us, while he gazes round, at length he spies here, fenc'd with strong redoubts, their navy lies;

ose underneath the walls: the washing tide cures from all approach this weaker side.
: takes the wish'd occasion; fills his hand
ith ready fires, and shakes a flaming brand:
g'd by his presence, every soul is warm'd,
nd every hand with kindled fire is arm'd.
om the fir'd pines the scattering sparkles fly;
t vapours mix'd with flames involve the sky.
hat power, O Muses, could avert the flame hich threaten'd, in the fleet, the Trojan name!
ll: for the fact, through length of time obscure,
hard to faith; yet shall the fame endure.

'Tis said that, when the chief prepar'd his flight,
nd fell'd his timber from Mount Ida's height,
e grandam goddess then approach'd her son,
nd with a mother's majesty begun:

ant me, she said, the sole request I bring,
nce conquer'd heaven has own'd you for its king:
a Ida's brows, for ages past, there stood,
ith firs and maples fill'd, a shady wood:
nd on the summit rose a sacred grove,
here I was worshipp'd with religious love;

These woods, that holy grove, my long delight,
I gave the Trojan prince to speed his flight.
Now fill'd with fear, on their behalf I come;
Let neither winds o'erlet, nor waves entomb,
The floating forests of the sacred pine;
But let it be their safety to be mine.

Then thus reply'd her awful son; who rolls
The radiant stars, and heaven and earth controls
How dare you, mother, endless date demand,
For vessels moulded by a mortal hand?
What then is fate? Shall bold Æneas ride,
Of safety certain, on th' uncertain tide?
Yet what I can, I grant: when, wafted o'er,
The chief is landed on the Latian shore,
Whatever ships escape the raging storms,
At my command shall change their fading forms
To nymphs divine; and plow the watery way,
Like Dotis and the daughters of the sea.

To seal his sacred vow, by Styx he swore,
The lake with liquid pitch, the dreary shore
And Phlegethon's innavigable flood,
And the black regions of his brother god:
He said; and shook the skies with his imperial nod.

And now, at length, the number'd hours were
come,

Prefix'd by fates' irrevocable doom,
When the great mother of the gods was free
To save her ships, and finish Jove's decree.
First, from the quarter of the morn, there sprung,
A light that sing'd the heavens, and shot along:
Then from a cloud, fring'd round with golden fires,
Were timbrels heard, and Berecynthiaan choirs:
And last a voice, with more than mortal sounds,
Both hosts, in arms oppos'd, with equal horror wounds.

O Trojan race, your needless aid forbear;
And know my ships are my peculiar care.
With greater ease the bold Rutulian may,
With hissing brands, attempt to burn the sea,
Than singe my sacred pines. But you, my charge,
Loos'd from your crooked anchors, launch at large,
Exalted each a nymph: forsake the sand,
And swim the seas, at Cybele's command.
No sooner had the goddess ceas'd to speak,
When lo, th' obedient ships their haufers break;
And, strange to tell, like dolphins in the main,
They plunge their prows, and dive, and spring
again:

As many beauteous maids the billows sweep,
As rode before tall vessels on the deep.
The foes surpris'd with wonder, stood aghast,
Messapus curb'd his fiery courser's haste;
Old Tiber roar'd; and raising up his head,
Call'd back his waters to their oozy bed.
Turnus alone, undaunted, bore the shock;
And with these words his trembling troops bespoke:

These monsters for the Trojan's fate are meant,
And are by Jove for black prefaces sent,
He takes the cowards last relief away;
For fly they cannot; and, constrain'd to stay, }
Must yield, unthought, a base inglorious prey.
The liquid half of all the globe is lost;
Heaven shuts the seas, and we secure the coast.
Their is no more than that small spot of ground,
Which myriads of our martial men surround,

Their fates I fear not; or vain oracles;
 'Twas given to Venus, they should cross the seas;
 And land secure upon the Latian plains:
 Their promis'd hour is pass'd, and mine remains.
 'Tis in the fate of Iunus to destroy,
 With sword and fire, the faithless race of Troy.
 Shall such affronts as these alone inflame
 The Grecian brothers, and the Grecian name?
 My cause and theirs is one; a fatal strife,
 And final ruin, for a ravish'd wife.
 Wasn't not enough, that, punish'd for the crime,
 They fell; but will they fall a second time?
 One would have thought they paid enough before,
 To curse the costly sex; and durst offend no more.
 Can they securely trust their feeble wall,
 A slight partition, a thin interval, [built
 Betwixt their fate and them; when Troy, though
 By hands divine, yet, perish'd by their guilt?
 Lend me, for once, my friends, your valiant hands,
 To force from out their lines these daftard bands.
 Less than a thousand ships will end this war;
 Nor Vulcan needs his fated arms prepare.
 Let all the Tuscans all th' Arcadians join,
 Nor these, nor those, shall frustrate my design.
 Let them not fear the treasons of the night;
 The robb'd palladium, the pretended flight:
 Our onset shall be made in open light. }
 No wooden engine shall their town betray,
 Fires they shall have around, but fires by day.
 No Grecian babes before their camp appear,
 Whom Hector's arms detain'd to the tenth tardy
 year,
 Now, since the sun is rolling to the west,
 Give me the silent night to needful rest:
 Refresh your bodies, and your arms prepare:
 The morn shall end the small remains of war.

The post of honour to Messapus falls,
 To keep the nightly guard; to watch the walls;
 To pitch the fires at distances around,
 And close the Trojans in their scanty ground.
 Twice seven Rutulian captains ready stand:
 And twice seven hundred horse their chiefs command:
 All clad in shining arms the works invest;
 Each with a radiant helm, and waving crest.
 Stretch'd at their length, they press the grassy
 ground;

They laugh, they sing, the jolly bowls go round:
 With lights and cheerful fires renew the day;
 And pass the wakeful night in feasts and play.

The Trojans, from above, their foes beheld;
 And with arm'd legions all the rampires fill'd:
 Seiz'd with affright, their gates they first explore;
 Join works to works with bridges; tower to tower:
 Thus all things needful for defence abound;
 Mnestheus and brave Serephus walk the round:
 Commission'd by their absent prince to share
 The common danger, and divide the care,
 The soldiers draw their lots; and, as they fall,
 By turns relieve each other on the wall.

Nigh were the foes their utmost guards advance

To watch the gate, was warlike Nifus' chance.
 His father Hyrticus of noble blood;
 His mother was a huntress of the wood;
 And sent him to the wars; well could he bear
 His lance in fight, and dart the flying spear:

But, better skill'd unerring shafts to send,
 Beside him stood Euryalus his friend,
 Euryalus, than whom the Trojan host
 No fairer face, or sweeter air could boast.
 Scarce had the down to shade his cheeks begun;
 One was their care, and their delight was one.
 One common hazard in the war they shar'd;
 And now were both, by choice, upon the guard.

Then Nifus, thus: Or do the gods inspire
 This warmth, or make we gods of our desire?
 A generous ardour boils within my breast,
 Eager of action, enemy to rest;
 This urges me to fight, and fires my mind,
 To leave a memorable name behind.
 Thou see'st the foe secure: how faintly shine
 Their scatter'd fires! the most in sleep lupine
 Along the ground an easy conquest lie:
 The wakeful few the flaming flaggon ply:
 All hush around. Now hear what I revolve;
 A thought unripe, and scarcely yet resolve.
 Our absent prince both camp and council mourn;
 By message both would hasten his return:
 If they confer what I demand on thee
 (For fame is recompence enough for me),
 Methinks beneath yon hill, I have esp'd
 A way that safely will my passage guide.
 Euryalus stood listening while he spoke;
 With love of praise, and noble envy struck;
 Then to his ardent friend expos'd his mind: }
 All this alone, and leaving me behind,
 Am I unworthy, Nifus, to be join'd?
 Think'st thou I can, my share of glory yield,
 Or send thee unassisted to the field?

Not so my father taught my childhood arms;
 Born in a siege, and bred among alarms;
 Nor is my youth unworthy of my friend,
 Nor of the heaven-born hero I attend
 The thing call'd life, with ease I can disclaim;
 And think it over-fold to purchase fame.

Then Nifus, thus: Alas! thy tender years
 Would minister new matter to my fears:
 So may the gods, who view this friendly strife,
 Restore me to thy lov'd embrace with life,
 Condemn'd to pay my vows (as sure I trust)
 This thy request is cruel and unjust.

But if some chance, as many chances are,
 And doubtful hazards in the deeds of war;
 If one should reach my head, there let it fall,
 And spare thy life; I would not perish all.
 Thy bloomy youth deserves a longer date;
 Live thou to mourn thy love's unhappy fate:
 To bear my mangled body from the foe;
 Or buy it back, and funeral rites bestow.
 Or, if hard fortune shall those dues deny,
 Thou canst at least an empty tomb supply.
 O let me not the widow's tears renew;
 Nor let a mother's curse my name pursue;
 Thy pious parent, who, for love of thee,
 Forsook the coasts of friendly Sicily,
 Her age committing to the seas and wind,
 When every weary matron staid behind,
 To this Euryalus: You plead in vain,
 And but protract the cause you cannot gain:
 No more delays, but haste. With that he wakes
 The nodding watch; each to his office takes.
 The guard reliev'd, the generous couple went
 To find the council at the royal tent.

Creatures else forgot their daily care;
 And sleep, the common gift of nature, share:
 Except the Trojan peers, who wakeful fate
 Nightly council for th' endanger'd state.
 They vote a message to their absent chief;
 Show their distress, and beg a swift relief.
 Amid the camp a silent feat they chose,
 To mote their clamour, and secure from foes,
 On their left arms their ample shields they bear,
 On their right rein'd upon the bending spear.
 Now Nisus and his friend approach the guard,
 And beg admision, eager to be heard:
 'Tis an affair important, not to be desert'd.
 Acanius bids them be conducted in;
 Considering the more experienc'd to begin.
 Then Nisus thus: Ye fathers, lend your ears,
 Or judge our bold attempt beyond our years.
 The foe, securely drench'd in sleep and wine,
 Neglect their watch; the fires but thinly shine:
 And where the smoke in cloudy vapours flies,
 Covering the plain, and curling to the skies,
 Twixt two paths, which at the gate divide,
 Close by the sea, a passage we have spy'd,
 Which will our way to great Æneas guide.
 Expect each hour to see him safe again,
 Laded with spoils of foes in battle slain.
 Watch we the lucky minute while we may:
 Or can we be mistaken in the way;
 Or, hunting in the vales, we both have seen
 The rising turrets, and the stream between:
 And know the winding course, with every ford.
 It ceas'd: and old Althes took the word.
 O country gods, in whom our trust we place
 Will yet from ruin save the Trojan race:
 While we behold such dauntless worth appear
 In dawning youth, and souls so void of fear.
 Men into tears of joy the father broke;
 Each in his longing arms by turns he took:
 Stood, and paus'd; and thus again he spoke:
 O brave young men, what equal gifts can we,
 In recompence of such desert, decree?
 The greatest sure, and best you can receive,
 Be gods, and your own conscious worth, will Give.
 He rest our grateful general will bestow;
 And young Acanius till his manhood owe.
 And I, whose welfare in my father lies,
 Acanius adds, by the great deities,
 My dear country, by my household-gods,
 My hoary Vesta's rites, and dark abodes,
 I conjure you both (on you my fortune stands,
 And bat and my faith I plight into your hands):
 Make me but happy in his safe return,
 Whose wonted presence I can only mourn,
 Whose common gift shall two large goblets be,
 Of silver, wrought with curious imagery;
 And hid embos'd, which, when old Priam
 Reign'd,
 By conquering fire at sack'd Arisba gain'd.
 And more, two tripods cast in antique mould,
 With two great talents of the finest gold:
 Beside a costly bowl, engrav'd with art,
 Which Dido gave when first she gave her heart.
 Let it in conquer'd Italy we reign,
 When spoils by lot the victor shall obtain,
 Thou saw'st the courier by proud Turnus press'd,
 Eat, Nisus, and his arms, and nodding crest,

And shield, from chance exempt, shall be thy
 share; }
 Twelve labouring slaves, twelve handmaids }
 And clad in rich attire, and train'd with care. }
 And last, a Latian field with fruitful plains,
 And a large portion of the king's domains.
 But thou, whose years are more to mine ally'd,
 No fate my vow'd affection shall divide
 From thee, heroic youth; be wholly mine:
 Take full possession; all my soul is thine.
 One faith, one fame, one fate, shall both attend;
 My life's companion, and my bosom friend;
 My peace shall be committed to thy care,
 And to thy conduct my concerns in war.
 Then thus the young Euryalus reply'd:
 Whatever fortune, good or bad, betide,
 The same shall be my age, as now my youth
 No time shall find me wanting to my truth.
 This only from your goodness let me gain
 (And this ungranted, all rewards are vain):
 Of Priam's royal race my mother came,
 And sure the best that ever bore the name:
 Whom neither Troy, nor Sicily could hold
 From me departing, but, o'erwent, and old,
 My fate she follow'd; ignorant of this,
 Whatever danger, neither parting kifs,
 Nor pious blessing taken, her I leave;
 And, in this only act of all my life deceive.
 By this right hand, and conscious night, I swear,
 My soul so sad a farewell could not bear.
 Be you her comfort; fill my vacant place
 (Permit me to resume so great a grace).
 Support her age, forsaken and distress'd;
 That hope alone will fortify my breast
 Against the worst of fortunes, and of fears.
 He said: the mov'd assistants melt in tears.
 Then thus Acanius (wonder-struck to see
 That image of his filial piety):
 So great beginnings, in so green an age,
 Exact the faith, which I again engage.
 Thy mother all the dues shall justly claim,
 Creusa had; and only want the name.
 Whatever event thy bold attempt shall have,
 'Tis merit to have borne a son so brave.
 Now by my head, a sacred oath, I swear,
 (My father us'd it) what returning here
 Crown'd with success, I for thyself prepare,
 That, if thou fail, shall thy lov'd mother share.
 He said; and, weeping while he spake the word,
 From his broad belt he drew a shining sword,
 Magnificent with gold. Lycaon made,
 And in an ivory scabbard sheath'd the blade:
 This was his gift: great Menesthus gave his friend
 A lion's hide, his body to defend:
 And good Althes furnish'd him beside,
 With his own trusty helm, of temper try'd.
 Thus arm'd they went. The noble Trojans
 Their issuing forth, and follow to the gate. [wait
 With prayers and vows, above the rest appears
 Acanius, manly far beyond his years.
 And messages committed to their care,
 Which all in winds were lost, and sitting air.
 The trenches first they pass'd; then took their
 way
 Where their proud foes in pitch'd pavilions lay;
 To many fatal, ere themselves were slain: [plain.
 They found the careless host dispers'd upon the

Who, gorg'd, and drunk with wine, supinely
Inore;

Unharnas'd chariots stand along the shore:
Amidst the wheels and reins, the goblet by,
A medley of debauch and war they lie.
Observing Nisus slow'd his friend the sight;
Behold a conquest gain'd without a fight.
Occasion offers, and I stand prepar'd;
There lies our way; be thou upon the guard,
And look around, while I securely go,
And hue a passage through the sleeping foe.
Softly he spoke; then, striding, took his way,
With his drawn sword, where haughty Rhamnes
His head rais'd high, on tapestry beneath, [lay:
And heaving from his breast, he drew his breath:
A king and prophet by king Turnus lov'd;
But fate by preference cannot be remov'd;
Him, and his sleeping slaves, he slew. Then spies
Where Rhemus, with his rich retinue, lies:
His armour-bearer first, and next he kills
His charioteer, intrinch'd betwixt the wheels:
And his lov'd horses: last invades their lord;
Full on his neck he drives the fatal sword:
The gasping head flies off; a purple flood
Flows from the trunk, that welters in the blood:
Which, by the spurning heels, dispers'd around,
The bed besprinkles, and bedews the ground.
Lamus the bold, and Lamyus the strong,
He slew; and then Serranus fair and young.
From dice and wine the youth retir'd to rest,
And puff'd the fummy god from out his breast:
Ev'n then he dreamt of drink and lucky play;
More lucky had it lasted till the day.

The famish'd lion thus, with hunger bold,
O'erleaps the fences of the nightly fold;
And tears the peaceful flocks; with silent awe
Trembling they lie, and pant beneath his paw.
Nor with less rage Euryalus employs
The wrathful sword, or fewer foes destroys:
But on th' ignoble crowd his fury flew:
He Fadius, Hebeus, and Rhætus flied.
Oppress'd with heavy sleep the former fall,
But Rhætus, wakeful, and observing all,
Behind a spacious jar he sink'd for fear:
The fatal iron found, and reach'd him there.
For, as he rose, it pierc'd his naked side,
And, reeking, thence return'd in crimson dy'd.
The wound pours out a stream of wine and blood:
The purple soul comes floating in the flood.

Now where Messapus quarter'd they arrive;
The fires were fainting there, and just alive.
The warrior-horses tied in order fed;
Nisus observ'd the discipline, and said,
Our eager thirst of blood may both betray;
And see the scatter'd streaks of dawning day,
Foe to nocturnal thefts: no more, my friend,
Here let our glutt'd execution end:
A lane through slaughter'd bodies we have
made:

The bold Euryalus, though loth, obey'd,
Of arms, and arras, and of plate they find
A precious load; but these they leave behind.
Yet, fond of gaudy spoils, the boy would stay
To make the rich caparison his prey,
Which on the steed of conquer'd Rhamnes lay. }
Nor did his eyes less longingly behold
The girdle belt, with nails of burnish'd gold.

This present Cedicus the rich bestow'd
On Remulus, when friendship first they yow'd;
And absent, join'd in hospitable ties;
He dying, to his heir bequeath'd the prize:
Till by the conquering Ardean troops oppress'd,
He fell; and they the glorious gift possess'd.
These glittering spoils (now made the victor
He to his body suits; but suits in vain. [gain
Messapus' helm he finds among the rest,
And laces on, and wears the waving crest.
Proud of their conquest, prouder of their prey,
They leave the camp, and take the ready way.
But far they had not pass'd, before they spy'd
Three hundred horse with Volscens for their guide.

The queen a legion to king Turnus sent,
But the swift horse the slower foot prevent:
And now, advancing, fought the leader's tent.
They saw the pair; for thro' the doubtful shade
His shining helm Euryalus betray'd,
On which the moon with full reflection play'd. }
'Tis not for nought, cry'd Volscens, from the crowd,

These men go there; then rais'd his voice aloud:
Stand, stand: why thus in arms, and whither bent: [sent?

From whence, to whom, and on what errand
Silent they scud away, and haste their flight
To neighbouring woods, and trust themselves to
The speedy horse all passages betray, [night
And spur their smoking steeds to cross their way;
And watch each entrance of the winding wood;
Black was the forest, thick with beech it stood;
Horrid with fern, and intricate with thorn,
Few paths of human feet or tracks of beasts were worn.

The darkness of the shades, his heavy prey,
And fear misled the younger from his way.
But Nisus hit the turns with happier haste,
And, thoughtless of his friend, the forest pass'd:
And Alban plains, from Alba's name so call'd,
Where king Latinus then his oxen stall'd.
Till, turning at the length, he stood his ground,
And mis'd his friend, and cast his eyes around:
Ah wretch, he cry'd, where have I left behind
Th' unhappy youth: where shall I hope to find?
Or what way take! Again he ventures back:
And treads the mazes of his former track.
He winds the wood, and listening hears the noise
Of trampling couriers, and the rider's voice.
The sound approach'd, and suddenly he view'd
The foes enclosing, and his friend pursu'd:
Forelay'd and taken, while he strove in vain,
The shelter of the friendly shades to gain.

What should he next attempt? What arms employ?

What fruitless force to free the captive boy:
Or desperate should he rush and lose his life,
With odds oppress'd, in such unequal strife?
Resolv'd at length his pointed spear he took;
And casting on the moon a mournful look,
Guardian of groves, and goddess of the night,
Fair queen, he said, direct my dart aright:
If e'er my pious father for my sake,
Did grateful offerings on thy altars make;
Or I increas'd them with my sylvan toils,
And hung the holy roofs with savage spoils, ive me to scatter these. Then from his ear he pois'd, and aim'd, and launch'd the trembling he deadly weapon, hissing from the grove, [spear.

petuous on the back of Sulmo drove ;
erc'd his thin armour, drank his vital blood,
nd in his body left the broken wood.
e staggers round ; his eye-balls roll in death,
nd with short sobs he gasps away his breath.
ll stand amaz'd ; a second javelin flies
With equal strength, and quivers thro' the skies :
his through thy temples, Tagus, forc'd the way,
nd in the brain-pan warmly buried lay.
ierce Volscens foams with rage, and gazing
round,

escri'd not him who gave the fatal wound :
or knew to fix revenge : But thou, he cries,
halt pay for both, and at the prisoner flies
With his drawn sword. Then struck with deep despair,

hat cruel sight the lover could not bear :
ut from his covert rush'd in open view,
nd sent his voice before him as he flew :
Te, me, he cry'd, turn all your swords alone
n me ; the fact confess'd, the fault my own.
e neither could nor durst, the guiltless youth ;
e moon and stars, bear witness to the truth !
(is only crime (if friendship can offend) is too much love to his unhappy friend.
oo late he speaks ; the sword, which fury guides, riven with full force, had pierc'd his tender sides. [wound

own fell the beauteous youth ; the yawning rush'd out a purple stream, and stain'd the ground.
his snowy neck reclines upon his breast,
like a fair flower by the keen share oppress'd :
like a white poppy sinking on the plain,
Whose heavy head is overcharg'd with rain.
Despair, and rage, and vengeance justly vow'd,
Drove Nisus headlong on the hostile crowd :
Volscens he seeks : on him alone he bends ;
borne back, and bor'd, by his surrounding friends,
Onward he press'd ; and kept him still in sight ;
Then whirl'd aloft his sword with all his might :
Th' unerring steel descended while he spoke Pierc'd his wide mouth, and through his weazen
broke :

Dying he flew ; and staggering on the plain,
With swimming eyes he sought his lover slain :
Then quiet on his bleeding bosom fell ;
Content in death to be reveng'd so well.

O happy friends ! for, if my verse can give,
Immortal life, your fame shall ever live :
Fix'd as the capitol's foundation lies ;
And spread where'er the Roman eagle flies !

The conquering party first divide the prey,
Then their slain leader to the camp convey.
With wonder, as they went, the troops were fill'd,
To see such numbers whom so few had kill'd.
Serranus, Rhames, and the rest they found :
Vast crowds the dying and the dead surround :
And the yet reeking blood o'erflows the ground. }
All knew the helmet which Messapus loit ;
But mourn'd a purchase that so dear had cost.
Now rose the ruddy morn from Tithon's bed ;
And, with the dawn of day, the skies o'erspread.
Nor long the sun his daily course withheld,
But added colours to the world reveal'd.

When early Turnus, wakening with the light,
All clad in armour, calls his troops to fight.
His martial men with fierce harangues he fir'd ;
And his own ardour in their souls inspir'd.
This done, to give new terror to his foes,
The heads of Nisus, and his friend he shows,
Rais'd high on pointed spears : a ghastly sight ;
Loud peals of shouts ensue, and barbarous delight.

Meantime the Trojans run, where danger calls :
They line their trenches, and they man their walls :
In front extended to the left they stood :
Safe was the right surrounded by the flood.
But casting from their towers a frightful view,
They saw the faces which too well they knew ;
Though then disguis'd in death, and smear'd all o'er

With silt obscene, and dropping putrid gore.
Soon hasty fame, through the sad city bears
The mournful message to the mother's ears :
An icy cold benumbs her limbs : she shakes :
Her cheeks the blood, her hand the web forsakes.
She runs the rampires round amidst the war,
Nor fears the flying darts : she rends her hair, }
And fills with loud laments the liquid air.
Thus then, my lov'd Euryalus appears !
Thus looks the prop of my declining years :
Was 't on his face my famish'd eyes I fed !
Ah how unlike the living is the dead !
And couldst thou leave me, cruel, thus alone,
Not one kind kiss from a departing son !
No look, no last adieu before he went,
In an ill-boding hour to slaughter sent !
Cold on the ground, and pressing foreign clay,
To Latian dogs and fowls he lies a prey !
Nor was I near to close his dying eyes,
To wash his wounds, to weep his obsequies :
To call about his corpse his crying friends,
Or spread the mantle (made for other ends)
On his dear body, which I wove with care,
Nor did my daily pains, or nightly labour spare.
Where shall I find his corpse ? What earth sustains
His trunk dismember'd, and his cold remains ?
For this, alas ! I left my needful ease,
Expos'd my life to winds, and winter seas !
If any pity touch Rutulian hearts,
Here empty all your quivers, all your darts :
Or if they fail, thou Jove conclude my woe,
And send me thunder-struck to shades below !

Her shrieks and clamours pierce the Trojans
ears,

Unman their courage and augment their fears :
Nor young Ascanius could the fight sustain,
Nor old Ilioneus his tears restrain :
But Actor and Idæus, jointly sent,
To bear the madding mother to her tent.
And now the trumpets, terribly from far,
With rattling clangor, rouse the sleepy war,
The soldiers shouts succeed the brazen sounds,
And heaven, from pole to pole, their noise rebounds.

The Volscians bear their shields upon their head,
And, rushing forward, form a moving shed ;
These fill the ditch ; those pull the bulwarks
down :

Some raise the ladders ; others scale the town.
But where void spaces on the walls appear,
Or thin defence, they pour their forces there.

With poles and missive weapons, from afar,
The Trojans keep aloof the rising war.
Taught by their ten years siege defensive fight,
They roll down ribs of rocks, and unresisted weight :

To break the penthouse with the ponderous blow
Which yet the patient Volscians undergo.
But could not bear th' unequal combat long ;
For where the Trojans find the thickest throng,
The ruin falls : their shatter'd shields give way,
And their crush'd heads became an easy prey.
They shrink for fear, abated of their rage,
Nor longer dare in a blind fight engage ;
Contented now to gull them from below
With darts and slings, and with the distant bow.

Elsewhere Mezentius, terrible to view,
A blazing pine within the trenches threw.
But brave Messapus, Neptune's warlike son,
Broke down the palisades, the trenches won,
And loud for ladders calls to scale the town. }

Gallope begin : ye sacred nine,
Inspire your poet in his high design ;
To sing what slaughter manly Turnus made :
What souls he sent below the Stygian shade :
What fame the soldiers with their captain share,
And the vast circuit of the fatal war.
For you in singing martial facts excel ;
You best remember ; and alone can tell.

There stood a tower, amazing to the sight,
Built up of beams ; and of stupendous height ;
Art, and the nature of the place, conspir'd
To furnish all the strength that war requir'd.
To level this, the bold Italians join ;
The wary Trojans obviate their design :
With weighty stones o'erwhelm'd their troops
below.

Shoot through the loop-holes, and sharp javelins through. [hand,

Turnus, the chief, toss'd from his thundering
Against the wooden walls, a flaming brand :
It stuck, the fiery plague : the winds were high ;
The planks were season'd, and the timber dry.
Contagion caught the posts : it spread along,
Scorch'd, and to distance drove the scatter'd throng.

The Trojans fled ; the fire pursu'd amain,
Still gathering fast upon the trembling train ;
Till, crowding to the corners of the wall,
Down the defence, and the defenders fall.
The mighty flaw makes heaven itself resound,
The dead and dying Trojans strew the ground.
The tower that follow'd on the fallen crew,
Whelm'd o'er their heads, and bury'd whom it slew :

Some stuck upon the darts themselves had sent ;
All the same equal ruin underwent.

Young Lycus and Helenor only 'scape ;
Sav'd how they know not, from the steep leap.
Helenor, elder of the two ; by birth,
On one side royal, one a son of earth,
Whom, to the Lydian king, Lycimnia bare,
And sent her boasted bastard to the war
(A privilege which none but freemen share).
Slight were his arms, a sword and silver shield,
No marks of honour charg'd its empty field.
Light as he fell, so light the youth arose,
And, rising, found himself amidst his foes.

Nor flight was left, nor hopes to force his way ;
Embolden'd by despair, he stood at bay :
And like a stag, whom all the troop surrounds
Of eager huntmen, and invading hounds,
Resolv'd on death, he dissipates his fears,
And bounds aloft against the pointed spears :
So dares the youth, secure of death, and throws
His dying body on his thickest foes.

But Lycus, swifter of his feet by far,
Runs, doubles, winds, and turns, amidst the wa
Springs to the walls, and leaves his foes behind,
And snatches at the beam he first can find.
Looks up, and leaps aloft at all the stretch,
In hopes the helping hand of some kind friend reach.

But Turnus follow'd hard his hunted prey
(His spear had almost reach'd him in the way,
Short of his reins, and scarce a span behind) :
Fool, said the chief, though swifter than the win
Couldst thou presume to 'scape when I pursue ?
He said, and downward by the feet he drew
The trembling dastard : at the tug he falls,
Vast ruins come along, rent from the smok
walls.

Thus on some silver swan, or timorous hare,
Jove's bird comes fousing down from upper air ;
Her crooked talons trusts the fearful fray :
Then out of sight she soars, and wings her way.
So seizes the grim wolf the tender lamb,
In vain lamented by the bleating dam.

Then rushing onward, with a barbarous cry,
The troops of Turnus to the combat fly.
The ditch with faggots fill'd, the daring foe
Toss'd firebrands to the steepy turrets throw.

Hiliqueus, as bold Lucetius came
To force the gate, and feed the kindling flame,
Roll'd down the fragment of a rock so right,
It crush'd him double underneath the weight.
Two more young Liger and Aylas slew ;
To bend the bow young Liger better knew :
Aylas best the pointed javelin threw.
Brave Cæneas laid Ottygius on the plain ;
The victor Cæneas was by Turnus slain.
By the same hand, Clonius and Itys fall,
Sagar and Ida, standing on the wall.
From Capys' arms his fate Privernus found ;
Hurt by Themilla first ; but slight the wound ;
His shield thrown by, to mitigate the smart,
He clapp'd his hand upon the wounded part :
The second shaft came swift and unesp'd,
And pierc'd his hand, and nail'd it to his side :
Transfix'd his breathing lungs, and beating heart
The soul came issuing out, and his'd against dart.

The son of Arcens shone amid the rest,
In glittering armour and a purple vest.
Fair was his face, his eyes inspiring love,
Bred by his father in the Mærtian grove :
Where the fat altars of Palicus flame,
And sent in arms to purchase early fame.
Him when he spy'd from far, the Thuscan king
Laid by the lance, and took him to the sling :
Thrice whirl'd the thong around his head, and
The heated lead half melted as it flew : [threw :
It pierc'd his hollow temples and his brain ;
The youth came tumbling down, and spurn'd the
plain.

Then young Ascanius, who before this day
Was wont in woods to shoot the savage prey,
First bent in martial strife the twanging bow;
And exercis'd against a human foe.
With this bereft Numanus of his life,
Who Turnus' younger sister took to wife.
Proud of his realm, and of his royal bride,
Vaunting before his troops, and lengthen'd with a stride,
In these insulting terms the Trojans he defy'd:
Twice conquer'd cowards, now your shame is shown,

Coop'd up a second time within your town!
Who dare not issue forth in open field,
But hold your walls before you for a shield.
Thus threat you war, thus our alliance force!
What gods, what madness hither steer'd your course!

You shall not find the sons of Atreus here,
Nor need the frauds of sly Ulysses fear.
Strong from the cradle, of a sturdy brood,
We bear our new-born infants to the flood;
There bath'd amid the stream, our boys we hold,
With winter harden'd, and inur'd to cold.
They wake before the day to range the wood,
Kill ere they eat, nor taste unconquer'd food.
No sports but what belong to war they know,
To break the stubborn colt, to bend the bow.
Our youth, of labour patient, earn their bread;
Hardly they work, with frugal diet fed.
From ploughs and harrows tent to seek renown,
They fight in fields, and storm the shaken town.
No part of life from toils of war is free;
No change in age, or difference in degree.
We plough, and till in arms; our oxen feed,
Instead of goads, the spur, and pointed steel:
Th' inverted lance makes furrows in the plain;
Ev'n time, that changes all, yet changes us in
The body, not the mind: nor can control [vain:
Th' immortal vigour, or abate the soul.
Our helms defend the young, disguise the gray:
We live by plunder, and delight in prey.
Your vests embroider'd with rich purple shine;
In sloth you glory, and in dances join.
Your vests have sweeping sleeves: with female pride

Your turbans underneath your chins are ty'd.
Go Phrygians, to your Dindymus agen;
Go, less than women, in the shapes of men;
Go, mix'd with eunuchs, in the mother's rites,
Where with unequal sound the flute invites.
Sing, dance, and howl, by turns, in Idæ's shade;
Reign the war to men, who know the martial
trade.

This soul reproach Ascanius could not hear
With patience, or a vow'd revenge forbear.
At the full stretch of both his hands, he drew,
And almost join'd the horns of the tough yew.
But first, before the throne of Jove he stood:
And thus with lifted hands invoc'd the god:
My first attempt, great Jupiter, succeed;
An annual offering in thy grove shall bleed:
A snow-white steer before thy altar led,
Who like his mother bears aloft his head,
But with his threatening brows, and bellowing
stands,
And dares the fight, and spurns the yellow sands.

Jove bow'd the heavens, and lent a gracious ear,
And thunder'd on the left, amidst the clear.
Sounded at once the bow, and swiftly flies
The feather'd death, and hisses through the skies.
The steel through both his temples forc'd the
way:

Extended on the ground Numanus lay.
Go now, vain boaster, and true valour scorn;
The Phrygians, twice subdued, yet make this third return.

Ascanius said no more: the Trojans shake
The heavens with shouting, and new vigour take.
Apollo then bestrode a golden cloud,
To view the feats of arms, and fighting crowd;
And thus the beardless victor, he bespoke aloud:

Advance, illustrious youth; increase in fame,
And wide from east to west extend thy name.
Oilspring of gods thyself; and Rome shall owe
To thee, a race of demigods below.
This is the way to heaven: the powers divine,
From this beginning date the Julian line.
To thee, to them, and their victorious heirs,
The conquer'd war is due: and the vast world is theirs.

Troy is too narrow for thy name. He said,
And, plunging downward, shot his radiant head;
Dispell'd the breathing air that broke his flight,
Shorn of his beams, a man to mortal fight.
Old Butes' form he took, Anchises' squire,
Now left to rule Ascanius, by his fire;
His wrinkled visage, and his hoary hairs,
His mien, his habit, and his arms he wears;
And thus salutes the boy, too forward for his
years:

Suffice it thee, thy father's worthy son,
The warlike prize thou hast already won:
The god of archers gives thy youth a part
Of his own praise; nor envies equal art.
Now tempt the war no more. He said, and flew Obscure in air, and vanish'd from their view.
The Trojans, by his arms, their patron know;
And hear the twanging of his heavenly bow.
Then deuous force they use, and Phœbus' name,
To keep from sight the youth too fond of fame.
Undaunted they themselves no danger shun:
From wall to wall the shouts and clamours run:
They bend their bows; they whirl their slings
around:

Heaps of spent arrows fall, and strew the ground; [found.]
And helms, and shields, and rattling arms re-
The combat thickens like the storm that flies
From westward, when the showery kids arise:
Or pattering hail comes pouring on the main,
When Jupiter descends in harden'd rain:
Or bellowing clouds burst with a stormy sound,
And with an armed winter strew the ground.

Pand'rus and Bitias, thunderbolts of war,
Whom Hiera to bold Alcanor bare
On Ida's top, two youths of height and size,
Like firs that on their mother-mountain rise;
Presuming on their force, the gates unbar,
And of their own accord invite the war.
With fates averse, against their king's command,
Arm'd on the right and on the left they stand,

And flank the passage: flining steel they wear,
And waving crests above their heads appear.
Thus two tall oaks, that Padus' banks adorn,
Lift up to heaven their leafy heads unshorn;
And overpress'd with nature's heavy load,
Dance to the whistling winds, and at each other nod.

In flows a tide of Latians, when they see
The gate set open, and the passage free.
Bold Quercens, with rash Tmarus rushing on,
Equicolas, who in bright armour shone,
And Hæmon first, but soon repuls'd they fly,
Or in the well-defended pass they die.
These with success are fir'd, and those with rage;
And each, on equal terms at length, engage.
Drawn from their lines, and issuing on the plain,
The Trojans hand to hand the fight maintain.

Fierce Turnus in another quarter fought,
When suddenly th' unhop'd-for news was brought;
The foes had left the fastness of their place,
Prevail'd in fight, and had his men in chase.
He quits th' attack, and, to prevent their fate,
Runs, where the giant brothers guard the gate.
The first he met, Antiphates the brave,
But base-begotten on a Theban slave;
Sarpedon's son he slew: the deadly dart
Found passage through his breast, and pierc'd his heart.

Fix'd in the wound th' Italian cornel stood;
Warm'd in his lungs, and in his vital blood.
Aphideus next, and Erymanthus dies,
And Meropes, and the gigantic size
Of Bitias, threatening with his ardent eyes. }
Not by the feeble dart he fell oppress'd,
A dart were lost within that roomy breast,
But from a knotted lance, large, heavy, strong;
Which roar'd like thunder as it whirl'd along:
Not two bull-hides th' impetuous force withhold;
Nor coat of double mail, with scales of gold.
Down sunk the monster-bulk, and press'd the ground:

His arms and clattering shield on the vast body
Not with less ruin, than the Bajan mole [found.
(Rais'd on the seas the furies to control),
At once comes tumbling down the rocky wall,
Prone to the deep the stones disjointed fall
Off the vast pile; the scatter'd ocean flies;
Black sands, discolour'd froth, and mingled mud arise.

The frighted billows roll, and seek the shores:
Then trembles Prochyta, then Ichia roars:
Typhceus thrown beneath, by Jove's command,
Astonish'd at the flaw that shakes the land,
Soon shifts his weary side, and, scarce awake,
With wonder feels the weight press lighter on his back.

The warrior-god the Latian troops inspir'd;
New sprung their sinews, and their courage fir'd,
But chills the Trojan hearts with cold affright:
Then black despair precipitates their flight.

When Pandarus beheld his brother kill'd,
The town with fear, and wild confusion fill'd.
He turns the hinges of the heavy gate
With both his hands; and adds his shoulders to the weight.

Some happier friends within the walls enclos'd;
The rest shut out, to certain death expos'd.

Fool as he was, and frantic in his care,
T' admit young Turnus, and include the war,
He thrust amid the crowd, securely bold;
Like a fierce tiger pent amid the fold.
Too late his blazing buckler they descry;
And sparkling fires that shot from either eye:
His mighty members, and his ample breast,
His rattling armour, and his crimson crest.

Far from that hated face the Trojans fly;
All but the fool who sought his destiny.
Mad Pandarus steps forth, with vengeance vow'd
For Bitias' death, and threatens thus aloud:
These are not Ardea's walls, nor this the town
Amata proffers with Lavinia's crown:
'Tis hostile earth you tread; of hope bereft,
No means of safe return by flight are left,
To whom, with countenance calm, and soul se-

date,
Thus Turnus: Then begin; and try thy fate:
My message to the ghost of Priam bear,
Tell him a new Achilles sent thee there.

A lance of tough ground-ash the Trojan threw,
Rough in the rind, and knotted as it grew:
With his full force he whirl'd it first around;
But the soft yielding air receiv'd the wound:
Imperial Juno turn'd the course before,
And fix'd the wandering weapon in the door.

But hope not thou, said Turnus, when I strike,
To shun thy fate; our force is not alike:
Nor thy steel temper'd by the Lemnian god:
Then, rising, on his utmost stretch he stood;
And aim'd from high: the full descending blow Cleaves the broad front, and beardless cheeks in two:

Down sinks the giant, with a thundering sound,
His ponderous limbs oppress the trembling ground; [wound.
Blood, brains, and foam, gush from the gaping
Scalp, face, and shoulders, the keen steel divides;
And the shar'd visage hangs on equal sides.
The Trojans fly from their approaching fate:
And had the victor then secur'd the gate,
And to his troops without unclos'd the bars,
One lucky day had ended all his wars.
But boiling youth, and blind desire of blood,
Push on his fury to pursue the crowd;
Hamstring'd behind, unhappy Gyges dy'd;
Then Phalaris is added to his side:
The pointed javelins from the dead he drew,
And their friends arms against their fellows threw.
Strong Halys stands in vain; weak Phlegys flies;
Saturnia, still at hand, new force and fire supplies.
Then Halius, Prytanis, Alcander fall
(Engag'd against the foes, who scal'd the wall):
But whom they fear'd without, they found within:

At last, though late, by Linceus he was seen:
He calls new succours, and assaults the prince;
But weak his force, and vain is their defence.
Turn'd to the right, his sword the hero drew,
And at one blow the bold aggressor flew.
He joints the neck; and with a stroke so strong,
The helm flies off, and bears the head along.
Next him, the huntsman Amycus he kill'd,
In darts envenom'd, and in poison skill'd.
Then Clytius fell beneath his fatal spear,
And Cretus, whom the Muses held so dear:

He fought with courage, and he sung the fight:
Arms were his business, verses his delight.

The Trojan chiefs behold, with rage and grief,
Their slaughter'd friends, and hasten their relief.
Bold Mneſtheus rallies first the broken train,
Whom brave Seresthus and his troop sustain.
To save the living, and revenge the dead,
Against one warrior's arm all Troy they led.
O, void of sense and courage, Mneſtheus cry'd,
Where can you hope your coward heads to hide?
Ah, where beyond these rampires can you run!
One man, and in your camp enclos'd, you shun!
Shall then a single sword such slaughter boast,
And pass unpunish'd from a numerous host?
Forfaking honour, and renouncing fame,
Your gods, your country, and your king, you
shame.

This just reproach their virtue does excite,
They stand, they join, they thicken to the fight.
Now Turnus doubts, and yet disdains to yield;
But with slow paces measures back the field;
And inches to the walls, where Tiber's tide,
Washing the camp, defends the weaker side.
The more he loses, they advance the more;
And tread in every step he trod before:
They shout, they bear him back, and whom by might
They cannot conquer, they oppress with weight.
As, compass'd with a wood of spears around,
The lordly lion still maintains his ground;
Grips horrible, retires, and turns again;
Threats his distended paws, and shakes his mane:
He loses while in vain he presses on,
Nor will his courage let him dare to run;

So Turnus fares, and, unresolv'd of flight,
Moves tardy back, and just recedes from fight.
Yet twice enrag'd, the combat he renews,
Twice breaks, and twice his broken foes pursues:
But now they swarm; and, with fresh troops sup-
ply'd,
Come rolling on, and rush from every side.
Nor Juno, who sustain'd his arms before,
Dares with new strength suffice th' exhausted
store.

For Jove, with four commands, sent Iris down,
To force th' invader from th' affrighted town.
With labour spent, no longer can he wield
The heavy falchion, or sustain the shield:
O'erwhelm'd with darts, which from afar they fling

The weapons round his hollow temples ring:
His golden helm gives way: with stony blows
Batter'd, and flat, and beaten-to his brows,
His crest is rash'd away; his ample shield
Is falsify'd, and round with javelins fill'd.

The foe now faint; the Trojans overwhelm:
And Mneſtheus lays hard load upon his helm.
Sick sweat succeeds, he drops at every pore,
With driving dust his cheeks are pass'd o'er,
Shorter and shorter every gasp he takes,
And vain efforts and hurtleis blows he makes.
Arm'd as he was, at length he leap'd from high;
Plung'd in the flood, and made the waters fly.
The yellow god the welcome burden bore,
And wip'd the sweat, and wash'd away the gore:
Then gently wafts him to the farther coast;
And sends him safe to cheer his anxious host.

B O O K X.

THE ARGUMENT.

Jupiter, calling a council of the gods, forbids them to engage in either party. At Æneas's return, there is a bloody battle: Turnus killing Pallas; Æneas, Lausus, and Mezentius. Mezentius is described as an atheist; Lausus as a pious and virtuous youth: the different actions and death of these two are the subject of a noble epifode.

THE gates of heaven unfold; Jove summons all
The gods to council in the common hall.
Sublimely seated, he surveys from far
The fields, the camp, the fortune of the war;
And all th' inferior world: from first to last
The sovereign senate in degrees are plac'd.
Then thus th' almighty fire began: Ye gods,
Natives, or denizens, of blest abodes; [mind,
From whence these murmurs, and this change of
This backward fate from what was first design'd?
Why this protracted war? When my commands
Pronounc'd a peace, and gave the Latian lands.
What fear or hopes on either part divides
Our heavens, and arms our powers on different
A lawful time of war at length will come [sides?
(Nor need your haste anticipate the doom)
When Carthage shall contend the world with Rome:

Shall force the rigid rocks, and Alpine chains;
And like a flood come pouring on the plains:
Then is your time for faction and debate,
For partial favour, and permitted hate.
Let now your immature dissension cease:
Sit quiet, and compose your souls to peace.
Thus Jupiter in few unfolds the charge:
But lovely Venus thus replies at large:
O power immense, eternal energy!
(For to what else protection can we fly?)
See'st thou the proud Rutulians, how they dare
In fields, unpunish'd, and insult my care?
How lofty Turnus vaunts amidst his train,
In shining arms triumphant on the plain?
Ev'n in their lines and trenches they contend;
And scarce their walls the Trojan troops defend:
The town is fill'd with slaughter, and o'erflows,
With a red deluge, their increasing moats,

Æneas, ignorant, and far from thence,
Has left a camp expos'd, without defence.
Th's endless outrage they shall still sustain?
Shall Troy renew'd be forc'd, and fired again?
A second siege my banish'd issue fears,
And a new Diomed in arms appears.
One more audacious mortal will be found;
And I thy daughter wait another wound.
Yet if, with fates averse, without thy leave,
The Latian lands my progeny receive,
Bear they the pains of violated law,
And thy protection from their aid withdraw.
But if the gods their sure success foretel,
If those of heaven consent with those of hell,
To promise Italy; who dare debate
The power of Jove, or fix another fate?
What should I tell of tempest on the main,
Of Æolus usurping Neptune's reign?
Of Iris sent, with Bacchanalian heat,
To inspire the matrons, and destroy the fleet.
Now Juno to the Stygian sky descends,
Solicits hell for aid, and arms the fiends.
That new example wanted yet above:
An act that well became the wife of Jove.
Alcsto, rais'd by her, with rage inflames
The peaceful bosoms of the Latian dames.
Imperial sway no more exalts my mind (Such hopes I had indeed, while heaven was kind);
Now let my happier foes possess my place,
Whom Jove prefers before the Trojan race;
And conquer they, whom you with conquest
grace.
Since you can spare, from all your wide command,
No spot of earth, no hospitable land,
Which may my wandering fugitives receive
(Since haughty Juno will not give you leave);
Then, father (if I still may use that name)
By ruin'd Troy, yet smoking from the flame,
I beg you, let Ascanius by my care,
Be freed from danger, and dismiss'd the war:
Inglorious let him live without a crown;
The father may be cast on coasts unknown,
Struggling with fate; but let me save the son.
Mine is Cythera, mine the Cyprian towers;
In those recesses, and those sacred bowers,
Obscurely let him rest; his right resign
To promis'd empire, and his Julian line.
Then Carthage may th' Ausonian towns destroy,
Nor fear the race of a rejected boy.
What profits it my son, to 'scape the fire,
Arm'd with his gods, and loaded with his fire;
To pass the perils of the seas and wind;
Evade the Greeks, and leave the war behind;
To reach th' Italian shores: if, after all,
Our second Pergamus is doom'd to fall?
Much better had he curb'd his high desires,
And hover'd o'er his ill-extinguish'd fires.
To Simois' banks the fugitives restore,
And give them back to war, and all the woes before.
Deep indignation swell'd Saturnia's heart:
And must I own, the said, my secret smart?
What with more decency were in silence kept,
And but for this unjust reproach had slept.

Did god, or man, your favourite son advise,
With war unhop'd the Latians to surprize?
By fate you boast, and by the gods decree,
He left his native land for Italy:
Confess the truth; by mad Cassandra, more Than Heaven, inspir'd, he sought a foreign shore!
Did I persuade to trust his second Troy
To the raw conduct of a beardless boy?
With walls unfinished, which himself forsakes,
And through the waves a wandering voyage takes?
When have I urg'd him meanly to demand
The Tuscan aid, and arm a quiet land?
Did I or Iris give this mad advice?
Or made the fool himself the fatal choice?
You think it hard, the Latians should destroy
With swords your Trojans, and with fires your Troy:
Hard and unjust indeed, for men to draw
Their native air, nor take a foreign law:
That Turnus is permitted still to live,
To whom his birth a god and goddess give:
But yet 'tis just and lawful for your line,
To drive their fields, and force with fraud to join.
Realms not your own, among your clans divide,
And from the bridegroom tear the promis'd bride:
Petition, while you public arms prepare;
Pretend a peace, and yet provoke a war.
'Twas given to you, your darling son to shroud,
To draw the daitard from the fighting crowd;
And for a man obtain an empty cloud.
From flaming fleets you turn'd the fire away,
And chang'd the ships to daughters of the sea.
But 'tis my crime, the Queen of Heaven offends,
If she presume to save her suffering friends.
Your son, not knowing what his fates decree,
You say is absent: absent let him be.
Yours is Cythera, yours the Cyprian towers,
The soft recesses, and the sacred bowers.
Why do you then these needless arms prepare,
And thus provoke a people prone to war?
Did I with fire the Trojan town deface,
Or hinder from return your exil'd race?
Was I the cause of mischief, or the man,
Whose lawless lust the fatal war began?
Think on whose faith th' adulterous youth re-ly'd:
Who promis'd, who procur'd the Spartan bride?
When all th' united states of Greece combin'd,
To purge the world of the perfidious kind;
Then was your time to fear the Trojan fate:
Your quarrels and complaints are now too late.
Thus JUNO. Murmurs rise, with mix'd applause;
Just as they favour, or dislike, the cause:
So winds, when yet unsegg'd in woods they lie,
In whippers first their tender voices try:
Then issue on the main with bellowing rage,
And storm to trembling mariners' pretage.
Then thus to both reply'd th' imperial god,
Who shakes Heaven's axes with his awful nod.
(When he begins, the silent senate stand
With reverence, listening to the dread command:

The clouds dispel; the winds their breath restrain;

And the hush'd waves lie flatted on the main).

Celestials! your attentive ears incline;
 Since, said the god, the Trojans must not join
 In with'd alliance with the Latian line;
 Since endless jarrings, and immortal hate,
 Tend but to discompose our happy state;
 'The war henceforward be resign'd to Fate,
 Each to his proper fortune stand or fall,
 Equal and unconcern'd I look on all.
 Rutulians, Trojans, are the same to me;
 And both shall draw the lots the fates decree.
 Let these assault, if Fortune bet heir friend;
 And if she favours those, let those defend:
 The Fates will find their way. The Thunderer said;

And shook the sacred honours of his head;
 Attesting Styx, th' inviolable flood,
 And the black regions of his brother god:
 Trembled the poles of Heav'n; and earth confess'd the nod:

This end the sessions had: the senate rise,
 And to his palace wait their sovereign through the skies.

Mean time, intent upon their siege, the foes
 Within their walls the Trojan host enclose:
 They wound, they kill, they watch at every gate:

Renew the fires, and urge their happy fate.

Th' Æneans with in vain their wonted chief,
 Hopeless of flight, more hopeless of relief;
 Thin on the towers they stand; and ev'n those few,

A feeble, fainting, and dejected crew:
 Yet in the face of danger some there stood:
 The two bold brothers of Sarpedon's blood,
 Aïus and Acmon: both th' Assaraci;
 Young Hæmon, and, though young, resolv'd to die.
 With these were Clarus and Thymetes join'd;
 Tiberis and Castor, both of Lycian kind.
 From Acmon's hands a rolling stone there came,
 So large, it half deserv'd a mountain's name!
 Strong, since w'd was the youth, and big of bone,
 His brother Mneitheus could not more have done;

Or the great father of th' intrepid son.
 Some firebrands throw, some flights of arrows send;

And some with darts, and some with stones defend.
 Amid the press appears the beauteous boy,
 The care of Venus, and the hope of Troy,
 His lovely face unarm'd, his head was bare,
 In ringlets o'er his shoulders hung his hair;
 His forehead circled with a diadem;
 Distinguish'd from the crowd he shines a gem,
 Enchas'd in gold, or polish'd ivory set,
 Amidst the meæser foil of fable jet.

Nor Iliarus was wanting to the war,
 Directing pointed arrows from afar,
 And death with poison arm'd: in Lydia born
 Where pleuteous harvests the fat fields adorn:
 Where proud Paclolus floats the fruitful lands,
 And leaves a rich manure of golden sands,
 There Capys, author of the Capuan name:
 And there was Mneitheus too increas'd in fame,
 Since Turnus from the camp he cast with shame.

Thus mortal war was wagg'd on either side.
 Meantime the hero cuts the nightly tide:
 For, anxious, from Evander when he went,
 He fought the Tyrrhene camp, and Tarchon's
 Expos'd the cause of coming to the chief; [tent;
 His name and country told, and ask'd relief:
 Propos'd the terms; his own small strength declar'd,

What vengeance proud Mezentius had prepar'd:
 What Turnus, bold and violent, design'd;
 Then show'd the slippery state of human kind,
 And fickle Fortune; warn'd him to beware:
 And to his wholesome counsel added prayer.
 Tarchon, without delay, the treaty signs:
 And to the Trojan troops the Tuscan joins.
 They soon set sail; nor now the Fates withstand;

Their forces trusted with a foreign hand.
 Æneas leads; upon his stern appear
 Two lions carv'd, which rising Ida bear;
 Ida, to wandering Trojans ever dear.
 Under their grateful shade Æneas fate,
 Revolving war's events, and various fate,
 His left young Pallas kept, fix'd to his side,
 And oft' of winds inquir'd, and of the tide:
 Oft' of the stars, and of their watery way;
 And what he suffer'd both by land and sea.

Now, sacred sisters, open all your spring:
 The Tuscan leaders, and their army sing;
 Which follow'd great Æneas to the war:
 Their arms, their numbers, and their names, de-
 A thousand youths brave Maficus obey, [clare.
 Born in the Tiger, through the foaming sea;
 From Asium brought, and Cosa, by his care;
 For arms, light quivers, bows and shafts they bear.
 Fierce Abas next, his men bright armour wore;
 His stern, Apollo's golden statue bore;
 Six hundred Populonea sent along,
 All skill'd in martial exercise, and strong.
 Three hundred more for battle Ilva joins,
 An ile renown'd for steel, and unexhausted mines.
 Asylas on his prow the third appears,
 Who heaven interprets, and the wandering stars;
 From offer'd entrails prodigies expounds,
 And peals of thunder, with prefaging sounds.
 A thousand spears in warlike order stand,
 Sent by the Pisans under his command.

Fair Astur follows in the watery field
 Proud of his manag'd horse, and painted shield,
 Gravisca, noisome from the neighbouring fen,
 And his own Cære, sent three hundred men:
 With those which Minio's fields, and Pyrgi gave;
 All bred in arms, unanimous and brave.
 Thou, Mufe, the name of Cinyras renew;
 And brave Cupavo follow'd but by few:
 Whose helm confess'd the lineage of the man,
 And bore, with wings display'd, a silver swan.
 Love was the fault of his fam'd ancestry,
 Whose forms and fortunes in his ensigns fly.
 For Cycnus lov'd unhappy Phæton,
 And sung his loïs in poplar groves alone;
 Beneath the sifter shades to soothe his grief:
 Heaven heard his song, and hasten'd his relief;
 And chang'd to snowy plumes his hoary hair,
 And wing'd his flight, to chant aloft in air.
 His son Cupavo brush'd the briny flood:
 Upon his stern a brawny Centaur stood,

Who heav'd a rock, and threatening still to throw,
With lifted hands, alarm'd the seas below :
They seem to fear the formidable fight,
And roll'd their billows on, to speed his flight.

Ocnus was next, who led his native train
Of hardy warriors through the watery plain,
The son of Manto, by the Tuscan stream,
From whence the Mantuan town derives the
name,

An ancient city, but of mix'd descent,
Three several tribes compose the government :
Four towns are under each ; but all obey
The Mantuan laws, and own the Tuscan sway.

Hate to Mezentius arm'd five hundred more,
Whom Mincius from his fire Benacus bore ; (Mincius with wreaths of reeds his forehead cover'd o'er.

These grave Auletes leads. A hundred sweep,
With stretching oars, at once the glassy deep :
Him, and his martial train, the Triton bears,
High on his poop the sea-green god appears :
Frowning he seems his crooked shell to sound,
And at the blast the billows dance around.

A hairy man above the waste he shows,
A porpoise tail beneath his belly grows,
And ends a fish : his breast the waves divides,
And froth and foam augment the murmuring tides.

Full thirty ships transport the chosen train,
For Troy's relief, and scour the briny main.

Now was the world forsaken by the sun,
And Phœbe halfe her nightly race had run.
The careful chief, who never clos'd his eyes,
Himself the rudder holds, the sails supplies.
A choir of Nereids meet him on the flood,
Once his own galleys, hewn from Ida's wood :
But now as many nymphs the sea they sweep,
As rods before tall vessels on the deep.
They know him from afar ; and in a ring
Enclose the ship that bore the Trojan king.
Cymodoce, whose voice excell'd the rest,
Above the waves advanc'd her snowy breast.
Her right hand stops the stern, her left divides
The curling ocean, and corrects the tides :
She spoke for all the choir ; and thus began
With pleasing words to warn th' unknowing man :
Sleeps our lov'd lord ? O goddess-born ! awake,
Spread every sail, pursue your watery track ;
And haste your course. Your navy once were we,
From Ida's height descending to the sea :
Till Turnus, as at anchor fix'd we stood,
Presum'd to violate our holy wood.
Then loos'd from shore we fled his fires profane
(Unwillingly we broke our master's chain) ;
And since have fought you through the Tuscan
main.

The mighty mother chang'd our forms to these,
And gave us life immortal in the seas.
But young Ascanius, in his camp distress'd,
By your insulting foes is hardly press'd ;
Th' Arcadian horsemen, and Etrurian host,
Advance in order to the Latian coast ;
To cut their way the Daunian chief designs,
Before their troops can reach the Trojan lines.
Thou, when the rosy morn restores the light,
First arm thy foldiers for th' ensuing fight ;
Thyself the fated sword of Vulcan wield,
And bear aloft th' impenetrable shield.

To-morrow's sun, unless my skill be vain,
Shall see huge heaps of foes in battle slain.
Parting, she spoke ; and, with immortal force,
Push'd on the vessel in her watery course,
(For well she knew the way) impell'd behind,
The ship flew forward, and outstript the wind.
The rest make up : unknowing of the cause,
The chief admires their speed, and happy omens draws. [eyes :

Then thus he pray'd, and fix'd on heaven his
Hear thou, great mother of the deities,
With turrets crown'd, (on Ida's holy hill, Fierce tigers, rein'd and curb'd, obey thy will).
Firm thy own omens, lead us on to fight,
And let thy Phrygians conquer in thy right.

He said no more. And now renewing day
Had chas'd the shadows of the night away.
He charg'd the soldiers with preventing care,
Their flags to follow, and their arms prepare ;
Warn'd of th' ensuing fight, and bade them hope
the war.

Now, from his lofty poop, he view'd below,
His camp encompass'd, and th' enclosing foe.
His blazing shield embrac'd, he held on high :
The camp receive the sign, and with loud shouts reply. [throw

Hope arms their courage : from their towers they
Their darts with double force, and drive the foe.
Thus, at the signal given, the cranes arise
Before the stormy south, and blacken all the skies.

King Turnus wonder'd at the sight renew'd ;
Till, looking back, the Trojan fleet he view'd ;
The seas with swelling canvas cover'd o'er ;
And the swift ships descending on the shore.
The Latians saw from far, with dazzled eyes,
The radiant crest that seem'd in flames to rise,
And dart dissolv'd fires around the field ;
And the keen glittering of the golden shield.
Thus threatening comets, when by night they rise,
Shoot sanguine streams, and sadden all the skies :
So Sirius, flashing forth sinister lights,
Pale human-kind with plagues and with dry famine frights.

Yet Turnus, with undaunted mind, is bent
To man the shores, and hinder their descent :
And thus awakes the courage of his friends :
What you so long have wish'd, kind fortune sends :
In ardent arms to meet th' invading foe :
You find, and find him at advantage now.
Yours is the day, you need but only dare :
Your swords will make you masters of the war.
Your fires, your sons, your houses, and your lands,
And dearest wives, are all within your hands.
Be mindful of the race from whence you came ;
And emulate in arms your father's fame. [stand
Now take the time, while staggering yet they
With feet unfirm ; and prepossess the strand :
Fortune befriends the bold. No more he said,
But balanc'd whom to leave, and whom to lead :
Then these elects, the landing to prevent ;
And those he leaves, to keep the city pent.

Meantime the Trojan sends his troops ashore :
Some are by boats expos'd, by bridges more.
With labouring oars they bear along the strand,
Where the tide languishes, and leap a-land.
Tarchon observes the coast with careful eyes,
And where no ford he finds, no water tries ;

Nor billows with unequal murmur roar,
But smoothly slide along, and swell the shore:
That course he steer'd, and thus he gave command,

Here ply your oars, and at all hazard land:
Force on the vessel, that her keel may wound
This hated soil, and furrow hostile ground.
Let me securely land, I ask no more,
Then sink my ships, or shatter on the shore.
This fiery speech inflames his fearful friends,
They tug at every oar; and every stretcher bends:
They run their ships aground, the vessels knock,
(Thus forc'd ashore) and tremble with the flock.
Tarchon's alone was lost, and stranded food,
Stuck on a bank, and beaten by the flood.
She breaks her back, the loosen'd sides give way,
And plunge the Tuscan soldiers in the sea.
Their broken oars and floating planks withstand
Their passage, while they labour to the land;
And ebbing tides bear back upon the uncertain sand.

Now Turnus leads his troops, without delay,
Advancing to the margin of the sea.
The trumpets sound: Æneas first assail'd
The clowns new-raisd and raw; and soon prevail'd

Great Theron fell, an omen of the fight:
Great Theron large of limbs, of giant height.
He first in open fields defy'd the prince,
But armour seal'd with gold was no defence
Against the fated sword, which open'd wide
His plated shield, and pierc'd his naked side.

Next, Lycas fell; who, not like others born,
Was from his wretched mother ripp'd and torn:
Sacred, O Phœbus! from his birth to thee,
For his beginning life from biting steel was free.
Nor far from him was Gyas laid along,
Of monstrous bulk; with Ciffens fierce and strong;
Vain bulk and strength; for when the chief assail'd,

Nor valour, nor Herculean arms, avail'd;
Nor their fam'd father, wont to war to go
With great Alcides, while he toil'd below.
The noisy Pharos next receiv'd his death,
Æneas with'd his dart, and stopp'd his bawling breath.

Then wretched Cydon had receiv'd his doom,
Who courted Clytius in his beardless bloom,
And fought with lust obscene polluted joys:
The Trojan sword had cur'd his love of boys,
Had not his seven bold brethren stopp'd the course
Of the fierce champion, with united force.
Seven darts are thrown at once, and some rebound
From his bright shield, some on his helmet found:
The rest had reach'd him, but his mother's care
Prevented those, and turn'd aside in air.

The prince then call'd Achates, to supply
The spears that knew the way to victory.
Those fatal weapons, which, inur'd to blood,
In Grecian bodies under Ilium stood:
Not one of those my hand shall toss in vain
Against our foes, on this contended plain,
He said: then seiz'd a mighty spear, and threw;
Which, wing'd with fate, through Mæon's buckler flew;
Pierc'd all the brazen plates, and reach'd his
He slagger'd with intolerable smart.

Alcanor saw; and reach'd, but reach'd in vain,
His helping hand, his brother to sustain.
A second spear, which kept the former course,
From the same hand, and sent with equal force,
His right arm pierc'd, and, holding on, bereft
His life of both, and pinion'd down his left.
Then Numitor, from his dead brother, drew
Th' ill-omen'd spear, and at the Trojan threw:
Preventing Fate directs the lance awry,
Which, glancing, only mark'd Achates' thigh.

In pride of youth the Sabine Clausus came,
And from afar at Dryops took his aim.
The spear flew hissing through the middle space,
And pierc'd his throat, directed at his face:
It stopp'd at once the passage of his wind,
And the free soul to flitting air resign'd:
His forehead was the first that struck the ground;
Life-blood and life rush'd mingled through the wound.

He slew three brothers of the Borean race,
And three, whom Ismarus, their native place,
He sent to war, but all the sons of Thrace.
Halefus next, the bold Aurunci leads;
The son of Neptune to his aid succeeds,
Conspicuous on his horse: on either hand
These fight to keep, and those to win the land.
With mutual blood th' Ausonian soil is dy'd,
While on its borders each their claim decide.

As wintery winds, contending in the sky,
With equal force of lungs their titles try:
They rage, they roar; the doubtful rack of hea-
Stands without motion, and the tide undriven:
Each bent to conquer, neither side to yield;
They long suspend the fortune of the field.
Both armies thus perform what courage can:
Foot set to foot, and mingled man to man.

But in another part, th' Arcadian horse,
With ill-success engage the Latian force,
For where th' impetuous torrent, rushing down,
Huge craggy stones, and rooted trees had thrown,
They left their couriers, and, unus'd to fight
On foot, were scatter'd in a shameful flight.
Pallas, who with disdain and grief had view'd
His foes pursuing, and his friends pursu'd, Us'd threatenings mix'd with prayers, his last resource:

[fire their force.]
With these to move their minds, with those to
Which way, companions! whither would you run?
By you yourselves, and mighty battles won;
By my great fire, by his establish'd name,
And early promise of my future fame;
By my youth emulous of equal right,
To share his honours, shun ignoble flight. [way
Trust not your feet; your hands must hew your
Through yon black body, and that thick array:
'Tis through that path forward that we must
come:

There lies our way, and that our passage home.
Nor powers above, nor destinies below,
Oppress'd our arms; with equal strength we go;
With mortal hands to meet a mortal foe.
See on what foot we stand: a scanty shore;
The sea behind, our enemies before:
No passage left, unless we swim the main;
Or, forcing these, the Trojan trenches gain.
This said, he strode with eager haste along,
And bore amidst the thickest of the throng,

Lagus, the first he met, with fate to foe,
Had heav'd a stone of mighty weight to throw;
Stooping, the spear descended on his chine,
Just where the bone distinguish'd either loin:
It stuck so fast, so deeply bury'd lay,
That scarce the victor forc'd the steel away.

Hisbon came on, but while he mov'd too slow
To wish'd revenge, the prince prevents his blow;
For, warding his at once, at once he pres'd;
And plung'd the fatal weapon in his breast.
Then lewd Anchemolus he laid in dust,
Who stain'd his stepdam's bed with impious lust.
And after him the Daunian twins were slain,
Laris and Thimbrus, on the Latian plain:
So wondrous like in feature, shape, and size,
As caus'd an error in their parent's eyes.
Grateful mistake! but soon the sword decides
The nice distinction, and their fate divides.
For Thimbrus' head was lopp'd: and Laris' hand,
Dismember'd, sought its owner on the strand:
The trembling fingers yet the sauchion strain,
And threaten still th' intended stroke in vain.

Now, to renew the charge, th' Arcadians
came:
Sight of such acts, and sense of honest shame,
And grief, with anger mix'd, their minds in-
flame.

Then with a casual blow was Rhæteus slain,
Who chang'd, as Pallas threw, to cross the plain!
The flying spear was after Ius sent,
But Rhæteus happen'd on a death unmeant:
From Teuthras and from Tyrus while he fled,
The lance, athwart his body, laid him dead.
Roll'd from his chariot with a mortal wound,
And intercepted fate, he spurn'd the ground.

As, when in summer welcome winds arise,
The watchful shepherd to the forest flies,
And fires the midmost plauts; contagion spreads,
And catching flames infect the neighbouring heads;

Around the forest flies the furious blast,
And all the leafy nation sinks at last;
And Vulcan rides in triumph o'er the waste;
The pastor, pleas'd with his dire victory,
Beholds the satiate flames in sheets ascend the sky:
So Pallas' troops their scatter'd strength unite;
And, pouring on their foes, their prince delight.

Halefus came, fierce with desire of blood
(But first collected in his arms he stood):
Advancing then he ply'd the spear so well,
Ladon, Demodochus, and Pheres, fell:
Around his head he tofs'd his glittering brand,
And from Strymonius hew'd his better hand,
Held up to guard his throat: then hurl'd a stone
At Thoas' ample front, and pierc'd the bone.
It struck beneath the space of either eye,
And blood, and mingled brains, together fly.
Deep skill'd in future fates, Halefus' fire
Did with the youth to lonely groves retire:
Eut, when the father's mortal race was run,
Dire Destiny laid hold upon the son,
And haul'd him to the war: to find beneath
Th' Evandrian spear a memorable death.
Pallas, th' encounter seeks; but ere he throws,
To Tuscan Tiber thus address'd his vows:
O sacred stream, direct my flying dart,
And give to pass the proud Halefus' heart:

His arms and spoils thy holy oak shall bear.
Pleas'd with the bribe, the god receiv'd his prayer;
For, while his shield protects a friend distress'd,
The dart came driving on, and pierc'd his breast.

But Laufus, no small portion of the war,
Permits not panic fear to reign too far,
Caus'd by the death of so renown'd a knight;
But by his own example cheers the fight.
Fierce Abas first he slew; Abas, the stay
Of Trojan hopes, and hindrance of the day.
The Phrygian troops escap'd the Greeks in vain,
They, and their mix'd allies, now load the plain.
To the rude shock of war both armies came,
The leaders equal, and their strength the same.
The rear so pres'd the front they could not wield
These angry weapons, to dispute the field.
Here Pallas urges on, and Laufus there,
Of equal youth and beauty both appear, [air.
But both by Fate forbid to breathe their native
Their congress in the field great Jove withstands,
Both doom'd to fall, but fall by greater hands.

Meantime Juturna warns the Dunian chief
Of Laufus' danger, urging swift relief.
With his driven chariot he divides the crowd,
And, making to his friends, thus calls aloud:
Let none presume his needless aid to join;
Retire, and clear the field, the fight is mine:
To this right hand is Pallas only due:
Oh were his father here my just revenge to view!
From the forbidden space his men retir'd,
Pallas their awe and his stern words admir'd,
Survey'd him o'er and o'er with wondering sight,
Struck with his haughty mien, and towering height.

Then to the king; your empty vaunts forbear.
Success I hope, and Fate I cannot fear.
Alive or dead, I shall deserve a name:
Jove is impartial, and to both the same.
He said, and to the void advanc'd his pace;
Pale horror sat on each Arcadian face.
Then Turnus, from his chariot leaping light,
Address'd himself on foot to single fight.
And, as a lion, when he spies from far
A bull that seems to meditate the war,
Bending his neck, and spurning back the sand,
Runs roaring downward from his hilly stand:
Imagine eager Turnus not more slow,
To rush from high on his unequal foe.

Young Pallas, when he saw the chief advance
Within due distance of his flying lance,
Prepares to charge him first, resolv'd to try
If Fortune would his want of force supply;
And thus to Heaven and Hercules address'd:
Alcides, once on earth Evander's guest,
His son adjures you by those holy rites,
That hospitable board, those genial nights;
Assist my great attempt to gain this prize,
And let proud Turnus view, with dying eyes,
His ravish'd spoils. 'Twas heard, the vain request;
Alcides mourn'd; and stifled sighs within his
Then Jove, to soothe his sorrow, thus began:
Short bounds of life are set to mortal man;
'Tis virtue's work alone to stretch the narrow span.

So many fons of gods in bloody fight,
Around the walls of Troy, have lost the light:

y own Sarpedon fell beneath his foe,
 or I, his mighty fire, could ward the blow;
 'n Turnus shortly shall resign his breath;
 and stands already on the verge of death.
 his said, the god permits the fatal fight,
 at from the Latian fields averts his sight.
 ow with full force his spear young Pallas threw;
 nd, having thrown, his shining faulchion drew:
 he steel just graz'd along the shoulder joint,
 nd mark'd it slightly with the glancing point.
 erce Turnus first to nearer distance drew,
 nd pois'd his pointed spear before he threw:
 hen, as the winged weapon whizz'd along,
 e now, said he, whose arm is better strung,
 he spear kept on the fatal course, unfay'd
 y plates of iron, which o'er the shield were laid:
 ro' folded brags and tough bull-hides it pass'd,
 is croset pierc'd, and reach'd his heart at last.
 a vain the youth tugs at the broken wood,
 he soul comes issuing with the vital blood:
 e falls; his arms upon his body found;
 nd with his bloody teeth he bites the ground.
 Turnus bestrode the corpse: Arcadians hear,
 aid he; my message to your master bear:
 uch as the fire deserv'd, the son I send:
 costs him dear to be the Phrygians' friend.
 he lifeless body, tell him, I bestow, nask'd, to rest his wandering ghost below.
 e said, and trampled down with all the force
 f his left foot, and spurn'd the wretched corpse:
 hen snatch'd the shining belt, with gold inlaid;
 he belt Eurytion's artful hands had made:
 here fifty fatal brides, express'd to fight,
 ll, in the compass of one mournful night,
 depriv'd their bridegrooms of returning light. }
 In an ill hour insulting Turnus tore hose golden spoils, and in a worse he wore.
 mortals! blind in fate, who never know
 o bear high fortune, or endure the low!
 he time shall come, when Turnus, but in vain,
 hall wish untouch'd the trophies of the slain:
 hall with the fatal belt were far away;
 nd curse the dire remembrance of the day.
 The sad Arcadians from th' unhappy field,
 ear back the breathless body on a shield.
 grace and grief of war! at once restor'd
 With praises to thy fire, at once deplor'd.
 ne day first sent thee to the fighting field,
 beheld whole heaps of foes in battle kill'd;
 ne day beheld thee dead, and borne upon thy
 shield. }
 his dismal news, not from uncertain fame, but sad spectators, to the hero came:
 his friends upon the brink of ruin stand,
 nless reliev'd by his victorious hand.
 le whirls his sword around, without delay,
 and hews through adverse foes an ample way;
 o find fierce Turnus, of his conquest proud:
 vander, Pallas, all that friendship ow'd
 o large deserts; are present to his eyes;
 his plighted hand, and hospitable ties.
 Four sons of Sulmo, four whom Ufens bred,
 he took in fight, and living victims led,
 o please the ghost of Pallas; and expire
 n sacrifice, before his funeral fire.
 At Magus next he threw: he stoop'd below
 The flying spear, and shunn'd the promis'd blow.

Then, creeping, clasp'd the hero's knees, and
 pray'd:
 By young Iulus, by thy father's shade,
 O spare my life, and send me back to see
 My longing fire, and tender progeny.
 A lofty house I have, and wealth untold,
 In silver ingots, and in bars of gold:
 All these, and sums besides, which see no day;
 The ransom of this one poor life shall pay.
 If I survive, shall Troy the less prevail?
 A single soul's too light to turn the scale.
 He said. The hero sternly thus reply'd:
 Thy bars, and ingots, and the sums beside,
 Leave for thy children's lot. Thy Turnus broke
 All rules of war, by one relentless stroke,
 When Pallas fell: so deems, nor deems alone,
 My father's shadow, but my living son.
 Thus having said, of kind remorse bereft,
 He seiz'd his helm, and dragg'd him with his left:
 Then with his right-hand, whilst his neck he wreath'd,
 Up to the hilts his shining faulchion sheath'd.
 Apollo's priest, Hæmonides, was near,
 His holy fillets on his front appear;
 Glittering in arms he shone amidst the crowd;
 Much of his god, more of his purple proud:
 Him the fierce Trojan follow'd through the field,
 The holy coward fell: and, forc'd to yield,
 The prince stood o'er the priest; and at one blow
 Sent him an offering to the shades below.
 His arms Serephus on his shoulders bears,
 Design'd a trophy to the god of wars.
 Vulcanian Cæculus renews the fight;
 And umbro born upon the mountain's height.
 The champion cheers his troops t' encounter those;
 And seeks revenge himself on other foes.
 At Anxur's shield he drove, and at the blow
 Both shield and arm to ground together go.
 Anxur had boasted much of magic charms,
 And thought he wore impenetrable arms;
 So made by mutter'd spells: and from the spheres
 Had life secur'd in vain, for length of years.
 Then Tarquitus the field in triumph trod;
 A nymph his mother, and his fire a god.
 Exulting in bright arms, he braves the prince;
 With his portended lance he makes defence:
 Bears back his feeble foe; then, pressing on,
 Arrests his better hand, and drags him down.
 Stands o'er the prostrate wretch, and as he lay,
 Vain tales inventing, and prepar'd to pray,
 Mows off his head; the trunk a moment stood,
 Then sunk, and roll'd along the sand in blood.
 The vengeful victor thus upbraids the slain;
 Lie there, proud man, unpity'd on the plain:
 Lie there, inglorious, and without a tomb,
 Far from thy mother, and thy native home:
 Expos'd to savage beasts, and birds of prey;
 Or thrown for food to monsters of the sea.
 On Lycas, and Antæus next he ran,
 Two chiefs of Turnus, and who led his van,
 They fled for fear; with these he chas'd along,
 Camers the yellow-lock'd, and Numa strong,
 Both great in arms, and both were fair and young:
 Camers was son to Volscens lately slain,
 In wealth surpassing all the Latian train,
 And in Amycla fix'd his silent easy reign.

And as Ægean, when with heaven he strove,
 Stood opposite in arms to mighty Jove;
 Mov'd all his hundred hands, provok'd the war,
 Deiy'd the forky lightning from afar:
 At fifty mouths his flaming breath expires,
 And flash for flash returns, and fires for fires:
 In his right-hand as many swords he wields,
 And takes the thunder on as many shields:
 With strength like his the Trojan hero stood,
 And soon the fields with falling crops were strow'd.

When once his Faulchion found the taste of blood,
 With fury scarce to be conceiv'd, he flew Against Niphæus, whom four coursers drew.
 They, when they see the fiery chief advance,
 And pushing at their chests his pointed lance,
 Wheel'd with so swift a motion, mad with fear,
 They drew their master headlong from the chair:
 They stare, they start, nor stop their course, before
 They hear the bounding chariot to the shore.

Now Lucagus and Liger, scour the plains,
 With two white steeds, but Liger holds the reins,
 And Lucagus the lofty seat maintains.
 Bold brethren both, the former wav'd in air
 His flaming sword; Æneas couch'd his spear,
 Unus'd to threats, and more unus'd to fear.
 Then Liger thus. Thy confidence is vain
 To 'scape from hence, as from the Trojan plain:
 Nor these the steeds which Diomed bestrode,
 Nor this the chariot where Achilles rode:
 Nor Venus' veil is here, nor Neptune's shield:
 Thy fatal hour is come; and this the field.
 Thus Liger vainly vaunts: the Trojan peer
 Return'd his answer with his flying spear.
 As Lucagus to lash his horses bends,
 Prone to the wheels, and his left foot pretends,
 Prepar'd for flight, the fatal dart arrives,
 And through the border of his buckler drives;
 Pass'd through, and pierc'd his groin; the deadly
 wound,

Cast from his chariot, roll'd him on the ground.
 Whom thus the chief upbraids with scornful
 spight;

Blame not the slowness of your steeds in flight;
 Vain shadows did not force their swift retreat:
 But you yourself forsake your empty seat.
 He said, and seiz'd at once the loosen'd rein
 (For Liger lay already on the plain By the same flock); then, stretching out his hands,

The recreant thus his wretched life demands:
 Now by thyself, O more than mortal man!
 By her and him from whom thy breath began,
 Who form'd thee thus divine, I beg thee spare
 This forfeit life, and hear thy suppliant's prayer.
 Thus much he spake; and more he would have
 But the stern hero turn'd aside his head, [said,
 And cut him short; I hear another man,
 You talk'd not thus before the fight began;
 Now take your turn: and, as a brother should,
 Attend your brother to the Stygian flood:
 Then through his breast his fatal sword he sent,
 And the soul issued at the gaping vent.
 As storms the skies, and torrents tear the ground,
 Thus rag'd the prince, and scatter'd deaths around:
 At length Ascanius, and the Trojan train,
 Broke from the camp, so long besieg'd in vain.

Mean time, the king of gods and mortal man
 Held conference with his queen, and thus began
 My sister-goddes, and well-pleasing wife,
 Still think you Venus' aid supports the strife;
 Sustains her Trojans, or themselves alone
 With inborn valour force their fortune on?
 How fierce in fight, with courage undecay'd
 Judge if such warriors want immortal aid.
 To whom the goddes with the charming eyes,
 Soft in her tone, submissively replies.

Why, O my sovereign lord, whole frown I fear,
 And cannot, unconcern'd, your anger bear;
 Why urge you thus my grief? when if I still (As once I was) were mistress of your will,
 From your almighty power, your pleasing wife
 Might gain the grace of lengthening Turnus' life
 Securely snatch him from the fatal fight;
 And give him to his aged father's sight.
 Now let him perish, since you hold it good,
 And glut the Trojans with his pious blood.
 Yet from our lineage he derives his name,
 And in the fourth degree from god Pilmunus came
 Yet he devoutly pays you rites divine,
 And offers daily incense at your shrine.

Then shortly thus the sovereign god reply'd;
 Since in my power and goodness you confide;
 If for a little space, a lengthen'd span,
 You beg reprieve for this expiring man:
 I grant you leave to take your Turnus hence,
 From instant fate, and can so far dispense.
 But if some secret meaning lies beneath,
 To save the short-liv'd youth from destin'd death
 Or if a farther thought you entertain,
 To change the fates; you feed your hopes in vain

To whom the goddes thus, with weeping eyes
 And what if that request your tongue denies,
 Your heart should grant; and not a short reprieve
 But length of certain life to Turnus give?
 Now speedy death attends the guiltless youth,
 If my prelaguing soul divines with truth,
 Which, O! I wish might err through causeless
 fears,

And you (for you have power) prolong his year
 Thus having said, involv'd in clouds, she flies,
 And drives a storm before her through the skies.
 Swift the descends, alighting on the plain,
 Where the fierce foes a dubious fight maintain.
 Of air condens'd, a spectre soon she made,
 And what Æneas was, such seem'd the shade.
 Adorn'd with Dardan arms, the phantom bore
 His head aloft, a plummy crest he wore:
 This hand appear'd a shining sword to wield,
 And that sustain'd an imitated shield:
 With manly mien he stalk'd along the ground;
 Nor wanted voice bely'd, nor vaunting found.
 (Thus haunting ghosts appear to waking sight,
 Or dreadful visions in our dreams by night).
 The spectre seems the Daunian chief to dare,
 And flourishes his empty sword in air:
 At this advancing Turnus hurl'd his spear;
 The phantom wheel'd, and seem'd to fly for fear
 Deluded Turnus thought the Trojan fled,
 And with vain hopes his haughty fancy fed.
 Whither, O coward, (thus he calls aloud,
 Nor found he spoke to wind, and chas'd a cloud;
 Why thus forsake your bride! Receive from me
 The fated land you sought so long by sea.

He said, and, brandishing at once his blade,
With eager pace purſu'd the flying ſhade.
By chance a ſhip was faſten'd to the ſhore,
Which from old Cluſium king Oſinius bore:
The plank was ready laid for ſafe aſcent;
For ſhelter there the trembling ſhadow bent,
And ſkipp'd, and ſculk'd, and under hatches went.

Exulting Turnus, with regardleſs haſte,
Aſcends the plank, and to the galley paſs'd.
Scarce had he reach'd the prow, Saturnia's hand
The hauſers cuts, and ſhoots the ſhip from land.
With wind in poop, the veſſel ploughs the ſea,
And meaſures back with ſpeed her former way.
Meantime Æneas ſeeks his abſent foe,
And ſends his ſlaughter'd troops to ſhades below.

The guiſeful phantom now forſook the ſhroud,
And flew ſublime, and vaniſh'd in a cloud.
'oo late young Turnus the deſuſion found,
'ar on the ſea, ſtill making from the ground.
Then, thankleſs for a life redeem'd by ſhame,
With ſenſe of honour ſtung, and forſeit fame,
Earful beſides of what in fight had paſs'd,
His hands and haggard eyes to heaven he caſt.
O Jove! he cry'd, for what offence have I
Deſerv'd to hear this endleſs inſamy?

Whence am I forc'd, and whither am I borne,
How, and with what reproach ſhall I return!
I ſhall ever behold the Latian plain,
Or ſee Laurentum's lofty towers again?
What will they ſay of their deſerting chief?
The war was mine, I fly from their relief:
Led to ſlaughter, and in ſlaughter leave;
And ev'n from hence their dying groans receive.
I ſee, over-match'd in fight, in heaps they lie,
Here ſcatter'd o'er the fields ignobly fly.
Wipe wide, O earth! and draw me down alive,
Or, oh, ye pitying winds! a wretch relieve;
In ſands or ſhelves the ſplitting veſſel drive:
Or ſet me ſhipwreck'd on ſome deſert ſhore,
Where no Rutulian eyes may ſee me more;
Unknown to friends, or foes, or conſcious Fame,
Let ſteps ſhould follow, and my flight proclaim!

Thus Turnus rav'd, and various fates revolv'd,
The choice was doubtful, but the death reſolv'd.
And now the ſword, and now the ſea took place:
That to revenge, and this to purge diſgrace.
Sometimes he thought to ſwim the ſtormy main,
By ſtretch of arms the diſtant ſhore to gain:
Thrice he the ſword aſſay'd, and thrice the flood;
But Juno, mov'd with pity, both withſtood:
And thrice repreſs'd his rage: ſtrong gales ſup-
ply'd,

And puſh'd the veſſel o'er the ſwelling tide.
At length ſhe lands him on his native ſhores,
And to his father's longing arms reſtores.

Meantime, by Jove's impuſe, Mezentius arm'd,
Succeeding Turnus, with his ardour warm'd
His fainting friends, reproach'd their ſhameful
flight,

Repell'd the victors, and renew'd the fight.
Againſt their king the Tuſcan troops conſpire,
Such is their hate, and ſuch their fierce deſire
Of wiſh'd revenge: on him, and him alone.
All hands employ'd, and all their darts are thrown.
He, like a ſolid rock by ſeas enclos'd,
To raging winds and roaring waves oppos'd;

From his proud ſummit looking down, diſdains
Their empty menace, and unmov'd remains.

Beneath his feet fell haughty Hebrus dead,
Then Latagus; and Palmus as he fled:
At Latagus a weighty ſtone he ſlung,
His face was flatt'd, and his helmet rung.
But Palmus from behind receives his wound;
Hamſtring'd he falls, and grovels on the ground;
His creſt and armour, from his body torn,
Thy ſhoulders, Lauſus, and thy head adorn.
Evas and Mymas, both of Troy, he ſlew,
Mymas his birth from fair Theano drew:
Born on that fatal night, when, big with fire,
The queen produc'd young Paris to his fire.
But Paris in the Phrygian fields was ſlain;
Unthinking Mymas, on the Latian plain.

And as a ſavage boar on mountains bred,
With foreſt maſt and fattening marſhes fed;
When once he ſees himſelf in toils enclos'd,
By huntſmen and their eager hounds oppos'd,
He whets his tuſks, and turns, and dares the war;
Th' invaders dart their javelins from afar;
All keep aloof, and ſafely ſhout around,
But none preſumes to give a nearer wound.
He frets and froths, erects his bristled hide,
And ſhakes a grove of lances from his ſide:
Not otherwiſe the troops, with hate inspir'd
And juſt revenge, againſt the tyrant fir'd;
Their darts with clamour at a diſtance drive,
And only keep the languish'd war alive.

From Coriſus came Acron to the fight,
Who left his ſpouſe betroth'd, and unconſummate
night.

Mezentius ſees him through the ſquadron ride,
Proud of the purple favours of his bride.
Then, as a hungry lion, who beholds
A gameſome goat who friks about the folds,
Or beaſty ſtag that grazes on the plain;
He runs, he roars, he ſhakes his riſing mane;
He grins, and opens wide his greedy jaws,
The prey lies panting underneath his paws:
He fills his famiſh'd maw, his mouth runs o'er
With unchew'd morsels, while he churns the gore;
So proud Mezentius ruſhes on his foes,
And firſt unhappy Acron overthrows:
Stretch'd at his length, he ſpurns the ſwarthy
ground,

The lance, beſneat'd with blood, lies broken in
the wound.

Then with diſdain the haughty victor view'd
Orodes flying, nor the wretch purſu'd:
Nor thought the daſtard's back deſerv'd a wound,
But running gain'd th' advantage of the ground.
Then, turning ſhort, he met him face to face,
To give his victory the better grace.

Orodes falls, in equal fight oppreſs'd:
Mezentius fix'd his foot upon his breaſt;
And reſted lance: and thus aloud he cries,
Lo here the champion of my rebels lies.
The fields around with Iu Pæan ring,
And peals of ſhouts applaud the conquering king.
At this the vanquiſh'd, with his dying breath,
Thus faintly ſpoke, and prophes'd in death:
Nor thou, proud man, unpunish'd ſhalt remain;
Like death attends thee on this fatal plain.
Then, ſourly ſmiling, thus the king reply'd:
For what belongs to me let Jove provide;

But die thou first, whatever chance ensue.
He said, and from the wound the weapon drew :
A hovering mist came swimming o'er his sight,
And seal'd his eyes in everlasting night.

By Cadicus, Alcaethous was slain ;
Sacrator laid Hydaspes on the plain :
Orles the strong to greater strength must yield :
He, with Parthenius, were by Rapo kill'd.
Their brave Messapus Ericetes slew,
Who from Lycaon's blood his lineage drew.
But from his headstrong horse his fate he found,
Who threw his master as he made a bound ;
The chief, alighting, stuck him to the ground.
Then Clonius hand in hand, on foot assails,
The Trojan sinks, and Neptune's son prevails.

Agis the Lycian, stepping forth with pride.
To single fight the boldest foe defy'd ;
Whom Tuscan Valerus by force o'ercame,
And not bely'd his mighty father's fame.
Salius to death the great Antronius sent,
But the same fate the victor underwent ;
Slain by Neales' hand, well skill'd to throw
The flying dart, and draw the far-deceiving bow.

Thus equal deaths are dealt with equal chance ;
By turns they quit their ground, by turns advance :
Victors, and vanquish'd, in the various field,
Nor wholly overcome, nor wholly yield.
The gods from heaven survey the fatal strife,
And mourn the miseries of human life.
Above the rest two goddesses appear
Concern'd for each : here Venus, Juno there :
Amidst the crowd infernal Atë shakes
Her scourge aloft, and crest of hissing snakes.

Once more the proud Mezentius with disdain
Brandish'd his spear, and rush'd into the plain :
Like towering in the midmost ranks he stood,
Like tall Orion stalking o'er the flood :
When with his brawny breast he cuts the waves,
His shoulders scarce the topmost billow laves.
Or like a mountain-ash, whose roots are spread,
Deep fix'd in earth, in clouds he hides his head.

The Trojan prince beheld him from afar,
And dauntless undertook the doubtful war.
Collected in his strength, and like a rock,
Pois'd on his base, Mezentius stood the shock.
He stood, and, measuring first with careful eyes
The space his spear could reach, aloud he cries :
My strong right-hand, and sword, assist my stroke :
(Those only gods Mezentius will invoke)
His armour, from the Trojan pirate torn,
By my triumphant Lausus shall be worn.
He said, and with his utmost force he threw
The massy spear, which, hissing as it flew,
Reach'd the celestial shield that stopp'd the course ;
But glancing thence, the yet-unbroken force
Took a new bent obliquely, and betwixt
The sides and bowels sam'd Anthores fix'd.
Anthores had from Argos travell'd far,
Alcides' friend, and brother of the war :
Till, tir'd with toils, fair Italy he chose,
And in Evander's palace sought repose :
Now falling by another wound, his eyes
He cast to heaven, on Argos thinks, and dies.

The pious Trojan then his javelin sent. [went
The shield gave way : through treble plates it
Of solid brass, of linen trebly roll'd, [roll'd.
And three bull-hides which round the buckler

All these it pass'd, resistless on the course,
Transpierc'd his thigh, and spent its dying force.
The gaping wound gush'd out a crimson flood ;
The Trojan, glad with sight of hostile blood,
His sauchion drew, to closer fight address'd,
And with new force his fainting foe oppress'd.

His father's peril Lausus view'd with grief,
He sigh'd, he wept, he ran to his relief :
And here, heroic youth, 'tis here I must
To thy immortal memory be just ;
And sing an act so noble and so new,
Posterity will scarce believe 'tis true.
Pain'd with his wound, and useless for the fight,
The father fought to save himself by flight :
Incumber'd, slow he dragg'd the spear along,
Which pierc'd his thigh, and in his buckler hung
The pious youth, resolv'd on death, below
The lifted sword springs forth, to face the foe ;
Protects his parent, and prevents the blow.
Shouts of applause ran ringing through the field,
To see the son the vanquish'd father shield :
All fir'd with generous indignation strive ;
And, with a storm of darts, at distance drive
The Trojan chief : who, held at bay from far,
On his Vulcanian orb sustain'd the war.

As when thick hail comes rattling in the wind
The ploughman, passenger, and labouring hind,
For shelter to the neighbouring covert fly ;
Or hous'd, or safe in hollow caverns lie ;
But, that o'erblown, when heaven above them
Return to travel, and renew their toils ; [smiles
Æneas, thus o'erwhelm'd on every side,
The storm of darts, undaunted, did abide ;
And thus to Lausus loud with friendly threatening cry'd :

Why wilt thou rush to certain death, and rage
In rash attempts, beyond thy tender age,
Betray'd by pious love ? Nor thus forborn
The youth desists, but with insulting scorn [tir'd
Provokes the lingering prince, whose patience
Gave place, and all his breast with fury fir'd.
For now the Fates prepar'd their sharpen'd spears
And lifted high the flaming sword appears,
Which full descending, with a frightful sway,
Through shield and corslet forc'd th' impetuous
way,
And buried deep in his fair bosom lay.
The purple stream through the thin armour strove
And drench'd th' embroider'd coat his mother wove ;

And life at length forsook his heaving heart,
Loth from so sweet a mansion to depart.
But when, with blood and paleness all o'erspread
The pious prince beheld young Lausus dead ;
He griev'd, he wept, the sight an image brought
Of his own filial love ; a sadly pleasing thought !
Then stretch'd his hand to hold him up, and said
Poor hapless youth ! what praises can be paid
To love so great, to such transcendent store
Of early worth, and sure presage of more !
Accept what'er Æneas can afford ;
Untouch'd thy arms, untaken be the sword !
And all that pleas'd the living, still remain
Inviolate, and sacred to the slain !
Thy body on thy parents I bestow,
To rest thy soul, at least if shadows know,
Of have a sense of human things below.

There to thy fellow-ghosts with glory tell,
 'Twas by the great Æneas' hand I fell.
 With this his distant friends he beckons near,
 Provokes their duty, and prevents their fear:
 Himself assist to lift him from the ground,
 With clotted locks, and blood that well'd from out
 the wound.

Meantime his father, now no father, stood,
 And wash'd his wounds by Tiber's yellow flood:
 Oppress'd with anguish, panting, and o'erspent,
 His fainting limbs against an oak he leant.
 A bough his brazen helmet did sustain,
 His heavier arms lay scatter'd on the plain:
 A chosen train of youth around him stand,
 His drooping head was rested on his hand:
 His grisly beard his penive bosom sought,
 And all on Lausus ran his restless thought.
 Careful, concern'd his danger to prevent,
 He much inquir'd, and many a message sent
 To warn him from the field: alas! in vain;
 Behold his mournful followers bear him slain:
 O'er his broad shield still gush'd the yawning wound,
 And drew a bloody trail along the ground.

Far off he heard their cries, far off divin'd
 The dire event with a foreboding mind.
 With dust he sprinkled first his hoary head,
 Then both his lifted hands to heaven he spread;
 Last the dear corpse embracing, thus he said:
 What joys, alas! could this frail being give,
 That I have been so covetous to live?
 To see my son, and such a son, resign
 His life a ransom for preserving mine?
 And am I then preserv'd, and art thou lost?
 How much too dear has that redemption cost!
 'Tis now my bitter banishment I feel;
 This is a wound too deep for time to heal.
 My guilt thy growing virtues did defame,
 My blackness blotted thy unblemish'd name.
 Chas'd from a throne, abandon'd, and exil'd,
 For foul misdeeds, were punishments too mild:
 I ow'd my people these, and from their hate
 With less repentment could have borne my fate.
 And yet I live, and yet sustain the fight
 Of hated men, and of more hated light:
 But will not long. With that he rais'd from
 ground

His fainting limbs that stagger'd with his wound.
 Yet with a mind resolv'd, and unappal'd
 With pains or perils, for his courser call'd:
 Well-mouth'd, well manag'd, whom himself did dress

With daily care, and mounted with success;
 His aid in arms, his ornament in peace.
 Soothing his courage with a gentle stroke,
 The steed seem'd sensible, while thus he spoke:
 O Rhæbus, we have liv'd too long for me
 (If life and long were terms that could agree);
 This day thou either shalt bring back the head
 And bloody trophies of the Trojan dead;
 This day thou either shalt revenge my woe
 For murder'd Lausus, on his cruel foe;
 Or, if inexorable Fate deny
 Our conquest, with thy conquer'd master die:
 For, after such a lord, I rest secure,
 Thou wilt no foreign reins, or Trojan load endure.
 He said: and straight th' officious courser kneels
 To take his wonted weight. His hands he fills

With pointed javelins: on his head he lac'd
 His glittering helm, which terribly was grac'd
 With waving horse-hair, nodding from afar;
 Then spur'd his thundering steed amidst the war.
 Love, anguish, wrath, and grief, to madness wrought,

Despair, and secret shame, and conscious thought
 Of inborn worth, his labouring soul oppress'd,
 Roll'd in his eyes, and rang'd within his breast.
 Then loud he call'd Æneas glad by name.
 The loud repeated voice to thrice Æneas came.
 Great Jove, he said, and the far-shooting god,
 Inspire thy mind to make thy challenge good.
 He spoke no more, but hasten'd, void of fear,
 And threaten'd with his long protended spear.

To whom Mezentius thus: thy vaunts are vain,
 My Lausus lies extended on the plain:
 He's lost! thy conquest is already won,
 The wretched fire is murder'd in the son.
 Nor fate I fear, but all the gods defy,
 Forbear thy threats, my business is to die;
 But first receive this parting legacy.
 He said: and straight a whirling dart he sent:
 Another after, and another went.

Round in a spacious ring he rides the field,
 And vainly plies th' impenetrable shield:
 Thrice rode he round, and thrice Æneas wheel'd,
 Turn'd as he turn'd; the golden orb withstood
 The strokes; and bore about an iron wood.
 Impatient of delay, and weary grown,
 Still to defend, and to defend alone:
 To wrench the darts which in his buckler light,
 Urg'd and o'erlabour'd in unequal fight:
 At length resolv'd, he throws with all his force
 Full at the temples of the warrior-horse. [spear
 Just where the stroke was aim'd, th' unerring
 Made way, and stood transfix'd thro' either ear.
 Seiz'd with unwonted pain, surpris'd with fright,
 The wounded steeds curvets; and, rais'd upright,
 Lights on his feet before; his hoofs behind
 Spring up in air aloft, and last the wind.
 Down comes the rider headlong from his height,
 His horse came after with unwieldy weight;
 And, floundering forward, pitching on his head,
 His lord's incumbent shoulder overlaid,
 From either host the mingled shouts and cries
 Of Trojans and Rutulians rend the skies.
 Æneas, hastening, wav'd his fatal sword,
 High o'er his head with this reproachful word:
 Now, where are now thy vaunts, the fierce dis-
 Of proud Mezentius, and the lofty strain? [daim
 Struggling, and wildly staring on the skies,
 With scarce recover'd sight, he thus replies:
 Why these insulting words, this waste of breath,
 To souls undaunted, and secure of death?
 'Tis no dishonour for the brave to die,
 Nor came I here with hope of victory.
 Nor ask I life, nor fought with that design:
 As I had us'd my fortune, use thou thine.
 My dying son contracted no such band;
 The gift is hateful from his murderer's hand.
 For this, this only favour let me sue:
 If pity can to conquer'd foes be due,
 Refuse it not: but let my body have
 The last retreat of human-kind, a grave.
 Too well I know th' insulting people's hate;
 Fated to me from their vengeance after fate:

This refuge for my poor remains provide,
And lay my much-lov'd Lausus by my side.
He said, and to the throat his sword apply'd.

} The crimson stream disdain'd his arms around,
And the disdainful soul came rushing through the
wound.

THE ARGUMENT.

Æneas erects a trophy of the spoils of Mezentius: grants a truce for burying the dead; and sends home the body of Pallas with great solemnity. Latins calls a council to propose offers of peace to Æneas, which occasions great animosity betwixt Turnus and Drances: in the mean time there is a sharp engagement of the horse; wherein Camilla signalizes herself; is killed: and the Latine troops are entirely defeated.

SCARCE had the rosy morning rais'd her head
Above the waves, and left her watery bed;
The pious chief whom double cares attend
For his unbury'd soldiers, and his friend:
Yet first to heaven perform'd a victor's vow:
He bar'd an ancient oak of all her boughs:
Then on a rising ground the trunk he plac'd;
Which with the spoils of his dead foe he grac'd.
The coat of arms by proud Mezentius worn,
Now on a naked flag in triumph borne,
Was hung on high; and glitter'd from afar:
A trophy sacred to the god of war.
Above his arms, fix'd on the leafless wood,
Appear'd his plummy crest, besmear'd with blood;
His brazen buckler on the left was seen;
Truncheons of shiver'd lances hung between:
And on the right was plac'd his corset, bor'd;
And to the neck was ty'd his unavailing sword.
A crowd of chiefs enclose the godlike man:
Who thus, conspicuous in the midst, began: [cefs:

Our toils, my friends, are crown'd with sure suc-
The greater part perform'd, achieve the less.
Now follow cheerful to the trembling town;
Press but an entrance, and presume it won.
Fear is no more: for fierce Mezentius lies,
As the first fruits of war, a sacrifice.
Turnus shall stand extended on the plain;
And in this omen is already slain.
Prepar'd in arms, pursue your happy chance:
That none unwarn'd, may plead his ignorance:
And I, at heaven's appointed hour, may find
Your warlike ensigns waving in the wind.
Meantime the rites and funeral pomps prepare,
Due to your dead companions of the war:
The last respect the living can bestow,
To shield their shadows from contempt below.
That conquer'd earth be theirs for which they fought; [bought.
And which for us with their own blood they
But silt the corpse of our unhappy friend,
To the sad city of Evander send:
Who not inglorious in his age's bloom
Was hurry'd hence by too severe a doom.
Thus, weeping while he spoke, he took his way,
Where, now in death, lamented Pallas lay:
Accetes watch'd the corpse; whose youth deserv'd
The father's trust; and now the son he serv'd
With equal faith, but less auspicious care:
Th' attendants of the slain his sorrow share.

A troop of Trojans mix'd with these appear,
And mourning matrons with dishevel'd hair.
Soon as the prince appears, they raise a cry;
All beat their breasts, and echoes rend the sky.
They rear his drooping forehead from the
ground;

But when Æneas view'd the grisly wound
Which Pallas in his manly bosom bore,
And the fair flesh disdain'd with purple gore:
First, melting into tears, the pious man
Deplor'd so sad a sight, then thus began:

Unhappy youth! when fortune gave the rest
Of my full wishes, she refus'd the best:
She came; but brought not thee along, to bless
My longing eyes, and share in my success:
She grudg'd thy safe return, the triumphs due
To prosperous valour, in the public view.
Not thus I promis'd, when thy father lent
Thy needles succour with a sad consent;
Embrac'd me parting for th' Etrurian land,
And sent me to possess a large command.
He warn'd, and from his own experience told,
Our foes were warlike, disciplin'd, and bold:
And now perhaps, in hopes of thy return,
Rich odours on his loaded altars burn;
While we, with vain officious pomp, prepare
To send him back his portion of the war;
A bloody breathless body: which can owe
No farther debt, but to the powers below.
The wretched father, ere his race is run,
Shall view the funeral honours of his son.
These are my triumphs of the Latian war;
Fruits of my plighted faith, and boasted care.
And yet, unhappy sire, thou shalt not see
A son, whose death disgrac'd his ancestry:
Thou shalt not blush, old man, however griev'd:
Thy Pallas no dishonest wound receiv'd.
He dy'd no death to make thee wish, too late,
Thou hadst not liv'd to see his shameful fate.
But what a champion has th' Ausonian coast,
And what a friend hast thou, Ascanius, lost!

—Thus having mourn'd, he gave the word around,
To raise the breathless body from the ground;
And chose a thousand horse, the flower of all
His warlike troops, to wait the funeral:
To bear him back, and share Evander's grief
(A well-becoming, but a weak relief).
Of oaken twigs they twist an easy bier;
Then on their shoulder the sad burden rear,

he body on this rural herse is borne,
 rewd leaves and funeral greens the bier adorn.
 If pale he lies, and looks a lovely flower,
 Few cropt by virgin hands, to dress the bower:
 Faded yet, but yet unfed below, [owe.
 No more to mother earth or the green stem shall hen two fair vests, of wondrous work and cost,
 f purple woven, and with gold embos'd, or ornament the Trojan hero brought,
 hich with her hands Sidonian Dido wrought.
 ne vest array'd the corpse, and one they spread er his clos'd eyes, and wra' d around his head:
 hat when the yellow hair in flame should fall,
 he catching fire, might burn the golden capl.
 esides the spoils of foes in battle slain,
 When he descended on the Latian plain:
 arms, trappings, horses, by the herse he led a long array (th' achievements of the dead).
 hen, pinion'd with their hands behind, appear h' unhappy captives, marching in the rear:
 ppointed offerings in the victor's name,
 o sprinkle with their blood, the funeral flame.
 nferior trophies by the chiefs are borne;
 auntlets and helms, their loaded hands adorn;
 nd fair inscriptions fix'd, and titles read
 f Latian leaders conquer'd by the dead.
 acetoes on his pupil's corpse attends,
 With feeble steps; supported by his friends:
 ausing at every pace, in sorrow drown'd,
 betwixt their arms he sinks upon the ground.
 Where groveling, while he lies in deep despair,
 He beats his breast, and rends his hoary hair.
 The champion's chariot next is seen to roll, besmear'd with hostile blood, and honourably foul.

To close the pomp, Æthon, the steed of state, s led, the funerals of his lord to wait.
 tripp'd of his trappings, with a fullen pace [face.
 He walks, and the big tears run rolling down his
 the lance of Pallas, and the crimson crest,
 Are borne behind; the victor seiz'd the rest.
 The march begins: the trumpets hoarsely found,
 The pikes and lances trail along the ground.
 Thus while the Trojan and Arcadian horse,
 To Pallantean towers direct their course,
 n long procession rank'd; the pious chief itopp'd in the rear, and gave a vent to grief.
 The public care, he said, which war attends,
 Diverts our present woes, at least suspends;
 Peace with the manes of great Pallas dwell;
 Hail holy relics, and a last farewell!
 He said no more, but inly though he mourn'd,
 Refrain'd his tears, and to the camp return'd.

Now supplicants, from Laurentum sent, demand

A truce, with olive branches in their hand.
 Obtest his clemency, and from the plain
 Beg leave to draw the bodies of their slain.
 They plead, that none those common rites deny
 To conquer'd foes, that in fair battle die.
 All cause of hate was ended in their death;
 Nor could he war with bodies void of breath.
 A king, they hop'd, would hear a king's request:
 Whose son he once was call'd, and once his guest.

Their suit, which was too just to be deny'd,
 The hero grants, and farther thus reply'd:

O Latian princes, how severe a fate
 In causeless quarrels has involv'd your state!
 And arm'd against an unoffending man,
 Who sought your friendship ere the war began!
 You beg a truce, which I would gladly give,
 Not only for the slain, but those who live.
 I came not hither but by heaven's command,
 And sent by Fate to share the Latian land.
 Nor wage I wars unjust; your king deny'd
 My proffer'd friendship, and your promis'd bride
 Lest me for Turnus; Turnus then should try
 His cause in arms, to conquer or to die.
 My right and his are in dispute: the slain
 Fell without fault, our quarrel to maintain.
 In equal arms let us alone contend;
 And let him vanquish, whom his Fates besfriend.
 This is the way, to tell him, to possess
 The royal virgin, and restore the peace.
 Bear this my message back; with ample leave
 That your slain friends may funeral-rites receive.

Thus having said, th' ambassadors amaz'd,
 Stood mute a while, and on each other gaz'd:
 Drances, their chief, who harbour'd in his breast
 Long hate to Turnus, as his foe profess'd,
 Broke silence first, and to the godlike man,
 With graceful action bowing, thus began:

Auspicious prince, in arms a mighty name,
 But yet whose actions far transcend your fame:
 Would I your justice or your force express,
 Thought can but equal; and all words are less:
 Your answer we shall thankfully relate,
 And favours granted to the Latian state:
 If wish'd success your labour shall attend,
 Think peace concluded, and the king your friend:
 Let Turnus leave the realm to your command:
 And seek alliance in some other land:
 Build you the city which your Fates assign:
 We shall be proud in the great work to join.
 Thus Drances; and his words so well persuade
 The rest empower'd, that soon a truce is made.
 Twelve days the term allow'd: and during those,
 Latians and Trojans, now no longer foes,
 Mix'd in the woods, for funeral pile prepare,
 To fell the timber, and forget the war.
 Loud axes through the groaning groves resound:
 Oak, mountain-ash, and poplar, spread the ground;
 Firs fall from high: and some the trunks receive,
 In loaden wains, with wedges some they cleave.

And now the fatal news by Fame is blown
 Through the short circuit of th' Arcadian town,
 Of Pallas slain: by Fame, which just before
 His triumphs on distended pinions bore.
 Rushing from out the gate, the people stand,
 Each with a funeral flambeau in his hand:
 Wildly they stare, distracted with amaz:
 The fields are lighten'd with a fiery blaze,
 That cast a fullen splendor on their friends
 (The marching troop which their dread prince attends).

Both parties meet: they raise a doleful cry:
 The matrons from the walls with shrieks reply:
 And their mix'd mourning rends the vaulted
 sky.

The town is fill'd with tumult and with tears,
 Till the loud clamours reach Evander's ears:
 Forgetful of his state, he runs along,
 With a disorder'd pace, and cleaves the throng:

Falls on the corpse, and groaning there he lies,
With silent grief, that speaks but at his eyes;
Short sighs and sobs succeed: till sorrow breaks
A passage, and at once he weeps and speaks.

O Pallas! thou hast fail'd thy plighted word!
To fight with caution, not to tempt the sword,
I warn'd thee, but in vain; for well I knew
What perils youthful ardour would pursue:
That boiling blood would carry thee too far;
Young as thou wert in dangers, raw to war!
O curst essay of arms, disastrous doom,
Prelude of bloody fields, and fights to come!
Hard elements of inauspicious war,
Vain vows to heaven, and unavailing care!
Thrice happy thou, dear partner of my bed,
Whose holy soul the stroke of fortune fled:
Precious of ills, and leaving me behind,
To drink the dregs of life by fate assign'd.
Beyond the goal of nature I have gone;
My Pallas late set out, but reach'd too soon.
If, from my league against th' Ausonian state,
Amid their weapons I had found my fate,
(Deserv'd from them) then I had been return'd
A breathless victor, and my son had mourn'd.
Yet will not I my Trojan friend upbraid,
Nor grudge th' alliance I so gladly made.
'Tis not his fault my Pallas fell so young,
But my own crime for having liv'd too long.
Yet, since the gods had destin'd him to die,
At least he led the way to victory:
First for his friends he won the fatal shore,
And sent whole herds of slaughter'd foes before:

A death too great, too glorious to deplore.
Nor will I add new honours to thy grave;
Content with those the Trojan hero gave.
That funeral pomp thy Phrygian friends design'd;
In which the Tuscan chiefs and army join'd:
Great spoils, and trophies gain'd by thee, they
bear:

Then let thy own achievements be thy share.
Ev'n thou, O Turnus, hadst a trophy stood,
Whose mighty trunk had better grac'd the wood.
If Pallas had arriv'd, with equal length
Of years, to match thy bulk with equal strength.
But why, unhappy man, dost thou detain
These troops to view the tears thou shed'st in vain!
Go, friends, this message to your lord relate;
Tell him, that if I bear my bitter fate,
And after Pallas' death, live lingering on,
'Tis to behold his vengeance for my son.
I stay for Turnus; whose devoted head
Is owing to the living and the dead:
My son and I expect it from his hand;
'Tis all that he can give, or we demand.

Joy is no more: but I would gladly go,
To greet my Pallas with such news below.
The morn had now dispell'd the shades of night;
Restoring toils, when the restor'd the light:
The Trojan king, and Tuscan chief, command
To raise the piles along the winding strand:
Their friends convey the dead to funeral fires;
Black smouldering smoke from the green wood expires; [retires.]

The light of heaven is chok'd, and the new day
Then thrice around the kindled piles they go
(For ancient custom had ordain'd it so).

Thrice horse and foot about the fires are led,
And thrice with loud laments they hail the dead Tears trickling down their breasts bedew the
ground;

And drums and trumpets mix their mournful sound
Amid the blaze, their pious brethren throw
The spoils, in battle taken from the foe;
Helms, bits embos'd, and swords of flaming steel
One casts a target, one a chariot-wheel:
Some to their fellows their own arms restore:
The fauchions which in luckless fight they bore:
Their bucklers pierc'd, their darts bestow'd in vain
And shiver'd lances gather'd from the plain,
Whole herds of offer'd bulls about the fire,
And bristled boars, and woolly sheep expire.
Around the piles a careful troop attends,
To watch the wasting flames, and weep their burning friends.

Lingering along the shore, till dewy night
New decks the face of heaven with starry light.

The conquer'd Latians, with like pious care,
Piles without number for their dead prepare;
Part, in the places where they fell, are laid;
And part are to the neighbouring fields convey'd.
The corpse of kings, and captains of renown,
Borne off in state, are bury'd in the town:
The rest unhonour'd, and without a name,
Are cast a common heap to feed the flame.
Trojans and Latians vie with like desires
To make the field of battle shine with fires;
And the promiscuous blaze to heaven aspires.

Now had the morning thrice renew'd the light,
And thrice dispell'd the shadows of the night;
When those who round the wasted fires remain,
Perform the last sad office to the slain:
They rake the yet warm ashes from below;
These, and the bones unburn'd, in earth bestow:
These relics with their country rites they grace;
And raise a mound of turf to mark the place.

But in the palace of the king appears
A scene more solemn, and a pomp of tears.
Maids, matrons, widows, mix their common moans:

Orphans their fires, and sires lament their sons.
All in that universal sorrow share,
And curse the cause of this unhappy war.
A broken league, a bride unjustly fought,
A crown usurp'd, which with their blood is bought!
These are the crimes, with which they load the
name

Of Turnus, and on him alone exclaim.
Let him, who lords it o'er th' Ausonian land,
Engage the Trojan hero hand to hand:
His is the gain, our lot is but to serve:
'Tis just, the sway he seeks, he should deserve.
This Drances aggravates; and adds, with spight,
His foe expects, and dares him to the fight.
Nor Turnus wants a party, to support
His cause and credit, in the Latian court.
His former acts secure his present fame;
And the queen shades him with her mighty name.

While thus their factious minds with fury burn;
The legates from th' Aetolian prince return:
Sad news they bring, that, after all the cost,
And care employ'd, their embassy is lost:
That Diomed refus'd his aid in war;
Unmov'd with presents, and as deaf to prayer.

Some new alliance must elsewhere be fought;
Or peace with Troy on hard conditions bought.

Latinus, sunk in sorrow, finds too late
A foreign son is pointed out by fate:
And till Æneas shall Lavinia wed,
The wrath of heaven is hovering o'er his head.
The gods, he saw, espous'd the juster side,
When late their titles in the field were try'd:
Witness the fresh laments, and funeral tears un-dry'd.

Thus, full of anxious thought, he summons all
The Latian senate to the council-hall:
The princes come, commanded by their head,
And crowd the paths that to the palace lead.
Supreme in power, and reverenc'd for his years,
He takes the throne, and in the midst appears:
Majestically sad, he sits in state,
And bids his envoys their success relate.

When Venulus began, the murmuring sound
Was hush'd, and sacred silence reign'd around.
We have, said he, perform'd your high command:
And pass'd with peril a long tract of land:
We reach'd the place desir'd, with wonder fill'd,
The Grecian tents and rising towers beheld.
Great Diomede has compass'd round with walls
The city, which Argypia he calls;
From his own Argos nam'd; we touch'd, with joy,
The royal hand that raz'd unhappy Troy.
When introucd, our presents first we bring,
Then crave an instant audience from the king:
His leave obtain'd, our native soil we name;
And tell th' important cause for which we came.
Attentively he heard us, while we spoke;
Then, with soft accents, and a pleasing look,
Made this return: Ausonian race, of old
Renown'd for peace, and for an age of gold,
What madness has your alter'd minds possess'd,
To change for war hereditary rest?
Solicit arms unknown, and tempt the sword
(A needless ill your ancestors abhor'd).
We (for myself I speak, and all the name
Of Grecians, who to Troy's destruction came)
Omitting those who were in battle slain,
Or borne by rolling Simois to the main:
Not one but suffer'd, and too dearly bought
The prize of honour which in arms he fought,
Some doom'd to death, and some in exile driv'n,
Cut-casts, abandon'd by the care of heaven:
So worn, so wretched, so despis'd a crew,
As ev'n old Priam might with pity view.
Witness the vessels by Minerva to's'd
In storms, the vengeful Capharean coast;
Th' Eubæan rocks, the prince, whose brother
Our armies to revenge his injur'd bed, [led
In Egypt lost; Ulysses, with his men,
Have seen Charybdis, and the Cyclops den:
Why should I name Idomeneus, in vain,
Restor'd to sceptres, and expell'd again?
Or young Achilles, by his rival slain?
Ev'n he, the king of men, the foremost name
Of all the Greeks, and most renown'd by fame,
The proud revenger of another's wife,
Yet by his own adulterers lost his life:
Fell at his threshold, and the spoils of Troy
The foul polluters of his bed enjoy.
The gods have envy'd me the sweets of life,
My much lov'd country, and my more lov'd wife:

Banish'd from both, I mourn; while in the sky,

Transform'd to birds, my lost companions fly:
Hovering about the coasts they make their moan;
And cuff the cliffs with pinions not their own.
What squalid spectres, in the dead of night,
Break my short sleep, and skim before my sight:
I might have promis'd to myself those harms,
Mad as I was, when I with mortal arms
Presum'd against immortal powers to move,
And violate with wounds the queen of love.
Such arms this hand shall never more employ;
No hate remains with me to ruin'd Troy.
I war not with its dust; nor am I glad
To think of past events, or good or bad.
Your presents I return: what'er you bring
To buy my friendship, send the Trojan king.
We met in fight, I know him to my cost;
With what a whirling force his lance he to's'd:
Heavens! what a spring was in his arm, to throw!
How high he held his shield, and rose at every
blow!

Had Troy produc'd two more, his match in might,
They would have chang'd the fortune of the
fight:

Th' invasion of the Greeks had been return'd:
Our empire waded, and our cities burn'd.
The long defence the Trojan people made,
The war protracted, and the siege delay'd,
Were due to Hector's and this hero's hand;
Both brave alike, and equal in command:
Æneas not inferior in the field,
In pious reverence to the gods excell'd.
Make peace, ye Latians, and avoid with care
Th' impending dangers of a fatal war.
He said no more: but, with this cold excuse,
Refus'd th' alliance, and advis'd a truce.

Thus Venulus concluded his report:
A jarring murmur fill'd the factious court:
As when a torrent rolls with rapid force,
And dashes o'er the stones that stop the course;
The flood, constrain'd within a scanty space,
Roars horrible along th' uneasy race:
White foam in gathering eddies floats around:
The rocky shores rebellow to the found.

The murmur ceas'd: then from his lofty throne
The king invok'd the gods, and thus began:
I wish, ye Latins, what we now debate
Had been resolv'd before it was too late:
Much better had it been for you and me,
Unforc'd by this our last necessity,
To have been earlier wise; than now to call
A council, when the foe surrounds the wall.
O citizens! we wage unequal war,
With men, not only heaven's peculiar care,
But heaven's own race: unconquer'd in the field,
Or, conquer'd, yet unknowing how to yield.
What hopes you had in Diomede, lay down:
Our hopes must centre on ourselves alone.
Yet those how feeble, and, indeed, how vain,
You see too well; nor need my words explain.
Vanquish'd without resource; laid flat by fate,
Factions within, a foe without the gate;
Not but I grant, that all perform'd their parts,
With manly force, and with undaunted hearts:
With our united strength the war we wag'd;
With equal numbers, equal arms, engag'd:

You see th' event—Now hear what I propose,
To save our friends, and satisfy our foes:
A tract of land the Latins have possess'd
Along the Tiber, stretching to the west,
Which now Rutulians and Auruncans till:
And their mix'd cattle graze the fruitful hill;
Those mountains fill'd with firs, that lower land,
If you consent, the Trojan shall command;
Call'd into part of what is ours; and there,
On terms agreed, the common country share.
There let them build, and settle, if they please;
Unless they choose once more to cross the seas,
In search of seats remote of Italy;
And from unwelcome inmates let us free.
Then twice ten galleys let us build with speed,
Or twice as many more, if more they need;
Materials are at hand: a well-grown wood
Runs equal with the margin of the flood:
Let them the number, and the form assign;
The care and cost of all the stores be mine.
To treat the peace, a hundred senators
Shall be commission'd hence with ample powers;
With olive crown'd: the presents they shall
bear,

A purple robe, a royal ivory chair; } [wear;
And all the marks of sway that Latian monarchs }
And fums of gold. Among yourselves debate }
This great affair, and save the sinking state.

Then Drances took the word; who grudg'd long since,

The rising glories of the Daunian prince.
Factious and rich, bold at the council-board,
But cautious in the field, he shun'd the sword; }
A close cavalier, and tongue-valiant lord. }
Noble his mother was, and near the throne,
But what his father's parentage, unknown,
He rose, and took th' advantage of the times,
To load young Turnus with invidious crimes.

Such truths, O king! said he, your words contain,

As strike the sense, and all replies are vain:
Nor are your loyal subjects now to seek
What common needs require; but fear to speak.
Let him give leave of speech, that haughty man,
Whose pride this inauspicious war began:
For whose ambition (let me dare to say,
Fear set a part, though death is in my way)
The plains of Latium run with blood around;
So many valiant heroes bite the ground:
Dejected grief in every face appears;
A town in mourning, and a land in tears.
While he, th' undoubted author of our harms,
The man who menaces the gods with arms,
Yet, after all his boasts, forsook the fight,
And found his safety in ignoble flight.

Now, best of kings, since you propose to send
Such bounteous presents to your Trojan friend;
Add yet a greater at our joint request,
One which he values more than all the rest;
Give him the fair Lavinia for his bride:
With that alliance let the league be ty'd;
And for the bleeding land a lasting peace provide.

Let infolence no longer awe the throne,
But with a father's right bestow your own.
For this maligner of the general good,
If still we fear his force, he must be woo'd:

His haughty godhead we with prayers implore,
Your sceptre to release, and our just rights restore.

O cursed cause of all our ills, must we
Wage wars unjust, and fall in fight for thee!
What right hast thou to rule the Latian state,
And send us out to meet our certain fate?
'Tis a destructive war: from Turnus' hand
Our peace and public safety we demand.
Let the fair bride to the brave chief remain;
If not, the peace without the pledge is vain.
Turnus, I know, you think me not your friend,
Nor will I much with your belief contend:
I beg your greatness not to give the law
In other realms, but, beaten, to withdraw.
Pity your own, or pity our estate;
Nor twit our fortunes with your sinking fate.
Your interest is, the war should never cease;
But we have felt enough, to wish the peace:
A land exhausted to the last remains,
Depopulated towns, and driven plains:
Yes, if desire of fame, and thirst of power,
A beauteous prince's, with a crown in dower,
So fire your mind, in arms assert your right;
And meet your foe, who dares you to the fight.
Mankind, it seems, is made for you alone;
We, but the slaves who mount you to the throne:
A base ignoble crowd, without a name:
Unwept, unworthy of the funeral flame:
By duty bound to forfeit each his life,
That Turnus may possess a royal wife.
Permit not, mighty man, so mean a crew Should share such triumphs; and detain from you

The post of honour, your undoubted due:
Rather alone your matchless force employ;
To merit, what alone you must enjoy.

These words, so full of malice, mix'd with art,
Inflam'd with rage the youthful hero's heart.
Then, groaning from the bottom of his breast,
He heav'd for wind, and thus his wrath express'd.
You, Drances, never want a stream of words,
Then, when the public need requires our swords,
First in the council-hall to steer the state;
And ever foremost in a tongue debate.
While our strong walls secure us from the foe,
Ere yet with blood our ditches overflow:
But let the potent orator declaim,
And with the brand of coward blot my name;
Free leave is given him, when his fatal hand
Has cover'd with more corpse the sanguine
strand;

And high as mine his towering trophies stand.
If any doubt remains who dares the moft,
Let us decide it at the Trojans' cost:
And issue both a-breast, where honour calls;
Foes are not far to seek without the walls.
Unless his noisy tongue can only fight:
And feet were given him but to speed his flight.
I beaten from the field! I forc'd away!
Who, but so known a dastard, dares to say?
Had he but ev'n beheld the fight, his eyes
Had witness'd for me what his tongue denies:
What heaps of Trojans by this hand were slain,
And how the bloody Tiber swell'd the main.
All saw, but he, th' Arcadian troops retire,
In scatter'd squadrons, and their prince expire,

he giant brothers, in their camp, have found,
 was not forc'd with ease to quit my ground.
 Of such the Trojans try'd me, when, enclos'd,
 singly their united arms oppos'd:
 First forc'd an entrance thro' their thick array;
 then, glutted with their slaughter, freed my way.
 'Tis a destructive war! So let it be,
 ut to the Phrygian pirate and to thee.
 I can proceed to fill the people's ears
 With false reports, their minds with panic fears:
 I'll show the strength of a twice-conquer'd race,
 How our foes encourage, and our friends debafe.
 I'll believ' thy fables, and the Trojan town
 Triumphant stands, the Grecians o'erthrown:
 I'll applaud at Hector's feet Achilles lies;
 and Diomed from fierce Æneas flies.
 I'll say rapid Ausidus with awful dread,
 runs backward from the sea, and hides his head,
 When the great Trojan on his bank appears:
 or that's as true as thy dissembled fears
 Of my revenge: dismiss that vanity,
 Thou, Drances, art below a death from me.
 Let that vile soul in that vile body rest:
 The lodging is well worthy of the guest.
 Now, royal father, to the present state
 Of our affairs, and of this high debate;
 If in your arms thus early you decide,
 and think your fortune is already try'd;
 If one defeat has brought us down so low;
 as never more in fields to meet the foe;
 When I conclude for peace: 'tis time to treat,
 and lie like vassals at the victor's feet.
 But oh, if any ancient blood remains,
 One drop of all our fathers in our veins:
 That man would I prefer before the rest,
 Who dar'd his death with an undaunted breast:
 Who comely fell by no dishonest wound,
 To shun that sight; and dying gnaw'd the ground.
 But, if we still have fresh recruits in store,
 our confederates can afford us more;
 If the contended field we bravely fought:
 And not a bloodless victory was bought:
 Their losses equal'd ours; and for their slain,
 With equal fires they fill'd the shining plain;
 Why thus unforc'd should we so tamely yield;
 And, ere the trumpet sounds, resign the field?
 Good unexpected, evils unforeseen
 Appear by turns, as Fortune shifts the scene:
 Some rais'd aloft, come tumbling down again:
 Then fall so hard, they bound and rise again.
 If Diomed refuse his aid to lend,
 The great Mifapus yet remains our friend:
 Columnius, who foretells events, is ours:
 Th' Italian chiefs, and princes, join their powers:
 Nor least in number, nor in name the last,
 Your own brave subjects have our cause embrac'd.
 Above the rest, the Volscian Amazon
 Contains an army in herself alone:
 And heads a squadron, terrible to fight
 With glittering shields, in brazen armour bright.
 Yet if the foe a single fight demand,
 And I alone the public peace withstand;
 If you consent, he shall not be refus'd,
 Nor find a hand to victory unus'd.
 This new Achilles let him take the field,
 With fated armour, and Vulcanian shield;

For you, my royal father, and my fame,
 I, Turnus, not the least of all my name,
 Devote my soul. He calls me hand to hand
 And I alone will answer his demand.
 Drances shall rest secure, and neither share
 The danger, nor divide the prize of war.
 While they debate; nor these nor those will Æneas draws his forces to the field; [yield;
 And moves his camp. The scouts with flying speed
 Return, and through the frighted city spread
 Th' unpleasing news, the Trojans are deserv'd
 In battle marching by the river's side;
 And bending to the town. They take th' alarm,
 Some tremble, some are bold, all in confusion arm.
 Th' impetuous youth press forward to the field;
 They clash the sword, and clatter on the shield;
 The fearful matrons raise a screaming cry;
 Old feeble men with fainter groans reply;
 A jarring sound results and mingles in the sky,
 Like that of swans remurmuring to the floods,
 Or birds of differing kinds in hollow woods,
 Turnus th' occasion takes, and cries aloud,
 Talk on, ye quaint barrangers of the crowd;
 Declaim in praise of peace, when danger calls;
 And the fierce foes in arms approach the walls.
 He said, and, turning short, with speedy pace,
 Casts back a scornful glance, and quits the place.
 Thou, Volusus, the Volscian troops command
 To mount; and lead thyself our Ardean band.
 Messapus, and Catillus, post your force
 Along the fields, and charge the Trojan horse.
 Some guard the passes, others man the wall;
 Drawn up in arms, the rest attend my call.
 They swarm from ev'ry quarter of the town;
 And with disorder'd haste the rampires crown.
 Good old Latinus, when he saw, too late,
 The gathering storm, just breaking on the state,
 Dismiss'd the council, till a sifter time,
 And own'd his easy temper as his crime;
 Who, forc'd against his reason, had comply'd
 To break the treaty for the promis'd bride.
 Some help to sink new trenches, others aid
 To ram the stones or raise the paliade. [walls
 Hoarse trumpets sound th' alarm: around the Ruins a distracted crowd, whom their last labour calls.
 A sad procession, in the streets is seen,
 Of matrons that attend the mother-queen:
 High in her chair she sits, and at her side,
 With down-cast eyes, appears the fatal bride.
 They mount the cliff, where Pallas' temple stands; Prayers in their mouths, and presents in their
 hands;
 With censers, first they fume the sacred shrine;
 Then in this common supplication join:
 O patroness of arms, unpotted maid,
 Propitious hear, and lend thy Latins aid:
 Break short the pirate's lance; pronounce his fate,
 And lay the Phrygian low before the gate.
 Now Turnus arms for fight: his back and
 breast,
 Well-temper'd steel and scaly brass invest:
 The cushions, which his brawny thighs infold,
 Are mingled metal damask'd o'er with gold.
 His faithful fauchion fits upon his side;
 Nor casque, nor crest, his manly features hide:

But bare to view amid surrounding friends,
With godlike grace, he from the tower descends.
Exulting in his strength, he seems to dare
His absent rival and to promise war.

Freud from his keepers, thus, with broken reins,
The wanton courser prances o'er the plains:
Or in the pride of youth o'erleaps the mounds:
And snuffs the females in forbidden grounds.
Or seeks his watering in the well-known flood,
To quench his thirst, and cool his fiery blood:
He swims luxuriant in the liquid plain,
And o'er his shoulder flows his waving mane:
He neighs, he snorts, he bears his head on high;
Before his ample chest the frothy waters fly.

Soon as the prince appears without the gate,
The Volscians, and their virgin-leader, wait
His last commands. Then, with a graceful mien,
Lights from her lofty steed the warrior queen:
Her squadron imitates, and each descends;
Whose common suit Camilla thus commends:
If sense of honour, if a soul secure
Of inborn worth, that can all tests endure,
Can promise aught; or on itself rely,
Greatly to dare, to conquer, or to die:
Then, I alone, sustain'd by these, will meet
The Tyrrhene troops, and promise their defeat.
Ours be the danger, ours the sole renown;
You, general, stay behind, and guard the town.
Turnus a while stood mute, with glad surprise,
And on the fierce virago fix'd his eyes:
Then thus return'd: O grace of Italy,
With what becoming thanks can I reply!
Not only words lie labouring in my breast;
But thought itself is by thy praise oppress;
Yet rob me not of all, but let me join
My toils, my hazard, and my fame, with thine.
The Trojan (not in stratagem unskill'd)
Sends his light horse before, to scour the field:
Himself, through steep ascents and thorny brakes,
A larger compass to the city takes.

This news my scouts confirm: and I prepare
To foil his cunning, and his force to dare:
With chosen foot his passage to forelay:
And place an ambush in the winding way.
Thou, with thy Volscians, face the Tuscan horse:
The brave Messapus shall thy troops enforce;
With those of Tibur; and the Latian band:
Subjected all to thy supreme command.

This said, he warns Messapus to the war:
Then every chief exhorts, with equal care.
All thus encourag'd, his own troops he joins,
And hastes to prosecute his deep designs.
Enclos'd with hills, the winding valley lies,
By nature form'd for fraud, and fitted for surprise;
A narrow track, by human steps untrod,
Leads, through perplexing thorns, to this obscure abode.

High o'er the vale a steepy mountain stands:
Whence the surveying sight the nether ground
The top is level: an offensive seat [commands.
Of war; and from the war a safe retreat.
For, on the right and left, is room to press
The foes at hand, or from afar distress:
To drive them headlong downward; and to pour,
On their descending backs, a stony shower.
Thither young Turnus took the well-known way;
Possess'd the pass, and in blind ambush lay.

Meantime, Latonian Phœbe, from the skies,
Beheld th' approaching war with hateful eyes,
And call'd the lightfoot Opis to her aid,
Her most belov'd, and ever-trusty maid.
Then with a sigh began: Camilla goes
To meet her death, amidst her fatal foes.
The nymph I lov'd of all my mortal train;
Invested with Diana's arms, in vain.
Nor is my kindness for the virgin, new,
'Twas born with her, and with her years it grew
Her father Metabus, when forc'd away
From old Privernum, for tyrannic sway,
Snatch'd up, and sav'd from his prevailing foes,
This tender babe, companion of his woes.
Casmilla, was her mother; but he drown'd
One hissing letter in a softer sound,
And call'd Camilla. Through the woods he flies
Wrapt in his robe the royal infant lies.
His foes in sight, he mends his weary pace;
With shouts and clamours they pursue the chase
The banks of Amasene at length he gains;
The raging flood his farther flight restrains:
Rais'd o'er the borders, with unusual rains.
Prepar'd to plunge into the stream, he fears:
Not for himself, but for the charge he bears.
Anxious he stops awhile; and thinks in haste;
Then, desperate in distress, resolves at last.
A knotty lance of well-boil'd oak he bore;
The middle part with cork he cover'd o'er:
He clos'd the child within the hollow space:
With twigs of bending osier bound the case.
Then pois'd the spear, heavy with human weight
And thus invoc'd my favour for the freight:
Accept, great goddesses of the woods, he said,
Sent by her fire, this dedicated maid:
Through air she flies a suppliant to thy shrine
And the first weapons that she knows, are thine.
He said; and with full force the spear he threw;
Above the sounding waves Camilla flew.
Then, press'd by foes, he stemm'd the stormy tide
And gain'd by strefs of arms, the farther side.
His fasten'd spear he pull'd from out the ground;
And, victor of his vows, his infant nymph unbound
Nor after that, in towns which walls enclose,
Would trust his hunted life amidst his foes.
But rough, in open air he chose to lie:
Earth was his couch, his covering was the sky.
On hills unshorn, or in a desert den,
He shunn'd the dire society of men.
A shepherd's solitary life he led:
His daughter with the milk of mares he fed;
The dugs of bears, and every savage beast,
He drew, and through her lip the liquor press'd.
The little Amazon could scarcely go,
He loads her with a quiver and a bow:
And, that the might her staggering steps command,

He with a slender javelin fills her hand:
Her flowing hair no golden fillet bound;
Nor swept her trailing robe the dusty ground.
Instead of these, a tiger's hide o'erspread
Her back and shoulders, fasten'd to her head.
The flying dart she first attempts to sling;
And round her tender temples toss'd the sling:
Then, as her strength with years increas'd, began
To pierce aloft in air the soaring swan; [crane
And from the clouds to fetch the heron and the

The Tuscan matrons with each other vy'd,
 Bless their rival sons with such a bride:
 At the disdain their love; to share with me
 The sylvan shades, and vow'd virginity.
 And oh! I wish, contented with my cares
 Of savage spoils, she had not fought the wars:
 Men had the been of my celestial train;
 And shunn'd the fate that dooms her to be slain.
 At since, opposing heaven's decree, she goes
 To find her death among forbidden foes;
 Afte with these arms, and take thy steepy flight,
 Where, with the gods adverse, the Latins fight:
 His bow to thee, this quiver, I bequeath;
 His chosen arrow to revenge her death:
 By whate'er hand Camilla shall be slain,
 Or of the Trojan, or Italian train,
 Let him not pass unpunish'd from the plain.
 When, in a hollow cloud, myself will aid,
 Or bear the breathless body of my maid:
 Unspoil'd shall be her arms, and unprofan'd
 Her holy limbs with any human hand:
 And in a marble tomb laid in her native land.
 She said: the faithful nymph descends from high
 With rapid flight, and cuts the sounding sky:
 Lack clouds and stormy winds around her body
 fly.

By this, the Trojan and the Tuscan horse,
 Drawn up in squadrons, with united force,
 Approach the walls; the sprightly coursers bound;
 Press forward on their bits, and shift their
 ground:

Shields, arms, and spears, flash horribly from far;
 And the fields glitter with a waving war.
 Oppos'd to these, come on with furious force
 Iffapus, Coras, and the Latian horse;
 These in a body plac'd; on either hand
 ustain'd, and clos'd by fair Camilla's band.
 Advancing in a line, they couch their spears;
 And less and less the middle space appears.
 Thick smoke obscures the field: and scarce are seen

The neighing coursers, and the shouting men.
 In distance of their darts they stop their course;
 Then man to man they rush, and horse to horse.
 The face of heaven their flying javelins hide:
 And deaths unseen are dealt on either side.

Gyrrenus, and Aconteus, void of fear,
 By mettled coursers borne in full career,
 Meet first oppos'd: and, with a mighty shock,
 Their horses heads against each other knock.
 Far from his steed is fierce Aconteus cast;
 As with an engine's force, or lightning's blast:
 He rolls along in blood, and breathes his last.
 The Latin squadrons take a sudden fright;
 And sling their shields behind, to save their backs in flight.

Spurring at speed to their own walls they drew;
 Close in the rear the Tuscan troops pursue,
 And urge their flight; Aylas leads the chase;
 Till seiz'd with shame they wheel about, and face:
 Receive their foes, and raise a threatening cry.
 The Tuscans take their turn to fear and fly.

So swelling furges, with a thundering roar,
 Driven on each other's backs, insult the shore;
 Bound o'er the rocks, encroach upon the land;
 And far upon the beach eject the sand.

Then backward, with a swing, they take their way; [ther-sea:
 Repuls'd from upper ground, and seek their mo-
 With equal hurry quit th' invaded shore;
 And swallow back the sand and stones they spew'd before.

Twice were the Tuscans masters of the field,
 Twice by the Latins, in their turn, repell'd.
 Aham'd at length, to the third charge they ran,
 Both hosts resolv'd, and mingled man to man:
 Now dying groans are heard, the fields are strow'd
 With falling bodies, and are drunk with blood:
 Arms, horses, men, on heaps together lie:
 Confus'd the fight, and more confus'd the cry.
 Orsilochus, who durst not press too near
 Strong Remulus, at distance drove his spear;
 And stuck the steel beneath his horse's ear.
 The fiery steed, impatient of the wound,
 Curvets, and, springing upward with a bound,
 His hopeless lord cast backward on the ground.
 Catillus pierc'd Iolas first: then drew
 His reeking lance, and at Herminius threw:
 The mighty champion of the Tuscan crew.
 His neck and throat unarm'd, his head was bare,
 But shaded with a length of yellow hair:
 Secure, he fought, expos'd on every part,
 A spacious mark for swords, and for the flying dart:
 Across the shoulders came the feather'd wound;
 Transfix'd, he fell, and doubled to the ground.

The sands with streaming blood are sanguine dy'd;

And death with honour fought on either side.
 Restless, through the war, Camilla rode;
 In danger unappall'd, and pleas'd with blood.
 One side was bare for her exerted breast:
 One shoulder with her painted quiver press'd.
 Now from afar her fatal javelins play;
 Now with her axe's edge she hews her way;
 Diana's arms upon her shoulder found;
 And when, too closely sent, she quits the ground,
 From her bent bow she sends a backward wound.
 Her maids, in martial pomp, on either side,
 Larina, Tulla, fierce Tarpeia ride;
 Italians all: in peace, their queen's delight:
 In war, the bold companions of the fight.

So march'd the Thracian Amazons of old,
 When Thermodon with bloody billows roll'd;
 Such troops as these in shining arms were seen,
 When Theseus met in fight their maiden queen.
 Such to the field Penthesilea led,
 From the fierce virgin when the Grecians fled:
 With such, return'd triumphant from the war;
 Her maids with cries attend the lofty car:
 They clasp with manly force their moony shields:
 With female-shouts resound the Phrygian fields.

Who foremost, and who last, heroic maid,
 On the cold earth were by thy courage laid?
 Thy spear, of mountain-ash, Eumenius first,
 With fury driven, from side to side transpierc'd;
 A purple stream came spouting from the wound;
 Bath'd in his blood he lies, and bites the ground.
 Lyrus and Pegasus at once she slew;
 The former, as the slacken'd reins he drew,
 Of his faint steed: the latter, as he stretch'd
 His arm to prop his friend, the javelin reach'd,
 By the same weapon, sent from the same hand,
 Both fall together, and both spurn the sand.

Amastrus next is added to the slain :
 The rest in rout she follows o'er the plain :
 Tereus, Harpalicus, Demophoon,
 And Chromys, at full speed her fury shun.
 Of all her deadly darts, not one she loſt ;
 Each was attended with a Trojan gholt.
 Young Ornithus beſtrode a hunter ſteed,
 Swift for the chafe, and of Apulian breed :
 Him, from afar, ſhe ſpy'd in arms unknown ;
 O'er his broad back an ox's hide was thrown ;
 His helm a wolf, whoſe gaping jaws were ſpread
 A covering for his cheeks, and grinn'd around his head.

He clench'd within his hand an iron prong :
 And tower'd above the reſt, conspicuous in the throng.

Him ſoon ſhe ſingled from the flying train,
 And flew with eaſe : then thus inſults the ſlain.
 Vain hunter, didſt thou think through woods to chafe

The ſavage herd, a vile and trembling race ?
 Here ceaſe thy vaunts, and own my victory ;
 A woman-warrior was too ſtrong for thee.

Yet if the gholtſ demand the conqueror's name,
 Confeſſing great Camilla, ſave thy ſhame.

Then Butes and Orſilochus ſhe ſlew,
 The bulkielt bodies of the Trojan crew.

But Butes breaſt to breaſt : the ſpear deſcends
 Above the gorget, where his helmet ends,
 And o'er the ſhield which his left ſide defends. }
 Orſilochus, and ſhe, their courſes ply,
 He ſeems to follow, and ſhe ſeems to fly.

But in a narrower ring ſhe makes the race :
 And then he flies, and ſhe purſues the chafe.

Gathering at length on her deluded foe,
 She ſwings her axe, and riſes at the blow :

Full on the helm behind, with ſuch a ſway
 The weapon falls, the riven ſteel gives way :

He groans, he roars, he ſues in vain for grace ;
 Brains, mingled with his blood, beſmear his face.

Aſtoniſh'd Aunus juſt arrives by chance,
 To ſee his fall, nor farther dares advance :

But fixing on the horrid maid his eye,
 He ſtares, and ſhakes, and finds it vain to fly.

Yet like a true Ligurian, born to cheat,
 (At leaſt while fortune favour'd his deceit)

Cries out aloud, What courage have you ſhown,
 Who truſt your courſer's ſtrength, and not your

Forego the 'vantage of your horſe, alight, [own ?
 And then on equal terms begin the fight :

It ſhall be ſeen, weak woman, what you can,
 When, foot to foot, you combat with a man.

He ſaid : ſhe glows with anger and didain,
 Diſmounts with ſpeed to dare him on the plain :

And leaves her horſe at large among her train.
 With her drawn ſword deſes him to the field :

And, marching, liſts aloſt her maiden ſhield :
 The youth, who thought his cunning did ſucceed,

Reins round his horſe, and urges all his ſpeed,
 Adds the remembrance of the ſpur, and hides

The goring rowels in his bleeding ſides.
 Vain fool, and coward, ſaid the lofty maid,

Caught in the train, which thou thyſelf haſt laid !
 On others praſtife thy Ligurian arts ;

Thin ſtratagems, and tricks of little hearts,
 Are loſt on me. Nor ſhalt thou ſafe retire,

With vaunting lies to thy fallacious fire.

At this, ſo faſt her flying feet ſhe ſped,
 That ſoon ſhe ſtrain'd beyond his horſe's head :
 Then turning ſhort, at once ſhe ſeiz'd the rein,
 And laid the boafter groveling on the plain.
 Not with more eaſe the falcon from above
 Truſſes, in middle air, the trembling dove :
 Then plumes the prey, in her ſtrong pounces bound
 The feathers foul with blood came tumbling to the ground.

Nor mighty Jove, from his ſuperior height,
 With his broad eye ſurveyſ th' unequal fight.
 He fires the breaſt of Tarchon with diſdain
 And ſends him to redeem th' abandon'd plain.
 Between the broken ranks the Tuſcan rides,
 And theſe encourages, and thoſe he chides :
 Recalls each leader, by his name, from flight ;
 Renews their ardour, and reſtores the fight.
 What panic fear has ſeiz'd your ſouls ? O ſhame,
 O brand perpetual of th' Etrurian name !
 Cowards, incurable ! a woman's hand
 Drives, breaks, and ſcatters, your ignoble band !
 Now caſt away the ſword, and quit the field :
 What uſe of weapons which you dare not wield ?
 Not thus you fly your female foes by night,
 Nor ſhun the ſeaſt, when the full bowls invite :
 When to fat offerings the glad augur calls,
 And the ſhrill horn-pipe ſounds to bacchanals.
 Theſe are your ſtudy'd cares ; your lewd delight ;
 Swift in debauch ; but ſlow to manly fight.

Thus having ſaid ; he ſpurs amid the foes,
 Not managing the life he meant to loſe.

The firſt he found he ſeiz'd, with headlong haſte,
 In his ſtrong gripe : and clasp'd around the waſte :

'Twas Venus ; whom from his horſe he tore,
 And (laid athwart his own) in triumph bore.

Loud ſhouts enſue : the Latins turn their eyes,
 And view th' unuſual fight with vaſt ſurpriſe.

The fiery Tarchon, flying o'er the plains,
 Preſs'd in his arms the ponderous prey ſuſtains :

Then, with his ſhorten'd ſpear, explores around
 His jointed arms, to fix a deadly wound.

Nor leſs the captive ſtruggles for his life :
 He writhes his body to prolong the ſtrife :

And, fencing for his naked throat, exerts
 His utmoſt vigour, and the point averts.

So ſtoops the yellow eagle from on high,
 And bears a ſpeckled ſerpent through the ſky ;

Faſtning his crooked talons on the prey,
 The priſoner hiſſes through the liquid way :

Reſiſts the royal hawk, and though oppreſt,
 She fights in volumes, and erects her creſt ;

Turn'd to her foe, ſhe ſtiſſens every ſcale,
 And ſhoots her forky tongue, and whisks her threatening tail.

Againſt the victor all defence is weak ;
 Th' imperial bird ſtill plies her with his beak :

He tears her bowels, and her breaſt he goes ;
 Then claps his pinions, and ſecurely ſoars.

Thus, through the miſt of circling enemies,
 Strong Tarchon ſnatch'd, and bore away his prize :

The Tyrrhene troops, that ſtrunk before, now
 preſs

The Latins, and preſume the like ſucces.

Then Aruns, doom'd to death, his arts eſſay'd
 To murder, unſpy'd, the Volſcan maid :

This way and that his winding courſe he bends,
 And, whereſoe'er ſhe turns, her ſteps attends.

Then she retires victorious from the chase,
 e wheels about with care, and shifts his place :
 hen, rushing on, she keeps her foes in sight,
 e keeps aloof, but keeps her still in sight :
 e threatens, and trembles, trying every way
 nseen to kill, and safely to betray.

Chlorens, the priest of Cybelè, from far,
 littering in Phrygian arms amidst the war,
 /as by the virgin view'd : the steed he press'd
 /as proud with trappings, and his brawny chest
 /ith scales of gilded bras was cover'd o'er, robe of Tyrian dye the rider wore.

With deadly wounds he gaul'd the distant foe ;
 nossian his shafts, and Lycian was his bow :
 golden helm his front and head surrounds,
 gilded quiver from his shoulder sounds.

old, weav'd with linen, on his thighs he wore,
 With flowers of needle-work distinguish'd o'er,
 With golden buckles bound, and gather'd up before.

im, the fierce maid beheld, with ardent eyes ;
 ond and ambitious of so rich a prize :

r that the temple might his trophies hold,
 r else to shine herself in Trojan gold :

ind in her haste, she chafes him alone,
 nd seeks his life, regardless of his own.

'his lucky moment the sly traitor chose :
 hen, starting from his ambush, up he rose,
 nd threw, but first to heaven address'd his vows.

atron of Socrates' high abodes,
 hœbus, the ruling power among the gods ;
 Whom first we serve, whole woods of unctuous pine

are fell'd for thee, and to thy glory shine ;
 by thee protected, with our naked souls, through flames unsing'd we march, and tread the kindled coals :

ive me, propitious power, to wash away
 he stains of this dishonourable fact :
 Nor spoils, nor triumph, from the day I claim ;
 but with my future actions trust my fame.
 et me, by stealth, this female plague o'ercome,
 and from the field return inglorious home.

Apollo heard, and, granting half his prayer,
 huffed in winds the rest, and tofs'd in empty air.
 e gives the death desir'd ; his safe return,
 by southern tempests, to the seas is borne.

Now, when the javelin whiz'd along the skies,
 both armies on Camilla turn'd their eyes,
 Directed by the sound of either host,

Th' unhappy virgin, though concern'd the most,
 Was only deaf ; so greedy was the bent

On golden spoils, and on her prey intent :
 Till in her pap the winged weapon stood nix'd ; and deeply drunk the purple blood.

Her sad attendants hasten to sustain
 Their dying lady drooping on the plain.

Far from their sight the trembling Aruns flies,
 With beating heart, and fear confus'd with joys ;
 Nor dares he farther to pursue his blow,
 Or ev'n to bear the sight of his expiring foe.

As when the wolf has torn a bullock's hide,
 At unawares, or ranch'd a shepherd's side :
 Conscious of his audacious deed, he flies
 And clasps his quivering tail between his thighs ;
 So, speeding once, the wretch no more attends ;
 But, spurting forward, herds among his friends.

She wrench'd the javelin with her dying hands ;
 But, wedg'd within her breast, the weapon stands ;
 The wood she draws, the steely point remains ;
 She staggers in her feat with agonizing pains
 A gathering mist o'erclouds her cheerful eyes,
 And from her cheeks the rosy colour flies.

Then turns to her, whom, of her female train,
 She trusted most, and thus she speaks with pain :

Acca, 'tis past ! he swims before my sight,
 Inexorable Death ; and claims his right.

Bear my last words to Turnus, fly with speed,
 And bid him timely to my charge succeed :

Repel the Trojans, and the town relieve :
 Farewell ; and in this kiss my parting breath re-

She said ; and sliding sunk upon the plain ; [ceivè.
 Dying, her open'd hand forsakes the rein ;

Short, and more short, she pants : by slow degrees
 Her mind the passage from her body frees.

She drops her sword, she nods her plummy crest ;
 Her drooping head declining on her breast :

In the last sigh her struggling soul expires,
 And, murmuring with disdain, to Stygian sounds retires.

A shout, that struck the golden stars, ensu'd :
 Despair and rage, and languish'd fight renew'd.

The Trojan troops, and Tuscans in a line,
 Advance to charge ; the mix'd Arcadians join.

By Cynthia's maid, high seated, from afar
 Surveys the field, and fortune of the war :

Unmov'd a while, till prostrate on the plain,
 Weltering in blood, she sees Camilla slain ;

And round her corpse of friends and foes a fighting train.

Then, from the bottom of her breast, she drew
 A mournful sigh, and these sad words ensue :

Too dear a fine, ah ! much-lamented maid,
 For warring with the Trojans, thou hast paid :

Nor aught avail'd, in this unhappy strife,
 Diana's sacred arms, to save thy life.

Yet unreveng'd thy goddess will not leave
 Her votary's death, nor with vain sorrow grieve.

Branded the wretch, and be his name abhor'd ;
 But after-ages shall thy praise record.

Th' inglorious coward soon shall press the plain ;
 Thus vows thy queen, and thus the fates ordain.

High o'er the field there stood a hilly mound,
 Sacred the place, and spread with oaks around ;

Where, in a marble tomb, Dercennus lay,
 A king that once in Latium bore the sway.

The beauteous Opis thither bent her flight,
 To mark the traitor Aruns from the height.

Him, in resfulgent arms, the soon esp'y'd,
 Swoln with success, and loudly thus she cry'd :

Thy backward steps, vain boaster, are too late ;
 Turn, like a man, at length, and meet thy fate.

Charg'd with my message to Camilla go ;
 And say I sent thee to the shades below ;

An honour undeferv'd from Cynthia's bow.

She said : and from her quiver chose with speed
 The winged shaft, destin'd for the deed :

Then, to the stubborn yew her strength apply'd ;
 Till the far distant horns approach'd on either side.

The bow-string touch'd her breast, so strong she Whizzing in air the fatal arrow flew. [drew ;

At once the twanging bow and sounding dart
 The traitor heard, and felt the point within his heart.

Him, beating with his heels, in pangs of death,
His flying friends to foreign fields bequeath.
The conquering damsel, with expanded wings,
The welcome message to her mistress brings.

Their leader lost, the Volscians quit the field;
And unsustain'd, the chiefs of Turnus yield.
The frighted soldiers, when their captains fly,
More on their speed than on their strength rely.
Confus'd in flight, they bear each other down,
And spur their horses headlong to the town.
Driven by their foes, and to their fears resign'd,
Not once they turn; but take their wounds behind.

These drop the shield, and those the lance forego;
Or on their shoulders bear the slacken'd bow.
The hoofs of horses, with a rattling sound,
Beat short and thick, and shake the rotten ground.
Black clouds of dust come rolling in the sky,
And o'er the darken'd walls and rampires fly.
The trembling matrons, from their lofty stands,
Rend heaven with female shrieks, and wring their
All pressing on, pursuers and pursued, [hands.
Are crush'd in crowds, a mingled multitude.
Some happy few escape: the throng too late
Rush on for entrance, till they choke the gate.
Evn in the sight of home, the wretched fire
Looks on, and sees his helpless son expire.
Then, in a fright, the folding gates they close:
But leave their friends excluded with their foes.
The vanquish'd cry; the victors loudly shout;
'Tis terror all within; and slaughter all without.
Blind in their fear, they bounce against the wall,
Or, to the moats pursu'd, precipitate their fall.

The Latian virgins, valiant with despair,
Arm'd on the towers, the common dangers share:

So much of zeal their country's cause inspir'd;
So much Camilla's great example fir'd.
Poles, sharpen'd in the flames, from high the throw,

With imitated darts, to gaul the foe;
Their lives, for godlike freedom they bequeath,
And crowd each other to be first in death.
Meantime to Turnus, ambush'd in the shade,
With heavy tidings, came th' unhappy maid:
The Volscians overthrow, Camilla kill'd,
The foes entirely masters of the field,
Like a resistless flood, came rolling on:
The cry goes off the plain, and thickens to the town.

Inflam'd with rage, (for so the furies fire
The Daunian's breast, and so the fates require,)
He leaves the hilly pass, the woods in vain
Possess'd, and downward issues on the plain:
Scarce was he gone, when to the straits, now freed

From secret foes, the Trojan troops succeed.
Through the black forest, and the ferny brake,
Unknowingly secure, their way they take.
From the rough mountains to the plain descend.
And there, in order drawn, their line extend.
Both armies, now, in open fields are seen:
Nor far the distance of the space between.
Both to the city bend: Æneas sees,
Through smoking fields, his hastening enemies.
And Turnus views the Trojans in array,
And hears th' approaching horses proudly neigh.
Soon had their hosts in bloody battle join'd;
But westward to the sea the sun declin'd.
Intrench'd before the town, both armies lie:
While night, with sable wings, involves the sky.

B O O K XII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Turnus challenges Æneas to a single combat: articles are agreed on, but broken by the Rutuli, who wound Æneas: he is miraculously cured by Venus, forces Turnus to a duel, and concludes the poem with his death.

WHEN Turnus saw the Latins leave the field,
Their armies broken, and their courage quell'd;
Himself become the mark of public spight,
His honour question'd for the promis'd fight:
The more he was with vulgar hate oppress'd,
The more his fury boil'd within his breast:
He fous'd his vigour for the late debate;
And rais'd his haughty soul, to meet his fate.

As when the swains the Libyan lion chase,
He makes a four retreat, nor mends his pace:
But if the pointed javelin pierce his side,
The lordly beast returns with double pride:
He wrenches out the steel, he roars for pain;
His sides he lashes, and erects his mane:
So Turnus fares; his eyeballs flash with fire,
Through his wide nostrils clouds of smoke expire.

Trembling with rage, around the court he ran,
At length approach'd the king, and thus began;

No more excuses or delays: I stand
In arms prepar'd to combat, hand to hand.
This base deserter of his native land.
The Trojan, by his word, is bound to take
The same conditions which himself did make.
Renew the truce, the solemn rites prepare,
And to my single virtue trust the war.
The Latians, unconcern'd, shall see the fight;
This arm, unaided, shall assert your right:
Then, if my prostrate body press the plain,
To him the crown and beauteous bride remain.
To whom the king sedately thus reply'd:
Brave youth, the more your valour has been
try'd,

The more becomes it us, with due respect,
To weigh the chance of war which you neglect.
You want not wealth, or a successive throne,
Or cities, which your arms have made your own;

My town and treasures are at your command;
And stor'd with blooming beauties is my land :
Aurentum more than one Lavina fees,
Inmarry'd, fair, of noble families.

Now let me speak, and you with patience hear,
Things which perhaps may grate a lover's ear :
But found advice, proceeding from a heart
Sincerely yours, and free from fraudulent art.

The gods, by signs, have manifestly shewn,
No prince, Italian born, should heir my throne :
Oft have our augurs, in prediction skill'd,
And oft our priests, a foreign son reveal'd.

Yet, won by worth, that cannot be withstood.
Brib'd by my kindness to my kindred blood,
Jug'd by my wife, who would not be deny'd,
I promis'd my Lavinia for your bride :

Her from her plighted lord by force I took ;
All ties of treaties and of honour broke :
On your account I wag'd an impious war,
With what success 'tis needless to declare ;
and my subjects feel ; and you have had your
share.

Twice vanquish'd, while in bloody fields we strive,
Scarce in our walls we keep our hopes alive :
The rolling flood runs warm with human gore ;
The bones of Latians glance the neighbouring
shore :

Why put I not an end to this debate,
Still unresolv'd, and still a slave to fate ?

If Turnus' death a lasting peace can give,
Why should not I procure it whilst you live ?
Should I to doubtful arms your youth betray,
What would my kinsmen, the Rutulians, say ?
And should you fall in fight, (which heaven defend)

How curse the cause, which hasten'd to his end,
The daughter's lover, and the father's friend ?
Weigh in your mind the various chance of war,
Pity your parent's age, and ease his care.

Such balmy words he pour'd, but all in vain :
The proffer'd medicine, but provok'd the pain.
The wrathful youth, disdainful the relief,
With intermitting sobs, thus vents his grief :

Thy care, O best of fathers, which you take
For my concerns, at my desire forsake.
Permit me not to languish out my days ;
But make the best exchange of life for praise.

This arm, this lance, can well dispute the prize ;
And the blood follows, where the weapon flies :
His goddess's mother is not near, to shroud
The flying coward with an empty cloud.

But now the queen, who fear'd for Turnus' life,
And loath'd the hard conditions of the strife,
Held him by forc'd ; and, dying in his death,
In these sad accents gave her sorrow breath :

O Turnus, I adjure thee by these tears ;
And whate'er price Amata's honour bears
Within thy breast, since thou art all my hope,
My sickly mind's repose, my sinking age's prop ;

Since on the safety of thy life alone
Depends Latinus, and the Latian throne :
Refuse me not this one, this only prayer,
To waive the combat, and pursue the war.

Whatever chance attends this fatal strife,
Think it includes in thine Amata's life.
I cannot live a slave ; or see my throne
Usurp'd by strangers, or a Trojan son.

VOL. XII.

At this a flood of tears Lavinia shed ;
A crimson blush her beauteous face o'erspread,
Varying her cheeks by turns with white and red.
The driving colours, never at a stay,
Run here and there ; and flush, and fade away.
Delightful change ! thus Indian ivory shows,
Which, with the bordering paint of purple
glows ;

Or lilies damask by the neighbouring rose.
The lover gaz'd, and, burning with desire,
The more he look'd, the more he fed the fire :
Revenge, and jealous rage, and secret spite,
Roll in his breast, and rouse him to the fight.

Then fixing on the queen his ardent eyes,
Firm to his first intent, he thus replies :
O, mother, do not, by your tears, prepare
Such boding omens, and prejudice the war.
Resolv'd on fight, I am no longer free,
To shun my death, if heaven my death decrees.

Then, turning to the herald, thus pursues ;
Go, greet the Trojan with ungrateful news ;
Denounce from me, that when to-morrow's light
Shall gild the heavens, he need not urge the fight ;
The Trojan and Rutulian troops no more
Shall dye, with mutual blood, the Latian shore :
Our single swords the quarrel shall decide,
And to the victor be the beauteous bride.

He said, and striding on, with speedy pace
He fought his couriers of the Thracian race.
At his approach, they tosd' their heads on high
And, proudly neighing, promise victory.
The fires of these Orithia sent from far,
To grace Pylumnus, when he went to war.
The drifts of Thracian snows were scarce so white, Nor northern winds in fleetness match'd their flight.

Officious grooms stand ready by his side ;
And some with combs their flowing manes divide ; [their pride.]
And others stroke their chests, and gently sooth

He sheath'd his limbs in arms ; a temper'd mass
Of golden metal those, and mountain brass.
Then to his head his glittering helm he ty'd ;
And girt his faithful faulchion by his side.

In his Ætnean forge, the god of fire
That faulchion labour'd for the hero's fire :
Immortal keenness on the blade bestow'd,
And plung'd it hissing in the Stygian flood.

Propp'd on a pillar, which the cieling bore,
Was plac'd the lance Auruncan Actor wore ;
Which with such force he brandish'd in his hand,
The tough ash trembled like an osier wand.

Then cry'd, O ponderous spoil of Actor slain,
And never yet by Turnus tosd' in vain,
Fail not, this day, thy wonted force : but go,
Sent by this hand, to pierce the Trojan foe :

Give me to tear his corset from his breast,
And from that eunuch head, to rend the crest :
Dragg'd in the dust, his frizzled hair to soil,
Hot from the vexing ir'n, and smear'd with fragrant oil.

Thus while he raves, from his wide nostrils sies
A fiery steam, and sparkles from his eyes.
So fares the bull in his lov'd female's fight ;
Proudly he bellows, and preludes the fight :
He tries his goring horns against a tree ;
And meditates his absent enemy :

K k

He pushes at the winds, he digs the strand
With his black hoofs, and spurns the yellow sand.

Nor left the Trojan, in his Lemnian arms,
To future fight his manly courage warms:
He whets his fury, and with joy prepares
To terminate at once the lingering wars.
To cheer his chiefs, and tender son, relates
What heaven had promis'd, and expounds the
Then to the Latian king he sends, to cease [fates.
The rage of arms, and ratify the peace.

The morn, ensuing from the mountain's height,
Had scarcely spread the skies with rosy light;
Th' ethereal coursers, bounding from the sea,
From out their flaming nostrils breath'd the day:
When now the Trojan and Rutulian guard,
In friendly labour join'd, the list prepar'd.
Beneath the walls, they measure out the space;
Then sacred altars rear, on sods of grass;
Where, with religious rites their common gods
they place.

In purest white the priests their heads attire,
And living waters bear, and holy fire:
And o'er their linen hoods, and shaded hair,
Long twisted wreaths of sacred vervain wear.

In order issuing from the town appears
The Latin legion, arm'd with pointed spears;
And from the fields, advancing on a line,
The Trojan and the Tuscan forces join:
Their various arms afford a pleasing sight: [fight.
A peaceful train they seem, in peace prepar'd for

Between the ranks the proud commanders ride,
Glittering with gold, and vests in purple dy'd.
Here Mnestheus, author of the Memnian line,
And there Messapus born of seed divine.
The sign is given, and round the lifted space
Each man in order fills his proper place.
Reclining on their ample shields, they stand;
And fix their pointed lances in the sand.
Now, studious of the fight, a numerous throng
Of either sex promiscuous, old and young,
Swarm from the town: by those who rest behind,
The gates and walls, and houses tops are lin'd.

Meantime the queen of heaven beheld the
fight,

With eyes unpleas'd, from Mount Albano's height:
(Since call'd Albano, by succeeding fame,
But then an empty hill, without a name.)
She thence survey'd the field, the Trojan powers,
The Latian squadrons, and Laurentine towers.
Then thus the goddess of the skies bespake,
With sighs and tears, the goddesses of the lake;
King Turnus' sister, once a lovely maid,
Ere to the lust of lawless Jove betray'd,
Compress'd by force, but by the grateful god,
Now made the Naïs of the neighbouring flood.

O nymph, the pride of living lakes, said she,
O most renown'd, and most belov'd by me,
Long hast thou known, nor need I to record
The wanton fallies of my wandering lord:
Of every Latian fair, whom Jove misde,
To mount by stealth my violated bed,
To thee alone I grudg'd not his embrace;
But gave a part of heaven, and an unenvy'd place.
Now learn from me, thy near approaching grief,
Nor think my wishes want to thy relief,
While fortune favour'd, nor heaven's king deny'd,
To lend my succour to the Latian side,

I sav'd thy brother, and the sinking state;
But now he struggles with unequal fate;
And goes with gods averse, o'ermatch'd in
To meet inevitable death in fight: [might Nor must I break the truce, nor can sustain the fight

Thou, if thou dar'st, thy present aid supply;
It well becomes a sifter's care to try.

At this the lovely nymph, with grief oppress'd
Thrice tore her hair, and beat her comely breast
To whom Saturnia thus. Thy tears are late:
Haste, snatch him, if he can be snatch'd, from fate
New tumults kindle, violate the truce;
Who knows what changeful fortune may produce?

'Tis not a crime t' attempt what I decree,
Or if it were, discharge the crime on me.
She said, and, failing on the winged wind,
Left the sad nymph suspended in her mind.

And now in pomp the peaceful kings appear:
Four steeds the chariot of Latinus bear:
Twelve golden beams around his temples play,
To mark his lineage from the god of day.
Two snowy coursers Turnus' chariot yoke,
And in his hand two massy spears he shook:
Then issued from the camp, in arms divine,
Æneas, author of the Roman line:
And by his side Ascanius took his place,
The second hope of Rome's immortal race.

Adorn'd in white, a reverend priest appears;
And offerings to the flaming altars bears;
A porket, and a lamb, that never suffer'd shears. }
Then to the rising sun he turns his eyes,
And shows the beasts design'd for sacrifice,
With salt and meal: with like officious care
He marks their foreheads, and he clips their hair.
Betwixt their horns the purple wine he sheds,
With the same generous juice the flame he feeds.
Æneas then unsheath'd his shining sword,
And thus with pious prayers the gods ador'd:

All-seeing sun, and thou Ausonian soil,
For which I have sustain'd so long a toil,
Thou king of heaven, and thou the queen of air,
(Propitious now, and reconcil'd by prayer)
Thou god of war, whose unresist'd sway
The labours and events of arms obey;
Ye living fountains, and ye running floods;
All powers of ocean, all ethereal gods,
Hear, and bear record: if I fall in field,
Or recreant in the fight, to Turnus yield,
My Trojans shall increase Evander's town;
Ascanius shall renounce th' Ausonian crown:
All claims, all questions of debate shall cease;
Nor he, nor they, with force infringe the peace.
But if my juster arms prevail in fight
As sure they shall, if I divine aright,
My Trojans shall not o'er th' Italians reign:
Both equal, both unconquer'd shall remain:
Join'd in their laws, their lands, and their abodes;
I ask but altars for my weary gods.
The care of those religious rites be mine:
The crown to king Latinus I resign;
His be the sovereign sway. Nor will I share
His power in peace, or his command in war.
For me, my friends another town shall frame,
And bless the rising towers, with fair Lavinia's
name.

Thus he. Then, with erected eyes and hands,
 The Latio king before his altar stands,
 By the same heaven, said he, and earth, and main,
 And all the powers, that all the three contain;
 By hell below, and by that upper god,
 Whose thunder signs the peace, who seals it with
 So let Latona's double offspring hear, [his nod;
 And double-fronted Janus what I swear:
 I touch the sacred altars, touch the flames,
 And all those powers attest, and all their names:
 Whatever chance befall on either side,
 No term of time this union shall divide:
 No force, no fortune, shall my vows unbind,
 Or shake the steadfast tenor of my mind:
 Not though the circling seas should break their
 bound,
 O'erflow the shores, or sap the solid ground;
 Not though the lamps of heaven their spheres
 forsake,
 Hurl'd down, and hissing in the nether lake:
 Ev'n as this royal sceptre (for he bore
 A sceptre in his hand) shall never more
 Shoot out in branches, or renew the birth;
 (An orphan now, cut from the mother earth
 By the keen axe, dishonour'd of his hair,
 And cas'd in brass, for Latio kings to bear).

When thus in public view the peace was ty'd
 With solemn vows, and sworn on either side,
 All dues perform'd which holy rites require;
 The victim beasts are slain before the fire:
 The trembling entrails from their bodies torn,
 And to the fatten'd flames in chargers borne.

Already the Rutulians deem their man
 O'ermatch'd in arms, before the fight began.
 First rising fears are whisper'd thro' the crowd;
 Then, gathering sound, they murmur more aloud.
 Now side to side, they measure with their eyes
 The champion's bulk, their sinews, and their size:
 The nearer they approach, the more is known
 Th' apparent disadvantage of their own.
 Turnus himself appears in public fight
 Conscious of fate, desponding of the fight.
 Slowly he moves; and at his altar stands
 With eyes dejected, and with trembling hands:
 And, while he mutters undistinguish'd prayers,
 A livid deadness in his cheeks appears.

With anxious pleasure when Juturna view'd
 Th' increasing fright of the mad multitude;
 When their short sighs and thickening sobs she
 heard,

And found their ready minds for change prepar'd;
 Dissembling her immortal form, she took,
 Camertus' mien, his habit, and his look,
 A chief of ancient blood: in arms well known
 Was his great fire, and he, his greater son,
 His shape assum'd, amid the ranks she ran,
 And, humouring their first motions thus began:

For shame, Rutulians, can you bear the sight
 Of one expos'd for all, in single fight?
 Can we, before the face of heaven, confess
 Our courage colder, or our numbers less?
 View all the Trojan host, th' Arcadian band,
 And Tuscan army; count them as they stand:
 Undaunted to the battle if we go,
 Scarce every second man will share a foe.
 Turnus, 'tis true, in this unequal strife,
 Shall lose, with honour, his devoted life:

Or change it rather for immortal fame,
 Succeeding to the gods, from whence he came:
 But you, a servile, and inglorious band,
 For foreign lords shall sow your native land:
 Those fruitful fields, your fighting fathers gain'd;
 Which have to long their lazy sons sustain'd.

With words like these, she carry'd her design;
 A rising murmur runs along the line,
 Then ev'n the city troops, and Latins, tir'd
 With tedious war, seem with new souls inspir'd:
 Their champion's fate with pity they lament;
 And of the league, so lately sworn, repent.

Nor fails the goddess to foment the rage
 With lying wonders, and a false preface:
 But adds a sign, which, present to their eyes,
 Inspires new courage, and a glad surprisè.
 For, sudden, in the fiery tracts above,
 Appears in pomp th' imperial bird of Jove:
 A plump of fowl he spies, that swim the lakes;
 And o'er their heads his sounding pinions shakes:
 Then stooping on the fairest of the train,
 In his strong talons traus'd a silver swan.
 Th' Italians wonder at th' unusual sight;
 But while he lags, and labours in his flight,
 Behold the dastard fowl return anew;
 And with united force the foe pursue:
 Clamorous around the royal hawk they fly;
 And thickening in a cloud, o'erhade the sky.
 The cuss, they scratch, they cross their airy course;
 Nor can th' incumbent bird sustain their force:
 But vex'd; not vanquish'd, drops the ponderous
 prey;

And, lighten'd of his burden, wings his way.
 Th' Ausonian bands with shouts salute the sight:
 Eager of action, and demand the fight.
 Then king Tolumnius, vers'd in augurs' arts,
 Cries out, and thus his boasted skill imparts:
 At length 'tis granted, what I long desir'd;
 This, this is what my frequent vows requir'd.
 Ye gods, I take your omèn, and obey:
 Advance, my friends, and charge; I lead the way.
 These are the foreign foes, whose impious band,
 Like that rapacious bird, infest our land:
 But soon, like him, they shall be forc'd to sea
 By strength united, and forego the prey;
 Your timely succour to your country bring;
 Hastè to the rescue, and redeem your king.

He said: and pressing onward, thro' the crew;
 Pois'd in his lifted arm, his lancè he threw.
 The winged weapon, whistling in the wind,
 Came driving on, nor miss'd the mark design'd.
 At once the cornel rattled in the skies;
 At once tumultuous shouts and clamours rise.
 Nine brothers in a goodly band there stood,
 Born of Arcadian mix'd with Tuscan blood:
 Gylippus' sons: the fatal javelin flew;
 Aim'd at the midst of the friendly crew.
 A passage through the jointed arms is found;
 Just where the belt was to the body bound,
 And struck the gentle youth extended on the
 ground.

Then, fir'd with pious rage, the generous train
 Run madly forward to revenge the slain.
 And some with eager haste their javelins throw;
 And some with sword in hand assault the foe.

The wish'd insult the Latin troops embrace;
 And meet their ardour in the middle space.

The Trojans, Tuscans, and Arcadian line,
 With equal courage obviate their design.
 Peace leaves the violated fields; and hate
 Both armies urges to their mutual fate.
 With impious haste their altars are o'erturn'd,
 The sacrifice half broil'd, and half-unburn'd.
 Thick storms of steel from either army fly,
 And clouds of clashing darts obscure the sky:
 Brands from the fire are missive weapons made;
 With chargers, bows, and all the priestly trade.

Latinus, frighted, hastens from the fray,
 And bears his unregarded gods away.
 These on their horses vault, those yoke the car;
 The rest, with swords on high, run headlong to
 the war.

Messapus, eager to confound the peace,
 Spurr'd his hot courser through the fighting press,
 At king Aulestes; by his purple known
 A Tufcan prince, and by his regal crown;
 And with a shock encountering, bore him down.
 Backward he fell; and, as his fate design'd,
 The ruins of an altar were behind:
 There pitching on his shoulders, and his head,
 Amid the scattering fires he lay supinely spread.
 The beamy spear descending from above,
 His cuirass pierc'd, and through his body drove.
 Then, with a scornful smile, the victor cries;
 The gods have found a fitter sacrifice.

Greedy of spoils, th' Italians strip the dead
 Of his rich armour; and uncrown his head.
 Priest Chorinæus arm'd his better hand,
 From his own altar, with a blazing brand:
 And, as Ebusus with a thundering pace,
 Advanc'd to battle, dash'd it on his face:
 His bristly beard shines out with sudden fires,
 The crackling crop a noisome scent expires.
 Following the blow, he seiz'd his curling crown
 With his left hand; his other cast him down.
 The prostrate body with his knees he press'd,
 And plung'd his holy poinard in his breast.

While Podalirius, with his sword, pursued
 The shepherd Albus through the flying crowd,
 Swiftly he turns, and aims a deadly blow,
 Full on the front of his unwary foe.
 The broad axe enters with a crashing sound,
 And leaves the chin with one continued wound: [arms around.]

Warm blood, and mingled brains, besmear his
 An iron sleep his stupid eyes oppress'd,
 And seal'd their heavy lids in endless rest.
 But good Æneas rush'd amid the bands,
 Bare was his head, and naked were his hands,
 In sign of truce: then thus he cries aloud,
 What sudden rage, what new desire of blood
 Inflames your alter'd minds? O Trojans, cease
 From impious arms, nor violate the peace.

By human sanctions, and by laws divine,
 The terms are all agreed, the war is mine.
 Dismiss your fears, and let the fight ensue;
 This hand alone shall right the gods and you:
 Our injur'd altars, and their broken vow,
 To this avenging sword the faithless Turnus owe.

Thus while he spoke, unmindful of defence,
 A winged arrow struck the pious prince,
 But whether from some human hand it came,
 Or hostile god, is left unknown by fame:

No human hand, or hostile god was found,
 To boast the triumph of so base a wound.

When Turnus saw the Trojan quit the plain,
 His chiefs dismay'd, his troops a fainting train:
 Th' unhop'd event his heighten'd soul inspires,
 At once his arms and couriers he requires.
 Then, with a leap, his lofty chariot gains,
 And with a ready hand assumes the reins.
 He drives impetuous, and where-e'er he goes.
 He leaves behind a lane of slaughter'd foes.
 These his lance reaches, over those he rolls.
 His rapid car, and crushes out their souls:
 In vain the vanquish'd fly; the victor sends
 The dead mens' weapons at their living friends.

Thus on the banks of Hebrus freezing flood
 The god of battles, in his angry mood,
 Clashing his sword against his brazen shield,
 Let loose the reins, and scours along the field:
 Before the wind his fiery couriers fly,
 Groans the sad earth, resounds the rattling sky.
 Wrath, terror, treason, tumult, and despair,
 Dire faces, and deform'd, surround the car;
 Friends of the god, and followers of the war.

With fury not unlike, nor less disdain,
 Exulting Turnus flies along the plain:
 His smoking horses, at their utmost speed,
 He lashes on; and urges o'er the dead.
 Their fetlocks run with blood; and when they
 bound,

The gore, and gathering dust, are dash'd around.
 Thamyris and Pholus, masters of the war,
 He kill'd at hand, but St Helenus afar:
 From far the sons of Imbracus he flew,
 Glaucus, and Lades, of the Lycian crew:
 Both taught to fight on foot, in battle join'd;
 Or mount the courser that out-strips the wind.

Meantime Eumedes, vaunting in the field,
 New fir'd the Trojans, and their foes repell'd
 This son of Dolon bore his grandfire's name;
 But emulated more his father's fame.
 His guileful father, sent a nightly spy,
 The Grecian camp and order to decry:
 Hard enterprise, and well he might require
 Achilles' car, and horses for his hire;
 But, met upon the scout, th' Etolian prince
 In death bestow'd a juster recompence,

Fierce Turnus view'd the Trojan from afar
 And launch'd his javelin from his lofty car:
 Then lightly leaping down, pursued the blow,
 And, pressing with his foot, his prostrate foe,
 Wrench'd from his feeble hold the shining sword,
 And plung'd it in the bosom of its lord.
 Possess, said he, the fruit of all thy pains,
 And measure, at thy length, our Latian plains.
 Thus are my foes rewarded by my hand,
 Thus may they build their town, and thus enjoy the land.

Then Daris, Butis, Sybaris, he slew,
 Whom o'er his neck the floundering courser threw.
 As when loud Boreas, with his blustering train,
 Stoops from above, incumbent on the main;
 Where-e'er he flies, he drives the rack before,
 And rolls the billows on th' Ægean shore:
 So where resistless Turnus takes his course,
 The scatter'd squadrons bend before his force:
 His crest of horses hair is blown behind,
 By adverse air, and rustles in the wind.

This haughty Phegeus, saw with high disdain,
 And as the chariot roll'd along the plain, [rein.]
 Light from the ground he leapt, and seiz'd the Thus hung in air, he still retain'd his hold;
 The coursers frighted, and their course controll'd.
 The lance of Turnus reach'd him as he hung,
 And pierc'd his plated arms; but pass'd along,
 And only raz'd the skin: he turn'd, and held
 Against his threatening foe his ample shield;
 Then call'd for aid: but, while he cry'd in vain,
 The chariot bore him backward on the plain.
 He lies revers'd; the victor-king descends,
 And strikes so justly where his helmet ends,
 He lops the head. The Latian fields are drunk,
 With streams that issue from the bleeding trunk.

While he triumphs, and while the Trojans yield.
 The wounded prince is forc'd to have the field:
 Strong Mneſtheus and Achates often try'd,
 And young Ascanius weeping by his side,
 Conduct him to his tent: scarce can he rear
 His limbs from earth, supported on his spear.
 Resolv'd in mind, regardless of the smart,
 He tugs with both his hands, and breaks the dart.
 The steel remains. No readier way he found
 To draw the weapon, than t' enlarge the wound.
 Eager of fight, impatient of delay,
 He begs; and his unwilling friends obey.

Iapis was at hand to prove his art,
 Whose blooming youth to fir'd Apollo's heart,
 That for his love he proffer'd to bestow
 His tuneful harp, and his unerring bow:
 The pious youth, more studious how to save
 His aged sire, now sinking to the grave,
 Preferr'd the power of plants, and silent praise
 Of healing arts, before Phæbeian bays.

Prop'd on his lance the pensive hero stood,
 And heard, and saw unmov'd, the mourning
 crowd.

The fam'd physician tucks his robes around
 With ready hands, and hastens to the wound,
 With gentle touches he performs his part,
 This way and that, soliciting the dart,
 And exercises all his heavenly art. }
 All softening simples, known of sovereign use,
 He presses out, and pours their noble juice;
 These first infus'd, to lenify the pain,
 He tugs with pincers, but he tugs in vain.
 Then to the patron of his art he pray'd;
 The patron of his art refus'd his aid.

Meantime the war approaches to the tents:
 Th' alarm grows hotter, and the noise augments:
 The driving dust proclaims the danger near,
 And first their friends, and then their foes ap- } pear;
 Their friends retreat, their foes pursue the rear. }
 The camp is fill'd with terror and affright;
 The hissing shafts within the trench alight;
 And undistinguished noise ascends the sky;
 The shouts of those who kill, and groans of those who die.

But now the goddess's mother, mov'd with grief,
 And pierc'd with pity, hastens her relief.
 A branch of healing dittany she brought,
 Which in the Cretan fields with care she sought:
 Rough is the stem, which woolly leaves surround;
 The leaves with flowers, the flowers with purple
 crown'd;

Well known to wounded goats; a sure relief
 To draw the pointed steel, and ease the grief.
 This Venus brings, in clouds involv'd; and brews
 Th' extracted liquor with ambrosial dews,
 And odorous panacee: unseen she stands,
 Tempering the mixture with her heavenly hands:
 And pours it in a bowl, already crown'd
 With juice of med'cal herbs prepar'd to bathe
 the wound.

The leech unknowing of superior art,
 Which aids the cure, with this sonents the part, }
 And in a moment ceas'd the raging smart.
 Stanch'd is the blood, and in the bottom stands:
 The steel, but scarcely touch'd with tender hands,
 Moves up, and follows of its own accord;
 And health and vigour are at once restor'd.
 Iapis first perceiv'd the closing wound;
 And first the footsteps of a god he found.
 Arms, arms, he cries, the sword and shield prepare,
 And send the willing chief, renew'd to war.
 This is no mortal work, no cure of mine,
 Nor arts effect, but done by hands divine:
 Some god our general to the battle sends;
 Some god preserves his life for greater ends.
 The hero arms in haste: his hands unfold
 His thighs with cuirasses of resplendent gold:
 Inflam'd to fight, and rushing to the field,
 That hand sustaining the celestial shield,
 This gripes the lance; and with such vigour shakes,
 That to the rest the beamy weapon quakes.
 Then, with a close embrace, he strain'd his son;
 And, kissing through his helmet, thus begun:
 My son, from my example learn the war, }
 In camps to suffer, and in fields to dare:
 But happier chance than mine attend thy care!
 This day my hand thy tender age shall shield,
 And crown with honours of the conquer'd field:
 Thou, when thy riper years shall send thee forth,
 To toils of war, be mindful of my worth,
 Assert thy birthright; and in arms be known,
 For Hector's nephew, and Æneas' son.

He said; and, striding, issued on the plain;
 Anteus, and Mneſtheus, and a numerous train,
 Attend his steps: the rest their weapons take,
 And, crowding to the field, the camp forsake.
 A cloud of blinding dust is rais'd around;
 Labours beneath their feet the trembling ground.

Now Turnus, posted on a hill, from far
 Beheld the progress of the moving war:
 With him the Latins view'd the cover'd plains;
 And the chill blood ran backward in their veins.
 Juturnia saw th' advancing troops appear;
 And heard the hostile sound, and fled for fear.
 Æneas leads; and draws a sweeping train,
 Clos'd in their ranks, and pouring on the plain.
 As when a whirlwind, rushing to the shore,
 From the mid ocean drives the waves before:
 The painful hind, with heavy heart, foresees
 The flatted fields, and slaughter of the trees;
 With such impetuous rage the prince appears,
 Before his doubled front; nor leeds destruction bears.
 And now both armies shock, in open field;
 Olyris is by strong Thymbraeus kill'd.
 Archetius, Ufens, Epulon, are slain
 (All fam'd in arms, and of the Latian train)
 By Gyas, Mneſtheus, and Achates' hand:
 The fatal sugar falls, by whose command

The truce was broken, and whose lance, embued
With Trojan blood, th' unhappy fight renew'd.
Loud shouts and clamours rend the liquid sky;
And o'er the field the frighted Latins fly.
The prince disdain'd the dastards to pursue,
Nor moves to meet in arms the fighting few:
Turnus alone, amid the dusky plain,
He seeks, and to the combat calls in vain.
Juturna heard, and, seiz'd with mortal fear,
Forc'd from the beam her brother's charioteer;
Assumes his shape, his armour, and his mien;
And like Metiscus in his feat is seen.

As the black swallow near the palace plies;
O'er empty courts, and under arches flies:
Now hawks aloft, now skims along the flood,
To furnish her loquacious nest with food:
So drives the rapid goddess o'er the plains;
The smoking horses run with loosen'd reins.
She fleers a various course among the foes;
Nowhere, now there, her conquering brother shows:
Now with a freight, now with a wheeling flight,
She turns, and bends, but shuns the single fight.
Æneas, fir'd with fury, breaks the crowd,
And seeks his foe, and calls by name aloud:
He runs within a narrower ring, and tries
To stop the chariot; but the chariot flies.
If he but gain a glimpse, Juturna fears,
And far away the Daunian hero bears.

What should he do? Nor arts nor arms avail;
And various cares in vain his mind assail;
The great Messapus thundering through the field,
In his left hand two pointed javelins held:
Encountering on the prince, one dart he drew,
And with unerring aim and utmost vigour threw.
Æneas saw it come, and stooping low
Beneath his buckler, shunn'd the threatening blow.
The weapon hiss'd above his head, and tore
The waving plume, which on his helm he wore.
Forc'd by this hostile act, and fir'd with spite,
That flying Turnus still declin'd the fight;
The prince, whose piety had long repell'd
His inborn ardour, now invades the field:
Invokes the powers of violated peace,
Their rites and injur'd altars to redress;
Then, to his rage abandoning the rein,
With blood and slaughter'd bodies fills the plain.

What god can tell, What numbers can display,
The various labours of that fatal day?
What chiefs and champions fall on either side,
In combat slain, or by what deaths they dy'd?
Whom Turnus, whom the Trojan hero kill'd:
Who shar'd the fame and fortune of the field?
Jove, could'st thou view, and not avert thy sight,
Two jarring nations join'd in cruel fight,
Whom leagues of lasting love so shortly shall unite!

Æneas first Rutulian Sucre found,
Whose valour made the Trojans quit their ground.
Betwixt his ribs the javelin drove so just,
It reach'd his heart, nor needs a second thrust.
Now Turnus, at two blows, two brethren slew:
First from his horse fierce Amicus he threw;
Then leaping on the ground, on foot assail'd
Diores, and in equal fight prevail'd.
Their lifeless trunks he leaves upon the place;
Their heads, distilling gore, his chariot grace.

Three cold on earth the Trojan hero threw:
Whom without respite at one charge he slew:

Cethegus, Tanais, Tagus, fell oppress'd
And sad Onythes, added to the rest;
Of Theban blood, whom Peridia bore.
Turnus two brothers from the Lycian shore,
And from Apollo's fane to battle sent,
O'erthrew, nor Phœbus could their fate prevent.
Peaceful Menœtes after these he kill'd,
Who long had shunn'd the dangers of the field:
On Lerna's lake a silent life he led,
And with his nets and angle earn'd his bread.
Nor pompous cares, nor palaces he knew,
But wisely from th' infectious world withdrew.
Poor was his house; his father's painful hand
Discharg'd his rent, and plough'd another's land.

As flames among the lofty woods are thrown,
On different sides, and both by winds are blown,
The laurels crackle in the sputtering fire;
The frighted sylvans from their shades retire:
Or as two neighbouring torrents fall from high,
Rapid they run; the foamy waters fry:
They roll to sea, with unresisted force,
And down the rocks precipitate their course:
Not with less rage the rival heroes take
Their different ways; nor less destruction make,
With spears afar, with swords at hand they strike,
And zeal of slaughter fires their souls alike.
Like them, their dauntless men maintain the field,
And hearts are pierc'd unknowing how to yield:
They blow for blow return, and wound for wound;
And heaps of bodies raise the level ground.

Murranus, boasting of his blood, that springs
From a long royal race of Latin kings,
Is by the Trojan from his chariot thrown,
Crush'd with the weight of an unwieldy stone:
Betwixt the wheels he feel; the wheels that bore
His living load, his dying body tore.
His starting steeds, to shun the glittering sword, Paw down his trampled limbs, forgetful of their lord.

Fierce Hillus threaten'd high; and face to face
Affronted Turnus in the middle space:
The prince encounter'd him in full career,
And at his temples aim'd the deadly spear:
So fatally the flying weapon sped,
That through his brazen helm it pierc'd his head.
Nor, Giffesus, could'st thou 'scape from Turnus
hand,

In vain the strongest of th' Arcadian band:
Nor to Cupentus could his gods afford
Availing aid against th' Ænean sword:
Which to his naked heart pursued the course:
Nor could his plated shield sustain the force.

Töius fell, whom not the Grecian powers,
Nor great subverter of the Trojan towers,
Were doom'd to kill, while heaven prolong'd his
date:

But who can pass the bounds prefix'd by fate?
In high Lynæssus, and, in Troy, he held
Two palaces, and was from each expell'd:
Of all the mighty man, the last remains
A little spot of foreign earth contains.

And now both hosts their broken troops unite,
In equal ranks, and mix in mortal fight.
Sereñus and undaunted Mœtheus join
The Trojan, Tuscian, and Arcadian line:
Sea-born Messapus, with Atinas, heads
The Latian squadrons, and to battle leads.

hey strike, they push, they throng the scanty
 space;
 resolv'd on death, impatient of disgrace;
 And where one falls, another fills his place.
 The Cyprian goddess now inspires her son
 To leave th' unfinished fight, and storm the town.
 Or, while he rolls his eyes around the plain,
 In quest of Turnus, whom he seeks in vain,
 He views th' unguarded city from afar,
 He careless quiet, and secure of war:
 Scarcion offers, and excites his mind,
 To dare beyond the task he first design'd.
 Resolv'd, he calls his chiefs; they leave the fight;
 Attended thus, he takes a neighbouring height:
 The crowding troops about their general stand,
 All under arms, and wait his high command.
 When thus the lofty prince: Hear and obey,
 The Trojan bands, without the least delay.
 I live with us, and what I have decreed
 Requires our utmost vigour, and our speed.
 Our instant arms against the town prepare;
 The source of mischief, and the seat of war.
 His day the Latian towers, that mate the sky,
 Shall level with the plain in ashes lie:
 The people shall be slaves, unless in time
 They kneel for pardon, and repent their crime.
 Twice have our foes been vanquish'd on the plain;
 When shall I wait till Turnus will be slain?
 Our force against the perjurd city bend:
 Here it began, and there the war shall end.
 The peace profan'd our rightful arms requires,
 Cleanse the polluted place with purging fires.
 He finish'd; and, one soul inspiring all,
 Form'd in a wedge, the foot approach the wall.
 Without the town, an unprovided train
 Of gaping, gazing citizens are slain.
 Some firebrands, others scaling ladders bear;
 And those they toss aloft, and these they rear:
 The flames now launch'd, the feather'd arrows fly,
 The clouds of missive arms obscure the sky.
 Advancing to the front, the hero stands,
 And, stretching out to heaven his pious hands,
 Attends the gods, asserts his innocence,
 Probraids with breach of faith th' Aulonian prince:
 Declares the royal honour doubly stain'd,
 And twice the rites of holy peace profan'd.
 Dissenting clamours in the town arise;
 Each will be heard, and all at once advise.
 One part for peace, and one for war contends:
 Some would exclude their foes, and some admit their friends.
 The helpless king is hurry'd in the throng;
 And whate'er tide prevails, is borne along.
 Thus, when the swain, within a hollow rock,
 Invades the bees with suffocating smoke,
 They run around, or labour on their wings,
 Dissu'd to flight; and shoot their sleepy stings;
 To shun the bitter fumes, in vain they try; [sky.
 Black vapours, issuing from the vent, involve the
 But fate, and envious fortune, now prepare
 To plunge the Latius in the last despair.
 The queen, who saw the foes invade the town,
 And brands on tops of burning houses thrown;
 Cast round her eyes, distracted with her fear;
 No troops of Turnus in the field appear.
 Once more she stares abroad, but still in vain;
 And then concludes the royal youth is slain.

Mad with her anguish, impotent to bear
 The mighty grief, she loaths the vital air.
 She calls herself the cause of all this ill,
 And owns the dire effects of her un govern'd will:
 She raves against the gods, she beats her breast,
 She tears with both her hands her purple vest;
 Then round a beam a running noose she ty'd,
 And, fasten'd by the neck, obscenely dy'd.
 Soon as the fatal news by fame was blown,
 And to her dames and to her daughter known;
 The sad Lavinia rends her yellow hair,
 And rosy cheeks; the rest her sorrow share:
 With shrieks the palace rings, and madness of despair.
 The spreading rumour fills the public place;
 Confusion, fear, distraction, and disgrace,
 And silent shame, are seen in every face.
 Latinus tears his garments as he goes,
 Both for his public and his private woes:
 With silt his venerable beard besmears,
 And fordid dust deforms his silver hairs.
 And much he blames the softness of his mind,
 Obnoxious to the charms of womankind, [sign'd:
 And soon reduc'd to change, what he so well de-
 To break the solemn league so long desir'd, [quir'd
 Nor finish what his fates, and those of Troy re-
 Now Turnus rolls aloof o'er empty plains,
 And here and there some straggling foes he gleans.
 His flying couriers plead him self and less,
 Asham'd of easy flight, and cheap success.
 Thus half contented, anxious in his mind,
 The distant cries come driving in the wind;
 Shouts from the walls, but shouts in murmurs
 A jarring mixture, and a boding sound. [drown'd;
 Alas, said he, what mean these dismal cries?
 What doleful clamours from the town arise?
 Confus'd he stops, and backward pulls the reins:
 She, who the drivers office now sustains,
 Replies: Neglect, my lord, these new alarms;
 Here fight; and urge the fortune of your arms:
 There want not others to defend the wall:
 If by your rival's hand th' Italians fall.
 So shall your fatal sword his friends oppress,
 In honour equal, equal in success.
 To this, the prince: O sister, (for I knew
 The peace infrin'd, proceeded first from you,)
 I knew you when you mingled first in fight,
 And now in vain you would deceive my sight:
 Why, goddess, this unprofitable care?
 Who sent you down from heaven, involv'd in air?
 Your share of mortal sorrows to sustain,
 And see your brother bleeding on the plain?
 For what to power can Turnus have recourse,
 Or how resist his fate's prevailing force!
 These eyes beheld Murranus bite the ground.
 Mighty the man, and mighty was the wound.
 I heard my dearest friend with dying breath,
 My name invoking to revenge his death:
 Brave Ufens fell with honour on the place;
 To shun the shameful sight of my disgrace.
 On earth supine, a many corpse he lies;
 His vest and armour are the victor's prize.
 Then shall I see Laurentum in a flame,
 Which only wanted to complete my shame?
 How will the Latins hoot their champion's flight;
 How Drances will insult and point them to the flight!

Is death too hard to bear? ye gods below,
(Since those above to small compassion show,)
Receive a soul unfully'd yet with flame,
Which not belies my great forefathers' name.

He said: and while he spoke, with flying speed,
Came fages, urging on his foamy steed;
Fix'd on his wounded face a shaft he bore,
And seeking Turnus sent his voice before:
Turnus, on you, on you alone depends
Our last relief; compassionate your friends.
Like lightning, fierce Æneas, rolling on,
With arms invest, with flames invades the town:
The brands are toss'd on high: the winds conspire
To drive along the deluge of the fire:
All eyes are fix'd on you; your foes rejoice;
Ev'n the king staggers, and suspends his choice.
Doubts to deliver, or defend the town;
Whom to reject, or whom to call his son. [plac'd,
The queen, on whom your utmost hopes were Herself suborning death, has breath'd her last.
'Tis true, Messapus, fearless of his fate,
With fierce Atinas' aid, defends the gate:
On every side furrounded by the foe;
The more they kill, the greater numbers grow; }
An iron harvest mounds, and still remains to } mow.

You, far aloof from your unshaken bands,
Your rolling chariot drive o'er empty sands.
Stupid he fate, his eyes on earth declin'd,
And various cares revolving in his mind:
Rage, boiling from the bottom of his breast,
And sorrow, mix'd with flame, his soul opprest'd;
And conscious worth lay labouring in his thought:
And love, by jealousy to madness wrought.
By slow degrees his reason drove away
The mists of passion, and resum'd her sway.
Then, rising on his car, he turn'd his look;
And saw the town involv'd in fire and smoke.
A wooden tower with flames already blaz'd,
Which his own hands on beams and rafters rais'd:
And bridges laid above to join the space:
And wheels below to roll from place to place.
Sister, the fates have vanquish'd: let us go
The way which heaven and my hard fortune show.
The fight is fix'd: nor shall the branded name
Of a base coward blot your brother's fame.
Death is my choice: but suffer me to try
My force, and vent my rage before I die.
He said, and, leaping down, without delay,
Through crowds of scatter'd foes he freed his way.
Striding, he pass'd, impetuous as the wind,
And left the grieving goddess far behind.
As when a fragment from a mountain torn
By raging tempests, or by torrents borne,
Or sapp'd by time, or loosen'd from the roots,
Proned through the void the rocky ruin shoots,
Rolling from crag to crag, from steep to steep;
Down sink at once the shepherds and their sheep;
Involv'd alike, they rush to nether ground,
Stunn'd with the flock; they fall, and stunn'd from earth rebound:

So, Turnus, hasting headlong to the town,
Shouldering and shoving, bore the squadrons down.
Still pressing onward, to the walls he drew,
Where shafts, and spears and darts, promiscuous } flew; } [brue.]
And sanguine streams the slippery ground en-

First stretching out his arm in sign of peace,
He cries aloud to make the combat cease;
Rutulians, hold, and Latin troops retire;
The fight is mine, and me the gods require.
'Tis just that I should vindicate alone
The broken truce, or for the breach atone.
This day shall free from war th' Ausonian state
Or finish my misfortunes in my fate.

Both armies from their bloody work desist:
And, bearing backward, form a specious list.
The Trojan hero, who receiv'd from fame
The welcome sound, and heard the champion
name,

Soon leaves the taken works and mounted wall
Greedy of war, where greater glory calls.
He springs to fight, exulting in his force;
His jointed armour rattles in the course.
Like Eryx, or like Athos, great he shows,
Or father Appennine, when white with snows,
His head divine, obscure in clouds he hides,
And shakes the sounding forest on his sides.

The nations, over-aw'd, surcease the fight,
Immoveable their bodies, fix'd their sight:
Ev'n death stands still; nor from above they thro'
Their darts, nor drive their battering rams below
In silent order either army stands;
And drop their swords, unknowing, from the hands.

Th' Ausonian king beholds, with wondering sight
Two mighty champions match'd in single fight,
Born under climes remote, and brought by fate,
With swords to try their titles to the state.

Now, in clos'd field, each other from afar
They view; and, rushing on, begin the war.
They launch their spears, then hand to hand the meet;

The trembling soil rebounds beneath their feet:
Their bucklers clash; thick blows descend from
high,

And flakes of fire from their hard helmets fly.
Courage conspires with chance; and both engage
With equal fortune yet, and mutual rage.

As when two bulls for their fair female fight
In Sila's shades, or on Taburnus' height;
With horns adverse they meet: the keeper flies:
Mute stands the herd, the heifers roll their eyes,
And wait th' event; which victor they shall bear
And who shall be the lord, to rule the lusty year:
With rage of love the jealous rivals burn,
And puff for puff, and wound for wound return:
Their dewlaps gor'd, their sides are lay'd in blood Loud cries and roaring sounds rebellow through the wood:

Such was the combat in the list'd ground;
So clash their swords, and so their shields rebound.
Jove sets the beam; in either scale he lays
The champion's fate, and each exactly weighs.
On this side life, and lucky chance ascends;
Loaded with death, that other scale descends.
Rais'd on the stretch, young Turnus aims a blow,
Full on the helm of his unguarded foe:
Shrill shouts and clamorous ring on either side:
As hopes and fears their panting hearts divide.
But all in pieces flies the traitor sword,
And, in the middle stroke, deserts his lord.
Now 'tis but death, or flight: disarm'd he flies,
When in his hand an unknown hit he spies.

Fame says that Turnus, when his steeds he
join'd,
Hurrying to war, disorder'd in his mind,
Snatch'd the first weapon which his haste could find.

'Twas not the fated sword his father bore;
But that his charioteer Metiscus wore.
This, while the Trojans fled, the toughness held;
But vain against the great Vulcanian shield.
The mortal-temper'd steel deceiv'd his hand:
The shiver'd fragments shone amid the sand.

Surpris'd with fear, he fled along the field;
And now forthright, and now in orbits, wheel'd.
For here the Trojan troops the list surround;
And there the pass is clos'd with pools and marshy
ground.

Æneas hastens, though with heavier pace,
His wound, so newly knit, retards the chase:
And oft his trembling knees their aid refuse,
Yet pressing foot by foot his foe pursues.

Thus, when a fearful stag is clos'd around
With crimson toils, or in a river found; [pears;
High on the bank the deep-mouth'd hound ap-
Still opening, following still, where'er he steers:
The persecuted creature, to and fro,
Turns here and there to 'scape his Umbrian foe:
Steep is th' ascent, and if he gains the land,
The purple death is pitch'd along the strand:
His eager foe, determin'd to the chase,
Stretch'd in his length gains ground at every pace:
Now to his beamy head he makes his way,
And now he holds, or thinks he holds, his prey:
Just at the pinch the stag springs out with fear,
He bites the wind, and fills his sounding jaws
with air. [cries;

The rocks, the lakes, the meadows, ring with
The mortal tumult mounts, and thunders in the skies. [blames

Thus flies the Daunian prince: and, flying,
His tardy troops: and, calling by their names,
Demands his trusty sword. The Trojan threats
The realm with ruin, and their ancient seats
To lay in ashes, if they dare supply,
With arms or aid, his vanquish'd enemy:
Thus menacing, he still pursues the course
With vigour, though diminish'd of his force.
Ten times already, round the lifted place
One chief had fled, and t' other given the chase:
No trivial prize is play'd; for on the life
Or death of Turnus, now depends the strife.

Within the space an olive-tree had stood,
A sacred shade, a venerable wood, [god.
For vows to Faunus paid, the Latins guardian
Here hung the vests, and tablets were engrav'd,
Of sinking mariners from shipwreck sav'd.
With heedless hands the Trojans fell'd the tree,
To make the ground enclos'd for combat free.
Deep in the root, whether by fate or chance,
Or erring haste, the Trojan drove his lance:
Then stoop'd, and tugg'd with force immense, to free

Th' encumber'd spear from the tenacious tree:
That whom his fainting limbs pursued in vain,
His flying weapon might from far attain.

Confus'd with fear, bereft with human aid,
Then Turnus to the gods, and first to Faunus
pray'd:

O Faunus pity, and thou mother earth,
Where I thy foster son receiv'd my birth,
Hold fast the steel; if my religious hand
Your plant has honour'd, which your foes profan'd;
Propitious hear my pious prayer! He said,
Nor with successless vows invok'd the aid.
Th' incumbent hero wrench'd, and pull'd, and frain'd,

But still the stubborn earth the steel detain'd.
Juturna took her time: and, while in vain
He strove, assum'd Metiscus' form again:
And, in that imitated shape, restor'd
To the despairing prince, his Daunian sword.
The queen of love, who, with disdain and grief,
Saw the bold nymph afford this prompt relief;
T' assert her offspring with a greater deed,
From the touch root the lingering weapon freed.

Once more erect, the rival chiefs advance;
One trusts the sword, and one the pointed lance:
And both resolv'd alike to try their fatal chance.

Meantime imperial Jove to Juno spoke,
Who from a shining cloud beheld the shock:
What new arrest, O queen of heaven, is sent
To stop the fates now labouring in th' event,
What further hopes are left thee to pursue?
Divine Æneas (and thou know'st it too)
Free-doom'd to these celestial seats is due.
What more attempts for Turnus can be made,
That thus thou lingerest in this lonely shade!
Is it becoming of the due respect,
And awful honour of a god elect,
A wound unworthy of our state to feel;
Patient of human hands, and earthly steel?
Or seems it just, the sister should restore
A second sword, when one was lost before,
And arm a conquer'd wretch against his conqueror?

For what without thy knowledge and avow,
Nay, more, thy dictate, durst Juturna do?
At last, in deference to my love, forbear
To lodge within thy soul this anxious care:
Reclin'd upon my breast, thy grief unload;
Who should relieve the goddess but the god?
Now, all things to their utmost issue tend;
Push'd by the fates to their appointed end:
While leave was giv'n thee, and a lawful hour
For vengeance, wrath, and unresisted power:
Tos'd on the seas thou could'st thy foes distress,
And driven ashore, with hostile arms oppress:
Deform the royal house; and from the side
Of the just bridegroom, tear the plighted bride:
Now cease at my command. The thunderer
said:

And with dejected eyes this answer Juno made.
Because your dread decree too well I knew;
From Turnus and from earth unwilling I withdrew.

Else should you not behold me here alone,
Involv'd in empty clouds my friends bemoan;
But girt with vengeful flames, in open fight,
Engag'd against my foes in mortal fight.
'Tis true, Juturna mingled in the strife
By my command, to save her brother's life;
At least to try: but by the Stygian lake,
(The most religious oath the gods can take)
With this restriction, not to bend the bow,
Or tofs the spear, or trembling dart to throw,

And now resign'd to your superior might,
 And tir'd with fruitless toils, I loath the fight.
 'Tis let me beg (and this no fates withstand)
 Both for myself, and for your father's land;
 That when the nuptial bed shall bind the peace,
 (Which I, since you ordain, consent to bless)
 The laws of either nations be the same;
 But let the Latins still retain their name:
 Speak the same language which they spoke before;
 Wear the same habits which their grandfathers wore:
 Call them not Trojans: perish the renown
 And name of Troy with that detested town,
 Latium be Latium still; let Alba reign,
 And Rome's immortal majesty remain.

Then thus the founder of mankind replies
 (Unruffled was his front, serene his eyes):
 Can Saturn's issue, and heaven's other heir,
 Such endless anger in her bosom bear?
 Be mistress, and your full desires obtain;
 But quench the cholery you soment in vain.
 From ancient blood th' Antonian people sprung, Shall keep their name, their habit, and their tongue.

The Trojans to their customs shall be ty'd,
 I will, myself, their common rites provide;
 The natives shall command, the foreigners subside.

All shall be Latium; Troy without a name:
 And her lost sons forget from whence they came.
 From blood so mix'd, a pious race shall flow;
 Equal to gods, excelling all below.
 No nation more respect to you shall pay,
 Or greater offerings on your altars lay.
 Juno consents, well pleas'd that her desires
 Had found success, and from the clouds retires.

The peace thus made, the thunderer next prepares

To force the watery goddesses from the wars.
 Deep in the dismal regions, void of light,
 Three daughters at a birth were born to night:
 These their brown mother, brooding on her
 Indulg'd with windy wings to sit in air; [care,
 With serpents girt alike, and crown'd with hissing hair.

In heaven the Diræ call'd, and still at hand,
 Before the throne of angry Jove they stand,
 His ministers of wrath; and ready still
 The minds of mortal men with fears to fill:
 Whene'er the moody sire, to wreak his hate
 On realms, or towns, deserving of their fate,
 Hurls down diseases, death, and deadly care,
 And terrifies the guilty world with war.
 One sister-plague of these from heaven he sent,
 To fright Juturna with a dire portent.
 The pest comes whistling down: by far more slow
 Springs the swift arrow from the Parthian bow,
 Or Cydon yew; when, traversing the skies,
 And drench'd in poisonous juice, the sure destruction flies.

With such a sudden and unseen a flight,
 Shot through the coluds the daughter of the night.
 Soon as the field enclos'd she had in view,
 And from afar her destin'd quarry knew:
 Contracted to the boding bird she turns,
 Which haunts the ruin'd piles, and hallow'd urns,
 And beats about the tombs with nightly wings;
 Where songs obscene on sepulchres she sings.

Thus lessen'd in her form, with frightful cries
 The fury round unhappy Turnus flies,
 Flaps on his shield, and flutters o'er his eyes.
 A lazy chilness crept along his blood,
 Chok'd was his voice, his hair with horror stood
 Juturna from afar beheld her fly,
 And knew th' ill omen, by her screaming cry,
 And stridour of her wing. Amaz'd with fear,
 Her beauteous breast she beat, and rent her flowing hair.

Ah me, the cries, in this unequal strife,
 What can thy sister more to save thy life!
 Weak as I am, can I, alas, contend
 In arms, with that inexorable fiend!
 Now, now, I quit the field! forbear to fright
 My tender soul, ye baleful bird of night!
 The lashing of your wings I know too well:
 The sounding flight, and funeral screams of hell
 These are the gifts you bring from haughty Jov
 The worthy recompence of ravish'd love!
 Did he for this exempt my life from fate?
 O hard conditions of immortal state!
 Though born to death, not privileg'd to die,
 But forc'd to bear impos'd eternity!
 Take back your envious bribes, and let me go
 Companion to my brother's ghost below!
 The joys are vanish'd: nothing now remains
 Of life immortal, but immortal pains.
 What earth will open her devouring womb,
 To rest a weary goddess in the tomb!
 She drew a length of sighs; nor more she said,
 But in her azure mantle wrapp'd her head:
 Then plung'd into her stream, with deep despair
 And her last sobs came bubbling up in air.

Now stern Æneas waves his weighty spear
 Against his foe, and thus upbraids his fear:
 What farther subterfuge can Turnus find?
 What empty hopes are harbour'd in his mind?
 'Tis not thy swiftness can secure thy flight:
 Not with their feet, but hands, the valiant fight.
 Vary thy shape in thousand forms, and dare
 What skill and courage can attempt in war:
 With for the wings of wind to mount the sky?
 Or hid within the hollow earth to lie.
 The champion shook his head, and made this short reply:

No threats of thine my manly mind can move:
 'Tis hostile heaven I dread; and partial Jove.
 He said no more: but, with a sigh, repris'd
 The mighty sorrow in his swelling breast.
 Then, as he roll'd his troubled eyes around,
 An antique stone he saw; the common bound
 Of neighbouring fields, and barrier of the ground:
 So vast, that twelve strong men of modern days
 Th' enormous weight from earth could hardly raise.
 He heav'd it at a list: and, pois'd on high,
 Ran staggering on, against his enemy.
 But so disorder'd, that he scarcely knew
 His way; or what unwieldy weight he threw.
 His knocking knees are bent beneath the load:
 And shivering cold congeals his vital blood.
 The stone drops from his arms; and falling short
 For want of vigour, mocks his vain effort.
 And as, when heavy sleep has clos'd the fight,
 The sickly fancy labours in the night:
 We seem to run; and, destitute of force,
 Our sinking limbs forsake us in the course:

vain we heave for breath; in vain we cry :
 he nerves unbrac'd their usual strength deny,
 nd on the tongue the faltering accents die :
 Turnus far'd, whatever means he try'd,
 ll force of arms, and points of art employ'd,
 he fury flew athwart, and made th' endeavour void.

A thousand various thoughts his soul con-
 found :

e star'd about; nor aid nor issue found :
 is own men stop the pass, and his own walls furround.

nce more he pauses; and looks out again :
 nd seeks the goddess charioteer in vain.

rembling, he views the thunder chief advance,
 nd brandishing aloft the deadly lance :

maz'd he cowers beneath his conquering foe,
 orgets to ward, and waits the coming blow.
 stonish'd while he stands, and fix'd with fear,
 im'd at his shield he sees th' impending spear.

The hero measur'd first, with narrow view,
 he destin'd mark : and, rising as he threw,
 ith its full swing the fatal weapon flew.

ot with less rage the rattling thunder falls,
 r stones from battering engines break the walls:
 wit as a whirlwind, from an arm so strong,
 he lance drove on; and bore the death along.
 ought could his seven-fold shield the prince avail,

or aught beneath his arms the coat of mail;
 pierc'd through all; and, with a grizly wound,
 rausfix'd his thigh, and doubled him to ground.
 ith groans the Latins rend the vaulted sky :
 Woods, hills, and valleys, to the voice reply.

Now low on earth the lofty chief is laid,
 With eyes cast upwards, and with arms dif-
 play'd;

And recreant thus to the proud victor pray'd :
 I know my death deserv'd, nor hope to live :
 Use what the gods and thy good fortune give.

Yet think; oh think, if mercy may be shown,
 (Thou hadst a father once, and hadst a son) :

Pity my fire, now sinking to the grave;
 And for Anchises' sake, old Dannaus save !
 Or, if they vow'd revenge, pursue my death;
 Give to my friends my body void of breath !

The Latian chiefs have seen me beg my life;
 Thine is the conquest, thine the royal wife ;
 Against a yielded man 'tis mean ignoble strife.

In deep suspense the Trojan seem'd to stand ;
 And, just appear'd to strike, repress'd his hand.

He roll'd his eyes, and every moment felt
 His manly soul with more compassion melt.

When, casting down a casual glance, he spy'd
 The golden belt that glitter'd on his side ;

The fatal spoils which haughty Turnus tore
 From dying Pallas, and in triumph wore.

Then, rous'd anew to wrath, he loudly cries [eyes]; (Flames, while he spoke, came flashing from his

Traitor, dost thou, dost thou to grace pretend,
 Glad, as thou art, in trophies of my friend !

To his sad soul a grateful offering go ;
 'Tis Pallas, Pallas gives this deadly blow.

He rais'd his arm aloft; and at the word,
 Deep in his bosom drove the shining sword,
 The streaming blood sustain'd his arms around,
 And the disdainful soul came rushing through the
 wound.

P O S T S C R I P T.

WHAT Virgil wrote in the vigour of his age, in plenty and at ease, I have undertaken to translate in my declining years: struggling with wants, oppressed with sickness, curbed in my genius, liable to be misconstrued in all I write; and my judgments, if they are not very equitable, already prejudiced against me; by the lying character which has been given them of my morals. Yet, steady to my principles, and not dispirited with my afflictions, I have, by the blessing of God on my endeavours, overcome all difficulties; and, in some measure, acquitted myself of the debt which I owed the public, when I undertook this work.
 In the first place, therefore, I thankfully acknowledge to the Almighty Power, the assistance he has given me in the beginning, the prosecution, and conclusion of my present studies, which are more happily performed, than I could have promised to myself, when I laboured under such discouragements.
 For, what I have done, imperfect as it is, for want of health and leisure to correct it, will be judged in after-ages, and possibly in the present, to be no dishonour to my native country;

whose language and poetry would be more esteemed abroad, if they were better understood. Somewhat (give me leave to say) I have added to both of them, in the choice of words, and harmony of numbers, which were wanting, especially the last,
 in all our poets, even in those who, being endued with genius, yet have not cultivated their mother-tongue with sufficient care; or, relying on the beauty of their thoughts, have judged the ornament of words, and sweetness of sound, unnecessary. One is for raking in Chaucer (our English Ennius) for antiquated words, which are never to be revived, but when sound or signification is wanting in the present language. But many of his deserve not this redemption, any more than the crowds of men who daily die, or are slain for sixpence in a battle, merit to be restored to life, if a wish could revive them. Others have no ear for verse, nor choice of words, nor distinction of thoughts; but mingle farthings with their gold to make up the sum. Here is a field of satire opened to me: but, since the Revolution, I have wholly renounced that talent. For who would give phy-fic to the great, when he is uncalled? to do his patient no good, and endanger himself for his prescription? Neither am I ignorant, but I may justly be condemned for many of those faults, of which I have too liberally arraigned others.

“Cynthius aurem vellet, & admonuit.”

It is enough for me, if the government will let me pass unquestioned. In the mean time, I am obliged, in gratitude, to return my thanks to many of them, who have not only distinguished me from others of the same party, by a particular exception of grace, but, without considering the man, have been bountiful to the poet: have encouraged Virgil to speak such English as I could teach him, and reward his interpreter, for the pains he has taken, in bringing him over into Britain, by defraying the charges of his voyage. Even Cerberus, when he had received the sop, permitted Æneas to pass freely to Elysium. Had it been offered me, and I had refused it, yet still some gratitude is due to such who were willing to oblige me. But how much more to those from whom I have received the favours which they have offered to one of a different persuasion? amongst whom I cannot omit naming the Earls of Derby and of Peterborough. To the first of these I have not the honour to be known; and therefore his liberality was as much unexpected, as it was undeserved. The present Earl of Peterborough has been pleased long since to accept the tenders of my service: his favours are so frequent to me, that I receive them almost by prescription. No difference of interests or opinion have been able to withdraw his protection from me: and I might justly be condemned for the most unthankful of mankind, if I did not always preserve for him a most profound respect and inviolable gratitude. I must also add, that if the last Æneid shine among its fellows, it is owing to the commands of Sir William Trumbull, one of the principal secretaries of state, who recommended it, as his favourite, to my care; and, for his sake particularly, I have made it mine. For who would confess weariness, when he enjoined a fresh labour? I could not but invoke the assistance of a muse, for this last office.

“Extremum hunc Arctifusa:—

“Negat quis carmina Gallo?”

Neither am I to forget the noble present which was made me by Gilbert Dolben, Esq. the worthy son of the late Archbishop of York; who, when I began this work, enriched me with all the several editions of Virgil, and all the commentaries of those editions in Latin; amongst which, I could not but prefer the Dauphine's, as the last, the shortest, and the most judicious. Fabrius I had also sent me from Italy; but either he understands Virgil but very imperfectly, or I have no knowledge of my author.

Being invited, by that worthy gentleman Sir William Bowyer, to Denham-court, I translated the first Georgic at his house, and the greatest part of the last Æneid. A more friendly entertainment no man ever found. Nor wonder therefore if both those versions surpass the rest, and own the satisfaction I received in his converse, with whom I had the honour to be bred in Cambridge, and in the same college. The seventh Æneid was made English at Burleigh, the magnificent abode of the Earl of Exeter: in a village belonging to his family I was born, and under his roof I endeavoured to make that Æneid appear in English with as much lustre as I could: though my author has not given the finishing stroke either to it, or to the eleventh, as I perhaps could prove in both, if I durst presume to criticize my master.

By a letter from William Walsh, of Abberly, Esq. (who has so long honoured me with his friendship, and who, without flattery, is the best critic of our nation) I have been informed that his Grace the Duke of Shrewsbury has procured a printed copy of the Pastorals, Georgics, and six first Æneids, from my bookseller, and has read them in the country, together with my friend. This noble person having been pleased to give them a commendation, which I presume not to insert; has made me vain enough to boast of so great a favour, and to think I have succeeded beyond my hopes; the character of his excellent judgment, the acuteness of his wit; and his general knowledge of good letters, being known as well to all the world, as the sweetness of his disposition, his humanity, his easiness of access, and desire of obliging those who stand in need of his protection, are known to all who have approached him; and to me in particular, who have formerly had the honour of his conversation. Whoever has given the world the translation of part of the third Georgic, which he calls “The Power of Love,” has put me to sufficient pains to make my own not inferior to his: as my Lord Roscommon's Silenus had formerly given me the same trouble. The most ingenious Mr. Addison, of Oxford, has also been as troublesome to me as the other two, and on the same account. After his bees, my latter swarm is scarcely worth the hiving. Mr. Cowley's “Praise of a Country Life” is excellent; but is rather an imitation of Virgil, than a version. That I have recovered in some measure the health which I had lost by too much application to this work, is owing, next to God's mercy, to the skill and care of Dr. Guibbons and Dr. Hobbs, the two ornaments of their profession; whom I can only pay by this acknowledgment. The whole faculty has always been ready to oblige me: and the only one of them, who endeavoured to defame me, had it not in his power*.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Trojans, after a seven years voyage, set sail for Italy, but are overtaken by a dreadful storm, which Æolus raises at Juno's request. The tempest sinks one ship, and scatters the rest: Neptune drives off the winds, and calms the seas. Æneas with his own, and six more ships, arrives safe at an African port. Venus complains to Jupiter of her son's misfortunes. Jupiter comforts her, and sends Mercury to procure him a kind reception among the Carthaginians. Æneas, going out to discover the country, meets his mother in the shape of a huntress, who conveys him in a cloud to Carthage; where he sees his friends whom he thought lost, and receives a kind entertainment from the queen. Dido, by a device of Venus, begins to have a passion for him, and, after some discourse with him desires the history of his adventures since the siege of Troy; which is the subject of the two following books.

ARMS and the Man I sing, the first who bore
His course to Latium from the Trojan shore;
By fate expell'd, on land and ocean tost,
Before he reach'd the fair Lavinian coast:
Doom'd by the gods a length of wars to wage,
And urg'd by Juno's unrelenting rage;
Ere the brave hero rais'd, in these abodes,
His destin'd walls, and fix'd his wand'ring gods.
Hence the fam'd Latian line, and fenates come,
And the proud triumphs, and the tow'rs of Rome.

Say, muse, what causes could so far incense
Celestial pow'rs, and what the dire offence
That mov'd heav'n's awful empress to impose
On such a pious prince, a weight of woes,
Expos'd to dangers, and with toils oppress'd?
Can rage so fierce inflame an heavenly breast?

Against th' Italian coast, of ancient fame
A city rose, and Carthage was the name;
A Tvrian colony; from Tiber far;
Rich, rough, and brave, and exercis'd in war.
Which Juno far above all realms, above
Her own dear Samos, honour'd with her love.
Here stood her chariot, here her armour lay,
Here she design'd, would destiny give way,
Ev'n then the seat of univerfal sway. }
But of a race she heard, that should destroy
The Tyrian tow'rs, a race deriv'd from Troy,
Who proud in arms, triumphant by their swords,
Should rise in time, the worlds victorious lords;
By fate design'd her Carthage to subdue,
And on her ruin'd empire raise a new.
This fear'd the goddess; and in mind she bore
The late long war her fury rais'd before
For Greece with Troy; nor was her wrath re-
But every cause hung heavy on her mind; [sign'd,
Her form disdain'd, and Paris' judgment, roll
Deep in her breast, and kindle all her soul;
Th' immortal honours of the ravish'd boy,
And last, the whole detested race of Troy.

With all these motives fir'd, from Latium far
She drove the relics of the Grecian war:
Fate urg'd their course; and long they wander'd
The spacious ocean tost from shore to shore. [o'er
So vast the work to build the mighty frame,
And raise the glories of the Roman name!

Scarce from Sicilian shores the shouting train, Spread their broad sails, and plough'd the foamy
main;

When haughty Juno, thus her rage express'd;
Th' eternal wound still rankling in her breast.

Then must I stop? are all my labours vain?
And must this Trojan prince in Latium reign?
Belike, the fates may baffle Juno's aims;
And why could Pallas, with avenging flames,
Burn a whole navy of the Grecian ships,
And whelm the scatter'd Argives in the deeps?
She, for the crime of Ajax, from above
Launch'd through the clouds the fiery bolts of Jove;

Dash'd wide his fleet, and, as her tempest flew,
Expos'd the ocean's inmost depths to view.
Then, while transfix'd the blasted wretch expires,
Flames from his breast, and fires succeeding fires,
Snatch'd in a whirlwind, with a sudden flock,
She hurl'd him headlong on a pointed rock.
But I, who moves supreme in heaven's abodes,
Jove's sister-wife, and empress of the gods,
With this one nation must a war maintain
For years on years; and wage that war in vain!
And now what suppliants will invoke my name,
Adore my pow'r, or bid my altars flame?

Thus fir'd with rage and vengeance, now she
flies

To dark Æolia, from the distant skies,
Impregnated with storms; whose tyrant binds
The blust'ring tempests, and reluctant winds.
Their rage imperial Æolus restrains
With rucky dungeons, and enormous chains.

The bellowing brethren, in the mountain pent,
 Roar round the cave, and struggle for a vent.
 From his high throne, their fury to alluage,
 He shakes his sceptre, and controls their rage ;
 Or down the void their rapid whirls had driv'n
 Earth, air, and ocean, and the tow'rs of heaven.
 But Jove, the mighty ruin to prevent,
 In gloomy caves th' aerial captives pent ;
 O'er their wild rage the pond'rous rocks he spread,
 And hurl'd huge heaps of mountains on their head ;
 And gave a king, commission'd to restrain
 And curb the tempest, or to loose the rein.

Whom thus the queen address'd : Since mighty
 Jove,

The king of men, and fire of gods above,
 Gives thee, great Æolus, the pow'r to raise
 Storms at thy sovereign will, or smooth the seas :
 A race, I long have labour'd to destroy,
 Wait to Hesperia the remains of Troy.
 Ev'n now their navy cuts the Tuscan floods,
 Charg'd with their exiles, and their vanquish'd gods.

Wing all thy furious winds ; o'erwhelm the train,
 Disperse, or plunge their vessels in the main.
 Twice sev'n bright nymphs, of beauteous shape
 are mine ;

For thy reward the fairest I'll resign,
 The charming Deiopeia shall be thine ;
 She, on thy bed, long blessings shall confer,
 And make thee father of a race like her.

'Tis yours, great queen, replies the pow'r, to lay
 The task, and mine to listen and obey.
 By you, I fit a guest with gods above,
 And share the graces and the smiles of Jove :
 By you, these realms, this sceptre I maintain,
 And wear these honours of the stormy reign.

So spoke th' obsequious god ; and, while he spoke,

Whirl'd his vast spear, and pierc'd the hollow rock.
 The winds, embattled, as the mountain rent,
 Flew all at once impetuous through the vent ;
 Earth, in their course, with giddy whirls they sweep,

Rush to the seas, and bare the bosom of the deep :
 East, west, and south, all black with tempests,
 roar,

And roll vast billows to the trembling shore.
 The cordage cracks ; with unavailing cries
 The Trojans mourn ; while sudden clouds arise,
 And ravish from their sight the splendours of
 the skies.

Night hovers o'er the floods ; the day retires ;
 The heavens flash thick with momentary fires ;
 Loud thunders shake the poles ; from ev'ry place
 Grim death appear'd, and glar'd in every face.

In horror fix'd, the Trojan hero stands,
 He groans, and spreads to heaven his lifted hands.
 'Thrice happy those ! whose fate it was to fall
 (Exclaims the chief) beneath the Trojan wall.
 Oh ! 'twas a glorious fate to die in fight,
 To die, so bravely, in their parents' fight !
 Oh ! had I there, beneath Tydides' hand,
 That bravest hero of the Grecian band,
 Pour'd out this soul, with martial glory fir'd,
 And in that field triumphantly expir'd,
 Where Hector fell by fierce Achilles' spear,
 And great Sarpedon, the renown'd in war ;

Where Simois' streams, encumber'd with the slain,
 Roll'd shields, and helms, and heroes to the main.

Thus while he mourns, the northern blast prevails,
 Breaks all his oars, and rends his flying sails ;
 The prow turns round ; the galley leaves her side
 Bare to the working waves, and roaring tide ;
 While in huge heaps the gathering furies spread,
 And hang in wat'ry mountains o'er his head,
 These ride on waves sublime ; those see the ground
 Low in the boiling deeps, and dark profound.
 Three shatter'd gallees the strong southern blast
 On hidden rocks, with dreadful fury, cast :
 Th' Italians call them altars, as they stood
 Sublime, and heav'd their backs above the flood.
 Three more, fierce Eurus on the Syrtis threw
 From the main sea, and (terrible to view)
 He dash'd, and left the vessels, on the land,
 Intrench'd with mountains of surrounding sand.
 Struck by a billow, in the hero's view,
 From prow to stern the shatter'd galley flew
 Which bore Æonides, and the Lycian crew :
 Swept off the deck, the pilot from the ship, Stunn'd by the stroke, shot headlong down the deep :

The vessel, by the surge tost round and round,
 Sunk, in the whirling gulf devour'd and drown'd,
 Some from the dark abyss emerge again ;
 Arms, planks, and treasures, float along the main,
 And now thy ship, Ilioneus, gives way,
 Nor thine, Achates, can resist the sea ;
 Nor old Aethes his strong galley saves ;
 Then Abas yields to the victorious waves :
 The storm dissolves their well-compacted sides,
 Which drink at many a leak the hostile tides.

Meantime th' imperial monarch of the main
 Heard the loud tumults in his wat'ry reign,
 And saw the furious tempest wide around
 Work up the waters, from the vast profound.
 Then for his liquid realms alarm'd, the god
 Lifts his high head above the stormy flood,
 Majestic and serene : he rolls his eyes,
 And scatter'd wide the Trojan navy spies, Oppress'd by waves below, by thunders from
 the skies.

Full well he knew his sister's endless hate,
 Her wiles and arts to sink the Trojan state.
 To Eurus, and the western blast, he cry'd,
 Does your high birth inspire this boundless pride,
 Audacious winds ! without a pow'r from me,
 To raise, at will, such mountains on the sea ?
 Thus to confound heav'n, earth, the air, and main ?
 Whom I—but first I'll calm the waves again.
 But if you tempt my rage a second time,
 Know, that some heavier vengeance waits the crime.

Hence ; fly with speed ; from me, your tyrant tell,
 That to my lot this wat'ry empire fell.
 Bid him his rocks, your darksome dungeons keep,
 Nor dare usurp the trident of the deep.
 There, in that gloomy court, display his pow'r,
 And hear his tempests round their caverns roar.

He spoke, and speaking chas'd the cloud
 away,
 Hush'd the loud billows, and restor'd the day.
 Cymothœ guards the vessels in the flock,
 And Triton heaves 'em from the pointed rock.

With his huge trident, the majestic god
Clear'd the wild Syrtes, and compos'd the flood ;
Then mounted on his radiant car he rides,
And wheels along the level of the tides.
As when sedition fires th' ignoble crowd,
And the wild rabble storms and thirsts for blood :
Of stones and brands, a mingled tempest flies,
With all the sudden arms that rage supplies :
If some grave fire appears, amid the strife,
In morals strict, and innocence of life.
All stand attentive ; while the sage controls
Their wrath, and calms the tumult of their souls.
So did the roaring deeps their rage compose,
When the great father of the floods arose.
Rapt by his steeds he flies in open day,
Throws up the reins, and skims the wat'ry way.

The Trojans, weary'd with the storm, explore
The nearest land, and reach the Libyan shore.
Far in a deep recess, her jutting sides
An ile projects, to break the rolling tides,
And forms a port, where, curling from the sea,
The waves steal back, and wind into a bay.
On either side, sublime in air, arise } [skies ;
Two tow'ring rocks, whose summits brave the }
Low at their feet the sleeping ocean lies :
Crown'd with a gloomy shade of waving woods,
Their awful brows hang nodding o'er the floods.
Oppos'd to these, a secret grotto stands,
The haunt of Nereids, fram'd by nature's hands ;
Where polish'd seats appear of living stone,
And limpid rills, that tinkle as they run.
No cable here, nor circling anchor binds
The floating vessel harass'd with the winds.
The Dardan hero brings to this retreat
Sev'n shatter'd ships, the relics of his fleet.
With fierce desire to gain the friendly strand,
The Trojans leap in rapture to the land,
And, drench'd in brine, lie stretch'd along the } sand

Achates strikes the fire, and from the stroke
The lurking seeds of fire in sparkles broke ;
The catching flame on leaves and stubble preys,
Then gathers strength, and mounts into a blaze.
Tir'd with their labours, they prepare to dine,
And grind their corn, infected with the brine.

Æneas mounts a rock, and thence surveys
The wide and wat'ry prospect of the seas ;
Now hopes the shatter'd Phrygian ships to find,
Antheus, or Capys, driving with the wind ;
And now, Caius' glitt'ring arms to spy,
Wide o'er the vast horizon darts his eye.
The chief could view no vessel on the main ;
But three tall stags stalk'd proudly o'er the
plain ;
Before the herd their beamy fronts they rais'd ;
Stretch'd out in length, the train along the valley
graz'd.
The prince, who spy'd 'em on the shore below,
Stopp'd short—then snatch'd the feather'd shafts
and bow,
Which good Achates bore : his arrows fled ;
And first he laid the lordly leaders dead ;
Next all th' ignoble vulgar he pursu'd,
And with his shafts dispers'd 'em thro' the wood ;
Nor ceas'd the chief, 'till, stretch'd beneath his feet,
Lay sev'n huge stags, the number of his fleet.

VOL. XII.

Back to the port the victor bends his way,
And with his friends divides the copious prey.
The generous wine to crown the genial feast,
Which kind Acestes gave his parting guest,
Next to his sad associates he imparts ;
And with these words revives their drooping hearts.

Friends ! we have known more toils, than now
we know,

By long experience exercis'd in woe ;
And soon to these disasters shall be giv'n
A certain period by relenting heav'n.
Think, how you saw the dire Cyclopean shore,
Heard Scylla's rocks, and all her monsters, roar.
Dismiss your fears ; on these misfortunes past
Your minds with pleasure may reflect at last.
Through such varieties of woes, we tend
To promis'd Latium, where our toils shall end :
Where the kind fates shall peaceful seats ordain,
And Troy, in all her glories, rise again.
With manly patience bear your present state,
And with firm courage wait a better fate.

So spoke the chief, and hid his inward smart ;
Hope smoooth'd his looks, but anguish rack'd his heart.

The hungry crowd prepare, without delay,
To dress the banquet, and to share the prey.
Some from the body strip the smoking hide,
Some cut in morsels, and the parts divide ;
These bid, with busy care, the flames aspire ;
Those roast the limbs, yet quiv'ring o'er the fire.
Thus, while their strength and spirits they restore,
The brazen cauldrons smoke along the shore.
Stretch'd on the grass, their bodies they recline,
Enjoy the rich repast, and quaff the gen'rous wine.

The rage of hunger quell'd, they pass'd away
In long and melancholy talk the day ;
Nor knew, by fears and hopes alternate led,
Whether to deem their friends distress'd, or dead,
Apart the pious chief, who suffer'd most,
Bemoans brave Gyas and Cloanthus lost ;
For Lycus' fate, for Amycus he weeps,
And great Orontes, whelm'd beneath the deeps.

Now, from high heav'n, imperial Jove surveys
The nations, shores, and navigable seas ;
There, as he sate, enthron'd above the skies,
Full on the Libyan realms he fix'd his eyes.
When lo ! the mournful queen of love appears ;
Her starry eyes were dimm'd with streaming tears ;
Who to the fire her humble suit address'd,
The schemes of fate revolving in his breast.

Oh thou ! whose sacred, and eternal sway,
Aw'd by thy thunders, men and gods obey ;
What have my poor exhausted Trojans done ?
Or what, alas ! my dear unhappy son ?
Still, for the sake of Italy, deny'd
All other regions, all the world beside ?
Sure, once you promis'd, that a race divine
Of Roman chiefs should spring from Teucer's line ;
The world in future ages to command,
And in the empire grasp the sea and land.
Oh ! sov'reign father, say ! what cause could move
The fix'd unalterable word of Jove ?
Which sooth'd my grief, when Ilium felt her
doom ;

And Troy I balanc'd with the fates of Rome.
But see ! their fortune still pursues her blow ;
When wilt thou fix a period to their woe ?

L I

In safety, bold Antenor broke his way
Through hoſts of foes, and pierc'd th' Illyrian bay,
Where, through nine ample mouths, Timavus
pours,

Wide as a ſea, and deluges the ſhores;
The flood rebellows, and the mountain roars,
Yet with his colonies, ſecure he came,
Rais'd Padua's walls, and gave the realms a name.
Then fix'd his Trojan arms; his labours ceaſe;
And now the hoary monarch reigns in peace.
But we, your progeny; ordain'd to riſe,
And ſhare the' eternal honours of the ſkies,
To glut the rage of one, our veſſels loſt,
Barr'd by her vengeance, from the promis'd coaſt.
Are theſe the palms that virtue muſt obtain,
And is our empire thus reſtor'd again?

The fire of men and gods, ſuperior, ſmil'd
On the ſad queen, and gently kiſ'd his child.
Then, with thoſe looks that clear the clouded ſkies,
And calm the raging tempeſt, he replies:
Daughter, diſmiſs your fears; by doom divine
Fix'd are the fates of your immortal line.
Your eyes Lavinium's promis'd walls ſhall ſee,
And here we ratify our firſt decree.
Your ion, the brave Æneas, ſoon ſhall riſe,
Himſelf a god; and mount the ſtarry ſkies.
To ſooth your care, theſe ſecrets I relate
From the dark volumes of eternal fate:
The chief fair Italy ſhall reach, and there
With mighty nations wage a dreadful war.
New cities raiſe, the ſavage nations awe,
And to the conquer'd kingdoms give the law.
The fierce Rutulians vanquiſh'd by his ſword,
Three years ſhall Latium own him ſovereign lord.
Your dear Æſcanus then, the royal boy,
(Now call'd Iſlus, ſince the fall of Troy)
While thirty rolling years their orbs complete,
Shall wear the crown, and from Lavinium's feat
Transfer the kingdom? and, of mighty length
Raiſe tow'ring Alba, glorying in her ſtrength.
There, ſhall the Trojan race enjoy the pow'r,
And fill the throne three hundred winters more.
Ilia, the royal prieſteſs, next ſhall bear
Two lovely infants to the god of war,
Nurs'd by a tawny wolf, her eldeſt ſon,
Imperial Romulus, ſhall mount the throne;
From his own name, the people Romans call,
And from his father Mars, his riſing wall.
No limits have I fix'd, of time, or place,
To the vaſt empire of the godlike race.
Ev'n haughty Juno ſhall the nation love,
Who now alarms earth, ſeas, and heav'n above;
And join her friendly counſels to my own,
With endleſs fame the ſons of Rome to crown,
The world's majeſtic lords, the nation of the gown.

This word be fate——an hour ſhall wing its way,
When Troy in duſt ſhall proud Mycenæ lay.
In Greece, Aſtarucus, his ſons ſhall reign,
And vanquiſh'd Argos wear the victor's chain.
Then Cæſar, call'd by great Iſlus' name,
(Whoſe empire ocean bounds, the ſtars his fame)
Sprung from the noble Trojan line, ſhall riſe Charg'd with his Eaſtern ſpoils, and mount the ſkies.

Him, ſhall you ſee, advanc'd to theſe abodes;
Ador'd by Rome; a god among the gods.

From that bleſt hour all violence ſhall ceaſe,
The age grow mild; and ſofter into reign,
With righteous Rhemus ſhall Quirinus peign,
Old faith, and Veſta, ſhall return again;
With many a ſolid hinge, and brazen bar,
Shall Janus cloſe the horrid gates of war.
Within the ſane dire Fury ſhall be bound,
With a huge heap of ſhatter'd arms around;
Wrapt in an hundred chains, beneath the load
The fiend ſhall roar, and grind his teeth in blood.

The thund'rer ſaid, and down th' ærial way
Sent with his high commands the ſon of May;
That Carthage may throw wide her friendly
tow'rs,

And grant her gueſts the freedom of her ſhores;
Leſt Dido, blind to fate, and Jove's decree,
Should ſhut her ports, and drive them to the ſea.
Swift on the ſteerage of his wings he flies,
And ſhoots the vaſt expanſion of the ſkies.
Arriv'd, th' Almighty's orders he performs,
Charm'd by the god, no more the nation ſtorms
With jealous rage; in chief the queen inclin'd
To peace, and mild benevolence of mind.

All night involv'd in cares Æneas lay,
But roſe impatient at the dawn of day,
To view the coaſt, the country to explore,
And learn if men, or beaſts poſſeſs'd the ſhore,
(For wide around the gloomy waſte extends)
And bear the tidings to his anxious friends.
Beneath a ſhelving rock his ſleet diſpos'd,
With waving woods and awful ſhades enclos'd,
Two glitt'ring ſpears he ſhook with martial pride
And ſoith he march'd; Achatas at his ſide.
As through the wilds the chief his courſe purſu'd,
He meets his goddeſs-mother in the wood;
In ſhow, an huntreſs ſhe appear'd, array'd
In arms and habit like a Spartan maid;
Or ſwift Harpalycæ of Thrace, whoſe ſpeed
Out-ſlew the wings of winds, and tir'd the rapid ſteed.

Bare was her knee; and with an eaſy pride
Her poliſh'd bow hung graceful at her ſide.
Cloſe, in a knot, her flowing robes ſhe drew;
Looke to the winds her wanton trefles flew.
Ho! gentle youths, the cry'd, have you beheld
One of my ſiſters wand'ring o'er the field,
Girt with a ſpeckled lynx's vary'd hide,
A painted quiver rattling at her ſide?
Or have you ſeen her with an eager pace
Urge with full cries the ſoaming boar in chafe?
None of your charming ſiſterhood (he ſaid)
Have we beheld, or heard, oh! beauteous maid,
Your name, oh! nymph, or oh! fair goddeſs, ſay
A goddeſs, ſure, or ſiſter of the day,
You draw your birth from ſome immortal line,
Your looks are heav'nly, and your voice divine,
'Tell me, on what new climate are we thrown?
Alike the natives and the lands unknown;
By the wild waves, and ſwelling ſurges toſt,
We wander ſtrangers on a foreign coaſt.
Then will we ſtill invoke your ſacred name,
And with fat victims ſhall your altars flame.

No goddeſs' awful name, ſhe ſaid, I bear;
For know, the Tyrian maids, by cuſtom, here,
The purple buſkin, and a quiver wear;
Your eyes behold Agenor's walls aſpire;
The Punic realms; a colony from Tyre's

See! wide around, waste Libya's bounds appear,
 Whose swarthy sons are terrible in war,
 From her fierce brother's vengeance, o'er the main,
 From Tyre, fled Dido, and enjoys the reign:
 The tale is intricate, perplex'd and long;
 Hear then, in short, the story of her wrong.
 Sichæus was her lord, beyond the rest
 Of the Phœnician race, with riches blest;
 Much lov'd by Dido, whom her father led
 Pure, and a virgin, to his nuptial bed.
 Her brother, fierce Pygmalion, fill'd the throne
 Of Tyre, in vice unrivall'd and alone.
 Ev'n at the sacred altar in a strife
 By stealth the tyrant shed his brother's life;
 Blind with the charms of gold, his faulchion drove,
 Stern, and regardless of his sister's love.
 Then, with fond hopes, deceiv'd her for a time,
 And forg'd pretences to conceal the crime.
 But her unbury'd lord, before her sight,
 Rose in a frightful vision of the night:
 Around her bed he stalks; grim! ghastly! pale!
 And, staring wide, unfolds the horrid tale
 Of the dire altars, dash'd with blood around;
 Then bates his breast, and points to every wound;
 Warns her to fly the land without delay;
 And to support her through the tedious way,
 Shows where, in massy piles, his bury'd treasure
 lay.

Rous'd, and alarm'd, the wife her flight intends,
 Obeys the summons, and convenes her friends:
 They meet, they join, and in her cause engage,
 All, who detest, or dread the tyrant's rage.
 Some ships, already rigg'd they seiz'd, and stow'd
 Their sides with gold; then launch'd into the flood.
 They sail; the bold exploit a woman guides;
 Pygmalion's wealth is wasted o'er the tides.
 They came, where now you see new Carthage rise,
 And yon proud citadel invade the skies.
 The wand'ring exiles bought a space of ground
 Which one bull-hide enclos'd and compass'd round;
 Hence Byrsa nam'd: but now, ye strangers, say,
 Who? whence you are? and whither lies your
 way?

Deep, from his soul, he draws a length of sighs,
 And, with a mournful accent, thus replies.
 Should I, O goddess, from their source relate,
 Or you attend, the annals of our fate,
 The golden sun would sink, and ev'ning close,
 Before my tongue could tell you half our woes.
 By Grecian foes expell'd from Troy we came,
 From ancient Troy (if e'er you heard the name)
 Through various seas; when lo! a tempest roars,
 And raging drives us on the Libyan shores.
 The good Æneas am I call'd; my fame,
 And brave exploits, have reach'd the starry frame:
 From Grecian flames I bear my rescu'd gods,
 Safe in my vessels, o'er the stormy floods.
 In search of ancient Italy I rove,
 And draw my lineage from Almighty Jove.
 A goddess-mother and the fates, my guides,
 With twenty ships I plough'd the Phrygian tides,
 Scarce sev'n of all my fleet are left behind,
 Rent by the waves, and shatter'd by the wind.
 Myself, from Europe and from Asia cast,
 A helpless stranger rove the Libyan waste.

No more could Venus hear her son bewail
 His various woes, but interrupts his tale.

Whoe'er you are, arriv'd in those abodes,
 No wretch I deem abandon'd by the gods;
 Hence then, with haste, to yon proud palace bend
 Your course, and on the gracious queen attend.
 Your friends are safe, the winds are chang'd again,
 Or all my skill in augury is vain!
 See those twelve swans, a flock triumphant, fly,
 Whom lately shooting from th' ethereal sky,
 Th' imperial bird of Jove dispers'd around,
 Some hover'ing o'er, some settling on the ground.
 As these returning clap their founding wings,
 Ride round the skies, and sport in airy rings;
 So have your friends and ships possess'd the strand;
 Or with full-bellying sails approach the land.
 Haste to the palace then, without delay,
 And, as this path directs, pursue your way.
 She said, and turning round, her neck she slow'd;
 That with celestial charms divinely glow'd.
 Her waving locks immortal odours shed,
 And breath'd ambrosial scents around her head.
 Her sweeping robe trail'd pompous as she trod,
 And her majestic port confess'd the god.
 Soon as he knows her through the coy disguise,
 He thus pursues his mother as she flies.

Must never, never more our hands be join'd?
 Are you, like heaven, grown cruel and unkind?
 Why must those borrow'd shapes delude your son?
 And why, ah! why those accents not your own?

He said; then sought the town; but Venus shrouds

And wraps their persons in a veil of clouds;
 That none may interpose to cause delay,
 Nor fondly curious ask them of their way.
 Through air sublime the queen of love retreats
 To Paphos' stately tow'rs, and blissful seats;
 Where to her name an hundred altars rise,
 And gums, and flow'r wreaths, perfume the skies.
 Now o'er the lofty hill they bend their way,
 Whence all the rising town in prospect lay,
 And tow'rs and temples; for the mountain's brow
 Hung bending o'er, and shaded all below.
 Where late the cottage stood, with glad surprise
 The prince beholds the stately palace rise;
 On the pav'd streets, and gates, looks wond'ring
 down,

And all the crowd and tumult of the town.
 The Tyrians ply their work; with many a groan
 These roll, or heave some huge unwieldy stone;
 Those bid the lofty citadel ascend;
 Some in vast length th' embattled walls extend;
 Others for future dwellings choose the ground,
 Mark out the spot, and draw the furrow round.
 Some, useful laws propose, and some the choice
 Of sacred senates, and elect by voice.
 These sink a spacious mole beneath the sea,
 Those a huge theatre's foundation lay;
 Hew massy columns from the mountains side,
 Of future scenes an ornamental pride.
 Thus to their toils, in early summer, run
 The clust'ring bees, and labour in the sun;
 Led forth, in colonies, their buzzing race,
 Or work the liquid sweets, and thicken to a mass.

The busy nation flies from flow'r to flow'r;
 And hoards, in curious cell, the golden store;
 A chosen troop before the gate attends,
 To take the burdens, and relieve their friends;

Warm at the fragrant work, in bands they drive
The drone, a lazy robber, from the hive.
The prince surveys the lofty tow'rs, and cries,
Blest, blest are you, whose walls already rise:
Then, strange to tell, he mingled with the crowds,
And pass'd, unseen, involv'd in mantling clouds.

Amid the town, a stately grove display'd
A cooling shelter, and delightful shade.
Here, tost by winds and waves, the Tyrians found
A courser's head within the sacred ground;
An omen sent by Juno, to declare
A fruitful soil; and race renown'd in war.
A temple here Sidonian Dido rais'd
To heaven's dread emprefs, that with riches blaz'd;
Unnumber'd gifts adorn'd the costly shrine,
By her own presence hallow'd and divine.
Bras were the steps, the beams with bras were strong,

The lofty doors on brazen hinges rung.
Here, a strange scene before his eyes appears,
To raise his courage, and dispel his fears;
Here first, he hopes his fortunes to redress:
And finds a glimmering prospect of success.
While for the queen he waited, and amaz'd,
O'er the proud shrine and pompous temple gaz'd;
While he the town admires, and wond'ring stands
At the rich labours of the artists' hands;
Amid the story'd walls, he saw appear,
In speaking paint, the tedious Trojan war;
The war, that fame had blaz'd the world around,
And every battle fought on Phrygian ground.
There Priam stood, and Agamemnon here,
And Pelus' wrathful son, to both severe.
Struck with the view, oh friend! the hero cries,
(Tears, as he spoke, came starting from his eyes)
Lo! the wide world our miseries employ;
What realm abounds not with the woes of Troy?
See! where the venerable Priam stands!
See virtue honour'd on the Libyan sands!
For Troy, the generous tears of Carthage flow;
And Tyrian breasts are touch'd with human woe.
Now banish fear, for since the Trojan name
Is known, we find our safety in our fame.

Thus while his soul the moving picture sed,
A show'r of tears the groaning hero shed.
For here, the fainting Greeks in flight he view'd;
And there the Trojans to their walls pursued
By plum'd Achilles, with his dreadful spear,
Whirl'd on his kindling chariot through the war.
Not far from thence, proud Rhaefus' tents he knows
By their white veils, that match'd the winter
snows,

Betray'd and stretch'd amidst his slaughter'd train,
And, while he slept, by fierce Tydides slain;
Who drove his coursers from the scene of blood,
Ere the fierce steeds had tasted Trojan food,
Or drank divine Scamander's fatal food.

There Troilus flies disarm'd (unhappy boy!)
From stern Achilles, round the fields of Troy:
Unequal he! to such an arm in war!
Supine, and trailing from his empty car,
Still, though in death, he grasps the flowing reins,
His startled coursers whirl him o'er the plains:
The spear inverted streaks the dust around;
His snowy neck and tresses sweep the ground.
Mean time a penfive supplicating train
Of Trojan matrons, to Minerva's fane

In sad procession with a robe repair,
Beat their white breasts, and rend their golden hair.
Unmov'd with pray'rs, disdainfully the frown'd,
And fix'd her eyes, relentless on the ground.
Achilles here; his vengeance to enjoy,
Thrice dragg'd brave Hector round the walls of Troy:

Then the mournful fire, the victor sold
The breathless body of his son for gold.
His groans now deepen'd, and new tears he shed,
To see the spoils and chariot of the dead,
And Priam both his trembling hands extend;
And, gash'd with wounds, his dear disfigur'd friend.
Mix'd with the Grecian peers, and hostile train,
Himself he view'd, conspicuous in the plain;
And swarthy Memnon, glorious to behold,
His eastern hosts, and arms that flame with gold.
All furious led Penthesilea there,
With moony shields, her Amazons to war;
Around her breast her golden belt she threw;
Then through the thick-embattled squadrons flew;
Amidst the thousands stood the dire alarms,
And the fierce maid engag'd the men in arms.

Thus, while the Trojan hero stood amaz'd,
And, fix'd in wonder, on the picture gaz'd,
With all her guards, fair Dido, from below,
Ascends the dome, majestically slow.
As on Eurota's banks, or Cynthus' heads,
A thousand beauteous nymphs Diana leads,
While round their quiver'd queen the quires advance,

She tow'rs majestic, as she leads the dance;
She moves in pomp superior to the rest,
And secret transports touch Latona's breast.
So pass'd the graceful queen amidst her train,
To speed her labours and her future reign.
Then with her guards surrounded, in the gate,
Beneath the spacious dome, sublime the fate.
She shares their labours, or by lots she draws;
And to the crowd administers the laws.
When lo! Æneas brave Cloanthus spies,
Antheus, and great Sergestus, with surprise,
Approach the throne, attended by a throng
Of Trojan friends, that pour'd in tides along;
Whom the wild whistling winds and tempests
bore,

And widely scatter'd on a distant shore.
Loft in his hopes and fears, amaz'd he stands,
And with Achatas longs to join their hands:
But doubtful of th' event, he first attends,
Wrapt in the cloud, the fortune of his friends;
Anxious, and eager till he knew their state,
And where their vessels lay, and what their fate.
With cries, the royal favour to implore,
They came, a train selected, from the shore:
Then, leave obtain'd, Ilioneus begun,
And, with their common suit, address the throne.

Oh! queen, indulg'd by Jove, these lofty tow'rs
And this proud town to raise on Libyan shores,
With high commands, a savage race to awe,
And to the barbarous natives give the law,
We wretched Trojans, an abandon'd race,
Tost round the seas, implore your royal grace;
Oh! check your subjects, and their rage reclaim,
Ere their wild fury wrap our fleet in flame.
Oh! save a pious race; regard our cry;
And view our anguish with a melting eye.

We come not, mighty queen, an hostile band,
With sword and fire, and, ravaging the land,
To bear your spoils triumphant to the shore;
No— to such thoughts the vanquish'd durst not
fear.

Once by Oenotrias till'd, there lies a place,
'Twas call'd Hesperia by the Grecian race,
(For martial deeds and fruits, renown'd by fame)
But since Italia, from the leader's name;
To that blest shore we steer'd our destin'd way,
When sudden, dire Orion rous'd the sea;
All charg'd with tempests rose the baleful star,
And on our navy pour'd his wat'ry war;
With sweeping whirlwinds cast our vessels wide,
Dash'd on rough rocks, or driving with the tide:
The few sad relics of our navy bore
Their course to this inhospitable shore.
What are the customs of this barbarous place?
What more than savage this inhuman race?
In arms they rise, and drive us from the strand,
From the last verge, and limits of the land.
Know, if divine and human laws you slight,
The gods, the gods will all our wrongs requite;
Vengeance is their's; and their's to guard his right.

Æneas was our king, of high renown;
Great, good, and brave; and war was all his own.
If still he lives, and breathes this vital air,
Nor we, his friends and subjects, shall despair;
Nor you, great queen, repent, that you employ
Your kind compassion in the cause of Troy.
Besides, on high the Trojan ensigns soar,
And Trojan cities grace Sicilia's shore;
Where great Aæetes, of the Dardan strain,
Deriv'd from ancient Teucer, holds his reign.
Permit us, from your woods, new planks and oars
To sell, and bring our vessels on your shores;
That, if our prince and friends return again,
With joy, from Latium, we may plough the main.
But if those hopes are vanish'd quite away,
If lost, and swallow'd in the Libyan sea,
You lie, great guardian of the Trojan state,
And young Iulus shares his father's fate;
Oh! let us sink Sicilia's shores again,
And fly from hence to good Aæetes' reign.
He spoke; a loud assent ran murmuring thro'
the train.

Thus then, in short, the gracious queen replies,
While on the ground she fixt her modest eyes:
Trojans, be bold; against my will, my fate,
A throne unsettled, and an infant state,
Bid me defend my realms with all my pow'rs,
And guard with these severities my shores.
Lives there a stranger to the Trojan name,
Their valour, arms, and chiefs of mighty fame?
We know the war that set the world on fire;
Nor are so void of sense the sons of Tyre:
For here his beams indulgent Phœbus sheds,
And rolls his flaming chariot o'er our heads.
Seek you, my friends, the blest Saturnian plains,
Or fair Trinacra, where Aæetes reigns?
With aids supply'd, and furnish'd from my stores,
Safe will I send you from the Libyan shores.
Or would you stay to raise this growing town?
Fix here your seat; and Carthage is your own.
Haste, draw your ships to shore; to me the same,
Your Troy and Tyre shall differ but in name.

And oh! that great Æneas had been tost,
By the same storm, on the same friendly coast!
But I will send, my borders to explore,
And trace the windings of the mazy shore.
Perchance, already thrown on these abodes,
He roams the towns, or wanders thro' the woods.
Rais'd in their hopes the friend and hero stood;
And long'd to break, transported, from the cloud.
Oh! goddess-born! cry'd brave Achates, say,
What are your thoughts, and why this long delay?
All safe you see; your friends and fleet restor'd;
One (whom we saw) the whirling gulf devour'd.
Lo! with the rest your mother's words agree,
All but Orontes 'scap'd the raging sea.

Swift as he spoke, the vapours break away,
Dissolve in ether, and refine to day.
Radiant in open view, Æneas stood,
In form and looks, majestic as a god.
Flush'd with the bloom of youth, his features shine,
His hair in ringlets waves with grace divine.
The queen of love the glance divine supplies,
And breathes immortal spirit in his eyes.
Like Parian marble beautiful to behold,
Or silver's milder gleam in burnish'd gold,
Or polish'd iv'ry, shone the godlike man:
All food surpris'd; and thus the prince began.

Æneas, whom you seek, you here survey;
'Escap'd the tempest of the Libyan sea,
O Dido, gracious queen, who make alone
The woes, and cause, of wretched Troy you own;
And shelter in your walls, with pious care,
Her sons, the relics of the Grecian war;
Who all the forms of misery have bore,
Storms on the sea, and dangers on the shore;
Nor we, nor all the Dardan nation, hurl'd Wide o'er the globe, and scatter'd round the world,

But the good gods, with blessings, shall repay
Your bounteous deeds, the gods and only they;
(If pious acts, if justice they regard);
And your clear conscience stands its own reward.
How blest this age that hath such virtue seen?
How blest the parents of so great a queen?
While to the sea the rivers roll, and shades
With awful pomp surround the mountain heads;
While ether shines, with golden planets grac'd,
So long your honour, name, and praise shall last:
Whatever realm my fortune has assign'd,
Still will I bear your image in my mind.

This said, the pious chief of Troy extends
His hands around, and hails his joyful friends:
His left Sergeus grasp'd with vast delight,
To great Ilioues he gave the right.
Cloanthus, Gyas, and the Dardan train,
All, in their turns, embrac'd the prince again.
Charm'd with his presence, Dido gaz'd him o'er,
Admir'd his fortune much, his perion more.
What fate, O goddess-born, the said, has tost
So brave a hero on this barbarous coast?
Are you Æneas, who in Ida's grove
Sprung from Anchises and the queen of love
By Simois' streams? and now I call to mind,
When Teucer left his native shores behind;
The banish'd prince to Sidon came, to gain
Great Belus' aid, to fix him in his reign;
Then the rich Cyprian isle, my warlike sire
Subdu'd, and ravag'd wide with sword and fire.

From him I learnt the Grecian kings of fame,
The fall of Ilion, and your glorious name:
He on your valour, though a foe, with joy
Would dwell, and proudly trace his birth from
Come to my palace then, my royal guest, [Troy.
And, with your friends, indulge the genial feast.
My wand'ring and my fate resembling yours,
At length I settled on these Libyan shores;
And, touch'd with miseries myself have known,
I view, with pity, woes so like my own.

She spoke, then leads him to her proud abodes,
Ordains a feast, and offerings to the gods.
Twice fifty bleating lambs and ewes she sends,
And twice ten brawny oxen to his friends:
A hundred bristly boars, and monstrous swine;
With Bacchus' gifts, a store of generous wine.
The inner rooms in regal pomp display'd,
The splendid feasts in ample halls are made;
Where, labour'd o'er with art, rich carpets lie,
That glow resplendent with the purple dye.
The boards are pill'd with plate of curious mould;
And their forefathers' deeds, in times of old,
Blaz'd round the bowls, and charg'd the rising gold.

No more the prince his eager love suppress,
All the fond parent struggled in his breast.
He sends Achates to inform his son,
And guide the young Ascanius to the town;
(On his Ascanius turn his fear and joy,
The father's cares are center'd in the boy;)
To bring rich presents to the queen of Tyre,
And relics, rescued from the Trojan fire.
A mantle wrought with saffron foilage round;
And a stiff robe with golden figures crown'd;
Fair Helen's dress, when, fir'd with lawless joy,
She left her native walls to ruin Troy,
(Her mother's present in the bridal hour;)
With gold a shining sceptre studded o'er,
That went Iliene's fair hand to grace,
The eldest nymph of Priam's beautiful race;
Her necklace, strung with pearls: her crown that glows

Instarr'd with gems and gold in double rows.
To bring the splendid gifts without delay,
Swift to the fleet, Achates bends his way,

But beautiful Venus in her breast design'd
New wiles, and plann'd new counsels in her mind,
That winged Cupid to the court should come
Like sweet Ascanius, in Ascanius' room;
With the rich gifts the Tyrian queen inspire,
And kindle in her veins the raging fire.
Her dress of Juno's arts, who guards the place,
Her just suspicions of the treach'rous race,
Break, each revolving night, her golden rest:
And thus the suppliant queen the god address'd.

Oh son! my strength! supreme in heaven above!
Whose arrows triumph o'er the bolts of Jove:
To thee I fly, thy succour to implore,
Court thy protection, and thy pow'r adore.
To tell how Juno's restless rage has tost
Your brother round the seas, and ev'ry coast,
Is but to mention what too well you know,
Who sigh'd my sighs, and wept a mother's woe.
Him, in her own town, the Tyrian queen detains,
With soft seducements, from the Latian plains.
But much I fear that hospitable place,
Where Juno reigns the guardian of the race:

And left this fair occasion she improve,
Know, I design to fire the queen with love;
A love, beyond the cure of pow'r's divine;
A love as strong, and violent as mine.
But how the proud Phœnician to surprize
With such a passion, hear what I advise.
The royal youth, Ascanius, from the port,
Hastes, by his father's summons, to the court;
With costly presents charg'd, he takes his way,
Sav'd from the Trojan flames, and stormy sea;
But to prevent suspicion, will I steep
His temples in the dews of balmy sleep,
Then to Cythera's sacred seats remove,
Or softly lay him in th' Idalian grove.
This one revolving night, thyself a boy,
Wear thou the features of the youth of Tróy;
And when the queen, transported with thy charms
Amidst the feast, shall strain thee in her arms,
The gentle poison by degrees inspire
Through all her breast; then fan the rising fire,
And kindle all her soul. The mother said,
With joy the god her soft commands obey'd.
Alide his quiver, and his wings he flung,
And, like the boy Iulus, tript along.

Mean time the goddess on Ascanius throws
A balmy slumber and a sweet repose;
Lull'd in her lap to rest, the queen of love
Convey'd him to the high Idalian grove.
There on a flow'ry bed her charge she laid,
And, breathing round him, rose the fragrant shade

Now Cupid, pleas'd his orders to obey,
Brought the rich gifts; Achates led the way.
He came, and found on costly carpets spread
The queen majestic, midst her golden bed.
The great Æneas and the Trojans lie
On pompous couches stain'd with Tyrian dye:
Soft towels for their hands th' attendants bring,
And limpid water from the crystal spring.
They wash; the menial train the tables spread;
And heap in glitt'ring canisters the bread.
To dress the feast, full fifty handmaids join,
And burn rich incense to the pow'r's divine;
A hundred boys and virgins stood around,
The banquet marshall'd, and the goblet crown'd
To fill th' embroider'd beds the Tyrians come
Rank behind rank; and crowd the regal room.
The guests the gorgeous gifts and boy admire,
His voice, and looks, that glow with youthful fire.
The veil and foliage wond'ring they behold,
And the rich robe that flam'd with figur'd gold
But chief the queen, the boy and presents move,
The queen, already doom'd to fatal love.
Insatiate in her joy, the fat amaz'd,
Gaz'd on his face, and kindled as she gaz'd.
First, his dissembled father he careft,
Hung round his neck, and play'd upon his breast
Next to the queen's embraces he withdrew;
She look'd, and sent her soul at ev'ry view:
Then took him on her lap, devour'd his charms;
Nor knew poor Dido, blind to future harms,
How great a god she fondled in her arms.
But he, now mindful of his mother, stole
By slow degrees Sitchæus from her soul;
Her soul, rekindling, in her husband's stead,
Admits the prince; the living for the dead.

Soon as the banquet paus'd, to raise their soul
With sparkling wine they crown the mazy bowl

Through the wide hall the rolling echo bounds,
The palace rings, the vaulted dome resounds.
The blazing torches, and the lamps display,
From golden roofs, an artificial day.
Now Dido crowns the bowl of state with wine,
The bowl of Belus, and the regal line.
Her hands aloft the shining goblet hold, [gold.
Pond'rous with gems, and rough with sculptur'd
When silence was proclaim'd, the royal fair
Thus to the gods address her fervent pray'r.

Almighty Jove! who plead'st the stranger's
cause;

Great guardian god of hospitable laws!
Oh! grant this day to circle still with joy,
Through late posterity, to Tyre and Troy.
Be thou, O Bacchus! god of mirth, a guest;
And thou, O Juno! grace the genial feast.
And you, my lords of Tyre, your fears remove,
And show your guests benevolence and love.
She said, and on the board, in open view,
The first libation to the gods she threw:
Then sip'd the wine, and gave to Bitias' hand:
He rose, obedient to the queen's command;
At once the thirsty Trojan swill'd the whole,
Sunk the full gold, and drain'd the foaming bowl.
Then through the peers, with sparkling nectar
crown'd

The goblet circles, and the health goes round.

With curling tresses grac'd, and rich attire,
Iopas stands, and sweeps the golden lyre;
The truths, which ancient Atlas taught, he sings,
And nature's secrets, on the sounding strings.
Why Cynthia changes; why the sun retires,
Shorn of his radiant beams, and genial fires;
From what originals, and causes, came
Mankind and beasts, the rain, and rising flame;
Arcturus, dreadful with his stormy star;
The wat'ry Hyads, and the northern car;
Why suns in summer the slow night detain,
And rush so swift in winter to the main.
With shouts the Tyrians praise the song divine,
And in the loud applause the Trojans join.
The queen, in various talk, prolongs the hours,
Drinks deep of love, and ev'ry word devours;
This moment longs of Hector to inquire,
The next of Priam, his unhappy sire;
What arms adorn'd Aurora's glorious son;
How high, above his hoists, Achilles shone;
How brave Tydides thunder'd on his car;
How his fierce couriers swept the ranks of war.
Nay, but at large, my godlike guest, relate
The Grecian wiles, she said, and Ilion's fate;
How far your course around the globe extends,
And what the woes and fortunes of your friends:
For, since you wander'd ev'ry shore and sea,
Have sev'n revolving summers roll'd away.

B O O K II.

THE ARGUMENT.

Aeneas relates how the city of Troy was taken, after a ten years siege, by the treachery of Sinon, and the stratagem of a wooden horse. He declares the fixt resolution he had taken not to survive the ruins of his country, and the various adventures he met with in the defence of it: at last, having been before advis'd by Hector's ghost, and now by the appearance of his mother Venus, he is prevail'd upon to leave the town, and settle his household gods in another country. In order to this he carries his father off on his shoulders, and leads his little son by the hand, his wife following him behind. When he comes to the place appointed for the general rendezvous, he finds a great confluence of people, but misses his wife, whose ghost afterwards appears to him, and tells him the land which was design'd for him.

ALL gaz'd in silence, with an eager look,
Then from the golden couch the hero spoke.
Ah mighty queen! you urge me to disclose,
And feel, once more, unutterable woes;
How vengeful Greece with victory was crown'd,
And Troy's fair empire humbled to the ground;
Those direful scenes I saw on Phrygia's shore,
Those wars in which so large a part I bore,
The fiercest Argive would with tears bewail,
And stern Ulysses tremble at the tale:
And lo! the night precipitates away;
The stars, grown dim before the dawning day,
Call to repose; but since you long to know,
And curious listen to the story'd woe;
Tho' my shock'd soul recoils, my tongue shall tell,
But with a bleeding heart, how Ilion fell.

The Grecian kings, (for many a rolling year, Repell'd by fate, and harass'd by the war);

By Pallas' aid, of season'd fir compose
A steed, that tow'ring like a mountain rose;
This they pretend their common vow, to gain
A safe return, and measure back the main:
Such the report; but guileful Argos hides
Her bravest heroes in the monster's sides;
Deep, deep within, they throng'd the dreadful gloom,
And half an host ambush'd in the womb.
An isle, in ancient times renown'd by fame,
Lies full in view, and Tenedos the name? [I say,
Once blest with wealth, while Priam held the
But now a broken, rough, and dang'rous bay:
Thither their unsuspected course they bore,
And hid their hosts within the winding shore.
We deem'd them lost sail'd for Greece; transported

Troy

Forgot her woes, and gave a loaf to joy;

Threw wide her gates, and pour'd forth all her
train,

To view th' abandon'd camp, and empty plain.
Here the Dolopian troops their station held;
There proud Achilles' tent o'erlook'd the field;
Here rang'd the thousand vessels stood, and there
In conflicts join'd the furious sons of war.
Some view the gift of Pallas with surprise,
The fatal monster, and its wondrous fize.
And first Thymætes mov'd the crowd to lead
And lodge within the tower the lofty steed;
Or, with design, his country to destroy,
Or fate determin'd now the fall of Troy.
But hoary Capys, and the wise, require
To plunge the treacherous gift of Greece in fire,
Or whelm the mighty monster in the tides,
Or bore the ribs, and search the cavern'd sides,
Their own wild will the noisy crowds obey,
And vote, as partial fancy points the way;
Till bold Laocoon, with a mighty train,
From the high tower rush'd furious to the plain;
And sent his voice from far, with rage inspir'd—
What madness, Trojans, has your bosoms fir'd?
Think you the Greeks are sail'd before the wind? hind?

Think you these presents safe, they leave be-
And is Ulysses banish'd from your mind?
Or this prodigious fabric must enclose,
Deep in its darksome womb, our ambush'd foes;
Or 'tis some engine, rais'd to batter down
The tow'rs of Ilium, or command the town;
Ah! trust not Greece, nor touch her gifts abhor'd;
Her gifts are more destructive than her sword.

Swift as the word, his pond'rous lance he
Against the sides the furious javelin flew [threw];
Thro' the wide womb a spacious passage found,
And shook with long vibrations in the wound.
The monster groans, and shakes the distant shore;
And, round his caverns roll'd, the deep'ning thunders roar.

Then had not partial fate conspir'd to blind,
With more than madness, ev'ry Trojan mind,
The crowd the treach'rous ambush had explor'd,
And not a Greek had escap'd the vengeful sword;
Old Priam still his empire would enjoy,
And still thy tow'rs had stood, majestic Troy!

Meantime, before the king, the Dardan swains,
With shouts triumphant, brought a youth in chains,

A willing captive to the Trojan hands,
To open Ilium to the Grecian hands;
Bold and determin'd either fate to try;
Resolv'd to circumvent, or fix'd to die.
The troops tumultuous gather round the foe,
To see the captive, and insult his woe.
Now hear the falsehoods of the Grecian train;
All, all in one; a nation in a man.
For while confounded and disarm'd he stands,
And trembling views around the Phrygian bands,
Alas! what hospitable land, (he cry'd)
Or oh! what seas a wand'ring wretch will hide?
Not only banish'd from the Grecian state;
But Troy, avenging Troy, demands my fate.

His melting tears, and moving sighs control
Our rising rage, and soften ev'ry soul.
We bid him tell his race, and long to know
The fate and tidings of a captive foe.

At length, encourag'd thus, the youth reply'd,
And laid his well-dissembled fears aside.

All, all, with truth, great monarch, I confess,
And first I own my birth deriv'd from Greece;
Wretch as he is, yet Sinon can defy
The frowns of fortune, and disdain a lie.
You know, perchance, great Palamedes' name,
Through many a distant realm renown'd by fame;
Condemn'd, though guiltless, when he mov'd for
peace,

Condemn'd for treason by the voice of Greece.
Though false the charge, the glorious hero bled,
But now the Greeks deplore the warrior dead.
Me, yet a youth, my father sent to share
With him, my kinsman, in the toils of war.
Long as that hero stood secure from fate,
Long as his counsels prop'd the Grecian state,
Ev'n I could boast an honourable name,
And claim some title to a share of fame;
But when the prince, (a well-known truth I tell)
By dire Ulysses' arts and envy fell;
Soon as he ceas'd to breathe this vital air,
I drag'd my days in darkness and despair,
And, if kind heav'n shou'd give me back once
more

Safe and triumphant to my native shore,
For innocence condemn'd, revenge I vow'd,
Mad as I was, and spoke my rage aloud.
This mov'd Ulysses' hate, and hence arose
My past misfortunes, and my present woes.
Eager he sought the means, and watch'd the time
To charge me too with some pretended crime.
For conscious of his guilt, my death he vow'd,
And with dark hints amus'd the list'ning crowd.
At length with Calchas he concert's the scheme—
But why, why dwell I on this hateful theme?
Or why detain you with a tale of woe?
Since you determine ev'ry Greek, a foe,
Strike, strike; th' Atrides wish my death enjoy,
And dire Ulysses thank the sword of Troy.

Now blind to Grecian frauds, we burn to know
With fond desire the causes of his woe;
Who thus, still trembling as he stood, and pale,
Pursu'd the moving melancholy tale.
Oft' had our hosts determin'd to employ
Their sails for Greece, and leave untaken Troy,
Urg'd to a shameful flight, from deep despair,
And the long labours of a ten years war.
And oh! that they had sail'd!—as oft' the force
Of southern winds, and tempests stopp'd their course.
But since this steed was rais'd; frait, bellowing
loud,

Deep thunders roar'd, and burst from every clond.
We sent Eurypius to Phœbus' shrine,
Who brought this sentence from the voice divine;
When first ye sail'd for Troy, ye calm'd the main
With blood, ye Grecians, and a virgin slain;
And ere you measure back the foamy flood,
Know, you must buy a safe return with blood.
These awful words to ev'ry Greek impart
Surprise and dread, and chill the bravest heart;
To the dire stroke each thought himself decreed,
Himself the victim that for Greece should bleed.
Ulysses then, importunate and loud,
Produc'd sage Calchas to the trembling crowd,
Bade him the secret will of heav'n relate—
And now my friends could prophesy my fate;

And base Ulysses' wicked arts, they said,
 Were level'd all at my devoted head.
 Ten days the prophet from the crowd retir'd,
 Nor mark'd the victim that the gods requir'd.
 So long besieg'd by Ithacus he stood,
 And seem'd reluctant to the voice of blood;
 At length he spoke, and, as the scheme was laid,
 Doom'd to the slaughter my destin'd head,
 All prais'd the sentence, and were pleas'd to see
 The fate that threaten'd all, confin'd to me.
 And now the dire tremendous day was come,
 When all prepar'd to solemnize my doom;
 The salted barley on my front was spread,
 The sacred fillets bound my destin'd head:
 I fled th' appointed slaughter, I confess,
 And, till our troops should hoist their sails for Swift to a slimy lake I took my flight, [Greece,
 Lay wrapt in flags, and cover'd by the night.
 And now these eyes shall view my native shore,
 My dear, dear children, and my fire no more;
 Whom haply Greece to slaughter has decreed,
 And for my fatal flight condemn'd to bleed.
 But thee, O gracious monarch, I implore
 By ev'ry god, by ev'ry sacred power,
 Who conscious of the facts my lips relate,
 With truth inspire me to declare my fate;
 By all the solemn functions that can bind
 In holy ties the faith of human kind;
 Have mercy, mercy, on a guiltless foe,
 O'erwhelm'd and sunk with such a weight of woe!
 His life we gave him, and dispell'd his fears,
 Touch'd with his moving eloquence of tears;
 And, melting first, the good old king commands
 To free the captive, and to loose his hands.
 Then with soft accents, and a pleasing look,
 Mild and benevolent the monarch spoke.
 Henceforth let Greece no more thy thoughts
 But live a subject and a son of Troy; [employ,
 With truth and strict sincerity proceed,
 Say, to what end they fram'd this monstrous deed;
 Who was its author, what his aim, declare;
 Some solemn vow? or engine of the war?
 Skill'd in the frauds of Greece, the captive rears
 His hands unshackled to the golden stars;
 You, ye eternal splendors! he exclaims,
 And you divine inviolable flames,
 Ye fatal swords and altars, which I fled,
 Ye wreaths that circled this devoted head;
 All, all, attest! that justly I release
 My sworn allegiance to the laws of Greece,
 Renounce my country, hate her sons, and lay
 Their inmost counsels open to the day.
 And thou, O Troy, by Sinon snatch'd from fate,
 Spare, spare the wretch, who saves the Phrygian
 Greece on Minerva's aid rely'd alone, [state.
 Since first the labours of the war begun.
 But from that execrable point of time,
 When Ithacus, the first in ev'ry crime,
 With Tydeus' impious son, the guards had slain,
 And brought her image from the Phrygian fane, Didstain'd her sacred wreaths with murderous
 hands,
 Still red and reeking from the slaughter'd bands;
 Then ceas'd the triumphs of the Grecian train,
 And their full tide of conquest sunk again;
 Their strength decay'd, and many a dreadful sign
 To trembling Greece proclaim'd the wrath divine.

Scarce to the camp the sacred image came,
 When from her eyes she flash'd a living flame;
 A briny sweat bedew'd her limbs around,
 And thrice she sprung indignant from the ground;
 Thrice was she seen with martial rage to wield
 Her ponderous spear, and shake her blazing shield.
 With that, sage Calchas mov'd the trembling train
 To fly, and measure back the deeps again;
 That 'twas not giv'n our armies to destroy
 The Phrygian empire, and the towers of Troy, Till they should bring from Greece those favouring gods, [floods;
 Who smil'd indulgent, when they plough'd the
 With more auspicious signs repass the main,
 And with new omens take the field again.
 Now to their native country they repair,
 With gather'd forces to renew the war;
 The scheme of Calchas! but their vanish'd host
 Will soon return to waste the Phrygian coast.
 All Greece, atoning dire Ulysses' deed,
 To Pallas' honour rais'd this wondrous steed;
 But Calchas order'd this enormous size,
 This monstrous bulk, that heaves into the skies,
 Left Troy should lead it through her opening gate,
 And by this new palladium guard her state.
 For oh! ye Phrygians, had your rage profan'd
 This gift of Pallas with an impious hand,
 Some fate (which all ye pow'rs immortal shud
 With all your vengeance on its author's head!)
 In one prodigious ruin would destroy
 Thy empire, Priam, and the sons of Troy.
 But would you join within your walls to lead
 This pledge of heav'n, this tutelary steed;
 Then, with her hosts, all Asia shall repair,
 And pour on Pelop's walls a storm of war;
 Then Greece shall bleed, and perish in her turn;
 Her future sons; her nations yet unborn.
 Thus did the perjur'd Sinon's art prevail;
 Too fondly we believ'd the study'd tale;
 And thus was Troy, who bravely could sustain
 Achilles' fury, when he swept the plain,
 A thousand vessels, and a ten years war,
 Won by a sigh, and vanquish'd by a tear.
 Here a more dreadful object rose to fight,
 And shook our souls with horror and affright.
 Unblest Laocoon, whom the lots design
 Priest of the year, at Neptune's holy shrine,
 Slew on the sands, beside the rolling flood,
 A stately steer, in honour of the god.
 When, horrid to relate! two serpents glide
 And roll incumbent on the glassy tide,
 Advancing to the shore; their spires they raise,
 Fold above fold, in many a tow'ring maze.
 Beneath their burnish'd breasts the waters glow,
 Their crimson crests inflame the deeps below;
 O'er the vast flood extended long and wide,
 Their curling backs lay floating on the tide;
 Lash'd to a foam the boiling billows roar,
 And now the dreadful monsters reach'd the shore;
 Their hissing tongues they darted, as they came,
 And their red eye-balls shot a sanguine flame,
 Pale at the sight, we fled in dire dismay;
 Strait to Laocoon they direct their way;
 And first in curling fiery volumes bound [round,
 His too young sons, and wrapt them round and Devour'd the children in the father's view;
 Then on the miserable father flew,

While to their aid he runs with fruitless haste ;
 And all the man in horrid folds embrac'd :
 Twice round his waist, and round his neck they
 Their winding heads, and his aloft in air, [rear
 His sacred wreaths the livid poisons stain, }
 And, while he labours at the knots in vain,
 Stung to the soul, he bellows with the pain. }
 So, when the axe had glanc'd upon his skull,
 Breaks from the shrine, and roars the wounded
 But each huge serpent now retires again, [bull.
 And flies for shelter to Minerva's fane ;
 Her buckler's orb the goddess wide display'd,
 And screen'd her monsters in the dreadful shade.

Then, a new fear the trembling crowd possess'd,
 A holy horror pants in every breast ;
 All judge Laocoon justly doom'd to bleed,
 Whose guilty spear profan'd the sacred steed.
 We vote to lead him to Minerva's tow'r,
 And supplicate, with vows, th' offended pow'r ;
 All to the fatal labour bend their care,
 Level the walls, and lay the bulwarks bare ;
 Some round the lofty neck the cables tie,
 Some to the feet the rolling wheels apply ;
 The tow'ring monster, big with Iliou's doom,
 Mounts o'er the wall ; an army in the womb ;
 Around the moving pile the children join
 In shouts of transport, and in songs divine ;
 They run, they pull the stretching cords with joy,
 And lend their little hands to ruin Troy !
 In one loud peal th' enormous horse rolls down,
 And thundering gains the center of the town.
 Oh Troy, renown'd in war ! oh bright abodes !
 Oh glorious Troy ! the labour of the gods !
 Thrice stop'd unmov'd the monster in the gate,
 And clashing arms thrice warn'd us of our fate ;
 But we, by madnes blinded and o'ercome,
 Lodge the dire monster in the sacred dome.
 Cassandra too, inspir'd, our fate declares
 (So Phœbus doom'd) to unregarding ears ; [waste
 We, thoughtless wretches ! deck the shrines, and
 In sports the day, which heav'n decreed our last.

Now had the sun roll'd down the beamy light,
 And from the caves of ocean rush'd the night ;
 With one black veil her spreading shades suppress
 The face of nature, and the frauds of Greece.
 The Trojans round their walls in silence lay,
 And lost in sleep the labours of the day.
 When lo ! their course the Grecian navy bore,
 New-rigg'd and arm'd, and reach'd the well-known shore,

By silent Cynthia's friendly beams convey'd ;
 And the proud admiral a flame display'd.
 Then Sinon, favour'd by the partial gods,
 Unlocks the mighty monster's dark abodes ;
 His peopled caves pour forth in open air
 The heroes, and the whole imprison'd war.
 Led by the guided cord, alight with joy
 Th' impatient princes, in the midst of Troy ;
 Machaon first, then great Achilles' heir,
 Ulysses, Thoas, Acamas, appear ;
 A crowd of chiefs with Menelaus succeed ;
 Epus last, who fram'd the fraudulent steed.
 Strait they invade the city, bury'd deep
 In fumes of wine, and all dissolv'd in sleep ;
 They lay the guards, they burst the gates, and join
 Their fellows, conscious to the bold design.

'Twas now the time when first kind heav'n be-
 On wretched man the blessings of repose ; [flows
 When, in my slumbers, Hector seem'd to rise
 A mournful vision ! to my closing eyes.
 Such he appear'd, as when Achilles' car
 And fiery couriers whirl'd him through the war ;
 Drawn thro' his swelling feet the thongs I view'd,
 His beauteous body black with dust and blood.
 Ye gods ! how chang'd from Hector ! who with Return'd in proud Achilles' spoils to Troy ; [joy
 Flung at the ships, like heav'n's almighty fire,
 Flames after flames, and wrapt a fleet in fire.
 Now gall'd with wounds that for his Troy he bore,
 His beard and locks stood stiffen'd with his gore.
 With tears and mournful accents I began,
 And thus bespoke the visionary man !

Say, glorious prince, thy country's hope and joy,
 What cause so long detains thee from thy Troy ?
 Say, from what realm, so long desir'd in vain,
 Her Hector comes, to bless her eyes again ?
 After such numbers slain, such labours past,
 Thus is our prince ! ah ! thus return'd at last ?
 Why stream these wounds ? or who could thus disgrace

The manly charms of that majestic face ?
 Nought to these questions vain the shade replies,
 But from his bosom draws a length of sighs ;
 Fly, fly, oh ! fly the gathering flames ; the walls
 Are won by Greece, and glorious Iliou falls ;
 Enough to Priam and to Troy before
 Was paid ; then strive with destiny no more ;
 Could any mortal hand prevent our fate,
 This hand, and this alone, had sav'd the state.
 Troy to thy care commends her wand'ring gods ;
 With these pursue thy fortunes o'er the floods
 To that proud city, thou shalt raise at last,
 Return'd from wand'ring wide the wat'ry waste.
 This said, he brought from Vesta's hallow'd quire
 The sacred wreaths, and everlasting fire.

Meantime tumultuous round the walls arise
 Shrieks, clamours, shout, and mingle in the skies.
 And (though remote my father's palace stood,
 With shades surrounded, and a gloomy wood)
 Near, and more near, approach the dire alarms ;
 The voice of woe ; the dreadful din of arms.
 Rous'd at the deaf'ning peal that roars around,
 I mount the dome, and listen to the found.
 Thus o'er the corn, while furious winds conspire,
 Rolls on a wide-devouring blaze of fire ;
 Or some big torrent, from a mountain's brow,
 Bursts, pours, and thunders down the vale below,
 O'erwhelms the fields, lays waste the golden grain,
 And headlong sweeps the forests to the main ;
 Stun'd at the din, the swain with list'ning ears
 From some steep rock the sounding ruin hears.

Now Hector's warning prov'd too clear and true,
 The wiles of Greece appear'd in open view ;
 The roaring flames in volumes huge aspire,
 And wrap thy dome, Deiphobus, in fire ;
 Thine, sage Ucalegon, next strow'd the ground,
 And stretch'd a vast unmeasur'd ruin round,
 Wide o'er the waves the bright reflection plays :
 The surges redden with the distant blaze.
 Then shouts and trumpets swell the dire alarms ;
 And, though 'twas vain, I madly flew to arms :
 Eager to raise a band of friends, and pour
 In one firm body, to defend the tow'r ;

Rage and revenge my kindling bosom fire,
Warm, and in arms, to conquer or expire.
But lo! poor Pantheus, Phœbus' priest appears,
Just scap'd the foe, distracted with his fears,
The sage his vanquish'd gods and relics bore,
And with his trembling grandson fought the shore.

Say, Pantheus, how the fate of Iliion stands?
Say, if a tow'r remains in Trojan hands?
He thus with groans;—Our last sad hour is come,
Our certain, fixt, inevitable doom.
Troy once was great, but oh! the scene is o'er,
Her glory vanish'd! and her name no more!
For partial Jove transfers her past renown
To Greece, who triumphs in her burning town;
And the huge monster from his op'ning side
Pours forth her warriors in an endless tide;
With joy proud Sinon sees the flames aspire,
Heaps blaze on blaze, and mingles fire with fire;
Here thousands pouring through the gates appear.
Far more than proud Mycenæ sent to war.
Some seize the passes; groves of spears arise,
That thirst for blood, and flash against the skies.
The guards but just maintain a feeble fight
With their fierce foes, amidst the gloomy night.

While Pantheus' words, while ev'ry god inspires,
I flew to arms; and rush'd amidst the fires,
Where the loud furies call, where shouts and cries
Ring round the walls, and thunder in the skies.
Now faithful Ripheus on my side appears,
With hoary Iphitus, advanc'd in years;
And valiant Hypazis and Dymas, known
By the pale splendors of the glimm'ring moon;
With thee Chorœbus, Mygdon's generous boy,
Who came, ill-fated, to the wars of Troy;
Fir'd with the fair Cassandra's blooming charms,
To aid her fire with unavailing arms;
Ah! brave unhappy youth! he would not hear
His bride inspir'd, who warn'd him from the war!

These when I saw, with fierce collected might,
Breathing revenge, and crowding to the fight;
With warmth I thus address'd the gen'rous train:
Ye bold, brave youths, but bold and brave in
If by your dauntless souls impell'd, you dare [vain!
With me to try th' extremities of war;
You see our hopeless state; how every god,
Who guarded Troy, has left his old abode;
You aid a town already sunk in fire;
Fly, fly to arms, and gloriously expire;
Let all rush on, and, vanquish'd as we are,
Catch one last beam of safety from despair.
Thus while my words inflame the list'ning crew,
With rage redoubled to the fight they flew
As hungry wolves, while clouds involve the day,
Rush from their dens; and, prowling wide for prey,
Howl to the tempest, while the savage brood,
Stretch'd in the cavern, pant and thirst for blood;
So through the town, determin'd to expire,
Thro' the thick storm of darts, and smoke and fire,
Wrapt and surrounded with the shades of night,
We rush'd to certain death, and mingled in the fight. [close?

What tongue the dreadful slaughter could dis-
Or oh! what tears could answer half our woes?
The glorious empress of the nations round,
Majestic Troy, lay level'd with the ground;
Her murder'd natives crowded her abodes,
Her streets, her domes, the temples of her gods,

Nor Iliion bled alone: her turn succeeds;
And then she conquers, and proud Argos bleeds;
Death in a thousand forms destructive frown'd,
And woe, despair, and horror rag'd around.

And first Androgeos, whom a train attends,
With style familiar hail'd us as his friends;
Haste, brave associates, haste; what dull delay
Detains you here, while others seize the prey?
In flames your friends have laid all Iliion waste,
And you come lagging from your ships the last.

Thus he; but soon from our reply he knows
His fatal error, compass'd round with foes;
Retrains his tongue, and, meditating flight,
Stops short;—and startles at the dreadful sight.
So the pale swain, who treads upon a snake
Unseen, and lurking in the gloomy brake,
Soon as his swelling spires in circles play,
Starts back, and shoots precipitate away.
Fierce we rush in, the heedless foes surround,
And lay the wretches breathless on the ground:
New to the place, with sudden terror wild;
And thus at first our flattering fortune smil'd.
Then, by his courage and success inspir'd,
His warlike train the brave Chorœbus fir'd;
Lo! friends, the road of safety you survey;
Come, follow fortune, where she points the way;
Let each in Argive arms his limbs disguise,
And wield the bucklers, that the foe supplies;
For if succeeds an enemy attends,
Who asks, if fraud or valour gain'd his ends?
This said, Androgeos' crested helm he wore;
Then, on his arm, the ponderous buckler bore
With beauteous figures grac'd, and warlike pride;
The starry sword hung glittering at his side.
Like him, bold Ripheus, Dymas, and the rest,
Their manly limbs in hostile armour dress'd.
With gods aver'd, we follow to the fight,
And, undistinguish'd in the shades of night,
Mix with the foes, employ the murdering steel,
And plunge whole squadrons to the depths of hell,
Some, wild with fear, precipitate retreat,
Fly to the shore, and shelter in the fleet:
Some climb the monstrous horse, a frighted train,
And there lie trembling in the sides again.
But, heav'n against us, all attempts must fail,
All hopes are vain, nor courage can prevail;
For lo! Cassandra lo! the royal fair
From Pallas' shrine with loose dishevell'd hair
Dragg'd by the shouting victors;—to the skies
She rais'd, but rais'd in vain, her glowing eyes;
Her eyes—she could no more—the Grecian bands
Had rudely manacled her tender hands;
Chorœbus could not bear that scene of woes,
But, fir'd with fury, flew amidst the foes;
As swift we follow to redeem the fair,
Rush to his aid, and thicken to the war.
Here from the temple on our troop descends
A form of javelins from our Trojan friends,
Who from our arms and helmets deem'd us
foes;
And hence a dreadful scene of slaughter rose.
Then all the Greeks our slender band invade,
And pour eurag'd to seize the rescu'd maid;
Ajax with all the bold Dolopians came,
And both the king of Atreus royal name.
So when the winds in airy conflict rise,
Here south and west charge dreadful in the skies;

There louder Eurus, to the battle borne,
 Mounts the swift couriers of the purple morn;
 Bencath the whirlwind roar the bending woods;
 With his huge trident Neptune strikes the floods:
 Foams, storms, and tempesting the deeps around,
 Bares the broad bosom of the dark profound.
 Those too, we chas'd by night, a scatter'd train,
 Now boldly rally, and appear again.
 To them our Argive helms and arms are known,
 Our voice and language diff'ring from their own.
 We yield to numbers. By Peneleus' steel
 First at Minerva's shrine Choroebus fell.
 Next Ripheus bled, the justest far of all
 The sons of Troy; yet heav'n permits his fall.
 The like sad fate brave Hypanis attends,
 And hapless Dymas, slaughter'd by their friends.
 Nor thee, fage Pantheus! Phcebus' wreaths could Nor all thy shining virtues from the grave. [save,
 Ye dear, dear ruins! and thou, Troy! declare
 If once I tremble or declin'd the war:
 Midd' flames and foes a glorious death I fought,
 And well deserv'd the death for which I fought.
 Thence we retreat, our brave associates gone,
 Pelias and Iphitus were left alone;
 This slow with age and bending to the ground,
 And that more tardy from Ulyssus' wound.
 Now from the palace-walls tumultuous ring
 The shouts, and call us to defend the king;
 There we beheld the rage of fight, and there
 The throne of death, and centre of the war;
 As Troy, all Troy beside has slept in peace,
 Nor stain'd by slaughter, nor alarm'd by Greece.
 Shield lock'd in shield, advance the Grecian pow'rs,
 To burst the gates, and storm the regal tow'rs;
 Fly up the steep ascent where danger calls,
 And fix their scaling engines in the walls.
 High in the left they grasp'd the fenceful shield,
 Fierce in the right the rocky ramparts held;
 Roofs, tow'rs, and battlements the Trojans throw,
 A pile of ruins! on the Greeks below;
 Catch for defence the weapons of despair,
 In these the dire extremes of death and war.
 Now on their heads the pond'rous beams are roll'd,
 By Troy's first monarchs crusted round with gold.
 Here thronging troops with glitt'ring Faulchions
 stand,

To guard the portals, and the door command.
 Strait to the palace, fir'd with hopes, I go
 To aid the vanquish'd, and repel the foe.
 A secret portico contriv'd behind,
 Great Hector's mansion to the palace join'd,
 By which his hapless princefs oft would bring
 Her royal infant to the good old king.
 This way the topmost battlements I gain,
 Whence the tir'd Trojans threw their darts in vain.

Rais'd on a lofty point, a turret rears
 Her stately head unrival'd to the stars;
 From hence we wont all Ilium to survey,
 The fields, the camp, the fleets, and rolling sea.
 With steel the yielding timbers we assail'd.
 Where loose the huge disjointed fracture fail'd;
 Then, tugg'd convulsive from the shatter'd walls,
 We push the pile: the pond'rous ruin falls
 Tumbling in many a whirl, with thund'ring sound, Down headlong on the foes, and smokes along the
 ground.

But crowds on crowds the bury'd troops supply;
 And in a storm the beams and rocky fragments fly.
 Full in the portal rag'd with loud alarms
 Brave Pyrrhus, glitt'ring in his brazen arms.
 So from his den, the winter slept away,
 Shoots forth the burnish'd snake in open day;
 Who, fed with ev'ry poison of the plain,
 Sheds his old spoils, and shines in youth again;
 Proud of his golden scales rolls tow'ring on,
 And darts his forky sting, and glitters on the sun.

To him the mighty Periphas succeeds,
 And the bold * chief who drove his father's steeds;
 With these the Scyriän bands advance, and aim
 Full at the battlements the missive flame.
 Fierce Pyrrhus in the front with forceful sway
 Ply'd the huge axe, and hew'd the beams away;
 The solid timbers from the portal tore,
 And rent from every hinge the brazen door.
 At last the chief a mighty op'ning made, [play'd:
 And, all th' imperial dome, in all her length dif-
 The sacred rooms of Troy's first monarchs lie,
 With Priam's pomp, profan'd by every eye;
 In arms the centries to the breach repair,
 And stand embody'd, to repel the war.

Now far within, the regal rooms disclose,
 Loud and more loud, a direful scene of woes;
 The roof resounds with female shrieks and cries,
 And the shrill echo strikes the distant skies.
 The trembling matrons fly from place to place,
 And kiss the pillars with a last embrace;
 Bold Pyrrhus storms with all his father's fire;
 The barrier's burst; and the vanquish'd guards retire;
 The shatter'd doors the thund'ring engines ply;
 The bolts leap back; the sounding hinges fly;
 The war breaks in; loud shouts the hostile train;
 The gates are storm'd; the foremost soldiers slain:
 Thro' the wide courts the crowding Argives roam,
 And swarm triumphant round the regal dome.
 Not half so fierce the foamy deluge bounds,
 And bursts resistless o'er the levell'd mounds;
 Pours down the vale, and aids roaring o'er the plain,
 Sweeps herds, and hinds, and houles to the main.

These eyes within the gate th' Atrides view'd,
 And furious Pyrrhus cover'd o'er with blood;
 Sad they beheld, amid the mournful scene,
 The hundred daughters with the mother queen,
 And Priam's self polluting with his gore
 Those flames, he hallow'd at the shrines before.
 The fifty bridal rooms, a work divine!
 (Such were his hopes of a long regal line)
 Rich in Barbaric gold, with trophies crown'd,
 Sunk with their proud support of pillars round;
 And, where the flames retire, the foes possess
 the ground.

And now, great queen, you haply long to know
 The fate of Priam in this general woe.
 When with sad eyes the venerable fire
 Beheld his Ilium sunk in hostile fire;
 His palace storm'd, the lofty gates laid low,
 His rich pavillions crowded with the foe;
 In arms, long since diffus'd, the hoary sage,
 Load each stiff languid limb, that shook with age;
 Girds on an unperforming sword in vain,
 And runs on death amidst the hostile train.
 Within the courts, beneath the naked sky,
 An altar rose; an aged laurel by;

* Automedon.

That o'er the hearth and household-gods display'd
A solemn gloom, a deep majestic shade :

Hither, like doves, who clofe-embod' d fly
From some dark tempest black'ning in the sky,
The queen for refuge with her daughters ran,
Clung and embrac'd their images in vain.
But when in cumbrous arms the king the spy'd,
Alas ! my poor unhappy lord ? the cry'd,
What more than madness, 'midst these dire alarms,
Mov'd thee to load thy helpless age with arms ?
No aid like thine this dreadful hour demands,
But asks far other strength, far other hands.
No ! could my own dear Hector arm again,
My own dear Hector now would arm in vain,
Come to these altars ; here we all shall have
One common refuge, or one common grave.
This said, her aged lord the queen embrac'd,
And on the sacred seat the monarch plac'd.

When lo ! Polites, one of Priam's sons,
Through darts and foes, from slaughter'ring Pyrrhus
Wounded he traverses the cloyster'd dome, [runs, Darts through the courts, and shoots from room to room ;

Clofe, clofe behind, pursu'd the furious foe,
Just grasp'd the youth, and aim'd the fatal blow ;
Soon as within his parents fight he past,
Pierc'd by the pointed death, he breath'd his last :
He fell ; a purple stream the pavement dy'd,
The soul comes gushing in the crimson tide.
The king, that scene impatient to survey,
Though death surrounds him, gives his fury way ;
And oh ! may ever violated god,
Barbarian ! thank thee for this deed of blood ;
(If gods there are, such actions to regard),
Oh ! may they give thy guilt the full reward ;
Guilt, that a father's sacred eyes desil'd
With blood, the blood of his dear murder'd child !
Unlike thy fire, Achilles the divine !
(But sure Achilles was no fire of thine !)

Foe as I was, the hero deign'd to hear
The guest's, the suppliant's, king's, and father's
To funeral rites restor'd my Hector slain, [pray'r ;
And safe dismiss'd me to my realm again.
This said, his trembling arm essay'd to throw
The dull dead javelin, that scarce reach'd the foe ;
The weapon languishingly lagg'd along,
And, guiltless on the buckler faintly rung.
Thou then be first, replies the chief, to go
With these sad tidings to thy ghost below ;
Begone—acquaint him with my crimes in Troy,
And tell my fire of his degenerate boy.
Die then he said, and dragg'd the monarch on,
Through the warm blood that issu'd from his son,
Stagg'ring and sliding in the slipp'ry gore,
And to the shrine the royal victim bore ;
Lock'd in the left he grasps the silver hairs,
High in the right the flaming blade he rears,
Then to the hilt with all his force apply'd,
He plung'd the ruthless fauchion in his side.
Such was the fate unhappy Priam found,
Who saw his Troy lie level'd with the ground ;
He, who, round Asia sent his high commands,
And stretch'd his empire o'er a hundred lauds,
Now lies a headless carcase on the shore,
The man, the monarch, and the name no more !
Then, nor till then, I fear'd the furious foe,
Struck with that scene of unexampled woe ;

Soon as I saw the murder'd king expire :
His old compeer, my venerable fire,
My palace, son, and comfort left behind,
All, all, at once came rushing on my mind.
I gaz'd around, but not a friend was there ;
My hapless friends, abandon'd to despair,
Had leap'd down headlong from the lofty spires,
Tir'd with their toils ; or plung'd amidst the fires,

Thus left alone, and wand'ring, I survey
Where trembling Helen clofe and silent lay
In Vesta's porch ; and by the dismal glare-
Of rolling flames discern the fatal fair ;
The common plague ! by Troy and Greece ab-hor'd !

She fear'd alike the vengeful Trojan sword,
Her injur'd country, and abandon'd lord,
Fast by the shrine I spy'd the lurking dame,
And all my soul was kindled into flame :
My ruin'd country to revenge, I stood
In wrath resolv'd to shed her impious blood.
Shall she, this guilty fair, return in peace,
A queen, triumphant, thro' the realms of Greece,
And see, attended by her Phrygian train,
Her home, her parents, spouse, and sons again ?
For her curst cause shall raging flames destroy
The stately structures of imperial Troy ?
So many slaughters drench the Dardan shore ?
And Priam's self lie wett'ring in his gore ?
No !—she shall die—for though the victor gain
No fame, no triumph for a woman slain :
Yet if by just revenge the traitress bleed,
The world consenting will applaud the deed :
To my own vengeance I devote her head,
And the great spirits of our heroes dead.

Thus while I rav'd, I saw my mother rise,
Confess'd a goddess, to my wond'ring eyes,
In pomp unusual, and divinely bright ;
Her beary glories pierc'd the shades of night ;
Such she appear'd, as when in heav'n's abodes
She shines in all her glories to the gods.
Just rais'd to strike, my hand she gently took,
Then from her rosy lips the goddess spoke.

What wrath so fierce to vengeance drives thee
Are we no objects of thy care, my son ? [on ?
Think of Anchises, and his helpless age,
Thy hoary fire expos'd to hostile rage ;
Think if thy dear Creusa yet survive,
Think if thy child, the young Iulus live ;
Whom, ever hov'ring round, the Greeks enclose,
From every side endanger'd by the foes ;
And, but my care withstood, the ruthless sword
Long since had slaughter'd, or the flames devour'd.
Nor beauteous Helen now, nor Paris blame,
Her guilty charms, or his unhappy flame ;
The gods, my son, th' immortal gods destroy
This glorious empire, and the tow'rs of Troy.
Hence then retire, retire without delay,
Attend thy mother, and her words obey ;
Look up, for lo ! I clear thy clouded eye
From the thick midst of dim mortality ;
Where yon' rude piles of shatter'd ramparts rise,
Stone rent from stone, in dreadful ruin lies,
And black with rolling smoke the dusty whirlwind flies :

There, Neptune's trident breaks the bulwarks
down,
There, from her basis heaves the trembling town ;

Heav'n's awful queen, to urge the Trojan fate,
Here storms tremendous at the Scæan gate:
Radiant in arms the furious goddess stands,
And from the navy calls her Argive bands.
On yon' high tow'r the martial maid behold,
With her dread Gorgon blaze in clouds of gold.
Great Jove himself the fons of Greece inspires,
Each arm he strengthens, and each soul he fires.
Against the Trojans, from the bright abodes,
See! where the thund'rer calls th' embattled
gods.

Strive then no more with heav'n;—but oh! re-
Ourself will guide thee to thy father's feat;
Ourselves will cover and befriend thy flight.
She said, and sunk within the shades of night;
And lo! the gods with dreadful faces frown'd,
And lower'd, majestically stern, around.
Then fell proud Ilium's bulwarks, tow'rs and spires;

Then Troy, though rais'd by Neptune, sunk in
So when an aged ash, whose honours rise
From some steep mountain tow'ring to the skies,
With many an axe by shouting swains is ply'd,
Fierce they repeat the strokes from every side;
The tall tree trembling, as the blows go round,
Bows the high head, and nods to every wound:
At last quite vanquish'd with a dreadful peal,
In one loud groan rolls crashing down the vale,
Headlong with half the shatter'd mountain flies,
And stretch'd out huge in length th' unmeasured ruin lies.

Now, by the goddess led, I bend my way,
Though javelins hiss, and flames around me play;
With sloping spires the flames obliquely fly,
The glancing darts turn innocently by.
Soon as, these various dangers past, I come Within my rev'rend father's ancient dome,
Whom first I fought, to bear his helpless age
Safe o'er the mountains, far from hostile rage;
An exil'd life disdaining to enjoy,
He stands determin'd to expire with Troy:
Fly you, who health, and youth, and strength maintain,

You, whose warm blood beats high in every vein;
For me had heav'n decreed a longer date,
Heav'n had preserv'd for me the Dardan state;
Too much of life already have I known,
To see my country's fall prevent my own;
Think then, this aged corse with Ilium fell,
And take, oh! take your solemn last farewell:
For death—these hands that office yet can do:
If not—I'll beg it from the pitying foe.
At least the soldier for my spoils will come:
Nor heed I now the honours of a tomb.
Grown to my friends an useless heavy load,
Long have I liv'd, abhorr'd by every god,
Since, in his wrath, high heaven's almighty sire
Blasted these limbs with his avenging fire.

Thus he; and obstinately bent appears;
The mournful family stand round in tears.
Myself, my shrieking wife, my weeping son,
Friends, servants, all, entreat him to be gone,
Nor to the general ruin add his own; }
Bid him be reconcil'd to life once more,
Nor urge a fate, that flew too swift before.
Unmov'd, he still determines to maintain
His cruel purpose, and we plead in vain.

Once more I hurry to the dire alarms,
To end a miserable life in arms;
For oh! what measures could I now pursue,
When death, and only death, was left in view:
To flee the foe, and leave your age alone,
Could such a fire propose to such a son?
If 'tis by your's and heav'n's high will decreed,
That you, and all, with hapless Troy, must bleed:
If not her least remains you mean to save;
Behold! the door lies open to the grave.
Pyrrhus will soon be here, all cover'd o'er
And red from venerable Priam's gore;
Who stabb'd the son before the father's view,
Then at the shrine the royal father slew.
Why, heavenly mother! did thy guardian care
Snatch me from fires, and shield me in the war?
Within these walls to see the Grecians roam,
And purple slaughter stride around the dome;
To see my murder'd consort, son, and fire,
Steep'd in each other's blood, on heaps expire!
Arms! arms! my friends, with speed my arms
supply,
'Tis our last hour, and summons us to die;
My arms!—in vain you hold me,—let me go—
Give, give me back this moment to the foe.
'Tis well—we will not tamely perish all,
But die reveng'd, and triumph in our fall.
Now rushing forth, in radiant arms, I wield
The sword once more, and gripe the pond'rous
shield.

When, at the door, my weeping spouse I meet,
The fair Creusa, who embrac'd my feet,
And clinging round them, with distraction wild,
Reach'd to my arms my dear unhappy child:
And oh! she cries, if bent on death thou run,
Take, take with thee, thy wretched wife and son;
Or, if one glimmering hope from arms appear,
Defend these walls, and try thy valour here;
Ah! who shall guard thy fire, when thou art
slain,
Thy child, or me, thy consort once in vain?
Thus while she raves, the vaulted dome replies
To her loud shrieks, and agonizing cries.

When lo! a wondrous prodigy appears,
For while each parent kiss'd the boy with tears,
Sudden a circling flame was seen to spread
With beams refulgent round Iulus' head;
Then on his locks the lambent glory preys,
And harmless fires around his temples blaze.
Trembling and pale we quench with busy care
The sacred fires, and shake his flaming hair.
But old Anchises lifts his joyful eyes,
His hands and voice, in transport, to the skies.
Almighty Jove! in glory thron'd on high,
This once regards us with a gracious eye;
If e'er our vows deserv'd thy aid divine,
Vouchsafe thy succour, and confirm thy sign.
Scarce had he spoke, when sudden from the pole,
Full on the left, the happy thunders roll;
A star shot sweeping through the shades of night,
And drew behind a radiant trail of light,
That o'er the palace, gliding from above,
To point our way, descends in Ida's grove;
Then left a long continued stream in view,
The track still glittering where the glory flew.
The flame past gleaming with a bluish glare,
And smokes of sulphur fill the tainted air:

At this convinc'd, arose my reverend fire,
 Address'd the gods, and hail'd the sacred fire.
 Proceed, my friends, no longer I delay,
 But instant follow where you lead the way.
 Ye gods, by these your omens, you ordain
 That from the womb of fate shall rise again,
 To light and life, a glorious second Troy;
 Then save this house, and this auspicious boy;
 Convinc'd by omens so divinely bright,
 I go, my son, companion of thy flight.
 Thus he---and nearer now in curling spires
 Thro' the long walls roll'd on the roaring fires.
 Haste then, my fire, I cry'd, my neck ascend,
 With joy beneath your sacred load I bend;
 Together will we share, where-e'er I go,
 One common welfare, or one common woe.
 Ourselves with care will young Iulus lead;
 At safer distance you my spouse succeed;
 Heed too these orders, ye attendant train;
 Without the wall stands Ceres' vacant fane,
 Rais'd on a mount; an aged cypress near,
 Preserv'd for ages with religious fear;
 Thither, from different roads assembling, come,
 And meet embody'd at the sacred dome:
 Thou, thou, my fire, our gods and relics bear;
 These hands, yet horrid with the stains of war,
 Refrain their touch unhallow'd till the day,
 When the pure stream shall wash the guilt away.

Now, with a lion's spoils bespread, I take
 My fire, a pleasing burthen on my back;
 Close clinging to my hand, and pressing nigh,
 With steps unequal trip'd Iulus by;
 Behind, my lov'd Creüsa took her way;
 Through every lonely dark recess we stray:
 And I, who late th' embattled Greeks could dare,
 Their flying darts, and whole embody'd war,
 Now take alarm, while horrors reign around,
 At every breeze, and start at every sound.
 With fancy'd fears my busy thoughts were wild
 For my dear father, and endanger'd child.

Now, to the city gates approaching near,
 I seem the sound of trampling feet to hear.
 Alarm'd my fire look'd forward through the shade,
 And, fly my son, they come, they come, he said;
 Lo! from their shields I see the splendours stream;
 And ken distinct the helmet's fiery gleam,
 And here, some envious god, in this dismay,
 This sudden terror, snatch'd my sense away.
 For while o'er devious paths I wildly trod,
 Studious to wander from the beaten road;
 I lost my dear Creüsa, nor can tell
 From that sad moment, if by fate she fell;
 Or sunk fatigu'd; or straggled from the train;
 But ah! she never blest these eyes again!
 Nor, till to Ceres' ancient wall we came,
 Did I suspect her lost, nor miss the dame.
 There all the train assembled, all but she,
 Lost to her friends, her father, son, and me.
 What men, what gods did my wild fury spare?
 At both I rav'd, and madden'd with despair.
 In Troy's last ruins did I ever know
 A scene so cruel! such transcendent woe!
 Our gods, my son, and father to the train
 I next commend, and hide them in the plain;
 Then fly for Troy, and shine in arms again.
 Resolv'd the burning town to wander o'er,
 And tempt the dangers that I fear'd before.

Now to the gate I run with furious haste,
 Whence first from Ilion to the plain I pass;
 Dart round my eyes, in every place in vain,
 And tread my former footsteps o'er again.
 Surrounding horrors all my soul affright;
 And more, the dreadful silence of the night.
 Next to my house I flew without delay,
 If there, if haply there she bent her way.
 In vain---the conquering foes were enter'd there;
 High o'er the dome, the flames emblaze the air;
 Fierce to devour, the fiery tempest flies,
 Swells in the wind, and thunders o the skies.
 Back to th' embattled citadel I ran,
 And search'd her father's regal walls in vain.
 Ulysses now and Phoenix I survey;
 Who guard, in Juno's fane, the gather'd prey:
 In one huge heap the Trojan wealth was roll'd,
 Refulgent robes, and bowls of massy gold;
 A pile of tables on the pavement nods,
 Snatch'd from the blazing temples of the gods.
 A mighty train of shrieking mothers bound,
 Stood with their captive children trembling round.
 Yet more---I boldly raise my voice on high,
 And in the shade on dear Creüsa cry;
 Call on her name a thousand times in vain,
 But still repeat the darling name again.
 Thus while I rave and roll my searching eyes,
 Solemn and slow I saw her shade arise,
 The form enlarg'd majestic mov'd along;
 Fear rais'd my hair, and horror chain'd my tongue;
 Thus as I stood amaz'd, the heav'nly fair
 With these mild accents footh'd my fierce despair.

Why with excess of sorrow raves in vain
 My dearest lord, at what the gods ordain?
 Oh could I share thy toils!--but fate denies;
 And Jove, dread Jove, the sovereign of the skies.
 In long, long exile, art thou doom'd to sweep
 Seas after seas, and plough the wat'ry deep.
 Hesperia shall be thine, where Tyber glides
 Through fruitful realms, and rolls in easy tides.
 There shall thy fates a happier lot provide,
 A glorious empire, and a royal bride.
 Then let your sorrows for Creüsa cease;
 For know, I never shall be led to Greece;
 Nor feel the victor's chain, nor captive's shame,
 A slave to some imperious Argive dame.
 No!--born a prince's, sprung from heav'n above,
 Ally'd to Venus, and deriv'd from Jove,
 Sacred from Greece, 'tis mine, in these abodes,
 To serve the glorious mother of the gods.
 Farewell; and to our son thy care approve,
 Our son, the pledge of our commutual love.

Thus she; and as I wept, and wish'd to say
 Ten thousand things, dissolv'd in air away.
 Thrice round her neck my eager arms I threw;
 Thrice from my empty arms the phantom flew
 Swift as the wind, with momentary flight,
 Swift as a fleeting vision of the night.
 Now, day approaching, to my longing train,
 From ruin'd Ilion I return again;
 To whom, with wonder and surprize, I find
 A mighty crowd of new companions join'd;
 A host of willing exiles round me stand,
 Matrons, and men, a miserable band;
 Eager the wretches pour from ev'ry side,
 To share my fortunes on the foamy tide;

Valiant, and arm'd, my conduct they implore,
To lead and fix them on some foreign shore:
And now, o'er Ida with an early ray
Flames the bright star, that leads the golden day.

No hopes of aid in view, and ev'ry gate
Possess'd by Greece, at length I yield to fate.
Safe o'er the hill my father I convey,
And bear the venerable load away.

B O O K III.

THE ARGUMENT.

Æneas proceeds in his relation: he gives an account of the fleet in which he sailed, and the success of his first voyage to Thrace: from thence he directs his course to Delos, and asks the oracle what place the gods had appointed for his habitation? By a mistake of the oracle's answer, he settles in Crete; his household gods give him the true sense of the oracle in a dream. He follows their advice, and makes the best of his way for Italy: he is cast on several shores, and meets with very surprising adventures, till at length he lands on Sicily; where his father Anchises dies. This is the place which he was sailing from, when the tempest rose, and threw him upon the Carthaginian coast.

WHEN heav'n destroy'd, by too severe a fate,
The throne of Priam, and the Phrygian state,
When Troy, though Neptune rais'd her bulwarks
round,

The pride of Asia, smok'd upon the ground;
We fought in vacant regions new abodes,
Call'd by the guiding omens of the gods.
Secret, a sudden navy we provide,
Beneath Antandros, and the hills of Idæ.
Doubtful, where heav'n would fix our wand'ring
train,

Our gather'd pow'rs prepare to plough the main.
Scarce had the summer shot a genial ray;
My fire commands the canvas to display,
And steer wherever fate should point the way. }
With tears I leave the port, my native shore,
And those dear fields, where Ilium rose before.
An exil'd wretch, I lead into the floods,
My son, my friends, and all my vanquish'd gods.

The warlike Thracians till a boundless plain,
Sacred to Mars, Lycurgus' ancient reign;
Ally'd to Troy, while fortune own'd her cause;
The same their gods and hospitable laws;
Thither, with fates averf, my course I bore,
And rais'd a town amid the winding shore.
Then from my name the rising city call,
And stretch along the strand th' embattled wall.
Herc to my mother, and the favouring gods,
I offer'd victims by the rolling floods;
But slew a stately bull to mighty Jove,
Who reigns the sovereign of the pow'rs above.

Rais'd on a mount, a cornel grove was nigh,
And with thick branches stood a myrtle by.
With verdant boughs to shade my altars round,
I came, and try'd to rend them from the ground.
When lo! a horrid prodigy I see;
For scarce my hands had wrench'd the rooted tree,
When, from the fibres, drops of crimson gore
Ran trickling down, and stain'd the fable shore.
Amaz'd, I shook with horror and affright,
My blood all curdl'd at the dreadful sight;
Curious the latent causes to explore,
With trembling hands a second plant I tore;
That second wounded plant distill'd around
Red drops of blood, and sprinkled all the ground.

Rack'd with a thousand fears, devout I bow'd
To every nymph, and Thracia's guardian god.
These omens to avert by pow'r divine,
And kindly grant a more auspicious sign:
But when once more we tug'd, with toiling hands,
And eager bent my knees against the sands;
Live I to speak it?—from the tomb I hear
A hollow groan, that shock'd my trembling ear,
How can thy pious hands, Æneas, rend
The bury'd body of thy hapless friend?
This stream that trickles from the wounded tree
Is Trojan blood, and once ally'd to thee.
Ah! fly this barbarous land, this guilty shore,
Fly, fly the fate of murder'd Polydore.
This grove of lances, from my body slain,
Now blooms with vegetable life again.
Then, as amaz'd in deep suspense I hung,
Fear rais'd my hair, and horror chain'd my tongue.

Ill-fated Priam, when the Grecian pow'rs
With a close siege begirt the Dardan tow'rs,
No more confiding in the strength of Troy,
Sent to the Thracian prince the hapless boy,
With mighty treasures, to support him there,
Remov'd from all the dangers of the war.
This wretch; when Ilium's better fortunes cease,
Clos'd with the proud victorious arms of Greece;
Broke through all sacred laws, and uncontroll'd
Destroy'd his royal charge, to seize the gold.
Curs'd gold!—how high will daring mortals rise
In ev'ry guilt, to reach the glittering prize?
Soon as my soul recover'd from her fears,
Before my father and the gather'd peers,
I lay the dreadful omens of the gods;
All vote at once to fly the dire abodes;
To leave th' unhopitable realm behind,
And spread our op'ning canvas to the wind.
But first we paid the rites to Polydore,
And rais'd a mighty tomb amid the shore.
Next, to his ghost, adorn'd with cypress boughs
And fable wreaths, two solemn altars rose;
With lamentable cries and hair unbound,
The Trojan dames in order mov'd around.
Warm milk and sacred blood in bowls we brought,
To lure the spirit with the mingled draught;

Compos'd the soul; and, with a dismal knell,
Took thrice the melancholy last farewell.

Soon as our fleet could trust the smiling sea,
And the soft breeze had smooth'd the wat'ry way;
Call'd by the whisp'ring gales, we rig the ships,
Crowd round the shores, and launch into the deeps.
Swift from the port our eager course we ply,
And lands and towns roll backward, as we fly.

By Doris lov'd, and Ocean's azure god,
Lies a fair isle amid th' Ægean flood;
Which Phœbus fix'd; for once the wander'd round
The shores, and floated on the vast profound.
But now unmov'd, the peopled region braves
The roaring whirlwinds, and the furious waves.
Safe in her open ports the sacred isle
Receiv'd us, haras'd with the naval toil.
Our rev'rence due to Phœbus' town we pay,
And holy Anius meets us on the way;

Anius, whose brows the wreaths and laurels grace,
Priest of the god, and sovereign of the place.
Well-pleas'd to see our train the shore ascend,
He flew to meet my fire, his ancient friend:
In hospitable guise our hands he prest,
Then to the palace led each honour'd guest.
To Phœbus' aged temple I repair,
And suppliant to the god prefer my pray'r:
To wand'ring wretches, who in exile roam,
Grant, O Thymbraean god, a settled home;
Oh! grant thy suppliants, their long labours past,
A race to flourish, and a town to last;
Preserve this little second Troy in peace,
Snatch'd from Achilles and the sword of Greece;
Vouchsafe, great father, some auspicious sign;
And oh! inform us with thy light divine,
Where lies our way? and what auspicious guide,
To foreign realms shall lead us o'er the tide?

Sudden, the dire alarm the temple took;
The laurels, gates, and lofty mountains shook.
Burst with a dreadful roar, the veils display
The hallow'd tripods in the face of day.
Humbled we fell; then, prostrate on the ground,
We hear these accents in an awful sound:
Ye valiant sons of Troy, the land that bore
Your mighty ancestors to light before,
Once more their great descendants shall embrace;
Go—seek the ancient mother of your race.
There the wide world, Æneas' house shall sway,
And down from son to son th' imperial power convey.

Thus Phœbus spoke; and joy tumultuous fir'd
The thronging crowds; and eager all inquir'd,
What realm, what town, his oracles ordain,
Where the kind god would fix the wand'ring
Then in his mind my fire revolving o'er [train?
The long, long records of the times before;
Learn, ye assembled peers, he cries, from me,
The happy realm the laws of fate decree;
Fair Crete sublimely tow'rs amid the floods,
Proud nurse of Jove, the sovereign of the gods.
There ancient Ida stands, and thence we trace
The first memorials of the Trojan race;
A hundred cities the blest isle contains,
And boasts a vast extent of fruitful plains.
Hence our fam'd ancestor old Teucer bore
His course, and gain'd the fair Rhetæan shore,
There the great chief the seat of empire chose,
Before proud Troy's majestic structures rose;

VOL. XII.

Till then, if rightly I record the tale,
Our old forefathers till'd the lowly vale.
From hence arriv'd the mother of the gods,
Hence her loud cymbals and her sacred woods:
Hence, at her rites religious silence reigns,
And lions whirl her chariot o'er the plains.
Then fly we speedily where the gods command,
Appease the winds, and seek the Cretan land:
Nor distant is the shore; if Jove but smile,
Three days shall waft us to the blissful isle.

This said; he slays the victims due, and loads
In haste the smoking altars of the gods.
A bull to Phœbus, and a bull was slain
To thee, great Neptune, monarch of the main:
A milk white ewe to ev'ry western breeze,
A black, to ev'ry storm that sweeps the seas.
Now fame reports Idomeneus' retreat,
Expell'd and banish'd from the throne of Crete;
Free from the foe the vacant region lay:
We leave the Delian shore, and plough the wat'ry
way.

By fruitful Naxos, o'er the flood we fly,
Where to the Bacchanals the hills reply;
By green Donyfa next and Paros steer,
Where, white in air, her glitt'ring rocks appear.
Thence through the Cyclades the navy glides,
Whose clust'ring islands stud the silver tides.
Loud shout the sailors, and to Crete we fly;
To Crete our country, was the general cry.
Swift floats the fleet before the driving blast,
And on the Cretan shore descends at last.

With eager speed I frame a town, and call
From ancient Pergamus the rising wall.
Pleas'd with the name, my Trojans I command
To raise strong tow'rs, and settle in the land.
Soon as our lusty youth the fleet could moor,
And draw the vessels on the sandy shore,
Some join the nuptial-bands: with busy toil
Their fellows plough the new-discover'd soil.
To frame impartial laws I bend my cares,
Allot the dwellings, and assign the shares.
When lo! from standing air and poison'd skies,
A sudden plague with dire contagion flies.
On corn and trees the dreadful pest began;
And last the fierce infection seiz'd on man.
They breathe their souls in air; or drag with pain
Their lives, now lengthen'd out for woes, in vain;
Their wonted food the blasted fields deny,
And the red dog-star fires the sultry sky,
My fire advis'd, to measure back the main,
Consult, and beg the Delian god again
To end our woes, his succour to display,
And to our wand'rings point the certain way.

'Twas night; soft slumbers had the world possessed,
When, as I lay compos'd in pleasing rest, [sift,
Those gods I bore from flaming Troy, arise
In awful figures to my wond'ring eyes:
Close at my couch they stood, divinely bright,
And shone distinct by Cynthia's gleaming light,
Then, to dispel the cares that rack'd my breast,
These words the visionary pow'rs address'd:

Those truths the god in Delos would repeat,
By us, his envoys, he unfolds in Crete;
By us, companions of thy arms and thee,
From flaming Ilium o'er the swelling sea.
Led by our care, shall thy descendants rise,
The world's majestic monarchs, to the skies.

M m

Then build thy city for imperial sway,
And boldly take the long laborious way,
Forfake this region; for the Delian pow'r
Assign'd not for thy seat the Gnosian shore.
Once by Oenotrians till'd, there lies a place,
'Twas call'd Hesperia by the Grecian race;
For martial deeds and fruits renown'd by fame;
But since, Italia, from the leader's name,
These are the native realms the Fates assign;
Hence rose the fathers of the Trojan line;
The great Iäsus, sprung from heaven above,
And ancient Dardanus, deriv'd from Jove.
Rise then, in haste these joyful tidings bear,
These truths unquesti'd to thy father's ear.
Begone--the fair Aonian realms explore,
For Jove himself denies the Cretan shore.

Struck with the voice divine, and awful sight,
No common dream, or vision of the night;
I saw the wreaths, their features; and a stream
Of trickling sweat ran down from every limb.
I started from my bed, and rais'd on high
My hands and voice in rapture to the sky.
Then (to our gods the due oblations paid)
The scene divine before my fire I laid.
He owns his error of each ancient place,
Our two great founders, and the double race.

My son, he cry'd, whom adverse fates employ,
Oh! exercis'd in all the woes of Troy!
Now I reflect, Cassandra's word divine
Assign'd these regions to the Dardan line.
But who furnis'd, the sons of Troy should come
To fair Hesperia from their distant home?
Or who gave credit to Cassandra's strain,
Doom'd by the Fates to prophesy in vain?
Pursue we now a surer, safer road,
By Phœbus pointed, and obey the god.
Glad we comply, and leave a few behind;
Then spread our sails to catch the driving wind;
Forfake this realm; the sparkling waves divide,
And the swift vessels shoot along the tide.

Now vanish'd from our eyes the lessening
ground;

And all the wide horizon stretching round,
Above was sky, beneath was sea profound:
When, black'ning by degrees, a gathering cloud,
Charg'd with big storms, frown'd dreadful o'er
the flood,

And darken'd all the main; the whirlwinds roar,
And roll the waves in mountains to the shore.
Snatch'd by the furious gust, the vessels keep
Their road no more, but scatter o'er the deep:
The thunders roll, the forky lightnings fly:
And in a burst of rain descends the sky.

Far from our course was dash'd the navy wide,
And dark we wander o'er the tossing tide.
Not skilful Palinure in such a sea,
So black with storms, distinguish'd night from day;

Nor knew to turn the helm, or point the way.
Three nights, without one guiding star in view,
Three days, without the sun, the navy flew;
The fourth, by dawn, the swelling shores we spy,

See the thin smokes, that melt into the sky,
And bluish hills just opening on the eye.
We furl the sails, with bending oars divide
The flashing waves, and sweep the foamy tide.

Safe from the storm the Strophades I gain,
Encircled by the vast Ionian main,
Where dwelt Celæno with her Harpy train;
Since Boreas' sons had chas'd the direful guests
From Phineus' palace, and their wonted feasts.
But fiends to scourge mankind, so fierce, so fell,
Heav'n never summon'd from the depths of hell;
Bloated and gorg'd with prey, with wombs obscene,

Foul paunches, and with on're still unclean;
A virgin face, with wings and hooky claws;
Death in their eyes, and famine in their jaws.

The port we enter'd, and with joy beheld
Huge herds of oxen graze the verdant field,
And feeding flocks of goats, without a swain,
That range at large, and bound along the plain;
We seize, we slay, and to the copious feast
Call every god, and Jove himself a guest.
Then on the winding shore the tables plac'd,
And fate indulging in the rich repast;
When from the mountains, terrible to view,
On founding wings the monster Harpies flew.
They taint the banquet with their touch abhor'd,
Or snatch the smoking viands from the board.

A stench offensive follows where they fly,
And loud they scream, and raise a dreadful cry.
Thence to a cavern'd rock the train remove,
And the close shelter of a shady grove;
Once more prepare the feast, the tables raise;
Once more with fires the loaded altars blaze.
Again the fiends from their dark covert fly,
But from a different quarter of the sky;
With loathsome claws they snatch the food away,
Scream o'er our heads, and poison all the prey.
Enrag'd; I bid my train their arms prepare,
And with the direful monsters wage the war.

Close in the grass, observant of the word, [sword
They hide the shining shield, and gleaming
Then, as the Harpies from the hills once more Pour'd shrieking down, and crowded round the
On his high stand Mifenus sounds from far [shore
The brazen trump, the signal of the war.

With unaccustom'd fight we flew, to slay
The forms obscene, dread monsters of the sea.
But proof to steel their hides and plumes remain;
We strike th' impenetrable fiends in vain,
Who from the fragments wing th' aerial way,
And leave, involv'd in stench, the mangled prey;
All but Celæno;--from a pointed rock
Where perch'd she fate, the boding Fury spoke:
Then was it not enough, ye sons of Troy,
Our flocks to slaughter, and our herds destroy?
But war, shall impious war your wrongs maintain,
And drive the Harpies from their native reign?
Hear then your dreadful doom with due regard,
Which mighty Jove to Phœbus has declar'd;
Which Phœbus open'd to Celæno's view,
And I, the Furies queen, unfold to you.

To promis'd Italy your course you ply,
And safe to Italy at length shall fly;
But never, never raise your city there,
'Till, in due vengeance for the wrongs we bear,
Imperious hunger urge you to devour
Those very boards on which you fed before.
She ceas'd, and fled into the gloomy wood.
With hearts dejected my companions stood,
And sudden horrors froze their curdling blood.

Down drop the shield and spear; from fight we cease,

And humbly sue by suppliant vows for peace;
And whether goddesses, or fiends from hell,
Prostrate before the monstrous forms we fell.
But old Anchises, by the beating floods,
Invok'd with sacrifice th' immortal gods; [vine,
And rais'd his hands and voice---ye pow'rs di-
Avert these woes, and spare a righteous line.
Then he commands to cut the cords away;
With southern gales we plough the foamy sea.
And, where the friendly breeze or pilot guides,
With flying sails we stem the murmuring tides.
Now, high in view, amid the circling floods
We ken Zacynthus crown'd with waving woods.
Dulichian coasts, and Samian hills we spy,
And proud Neritos tow'ring in the sky.
Rough Ithaca we shun, a rocky shore,
And curse the land that dire Ulysses bore.
Then dim Leucate swell'd to sight, who shrouds
His tall ærial brow in ambient clouds;
Last opens, by degrees, Apollo's fane,
The dread of sailors on the wint'ry main.
To this small town, fatigu'd with toil, we haste;
The circling anchors from the prows are cast.
Safe to the land beyond our hopes restor'd,
We paid our vows to heaven's almighty lord.
All bright in suppling oil, my friends employ
Their limbs in wrestling, and revive with joy
On Actian shores the solemn games of Troy.
Pleas'd we reflect that we had pass'd in peace
Through foes unnumber'd, and the tow'ns of Greece.

Meantime the sun his annual race performs,
And blust'ring Boreas fills the sea with storms;
I hung the brazen buckler on the door,
Which once in fight the warlike Abas bore;
And thus inscrib'd---these arms with blood dis-
tain'd,

From conquering Greece the great Æneas gain'd;
Then, rous'd at my command, the sailors sweep
And dash with bending oars the sparkling deep.
Soon had we lost Phœacia's sinking tow'rs,
And skim'd along Epirus' flying shores.
On the Caonian port at length we fall;
Thence we ascend to high Buthrotos' wall.
Astonish'd here a strange report we found,
That Trojan Helenus in Greece was crown'd.
The captive prince, (victorious Pyrrhus dead)
At once succeeded to his throne and bed;
And fair Andromache to Troy restor'd,
Once more was wedded to a Dardan lord.
With eager joy I left the fleet, and went [event.
To hail my royal friends, and learn the strange

Before the walls, within a gloomy wood,
Where a new Simois roll'd his silver flood;
By chance, Andromache that moment paid
Thé mournful offerings to her Hector's shade.
A tomb, an empty tomb her hands compose
Of living turf; and two fair altars rose.
Sad scene! that still provok'd the tears she shed;
And here the queen invok'd the mighty dead.
When lo! as I advanc'd, and drew more nigh,
She saw my Trojan arms and ensigns fly;
So strange a sight astonish'd to survey,
The princess trembles, falls, and faints away.
Her beauteous frame the vital warmth forsook,
And, scarce recover'd; thus at length she spoke:

Ha!---is it true?---in person? and alive?
Still, dost thou still, oh! goddess-born, survive?
Or, if no more thou breathe the vital air,
Where is my lord, my Hector, tell me where?
Then, the big sorrow streaming from her eyes,
She fill'd the air with agonizing cries.
Few words to sooth her raging grief I say; [way:
And scarce those few, for sobs, could find their

Ah! trust your eyes, no phantoms here impose;
I live indeed, but drag a life of woes,
Say then, oh say, has fortune yet been just
To worth-like yours, since Hector sunk in dust?
Or oh! is that great hero's consort led (His dear Andromache) to Pyrrhus' bed?
To this, with lowly voice, the fair replies,
While on the ground she fixt her streaming eyes:

Thrice blest Polyxena! condemn'd to fall
By vengeful Greece beneath the Trojan wall;
Stabb'd at Pelides' tomb the victim bed,
To death deliver'd from the victor's bed.
Nor lots disgrac'd her with a chain, like me,
A wretched captive, dragg'd from sea to sea!
Doom'd to that hero's haughty heir, I gave
A son to Pyrrhus, more than half a slave,
From me, to fair Hermoine he fled
Of Leda's race, and fought a Spartan bed;
My slighted charms to Helenus resign'd,
And in the bridal bands his captives join'd.
But fierce Orastes, by the furies tost
And mad with vengeance for the bride he lost,
Swift on the monarch from his ambush flew,
And at Apollo's hallow'd altar flew.
On Helenus devolv'd (the tyrant slain)
A portion of the realm, a large domain:
From Chaon's name the fruitful tract he calls,
And from old Pergamus, his growing walls.
But oh! what winds, what fates, what gracious
pow'rs,

Led you, unknowing, to these friendly shores?
Does yet Ascanius live, the hope of Troy?
Does his fond mother's death afflict the boy?
Or glory's charms, his little soul inflame,
To match my Hector's or his father's fame?

So spoke the queen with mingled sobs and cries,
And tears in vain ran trickling from her eyes.
When lo! in royal pomp the king descends
With a long train, and owns his ancient friends.
Then to the town his welcome guests he led;
Tear follow'd tear, at ev'ry word he said.
Here in a foreign region I behold
A little Troy, an image of the old;
Here creeps along a poor penurious stream,
That fondly bears Scamander's mighty name:
A second Scæan gate I clasp with joy,
In dear remembrance of the first in Troy.
With me, the monarch bids my friends, and all,
Indulge the banquet in the regal hall,
Crown'd with rich wine the foamy goblets hold;
And the vast feast was serv'd in massy gold, [gales

Two days were past, and now the southern
Call us aboard, and stretch the swelling sails.
A thousand doubts distract my anxious breast,
And thus the royal prophet I address'd:
Oh-sacred prince of Troy, to whom 'tis giv'n,
To speak events, and search the will of heav'n,
The secret mind of Phœbus to declare
From laurels, tripods, and from every star:

To know the voice of every fowl that flies,
 The signs of every wing that beats the skies;
 Instruct me, sacred seer; since every god,
 With each blest omen, bids me plough the flood,
 To reach fair Italy, and measure o'er
 A length of ocean to the destin'd shore:
 The happy queen, and she alone, relates
 A scene of sad unutterable fates,
 A dreadful famine sent from heaven on high,
 With all the gather'd vengeance of the sky:
 Tell me, what dangers I must first oppose,
 And how o'ercome the mighty weight of woes,
 Now, the due victims slain, the king implores
 The grace and favour of th' immortal pow'rs;
 Unbind the fillets from his sacred head,
 Then, by the hand, in solemn state he led
 His trembling guest to Phœbus' fair abode;
 Struck with an awful reverence of the god.
 At length, with all the sacred fury fir'd,
 Thus spake the prophet, as the god inspir'd:
 Since, mighty chief, the deities, your guides,
 With prosperous omens wait you o'er the tides,
 Such is the doom of fate, the will of Jove,
 The firm decree of him who reigns above;
 Hear me, of many things, explain a few,
 Your future course with safety to pursue;
 And, all these foreign floods and countries past,
 To reach the wish'd Ausonian port at last.
 The rest the fates from Helenus conceal,
 And heav'n's dread queen forbids me to reveal.
 First then, that Italy, that promis'd land,
 Though thy fond hopes already grasp the strand,
 (Though now she seems so near) a mighty tide,
 And long, long regions from your reach divide.
 Sicilian seas must bend your plunging oars;
 Your fleet must coast the fair Ausonian shores,
 And reach the dreadful isle, the dire abode
 Where Circe reigns; and stem the Stygian flood,
 Before your fated city shall ascend.
 Hear then, and these auspicious signs attend:
 When, lost in contemplation deep, you find
 A large white mother of the bristly kind,
 With her white brood of thirty young, who drain
 Her swelling dugs, where Tyber bathes the plain:
 There, there, thy town shall rise, my godlike
 friend,
 And all thy labours find their destin'd end.
 Fear then Celæno's direful threats no more,
 That your fierce hunger shall your boards devour.
 Apollo, when invoc'd, will teach the way,
 And fate the mystic riddle shall display.
 But these next borders of th' Italian shores,
 On whose rough rocky sides our ocean roars,
 Avoid with caution, for the Grecian train
 Possess those realms that stretch along the main.
 Here, the fierce Locrians hold their dreadful seat;
 There, brave Idomeneus, expell'd from Crete,
 Has fixt his armies on Salentine ground,
 And awes the wide Calabrian realms around.
 Here Philoctetes, from Theffalian shores,
 Rears strong Petilia, fence'd with walls and tow'rs,
 Soon as transported o'er the rolling floods,
 You pay due vows in honour of the gods;
 When on the shore the smoking altars rise,
 A purple veil draw cautious o'er your eyes;
 Lest hostile faces should appear in sight,
 To blast and discompose the hallow'd rite.

Observe this form before the sacred shrine,
 Thou, and thy friends, and all thy future line.
 When near Sicilian coasts thy belying sails
 At length convey thee with the driving gales;
 Pelorus' straits just opening by degrees;
 Turn from the right; avoid the shores and seas.
 Far to the left thy course in safety keep,
 And fetch a mighty circle round the deep.
 That realm of old, a ruin huge! was rent
 In length of ages from the continent;
 With force convulsive burst the isle away;
 Through the dread opening broke the thund'ring
 At once the thund'ring sea Sicilia tore, [sea:
 And sunder'd from the fair Hesperian shore;
 And still the neighbouring coasts and towns divides
 With scanty channels, and contracted tides,
 Fierce to the right tremendous Scylla roars,
 Charybdis on the left the flood devours:
 Thrice swallow'd in her womb, subsides the sea,
 Deep, deep as hell; and thrice she spouts away
 From her black bellowing gulf's, disgorg'd on
 high,
 Waves after waves, that dash the distant sky.
 Lodg'd in a darksome cavern's dreadful shade,
 High o'er the surges Scylla rears her head:
 Grac'd with a virgin's breast, and female looks,
 She draws the vessels on the pointed rocks.
 Below, she lengthens in a monstrous whale,
 With dogs surrounded, and a dolphin's tail.
 But oh! 'tis far, far safer with delay
 Still round and round to plough the watery way,
 And coast Pachynus, than with curious eyes
 To see th' enormous den where Scylla lies;
 The dire tremendous fury to explore,
 Where, round her cavern'd rocks, her wat'ry monsters roar.
 Besides, if Helenus the truth inspires,
 If Phœbus warms me with prophetic fires;
 One thing in chief, O prince, Venus' strain,
 Though oft repeated, I must urge again.
 To Juno first with gifts and vows repair,
 And vanquish heaven's imperial queen with pray'
 So shall your fleets in safety wait you o'er,
 From fair Trinacria to th' Hesperian shore;
 There when arriv'd you visit Cuma's tow'rs,
 Where dark with shady woods Avernus roars,
 You see the Sibyl in her rocky cave,
 And hear the furious maid divinely rave.
 The dark decrees of fate the virgin sings,
 And writes on leaves, names, characters, an
 The mystic numbers, in the cavern laid, [things
 Are rang'd in order by the sacred maid;
 There they repose in ranks along the floor;
 At length a casual wind unfolds the door;
 The casual wind disorders the decrees,
 And the loose fates are scatter'd by the breeze.
 She scorns to range them, and again unite
 The fleeting scrolls, or stop their airy flight.
 Then back retreat the disappointed train,
 And curse the Sibyl they consult in vain.
 But thou more wise, thy purpos'd course delay,
 Tho' thy rash friends should summon thee away
 And wait with patience, tho' the flattering gale
 Sing in thy throuds, and fill thy opening sails.
 With suppliant pray'rs entreat her to relate,
 In vocal accents all thy various fate.

Her voice the Italian nations shall declare,
And the whole progress of thy future war,
Thy numerous toils the prophets shall show,
And how to shun, or suffer every woe.
With reverence due, her potent aid implore,
So shalt thou safely reach the distant shore:
Thus far I tell thee, but must tell no more.
Proceed, brave prince, with courage in thy wars,
And raise the Trojan glory to the stars.

When thus my fate the royal seer foretold,
He sent rich gifts of elephant and gold;
Within my navy's sides large treasures stow'd
And brazen cauldrons that resplendent glow'd.
To me the monarch gave a shining mail,
With many a golden clasp, and golden scale;
With this, a beauteous radiant helm, that bore
A waving plume; the helm that Pyrrhus wore.
My father too with costly gifts he loads,
And sailors he supplies to stem the floods,
And generous steeds, and arms to all my train,
With skillful guides to lead us o'er the main.

And now my sire gave orders to unbind
The gather'd sails, and catch the rising wind;
Whom thus, at parting the prophetic sage
Address'd with all the reverence due to age—
O favour'd of the skies! whom Venus led
To the high honours of her genial bed,
Her own immortal beauties to enjoy,
And twice preserv'd thee from the flames of Troy:
Lo! to your eyes Ausonian coasts appear;
Go—to that realm your happy voyage steer.
But far beyond those regions you survey,
Your coasting fleet must cut the lengthen'd way.
Still, still at distance lies the fated place;
Assign'd by Phœbus to the Trojan race.
Go then, he said, with full success go on,
Oh blest! thrice blest in such a matchless fon.
Why longer should my words your course detain;
When the soft gales invite you to the main?

Nor less the queen, her love and grief to tell,
With costly presents takes her sad farewell.
She gave my son a robe; the robe of old
Her own fair hands embroider'd o'er with gold:
With precious vests she loads the darling boy,
And a resplendent mantle wrought in Troy.
Accept, dear youth, she said, these robes I wove
In happier days, memorial of my love.

This trifling token of thy friend receive,
The last, last present Hector's wife can give.
Ah! now, methinks, and only now, I see
My dear Aftyanax revive in thee!
Such were his motions! such a sprightly grace
Charm'd from his eyes, and open'd in his face!
And had it pleas'd, alas! the pow'rs divine,
His blooming years had been the same as thine.

Thus the then mournful last farewell I took,
And; bath'd in tears, the royal pair bespoke:
Live you long happy in a settled state;
'Tis ours to wander still from fate to fate.
Safe have you gain'd the peaceful port of ease,
Not doom'd to plough th' immeasurable seas;
Nor seek for Latium, that deludes the view,
A coast that flies as fast as we pursue.
Here you a new Scamander can enjoy;
Here your own hands erect a second Troy:
With happier omens may the rise in peace,
And less obnoxious than the first to Greece.

If e'er the long-expected shore I gain,
Where Tyber's streams enrich the flow'ry plain;
Or if I live to raise our fated town;
Our Latian Troy and yours shall join in one;
In one shall centre both the kindred states,
The same their founder, and the same their fates!
And may their son to future times convey
The sacred friendship which we sign to-day.

We take to Italy the shortest road,
By steep Ceraunian mountains; o'er the flood.
Now the descending sun roll'd down the light,
The hills lie cover'd in the shades of night;
When foin by lot attend, and ply the oars,
Some, worn with toil, lie stretch'd along the shores:
There, by the murmurs of the heaving deep
Rock'd to repose, they sunk in pleasing sleep.
Scarce half the hours of silent night were fled,
When careful Palinure forsakes his bed;
And every breath explores that stirs the seas,
And watchful listens to the passing breeze;
Observes the course of ev'ry orb on high,
That moves in silent pomp along the sky.
Arcturus dreadful with the stormy star,
The wat'ry Hyads, and the northern car,
In the blue vault his piercing eyes behold,
And huge Orion flame in arms of gold.
When all serene he saw th' ethereal plain;
He gave the signal to the slumbering train.
We rouse; our opening canvass we display,
And wing with spreading sails the wat'ry way.

Now every star before Aurora flies,
Whose glowing blushes streak the purple skies!
When the dim hills of Italy we view'd,
That peep'd by turns, and div'd beneath the flood.
Lo! Italy appears, Achates cries,
And Italy with shouts, the crowd replies.
My sire, transported, crowns a bowl with wine,
Stands on the deck, and calls the powers divine:
Ye gods! who rule the tempests, earth, and seas,
Beside our course, and breathe a prosperous breeze,

Up sprung th' expected breeze; the port we spy,
Near, and more near: and Pallas' sane on high,
With the steep hill, rose dancing to the eye.
Our sails are fur'd; and from the seas profound,
We turn the prows to land, while ocean foams a-
round.

Where from the raging east the furies flow,
The land indent'd bends an ample bow,
The port conceal'd within the winding shore,
Dash'd on the fronting cliffs, the billows roar.
Two lofty tow'ring rocks extended wide, [tide-
With outstretch'd arms embrace the murmuring
Within the mighty wall the waters lie,
And from the coast the temple seems to fly.

Here first, a dubious omen I beheld;
Four milk-white couriers graz'd the verdant field.
War, cry'd my sire, these hostile realms prepare;
Train'd to the fight, these steeds denounce the war:
But since sometimes they bear the guiding rein,
Yok'd to the car; the hopes of peace remain.
Then, as her temple rais'd, our throats, we paid
Our first devotions to the marriage maid.
Next, as the rules of Helenus enjoin,
We veil'd our heads at Juno's sacred shrine;
And sought heaven's awful queen with rites
divine.

This done;—once more with shifting sails we fly,
 And cautious pass the hostile regions by.
 Hence we renown'd Tarentum's bay behold,
 Renown'd, 'tis said, from Hercules of old.
 Oppos'd, Lacinia's temple rose on high,
 And proud Caullonian tow'rs salute the sky.
 Then, near the rocky Scyllacæan bay
 For wrecks defam'd, we plough the wat'ry way.
 Now we behold, emerging to our eyes
 From distant floods, Sicilian Ætna rise;
 And hear a thund'ring din and dreadful roar
 Of billows breaking on the rocky shore.
 The smoking waves boil high, on every side,
 And scoop the sands, and blacken all the tide.
 Charybdis' gulf, my father cries, behold!
 The direful rocks the royal fœr foretold;
 Ply, ply your oars, and stretch to every stroke:
 Swift as the word, their ready oars they took;
 First skilful Palinure; then all the train
 Steer to the left, and plough the liquid plain.
 Now on a tow'ring arch of waves we rise,
 Heav'd on the bounding billows, to the skies.
 Then, as the roaring surge retreating fell,
 We shoot down headlong to the depths of hell.
 Thrice the rough rocks rebel on our ears;
 Thrice mount the foamy tides, and dash the fars.
 The wind now sinking with the lamp of day,
 Spent with her toils, and dubious of the way;
 We reach the dire Cyclopean shore, that forms
 An ample port, impervious to the storms.
 But Ætna roars with dreadful ruins nigh,
 Now huris a bursting cloud of cinders high,
 Involv'd in smoky whirlwinds to the sky;
 With load disjunct, to the starry frame:
 Shoots fiery globes, and furious floods of flame:
 Now from her bellowing caverns burst away
 Vast piles of melted rocks, in open day.
 Her shatter'd entrails wide the mountain throws,
 And deep as hell her burning centre glows.
 On vast Encelades this pond'rous load
 Was thrown in vengeance by the thund'ring god;
 Who pants beneath the mountains, and expires,
 Through openings huge, the fierce tempestuous
 fires;
 Oft as he shifts his side, the caverns roar;
 With smoke and flame the skies are cover'd o'er,
 And all Trinacria shakes from shore to shore.
 That night we heard the loud tremendous sound,
 The monstrous mingled peal that thunder'd round;
 While in the shell'ring wood we sought repose,
 Nor knew from whence the dreadful tumult rose.
 For not one star displays his golden light;
 The skies lie cover'd in the shades of night;
 The silver moon her glimmering splendor shrouds
 In gathering vapors, and a night of clouds.
 Now fled the dewy shades of night away,
 Before the blushes of the dawning day;
 When, from the wood, thut sudden forth in view
 A wretch, in rags that flutter'd as he flew.
 The human form in meagre hunger lost;
 The suppliant stranger, more than half a ghost, Stretch'd forth his hands, and pointed to the coast.
 We turn'd to view the sight;—his vest was torn,
 And all the tatter'd garb was ragg'd with thorn.
 His beard hangs long, and dust the wretch distains,
 And scarce the shadow of a man remains.

In all besides, a Grecian he appears,
 And late a soldier in the Trojan wars.
 Soon as our Dardan dreis and arms he view'd,
 In fear suspended for a space he stood;
 Stood, stop'd, and paus'd; then, springing forth,
 he flies

All heading to the shore with pray'rs and cries:
 Oh! by this vital air, the stars on high,
 By every pitying pow'r who treads the sky!
 Ye Trojans, take me hence; I ask no more;
 But bear, oh bear me from this dreadful shore.
 I own myself a Grecian, and confess
 I storm'd your Ilium with the sons of Greece.
 If that offence must doom me to the grave,
 Ye Trojans, plunge me in the whelming wave.
 I die contented, if that grace I gain;
 I die with pleasure, if I die by man. [around
 Then kneel'd the wretch, and suppliant clung
 My knees with tears, and grovell'd on the ground:
 Mov'd with his cries, we urge him to relate
 His name, his lineage, and his cruel fate:
 Then by the hand my good old father took
 The trembling youth, who thus encourag'd spoke Ulysses' friend, your empire to destroy,
 I left my native Ithaca for Troy,
 My fire, poor Admaſtus, sent from far
 His ion, his Achæmenides, to war;
 Oh! had we both our humble state maintain'd,
 And safe in peace and poverty remain'd!
 For me my friends forgetful left behind,
 In the huge Cyclops' ample cave confin'd.
 Floating with human gore, the dreadful dome
 Lies wide and waste, a solitary gloom!
 With mangled limbs was all the pavement spread;
 High as the stars he heaves his horrid head.
 The tow'ring giant stalks with matchless might;
 A savage fiend! tremendous to the sight.
 (Far, far from earth, ye heavenly pow'rs, sepell
 A fiend so direful to the depths of hell!)
 For slaughter'd mortals are the monster's food,
 The bodies he devours, and quaffs the blood.
 These eyes beheld him, when his ample hand
 Seiz'd two poor wretches of our trembling band.
 Stretch'd o'er the cavern, with a dreadful stroke,
 He snatch'd, he dash'd, he brain'd 'em on the rock.
 In one black torrent swam the smoking floor;
 Fierce he devours the limbs that drop with gore;
 The limbs yet sprawling, dreadful to survey!
 Still heave and quiver while he grinds the prey.
 But mindful of himself, that fatal hour,
 Not unreveng'd their death Ulysses bore.
 For while the nodding savage sleeps supine,
 Gorg'd with his horrid feast, and drown'd in wine;
 And, stretch'd o'er half the cave, ejects the load
 Of human offals mixt with human blood:
 Trembling, by lot we took our posts around,
 Th' enormous giant slumb'ring on the ground.
 Then (ev'ry god invoc'd, who rules the sky)
 Plunge the sharp weapon in his monstrous eye;
 His eye, that midst his frowning forehead shone,
 Like some broad buckler, or the blazing sun.
 Thus we reveng'd our dear companions lost:
 But fly, ye Trojans, fly this dreadful coast.
 For know, a hundred horrid Cyclops more
 Range on these hills, and dwell along the shore,
 As huge as Polypheme, the giant swain,
 Who milk, like him, in caves the woolly train:

Now thrice the moon, fair empress of the night,
Has fill'd her growing horns with borrow'd light,
Since in these woods I pass'd the hours away,
In dens of beasts, and savages of prey,
Saw on the rocks the Cyclops ranging round, Heard their loud footsteps thund'ring on the ground, [at the found.]

With each big bellowing voice, and trembled
Here every stony fruit I pluck for food,
Herbs, cornels, roots, and berries of the wood.
While round I gaze, your fleet I first explore,
The first that touch'd on this detested shore ;
To 'scape these savages, I flew with joy
To meet your navy, though it sail'd from Troy.
If I but shun the cruel hands of these ;
Do you destroy me by what death you please.

Scarce had he said ; when lo ! th' enormous
Huge Polyphemus, 'midst his fleecy train, [swain,
A bulk prodigious ! from the mountains brow
Defends terrific to the shore below :

A monster grim, tremendous, vast, and high ;
His front deform'd, and quench'd his blazing eye !
His huge hand held a pine, tall, large, and strong,
To guide his footsteps as he tow'd along.
His flock attends, the only joy he knows ;
His pipe around his neck, the solace of his woes.
Soon as the giant reach'd the deeper flood,
With many a groan he cleans'd the gather'd blood
From his bor'd eye-ball in the briny main,
And, bellowing, grinds his teeth in agonizing pain.
Then stalks enormous through the midmost tides ;
And scarce the topmost surges reach his sides.

Aboard, the well-deserving Greek we took,
And, pale with fear, the dreadful coast forsook ;
Cut every cord with eager speed away,
Bend to the stroke, and sweep the foamy sea.
The giant heard ; and, turning to the found,
At first pursu'd us through the vast profound ;
Stretch'd his huge hand to reach the fleet in vain ;
Nor could he ford the deep Ionian main.
With that, the furious monster roar'd so aloud,
That Ocean shook in ev'ry distant flood ;
Trembled all Italy from shore to shore ;
And Ætna's winding caves rebellow to the roar.

Rous'd at the peal, the fierce Cyclopean train Rush'd from their woods and mountains to the
main ;

Around the port the ghastly brethren stand,
A dire assembly ! covering all the strand.
In each grim forehead blaz'd the single eye ;
In vain enrag'd the monstrous race we spy,
A host of giants tow'ring in the sky. }
So on some mountain tow'rs the lofty grove
Of beauteous Dian, or imperial Jove ;
Th' aerial pines in pointed spires from far,
Or spreading oaks, majestic nod in air.

Headlong we fly with horror, where the gales
And speeding winds direct the flutt'ring sails.
But Helenus forbids to plough the waves
Where Scylla roars, and fierce Charybdis raves.
As death stands dreadful 'midst the dangerous road,
With backward course we plough the foamy flood ;
When, from Pelorus' point a northern breeze
Swells every sail, and wafts us o'er the seas ;
First, where Pantagia's mouth appear'd in view,
Flank'd by a range of rocks, the navy flew :
Then, shooting by the fam'd Megarean bay,
And lowly Tapus cut the wat'ry way.
These coasts by Achaemendes were shown,
Who follow'd, late, Læertes' wand'ring son :
Familiar with the track he pass'd before,
He names the lands, and points out ev'ry shore.

An isle, once call'd Ortagia, fronts the fides
Of rough Plemmyrium, and Sicanian tides.
Hither, 'tis said, Alphæus, from his source
In Elis' realms, directs his watery course :
Beneath the main he takes his secret way,
And mounts with Arethusa's streams to day :
Now a Sicilian flood his course he keeps,
And rolls with blended waters to the deeps.
Admonish'd, I adore the guardian gods,
Then pass the bounds of rich Helorus' floods.
Next our fleet galleys by Pachynus glide,
Whose rocks projecting stretch into the tide.
The Camarinian marsh I now survey,
By fate forbidden to be drain'd away.
Then the Galoan fields with Gela came
In view, who borrow'd from the flood their name.
With her huge wall proud Agragas succeeds ;
A realm, of old renown'd for generous steeds.
From thee, Selinus, swift before the wind
We flew, and left thy sinking palms behind ;
By Lilybaeum's sides our course pursu'd,
Whose rocks insidious hide beneath the flood ;
And reach (those dangerous shelves and shallows past)

The fatal port of Drepanum at last.
Wretch as I was, on this detested coast,
The chief support of all my woes, I lost ;
My dear, dear father—sav'd, but sav'd in vain—
From all the tempests of the raging main.
Nor did the royal sage this blow foretell ;
Nor did the direful Harpy-queen of hell,
Among her frightful prodigies, foreshow.
This last sad stroke ; this unexpected woe.
Here all my labours, all my toils were o'er,
And hence heav'n led me to your friendly shore.

Thus, while the room was hush'd, the prince relates

The wondrous series of his various fates ;
His long, long wand'rings, and unnumber'd woes :
Then ceas'd ; and sought the blessings of repose.

THE ARGUMENT.

Dido discovers to her sister her passion for Æneas, and her thoughts of marrying him. She prepares a hunting match for his entertainment. Juno with the consent of Venus, raises a storm, which separates the hunters, and drives Æneas and Dido into the same cave, where their marriage is supposed to be completed. Jupiter dispatches Mercury to Æneas, to warn him from Carthage. Æneas secretly prepares for his voyage. Dido finds out his design, and, to put a stop to it, makes use of her own and her sister's entreaties, and discovers all the variety of passions that are incident to a neglected lover. When nothing could prevail upon him, she contrives her own death, with which this book concludes.

But love inflam'd the queen; the raging pain
Preys on her heart, and glows in every vein.
Much she revolves the hero's deeds divine,
And much the glories of his godlike line;
Each look, each accent breaks her golden rest,
Lodg'd in her soul, and imag'd in her breast.

The morn had chas'd the dewy shades away,
'And o'er the world advanc'd the lamp of day;
When to her sister thus the royal dame
Disclos'd the secret of her growing flame.

Anna, what dreams are these that haunt my
Who is this hero, this our godlike guest? [rest?
Mark but his graceful port, his manly charms:
How great a prince! and how renown'd in arms!
Sure he descends from some celestial kind;
For fear attends the low degenerate mind.
But oh! what wars, what battles he relates!
How long he struggled with his adverse fates!
Did not my soul her purpose still retain,
Fix'd and determin'd ne'er to wed again,
Since from my widow'd arms the murdering sword
Untimely snatch'd my first unhappy lord;
Did not my thoughts the name of marriage dread,
And the bare mention of the bridal bed---
Forgive my frailty---but I seem inclin'd
To yield to this one weakness of my mind.

For oh! my sister, unreserv'd and free
I trust the secret of my soul to thee;
Since poor Sichæus, by my brother slain,
Dash'd with his blood the consecrated fane,
And stain'd the gods; my firm resolves, I own,
This graceful prince has shook, and this alone.
I feel a warmth o'er all my trembling frame,
Too like the tokens of my former flame.
But oh! may earth her dreadful gulf display,
And gaping snatch me from the golden day;
May I be hurl'd, by heav'n's almighty fire,
'Transfix'd with thunder and involv'd in fire,
Down to the shades of hell from realms of light,
The deep, deep shades of everlasting night;
Ere, sacred honour! I betray thy cause
In word, or thought, or violate thy laws.
No!--my first lord, my first ill-fated spouse,
Still, as in life, is lord of all my vows.
My love he had, and ever let him have,
Interr'd with him, and buried in the grave.
Then, by her rising grief o'erwhelm'd, she ceas'd:
The tears ran trickling down her heaving breast.

Sister, the fair replies, whom far above
The light of heav'n, or life itself I love;
Still on your bloom shall endless sorrow prey,
And waste your youth in solitude away?
And shall no pleasing theme your thoughts em-
The prattling infant, or the bridal joy? [ploy?
Think you such cares disturb your husband's shade,
Or stir the sacred ashes of the dead?
What though before, no lover won your grace,
Among the Tyrian, or the Libyan race?
With just disdain you pass'd farbas o'er,
And many a king whom warlike Afric bore.
But will you fly the hero you approve?
And feel your heart against a prince you love?
Nor will you once reflect what regions bound
Your infant empire, and your walls surround?
Here proud Gætulian cities tow'r in air,
Whose swarthy sons are terrible in war;
There the dread Syrtes stretch along the main,
And there the wild Barcæans range the plain;
Here parch'd with thirst a smoking region lies,
There fierce in arms the brave Numidians rise.
Why should I urge our vengeful brother's ire?
The war just bursting from the gates of Tyre?
Sure, every god, with mighty Juno, bore
The fleets of Ilium to the Libyan shore.
From such a marriage, soon your joyful eyes
Shall see a potent town and empire rise.
What scenes of glory Carthage must enjoy,
When our confederate arms unite with Troy?
Go then, propitiate heav'n; due offerings pay;
Careful, invite your godlike guest to stay,
And study still new causes of delay. }
Tell him, that, charg'd with deluges of rain,
Orion rages on the wint'ry main;
That still unrigg'd his shatter'd vessels lie,
Nor can his fleet endure so rough a sky.

These words soon scatter'd the remains of
shame;

Confirm'd her hopes, and fann'd the rising flame-
With speed they seek the temples, and implore
With rich oblations each celestial pow'r:
Selected sheep with holy rites they slay
To Ceres, Bacchus, and the god of day.
But chief, to Juno's name the victims bled,
To Juno, guardian of the bridal bed.
The queen before the snowy heifer stands,
Timid the flurries, a goblet in her hands;

Between the horns she sheds the sacred wine,
 And pays due honours to the pow'rs divine;
 Moves round the fane in solemn pomp, and loads,
 Day after day, the altars of the gods.
 Then hovering o'er, the fair consults in vain
 The panting entrails of the victims slain:
 But ah! no sacred rites her pain remove; [love?
 Priests, pray'rs, and temples! what are you to
 With passion fir'd, her reason quite o'erthrown,
 The hapless queen runs raving through the town.
 Soft flames consume her vitals, and the dart,
 Deep, deep within, lies festering in her heart,
 So sends the heedless hunter's twanging bow
 The shaft that quivers in the bleeding doe;
 Stung with the stroke, and madding with the pain,
 She wildly flies from wood to wood in vain;
 Shoots o'er the Cretan laws with many a bound,
 The cleaving dart still rankling in the wound!

Now the fond princefs leads her hero on,
 Shows him her Tyrian wealth, and growing town;
 Displays her pompous tow'rs that proudly rise,
 And hopes to tempt him with the glorious prize;
 Now as she tries to tell her raging flame,
 Stops short,—and falters, check'd by conscious
 shame:

Now, at the close of evening, calls her guest,
 To share the banquet and renew the feast:
 She fondly begs him to repeat once more
 The Trojan story that she heard before;
 Then to distraction charm'd, in rapture hung
 On every word, and dy'd upon his tongue.
 But when the setting stars to rest invite,
 And fading Cynthia veils her beamy light;
 When all the guests retire to soft repose;
 Left in the hall, she sighs, and vents her woes,
 Lies on his couch, bedews it with her tears,
 In fancy fees her absent prince, and hears
 His charming voice still sounding in her ears. }
 Fir'd with the glorious hero's graceful look,
 The young Ascanius on her lap she took,
 With trifling play her furious pains beguill'd;
 In vain!—the father charms her in the child.
 No more the tow'rs, unfinish'd, rise in air: }
 The youth, undisciplin'd no more prepare
 Ports for the fleet, or bulwarks for the war;
 The works and battlements neglected lie,
 And the proud structures cease to brave the sky.

The fair thus rages with the mighty pain,
 That fir'd her soul; and honour pleads in vain.
 This Juno saw, and thus the bride of Jove,
 In guileful terms address'd the queen of love:
 A high exploit indeed! a glorious name,
 Unfading trophies and eternal fame,
 You, and your son have worthily pursu'd!
 Two gods a single woman have subdu'd!
 To me your groundless jealousies are known,
 And dark suspicions o' this Tyrian town.
 But why, why, goddess, to what aim or end,
 In lasting quarrels should we still contend?
 Hence then from strife resolve we both to cease,
 And by the nuptial band confirm the peace.
 To crown your wish, the queen with fond desire
 Dies for your son, and melts with amorous fire.
 Let us with equal sway protect the place,
 The common guardians of the mingled race.
 Be Tyre the dow'r to seal the glad accord,
 And royal Dido serve this Phrygian lord.

To whom the queen; (who mark'd with piercing eyes

The goddess labouring, in the dark disguise,
 To Libyan shores from Latium to convey
 The destin'd seat of universal sway);
 Who this alliance madly would deny?
 Or war with thee, dread empress of the sky?
 And oh! that fortune in the work would join,
 With full success to favour the design!
 But much I doubt, O goddess, if the Fates,
 Or Jove permit us to unite the states.
 You, as his consort, your request may move,
 And search the will, or bend the mind of Jove,
 Go then—your scheme before the father lay;
 Go;—and I follow, where you lead the way.

Be mine the care, th' imperial dame replies,
 To gain the god, the sovereign of the skies,
 Then heed my counsel—when the dawning light
 Drives from the opening world the shades of night;
 The prince and queen, transfix'd with amorous flame,
 Bend to the woods to hunt the savage game;
 There, while the crowds the forest-walks betet,
 Swarm round the woods, and spread the waving
 The skies shall burst upon the sportive train: [net;
 In storms of hail, and deluges of rain,
 The gather'd tempest o'er their heads shall roll,
 And the long thunders roar from pole to pole.
 On ev'ry side shall fly the scattering crowds,
 Involv'd and cover'd in a night of clouds.
 To the same cave for shelter shall repair
 The Trojan hero and the royal fair.
 The lovers, if your will concurs with mine,
 Ourselves in Hymen's nuptial bands will join.
 The goddess gave consent, the compact bound,
 But smil'd in secret at the fraud the found.

Scarce had Aurora left her orient bed,
 And rear'd above the waves her radiant head,
 When, pouring thro' the gates, the train appear }
 Massilian hunters with the steely spear, [war,
 Sagacious hounds, and toils, and all the lyvan }
 The queen engag'd in dress,—with reverence
 The Tyrian peers before the regal gate. [wait
 Her steed, with gold and purple cover'd round,
 Neighs, champs the bit, and foaming paws the
 At length she comes, magnificently dress'd [ground.
 (Her guards attending) in a Tyriaan vest:
 Back in a golden caul her locks are ty'd;
 A golden quiver rattles at her side;
 A golden clasp her purple garments binds,
 And robes, that flew redundant in the winds.
 Next with the youthful Trojans to the sport
 The fair Ascanius issues from the court.
 But far the fairest, and supremely tall,
 Tow'rs great Æneas, and outshines them all.
 As when from Lycia bound in wintry frost,
 Where Xanthus' streams enrich the smiling coast,
 The beauteous Phœbus in high pomp retires,
 And hears in Delos the triumphant quires;
 The Cretan crowds and Dryopes advance,
 And painted Scythians round his altars dance;
 Fair wreaths of vivid bays his head infold,
 His locks bound backward and adorn'd with gold;
 The god majestic moves o'er Cynthus' brows,
 His golden quiver rattling as he goes:
 So mov'd Æneas; such his charming grace;
 So glow'd the purple bloom, that flush'd his god-like face.

Soon as the train amid the mountains came,
And form'd the covert of the savage game;
The goats flew bounding o'er the craggy brow
From rock to rock, and fought the fields below.
Here the fleet stags chas'd down the tow'ring steep,
In clouds of dust through the long valley sweep:
While there, exulting, to his utmost speed
The young Afcanius spurs his fiery steed,
Outstrips by turns the flying ferial train,
And scorns the meaner triumphs of the plain:
The hopes of glory all his soul inflame;
Eager he longs to run at nobler game,
And drench his youthful javelin in the gore
Of the fierce lion, or the mountain boar.

Meantime loud thunders rattle round the sky,
And hail and rain, in mingled tempest, fly;
While floods on floods, in swelling turbid tides,
Roll roaring down the mountain's channell'd sides.
The young Afcanius, and the hunting train,
To close retreats fled diversely o'er the plain.
To the same gloomy cave with speed repair
The Trojan hero and the royal fair.
Earth shakes, and Juno gives the nuptial signs;
With quivering flames the glimmering grotto shines:

With light'nings all the conscious skies are spread:
The nymphs run shrieking round the mountain's
From that sad day, unhappy Dido! rose [head.
Shame, death, and ruin, and a length of woes.
Nor fame nor censure now the queen can move,
No more the labours to conceal her love.
Her passion stands avow'd; and wedlock's name
Adorns the crime, and sanctifies the fame.

Now fame, tremendous fiend! without delay
Through Libyan cities took her rapid way.
Fame, the swift plague that every moment grows,
And gains new strength and vigour as she goes.
First small with fear, she swells to wond'rous size,
And stalks on earth and tow'rs above the skies;
Whom, in her wrath to heav'n, the teeming earth
Produc'd the last of her gigantic birth;
A monster huge and dreadful to the eye,
With rapid feet to run, or wings to fly.
Beneath her plumes the various fury bears
A thousand piercing eyes and list'ning ears:
And with a thousand mouths and babbling tongues appears.

Thund'ring by night, thro' heaven and earth the
No golden slumber seal her watchful eyes; [flies;
On tow'rs of battlement she sits by day,
And shakes whole towns with terror and dismay;
Alarms the world around, and, perch'd on high,
Reports a truth, or publishes a lie.
Now both she mingled with malignant joy,
And told the nations, that a prince from Troy
Inflam'd with love the Tyrian queen, who led
The godlike stranger to her bridal bed;
That both, indulging to their soft desires,
And deaf to censure, melt in amorous fires;
From every thought the cares of state remove,
And the long winter pass'd away in love.

This tale the fury glories to display,
Then to the king Larbas bent her way;
With jealous rage the turious prince inspires,
And all his soul with indignation fires.
This monarch sprung from Ammon's warm embrace
With a fair nymph of Garamantic race,

The mighty king a hundred temples rais'd;
An hundred altars that with victims blaz'd;
Through all his realms, in honour of his fire;
And watch'd the hallow'd everlasting fire;
With various wreaths adorn'd the holy door,
And drench'd the soil with consecrated gore.
Amid the statues of the gods he stands,
And spreading forth to Jove his lifted hands,
Fir'd with the tale, and raving with despair,
Prefers in bitterness of soul his pray'r.

Almighty Jove! to whom our Moorish line
In large libations pour the generous wine,
And least on painted beds; say, father, say,
If yet thy eyes these flagrant crimes survey.
Or do we vainly tremble and adore,
When through the skies the pealing thunders
Thine are the bolts? or idly do they fall, [roar!
And rattle through the dark aerial hall?
A wand'ring woman, who on Libya thrown,
Rais'd on a purchas'd spot a slender town;
On terms ourself prescrib'd, was glad to gain
A barren tract that runs along the main;
The proffer'd nuptials of thy son's abhorr'd;
But to her throne receives a Dardan lord.
And lo! this second Paris come again,
With his unmanly, soft, luxurious train,
In scented tresses and a mitre gay,
To bear my bride, his ravish'd prize, away;
While still in vain we bid thy altars flame,
And pay our vows to nothing but a name.

Him, as he grasp'd his altars, and preferr'd
His wrathful pray'r, th' almighty father heard;
Then to the palace turn'd his awful eye,
Where, careles of their fame, the lovers lie.
The god, that scene offended to survey,
Charg'd with his high command the son of May:
Fly, fly, my son, our orders to perform;
Mount the fleet wind, and ride the rapid storm;
Fly---to yon Dardan chief in Carthage bear
Our awful mandate through the fields of air,
Who idly ling'ring in the Tyrian state,
Neglects the promis'd walls decreed by fate.
Not such a prince, the beauteous queen of love
(When twice she sav'd him) promis'd him to Jove;
A prince the promis'd who by deeds divine
Should prove he sprung from Teucer's martial line;
Whose sword imperial Italy should awe,
A warlike realm! and give the world the law.

If no such glories can his mind inflame,
If he neglects his own immortal fame;
What has his heir the young Afcanius done?
Why should he grudge an empire to his son?
What scheme, what prospect can the chief pro-
So long to loiter with a race of foes? [pose,
The promis'd kingdom to regard no more,
And quite neglect the destin'd Latian shore?
Haste---bid him fail---be this our will; and bear
With speed this mandate through the fields of air.

Swift at the word, the duteous son of May Prepares th' almighty's orders to obey;
First round his feet the golden wings he bound,
That speed his progress o'er the seas profound,
Or earth's unmeasur'd regions, as he flies,
Wrapp'd in a rapid whirlwind, down the skies.
Then grasp'd the wand; the wand that calls the ghosts
From hell, or drives 'em to the Stygian coasts;

ites or chafes sleep with wond'rous pow'r,
 dopes those eyes that death had seal'd before.
 us arm'd, on wings of winds sublimely rode rough heaps of opening clouds the flying god.
 om far huge Atlas' rocky sides he spies,
 las, whose head supports the starry skies:
 at by the winds and driving rains, he shrouds
 s shady forehead in surrounding clouds;
 ith ice his horrid beard is crusted o'er;
 om his bleak brows the gushing torrents pour;
 it-spread, his mighty shoulders heave below
 e hoary piles of everlasting snow.
 ere on pois'd pinions stoop'd the panting god;
 en, from the steep, shot headlong to the flood.
 s the swift sea-mew, for the fishy prey,
 low excursions skims along the sea,
 , rocks and shores, and wings th' aerial way; }
 , from his kindred mountain, Hermes flies etween th' extended earth and starry skies;
 us through the parting air his course he bore,
 nd, gliding, skimm'd along the Libyan shore.
 on as the winged god to Carthage came,
 e finds the prince forgetful of his fame:
 he rising domes employ his idle hours,
 h' unfinish'd palaces and Tyrian tow'rs.
 sword all starr'd with gems, and spangled o'er ith yellow jaspers, at his side he wore;
 robe resplendent from his shoulders flow'd hat, flaming, deep with Tyrian crimson glow'd;
 he work of Dido; whose unrivall'd art
 With flow'rs of gold embroider'd every part.
 To whom the god:---These hours canst thou employ

To raise proud Carthage, heedless prince of Troy?
 Thus for a foreign bride to build a town
 And form a state, forgetful of thy own?
 The lord of heav'n and earth, almighty Jove,
 With this command dispatch'd me from above;
 What are thy hopes from this thy long delay?
 Why thus in Libya pass thy hours away?
 If future empire cease thy thoughts to raise,
 Or the fair prospect of immortal praise;
 Regard Acanus, prince, the royal boy;
 The last, the best surviving hope of Troy;
 To whom the Fates decree, in time to come,
 The long, long glories of imperial Rome.
 He spoke, and speaking left him gazing there;
 And all the fluid form dissolv'd in air.

The prince astonish'd stood, with horror stung;
 Fear rais'd his hair, and wonder chain'd his tongue:
 Struck and alarm'd with such a dread command,
 He longs to leave the dear enchanting land.
 But ah! with what address shall he begin,
 How speak his purpose to the raving queen?
 A thousand thoughts his wavering soul divide,
 That turns each way, and strains on every side:
 A thousand projects labouring in his breast,
 On this at last he fixes as the best:
 Mnestheus and brave Cloanthus he commands
 To rig the fleet, to summon all the bands
 In secret silence to the shore, and hide
 The sudden cause, that bids them tempt the tide.
 Then while fair Dido, sick with fond desire,
 Thinks such a boundless love can ne'er expire,
 Himself the proper measures will prepare
 To move the queen, and seize with watchful }
 The softest moments to address the fair. {care}

With speed impatient fly the chiefs away,
 And, fir'd with eager joy, the prince obey.

But soon the fraud unhappy Dido spies;
 (For what can 'scape a lover's piercing eyes,
 Who e'en in safety fears with wild affright?)
 She first discern'd the meditated flight;
 And fame, infernal fiend, the news conveys,
 The fleet was rigg'd and launching on the seas.
 Mad with despair, and all her soul on flame,
 Around the city raves the royal dame:
 So the fierce Bacchanal with frantic cries,
 Stung by the god, to proud Cithæron flies,
 And shakes her ivy spear, and raves around,
 While the huge mountain echoes to the sound.
 At length, by potent love and grief oppress'd,
 The queen, her recreant lover first address'd:

And could'st thou hope, dissembler, from my sight,
 Ah! wretch perfidious! to conceal thy flight?
 In such base silence from my realms to fail?
 Nor can our vows and plighted hands prevail,
 Nor Dido's cruel death thy flight detain?
 For death, death only can relieve my pain:
 And are thy vessels launch'd, while winter sweeps
 With the rough northern blast the roaring deeps?
 Barbarian! say, if Troy herself had stood,
 Nor foreign realms had call'd thee o'er the flood,
 Would'st thou thy sails in stormy seas employ,
 And brave the surge to gain thy native Troy?
 Me will you fly, to tempt the dangerous wave?
 Ah! by the tears I shed, the hand you gave;
 (For these still mine, and only these remain;
 The tears I shed, the hand you gave in vain!)
 By those late solemn nuptial bands I plead,
 By those first pleasures of the bridal bed;
 If e'er, when folded in your circling arms,
 You sigh'd, and prais'd these now-neglected
 charms:

If pray'r can move thee, with this pray'r com- }
 Regard, Æneas, with a pitying eye [ply.]
 A falling race, and lay thy purpose by.
 For thee Numidian kings in arms conspire;
 For thee have I incens'd the sons of Tyre;
 For thee I lost my honour and my fame,
 That to the stars advanc'd my glorious name.
 Must I in death thy cruel scorn deplore,
 My barbarous guest!--but ah!--my spouse no-
 more!

What--shall I wait, till fierce Pygmalion pours
 From Tyre on Carthage, and destroys my tow'rs?
 Shall I in proud Iarbas' chains be led
 A slave, a captive to the tyrant's bed?
 Ah!--had I brought, before thy fatal flight,
 Some little offspring of our loves to light;
 If in my regal hall I could survey
 Some princely boy, some young Æneas play;
 Thy dear resemblance but in looks alone!
 I should not seem quite widow'd and undone.

She said; the prince stood still in grief profound,
 And fix'd his eyes relentless on the ground;
 By Jove's high will admonish'd from the skies;
 At length the hero thus in brief replies.

Your bounties, queen, I never can forget;
 And never, never pay the mighty debt;
 But, long as life informs this fleeting frame,
 My soul shall honour fair Eliza's name.
 Then hear my plea:---By stealth I ne'er design'd
 To leave your hospitable realm behind;

Forbear the thought ;-- much less in Libyan lands,
 A casual guest, to own the bridal bands.
 Had fate allow'd me to consult my ease,
 To live and settle on what terms I please ;
 Still had I stay'd in Asia, to enjoy
 The dear, dear relics of my native Troy :
 Rais'd royal Priam's ruin'd tow'rs again,
 A second Ilion for my vanquish'd train.
 But now, fair queen, Apollo's high command
 Has call'd me to the fam'd Italian land ;
 Thither, inspir'd by oracles, I move,
 There lies my country, and there lies my love.
 If you your rising Carthage thus admire
 In these strange realms, a foreigner from Tyre,
 Why should not Teucer's race be free to gain
 The Latian kingdom, as the gods ordain ?
 Oft as the stars display their fiery light,
 And earth lies cover'd in the shades of night,
 My father's angry spirit blames my stay,
 Stalks round my bed, and summons me away.
 Long has Afcanius call'd me hence in vain,
 By me defrauded of his destin'd reign.
 And now, ev'n now, the messenger of Jove
 (Both gods can witness) shot from heav'n above :
 Charg'd with the thunderer's high commands he
 The glorious form appear'd in open view : [flew,
 I saw him pass these lofty walls, and hear
 His awful voice still murmuring in my ear.
 Then cease, my beautiful princefs, to complain ;
 Nor let us both be discompos'd in vain :
 From these dear arms to Latium forc'd away ;
 'Tis fate that calls, and fate I must obey.
 Thus while he spoke, with high disdain and pride
 She roll'd her wrathful eyes on every side,
 That glance in silence o'er the guilty man,
 And, all inflam'd with fury, she began :
 Perfidious monster ! boast thy birth no more ;
 No hero got thee, and no goddess bore.
 No !--thou wert brought by Scythian rocks
 By tigers nurs'd, and savages of prey ; [to day,
 But far more rugged, wild, and fierce than they. }
 For why, ah ! why the traitor should I spare ?
 What baser wrongs can I be doom'd to bear ?
 Did he once deign to turn his scornful eyes ?
 Did he once groan at all my piercing sighs ?
 Dropp'd he one tear in pity to my cries ?
 Calm he look'd on, and saw my passion burst.
 Which, which of all his insults was the worst ?
 And yet great Jove and Juno from the sky
 Behold his treason with a careless eye ;
 Guilt, guilt prevails ; and justice is no more.
 The needy wretch just cast upon my shore,
 Fool as I was ! with open arms I led
 At once a partner to my throne and bed ;
 From infant death I sav'd his famish'd train,
 His shatter'd fleet I stor'd and rigg'd again.
 But ah I rave ;--my soul the Furies fire ;
 Now great Apollo warns him to retire ;
 With all his oracles forbids to stay ;
 And now through air with haste the son of May Conveys Jove's orders from the blest abodes ;
 A care well worthy to disturb the gods !
 Go then ; I plead not, nor thy slight delay ;
 Go, seek new kingdoms through the wat'ry way :
 But there may every god, thy crime provokes,
 Reward thy guilt, and dash thee on the rocks ;
 Then shalt thou call, amid the howling main,
 On injur'd Dido's name, nor call in vain ;

For, wrapt in fires, I'll follow through the sky,
 Flash in thy face, or glare tremendous by.
 When death's cold hand my struggling soul shall
 free,

My ghost in every place shall wait on thee :
 My vengeful spirit shall thy torments know,
 And smile with transport in the realms below.
 With that, abrupt she took her sudden flight ;
 Sick of the day, she loathes the golden light ;
 And turns, while fault'ring he attempts to say
 Ten thousand things, disdainfully away ;
 Sunken in their arms the trembling handmaids led
 The fainting princefs to the regal bed.

But though the pious hero tries with care,
 And melting words, to sooth her fierce despair,
 Stung with the pains and agonies of love,
 Still he regards the high commands of Jove ;
 Repairs the fleet ; and soon the busy train
 Roll down the lofty vessels to the main.
 New-rigg'd, the navy glides along the flood ;
 Whole trees they bring, unfinish'd from the wood,
 And leafy saplings to supply their oars,
 Pour from the town, and darken all the shores.
 So when the pismires, an industrious train,
 Embod'y'd, rob some golden heap of grain,
 Studious, ere stormy winter frowns, to lay
 Safe in their darksome cells the treasure'd prey ;
 In one long track the dusky legions lead
 Their prize in triumph through the verdant mead :
 Here, bending with the load, a panting throng
 With force conjoin'd heave some huge grain along :

Some last the stragglers to the task assign'd,
 Some, to their ranks, the bands that lag behind :
 They crowd the peopled path in thick array,
 Glow at the work, and darken all the way.
 At that sad prospect, that tormenting scene,
 What thoughts, what woes were thine, unhappy queen !

How loud thy groans, when from thy lofty tow'r
 Thy eyes survey'd the tumult on the shore ;
 When on the floods thou hear'dst the shouting train
 Plough with resounding oars the wat'ry plain ?
 To what submissions, of what low degree,
 Are mortals urg'd, imperious love, by thee ?
 Once more she lies to pray'rs and tears, to move
 Th' obdurate prince ; and anger melts to love ;
 Tries all her suppliant female arts again
 Before her death ;--but tries 'em all in vain :

Sister, behold, from every side they pour
 With eager speed, and gather to the shore.
 Hark!--how with shouts they catch the springing gales, [sails-

And crown their ships, and spread their flying
 Ah ! had I once foreseen the fatal blow,
 Sure, I had borne this mighty weight of woe.
 Yet, yet, my Anna, this one trial make
 For thy despairing, dying sister's sake.
 For ah ! the dear perfidious wretch, I see ;
 Lays open all his secret-soul to thee.
 In all his thoughts you ever bore a part ;
 You know the nearest passage to his heart.
 Go then, dear sister, as a suppliant go,
 Tell, in the humblest terms, my haughty foe,
 I ne'er conspir'd at Aulis to destroy,
 With vengeful Greece, the hapless race of Troy ;
 Nor sent one vessel to the Phrygian coast,
 Nor rais'd abroad his father's sacred dust.

From all the pray'rs a dying queen prefers,
 Why will he turn his unrelenting ears?
 Whither, ah whither, will the tyrant fly?
 Beg but this one grace before I die,
 To wait for calmer seas and softer gales
 To smoothe the floods, and fill his opening sails.
 Tell my perfidious lover, I implore
 The name of wedlock he disclaims no more:
 No more his purpos'd voyage I detain
 From beauteous Latium, and his destin'd reign.
 For some small interval of time I move,
 Some short, short season to subdue my love;
 Till reconcil'd to this unhappy state,
 I grow at last familiar with my fate:
 This favour if he grant, my death shall please
 His cruel soul, and set us both at ease.

Thus pray'd the queen; the sister bears in vain

The moving message, and returns again.
 He stands inflexible to pray'rs and tears,
 For Jove and Fate had stopp'd the hero's ears.

As o'er th' aerial Alps sublimely spread,
 Some aged oak uprears his reverend head;
 This way and that the furious tempests blow,
 To lay the monarch of the mountains low;
 Th' imperial plant, though nodding at the found,
 Though all his scatter'd honours strow the ground,
 Safe in his strength, and seated on the rock,
 In naked majesty defies the shock:

High as the head shoots tow'ring to the skies,
 So deep the root in hell's foundation lies.
 Thus is the prince besieg'd by constant pray'rs:
 But though his heart relents at Dido's cares,
 Still firm the dictates of his soul remain,
 And tears are shed, and vows preferr'd in vain.

Now tir'd with life abandon'd Dido grows;
 Now bent on fate, and harass'd with her woes,
 She loathes the day, she sickens at the sky,
 And longs, in bitterness of soul, to die.
 To urge the scheme of death already laid,
 Full many a direful omen she survey'd:
 While to the gods she pour'd the wine, she view'd
 The pure libation turn'd to sable blood.
 This horrid omen to herself reveal'd,
 Ev'n from her sister's ears she kept conceal'd;
 Yet more---a temple, where she paid her vows,
 Rose in the palace to her former spouse;
 A marble structure; this she dress'd around
 With snowy wool; with sacred chaplets crown'd.
 From hence, when gloomy night succeeds the day,
 Her husband seems to summon her away.
 Perch'd in the roof the bird of night complains,
 In one sad length of melancholy strains;
 Now dire predictions rack her mind, foretold
 By prescient fages, and the seers of old;
 Now stern Æneas, her eternal theme,
 Haunts her distracted soul in ev'ry dream;
 In slumber now she seems to travel on,
 Through dreary wilds, abandon'd and alone;
 And treads a dark uncomfortable plain,
 And seeks her Tyrians o'er the waste in vain.
 So Pentheus rav'd, when, flaming to his eyes,
 He saw the Furies from the deeps arise;
 And view'd a double Thebes with wild amaze,
 And two bright suns with rival glories blaze.
 Wounds the mad Orestes o'er the stage,
 Whose looks distracted, from his mother's rage;

Arm'd with her scourge of snakes she drives him on,
 And, wrapt in flames, pursues her murdering son;
 He flies, but flies in vain;---the Furies wait,
 And fiends in forms tremendous guard the gate.

At length distracted, and by love o'ercome,
 Resolv'd on death, she meditates her doom;
 Appoints the time to end her mighty woe,
 And takes due measures for the purpos'd blow.
 Then her sad sister she with smiles address'd,
 Hope in her looks, but anguish at her breast:
 Anna, partake my joy, for lo! I find
 The sole expedient that can cure my mind,
 Relieve my soul for ever from her pain,
 Or bring my lover to my arms again.

Near Ocean's utmost bound, a region lies,
 Where mighty Atlas props the starry skies;
 There lives a priestess of Massilian strain,
 The guardian of the rich Hesperian fane;
 Who wont the wakeful dragon once to feed
 With honey'd cakes, and poppy's drowsy seed,
 That round the tree his shining volumes roll'd
 To guard the sacred balls of blooming gold.
 By magic charms the matron can remove,
 Or fiercely kindle all the fires of love;
 Roll back the stars; stop rivers as they flow;
 And call grim spectres from the realms of woe.
 Trees leave their mountains at her potent call;
 Beneath her footsteps groans the trembling ball:
 But witness thou, and all ye gods on high,
 With what regret to magic rites I fly.

Go then, erect with speed and secret care,
 Within the court, a pile in open air.
 Bring all the traitor's arms and robes, and spread
 Above the heap our fatal bridal bed.
 The sacred dame commands me to destroy
 All, all memorials of that wretch from Troy.

Thus with dissembling arts the prince's spoke:
 A deadly paleness spreads o'er all her look.
 Nor could her wretched sister once divine
 These rites could cover such a dire design,
 Nor deem'd a lover treacherous to his vows
 Should more afflict her than her murder'd spouse;
 But rears a pile of oaks and firs on high,
 Within the court, beneath the naked sky [round;
 With wreaths the queen adorn'd the structure
 And with funereal greens and garlands crown'd
 Next big with death, the sword and robe she
 spread,

And plac'd the dear, dear image on the bed.
 Amidst her altars, with dishevell'd hairs,
 Her horrid rites the priestess now prepares.
 Thund'ring the calls, in many a dreadful sound,
 On Chaos hoar, and Erebus profound;
 On hideous Hecate, from hell's abodes,
 (The threefold Dian!) and a hundred gods.
 The place she sprinkled, where her altars stood,
 With streams dissembled from Æverus' flood,
 And black envenom'd herbs she brings, reap'd down
 With brazen sickles, by the glimmering moon.
 Then crops the potent knots of love with care,
 That from the young efrange the parent mare.
 Now with a sacred cake and lifted hands,
 All bent on death, before her altar stands
 The royal victim, the devoted fair;
 Her robes were gathered, and one foot was bare.
 She calls on every star in solemn state,
 Whose guilty beams shine conscious of her fate:

She calls to witness every god above,
To pay due vengeance for her injur'd love.
'Twas night; and, weary with the toils of day,
In soft repose the whole creation lay.
The murmurs of the groves and furies die,
The stars roll solemn through the glowing sky;
Wide o'er the fields a brooding silence reigns,
The flocks lie stretch'd along the flow'ry plains;
The furious savages that haunt the woods,
The painted birds, the fishes of the floods;
All, all, beneath the general darkness, share
In sleep, a soft forgetfulness of care;
All but the hapless queen;—for love denies
Rest to her thoughts, and slumber to her eyes.
Her passions grow still fiercer, and by turns
With love she maddens, and with wrath she burns,
The straggling tides in different motions roll,
And thus she vents the tempest of her soul:

What shall I do?—shall I in vain implore
The royal lovers I disdain'd before?
Or, slighted in my turn with haughty pride,
Court the fierce tyrant whom I once deny'd?
Shall I the Trojans base commands obey,
Their slave, their suppliant, through the watry
way?

Yes—for my bounties, and my former aid
By Troy already stand so well repaid!
And yet suppose I were inclin'd to go;
The haughty sailors would but mock my woe.
Hast thou not yet, not yet, Eliza, known
The perjurd sons of proud Laomedon?
What!—shall I follow through the roaring main,
Sole and abandon'd, their triumphant train,
Or drive 'em thro' the deeps with sword and fire,
With all my armies, all the sons of Tyre?
But can I draw to sea those Tyrian bands
I drew reluctant from their native lands?
Die then as thou deserv'st; in death repose;
The sword, the friendly sword, shall end thy woes.
You first, dear sister, by my sorrows mov'd,
Expos'd me rashly to the wretch I lov'd;
Your prompt obedience, and officious care
Fann'd the young flame, and plung'd me in def-
Oh! had I learn'd like savages to rove, [pair
And never known the woes of bridal love!
I prov'd unfaithful to my former spouse,
And now I reap the fruits of broken vows!

Thus vents the mournful queen, by love oppress'd,
The grief that rag'd tumultuous in her breast.
Meantime with all things ready for his flight,
In thoughtless sleep the hero past the night.
To whom again the feather'd Hermes came,
His youthful figure, looks and voice the same,
And thus alarms the slumb'ring prince once more;
What—can'st thou sleep in this important hour?
Nor all thy dangers can'st thou yet survey?
Nor hear the zephyrs call thee to the sea?
Mad as thou art!—determin'd on her doom,
She forms designs of mischiefs yet to come.
Then fly her fury while thou yet can'st fly,
Before Aurora gilds the purple sky:
Fly,—or the floods shall soon be cover'd o'er
With numerous fleets, and armies crowd the shore,
And direful brands with long-projected rays,
Shall set the land and ocean in a blaze.
Ev'n now her dread revenge is on the wing;
Rise, prince; a woman is a changeful thing.

This said, at once he took his rapid flight,
Diffolv'd in air, and mingled with the night.

The hero starts from sleep in wild surprize,
Struck with the glorious vision from the skies,
And rouses all the train: awake, unbind,
And stretch, my friends, the canvas to the win
Seize, seize your oars; the god descends again,
To bid me fly, and launch into the main.
Whoe'er thou art, thou blest celestial guide,
Thy course we follow through the foamy tide;
With joy thy sacred orders we obey;
And may thy friendly stars direct the way.
Sudden, he drew his sword as thus he said,
And cut the haulers with the flaming blade;
With the same ardor fir'd, the shouting train
Fly, seize their oars, and rush into the main.
At once the floods with ships were cover'd o'er,
And not one Trojan left upon the shore;
All stretching to the stroke, with vigour sweep
The whitening furge, and plough the smokin'
deep.

Now o'er the glittering lawns Aurora spread
Her orient beam, and left her golden bed.
Soon as the queen at early dawn beheld
The navy move along the wat'ry field,
In pomp and order, from her lofty tow'r;
And saw th' abandon'd port, and empty shore;
Thrice her fierce hands in madness of despair
Beat her white breast, and tore her golden hair.

Then shall the traitor fly, ye gods! (she said)
And leave my kingdom, and insulted bed?
And shall not Carthage pour in arms away?
Run there, and launch my navies on the sea.
Fly, fly with all your sails, ye sons of Tyre;
Hurl flames on flames; involve his fleet in fire.
What have I said?—ah! impotent and vain!
I rave, I rave—what madneis turns my brain?
Now can you, Dido, at so late a time,
Reflect with horror on your former crime?
Well had this rage been shown, when first you led
The wretch, a partner to your throne and bed.
This is the prince, the pious prince, who bore
His gods and relics from the Phrygian shore!
And safe convey'd his venerable fire
On his own shoulders through the Trojan fire!
Could I not tear, and throw him for a prey,
Base wretch! to every monster of the sea?
Stab all his friends, his darling son destroy,
And to his table serve the murder'd boy?
For bent on death, and valiant from despair,
Say—could I dread the doubtful chance of war?
No—but my flames had redd'n'd all the seas;
Wrapt all the flying navy in the blaze;
Destroy'd the race, the father and the son,
And crown'd the general ruin with my own.
Thou glorious sun! whose piercing eyes survey
These worlds terrestrial in thy fiery way,
And thou, O Juno! bend thy awful head,
Great queen, and guardian of the bridal bed;
Hear thou, Dire Hecate! from hell profound,
Whose rites nocturnal through the streets resound,
Hear all ye furies, fiends, and gods, who wait
To pay due vengeance for Eliza's fate!
If to the destin'd port the wretch must come,
If such be Jove's unalterable doom:
Still let him wander tosd from place to place,
Far from his country, and his son's embrace,

By barbarous nations harass'd with alarms;
 And take the field with unsuccessful arms;
 For foreign aid to distant regions fly,
 See all his friends a common carnage lie;
 And when he gains, his ruin to complete,
 A peace more shameful than his past defeat;
 Nor life nor empire let him long maintain,
 But fall, by murderous hands untimely slain,
 And lie unburied on the naked plain!
 This vow, ye gods, Eliza pours in death,
 With her last blood, and her last gasping breath!
 Oh!--in the silent grave when Dido lies,
 Rise in thy rage, thou great avenger, rise!
 Against curs'd Troy, go mighty son of Tyre,
 Go, in the pomp of famine, sword, and fire!
 And you, my Tyrians, with immortal hate,
 In future times, pursue the Dardan state.
 No peace, no commerce with the race be made:
 Pay this last duty to your prince's shade;
 Fight, when your pow'rs supplies so just a rage;
 Fight now, fight still, in every distant age;
 By land, by sea, in arms the nation dare,
 And wage, from son to son, eternal war!

This said, she bends her various thoughts to close

Her hated life, and finish all her woes.
 Then to her husband's nurse she gave command,
 (Her own lay bury'd in her native land)
 Go, Barce, go, and bid my sister bring
 The sable victims for the Stygian king,
 But first be sprinkled from the limpid spring.
 Thus let her come; and, while I pay my vows,
 Thou too in fillets bind thy aged brows.
 Fain would I kindle now the sacred pyre,
 And see the Trojan image sink in fire,
 Thus I complete the rites to Stygian Jove,
 And then farewell—a long farewell to love!
 She said; the matron, studious to obey,
 With deuteous speed runs trembling all the way.
 Now to the fatal court fierce Dido flies,
 And rolls around her fiery glaring eyes;
 Though pale and shivering at her purpos'd doom,
 And every dreadful thought of death to come:
 Yet many a crimson flush, with various grace,
 Glows on her cheek, and kindles in her face.
 Furious she mounts the pyre, and draws the sword,
 The fatal present of the Dardan lord;
 For no such end bestow'd;—the conscious bed,
 And robes the view'd; and tears in silence shed;
 Stood still, and paus'd a moment,—then the cast
 Her body on the couch, and spoke her last:

Ye dear, dear relics of the man I lov'd!
 While fate consents, and the gods approv'd,
 Relieve my woes, this rage of love control,
 Take my last breath, and catch my parting soul.
 My fatal course is finish'd, and I go
 A ghost majestic to the realms below.
 Well have I liv'd to see a glorious town
 Rais'd by these hands, and bulwarks of my own;
 Of all its trophies robb'd my brother's sword,
 And on the wretch reveng'd my murder'd lord.
 Happy! thrice happy! if the Dardan band
 Had never touch'd upon the Libyan land.
 Then pressing with her lips the Trojan bed,
 Shall I then die, and unreveng'd? (she said)
 Yet die I will,—and thus, and thus, I go—
 Thus—fly with pleasure to the shades below.

This blaze my yon' proud Trojan from the sea,
 This death, an omen of his own, survey.

Meantime, the sad attendants, as she spoke,
 Beheld her strike, and sink beneath the stroke.
 At once her snowy hands were purpl'd o'er,
 And the bright Faulchion smok'd with streaming
 Her sudden fate is blaz'd the city round; [gore.
 The length'ning cries from street to street resound;
 To female shrieks the regal dome replies,
 And the shrill echoes ring amidst the skies;
 As all fair Carthage, or her mother Tyre,
 Storm'd by the foe, had sunk in floods of fire:
 And the fierce flame devour'd the proud abodes,
 With all the glorious temples of the gods.

Her breathless sister runs with eager pace,
 And beats her throbbing breast, and beauteous face.
 Fierce through the parting crowds the virgin flies,
 And on her dying dear Eliza's cries,
 Was this, my Dido, ah! was this the way
 You took, your easy sister to betray?
 Was it for this my hands prepar'd the pyre,
 The fatal altar, and the funeral fire?
 Where shall my plaints begin?—ah! wretch un-
 Now left abandon'd to my woes alone! [done,
 Was I unworthy then, to yield my breath,
 And share thy sweet society in death?
 Me, me you should have call'd, your fate to share
 From the same weapon, and the same despair.
 And did these hands the lofty pile compose?
 Did I invoke our gods with solemn vows?
 Only—ah cruel! to be sent away
 From the sad scene of death I now survey?
 You by this fatal stroke, and I, and all,
 Your senate, people, and your Carthage fall.
 Bring, bring me water; let me bathe in death
 Her bleeding wounds, and catch her parting breath.
 Then up the steep ascent she flew, and prest
 Her dying sister to her heaving breast;
 With cries succeeding cries her robes unbound,
 To stanch the blood that issu'd from the wound.
 Her bosom groaning with convulsive pain,
 She strives to raise her heavy lids in vain,
 And in a moment sinks, and swoons again.
 Prop'd on her elbow, thrice she rear'd her head,
 And thrice fell back, and fainted on the bed;
 Sought with her swimming eyes the golden light,
 And saw the sun, but sicken'd at the sight.

Then mighty Juno, with a melting eye,
 Beheld her dreadful anguish from the sky;
 And bade fair Iris, from the starry pole,
 Fly, and enlarge her agonizing soul:
 For as she dy'd by love before the time,
 Nor fell by fate, nor perish'd for a crime,
 Not yet had Proserpine, with early care,
 Clip'd from her head the fatal golden hair;
 The solemn offering to the pow'rs below,
 To free the spirit, and relieve her woe,
 Swift from the glancing sun the goddess drew
 A thousand mingling colours, as the flew:
 Then radiant hover'd o'er the dying fair;
 And lo! this consecrated lock I bear
 To Stygian Jove: and now, as heav'n ordains,
 Release thy soul from these corporeal chains.
 The goddess stretch'd her hand, as thus she said,
 And clip'd the sacred honours of her head;
 The vital spirit flies, no more confin'd,
 Dissolves in air, and mingles with the wind.

B O O K V.

THE ARGUMENT.

Æneas setting sail from Afric, is driven by a storm on the coast of Sicily, where he is hospitably received by his friend Acestes, king of part of the island, and born of Trojan parentage. He celebrates the memory of his father with divine honours, institutes funeral games, and appoints prizes for those who should conquer in them. While the ceremonies were performing, Juno sends Iris to persuade the Trojan women to burn the ships, who, upon her instigation, set fire to them; which burnt four, and would have consumed the rest, had not Jupiter by a sudden shower extinguished it. Upon this, Æneas, by the advice of one of his generals, and a vision of his father, builds a city, for the women, old men, and others, who were either unfit for war, or weary of the voyage; and sails for Italy. Venus procures of Neptune a safe voyage for him and all his men, excepting only his pilot Palinurus, who was unfortunately lost.

Now with a prosp'rous breeze, Æneas held
His destin'd course, and plough'd the wat'ry field;
Unhappy Dido's funeral flames surveys,
That gild the spires, and round the bulwarks blaze;
But soon the hidden cause the prince divin'd
From the known transports of a female mind;
With such a whirl their fiery passions move,
In the mad rage of disappointed love!

Now o'er the deep the rapid gallees fly,
And the vast round was only wave and sky.
A cloud all charg'd with livid darkness spreads, Black'ning the floods, and gathering o'er their Aloud the careful Palinurus cries; [heads.
Lo! what a dreadful storm involves the skies!
Oh! Neptune, mighty father of the main!
What tempests threaten from thy wat'ry reign?
Then he commands to furl the sails, and sweep
With every bending oar the foamy deep.
Himself, to break the blast, his sails inclin'd,
And fled obliquely with the driving wind.
Oh! mighty prince, the trembling master cry'd,
Scarce could I hope, in such a tossing tide,
To reach Hesperia and surmount the flood,
Though Jove had past the promise of a God.
See! from the west what thwarting winds arise!
How in one cloud are gathered half the skies!
In vain our course we labour to maintain,
And, struggling, work against the storm in vain.
Let us, since fortune mocks our toil, obey,
And speed our voyage, where she points the way.
For not far distant lies the realm, that bore
Your brother Eryx, the Sicilian shore,
If right I judge, whose eyes with constant care
Have watch'd the heav'n's retracing every star.

I see, reply'd the prince, thy fruitless pain,
That long has struggled with the winds in vain.
Then change thy course, the whirling gusts obey,
And steer with open sails a different way.
Oh! to what dearer land can I retreat?
There I may rig again my shatter'd fleet:
That land my father's sacred dust contains,
And there my Trojan friend, Acestes reigns.
This said, they steer their course; the western gales

With friendly breezes stretch their belying sails;
Smooth o'er the tides the flying navy past, [last.
And reach'd with joy the well-known shore at

The king with wonder from a mountain's brow
Beheld the fleet approach the coast below;
Then, with a javelin in his hand, descends,
Clad in a lion's spoils, to meet his friends,
This monarch sprung from great Crinifus' flood;
His Trojan mother mingling with the god.
With due regard he hails the kindred train,
Arriv'd from Carthage at his realms again;
With feasts their fainting spirits he restor'd;
And rural viands crown'd the generous board.

Now the diminish'd stars had fled away
Before the glories of the dawning day.
His friends Æneas summon'd from the coast;
Then from a rising point bespoke the host:
Ye far-fam'd sons of Troy, a race divine,
Whose fathers sprung from Jove's immortal line,
Now the first circle of the year runs round,
Since we dispos'd my fire in foreign ground,
Rais'd verdant altars to the mighty shade,
And paid all funeral honours to the dead:
And now the fatal day is just return'd,
By me (so Heav'n ordains) with rites adorn'd,
For ever honour'd, and for ever mourn'd:
Though banish'd to the burning Libyan land,
Though led a captive to the Argive land,
Though lost and shipwreck'd on the Grecian sea,
Still would I solemnize this sacred day.
Sure all the friendly pow'rs our course inspire,
To the dear relics of my reverend fire.
Haste then, the new-adopted god adore,
And from his grace a prosp'rous gale implore;
Implore a city, where we still may pay,
In his own fane, the honours of the day.
On every ship two oxen are bestow'd
By great Acestes of our Dardan blood;
Call to the feast your native Phrygian pow'rs,
With those the hospitable king adores.
Soon as the ninth fair morning's opening light
Shall glad the world, and chase the shades of night,
Then to my Trojans I propose, to grace
These sacred rites, the rapid naval race;
Then all, who glory in their matchless force,
Or vaunt their fiery swiftness in the course,
Or dart the spear, or bend the twanging bow,
Or to the dreadful gauntlet dare the foe,
Attend; and each by merit bear away
The noble palms, and glories of the day.

Now grace your heads with verdant wreaths, he said;

Then with his mother's myrtle binds his head. Like him, Aætes, and the royal boy, Adorn their brows, with all the youth of Troy.

Now to the tomb surrounded with a throng, A mighty train, the hero pass along.

Two bowls of milk, and sacred blood he pours; Two of pure wine; and scatters purple flow'rs.

Then thus—Hail sacred fire, all hail again, Once more restor'd, but ah! restor'd in vain!

'Twas more than envious fate would give, to see

The destin'd realms of Italy with thee;

Or mighty Tiber's rolling streams explore

The sacred flood, that bathes th' Aulonian shore.

Scarce had he said, when, beautiful to behold!

From the deep tomb, with many a shining fold,

An azure serpent rose, in scales that flam'd with gold:

Like heaven's bright bow his varying beauties shone;

That draws a thousand colours from the sun:

Pleas'd round the altars and the tomb to wind,

His glittering length of volumes trails behind.

The chief in deep amazement suspended hung,

While through the bowels the serpent glides along;

Tastes all the food, then softly slides away,

Seeks the dark tomb, and quits the sacred prey;

Astonish'd at the sight, the hero paid

New rites, new honours to his father's shade,

Doubts if the demon of his fire rever'd,

Or the kind genius of the place appear'd.

Five fable steers he slew with rites divine,

As many snowy sheep, and bristly swine;

And pouring wine, invoc'd his father's shade

Sent from the darksome regions of the dead.

Then all the train, who gather'd round the grave,

Each for his rank, proportion'd treasures gave.

The altars blaze; the victims round expire;

Some hang the massy cauldrons o'er the fire:

Some o'er the grass the glowing embers spread;

Some broil the entrails on the burning bed.

Now bright the ninth expected morning shone;

Now rose the fiery couriers of the sun;

When endless crowds the vast assembly crown'd

From all the wide dispeopled country round.

Some rous'd by great Aætes' mighty name,

Some to behold the Trojan strangers came,

Some to contend, and try the noble game.

In view, amid the spacious circle, lay

The costly gifts, the prizes of the day.

Arms on the ground, and sacred tripods glow,

With wreaths and palms to bind the victor's brow.

Silver and purple vests in heaps are roll'd,

Rich robes, and talents of the purest gold;

And from a mount the sprightly trumpet proclaims

To all the gather'd crowd the glorious games.

Four well-match'd gallees first, by oars impell'd

Drawn from the navy, took the wat'ry field.

In the swift Dolphin mighty Mnestheus came,

Mnestheus, the founder of the Memnian name.

Next Gyas in the vast Chimæra sweeps

(Huge as a town) the hoarse resounding deeps:

Three rows of oars employ the panting train,

To push th' enormous burthen o'er the main.

Sergestus in the Centaur took his place,

The glorious father of the Scyrian race.

In the blue Scylla great Cloanthus rode,

The noble source of our Cluentian blood;

Far in the main a rock advances o'er

'T he level tides, and fronts the foamy shore,

That hid beneath the rolling ocean lies,

When the black storms involve the starry skies,

But in a calm its lofty head displays

To rest the birds who wing the spacious seas.

Here the great hero fix'd an oaken bough,

A mark, that nodded o'er the craggy brow;

To teach the train to steer the backward way,

And fetch a shorter circle round the sea:

Then, rank'd by lot, conspicuous o'er the flood,

The chiefs array'd in gold and purple glow'd.

The youths green poplars round their temples

twine,

And bright with oil their naked bodies shine,

Eager, they grasp their oars, and list'ning wait

the sign.

Thick in their hearts alternate motions play,

Now prest with beating fears they sink away,

Now thro' with rising hopes to win the glorious day.

Soon as the trumpet first shrill signal blew.

All in a moment from the barrier flew:

Turn'd by their labouring oars the furies rise,

And with their shouts the sailors rend the skies,

The foamy tides with equal furrows sweep:

And, opening to the keel, divides the hoary deep.

Not half so swift the fiery couriers pour,

And, as they start, the distant plain devour;

Nor half so fierce the drivers, pois'd in air,

Urge the fleet steeds to whirl the flying car,

Throw up the reins, and, bending o'er the yoke,

Shout, last, and send their souls at every stroke.

The crowds in parties join; and, to the cries

And eager shouts, the hollow wood replies;

While hills to hills repeat the mingled roar,

And the long echo rolls around the winding shore,

With peals of loud applause from every side

First Gyas flew, and shot along the tide.

Cloanthus follows; but his ponderous ship,

Though better mann'd, moves heavier on the deep.

Behind, the Dolphin and the Centaur lay,

At equal distance, on the wat'ry way:

Now darts the rapid Dolphin o'er the main,

Now the vast Centaur wins the day again:

Then, side by side, and front by front, they join,

And plough in frothy tracks the ruffled brine.

And now proud Gyas reach'd th' appointed place,

While the victor of the wat'ry race:

Then to Menætes call'd, and gave command,

To leave the right, and steer against the land;

Let others plough the deep;—in vain he spoke;

The cautious pilot dreads the lurking rock,

And turns his prow, and steers a different road,

And leaves the shallows for the open flood.

Once more in vain the raging Gyas cry'd,

And lo! that moment, brave Cloanthus spy'd close at his back, who plough'd the nearer tide.

The dangerous way the daring hero took

Between bold Gyas and the sounding rock.

Sudden beyond the chief he shoots away,

Clear of the goal, and gains the roamy sea.

Then Gyas wept; and grief and rage inflame

The youth, forgetful of his friends and fame.

From the high stern, with anger and disdain,
 He hurl'd the hoary master in the main ;
 'Then madly took himself the sole command,
 And fir'd his train, and bore upon the land.
 Hoary with age, and struggling long in vain,
 With cumb'rous vests, Menætes mounts again ;
 Trembling he climb'd a lofty rock ; and dry'd
 His limbs, all drench'd and reeking with the tide.
 Loud laugh'd the crowds to see him shoot away,
 Drink and disgorge by turns the briny sea.
 At distance Mneſtheus and Sergeſtus lie ;
 Both hope to paſs the fiery Gyas by.
 The 'vantage firſt the bold Sergeſtus took,
 With rapid ſpeed advancing to the rock ;
 But not a length before : the Dolphin rides
 With rival ſpeed, and bears upon her ſides.
 Brave Mneſtheus now inflames his naval crew,
 As o'er the deck from man to man he flew,
 My brave associates, in whoſe aid I truſt,
 You, whom I choſe, when Iliſon ſunk in duſt,
 Now ſhow the ſtrength and ſpirit once you ſhow'd,
 When raging ſtorms, and Syrtis you withſtood,
 Plough'd Malea's tide, and ſtemm'd th' Iſonian
 flood :
 Now, now, my friends, your utmoſt pow'r diſplay,
 Riſe to your oars, and ſweep the wat'ry way :
 Nor ſtrive we now the victory to gain,
 Tho' yet !—but ah ! let thoſe the palm obtain,
 Thoſe, whom thy favours crown, great monarch of the main !
 But to return the lags of all the day !
 Oh! wipe, my friends, that ſhameful ſtain away !
 Fir'd at the word, each other they provoke ;
 Springs the ſwift ſhip at every vigorous ſtroke.
 With painful ſweat their heaving bodies ſteam ;
 Thick pant their hearts, and trembles every limb.
 All bending to their oars the labour ply ;
 The ſea rolls backward, and the ſurges fly.
 Now, with the wiſh'd ſucceſs they toil to gain,
 Indulgent fortune crowns the lab'ring train ;
 For while the fierce Sergeſtus nearer drew,
 And in a ſcanty ſpace too raſhly flew,
 (His road ſtill narrower) with a mighty ſhock
 He ruſh'd againſt the ſharp projected rock.
 Then flew the ſhatter'd oars, and flying rump,
 And on the rugged ſides the veſſel hung.
 To gain their floating oars, with mingled cries,
 All arm'd with iron poles, the failors riſe.
 Fir'd with ſucceſs, along the open ſea,
 Proud Mneſtheus ſhoots, invoking every breeze,
 As in her neſt, within ſome cavern hang,
 The dove ſits trembling o'er her callow young,
 Till rous'd at laſt by ſome impetuous ſhock,
 She ſtarts ſurpris'd, and beats around the rock ;
 Then to the open field for refuge flies,
 And the free bird expatiates in the ſkies ;
 Her pinions poiſ'd, through liquid air ſhe ſprings,
 And ſmoothly glides, nor moves her levell'd wings:
 So joyful Mneſtheus darts without control
 O'er the wide ocean, and approach'd the goal ;
 So the ſwift Dolphin flies in open view,
 And gain'd new ſtrength, new ſwiftness as ſhe flew.
 Firſt by Sergeſtus' ſhip he ſhoots along,
 That in the ſhelves and dang'rous ſhallows hung ;
 With cries the chief his rival's aid implores,
 And ſtrives in vain to row with ſhatter'd oars.

Next fiery Gyas he with ſhouts purſu'd,
 Who in the huge Chimæra ſtemm'd the flood ;
 She yields, depriv'd of her experienc'd guide ;
 And ſees her rival fly triumphant o'er the tide.
 Now, near the port, with all his pow'r he ſtrains
 To paſs Cloanthus, who the laſt remains.
 The doubling ſhouts inſpire him as he flies
 And the long peal runs rattling round the ſkies :
 Theſe, fuſſ'd with pride, would caſt their lives
 away,
 Ere they reſign the glories of the day :
 Thoſe, by ſucceſs, in ſtrength and ſpirit riſe,
 And their fierce hopes already win the prize.
 Thus haply both with level beaks had ply'd
 The ſurge, and rode the victors of the tide ;
 But brave Cloanthus o'er the rolling floods Stretch'd wide his hands, and thus invoc'd the gods :
 Ye pow'rs ! on whoſe wild empire I diſplay
 My flying ſails, and plough the wat'ry way ;
 Oh, hear your ſuppliant, and my vow ſucceed ;
 Then on theſe ſhores a milk-white bull ſhall bleed ;
 And purple wine your ſilver waves ſhall ſtain,
 And ſacred victims glut the greedy main.
 Thus he—and every Nereid heard the vow,
 With mighty Phorcus from the deeps below.
 And great Portunus, with his ample hand,
 Puſh'd on the rapid galley to the land.
 Swift as the hiſſing javelin cuts the ſkies,
 Swift as a whirlwind, to the port ſhe flies.
 And now the herald's voice proclaims aloud
 Cloanthus victor, to the ſhoutiug crowd.
 The mighty prince himſelf, with verdant boughs
 Of vivid laurel, binds the hero's brows.
 Three ſteers, and one large talent are beſtow'd
 On every rival crew, that plough'd the flood.
 But to the glorious leaders, bold and brave,
 The generous chief diſtinguiſh'd honours gave.
 A robe the victor ſhar'd, where purple plays,
 Mixt with rich gold, in every ſhining maze.
 There royal Ganymede, envelop'd with art,
 O'er hills and forests hunts the bounding hart ;
 The beauteous youth, all wondrous to behold !
 Pants in the moving threads, and lives in gold :
 From tow'ring Ida ſhoots the bird of Jove,
 And bears him ſtruggling through the clouds above ;
 With out-ſtretch'd hands his hoary guardians cry,
 And the loud hounds ſpring furious at the ſky.
 On Mneſtheus next, the chief who bore away
 The ſecond glorious honours of the day,
 A ſhining mail the generous prince beſtows,
 That, rich with claps of gold, refulgent glows,
 Who ſtrip Demoleus of the coaſtly load
 In Trojan fields, by Simois' mighty flood :
 Two labouring ſervants, with united toil
 And ſtrength conjoin'd, ſcarce heav'd th' enormous ſpoil :
 Yet in theſe arms of old, with matchleſs might,
 The ſwift Demoleus chas'd his foes in fight.
 This mail, Æneas gave the chief to bear,
 A ſure defence and ornament in war.
 The next rich preſents mighty Gyas grace,
 Two ponderous cauldrons of refulgent braſs ;
 Two ſilver goblets, wrought with art divine,
 That rough, and bright with ſculptur'd figures
 ſhine.

round of their gifts the lofty leaders tread,
and purple filets glitter on their head.
When, from the rock scarce disengag'd with pain,
ergestus brings his shatter'd ship again.
One side all maim'd, the slowly moves along,
poil'd of her oars amid the hooting throng;
As when a ling'ring fate the serpent feels,
obliquely crush'd beneath the brazen wheels,
Or, bruis'd and mangled by the cruel swain
With some huge stone, writhes with the shooting pain,

and rolls and twists her scaly folds in vain.
Above, all fierce her glittering volumes rise, flames in her crest, and lightning in her eyes;
but maim'd below, and tardy with the wound,
her train unfolded drags along the ground.
O maim'd and slow the shatter'd galley past,
but aided by her sails she reach'd the port at last.
Reas'd with the vessel and the crew restor'd,
the generous prince rewards their hapless lord.
The promis'd present to the chief he gave;
holoc, the beauteous female Cretan slave,
in works of art superior to the rest,
and proud of two fair infants at the breast.

This contest o'er; with thousands in his train,
lov'd the great hero to a spacious plain.
High hills the verdant theatre surround;
and waving woods the mighty circuit crown'd.
Fisher, with all the crowds the prince withdrew,
and took his sylvan throne in open view.
Here costly gifts the chiefs propos'd, to grace
the sprightly youths that urge the rapid race.
Now through the Trojan and Sicilian band;
and first Euryalus and Nisus stand;
that, for his youthful charms admir'd by Troy;
This, for chaste friendship to the beauteous boy.
Next to the contest, warm with hopes of fame,
Of Priam's royal race, Dioreas came,
alms and Patron then in order past;
piras one, and one Arcadia grac'd.

Brave Helymus and Panopes succeed;
Two valiant youths in fair Trinacria bred;
Who with Acestes drove the savage race
From wood to wood, long practis'd to the chase.
And mighty numbers more; unknown to fame,
Advance in crowds to share the glorious game.

High in the midst Æneas rear'd his head,
And oh! attend, ye generous youths (he said);
Of all who try the fortune of the day,
Not one shall go without a gift away.
With two bright Cretan lances, each shall share
An ax with silver grav'd, to shine in war.
Distinguish'd gifts and olive wreaths shall grace
The three triumphant victors of the race.

On the first youth a courser I bestow,
Whose trappings rich with gold and purple glow;
The next a quiver charg'd with shafts shall claim,
Such as adorns an Amazonian dame;
Clasp'd by a gem, resplendent to behold,
Shines the bright trophy with a belt of gold.
On the proud youth this gift shall be conferr'd:
And this fair Argive helm shall grace the third.

This said, they took their place; the trumpet blew;

And all impetuous from the barrier flew:
Fierce as a tempest, o'er the plain they past
From the first space, and gain upon the last.

First Nisus sprung, and left the crowd behind,
Swift as the lightning, or the wings of wind.
Next, but the next with many a length between,
Young Salius skimm'd along the level green.
Euryalus, the third, scarce touch'd the plain;
Behind, bold Helymus his rival ran;
But, hovering o'er him, runs Dioreas nigh;
Now side by side, and foot by foot they fly.
The youth had conquer'd in a longer way,
Or undecided left the honours of the day.

And now they just approach'd with rapid pace,
Fir'd with the toil, the limit of the race,
When Nisus fell amid the slippery plain,
Drench with the copious blood of victims slain:
His feet no more the shouting victor held;
Aloft they fly, and quiver on the field.
Headlong he fell, with mud all cover'd o'er,
And every limb was stain'd with sacred gore.
Yet, as he welters on the ground, he strove
To show Euryalus his ardent love.

For now, ev'n now, the youth his body threw
Before his rival Salius, as he flew:
He fell, and on the ground extended lay;
Thus favour'd by his friend, sprung swift away
The young Euryalus, and won the day.

At once beyond the goal the victor flies;
Shouts of applause tumultuous rend the skies.
Next Helymus, and next Dioreas came
With eager ardour, now the third in fame.
Now Salius fills the ring with clam'rous cries,
By turns to every hoary judge applies,
Storms at the fraud, and claims the rightful prize.

But favour, winning tears, and youthful grace,
Plead for the boy, the victor of the race.
Dioreas too, before the partial crowd,
Defends the young Euryalus aloud;
Who now must urge his claim, should Salius gain
The first proud honours, to the third in vain.

Thus then the prince—In order shall we pay
To each brave youth the prizes of the day:
Since these are shar'd, permit me to extend
One proof of pity to a hapless friend:
This said, on Salius generous be bestow'd
A lion's yellow spoils (a costly load!)
With martial pride his shoulders to infold;
Rough was the dreadful mane, the paws were sheath'd in gold.

When Nisus thus,—If such high presents grace
Salius who fell, first vanquish'd in the race,
What gift shall I receive, who bore away,
And still had held the honours of the day,
Had not that fortune, which my foe o'erthrew,
Besall'n unhappy Nisus, as he flew?
Then show'd his robes and face with blood defil'd:
Th' indulgent father of the people smil'd,
And caus'd a mighty buckler to be brought,
With art divine by Didymaon wrought;
Great Neptune's gates the prize adorn'd in Troy,
Now the bright present loads the favour'd boy.

These gifts bestow'd; the hero cries aloud,
Stand forth, ye valiant champions, from the crowd;

Who vaunt your courage and unrivall'd might,
And with the gauntlet dare provoke the fight.
Then he propos'd, in gold and garments gay,
A bull, to grace the victor of the day.

Next, to relieve the loser's shame and pain,
 Cast a rich sword and helmet on the plain.
 Strait with a shout, supremely tall and strong,
 Bold Dares rear'd his bulk above the throng ;
 The youth, the only youth, who dar'd withstand
 The fierce tempestuous sway of Paris' hand,
 Who on huge Butes prov'd his matchless might
 At Hector's tomb, victorious in the fight ;
 (Butes, of Amycus' Bebrycian strain),
 And stretch'd th' enormous giant on the plain.
 Thus, glorying in his strength, in open view
 His arms around, the tow'ring Dares threw,
 Stalk'd high, and laid his brawny shoulders bare,
 And dealt his whistling blows in empty air.
 His match was fought ; through all a terror ran ;
 All gaz'd and trembled at the mighty man.
 Despair, he thought, had seiz'd the circling bands ;
 And now before the prince the champion stands ;
 Fierce by the horns the beauteous bull he took,
 And in proud triumph to the hero spoke :
 Since none, oh ! chief, accepts the proffer'd fray,
 Why for his coward foe must Dares stay ?
 Permit me, prince, to lead my rightful prize
 away.

The Trojans clamour with applauding cries,
 And for the youth demand the promis'd prize.
 Then to Entellus old Acestes said,
 Who fate beside him on the flow'ry bed ;
 Entellus !---once the bravest on the plain,
 But ah ! the bravest, and the best in vain !
 With such tame patience can my friend survey
 This prize, without a contest, borne away ?
 Where, where is now great Eryx' vaunted name ;
 The god, who taught our thund'ring arms the game, [former fame :

The spoils that grace thy roof, and all thy
 I am not dead, replies the chief, to praise,
 Nor yield to fear, but sink by length of days.
 My nerves unstrung, my strength no more remains,
 And age creeps shiv'ring through my icy veins.
 Had I that vigour still, my youth could boast,
 Or you' vain champion vaunts to all the host,
 Soon should this arm that insolence chastise,
 For same alone, without the proffer'd prize.
 Ev'n now I scorn the combat to decline ;
 The prize I heed not ; let the same be mine !

This said ; amid the ring, in open view,
 Two mighty gauntlets on the ground he threw :
 These grac'd great Eryx in the fight of old,
 And brac'd his arms with many a dreadful fold :
 Seven thick bull-hides, their volumes huge dif-
 Pond'rous with iron and a weight of lead. {spread,
 The host stood all astonish'd at the sight,
 But Dares most, who now refus'd the fight :
 The hero turns the folds, in wonder stands,
 And pois'd th' enormous gauntlets in his hands.
 How had you wonder'd, the bold champion said,
 Had you the huge Herculean arms survey'd ?
 Had you those pond'rous gloves of death beheld,
 And the stern combat, on this fatal field ?
 These, prince, of old your brother Eryx wore,
 Lo ! you behold 'em still distain'd with gore.
 With these Alcides' force he long sustain'd,
 And there I brandish'd, while my strength re-main'd,

Ere the cold hand of envious age had shed
 These marks of winter on my hoary head.

Yet, if your champion trembles at the sight,
 Nor dares to meet these gauntlets in the fight ;
 If so Æneas and the king incline ;
 Lo ! to his fears these weapons I resign :
 With equal arms the combat we will try ;
 And thou, lay thou, thy Trojan gauntlets by.
 This said, the hero strait his robe unbound,
 And cast the double garment on the ground ;
 Bares his huge brawny limbs, and on the sands,
 Dreadful to view, the hoary champion stands.
 Then the great prince with equal gauntlets bound
 Their vigorous hands, and brac'd their arms a-
 round :

Their arms, that moment, each impetuous foe
 Rear'd high in air, and rose to every blow ;
 And, while their raging hands the fight provoke,
 Withdraw their heads from each tempestuous stroke.

This on his youth and active speed relies,
 That on his bulk and tall gigantic size :
 But each vast limb moves stiff and slow with age
 And thick short pantings shake the lab'ring sage
 Each, but in vain, a thousand strokes bestows ;
 Their sides and breasts re-echo to the blows.
 With swift repeated wounds their hands fly round
 Their heads and checks ; their crackling jaws re-
 found ;

Unmov'd Entellus, with a stedfast look
 And watchful eye, avoids the furious stroke.
 The youth invests his foe with all his pow'r,
 As some brave leader a beleagu'rd tow'r,
 When on the bulwarks in his rage he falls,
 And plants his engines round th' embattled walls
 On every side with fruitless skill and pain,
 Eager he tries a pass or post to gain,
 And storms the rocky battlements in vain.
 And now his aim the bold Entellus took,
 With his huge hand, high brandish'd for the
 stroke ;

The youth observ'd the long-descending blow,
 And leaps aside, and disappoints the foe :
 The stroke was spent in air ; with dreadful sound
 Prone fell the champion thund'ring to the ground
 A pine thus tumbles to the vales below,
 From Ida's top, or Erymanthus' brow.
 At once the Trojans and Sicilians rise,
 And with divided clamours rend the skies.
 And first Acestes, touch'd with pity, ran
 To raise his friend and old compeer again.
 Swift from the fall, and with redoubled might Sprung the fierce hero, and renew'd the fight ;
 Improv'd in spirit, to the combat came,
 While conscious valour sets his soul on flame,
 Stung with disgrace, and more enrag'd with
 shame.

Now headlong o'er the field he drove the foe,
 And rose in strength and wrath at every blow.
 Now a thick storm of strokes around him flies,
 Thick as the hail comes rattling from the skies ;
 With both his thund'ring hands the blows he ply'd
 And turn'd his giddy foe on every side,
 Then flew the good Æneas, to avenge
 The hero's wrath, and check the mighty rage :
 From death he snatch'd the champion, and bega
 To soothe the sorrows of the vanquish'd man :

What madness, hapless Dares, has possess'd
 Thy thoughtless mind, and fir'd thy daring breast

Thy rival see, sustain'd by pow'r divine,
By other strength, and mightier force than thine!
Cease then, and give the vain contention o'er;
Cease, and oppole the hand of heav'n no more!

The youth now drags his trembling legs along;
His loose head tott'ring o'er his shoulders hung,
Giddy with pain; he now ejects the blood,
His loosen'd teeth come mingled in the flood:
While in their arms his sad associates bore
The batter'd champion groaning to the shore,
The dear-bought sword and helmet brought
away,

And left the palm and bull the victor's prey.

Now great Entellus, glorying in the prize,
And flush'd with conquest, thus, exulting cries;
Behold, ye Trojans, and thou, chief divine,
What vigour, in the bloom of youth, was mine;
From what a thund'ring arm and fatal blow,
Your timely mercy has preserv'd my foe.
With that the chief, collected in his might,
Confronts the victim, the reward of fight;
Then rais'd his hand aloft, and from above,
With dreadful sway, the pond'rous gauntlet drove Through the broad forehead of the stately bull,
And dash'd within the brain the batter'd skull.
The bull, convulsive with the deadly wound,
Groans, tumbles, rolls, and quivers on the
ground.

Then, thus the hoary chief performs his vow,
Eryx, on thee this victim I bestow;
A nobler victim than my Trojan foe!
To younger champions now the game I yield;
Here hang my conquering arms; and here renounce the field.

Next the great prince propos'd the prize to those, [bows.

Who wing'd the shafts, and bent the twanging
Amid the ipsgious plain the hero plac'd
Sublime in air Sergestus' lofty mast;
Around the tapering top a dove they tie,
The trembling mark at which their arrows fly;
Hither to try their skill the warriors haste;
And in a brazen helm the lots are cast.
First, with applause, Hippocoon's lot was thrown,
The mighty Hyrtacus' illustrious son.
Mnestheus the next, whom verdant olives grace,
The second victor in the naval race.
Then the third chance to great Eurytion came,
Thy brother, Pandarus, renown'd by fame,
Whose hand by Pallas prompted, drew the bow,
To break the truce against the Grecian foe.
Last in the helm remain'd Acestes' name;
Old as he was, he try'd the youthful game.
Then every chief, with all his strength and art,
Bent the tough bow, and chose the feather'd dart.
Through yielding air first vanish'd with a spring
Hippocoon's arrow from the founding string;
Fall in the mast, impell'd with vigour stood
The forceful shaft, and quiver'd in the wood.
The dove affrighted, stretch'd her flutt'ring wing;
And with applause the vales and mountains ring.
Then Mnestheus drew the bow, and aim'd on high
The pointed dart, and level'd with his eye;
Nor through the mark the luckleis arrow drove,
But cut the string that ty'd the trembling dove.
Swift through the clouds the bird unshackled flies,
And spreads her wings at freedom in the skies.

Already had Eurytion bent his bow,
And to his brother god address'd his vow:
The tow'ring bird amid the clouds he flew,
And the swift shaft transfix'd her as she flew.
High in the skies she feels the deadly wound,
And, with the dart, comes dying to the ground.
And now, all hopes expir'd, the conquest gain'd,
The venerable prince alone remain'd.
Yet he discharg'd the flying shaft, to show
His skill, his vigour, and rebounding bow.
When sudden they beheld, with wond'ring eyes,
A dire portentous omen in the skies.

Too late the fcers the frightful sign explain,
Too late they clear the dread event in vain!
For, flying through the clouds in open view,
The glowing arrow kindled as it flew;
Then drew a golden trail of flames behind,
That mark'd its course, and vanish'd in the wind:
So shine the falling stars with dreadful hair,
And glance, and shoot along the fields of air.
Amaz'd the Trojans and Sicilians stood;
And breath'd their ardent prayers to every god.
The Dardan prince the doubtful sign mistook,
Embrac'd the monarch, and with transport spoke:
Father! accept the prize; the will divine
Of mighty Jove, by this auspicious sign,
Declares the first distinguish'd honours thine. }
Accept this goblet, which my fire of old
Receiv'd from Cisseus, rough with sculptur'd gold;
Take it, my royal friend, and let it prove
A long-priz'd gift of dear respect and love.
Then he bestow'd the laurel, and aloud
Proclaim'd him victor to the shouting crowd.
Nor did the generous chief the prize deny,
Whose arrow pierc'd the bird amid the sky;
Next, he who cut the cord, with gifts was grac'd;
And he, whose arrow struck the tree, the last.

Now call'd the prince, before the games were done,

The hoary guardian of his royal son,
And gently whispers in his faithful ear,
To bid Ascanius in his arms appear,
And with his youthful band and courser come,
To pay due honours at his grandfire's tomb.
Next he commands the huge assembled train
To quit the ground, and leave an open plain.
Strait on their bridled steeds, with grace divine,
The beauteous youths before their fathers shine;
The blooming Trojans and Sicilians throng,
And gaze with wonder as they march along.
Around their brows a vivid wreath they wore;
Two glittering lances tipt with steel they bore:
These a light quiver stor'd with shafts sustain,
And from their neck depends a golden chain.
On bounding steeds advance three graceful bands,
And each a little blooming chief commands.
Beneath each chief twelve sprightly striplings
came,

In shining arms, in looks and age the same.
Grac'd with his grandfire's name, Polites' son,
Young Priam, leads the first gay Squadron on;
A youth, whose progeny must Latium grace:
He pres'd a dappled steed of Thracian race:
Before, white spots on either foot appear,
And on his forehead blaz'd a silver star.
Atys the next advanc'd, with looks divine,
Atys the source of the great Attian line;

Iulus' friendship grac'd the lovely boy :
 And last Iulus came, the pride of Troy,
 In charms superior to the blooming train ;
 And spurr'd his Tyrian courser to the plain ;
 Which Dido gave the princely youth, to prove
 A lasting pledge, memorial of her love.
 Th' inferior boys on beauteous couriers ride,
 From great Aecetes' royal stalls supply'd. [fear,
 Now flush'd with hopes, now pale with anxious
 Before the shouting crowds, the youths appear ;
 The shouting crowds admire their charms, and
 Their parents lines in every lovely face, [trace
 Now round the ring, before their fathers, ride
 The boys, in all their military pride.
 'Til Periphantes' sounding lash from far
 Gave the loud signal of the mimic war ;
 Strait, in three bands distinct, they break away,
 Divide in order, and their ranks display :
 Swift at the summons they return, and throw
 At once their hostile lances at the foe :
 Then take a new excursion on the plain ;
 Round within round, in endless course maintain ; }
 And now advance, and now retreat again ;
 With well-dissembled rage their rivals dare,
 And please the crowd with images of war.
 Alternate now they turn their backs in flight,
 Now dart their lances, and renew the fight :
 Then in a moment from the combat cease,
 Rejoin their scatter'd bands, and move in peace.
 So winds delusive, in a thousand ways
 Perplex and intricate, the Cretan maze ;
 Round within round, the blind meanders run,
 Untrac'd and dark, and end where they begun.
 The skilful youths, in sport, alternate ply
 Their shifting course ; by turns they fight and fly :
 As dolphins gambol on the wat'ry way, [play.
 And, bounding o'er the tides, in wanton circles
 This sport Afcanian, when in mighty length
 He rais'd proud Alba glorying in her strength,
 Taught the first fathers of the Latian name,
 As now he solemniz'd the noble game.
 From their successive Alban offspring come
 These ancient plays, to grace imperial Rome ;
 Who owns her Trojan band, and game of Troy
 Deriv'd through ages from the princely boy.
 Thus were the solemn funeral honours paid
 To great Anchises' venerable shade.
 But soon the prince his changing fortune found,
 And in her turn the sickle goddess frown'd.
 For, while the gather'd crowds the games repeat,
 Heav'n's mighty empress, to the Trojan fleet,
 (Her ancient rage still glowing in her soul)
 Dispatch'd fair Iris from the starry pole.
 Big with revengeful schemes, herself supplies
 The rapid storm that bears her down the skies,
 Unseen, the maid a thousand colours drew,
 As down her bow, with winged speed, she flew :
 And saw around the tomb th' assembly meet,
 The vacant harbour, and neglected fleet.
 Meantime, retir'd within the lonely shore,
 Anchises' fate the Trojan dames deplore ;
 Cast a long look o'er all the flood, and weep
 To see the wide-extended wat'ry deep :
 Yet, must we yet, alas ! new labours try,
 More seas, more oceans ? was the general cry.
 Oh ! grant a town at last, ye gracious gods !
 To wretches harass'd with the winds and floods.

'Twas then, their raging sorrow to improve,
 Amid the train shot Iris from above.
 Aside her heav'nly charms the goddess threw,
 And like old Beroë stood in open view ;
 (Doryclus' hoary spouse, a noble dame,
 Fam'd for her offspring, and illustrious name) ;
 And thus the goddess fans the rising flame :
 Ah ! wretched race, whom heav'n torbade to fly
 By Grecian iwords, beneath our native wall !
 Toft round the seas, o'er every region cast,
 Oh ! to what fate are we relier'd at last !
 Now, since imperial Troy in ashes lay,
 Have sev'n successive summers roll'd away,
 Still to new lands o'er floods and rocks we fly,
 And sail, by every star, in every sky.
 So long we chase, o'er all the boundless main,
 The flying coasts of Italy in vain.
 Here o'er our kindred Eryx' fruitful plains,
 The hospitable king, Aecetes reigns :
 What, what forbids our wand'ring Trojan bands
 To raise a city in these friendly lands ?
 Ye gods preserv'd from hostile flames in vain !
 Shall our dear Ilium never rise again ?
 A second Simois shall we view no more,
 Or a new Xanthus, on a foreign shore ?
 Rise then, rise all ; assist, ye mournful dames,
 To set this execrable fleet in flames.
 For late, Cassandra seem'd to load my hands,
 In visions of the night, with blazing brands :
 Seek Troy no more, she said : this destin'd place
 Is the fixt mansion of the Dardan race.
 Fly, fly we then, the omen to complete ;
 The glad occasion calls to fire the fleet ;
 Lo ! where to Neptune four proud altars rise !
 Lo ! his own fires the ready god supplies !
 She said ; — then seiz'd a blazing brand, and Threw ;
 Th' increasing flames amid the navy flew.
 At the bold deed, with deep surprise amaz'd,
 The dames all wand'ring, on the goddess gaz'd,
 At last, the nurse of Priam's offspring broke
 The general silence, and the train bespoke :
 This was no Beroë, whom we saw appear,
 But some bright goddess from th' ethereal sphere
 Mark her majestic port ! her voice divine !
 O'er all her form what starry splendors shine !
 She darts a glance immortal from her eyes,
 Breathes, looks and moves, a sister of the skies !
 Beroë I left in anguish, who repin'd,
 Shut from the rites, and to her couch confin'd.
 The matrons, now by doubts and fears impell'd
 First with malignant eyes the fleet beheld ;
 In choice suspended for a space they stand,
 Between the promis'd and the present land :
 When, smooth on level'd wings, the goddess flew
 And cut a mighty bow along the skies.
 Struck at the wondrous sight, the shrieking
 dames
 From the bright altars snatch the sacred flames ;
 Bring leaves and wither'd branches in their hand
 To feed the fires ; and hurl the blazing brands.
 Fierce through the ships, the decks, the crackling
 In all his rage devouring Vulcan roars. [oars
 And now Eumelus to the host conveys
 The dreadful tidings of the rising blaze :
 The crowds grow pale : they look behind and fly
 A cloud of cinders dark'ning all the sky.

And first Ascanius, as he led the band,
Pour'd o'er the plain, impetuous, to the strand;
Nor can his panting guardians check the speed
Of the young hero, and his fiery steed:
Oh! what curst rage is this, ye wretched dames?
To what dire purpose fly these fatal flames?
Behold, your own Ascanius---you destroy
No Argive navy, but the hopes of Troy.

With that, he threw his helmet on the shore,
In which he led his youthful bands before.
Next came Æneas, and the Trojan host.
Th' affrighted dames dispersing o'er the coast,
To woods and hollow caverns take their flight,
Repent their crime, and hate the golden light:
With alter'd minds their kindred they confeit,
And the fierce goddess fled from every breast.

Not so the furious flames; they spread the more;
And, high in air, with rage redoubled roar.
Close in the cordage works the fullen fire,
And through the ribs the heavy smokes expire.
Within the keel the subtle vapours lie;
Thence the contagious flames thro' all the vessel
The lab'ring heroes toil with fruitless pain, [fly.
And gushing floods on floods are pour'd in vain.
The prince then tore his robes in deep despair,
Rais'd high his hands; and thus address his pray'r;
Great Jove! if one of all the Trojan state
Lives yet exempt from thy immortal hate;
Oh! if thy sacred eyes with wonted grace
Behold the miserable mortal race;

Suppress these fires; forbid them to destroy;
And snatch from death the poor remains of Troy!
Or if my crimes, almighty fire! demand
The last, last vengeance of thy dreadful hand,
On me, on me alone that vengeance shed,
And with thy levell'd thunders strike me dead!
Scarce had he said, when o'er the navy pours
A sudden gloomy cloud in rattling show'rs;
Black with the southern winds the tempest flies,
And in a moment burst from all the skies
In sluicy sheets and deluges of rain; [the plain.
And the loud thunders smook the mountain and Fierce o'er the ships the waters took their way;
And, quench'd in floods, the hissing timbers lay.
Four gallees lost; at length the flames retire,
And all the remnant fleet escap'd the raging fire.

Meantime the hero by the loís oppress'd,
With various cares, that rack'd his lab'ring breast,
If still to seek the Latian realm debates,
Or here to fix, forgetful of the fates.
Then Nautes, fam'd for wisdom and for age,
(For Pallas taught the venerable sage,
What great events the fates and gods ordain);
Bespoke the chief, and thus reliev'd his pain.
'Tis best, illustrious hero, to obey,
And still pursue where fortune leads the way;
By patience to retrieve our hapless state,
And rise superior to the strokes of fate.
Let great Aætes in your councils join,
Your royal friend, of Troy's immortal line.
Your vessels lost; those numbers who remain,
A timorous, weak, unnecessary train,
The hoary fires and dames, unfit to bear
The perils of the sea, or toils of war,
Select; and trust to his paternal care.
The weary wretches here their walls may frame,
And call their city by the monarch's name.

The prince approv'd th' advice his friend address'd
But still a thousand cares distract his lab'ring breast

Now o'er the solemn skies devoid of light,
High in her sable chariot rode the night;
When to the godlike hero, from the pole
Descends, and speaks his mighty father's soul:
My son! in all the fates o' Troy approv'd,
Whom, while I liv'd, beyond my life I lov'd;
Lo! I am sent by heav'n's almighty fire,
Who from thy navy bade the flames retire.
The prudent counsel of thy friend obey,
Take, with the bravest youths, the dangerous way:
With these fair Latium shalt thou reach, and there
Wage with a rugged race a dreadful war.
Yet first, my son, to Pluto's regions go,
And meet thy father in the realms below;
For know my spirit was not doom'd to dwell
In the dark horrors and the depths of hell,
But, with the pious blest assembly reigns,
In all the pleasures of th' Elysian plains.
But thou the blood of sable victims shed;
Then shall the Sybil guide thee to the dead.
There shalt thou know what town the fates assign,
With the long glories of thy future line.
And now, farewell;---the night flides swift away
I feel from far the morning's painful ray;
And shrink and sicken at the beams of day.
He said, and lo! that moment from his eyes,
Like a thin smoke, dissolv'd into the skies.

Vanish'd to so soon! where, whither art thou
Why, why retirest my father from his son? [gone?
What! not one last embrace? the prince ex-claims:

Then to new life he wakes the slumb'ring flames;
And hoary Vesta, and the Trojan powers,
With sacred gifts and suppliant vows adores.
Strait the whole scene before his friends he lays,
But chief the vision to the king displays;
Unfolds the message sent from Heav'n above,
His father's counsel, and the will of Jove.
His friends approve the hero's new designs,
And in the task the good Aætes joins.
To the new town the matrons they assign'd,
And leave the willing vulgar crowds behind;
Souls, that no hopes of future praise inflame,
Cold and insensible to glorious fame.
With speed the half-burn'd vessels they repair,
Provide new cordage, decks, and oars with care;
A slender band, but eager all for war.
The prince then drew a city on the plain;
Next he assign'd the dwellings to the train.
Now a new lion in Trinacria rose,
And a new Simois and Scamander flows.
Well-pleas'd Aætes took the sovereign sway;
Th' adopted subjects their new prince obey.
The king conven'd the peers around, and late
To frame new laws, and regulate the state.
To Venus' name they bid a temple rise
From Eryx' top, high tow'ring to the skies:
And next a priest and ample grove were made,
For ever sacred to Anchises' shade.
Now nine whole days in solemn feasts had pass'd;
When gentle breezes smooch'd the floods at last:
The southern winds invite their sails and oars;
Then cries and shrieks resound along the shores.
In long, long tenderness they spend the day,
In close embraces waste the night away.

Now all the wretches, e'en the female train
 Who fear'd so late the dangers of the main,
 And shrunk, the rolling ocean to survey,
 All wish to take the long laborious way.
 The melting hero soothes the wild despair, [care.
 And weeps, and gives them to the monarch's
 Three heifers next to Eryx' name he pays,
 A lamb to every storm the hero slays,
 Unmoors his fleet, and every sail displays. }
 Crown'd with a graceful olive wreath he stands
 High on the prow; a charger in his hands:
 Hurls the fat entrails o'er the foamy brine,
 And stains the silver waves with fable wine.
 Fresh rise the esp'rous gales; the sailors sweep,
 And dash with equal strokes the roaring deep.

Meantime the queen of love with cares oppress,
 The mighty father of the floods address:
 Imperious Juno's unrelenting hate
 To the poor relics of the Trojan state,
 (Which no decrees of Jove or fate restrain,
 Nor length of years, nor vows prefer'd in vain)
 Compels a sister goddess to repair;
 To thee, great Neptune, with a suppliant's prayer.
 For rage like her's, 'twas little to destroy,
 Fair Asia's pride, th' imperial town of Troy!
 'Twas not enough her wand'ring natives know
 All forms and all varieties of woe!
 But oh! her groundless vengeance would efface,
 Ev'n the last relics of the perish'd race!
 'Thou, thou canst witness, ocean's mighty god!
 With what dire storms the lash'd the Libyan flood;
 When, arm'd with all th' Æolian winds in vain, Earth, air, and heav'n, she mingled with the
 main,

And rais'd such tumults in thy wat'ry reign.
 Yet, still more shameful!—now her arts inspire
 The Trojan dames to wrap the ships in fire;
 And urge my son, to leave his social band
 (His fleet half-ruin'd) in a foreign land.
 But oh! I beg for those, who yet remain,
 A peaceful voyage to the Latian plain;
 A suppliant goddess begs for nothing more
 Than those same realms the fates assign'd before:
 'Tis yours, reply'd the monarch of the main,
 Yours to command in this our wat'ry reign;
 Since from the sacred ocean first you came,
 Since your deserts your confidence may claim;
 Off for your son I bade the whirlwinds cease;
 I hush'd the roarings of the floods to peace;
 And Simois can attest and Xanthus' stream,
 By land my guardian care was still the same.
 When first Achilles, furious to destroy,
 Drove to their walls the trembling sons of Troy;
 Beneath his vengeful spear when thousands bled,
 When the chok'd rivers groan'd with loads of dead;
 When Xanthus' flood incumber'd with the slain,
 Scarce roll'd his struggling billows to the main;
 Your son oppos'd him, with unequal might
 And far inferior gods, in single fight:
 Instant I snatch'd him from the dreadful fray,
 And in a cloud convey'd the chief away.
 Ey'n then I sav'd the warrior, when with joy
 I wish'd and wrought the fall of perjurd Troy:
 And still will save him—he shall plough the sea,
 And to Avernus' port direct his way.
 On the wild floods shall only one be lost,
 One single wretch atone for all the host!

Thus when the god had footh'd her anxious
 mind,
 His sinny courfers to the car he join'd;
 Next to their fiery mouths the bits apply'd,
 And, while the wheels along the level glide,
 He throws up all the reins, and skims the floating tide.

The flood subsides and spreads a glassy plain,
 And the loud chariot thunders o'er the main;
 The clouds before the mighty monarch fly
 In heaps, and scatter through the boundless sky:
 A thousand forms attend the glorious god,
 Enormous whales, and monsters of the flood:
 Here the long train of hoary Glaucus rides;
 Here the swift Tritons shoot along the tides;
 There rode Palæmon o'er the wat'ry plain,
 With aged Phorcus, and his azure train;
 And beauteous Thetis led the daughters of the
 main.

Æneas view'd the scene; and hence arose
 A beam of joy to dissipate his woes.
 Instant he gives command to stretch the sails,
 To rear the mast and catch the springing gales.
 Strait the glad train the spacious sheet unbind,
 And stretch the canvass to the driving wind.
 Old Palinurus first the navy guides;
 The rest obedient follow through the tides.
 Now half the night thro' heav'n had roll'd away,
 The sailors stretch'd along their benches lay,
 When through the parting vapour swiftly flies
 The god of slumbers from th' ethereal skies.
 To thee, poor Palinure, he came and shed
 A fatal sleep on thy devoted head!
 High on the stern his silent stand he took
 In Phorbas' shape; and thus the phantom spoke
 Behold, the fleet, my friend, securely sails,
 Steer'd by the floods and waited by the gales!
 Now steal a moment's rest; myself will guide
 A while the vessel o'er the floating tide.
 To whom the careful Palinure replies,
 While scarce he rais'd his heavy closing eyes:
 M'woud'st thou urge in sleep to sink away,
 And fondly credit such a flattering sea?
 Too well, my friend, I know the treacherous main
 Too well to tempt the monsters smiles again!
 Too oft deceiv'd by such a calm before,
 I trust my master to the winds no more.
 This said, he grasp'd the helm, and fix'd his eyes
 On every guiding star that gilds the skies.
 Then o'er his temples shook the wrathful god
 A branch, deep-drench'd in Lethe's silent flood.
 The potent charm in dews of slumber steep,
 And soon weigh down his swimming eyes to sleep
 Scarce yet his languid limbs had sunk away,
 When o'er the wretch the god incumbent lay,
 And, with a shatter'd fragment of the ship,
 Bore down the helm and pilot to the deep;
 Headlong he tumbles in the flashing main,
 And calls for succour to his friends in vain,
 Swift from the stern the airy phantom flies,
 And with spread pinions mounts the golden skies:
 Yet smooth along the flood the navy rode,
 Safe in the promise of the wat'ry god,
 Now they approach'd the firen's dangerous coast
 Once rough, and infamous for vessels lost:
 Huge heaps of bones still whiten all the shore;
 And, dash'd from rock to rock the billows roar,

The watchful prince th' endarg'd galley found,
Without a pilot strike on shoaly ground;
Himself then took the task, by night to guide
The wand'ring vessel o'er the rolling tide :

O dear lamented friend ! (the hero cries,
For faith repos'd on flattering seas and skies,
Cast on a foreign shore thy naked body lies !

B O O K VI.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Sibyl foretells Æneas the adventures he should met with in Italy. She attends him to hell, describing to him the various scenes of that place, and conducting him to his father Anchises, who instructs him in those sublime mysteries of the soul of the world, and the transmigration; and shows him that glorious race of heroes, which was to descend from him and his posterity.

Thus while he wept ; with flying sails and oars
The navy reach'd the fair Cumæan shores.
The circling anchors here the fleet detain,
All rang'd beside the margin of the main.
With eager transport fir'd, the Trojan band
Leap from the ships to gain th' Hesperian land.
Some strike from flints the sparkling seeds of flame,
Some storm the coverts of the savage game ;
To feed the fires, unroot the standing woods,
And show with joy the new-discover'd floods.
To Phœbus' fane the hero past along,
And those dark caverns where the Sibyl sung.
There, as the god enlarg'd her soul, she fate,
And open'd all the deep decrees of fate.
The train with reverence enter, and behold
Chaste Trivia's grove, and temple roof'd with gold ;
A structure rais'd by Dædalus, ('tis said)
When from the Cretan king's revenge he fled,
On wings to northern climes he dar'd to soar,
Through airy ways unknown to man before ;
Full many a length of sky and ocean past,
On Cuma's sacred tow'rs he stoop'd at last.
Then hung to Phœbus in the strange abode,
The wings that steer'd him through the liquid road, [god.]

And rais'd the pompous pile in honour of the
The matchless artist, on the lofty gate,
Engrav'd Androgeos' memorable fate :
And here by lot sad Athens early paid
Sev'n hapless youths, to sooth his angry shade.
Here stood the fatal urn ; and there with pride
Fair Crete rose tow'ring on the silver tide.
There too the father of the herds was seen,
Who quench'd the passion of the lustful queen ;
Their birth, a man below, a beast above,
The mingled offspring of prepos't'rous love !
There stood the winding pile, whose mazes run
Round within round, and end where they begun.
But when the pitying Dædalus survey'd
The hopeless passion of the * royal maid,
He led her Theseus through the puzzling ways,
Safe with a clue, and open'd every maze.
Thou too, poor Icarus ! hadst borne a part,
Had grief not check'd thy parent in his art !
He thrice essay'd the mournful task in vain ;
Thrice shook his hand, and drop'd the task again.

Thus had they gaz'd o'er all the costly frame,
When lo ! Achates from the temple came ;

* Ariadne:

With him Deiphobe of Phœbus' fane
The sacred priestess—who at once began :—
Hence—gaze no more ; sev'n chosen sheep with speed,
Sev'n steers, unconscious of the yoke, must bleed.
She spoke ; the crowds obey ; and to the fane
Sublime, she calls the wand'ring Trojan train.
Scoop'd through the rock, in mighty deep display'd,
Lies like the dark cavern of the Sibyl maid ;
Through all the hundred portals rush abroad
Her sacred voice, and answers of the god.
Scarce at the cell arriv'd—invoke the skies,
I feel the god, the rushing god ! she cries.
While yet she spoke, enlarg'd her features grew,
Her colour chang'd, her locks dishevel'd flew,
The heav'nly tumult reigns in ev'ry part,
Pants in her breast, and swells her rising heart :
Still spreading to the fight, the priestess glow'd,
And heav'd impatient of th' incumbent god.
Then to her inmost soul by Phœbus fir'd,
In more than human sounds she spoke inspir'd :
Still, dost thou still delay ? thy voice employ
In ardent vows, illustrious prince of Troy !
Thy pray'rs, thy urgent pray'rs must wide display
These awful portals to the light of day.
She said ; the Trojans shook with holy fear,
And thus the suppliant prince prefer'd his pray'r
Hear, Phœbus, gracious God ! whose aid divine :
So oft has sav'd the wretched Trojan line,
And wing'd the shaft from Paris' Phrygian bow,
The shaft that laid the great Achilles low.
Led by thy guardian care, secure I pass [waste ;
Through many a realm, and rang'd the wat'ry
Tro'd the wild regions where the Syrtes lie,
And lands that stretch beneath a different sky.
At length the coast of Italy we gain,
The flying coast, so long pursu'd in vain.
Till now, to every realm our course we bent,
And Ilion's fate pursu'd us where we went.
Now all ye pow'rs, confederate to destroy
The glorious empire and the tow'rs of Troy,
'Tis time to bid your wrathful vengeance cease,
To bid her poor remains repose in peace.
And thou, great Sibyl ! to whose piercing eye
Disclos'd the scenes of future ages lie ;
Since all my cares and labours but explore
An empire promis'd by the fates before,
Give me to fix in Latium's fair abodes
The sons of Troy, and rest her wand'ring gods :

Then shall my hands a glorious temple frame
To mighty Dian, and her brother's name ;
And solemn days, to Phœbus I'll decree,
And in my realms shall temples rise to thee ;
There all thy mystic numbers will I place,
With all the fortunes of the Trojan race.
By chosen fages guarded, there shall lie
The records, sacred from the vulgar eye.
Nor be my fates to flitting leaves consign'd,
To fly the common sport of every wind !
But thou, even thou, great prophetess ! relate
In vocal accents all my future fate.

Now raves the Sibyl in her cave, oppress'd
By Phœbus raging in her heaving breast ;
She struggles to discharge the mighty load,
Maddens and bounds, impatient of the god :
Her foamy mouth attentive to control,
He forms her organs and commands her soul.
Then (all the hundred doors display'd to view)
Through every vent the sacred accents flow :

By sea, O prince ! are all thy perils o'er,
But far, far greater wait thee on the shore.
Dismiss thy doubts ; to Latium's destin'd plain
Troy's sons shall come, but wish to fly again.
Wars, horrid wars I see on Tyber's shore ;
And all his waves run thick with human gore !
Scamander shall thou find, and Simois there,
And Greece shall arm a second host for war.
A new Achilles rises to the fight ;
Him too a pregnant goddess brings to light :
And heav'n's great queen, with unrelenting hate,
Still, as of old, pursues the Dardan state.
Once more the woes of Troy derive their cause
From a new breach of hospitable laws ;
And the must bleed again as late he bled,
For a rap'd prince and a foreign bed.
How shalt thou rove, new succours to implore,
From every court along the Latian shore !
But thou, more bold, the more thy fates oppose,
Advance, great prince, superior to thy woes :
Thy first fair hopes of safety and success,
Beyond thy fondest wish, shall rise from Greece.

Thus spoke the Sibyl from her dark abode
The dread mysterious answers of the god ;
The wondrous truths involv'd in riddles, gave,
And, furious, bellow'd round the gloomy cave.
Apollo shook his rod ; possess her whole,
Pour'd in his fires, and rein'd her raging soul.
At length the fierce ethereal transport cease,
And all the heavenly fury sunk in peace.

When thus the chief--O sacred dame ! I know
Too well already my predestin'd woe ;
But grant my pray'r!--Since here, as Fame relates

Lies the dread road to Pluto's gloomy gates :
Where baleful Acheron spreads, far and wide,
His livid, melancholy, murmuring tide ;
Unfold these portals, and thy suppliant lead
Down to the dark dominions of the dead :
Give me to view my father's reverend face,
And rush with transport to his dear embrace !
Him though embattled armies I convey'd,
While javelins hiss'd, and flames around me play'd.
He shar'd my toils, determin'd to defy
The storms of every sea and every sky ;
In hardships, cares and dangers to engage ;
Nor spar'd his stooping venerable age.

Yet more--he bade me to thy cell repair,
And seek thy potent aid with suppliant pray'r :
Oh ! hear our joint request, our just desire ;
And guide the son, in pity to the fire.
Yours is the pow'r, for Hecatê bestow'd
On you the rule of this infernal wood.
If Orpheus by his lyre's enchanting strain
Could call his consort from the shades again ;
If Pollux dy'd alternate, to convey
His ransom'd brother to the realms of day,
And trod so oft the same infernal way !
Why should I Theseus, why Alcides name,
Each hero sprung but from a mortal dame ?
To hell those chiefs descended from above :
I claim a juster right ; for I can prove
My birth from Venus ; my descent from Jove.

Then to the Trojan hero, as he pray'd
And grasp'd the altars, spoke the sacred maid :
O glorious prince ! of brave Anchises' line,
Great, godlike hero, sprung from seed divine !
Smooth lies the road to Pluto's gloomy shade ;
And hell's black gates for ever stand display'd ;
But 'tis a long unconquerable pain,
To climb to these ethereal realms again.
The choice selected few, whom fav'ring Jove,
Or their own virtue rais'd to heav'n above,
From these dark realms emerg'd again to day ;
The mighty sons of gods ! and only they !
The frightful entrance lies perplex'd with woods,
Enclous'd with sad Cocytus' sullen floods.
But since you long to pass the realms beneath,
The dreadful realms of darkness and of death,
Twice the dire Stygian stream to measure o'er,
And twice the black Tartarean gulf explore :
First, take my counsel, then securely go,
A mighty tree, that bears a golden bough,
Grows in a vale, surrounded with a grove,
And sacred to the queen of Stygian Jove.
Her nether world no mortals can behold,
Till from the bole they strip the blooming gold.
The mighty queen requires this gift alone,
And claims the shining wonder for her own.
One pluck'd away, a second branch you see
Shoot forth in gold, and glitter through the tree,
Go then ; with care erect thy searching eyes,
And in proud triumph seize the glorious prize.
Thy purpos'd journey if the Fates allow,
Free to thy touch shall bend the costly bough :
If not ; the tree will mortal strength disdain ;
And feel shall hew the glittering branch in vain.
Besides, while here my counsel you implore,
Your breathless friend, unburied on the shore,
(Ah ! hapless warrior ! in thy absence lost)
The camp unhallows, and pollutes the hoit.
First let his cold remains in earth be laid,
And decent in the grave dispose the dead.
The due lustration next perform, and bring
The sable victims for the Stygian king.
Then to the realms of hell shalt thou repair,
Untrod by those who breathe the vital air.

She ceas'd ; the mournful prince returns with fights :
On earth the drooping hero fix'd his eyes.
Deep in his melancholy thoughts he weigh'd
The dire event, and all the Sibyl said ;
While at his side the good Achatas shares
The warrior's anguish, and divides his cares.

Oft they divin'd in vain, what hapless friend
 Dead and expos'd, her dubious words intend,
 But when arriv'd, amid the crowded strand
 They saw Misenus stretch'd along the sand;
 The great Misenus, of celestial kind
 Sprung from the mighty monarch of the wind;
 Whose trump, with noble clangors, fir'd from far
 Th' embattled hosts, and blew the flames of war.
 By Hector's side with unresisted might
 His javelin rag'd; his trumpet rous'd the fight.
 But when that hero on the Phrygian plain
 By stern Pelides' thund'ring arm was slain,
 He follow'd next Æneas' conqu'ring sword,
 As brave a warrior as his former lord.
 But while the daring mortal o'er the flood
 Rais'd his high notes, and challeng'd every god,
 With envy Triton heard the noble strain,
 And whelm'd the bold musician in the main.
 Around the body stood the mournful host,
 By his great master wept, and suffer'd most.
 The sorrowing troops the Sibyl's words obey,
 And to the lofty forest bend their way,
 To bid the proud funereal pyre arise,
 And build the solemn structure to the skies.
 Then fled the savage from his dark abode;
 The well-ply'd axes echo through the wood.
 The piercing wedges cleave the crackling oak;
 Loud groan the trees and sink at every stroke.
 The tall ash tumbles from the mountain's crown;
 Th' aerial elms come crashing headlong down.
 First of the train, the prince, with thund'ring
 sound,
 Whirl'd his huge axe, and spread the ruin round.
 Then as the mighty forest he survey'd,
 O'erwhelm'd with care the thoughtful hero
 pray'd:
 Oh! in this ample grove could I behold
 The tree that blooms with vegetable gold!
 Since truth inspir'd each word the Sibyl said;
 Too truly the pronounc'd Misenus dead!
 While yet he spoke, two doves before him flew:
 His mother's birds the chief with transport knew;
 Then, as they settled on the verdant plain,
 The joyful hero pray'd, nor pray'd in vain:
 Be you my guides through airy tracks above,
 And lead my footsteps to the fatal grove;
 Point out the road (if any can be found),
 Where the rich bough o'er spreads the sacred
 ground,
 With chequer'd darkness pierc'd by golden rays,
 And darts at once a shadow and a blaze:
 Thou too, O goddess mother! lead me on,
 Unfold these wonders, and relieve thy son.
 This said, he stopp'd; but still his eager sight
 Watch'd every motion, and observ'd their flight.
 By turns they feed, by turns they gently fly;
 Th' advancing chief still follows with his eye.
 Arriv'd at length, where, breathing to the skies,
 Blue clouds of poison from Avernus rise,
 Swift from the deathful blast at once they spring,
 Cut the light air, and shoot upon the wing;
 Then on the wond'rous tree the doves alight,
 Where shines the fatal bough divinely bright,
 That, gilding all the leaves with glancing beams,
 Strikes through the fallen shade with golden gleams:

As when bleak winter binds the frozen skies,
 Push'd from the oak her foreign honours rise;
 The lofty trunk th' adopted branches crown,
 Grac'd with a yellow offspring not her own:
 So with bright beams, all beauteous to behold,
 Glow'd on the dusky tree the blooming gold;
 The blooming gold, by every breath inclin'd,
 Flam'd as it wav'd, and twinkled in the wind.
 The chief with transport stripp'd the branching
 And the rich trophy to the Sibyl bore. } ore,
 Next on the strand, with tears the Trojans paid
 The last sad honour: to Misenus' shade:
 With cloven oaks and unctuous pines, they rear
 A stately solemn pile aloft in air.
 With fable wreaths they deck the sides around,
 The spreading front with baleful cypress bound,
 And with his arms the tow'ring structure
 crown'd. }
 Some the huge cauldron fill; the foaming stream
 From the deep womb mounts bubbling o'er the brim.
 With groans the train anoint and bathe the dead, }
 O'er the cold limbs his purple garment spread,
 And place him decent on the funeral bed;
 While these support the bier, and in their hands,
 With looks averted, hold the flaming brands:
 The rite of old!—rich incense loads the pyre,
 And oils and slaughter'd victims feed the fire.
 Soon as the pile, subsiding, flames no more,
 With wine the smoking heap they sprinkled o'er;
 Then Chorinæus took the charge, to place
 The bones selected in a brazen vase:
 A verdant branch of olive in his hands,
 He mov'd around, and purify'd the bands;
 Slow as he pass, the lustral waters shed,
 Then clos'd the rites, and thrice invoc'd the dead.
 This done; to solemnize the warrior's doom,
 The pious hero rais'd a lofty tomb;
 The tow'ring top his well-known ensigns bore,
 His arms, his once loud trump, and tapering oar:
 Beneath the mountain rose the mighty frame,
 That bears from age to age Misenus' name.
 These rites discharg'd: the Sibyl to obey,
 Swift from the tomb the hero bends his way.
 Deep, deep, a cavern lies, devoid of light,
 All rough with rocks, and horrible to sight;
 Its dreadful mouth is fenc'd with table floods,
 And the brown horrors of surrounding woods.
 From its black jaws such baleful vapours rise,
 Blot the bright day, and blast the golden skies,
 That not a bird can stretch her pinions there
 Through the thick poisons and incumber'd air,
 But struck by death her flagging pinions cease;
 And hence Aërnis was it call'd by Greece.
 Hither the priestess four black heifers led,
 Between their horns the hallow'd wine she shed;
 From their high front the topmost hairs she drew,
 And in the flames the first oblations threw.
 Then calls on potent Hecate, renown'd
 In heav'n above, and Erebus profound.
 The victims next th' attendants kill'd, and stood
 With ample chargers, to receive the blood.
 To earth and night a lamb of fable hue,
 With solemn rites, the pious hero slew.
 Next by the knife a barren heifer tell
 To great Persephone the queen of hell.

Then to her lord, infernal Jove, he said
A large oblation in the gloomy shade;
And oils amid the burning entrails pour'd,
While slaughter'd bulls the sacred flames devour'd.

When lo! by dawning day, with dreadful sound,
Beneath their footsteps groan; the heaving
ground;

The groves all wave; the forests tremble round.

Pale Hecate forsook the nether sky;

And howling dogs proclaim'd the goddess nigh.

Fly, ye profane! far, far away, remove (Exclaims the Sybil) from the sacred grove:

And thou, Æneas, draw thy shining steel,

And boldly take the dreadful road to hell.

To the great task thy strength and courage call,

With all thy pow'rs; this instant claim them all.

This said; she plunges down the deep descent;

The prince as boldly follow'd where she went.

Ye subterraneous gods! whose awful sway

The gliding ghosts and silent shades obey;

O Chaos hoar! and Phlegethon profound!

Whose solemn empire stretches wide around;

Give me, ye great tremendous pow'rs, to tell

Of scenes, and wonders in the depths of hell;

Give me your mighty secrets to display

From those black realms of darkness to the day.

Now through the dismal gloom they pass, and tread

Grim Pluto's courts, the regions of the dead;

As puzzled travellers bewild'rd move,

(The moon scarce glimmering through the dusky grove)

When Jove from mortal eyes has snatch'd the light,
And wrapt the world in undistinguish'd night.

At hell's dread mouth a thousand monsters wait;

Griefsweeps, and vengeance-bellows in the gate;

Base want, low fear, and famine's lawless rage,

And pale disease, and slow repining age,

Fierce formidable fiends! the portal keep;

With pain, toil, death, and death's half-brother sleep.

There, joys, embitter'd with remorse appear;

Daughters of guilt! here storms destructive war.

Mad discord there her snaky tresses tore:

Here, stretch'd on iron beds, the furies roar.

Full in the midst spreading elm display'd

His aged arms, and cast a mighty shade,

Each trembling leaf with some light vision teems,

And heavens impregnated with airy dreams.

With double forms each Scylla took her place

In hell's dark entrance; with the Centaur's race;

And, close by Lerna's hissing monster, stands

Briareus dreadful with an hundred hands.

There stern Geryon rag'd; and, all around,

Fierce Harpies scream'd, and direful Gorgons frown'd:

Here from Chimæra's jaws long flames expire;

And the huge fiend was wrapt in smoke and fire.

Scar'd at the sight, his sword the hero drew

At the grim monsters, as they rose to view.

His guide then warn'd him not to wage the war

With thin light forms, and images of air;

Else had he rush'd amid th' impassive train,

And madly struck at empty shades in vain.

From hence a dark uncomfortable road

Leads to dread Acheron's Tartarean flood,

Whose furious whirlpools boil on every side,

And in Cocytus pour the roaring tide

All stain'd with ooze, and black with rising sands,

Lord of the flood, imperious Charon stands;

But rough, begrimm'd, and dreadful he appear'd;

Rude and neglected hung his length of beard;

All patch'd and knotted flutters his attire;

His wrathful eyeballs glare with sanguine fire.

Though old, still unimpair'd by years he stood,

And hoary vigour blest the furly god.

Himself still ply'd the oars, the canvas spread,

And in his sable bark convey'd the dead.

Hither, a mighty crowd, a mingled host,

Confus'd, came pouring round the Stygian coast.

Men, matrons, boys and virgins, in the throng,

With mighty kings, and heroes march'd along;

And blooming youths before their mournful fires

Stretch'd out untimely on their funeral pyres;

Thick as the leaves come fluttering from above,

When cooler autumn strips the blasted grove:

Thick, as the feather'd flocks, in close array,

O'er the wide fields of ocean wing their way,

When from the rage of winter they repair

To warmer suns, and more indulgent air.

All stretch'd their suppliant hands, and all implore

The first kind passage to the farther shore.

Now these, now those, he singles from the host,

And some he drives all trembling from the coast.

The prince astonish'd at the tumult, cry'd,

Why crowd such mighty numbers to the tide?

Why are those favour'd ghosts transported o'er?

And these sad shades chas'd backward from the shore?

The full of days, the Sybil thus replies;

Great prince, the true descendant of the skies!

You see Cocytus' stream; the Stygian floods,

Whose awful-sanction binds th' attesting gods.

Those, who neglected on the strand remain,

Are all a wretched, poor, unbury'd train;

Charon is he, who o'er the flood presides;

And those interr'd, who cross the Stygian tides.

No mortals pass the hoarse-resounding wave,

But those who slumber in the peaceful grave.

Thus, till a hundred years have roll'd away,

Around these shores the plaintive spectres stray.

That mighty term expir'd, their wanderings past,

They reach the long expected shore at last.

Struck with their fate, his steps the hero stay'd,

And with soft pity all the crowd survey'd.

When lo! Leucaspis in the throng he spy'd;

And great Orontes, once the Lycian guide;

Sullen and sad; for fate's relentless doom

Deny'd the chiefs the honours of a tomb;

Whose galley, whirl'd by tempests round and round,

Sunk, by a mighty surge devour'd and drown'd.

Now drew his pilot Palinurus nigh,

Who watching every star that gilds the sky,

While from the Libyan shores his course he keeps,

From the tall stern plung'd headlong down the deeps.

Pensive his slow approach the spectre made,

When, as the prince had scarce his form survey'd

Through the thick gloom, he first address'd the shade:

What godhead whim'd my friend, our faithful

Beneath the roarings of the dreadful tide? [guide,

Tell me—for oh! I never would complain,
Till now, of Phœbus, nor believ'd in vain.
Once he foretold—(but ah! those hopes are lost)
That Palinure should reach th' Ausonian coast,
Safe from the giddy storm and rolling flood;
Is this, is this the promise of a god?
Nor Phœbus, he replies, foretold in vain,
Nor has a god o'erwhelm'd me in the main.
No—as I steer'd along the foamy sea,
Headlong I fell, and tore the helm away.
But by those fierce tumultuous floods I swear,
For my own life I never felt a fear,
For your's alone I trembled, left the ship,
Left all at large and bounding o'er the deep,
Kobb'd of her helm and long experienc'd guide,
Should sink, o'erwhelm'd in such a furious tide.
For three long stormy nights sublime I rode,
Heav'd by the southern tempests o'er the flood;
At early dawn my eyes could just explore,
From a tall tow'ring surge, th' Italian shore.
Thus tir'd, the land I gain by slow degrees,
And 'scap'd at length the dangers of the seas;
And hopes of prey the savage natives led,
And, while I grasp'd the shaggy mountain's head,
(My cumbersome veils yet heavy from the main,)
By barbarous hands thy helpless friend was slain.
And now by floating surges am I tost,
With every wind, and dash'd upon the coast.
But by the light of yon ethereal air,
By thy dead father, and surviving heir,
O prince! thy pity to a wretch extend;
And from these dismal realms enlarge thy friend.
Or to the Veline port direct thy way,
And in the ground my breathless body lay:
Or, if thy goddess-mother can disclose
Some means to fix a period to my woes,
(For sure uncall'd, unguided by the gods,
Thou durst not pass these dreadful Stygian floods)
Lend to a pining wretch thy friendly hand,
And waft him with thee to the farther strand!
Thus, in this dismal state of death at least
My wand'ring soul may lie compos'd in rest.
And how, reply'd the dame, could rise in man
A wish so impious, or a thought so vain!
Uncall'd, unbury'd, wouldst thou venture o'er,
And view th' infernal fiends who guard the
shore?
Hope not to turn the course of fate by pray'r,
Or bend the gods inflexibly severe:
But bear thy doom content; while I disclose
A beam of comfort to relieve thy woes;
For know, the nations bord'ring on the floods,
Alarm'd by direful omens of the gods,
In full atonement of thy death shall rear
A mighty tomb, and annual offerings bear.
The place, from age to age renown'd by fame,
Still shall be known by Palinurus' name.
These words reliev'd his sorrows, and display'd
A dawn of joy to please the pensive shade.
Now they proceed; but soon the pilot spy'd
The strangers from the wood approach the tide.
Then to the godlike chief, in wrath he said,
Mortal! whoe'er thou art, in arms array'd,
Stand off; approach not; but at distance say,
Why to these waters dar'st thou bend thy way?
These are the realms of sleep, the dreadful coasts
Of sable night, and airy gliding ghosts.

No living mortals o'er the stream I lead;
Our bark is only sacred to the dead.
Know, I repent I led Pirithous o'er,
With mighty Theseus, to the farther shore;
The great Alcides past the Stygian floods;
Though these were heroes, and the sons of gods.
From Pluto's throne, this dragg'd in chains away
Hell's triple porter, trembling, to the day.
Those from his lofty dome aspir'd to lead
The beauteous partner of his royal bed.
To whom the sacred dame—how vain thy fear!
These arms intend no violence of war.
May the huge dog through all the Stygian coasts,
Roar from his den, and scare the flying ghosts;
Untouch'd and chaste, Persephoné may dwell,
And with grim Pluto share the throne of hell:
The Trojan prince, Æneas far around
For valour, arms, and piety renown'd,
Through these infernal realms decrees to go,
And meet his father in the shades below.
To bend thy mind, if such high virtue fail,
At least this glorious present must prevail;
(Then show'd the bough, that lay beneath her vest.)

At once his rising wrath was hush'd to rest;
At once stood reconcil'd the ruthless god,
And bow'd with reverence to the golden rod;
Bow'd, and refus'd his office now no more,
But turns the sable vessel to the shore;
Drives from the deck the sitting airy train;
Then in the bark receiv'd the mighty man.
The feeble vessel groans beneath the load,
And drinks at many a leak th' infernal flood.
The dame and prince at last are wafted o'er
Safe to the slimy strand and oozy shore.

Arriv'd, they first grim Cerberus survey;
Stretch'd in his den th' enormous monster lay,
His three wide mouths, with many a dreadful yell,
And long, loud bellowings, shook the realms of hell:

Now o'er his neck the starting serpents rose,
When o'er his fiend the dame a morsel throws.
Honey, and drugs, and poppy juices steep
The temper'd mafs with all the pow'rs of sleep.
With three huge gaping mouths, impatient flies
The growling savage, and devours the prize;
Then, by the charm subdu'd, he funk away;
And stretch'd all o'er the cave, the slumbering monster lay.

The fiend thus lull'd, the hero took the road,
And left behind th' irremovable flood,
Now, as they enter'd doleful screams they hear;
And tender cries of infants pierce the ear.
Just new to life, by too severe a doom,
Snatch'd from the cradle to the silent tomb!
Next, mighty numbers crowd the verge of hell,
Who, by a partial charge and sentence fell.
Here, by a juster lot, their seats they took;
The fatal urn imperious Minos shook,
Convenes a council, bids the spectres plead,
Rehears the wretches, and absolves the dead.
Then crowds succeed, who, prodigal of breath,
Themselvcs anticipate the doom of death;
Tho' free from guilt they cast their lives away,
And sad and sullen hate the golden day.
Oh! with what joy the wretches now would bear
Pain, toil and woe, to breathe the vital air!

In vain!—by fate forever are they bound
With dire Avernus, and the lake profound
And Styx with nine wide channels roars around, }

Next open wide the melancholy plains,
Where Lovers pine in everlasting pains;
Thuse soft consuming flames they felt alive,
Pursue the wretches, and in death survive. [play,
Here, where the myrtle groves their shades dif-
In cover'd walks they pass their hours away,
Eualne, Phædra, Procris he survey'd,
Pasiphaë next, and Laodamia's shade.

Stabb'd by her son, false Eriphylé there
Points to her wound, and lays her bosom bare:
Cænus, who try'd both sexes, trod the plain,
Now to a woman chang'd by fate again.
With these, fair Dido rang'd the silent wood,
New from her wound, her bosom bath'd in blood;
The chief, advancing thro' the shady scene,
Scarce thro' the gloom discern'd the fullen queen:
So the pale moon scarce glimmers to the eye,
When first she rises in r clouded sky.

He wept, and thus address'd her in the grove,
With all the melting tenderness of love:

Then was it true, that by revengeful feel,
Stung with despair, unhappy Dido fell?

And I, was I the cause of that despair?
Yet oh! I vow by every golden star;
By all the pow'rs the ethereal regions know,
By all the pow'rs that rule the world below,
I left your realm reluctant: o'er the floods
Call'd by the fates, and summon'd by the gods;

Th' immortal gods;—by whose commands I come
From yon bright realms to this eternal gloom:
Condemn'd the wasteful deep of night to tread,
And pass these doleful regions of the dead.
Ah! could I think, when urg'd by heav'n to go,
My flight would plunge you in the depth of woe!

Stay, Dido, stay, and see from whom you fly?
'Tis from your fond repentant lover's eye.
Turn then one moment, and my vows believe,
The last, last moment fate will ever give!

Nought to these tender words the fair replies,
But fixt on earth her unrelenting eyes,

The chief still weeping: with a fullen mien,
In stedfast silence, frown'd th' obdurate queen.
Fixt as a rock amidst the roaring main,
She hears him sigh, implore, and plead in vain.

Then, where the woods their thickest shades dif-
From his detested sight the shoots away; [play,
There from her dear Sichæus in the grove, [love,
Found all her cares repaid, and love return'd for Touch'd with her woes, the prince with streaming eyes

And floods of tears, pursues her as she flies.

Hence he proceeds; and last the fields appear,
Where stalk'd the proud heroic sons of war,
Tydeus and pale Adrastus rose to fight,
With Atalanta's son renown'd in fight.

Here, a long crowd of chiefs the prince beheld,
Who fell lamented in the glorious field,
His Trojan friends;—with sighs he view'd the Three valiant sons of sage Antenor slain: [train;
Here brave Therfilocus and Glaucus stood,
Medon and Polyætes bath'd in blood.

Idæus there still glories in alarms,
Vaults on his car, and wields his shining arms.

* Parthenopæus.

Eager to view the chief, on either hand,
Rank behind rank, the eager warriors stand:
All in their turn retard the prince, to know
What urg'd his journey to the shades below.
Not so the kings of Greece—appall'd, dismay'd,
The hostile chiefs the godlike man survey'd }
In arms that glitter'd through the dusky shade. }
Some turn'd and fled, astonish'd at the view,
As when before him to their fleets they flew,
Some rais'd a cry; the fluttering accents hung,
And dy'd imperfect on the trembling tongue.

Here Priam's son, Deiphobus, he found;
The mangled youth was one continued wound.
For now his face, his beauteous face appears
Gash'd, and dishonour'd with a thousand scars.
His hands, ears, nostrils, hideous to survey!
The stern insulting foes had lopp'd away;
Trembling he stood, industrious to conceal
The bloody traces of the ruthless steel.
Soon as the prince discern'd him, he began,
And thus deplor'd the miserable man:
O brave Deiphobus! O chief divine!

Sprung from majestic Teucer's martial line:
What fierce barbarian hands could thus disgrace
Thy manly figure, and thy beauteous face?

In that last night, when Ilium sunk in flame,
I heard, brave warrior! from the voice of fame,
You fell on heaps of foes, with slaughter tir'd,
And on the glorious purple pile expir'd.
With care I rais'd on our Rhœtean coast
A vacant tomb, and hail'd thy mighty ghost:

Thy name and arms adorn the place around;
And, had thy mingled bleeding corse been found,
Thy relics had repos'd in Trojan ground, }

My friend (replies the chief) has duly paid
All funeral honours to my pensive shade;

But these dire woes from fatal Helen came;
These are the triumphs of the Spartan dame!
For well, too well you know, in what delight
We fondly spent our last destructive night:

When the vast monster big with Ilium's doom,
Tower'd through the town, an army in its womb;
In solemn show she bade the dames advance,
And in dissembled orgies led the dance;

A flaming torch she brandish'd in her hand;
Then from the tow'r invites the Grecian band;
While, worn with labours I repos'd my head
(Ah wretch ill-fated!) on our bridal bed.

My heavy lids the dews of slumber steep,
Lull'd in a soft, profound, and death-like sleep.
Then from beneath my head, as tir'd I lay,
My loyal bride conveys my sword away,

Removes my arms, unfolds the door, and calls
Her Spartan lord within my palace walls;
Betrays her last, to please her former spouse,
And cancel all the guilt of broken vows!

Fierce they broke in, by dire Ulysses led,
And safely slew me in the bridal bed.
Hear my just pray'rs, ye gods!—to Greece repay

A fate like mine; give all your vengeance way!
But thee, O prince, what wond'rous fortune led Alive, to these dominions of the dead?

Say, did the will and counsel of the gods,
Or the rude tempests and tumultuous floods,
Compel thy courie from yon ethereal light,
To these dark realms of everlasting night?

Meantime the swift-wing'd courfers of the fun
Through heav'n full half their fiery race had run;
And all th' appointed hours in talk had past,
But thus the priestess warn'd the chief at last:
Lo! night advances, prince!—we waste away
In idle sorrows the remains of day.

See—in two ample roads, the way divides;
The right, direct, our destin'd journey guides,
By Pluto's palace, to th' Elysian plains;
The left to Tartarus, where, bound in chains,
Loud howl the damn'd in everlasting pains.
Dismiss thy wrath, replies the pensive shade,
But one word more—I then rejoice the dead:
Go—mighty prince, the promis'd throne ascend;
Go—but with better fortune than thy friend!
With these last accents, to the warrior host
Retires the trembling, melancholy ghost.

Now to the left, Æneas darts his eyes,
Where lofty walls with triple ramparts rise.
There rolls swift Phlegethon, with thund'ring
found,

His broken rocks, and whirls his furies round.
On mighty columns rais'd sublime are hung
The massy gates, impenetrably strong.
In vain would men, in vain would gods essay,
To heave the beams of adamant away.
Here rose an iron tow'r: before the gate,
By night and day, a wakeful fury fate,
The pale Tisiphone; a robe she wore,
With all the pomp of horror, dy'd in gore.
Here the loud scourge and louder voice of pain,
The crashing fetter, and the rattling chain,
Strike the great hero with the frightful sound,
The hoarte, rough, mingled din, that thunders
round:

Oh! whence that peal of groans? what pains are those?

What crimes could merit such stupendous woes?
Thus she—Brave guardian of the Trojan state,
None that are pure must pass that dreadful gate.
When plac'd by Hecat o'er Avernus' woods,
I learnt the secrets of those dire abodes,
With all the tortures of the vengeful gods.
Here Rhadamanthus holds his awful reign,
Hears and condemns the trembling impious train.
Those hidden crimes the wretch till death suppress,
With mingled joy and horror in his breast,
The stern dread judge commands him to display;
And lays the guilty secrets bare to day.
Her lash Tisiphone that moment shakes;
The ghost she scourges with a thousand snakes;
Then to her aid, with many a thund'ring yell,
Calls her dire sisters from the gulfs of hell.

Now the loud portals from their hinges flew,
And all the dreadful scene appears in view.
Behold without what direful monster waits
(Tremendous form!) to guard the gloomy gates!
Within, her bulk more dreadful hydra spreads,
And hissing rears her fifty tow'ring heads.
Full twice as deep, the dungeon of the fiends,
The huge, Tartarean, gloomy gulf descends
Below these regions, as these regions lie
From the bright realms of yon' ethereal sky.
Here roar the Titan race, th' enormous birth;
The ancient offspring of the teeming earth.
Pierc'd by the burning bolts, of old they fell,
And still roll bellowing in the depths of hell.

Here lie th' Alein twins, in length display'd;
Stretch'd as they lie, the giants I survey'd,
Who warr'd to drive the thunderer from above;
And storm'd the skies, and shook the throne of Jove.

The proud Salmoneus, wrapt in chains below,
Raves in eternal agonies of woe;
Who mock'd with empty sounds and mimic rays,
Heav'n's awful thunder and the lightning's blaze;
Th' audacious wretch through Elis tower'd in air,
Whirl'd by four courfers in his rattling car;
A blazing torch he shook; o'er crowds he rode;
And madly claim'd the glories of a god.
O'er hollow vaults he lath'd the steeds along,
And, as they flew, the brazen arches rung.
Vain fool! to mock the bolts of heav'n above,
And those inimitable flames of Jove!
But from the clouds, th' avenging father aims
Far other bolts and undisssembled flames:
Dash'd from his car, the mimic thunder fell,
And in a fiery whirlwind plung'd to hell.

There too th' enormous Tityus I beheld,
Earth's mighty giant son, stretch'd o'er th' infernal field;

He cover'd nine large acres as he lay,
While with fierce screams a vulture tore away
His liver for her food, and scoop'd the smoking
prey;

Plung'd deep her bloody beak, nor plung'd in
vain,

For still the fruitful fibres spring again,
Swell, and renew th' enormous monster's pain,
She dwells for ever in his roomy breast,
Nor gives the roaring fiend a moment's rest;
But still th' immortal prey supplies th' immortal feast.

Need I the Lapiths' horrid pains relate,
Ixion's torments, or Pirithous' fate?
On high a tottering rocky fragment spreads,
Projects in air, and trembles o'er their heads.
Stretch'd on the couch, they see with longing eyes
In regal pomp successive banquets rise,
While lucid columns, glorious to behold,
Support th' imperial canopies of gold.
The queen of Furies, a tremendous guest,
Sits by their side, and guards the tempting feast,
Which if they touch, her dreadful torch she rears,
Flames in their eyes, and thunders in their ears.
They that on earth had base pursuits in view,
Their brethren hated, or their parents flew,
And, still more numerous, they who swell'd their
store,

But ne'er reliev'd their kindred or the poor:
Or in a cause unrighteous fought and bled;
Or perish'd in the foul adulterous bed;
Or broke the ties of faith with dark deceit;
Imprison'd deep, their destin'd torments wait.
But what their torments, seek not thou to know,
Or the dire sentence of their endless woe.
Some roll a stone, rebounding down the hill,
Some hang suspended on the whirling wheel;
There Theseus groans in pains that ne'er expire,
Chain'd down for ever in a chair of fire.
There Phlegyas feels unutterable woe,
And roars incessant through the shades below;
Be just, ye mortals! by these torments aw'd,
These dreadful torment; not to scorn a god.

This wretch his country to a tyrant sold,
 And barter'd glorious liberty for gold,
 Laws for a bribe he past, but past in vain,
 For the same laws a bribe repeal'd again.
 This wretch by hot preposterous lust was led,
 To climb and violate his daughter's bed.
 To some enormous crimes they all aspir'd;
 All feel the torments that those crimes requir'd!
 Had I a hundred mouths, a hundred tongues,
 A voice of brass, and adamantine lungs,
 Not half the mighty scene could I disclose,
 Repeat their crimes, or count their dreadful woes!

Thus spoke the priestess of the god of day;
 And, haste, she cry'd; to hell's great empress pay
 The destin'd present, and pursue thy way }
 For lo! the high Cyclopean walls are near,
 And in full view the massy gates appear.
 On these the gods enjoin thee to bestow
 The sacred offering of the golden bough.
 This said, they journey'd through the solemn gloom,
 And reach'd at length the proud imperial dome:
 With eager speed his course the hero bore,
 With living streams his body sprinkled o'er,
 And fixt the glittering present on the door. }

These rites complete, they reach the flowery plains,

The verdant groves where endless pleasure reigns.
 Here glowing Æther shoots a purple ray,
 And o'er the region pours a double day.
 From sky to sky th' unweary'd splendor runs;
 And nobler planets roll round brighter suns.
 Some wrestle on the sands; and some, in play
 And games heroic, pass the hours away.
 Those raise the song divine, and these advance
 In measur'd steps to form the solemn dance.
 There Orpheus, graceful in his long attire,
 In seven divisions strikes the sounding lyre;
 Across the chords the quivering quill he flings,
 Or with his flying fingers sweeps the strings.
 Here Tæucer's ancient race the prince surveys,
 The race of heroes born in happier days:
 Ilius, Affacus in arms rever'd,
 And Troy's great founder Dardanus appear'd;
 Before him stalk'd the tall majestic train,
 And pitch'd their idle lances on the plain.
 Their arms and airy chariots he beheld;
 The steeds unharnes'd graz'd the flowery field.
 Those pleasing cares the heroes felt, alive;
 For chariots, steeds, and arms, in death survive.
 Some on the verdant plains were stretch'd along;
 Sweet to the ear their tuneful Pæans rung:
 Others beneath a laurel grove were laid,
 And joyful feasted in the fragrant shade.
 Here, glittering through the trees, his eyes survey

The streams of Po descending from the day.
 Here a blest train advance along the meads,
 And snowy wreaths adorn their graceful heads:
 Patriots who perish'd for their country's right,
 Or nobly triumph'd in the field of fight:
 There, holy priests, and sacred poets stood,
 Who sung with all the raptures of a god:
 Worthies, who life by useful arts refin'd,
 With those, who leave a deathless name behind,
 Friends of the world, and fathers of mankind! }

This shining band the priestess thus address'd,
 But chief Mææus, towering o'er the rest;

So high the poet's lofty stature spreads
 Above the train, and overtops their heads!
 Say, happy souls! and thou, blest poet, say,
 Where dwells Anchises, and direct our way?
 For him we took the dire infernal road,
 And stem'd huge Acheron's tremendous flood.
 To whom the bard---Unsettled we remove,
 As pleasure calls from verdant grove to grove,
 Stretch'd on the flowery meads, at ease we lie,
 And hear the silver rills run bubbling by.
 Come then, ascend this point, and hence survey
 By yon descent an open easy way.

He spoke, then stalk'd before; and from the bro
 Points out the fair enamell'd fields below.
 They leave the proud aerial height again,
 And pleas'd bend downward to the blissful plain.

Anchises there, the hero's sire divine,
 Deep in the vale had rang'd his glorious line;
 Rank behind rank, his joyful eyes survey
 The chiefs in bright succession rise to day.
 He counts th' illustrious race with studious care
 Their deeds, their fates, their victories and war:
 Soon as his lov'd Æneas he beheld,
 His dear, dear son, advancing o'er the field;
 Eager he stretch'd his longing arms, and shed
 A stream of tears, and thus with transport said:
 Then has thy long-try'd pious love surpass
 The dreadful road, to meet thy fire at last?
 Oh! is it given to see, nor see alone,
 But hear, and answer to my godlike son?
 This I presag'd, indeed, as late I ran
 O'er times and seasons; or presag'd in vain.
 From what strange lands, what stormy seas as sties

Returns my son, to bless my longing eyes?
 How did my anxious mind your danger move.
 Then, when in Carthage you indulg'd your love
 Your shade, the prince replies, your angry shade
 In many a frightful vision I survey'd.
 By your behest I came to these abodes;
 My fleet lies anchor'd in the Tuscan floods:
 Give me, O father! give thy hand, nor shun
 The dear embraces of a dutiful son.
 While yet he spoke, the tender sorrows rise,
 And the big drops run trickling from his eyes.
 Thrice round his neck his eager arms he threw Thrice from his empty arms the phantom flew,
 Swift as the wind, with momentary flight,
 Swift as a fleeting vision of the night.
 Meantime the hero faw, with wondering eyes,
 Deep in a vale a waving forest rise:
 Through those sequester'd scenes flow Lethe glid
 And in low murmurs lulls her slumbering tides
 Unnumber'd ghosts around the waters throng,
 And o'er the brink the airy nations hung.
 So to the meads in glowing summer pour
 The clustering bees, and rise ev'ry flow'r:
 O'er the sweet lilies hang the busy swarms;
 The fields remurmur to the deep alarms.
 Struck with the sight, the prince astonish'd stood
 Oh! say, why throng such numbers to the flood
 Or what the nature of the wondrous tide,
 And who the crowds?---To whom the sire reply
 To all those souls who round the river wait,
 New mortal bodies are decreed by fate.
 To you dark streams the gliding ghosts repair,
 And quaff deep draughts of long oblivion there.

How have I wish'd before thee to display
 These my descendants, ere they rise to day!
 Thus shalt thou Latium find with double joy,
 Since fate has fixt th' eternal throne of Troy.—
 O father! say, can heavenly souls repair
 Once more to earth, and breathe the vital air?
 What!—can they covet their corporeal chain?
 Gods!—can the wretches long for life again!—
 Attend, he cry'd, while I unfold the whole,
 And clear these wonders that amaze thy soul.
 Then the great fire the scheme before him lays,
 And thus each awful secret he displays:

Know first, a spirit, with an active flame,
 Fills, feeds and animates this mighty frame;
 Runs through the wat'ry worlds, the fields of air, [there
 The pond'rous earth, the depths of heav'n; and Glows in the sun and moon, and burns in every star.

Thus, mingling with the mass, the general soul
 Lives in the parts, and agitates the whole.
 From that celestial energy began

The low-brow'd brute; th' imperial face of man;
 The painted birds who wing th' aerial plain,
 And all the mighty monsters of the main.
 Their souls at first from high Olympus came;
 And, if not blunted by the mortal frame,
 Th' ethereal fires would ever burn the same!

But while on earth; by earth-born passions tost,
 The heavenly spirits lie extinct and lost;
 Nor steal one glance, before their bodies die,
 From those dark dungeons to their native sky.
 Ev'n when those bodies are to death resign'd,
 Some old inherent spots are left behind;

A sullying tincture of corporeal stains
 Deep in the substance of the soul remains.
 Thus are her splendors dimm'd, and crush'd o'er
 With those dark vices, that she knew before.

For this the souls a various penance pay,
 To purge the taint of former crimes away:
 Some in the sweeping breezes are refin'd;
 And hung on high to whiten in the wind;
 Some cleanse their stains beneath the gushing
 streams,

And some rise glorious from the searching flames.
 Thus all must suffer; and, those sufferings past,
 The clouded minds are purify'd at last.
 But when the circling seasons as they roll,
 Have cleans'd the dross long-gather'd round the soul;

When the celestial fire divinely bright,
 Breaks forth victorious in her native light;
 Then we, the chosen few, Elysium gain,
 And here expatiate on the blissful plain.

Both those thin airy throngs thy eyes behold,
 When o'er their heads a thousand years have roll'd,
 In mighty crowds to yon Lethean flood
 Swarm at the potent summons of the god;
 There deep the draught of dark oblivion drain;
 Then they desire new bodies to obtain,
 And visit heav'n's ethereal realms again.

This said, the fire conducts their steps along
 Through the loud tumult of th' aerial throng;
 Then climb'd a point, and every face deserv'd,
 As the huge train press'd forward to the tide:
 Now hear, while I display our race divine,
 And the long glories of our Dardan line,

The noble Roman heroes, who shall rise
 From Trojan blood, successive, to the skies.
 This mighty scene of wonders I relate,
 And open all thy glorious future fate.
 First then behold yon blooming youth appear,
 That hero leaning on his shining spear!
 This thy last son, thy hoary age shall grace,
 Thy first brave offspring of the Latian race;
 From fair Lavinia in the groves he springs,
 A king, and father of a race of kings;
 Sylvius his name; proud Alba shall he sway
 And to his sons th' imperial pow'r convey.
 See! where the youth, already wing'd to rise,
 Stands on the verge of life, and claims the skies.
 Procas the next behold, a chief divine,
 Procas the glory of the Trojan line;
 Capys and Numitor there pant for fame;
 There a new * Sylvius bears thy mighty name;
 Like thee, just, great and good, for valour known,
 The chief shall mount th' imperial Alban throne.
 What strength each youth displays? but who are those

With Civic crowns around their manly brows?
 By those shall Gabii and Nomentum rise,
 And proud Collatian tow'rs invade the skies.
 Then Faunus' town with turrets shall be crown'd,
 And fair Fidena stretch her ramparts round.
 Then Bola too shall rise, of mighty fame;
 Unpeopled now they lie, and lands without a name!

Bright Ila, sprung from Trojan blood, shall bear
 Yon glorious hero to the god of war:
 Behold great Romulus, her victor son;
 Whose sword restores his grandfire to the throne.
 Lo! from his helmet what a glory plays!

And Jove's own splendors round his temples blaze.
 From this brave prince, majestic Rome shall rise;
 The boundless earth, her empire shall comprise;
 Her fame and valour tow'r above the skies!

Seven ample hills th' imperial city grace,
 Who nobly glories in her martial race;
 Proud of her sons, she lifts her head on high;
 Proud, as the mighty mother of the sky,
 When through the Phrygian towns, sublime in air,
 She rides triumphant in her golden car,

Crown'd with a nodding diadem of tow'rs;
 And counts her offspring, the celestial pow'rs,
 A shining train, who fill the blest abode,
 A hundred sons, and ev'ry son a god!
 Turn, turn thine eyes! see here thy race divine,
 Behold thy own imperial Roman line;

Cæsar, with all the Julian name survey;
 See where the glorious ranks ascend to day!—
 This—is this he!—the chief so long foretold
 To bless the land where Saturn rul'd of old,
 And give the Lernean realms a second age of gold!

The promis'd prince, Augustus the divine,
 Of Cæsar's race, and Jove's immortal line!
 This mighty chief his empire shall extend
 O'er Indian realms, to earth's remotest end.
 The hero's rapid victories out-run [the sun!
 The year's whole course, the stars, and journeys of Where, high in air, huge Atlas' shoulders rise,
 Support th' ethereal lights, and prop the rolling skies!
 He comes!—he comes!—proclaim'd by every god!
 Nile hears the shout, and shakes in every flood.

* Sylvius Æneas.

Proud Asia flies before his dire alarms,
 And distant nations tremble at his arms.
 So many realms not great Alcides past,
 Not, when the brazen-footed hind he chas'd,
 O'er Erymanthus' sleeps the boar pursu'd ;
 Or drew the huge Lernean monster's blood.
 Nor Bacchus such a length of regions knew,
 When on his car the god in triumph flew,
 And shook the reins, and urg'd the fiery wheels,
 Whirl'd by swift tygers down the Indian hills.---
 And doubt we yet, by virtuous deeds to rise,
 When fame, when empire is the certain prize ?
 Rise, rise, my son ; thy Latian foes o'ercome !
 Rise, the great founder of majestic Rome !

But who that chief, who crown'd with olive
 stands,

And holds the sacred relics in his hands ?
 I know the pious Roman king from far,
 The silver beard, and venerable hair ;
 Call'd from his little barren field away,
 To pomp of empire and the regal sway.
 Tullus the next succeeds, whose loud alarms
 Shall rouse the slumb'ring sons of Rome to arms.
 Inspir'd by him, the soft-unwarlike train
 Repeat their former triumphs o'er again.
 Lo Ancas there !---the giddy crowd he draws,
 And swells too much with popular applause.
 Now would'st thou Tarquin's haughty race behold,

Or fierce avenging Brutus, brave and bold ?
 See the stern chief stalk awful o'er the plain,
 The glorious chief, who breaks the tyrant's chain :
 He to his axe shall proud rebellion doom,
 The first great consul of his rescu'd Rome !
 His sons (who arm, the Tarquins to maintain,
 And fix oppression in the throne again)
 He nobly yields to justice, in the cause
 Of sacred freedom and insulted laws.
 Though harsh th' unhappy father may appear,
 The judge compels the fire to be severe ;
 And the fair hopes of fame the patriot move,
 To sink the private in the public love.

Like him, Torquatus, for stern justice known,
 Dooms to the axe his brave victorious son.

Behold the Drusi prodigal of blood !
 The Decii dying for their country's good !
 Behold Camillus there ; that chief shall come
 With four proud triumphs to imperial Rome.
 Lo ! in bright arms two spirits rise to fight !
 How strict their friendship in the realms of night !
 How fierce their discord when they spring to
 light !

How furious in the field will both appear !
 With what dire slaughter ! what a waste of war !
 Impetuous to the fight the father pours
 From the steep Alps, and tall Ligurian tow'rs.
 The son, with servile monarchs in his train,
 Leads the whole eastern world, and spreads the plain.

Oh ! check your wrath, my sons ; the nations spare ;
 And save your country from the woes of war ;
 Nor in her sacred breast, with rage abhorrd,
 So fiercely plunge her own victorious sword !
 And thou, be thou the first ; thy arms resign,
 Thou, my great son of Jove's celestial line !---
 Yon chief shall vanquish all the Grecian pow'rs,
 And lay in dust the proud Corinthian tow'rs,

Drive to the capitol his gilded car,
 And grace the triumph with the spoils of war.
 That chief shall stretch fair Argos on the plain,
 And the proud seat of Agamemnon's reign,
 O'ercome th' Æacian king, of race divine,
 Sprung from the great Achilles' glorious line ;
 Avenge Minerva's violated fane,
 And the great spirits of thy fathers slain.
 What tongue, just Cato, can thy praise forbear !
 Or each brave Scipio's noble deeds declare,
 Afric's dread foes ; two thunderbolts of war !
 Who can the bold Fabricius' worth repeat,
 In pride of poverty, divinely great ;
 Call'd by his bleeding country's voice to come
 From the rude plough, and rule imperial Rome !
 Tir'd as I am the glorious roll to trace,
 Where am I snatch'd by the long Fabian race !
 See where the patriot shines, whose prudent care
 Preserves his country by protracted war !---
 The subject nations, with a happier grace,
 From the rude stone mall the mimic face,
 Or with new life inform the breathing bras :
 Shine at the bar, describe the stars on high,
 The motions, laws, and regions of the sky :
 Be this your nobler praise in times to come,
 These your imperial arts, ye sons of Rome !
 O'er distant realms to stretch your awful sway,
 To bid those nations tremble and obey ;
 To crush the proud, the suppliant foe to rear,
 To give mankind a peace, or shake the world with
 war.

He said---awhile their ravish'd eyes admire
 The wondrous scenes :---when thus proceeds the
 fire :

See ! where Marcellus tow'rs above the train,
 And bears the regal trophies from the plain.
 Endanger'd Rome shall bless his guardian care,
 And stand unshaken in a storm of war.
 Carthage and Gaul the hero's might shall prove,
 The third who hangs th' imperial spoils to Jove.
 With him the Trojan prince a youth beheld
 In shining arms advancing o'er the field ;
 A beauteous form ; but clouds his front surround,
 And his dim eyes were fixt upon the ground.
 Say, who that youth (he cries) o'ercast with grief
 The youth who follows that victorious chief ?
 His son ? or one of his illustrious line ?
 What numbers shout around the form divine ?
 His port how noble ! how august his fame !
 How like the former ! and how near the same !
 But gloomy shades his pensive brows o'er'spread,
 And a dark cloud involves his beauteous head.
 Seek not, my son, replies the fire, to know
 (And, as he spoke, the gushing sorrows flow)
 What woes the gods to thy descendants doom,
 What endless grief to every son of Rome !
 This youth on earth the fates but just display,
 And soon, too soon, they snatch the gift away !
 Had Rome for ever held the glorious prize,
 Her bliss had rais'd the envy of the skies !
 Oh ! from the martial field what cries shall come
 What groans shall echo through the streets of Rome !

How shall old Tyber, from his oozy bed,
 In that sad moment rear his reverend head,
 The length'ning pomp and funeral to survey, [way
 When by the mighty tomb he takes his mournful

A youth of nobler hopes shall never rise,
 Nor glad like him the Latian fathers eyes :
 And Rome, proud Rome shall boast, she never bore,
 From age to age, so brave a son before !
 Honour and fame, alas ! and ancient truth,
 Revive and die with that illustrious youth !
 In vain embattled troops his arms oppose :
 In every field he tames his country's foes,
 Whether on foot he marches in his might,
 Or spurs his fiery courser to the fight.
 Poor pitied youth ! the glory of the state !
 Oh ! could'st thou shun the dreadful stroke of fate,
 Rome should in thee behold, with ravish'd eyes,
 Her pride, her darling, her Marcellus rise !
 Bring fragrant flow'rs, the whitest lilies bring,
 With all the purple beauties of the spring ;
 These gifts at least, these honours I'll bestow
 On the dear youth, to please his shade below—
 Thus, while the wondrous scenes employ their sight,
 They rove with pleasure in the fields of light.

When the great fire had taught his son the whole,
 And with the Roman glories fir'd his soul ;
 Next to the list'ning hero he declares
 His toils in Latium, and successive wars ;
 Gives him their nations and their towns to know,
 And how to shun, or suffer every woe.
 Two gates the silent courts of sleep adorn,
 That of pale ivory, this of lucid horn.
 Through this, true visions take their airy way, Through that, false phantoms mount the realms of day.

Then to the ivory gate he led them on,
 And there dismiss'd the Sibyl and his son.
 Now the great chief, returning to the main,
 Reviews his fleet, and glads his friends again.
 Then, steering by the strand, he ploughs the sea,
 And to Cajeta's port directs his way :
 There all the fleet the crooked anchors moor ;
 And the tall ships stood rang'd along the shore.

B O O K VII.

THE ARGUMENT.

King Látinus entertains Æneas, and promises him his only daughter Lavinia, the heiress of his crown. Turnus, who is in love with her, being favoured by her mother, and stirred up by Juno and Alcëto, breaks the treaty which was made ; and engages in his quarrel, Mezentius, Camilla, Messapus, and many others of the neighbouring princes ; whose forces and the names of their commanders are particularly recited.

You too, Cajeta, whose indulgent cares
 Nurs'd the great chief, and form'd his tender
 Expiring here (an ever honour'd name !) [years,
 Adorn Hesperia with immortal fame :
 Thy name survives to please thy pensive ghost ;
 Thy sacred relics grace the Latian coast.
 Soon as her funeral rites the prince had paid,
 And rais'd a tomb in honour of the dead ;
 (The sea subsiding, and the tempests o'er)
 He spreads the flying sails, and leaves the shore.
 When, at the close of night, soft breezes rise,
 The moon in milder glory mounts the skies :
 Safe in her friendly light the navy glides :
 The silver splendors trembling o'er the tides.
 Now by rich Circe's coast they bend their way,
 (Circe, fair daughter of the god of day ;)
 A dangerous shore : the echoing forests rung,
 While at the loom the beauteous goddess sung :
 Bright cedar brands supply her father's rays,
 Perfumè the dome, and round the palace blaze.
 Here wolves with howlings scare the naval train,
 And lions roar reluctant to the chain.
 Here growling bears and swine their ears affright,
 And break the solemn silence of the night.
 These once were men ; but Circe's charms confine,
 In brutal shapes, the human forms divine.
 But Neptune, to secure the pious host
 From these dire monsters, this enchanted coast,
 A friendly breeze to every sail supplies ;
 And o'er the deeps the rapid navy flies.

Now on her car was gay Aurora borne,
 And ocean reddens with the rising morn ;
 The winds lie hush'd ; the swelling surge subsides ;
 And with their bending oars they labour through the tides.

From hence the hero view'd a range of woods ;
 Through the dark scene roll Tyber's glittering
 floods ;

With circling whirlpools urge their winding way,
 And lead their yellow waters to the sea.
 The painted birds, that haunt the golden tide,
 And flutter round the banks on every side ;
 Along the groves in pleasing triumph play,
 And with soft music hail the dawning day,
 Smooth o'er the shaded floods ; at his command,
 The painted gallees glide, and reach the land.

Now goddess ! aid thy poet, while he sings
 The state of Latium, and her ancient kings ;
 Her dark confusions from their birth explores,
 When first the Trojans reach'd th' Hesperian
 Thou, thou, great Erato ! my soul inspire, [shores]
 To sing each furious fight with equal fire.

A mightier work, a nobler scene appears ;
 A long, long series of destructive wars !
 Kings against kings engag'd in dire alarms !
 And all Hesperia rous'd to all the rage of arms !
 Látinus o'er the realm the sway maintain'd ;
 And long in peace the hoary prince had reign'd ;
 From Faunus and a fair Laurentian dame,
 A lovely nymph, the mighty monarch came ;

From Picus, Faunus drew his birth divine ;
From Saturn he, great author of the line. [son.
Fate from this king had snatch'd each blooming
And one bright daughter heir'd the imperial throne.

Fir'd by her matchless charms, the youths repair
From all the realms around, to court the fair ;
Bold Turnus too the royal maid address,
Whose birth and beauty far surpass the rest.
The Latian queen, to gain so brave a son,
Had made the blooming hero's cause her own,
Vain was her aim, for every power divine
Withstood the match, with many a dreadful sign.

Amid the court a laurel rose in air,
Preserv'd for ages with religious care ;
This venerable plant Latinus found,
When first his town with rising towers he crown'd ;
(Which thence deriv'd her name, as records say ;)
Then made it sacred to the god of day.
It chanc'd, a cloud of bees in gathering swarms
Swept through the skies, with murmuring hoarse alarms ;

Pour'd in, and (settling on the topmost bough)
Stretch'd down, dependent deep in air below :
In one black lengthening chain together clung,
Feet clasp'd in feet, the clustering nations hung.
On this exclaims an augur---I explore
A foreign comfort from a distant shore ;
From yon some point a stranger host shall come ;
And here their prince shall reign in this imperial dome.

Yet more ; while chaste Lavinia, at the shrine,
Burns od'rous incense to the powers divine ;
As by her father stood the royal fair,
The fires flew round, and caught her waving hair :
O'er all her rich embroider'd garments roll'd
The wanton flame, and crept through every fold :
Then, crackling, through her crown victorious
The gems run melting in the golden blaze : [plays ;
Around the fair the dancing glories stray'd,
And lambent fires involv'd the lovely maid ;
Then from her beauteous head enlarging grew,
Wide and more wide, and round the palace flew.
From this strange sign, portentous to behold,
Th' astonish'd seer surpris'd truths foretold,
That bright with fame should shine the glorious fair,

But through the nations spread, the flames of war.

Meantime the king, astonish'd at the sign,
Hastes to consult his prescient † fire divine.
In dark Albunea's shades, supreme of woods !
Where from her fountains boil sulphureous floods ;
Thick from her streams the clouds of poison rise,
And, charg'd with heavy vapours, load the skies.
Here, in distress, th' Italian nations come, [doom.
Anxious, to clear their doubts, and learn their
First, on the fleeces of the slaughter'd sheep,
By night the sacred priest dissolves in sleep :
When, in a train, before his slumbering eye,
Thin, airy forms, and wond'rous visions fly.
He calls the pow'rs, who guard th' infernal floods ;
And talks, inspir'd, familiar with the gods.
To this dread oracle the prince withdrew,
And first a hundred sheep the monarch slew ;
Then on their fleeces lay ; and from the wood
He heard distinct these accents of the god :

† FAUNUS:

Seek not a native prince, my son, nor wed
Thy royal daughter to a Latian bed.
A foreign chief appears, of mighty fame,
Whose race to heav'n shall raise our glorious
name ;

O'er either ocean shall their empire run,
Beyond the radiant journeys of the sun.
In every clime their standards are unfurl'd !
And, prostrate at their feet, shall lie the trembling
world !

These answers of the god, reveal'd by night,
The king divulg'd, and fame display'd to light ;
Spread the glad tidings all the nations o'er ;
When now the Trojan navy reach'd the shore.

The hero with his son and chiefs had laid
Their limbs at ease beneath a cooling shade ;
Then, dictated by Jove, the banquet spread
On cakes of flour along the verdant mead ;
The slender cakes the busy Trojans load
With fruits austere, and wildings of the wood :
These scanty viands soon consum'd, the crew,
Compell'd by hunger, on their tables flew ;
Full eager they devour'd, by want distress'd,
The frail supporters of the failing feast.

When with a laugh, Afcanius---we devour
The plates and boards on which we fed before.
Th' auspicious words his fire in rapture took,
And weigh'd what once the oracle had spok'd :

Hail happy realm, which fate so long has ow'd !
All hail, he cry'd, each guardian Trojan god !
My fire, when fair Elysiu'm blest my eyes,
Did thus disclose the secrets of the skies :

" When prest by raging famine, you devour
" Your boards, impatient, on a foreign shore ;
" There thy long labours shall with peace be crown'd ; [round."
" There build thy town, and raise the ramparts
This is the famine that the fates foreshow,
And this the place to terminate our woe.
Then bend we from the port, at dawn of day,
Our eager steps, and strike a different way,
To view the land, the cities to explore,
And know what nations hold the fated shore.
Now place again the goblets on the board ;
Be great Anchises honour'd and ador'd,
And pour the wine to heav'n's almighty lord.

Then, while the verdant boughs his temples
The prince ador'd the Genius of the place ; [grace,
The Nymphs, and unknown pow'rs that rule the
floods,

And sacred Earth, great source of all the gods ;
And awful night ; with her the stars that rise,
To gild her face, and beautify the skies ;
And Jove, the guardian god of Troy, implores,
And the great mother of th' ethereal pow'rs ;
His mighty parents last, with honours crown'd
In heav'n above, and Erebus profound.

The hero's vows th' almighty heard from high,
And thrice he thunder'd from an azure sky ;
And shook, majestic as the thunders roll'd,
A fiery cloud, that blaz'd with beams of gold.

Now thro' the Trojan host the news had flown
The day was come to raise their promis'd town ;
All, warm'd with transport at the happy sign,
Indulge the feast, and quaff the generous wine.

Soon as the morning shot a purple ray,
And tipp'd the mountains with the beams of day,

By different ways the busy train explore
The bounds, the cities, and the winding shore.
Here dwell the Latian line; there Tyber flows;
And here thy sacred stream, Numicus, rofe.

Now sent the Trojan prince (a peace to gain)
A hundred youths selected from the train,
With presents for the king. Without delay,
All crown'd with olives took their speedy way.
Meantime the chief design'd th' allotted ground
For the new town, and drew the trench around:
High tow'rs and ramparts all the place enclōse;
And, like a camp, the sudden city rofe.

Now the commission'd youths proceed with
And spy the lofty Latian spires at laſt. [haſte,
Before the gate, the blooming active train
Or break the fiery courſer to the rein,
Or whirl the chariot o'er the duſty plain;
Or bend the bow, or toſs the whizzing ſpear,
Or urge the race, or wage the mimic war.
When lo! a meſſenger, diſpatch'd with ſpeed,
Spurs to the Latian court his panting ſteed,
And told the monarch what illuſtrious gueſts
Arriv'd from foreign lands in foreign veſts.
The monarch ſummon'd all the train, and ſhone,
In ſtate majeſtic on the regal throne.

High o'er the town, ſurrounded by a wood,
Old Picus' venerable palace ſtood,——
Auguſt and awful! proudly roſe, around,
A hundred columns, and the ſtructure crown'd.
Here kings receiv'd the types of royal pow'r,
The crown and ſceptre, and the robes they wore.

This was their temple; this their court of ſtate,
Here at the ſacred feaſts the fathers ſate;
And in long orders, as their thrones they fill'd,
On offer'd rams their annual banquets held.
Before the gates a venerable band,
In cedar carv'd, the Latian monarchs ſtand.
Sabinus there, who preſt the foaming wine,
Extend the hook that prun'd the generous vine;
The front old Italus and Saturn grace,
And hoary Janus with his double face;
And many an ancient monarch, proud to hear
In their dear country's cauſe the wounds of war.
Hung on the pillars, all around appears
A row of trophies, helmets, ſhields, and ſpears,
And ſolid bars, and axes keenly bright,
And naval beaks, and chariots ſeiz'd in fight.

With his divining wand in ſolemn ſtate,
With robes ſuccinct the royal Picus ſate.
Fierce in his car of old he ſwept the field;
And ſtill the hero graſps the ſhining ſhield.
Him beauteous Circe lov'd, but lov'd in vain;
Th' enchantreſs' dame, rejected with diſdain,
Transform'd the hapleſs monarch, in deſpair,
Chang'd to a painted bird, and ſent to ſit in air.

Thus ſat the ſov'reign in the pompous ſeat,
And gave admiffion to the Dardan train.
Then to th' illuſtrious ſtrangers, from the throne,
The prince with mild benevolence begun.
Say, noble Trojans, for we knew your name
An ancient race, before your navy came;
What cauſe your fleet to Latium could convey,
What call, through ſuch a length of wat'ry way?
Or were your gallees wide in ocean loſt?
Or driv'n by tempeſts on th' Heſperian coaſt?
Such dangers oft befall the train who ride
O'er the wild deeps, and ſtem the furious tide.

Vouchſafe to be our gueſts, and Latium grace;
For know, our generous hoſpitable race,
By Saturn form'd, from him their manners draw,
Juſt without ties, and good without a law.
From old Aurruntian ſages once our ears
Have heard a tale, tho' ſunk in length of years;
Theſe realms the birth of Dardanus could boaſt,
Who fail'd from hence, and reach'd your Phrygian coaſt.

He left the Tuſcan realms, and now on high
Dwells in the ſtarry manſions of the ſky:
Call'd from this nether world to heav'n's abodes,——
He reigns above, a god among the gods!

O prince divine! great Faunus' glorious ſon;
(Thus, to the king Ilioneus begun);
Nor ſtars miſled our fleets, nor tempeſts toſt,
Nor wide we wander'd to the Latian coaſt,
But our determin'd courſe, ſpontaneous bore,
With one next purpoſe, to this friendly ſhore;
Driv'n from the nobleſt empire o'er the ſeas,
That the bright ſun in all his race ſurveyſ.
We and our prince derive our birth divine
From Jove, the ſource of our ethereal line;
And at the godlike chief's command we come,
His ſuppliant envoys to this regal dome.
Thoſe, who beyond the bounds of ocean hurl'd,
Poſſeſs that wild unhoſpitable world;
And thoſe who glow beneath the burning zone,
Beneath the fiery chariot of the ſun,
Have heard, and heard with terror from afar,
What a dire deluge, what a ſtorm of war,
With ruin charg'd, and furious to deſtroy, [Troy;
From Greece burſt thund'ring o'er the realms of
When Europe ſhook proud Aſia with alarms,
And fate fet two contending worlds in arms.
Snatch'd from that ſtorm, to roll around the floods,
We beg ſome place, to fix our wand'ring gods;
Some vacant region, you with eaſe can ſpare;
The common uſe of water, earth, and air.
Nor ſhall this new alliance bring diſgrace,
But add new glories to th' Italian race:
Nor Latium ſhall repent the kind ſupply,
Nor ſhall the dear remembrance ever die.
Now by our potent glorious prince I ſwear,
As true in peace as dreadful in the war;
Though now as ſuppliants at thy throne we
ſtand,

With humble pray'rs and olives in our hand,
Yet many nations, prince, invite our train,
And our alliance court, but court in vain.
For know, the gods, the mighty gods command
The ſons of Troy to ſeek the Latian land.
To Tyber's flood great Phœbus urg'd our way,
Where ſpring Numicus' ſacred ſtreams to day;
Here Dardanus was born, of heav'nly ſtrain;
Hence firſt he came, and now returns again.
Yet more— theſe preſents from the Trojan king,
Theſe relics of his former ſtate we bring,
Snatch'd from devouring flames—his fire, of old,
Pour'd due libations from this bowl of gold:
In theſe rich robes the royal Priam ſhroue,
And gave the law, majeſtic, from the throne:
This crown, this ſceptre, did the monarch wear;
Theſe veſts were labour'd by the Trojan fair.

He ceas'd— the ſov'reign paus'd in thought pro-
found,
And fixt his eyes unmov'd upon the ground.

His daughter's fortunes all his mind employ,
 And future empire, not the gifts from Troy.
 Deep in his mind the prophecy he roll'd,
 And deem'd this chief, the son the gods foretold,
 The mighty hero long foredoom'd by fate
 To share the glories of the regal state;—
 From whom a race, victorious by their swords,
 Should rise in time, the world's majestic lords:
 Then joyful spoke: May heav'n our counsels bless,
 And its own omens, with the wish'd success!
 Well pleas'd, my friends, your presents I receive,
 And free admision in my kingdoms give;
 Nor shall you want, while I the throne enjoy,
 A land as fruitful as the fields of Troy.
 But let your godlike prince, if he request
 Our royal friendship, be our honour'd guest;
 The peace he asks in person he may bring:
 Go then—report this message to your king—
 A beauteous daughter in her bloom is mine,
 Forbid to wed in our Ausonian line:
 This all our native oracles deny,
 And every dreadful omen of the sky;
 From foreign shores, a foreign son appears,
 Whose race shall lift our glory to the stars.
 Your prince, the destin'd chief the Fates require,
 Our thoughts divine, and we, my friends, desire.

He said, and order'd steeds, to mount the band;
 In lofty stalls three hundred coursers stand,
 Their shining sides with crimson cover'd o'er;
 The sprightly steeds embroider'd trappings wore,
 With golden chains, resurgent to behold:
 Gold were the bridles, and they champ'd on gold.
 But to their prince he sent a glorious car,
 With two distinguish'd coursers for the war;
 Fierce as they flew, their nostrils breath'd a fire;
 These Circe stole from her celestial fire,
 By mortal mares on earth, who, all unknown,
 Mixt with the flaming coursers of the sun.
 Pleas'd with the monarch's gift, their steeds they press,

And to their anxious lord return with peace.

But Jove's imperial queen, from Argos far,
 Rides on the whirlwinds through the fields of air.
 From proud Pachynus' point, her eyes explore
 The Trojan prince, and all his fleet on shore.
 The bulwarks rise, the troops possess the strand,
 Desert the ships, and pour upon the land;
 She stood in anguish fixt, and shook her head,
 Then, fir'd with rage, the wrathful goddess said:

Curst race;—a race I labour to destroy!—
 But Juno sinks beneath the fates of Troy!
 Did not the captives break the victor's chain?
 Did not her slaughter'd sons revive again?
 Did they not force, when Troy in ashes lay,
 Through fires and armies their victorious way?
 What—heav'n's great empress flags, by toils op-
 Or sure, her glutted vengeance lies at rest! [press!
 And yet I dar'd pursue the banish'd train Through the last bounds of Neptune's wat'ry reign, [high,

With rocks, with gulfs, with thunders from on
 With all the storms of ocean and the sky.
 In vain with storms I rous'd the roaring main;
 Earth, skies, and oceans wag'd my war in vain,
 In vain dire Scylla thunder'd o'er the sea;
 Nor could the vast Charybdis bar the way.
 For lo! in Tyber's flood their navies ride,
 Mock my revenge, and triumph o'er the tide.

And yet the god of battles could efface
 For one neglect, the Lapithæan race,
 For one neglect, did Jove himself resign
 To Dian's wrath the Caledonian line.
 But I, the queen supreme of gods above,
 The mighty consort of imperial Jove,
 In vain for years one nation have pursu'd;
 Nay, by one single mortal am subdu'd!
 Yet, though my pow'rs are baffled, will I try
 Whatever pow'rs in nature's circle lie.
 What! though the partial heav'n's my aims repel,
 I'll raise new forces from the depths of hell!
 What!—if the Trojan must in Latium reign!
 What!—if the Fates a regal bride ordain!
 Yet, may I still the nuptial rite delay,
 And by a length of wars defer the day.
 Yet, shall the people bleed! the kings shall reign,
 The lonely monarchs of an empty plain!
 Yet shall the father and the son make good
 Their league of friendship, in their subjects
 In the mixt blood of nations shall be paid, [blood;
 At large, thy dreadful dow'r, imperial maid!
 Wed then—with every fatal omen wed:
 Bellona waits thee to the bridal bed,
 The queen of love, like Priam's royal dame,
 For Ilium has conceiv'd a second flame.
 A Paris, sprung from Venus, shall destroy
 Once more with fatal fires the tow'rs of Troy.
 This said, to earth th' impetuous goddess flies,
 Inflam'd with rage and vengeance, from the skies
 Looks down, and, bending o'er the baleful cell,
 Calls dire Alecto from the realms of hell.
 Crimes, frauds and murders are the fiend's delight,
 The rage of death, and slaughters of the fight.
 So fierce her looks! such terrors from her eyes!
 Round her grim front such monstrous serpents rise!
 She scares ev'n Pluto, her immortal sire;
 Her sister Furies tremble and retire. [train;
 Then heav'n's great queen, against the Trojan
 Inflam'd her native rage, and thus began:

Daughter of night! thy potent aid I claim
 To guard my honour, and support my fame.
 Oh! let not Troy her pow'rs to Latium bring,
 Nor with this match amuse her easy king.
 'Tis thine, the peace of brethren to confound,
 To arm their hands, and spread destruction round;
 Through kindling houses, tow'ns and realms to bear
 The torch of discord, and the flames of war.
 To thee a thousand noxious arts are known,
 And every form of mischief is thy own.
 Rouse, rouse the fury in thy soul! excite
 The chiefs, and kindle all the rage of fight!
 Dissolve the peace; and fir'd by dire alarms,
 Bid the mad nations rush to blood and arms! [eyes
 Scarce had she spoke, when sudden from her
 Smear'd with Gorgonean blood, the fury flies
 Sublime; and tow'ring o'er the palace foars;
 Then stands unseen before Amata's doors;
 While grief and wrath the raging queen employ,
 For Turnus, injur'd by the match with Troy,
 Here stoop the fiend; and, discord all her view, Snatch'd from her hissing locks, a snake she threw; [flew.
 And through her inmost soul the fiery serpent
 Unfelt, the monster glides through every vein,
 And breathes the secret poison in her breast.
 Now like a fillet, round her temples roll'd,
 Now round her bosom, like a chain of gold,

Now to her tresses he repairs, and there
 Thrills every ringlet of her golden hair.
 Thus while her kindling soul the pest inspires
 With the first sparkles of her fatal fires,
 Before the bosom of the royal dame
 Felt the full furies of th' infernal flame,
 She speaks her grief, in accents soft and mild,
 Implores the fire, and sorrows o'er her child :
 And must Lavinia then, our only joy,
 Wed with this wand'ring fugitive of Troy ?
 And can a father issue the decree,
 So fatal to himself, to her and me ?
 For sure the pirate soon will bear away
 With the first rising wind the lovely prey.
 Such, such a guest of old, the Phrygian boy
 Bore ravish'd Helen to the tow'rs of Troy. [now ?
 Where, where is friendship, truth and honour
 A father's promise, and a monarch's vow !
 If thy great fire's commands have fixt thy mind,
 To choose some hero of a foreign kind :
 Then every kind, my lord, and every land
 Are foreign, that are free from our command :
 And if we trace brave Turnus' blood, he springs
 From a long line of ancient Argive kings.

Thus urg'd the mother, in a mournful strain,
 Her loud complaints, yet urg'd them all in vain.
 But now the spreading poison, fir'd her whole,
 Ev'n to the last recesses of her soul.
 In her wild thoughts a thousand horrors rise ;
 And fierce, and madd'ning round the streets she flies.
 So the gay striplings lash in eager sport
 A top, in giddy circles, round a court.
 In rapid rings it whirls, and spins aloud,
 Admir'd with rapture by the blooming crowd ;
 From every stroke, flies humming o'er the ground,
 And gains new spirit, as the blows go round.

Thus flew the giddy queen, with fury stung,
 Through the wide town, amid the wond'ring throng.
 Yet more ; --- the destin'd nuptials to delay,
 Pierce to the darksome wood she bounds away ;
 And, rising still in rage, with rites divine
 She feign'd new orgies to the god of wine.
 Thou, Bacchus, only thou, deserv'st the fair !
 For thee in ringlets grows her lovely hair !
 For thee she leads the dance, and wreaths her ivy spear.

Now spread around the wild infectious flames ;
 With the same fury glow the Latian dames ;
 Let loose their flying tresses in the wind,
 Rush to the woods, and leave the town behind ;
 To's high their ivy-spears ; while clamours rise,
 And trembling shrieks, tumultuous rend the skies.
 The madding queen, with rage superior stung,
 Rear'd high a flaming pine, amid the throng,
 And for young Turnus rais'd the nuptial song. }
 Then rolls her fiery eyes, and loud exclaims :
 Hear, all ye matrons ! hear ye Latian dames !
 If yet a mother's woes your souls can move,
 If yet your injur'd princel's shares your love ;
 Like me, unbind your tresses ; rove abroad ;
 And hold these sacred orgies to the god.

Thus the fierce fiend Amata's breast invades,
 And drives her raving to the sylvan shades.
 When all the monarch's palace she survey'd,
 With all his counsels in confusion laid ;
 As wide around the rising Fury grew,
 On dusky wings to Ardea swift she flew :

Ardea, by Danaë built in days of yore, {shore ;
 When with her Argive train she sought the }
 But now her perish'd ruins are no more !
 Where o'er the rest brave Turnus' mansion rose,
 She found the hero sunk in soft repose ;
 And first, her dread infernal form to hide,
 Laid the grim terrors of her front aside :
 With silver hairs her temples were o'erspread,
 And wreaths and verdant olives crown'd her head.
 Her wither'd face with wrinkles was embost,
 And in the woman all the fiend was lost.

She now appear'd a venerable dame,
 And to the couch like Juno's priestess came :
 Then are thy labours vain, (she thus begun)
 And shall a Trojan seize thy rightful throne ?
 The king denies the crown he long has ow'd,
 Denies the fair thy labours bought with blood.
 Go---save his kingdom ; fight the Tuscan train !---
 Go, prince, and conquer, to be scorn'd again !
 Hear then by me the mandate from on high
 Sent by the mighty empress of the sky :
 Fly, fly ; the valiant youth for arms prepare ;
 And through the opening gates let loose the war.
 Lo ! where in Tyber ride the fleets of Troy ;
 Go then, their chiefs and painted ships destroy ;
 So Heav'n commands---and, if the Latian lord
 Detain the fair, regardless of his word,
 Let him in blood thy vengeful sword deplore,
 The sword that conquer'd in his cause before.

Thus the dissembled dame---with scornful pride,
 In haughty terms the martial youth reply'd :

The tidings you convey, I knew before ;
 The Trojan fleet is landed on the shore.
 Hence---nor with idle tales my bosom move ;
 I live secure in Juno's guardian love.
 But, worn with years, you dote with vain alarms,
 And, when you nod, you dream of kings in arms.
 Go, mother, go---and make your gods your care,
 But leave to men the province of the war.

While yet he spoke, her looks the youth con-
 found,

And the black fiend in all her terrors frown'd.
 Aghast, he shook, and trembled with a fright,
 While all her native horrors blast his sight.
 Such a tremendous front the Fury spread,
 So dreadful hit the serpents round her head ;
 So grim a figure now she seem'd to rise ;
 That hell, all hell was open'd in her eyes ! [ply'd,

Then, ere the fault'ring trembling youth re-
 She roll'd their fiery orbs from side to side ; [shook Snatch'd two black serpents from her locks, and
 The sounding scourge, and thund'ring thus she spoke :

Behold, behold the wretch, by vain alarms
 And age, reduc'd to dream of kings in arms !
 A fury from the deeps of hell, I bear,
 In these dread hands, destruction, death and war !

With that a flaming torch the goddess threw ;
 Deep through his breast the fiery weapon flew.
 Strait rous'd the startled warrior ; and a stream
 Of sweat ran copious down from every limb.
 Though through the wide dome he raves with mad
 He runs, he flies, he calls aloud to arms ; [alarms,
 Fell wrath and vengeance in his eyes appear,
 The thirst of slaughter, and the rage of war.
 So when in parting spires the flame divides,
 And crackling climbs along the cauldron's sides,
 In the deep womb glow fierce the hissing streams,
 Boil, swell and foam, and bubble o'er the brims ;

Till high in air the fuming liquids rise;
 And in a length of vapours mount the skies.
 He sends to great Latinus, to declare
 The peace polluted, and denounce the war :
 To arms he cries,—this moment will we go
 To guard our country, and repel the foe.
 Himself, he boasts, will all the war maintain,
 And fight the Trojan and Aulonian train.
 His troops take fire, and (heaven invoc'd in pray'r)
 With eager rage they gather to the war :
 Some by his beauty mov'd, his cause embrace,
 Some by his valiant deeds, and regal race.

While thus his social train the prince inspires,
 Swift to the Trojan host the fiend retires.
 Big with new mischiefs to the place the came,
 Where young Iulus hunts the savage game—
 A stag he chas'd; the chase the Fury sees,
 And bids the scent grow warm in every breeze ;
 His opening hounds, exulting, swoot away,
 And bear impatient on the panting prey :
 From this light cause she rais'd the first alarms,
 And fir'd the brutal swains to blood and arms.—
 Snatch'd from the dam, by Tyrrheus' children
 rear'd,

(Tyrrheus, chief master of the royal herd)
 With care domestic had this stag been bred ;
 Of beauteous shape; and antlers grac'd his head.
 The beast became their sister's darling care ;
 His horns were dress'd with garlands by the fair.
 Fed from the board, accusom'd to command,
 The fawn familiar lick'd her stroking hand.
 Full oft the bath'd him in the limpid tide,
 And fondly curious comb'd his silken hide :
 All day amid the forests would he roam,
 But came each evening to his wonted home.
 Alcanius' bounds had rous'd the trembling prey,
 As down the gentle flood he took his way,
 And on the cooling bank in length luxuriant lay. }
 The youthful hero fir'd with love of fame,
 Directs a feather'd arrow at the game ;
 The feather'd arrow flew; the Fury guides
 The pointed weapon through the wanton's sides.
 Pierc'd with the dart, the bleeding fawn in vain
 Flies back for refuge to his home again ;
 Complains with human tears, and human sighs,
 And begs for aid with unavailing cries.
 The beauteous Sylvia heard his moving strains,
 Beat her white bosom, and alarm'd the swains.
 Inspir'd with sudden rage they wing their way,
 For in the wood the lurking Fury lay.
 Some arm'd with knotted clubs, impetuous came,
 And some with staves well-season'd in the flame.
 With stones or brands the peasants throng from far,
 And every sudden weapon, to the war.
 Tyrrheus, who clove a tree with many a stroke,
 Left the huge wedge within the gaping oak ;
 Then seiz'd the pond'rous axe with loud alarms,
 And call'd the rustics all around to arms.
 Meantime the Fury from her stand descends
 The growing discord every moment rise ;
 Ascends the roof, and, from the lofty height,
 Calls in the boist'rous peasants to the fight :
 With her full force her mighty horn the winds ;
 Th' infernal strain alarms the gathering hinds.
 The dreadful summons the deep forests took ;
 The woods all thunder'd, and the mountains
 shook.

The lake of Trivia heard the note profound,
 The Veline fountains trembled at the sound.
 The thick sulphureous floods of hoary Nar
 Shook at the blast that blew the flames of war :
 Pale at the piercing call, the mothers prest
 With shrieks their starting infants to the breast.
 Thus the mad rustics caught the dire alarms,
 And at the horrid signal flew to arms.
 Nor less, in succour of the princely boy,
 Pour forth to battle all the troops of Troy : [tain
 Clubs, staves and brands, at first the fight main
 But now embody'd armies spread the plain,
 And deadly swords and shining bucklers wield ;
 And groves of spears gleam dreadful o'er the field.
 On brazen arms the sun refulgent plays,
 And to the skies the fiery helmets blaze.
 So when the wind has stir'd the gentle seas,
 The waves just swell, and whiten by degrees ;
 Till all the heaving wat'ry worlds arise,
 In one vast burst of thunder to the skies.

First Almon, Tyrrheus' eldest hope, was slain
 Fierce as he fought, the foremost on the plain.
 Beneath his throat the arrow found its way ;
 And chok'd in blood, the beauteous warrior lay
 Now heaps on heaps fall thick on every side,
 And in the cloud of fight Galeus dy'd ;
 Good old Galeus ! while with earnest care,
 He labour'd to prevent the rising war :
 The sage for justice bore the foremost place,
 Though far the wealthiest of the Latian race :
 Five flocks, five bellowing droves, his pastu held,

And with a hundred teams he turn'd the spacie
 Thus, while on either side, the martial train
 With mutual slaughter bath'd the purple plain
 When the stern Fury, from her promise freed,
 Beheld with joy the growing battle bleed ;
 She leaves th' Hesperian shores, she mounts t
 skies,

And in proud triumph thus to Juno cries :
 Behold my promise, mighty queen ! made good
 The Trojan sword has drawn the Latian blood.
 War, boundless war, runs raging round the plain
 Nor can yourself command the peace again ;
 Speak but you will, I'll spread the dire alarm,
 And bid the bord'ring towns and countries arm
 Both sides to aid, the nations shall repair ;
 Wide round, the rising discord will I bear,
 And rouse in every breast the furies of the war.

Enough, replies the queen, enough is done,
 The war stands fixt ; the slaughters are begun.
 They fly to war ; their arms with blood daint
 Death, rage, and terror, range the purple plain
 Such are the nuptial rites, that we prepare
 For Latium's king, and Venus' worthy heir !
 But go—this moment leave the realms above ;
 Go—nor offend the sacred eyes of Jove.
 To thy unhallow'd feet the fire denies
 Th' ethereal walks, and freedom of the skies.
 Retire to hell ! if aught remains undone,
 Ourselves shall finish what thy toils begun.

Swift as the goddess spoke, the Fury springs
 With rapid speed, and spreads her dusky wings
 Her serpents hissing all around, she flies
 To hell's dark realms, impetuous, from the skies
 Amid fair Italy, renown'd by fame,
 Lies a deep vale, Amfautus is the name.

Her gloomy fides are shaded with a grove ;
 And a huge range of mountains tow'rs above ;
 Fierce through the dusky vale the torrents pour,
 And o'er the rattling stones the whirlpools roar.
 There the black jaws of hell are open'd wide ;
 There rolls dire Acheron his fiery tide ;
 There lies the dark infernal cave, and there
 Grim Pluto breathes the soft ethereal air.
 Down through this dreadful opening, from on
 high,

The fiend plung'd headlong, and reliev'd the sky.

Meantime the queen of heav'n exerts her care,
 With her last hand to crown the growing war.
 In one vast tide the loud tumultuous swains
 Pour to the city, and desert the plains.
 Young Almon's corse they bear in open sight,
 And old Galeus slaughter'd in the fight ;
 Implore the gods with vows, and beg in vain
 The hoary monarch to revenge the slain.
 While the fierce Daunian lords complaints conspire,

To spread the gath'ring fears of sword and fire.

Turnus, he cries, is banish'd with disgrace,
 And wrong'd in favour of a foreign race.
 The king prefers a Trojan for his son ;
 A Trojan prince already fills the throne !
 Those too, whose mothers by the queen were led,
 When, fir'd by Bacchus, to the woods the fled,
 (Such was her interest in the realm) declare
 For open arms, and breathe revenge and war.
 War is the fatal universal cry,

Against all omens of the angry sky !—
 Furious they crowd their sovereign's regal door,
 And, madding, round the rich pavilions roar ;
 Besiege their king, as waves a rock, in vain,
 Some mighty rock, amidst the rolling main ;
 That hears unmov'd the sounding tempests blow,
 That fees the furious furies foam below ;
 And o'er the deeps, majestic to the fight,
 Stands fixt, and glories in its matchless height.
 Proud of its bulk ; while storms and working
 tides

Fly, dash and break against the tow'ring fides !

When long the prince had labour'd to retain
 The rising madness of their souls in vain,
 And saw the crowd no counsel would obey,
 But rush'd to arms as Juno led the way ;
 The mournful fire obefts the gods and skies ;
 And lo ! we yield to fate, the monarch cries.
 The storm impetuous bears us down the flood—
 But heav'n, heav'n claims your sacrilegious blood !
 Thou too, rash Turnus, shalt thy part sustain,
 And late, too late, implore the gods in vain !
 Safe to the port am I already come,
 And all your king can lose, is but a tomb !
 Then pensive he retir'd, and left to fate
 The reins of empire, and the cares of state.

A solemn custom in Hesperia reign'd,
 Which long the potent Alban lords maintain'd,
 And Rome still holds, when terrible in night,
 The world's great empress fends her sons to fight.
 Whether the chain for Dacia they prepare,
 Or wage th' Hyrcanian, or Arabian war,
 Or their victorious arms on India turn,
 And spread her eagles to the rising morn ;
 Or urge proud Parthia's long-expected doom,
 And bring in pomp our ravish'd ensigns home.—

Two massy solid gates have ever stood,
 For ages sacred to the * Thracian god.
 Old, double Janus guards the dreadful doors ;
 Grim war within, his mighty captive, roars.
 On many a pond'rous hinge the gates are hung ;
 With brazen bars impenetrably strong,
 Soon as the fathers of the state proclaim,
 The fight must vindicate the Roman fame ;
 Strait, at their high decree, the consul, drest
 In the rich sacred robe and Gabine vest,
 While the loud trumpets found a martial strain,
 (In pomp attended by the valiant train,) [far
 Th'rows wide the gates ; and through the nations
 Lets loose the boundless furies of the war.
 So now the madding Latian crowds implore
 Their monarch, to unfold the sacred door.
 But from the fatal office he withdrew,
 Abhor'd the province, and retir'd from view.
 Then heav'n's dread empress, while the prince delay'd,

Shot down, and both the burffing gates display'd :
 The bolts fly back, with every brazen bar ;
 And, like a storm, broke forth th' imprison'd war.*

Till now unmov'd by discord and alarms,
 Ausonia burns, and calls her sons to arms.
 Some to the furious fight on foot proceed
 Some vault impetuous on the bounding steed,
 Some whet the blunted pole-axe for the field,
 Brighten the spear and long-neglected shield ;
 With transport hear the trumpet's clangors rise,
 And view the banners streaming in the skies.
 Ardea, proud Tybur, Crustumium's pow'rs,
 Atina strong, and high Antemnæ's tow'rs,
 Five potent cities, all their sons employ,
 To forge new arms against the troops of Troy.
 For greaves the ductile silver they extend,
 And for the shield the pliant fallow bend :
 The guttleless arms the rural trade affords, Scythes, plough-shares, hooks, are streighten'd into swords.

And in the glowing forges they restore
 The blunted faulchions which their fathers wore.
 And now the sprightly trumpets found from far ;
 The world flies round ; the signal of the war.
 Some snatch the polish'd helm with eager speed ;
 Some to the yoke compel the snorting steed.
 Brace on the golden cuirafs, seize the shield ;
 And, with the glitt'ring sword, rush furious to the field.

Ye maies ! now unlock your sacred spring ;
 Inspire your bard, and teach him how to sing
 What mighty heroes led the martial train,
 And what embattled armies spread the plain :
 The Latian chiefs, ye goddesses ! declare,
 And the dire progress of the wasteful war ;
 You know, and can record the pow'rs who came,
 Which we learn only from the voice of fame.
 Mezentius first, who scorn'd th' immortal pow'rs,
 Conducts his armies from the Tuscan shores.
 Him follow'd Lausus, flush'd with youthful fire,
 A son, whose shining virtues might require
 A happier throne, and far a better fire !
 He tam'd the steed, and urg'd the generous chase,
 And none but Turnus match'd his blooming face :
 He led from fair Agylla to the plain
 A thousand warriors, but he led in vain !

* Mars.

Great Aventinus, great Alcides' son,
Wore the proud trophy that his father won :
A hundred serpents round his buckler roll'd,
And Hydra hiss'd from all her heads, in gold.
Fresh wreaths of palm his lofty chariot crown'd,
And fierce he lash'd his fiery couriers round.
When great Alcides from Geryon slain
Return'd triumphant to the Latian plain ;
And the brave victor, safe in these abodes,
Cool'd his Hesperian herds in Tyber's floods ;
He won in shades the beauteous Rhea's grace,
And this bold hero crown'd his strong embrace,
Born in mount Aventine's sequester'd wood ;
The mortal mother mingling with the god.

His valiant troops long Sabine javelins bear,
And arm'd with steely piles, provoke the war.
He stalk'd before his host ; and wide dispread,
A lion's teeth grinn'd horrid o'er his head :
Then fought the palace in this strange attire,
And look'd as stern and dreadful as his fire.

From Tibur, Coras and Catillus came,
Tibur, the town that took their brother's name.
Brave youths ! who led the martial Argive train,
And rush'd to the foremost to th' embattled plain.
So two fierce centaurs of the cloud-born race,
Rush furious down the frozen hills of Thrace ;
The groves give way, the crackling woods refound,
And trampled forests spread their ruins wide a-
round.

Next mighty Cæculus to battle flies,
Who bade the tow'rs of proud Præneste rise ;
Found on the hearth, amid the glowing fire ;
The nations deem'd great Mulciber his fire.
A host of warriors to the field he led,
The hardy swains that fair Præneste bred,
Or Gabii sent where Juno's temple rose ;
The troops who dwell where chilling Anio flows.
With those who drink old Amalenus' stream,
Or from the walls of rich Anagnia came.
Not all with arms are furnish'd for the war,
Nor grasp the shield, nor whirl the rapid car ;
But most from slings a storm of bullets throw ;
And leaden deaths destroy the distant foe.
Some in their hands two pointed javelins bore,
And spoils of wolves for glitt'ring helmets wore ;
The left foot bare, they boldly rush to fight,
But a tough hide, unseason'd, sheaths the right.

Next Neptune's son, the brave Messapus came,
Exempt from steel, and sacred from the flame.
To long neglected wars he fir'd his train,
And urg'd his troops to shine in arms again.
From the Flavianian and Fescennian coast
At his command advance th' embody'd host :
With the Faliscan band, who purest justice boast. }
Those who on high Soracte's tow'rs reside,
Or dwell by Ciminius' expanded tide,
Or o'er the rough aspiring mountain rove,
Or haunt divine Feronia's shady grove :
All march, embattled in array, and sing
The martial glories of their godlike king.
So from the fishy floods, a snowy train
Of swans embody'd wing th' aerial plain ;
Stretch their long necks o'er Aius' crystal spring,
And the responsive shores and echoing waters ring.

Not one, who heard the loud confus'd alarms,
Had thought this noisy train a host in arms,

But some huge cloud of clamorous fowls, who soar
Among the cliffs, and scream around the shore.

Lo ! next brave Clausus leads his troops along ;
From the old Sabine race the warrior sprung ;
With a vast host, a shot himself, he came,
The first great father of the Claudian name ;
That spread through Latium, when, the line to
grace,

Rome shar'd her empire with the Sabine race.
The ancient Cures march at his commands,
And a large force from Amiterian lands,
With those who dwell where full Velinus runs,
Or where Nomentum boasts her martial sons,
Or old Eretum stretch'd her utmost bound,
And rich Mutufa smiles, with olives crown'd ;
Or where steep Tetrica's rough rocks arise,
Or proud Severus tow'rs amid the skies.
Where, with fair Foruli Casperia stands,
And clear Himella floats the fruitful lands,
Where gentle Fabaris serenely glides,
Whose streams augment imperial Tyber's tides :
Where, near cold Nursia, beauteous Orta stood,
And mournful Allia rolls her fatal flood.
Thick shines with moving troops the blazing plain,
Thick, as the billows on the stormy main ;
Thick as the ripen'd harvests are beheld,
That nod and wave along the golden field.
The hucklers ring, the clashing arms refound ;
Beneath their footsteps groans the trembling ground.

Then Agamemnon's son, Helelus came,
By birth a foe to all the Trojan name ;
He yok'd his fiery couriers to the car,
And with a thousand soldiers rush'd to war,
From where on mountains live th' Auruntian line,
Where massic hills produce the generous wine ;
Warriors, who dwell along the roaring sea,
Or from the walls of Gales took their way :
With those who drink Vulturinus' shoaly flood,
The rough Saticulan and Ofcan flood.
Short, pointed javelins, fasten'd by a string,
With fatal force the dextrous artists fling :
Light shields of season'd hide aloft they bear,
And, arm'd with bending swords, provoke the war.
Not thou, unsung, brave Cæbalus ! shalt pass,
The nymph Sebetis' son, of Telo's race.
While pleasing Caprea own'd his father's sway,
And the Teleboan realms his nod obey ;
The son, far more ambitious, stretch'd his reign O'er those rich towns, where Cærno bathes the plain.

Now to the fight he leads his warlike pow'rs
From ancient Batulum, and Rufa's tow'rs,
From where, her blooming fruits Abella crown,
And old Celenna spreads her spacious down.
These, like the rough Teutonic warriors, threw Huge spears with barbs, that wing'd with slaughter flew. [wore,

Light casques of cork around their heads they
And brazen swords, and brazen bucklers bore.

These too, bold Ufens, to the dire alarms,
Cold Nursia sent a chief renown'd in arms.
Her fierce rough sons through forests bound away,
And o'er wild mountains chase the panting prey.
In arms the natives turn the frozen soil,
Make war a sport, and fly upon the spoil.

Umbro, the brave Marubian priest, was there,
Sent by the Marfan monarch to the war.

The smiling olive with her verdant boughs
Shades his bright helmet, and adorns his brows.
His charms, in peace the furious serpent keep,
And lull the envenom'd viper's race to sleep;
His healing hand allay'd the raging pain;
And at his touch the poisons fled again.
But yet he fail'd to cure, with all his art,
The wound inflicted by the Trojan dart!
Nor all his charms, nor potent herbs that grow
On Marſian mountains could prevent the blow!
For thee, wide echoing ſigh'd th' Angitian woods;
For thee, in murmurs ſeep't thy native floods!

Next, brave Hyppolytus! thy beauteous heir,
The lovely Virbius mingled in the war.
In the dark woods by fair Egeria bred,
His troops the youth from old Aricia led:
Where, on the ſhore, Diana's altar ſtood,
(But now unſtain'd with offer'd human blood;)
For when Hyppolytus, as records tell,
By his fierce ſtepdame's arts and vengeance fell,
Chas'd by his father's curſes to the ſhore,
The hapleſs youth the ſtartled courſers tore;
By Æſculapius' ſkill and Dian's care
The chief reviv'd and breath'd etherial air.
But Jove incens'd, a mortal to ſurvey,
From the Tartarean ſhades reſtor'd to day,
Great Phœbus' ſon, the godlike artiſt, hurl'd,
Transfixt with thunder, to the nether world:
But Dian hid the youth in groves, and there
Conſign'd her darling to Egeria's care.
There, in the foreſts, with the ſacred dame
He paſt his days, and Virbius was his name.
For this, th' unhallow'd ſteed muſt ſtill remove
From Dian's ſane and conſecrated grove:
Since the mad horſes ſtartled as they flew,
And on the ground their mangled maſter threw.
Yet his brave offſpring drove the thund'ring car,
And laſh'd his fiery courſers to the war.

Bold Turnus in the front, ſupremely tall,
Sheath'd in refulgent arms, outlines them all;
High on his helm a triple plume was rais'd,
And on his creſt the dire chimæra blaz'd:
From her wide jaws the horrid fiend expires
A dreadful length of fires ſucceeding fires.

When the loud voice of ſlaughter rends the ſkies,
And the full horrors of the battle riſe,
She glows, ſhe lightens, as the warrior turns;
She flames with rage; and the whole monſter
Chang'd to an heifer in the flowery field, [burns,
The beauteous Iô charg'd the ſhining field.
Here flood her * guard; and there her † father
His ſwelling farges thro' the figur'd gold. [roll'd
A cloud of ſoft ſucceeds; a mighty train,
With ſpears and ſhields; and armies hide the plain.
The pow'rs from Argive and Auruntian lands
Mix'd with the ancient bold Sicanian bands.
With painted ſhields the brave Labici came
And Sacran forces to the field of fame;
With thoſe who till Numicus' fair abodes,
Or dwell where Tyber views his riſing woods:
Or where the rough Rutulians turn the ground,
And the ſteep hills of Circe ſtretch around:
Where fair Feronia boaſts her ſtately grove,
And Anxur glories in her guardian Jove:
Where ſtands the Pontine lake and o'er the plain,
Cold Uſens' ſtream ſtreams gently to the main,
Laſt with her martial troops, all ſheath'd in braſs,

Camilla came, a queen of Volſcian race.
Nor were the web or loom the virgin's care,
But arms and courſers, and the toils of war.
She led the rapid race, and left behind,
The flagging floods, and pinions of the wind:
Lightly ſhe flies along the level plain,
Nor hurts the tender graſs, nor bends the golden
grain;

Or o'er the ſwelling ſurge ſuſpended ſweeps,
And ſmoothly ſkims, unhath'd, along the deeps.
From the diſpeopled towns and fields repair
Men, matrons, maids and youths, to view the fair:
The crowds all gaze with tranſport, to ſurvey
Loofe in the winds, her purple garments play,
Her poliſh'd bow, her quiver's gaudy pride
With arrows ſtor'd, and glittering at her ſide:
Her ſhining javelin, wondering they behold,
And her fair treſes bound with claſps of gold.

THE ARGUMENT.

The war being now begun, both the generals make all poſſible preparations. Turnus ſends to Diomedes; Æneas goes in perſon to beg ſuccours from Evander, and the Tuſcans. Evander receives him kindly, furniſhes him with men, and ſends his ſon Pallas with him. Vulcan, at the requeſt of Venus, makes arms for her ſon Æneas, and draws on his ſhield the moſt memorable actions of his poſterity.

Now Turnus rous'd all Latinum with alarms
To mount the fiery ſteeds and fly to arms;
Fixt on Laurentum's tow'rs, ſublime in air,
His ſtandard wav'd, the ſignal of the war:
And the loud trumpets, heard from far, excite
The generous youth, and call them to the fight.

Confederate pow'rs conſpire, the war to wage;
And the mad nations breathe revenge and rage.
Their armies Uſens and Meſſapus guide,
With proud Mepzentius who the gods deſy'd.
From the ſuſpended plough they drag the ſwains,
And for the war diſpeopled all the plains.

To Arpi next fage Venuſus they ſped
To beg the aid of royal Diomede;
And charge the hoary envoy to inform
The martial monarch of the riſing ſtorm;
That Troy's proud navy rides in Tyber's floods;
Æneas here has fixt his vanquiſh'd gods;
And vaunts himſelf the prince ordain'd by fate
To ſway the ſceptre of th' Hæſperian ſtate;
The nations own his cauſe, his right proclaim,
And Latium echoes with his growing fame;
That beſt himſelf could judge, who knew the foe,
From ſuch a war what dread effects may flow;
What is his mighty aim, his proud intent;
And, ſhould he conquer, what the dire event,
Was left for him to weigh; whoſe ſtate and throne,
And fortunes, ſtood endanger'd like their own.

All this the Trojan chief beheld, oppreſt
With cares that roll'd tumultuous in his breaſt.
A thouſand thoughts his wavering ſoul divide,
That turns each way, and points to every ſide.
So from a brazen vaſe the trembling ſteam
Reflects the lunar, or the ſolar beam:
Swift and eluſive of the dazzled eyes,
From wall to wall the dancing glory flies:
Thence to the cieling ſhoot the glancing rays,
And o'er the roof the quivering ſplendor plays.

'Twas night—and, weary with the toils of
In ſoft repole the whole creation lay; [day,
And laſt the Trojan prince, oppreſt with care
On the dire proſpect of th' approaching war,
Sunk, and in balmy ſlumbers cloſ'd his eyes;
His couch the bank; his canopy the ſkies.
When, ſlow-emerging through the poplar wood,
Roſe the majestic father of the flood,
Tyber, the guardian god, in open view;
A ſea-green mantle round his ſhoulders flew;
A wreath of reeds adorn'd his hoary head,
And to relieve his ſorrows, thus he ſaid:

O long-expected on our bleſt abodes,
Great chief, the true deſcendant of the gods!
Whoſe conduct brings thy reſcu'd Troy once more
To riſe immortal on our Latian ſhore;
Proceed, and conquer, prince! nor yield to fear;
Here lies thy ſated home, thy Ilium here. [vain,
Go!—meet the threat'ning war; thy cares are
The gods relent, and heav'n grows mild again.
Nor think, an airy viſion of the night,
A tranſient empty dream deludes thy ſight.
Soon thou ſhalt view, beneath an oak reclin'd,
A large white mother of the briſtly kind,
With her white numerous brood of thirty young,
Who drain her udders as the lies along.
There, there, thy town, great hero, ſhall aſcend,
There all thy labours, all thy woes ſhall end.
Heav'n, by this ſign, ordains thy royal fon,
When thirty years in full ſucceſſion run,
Shall build a city of diſtinguiſh'd fame,
Which from this omen ſhall derive her name.
But to ſucceed, purſue what I adviſe;
Go, make th' Arcadian tribes thy firm allies.
The race, that own'd of old great Pallas' ſway,
Hither beneath Evander bent their way;
Then rais'd their walls on the tall mountain's
crown;

And Pallas' name adorn'd the riſing town.
But ſoon the Latian race in arms appear;
And with the ſtrangers wage a dreadful war.

Go, join their forces, and their aid implore,
And fear the gath'ring hoſtile train no more.
Riſe, ſon of Venus, riſe, employ thy oars;
Our ſelf will guide thee to the friendly ſhores.
Soon as the day ſhall dawn, thy gifts prepare,
And vanquiſh heav'n's revengeful queen with pray'r.

Crown'd with ſucceſs, and all thy foes o'er-aw'd,
Discharge to me the honours of a god,
To me the fire of this immortal flood:
For know, old Tyber ſtands before thine eyes,
Ador'd on earth, and reverenc'd in the ſkies.
I lead, in peaceful pomp, my humid train
Along theſe banks, and bathe the fruitful plain:
And on our ſides a city ſhall be ſeen;
Our glorious ſeat; the world's majestic queen!
The god then plung'd beneath his oozy bed;
And with the night the hero's ſlumber fled.
He roſe, and ſtrait his joyful eyes ſurvey
The purple ſplendors of the dawning day;
Then water in his palm devoutly took,
Rais'd to the ſkies, and thus with tranſport ſpoke:
Ye nymphs, Laurentian nymphs! from whoſe
ſupplies

And watery ſtores the ſwelling rivers riſe;
And thou, old Tyber! my propitious guide,
Receive Æneas on thy ſacred tide;
From every ill defend him, as he goes,
And look with pity on his endleſs woes.
Then from whatever ſource thy ſtreams ſurvey
The golden light, and morn'ning ſpring to day;
O thou, the greateſt of the wat'ry gods,
Majestic prince of all th' Hæſperian floods!
Still to thy name due honours will I pay,
And gifts unceaſing on thy altars lay.
But oh! be preſent with thy aid divine,
Display, and then confirm the promis'd ſign.

He ſaid, then arm'd his Trojans, and ſupply'd
Two barks with oars, to ſtem the yellow tide.
When lo! the promis'd omen was diſplay'd;
The large white dam lay ſtretch'd along the ſhade,

With all her ſnowy young, in open view;
Whom, with her brood, the prince to Juno ſlew.
Now while the ſhips with equal ſtrokes they row'd,

All night old Tyber calm'd his ſwelling flood.
The lumbering ſtreams no mingling murmurs make,

Smooth, as the glaſſy level of the lake.
With joyful ſhouts the ſable gallees glide,
Eaſy and light, along the floating tide.
Surpris'd, the foreſts and the floods beheld
Bright arms and veſſels on the wat'ry field.
All night, all day, they ply their buſy oars
Along the mazes of the winding ſhores.
And gently move beneath the waving ſcene
Of groves, that paint the chequer'd floods with green. [high

Now had the ſun's bright courſers whirl'd on
His fiery chariot to the mid-day ſky:
When lo! the diſtant tow'rs the train deſcries;
And walls and intermingled houſes riſe;
Evander's homely ſtate—where now appears
Immortal Rome, advanc'd above the ſtars!
Thither they turn the prow without delay,
And to the city bend their eager way.

Before the town, within the gloomy woods,
To great Alcides and the favouring gods,
It chanc'd, that day, th' Arcadian monarch paid
A solemn offering in the secret shade.
Pallas his son, the rural senate round,
And the chief youths the flaming altars crown'd :
With fuming incense in their hands they stood,
And the red pavement blush'd with sacred blood.

Soon as they saw the ships in silence move,
And shine between the openings of the grove ;
A sudden dread strikes cold through every breast ;
They start they rise, and leave th' unfinished feast.
But Pallas bids the guests the rite pursue,
Then snatch'd a javelin, and impetuous flew—
Resolve me, stranger, (from a point he calls)
Who, whence you are, and why approach our walls ?

What urg'd your voyage to these shores, declare ?
Speak, speak your business—bring you peace or war ?

High on the stern the Trojan hero stands,
And held a branch of olive in his hands.
Behold, he cries, the far-fam'd sons of Troy ;
These swords against the Latians we employ ;
The perjurd Latians ; whose unjust alarms
Force us to fly to great Evander's arms.
Go, tell your king, the Dardan chiefs appear,
And beg his potent succour in the war.

Whoe'er thou art, approach, he cries with joy,
(All fir'd to hear the glorious name of Troy ; )
To my great father be thy suit address'd,
And grace our mansions as a friend and guest.
With that he gave the Dardan prince his hand,
And led the godlike hero from the strand :
Then to the sacred grove, their way they took ;
And thus the Trojan to the monarch spoke :

Best of the Greeks ! to whom devoid of fear,
Constrain'd by fate, these types of peace I bear.
Though from Arcadia's hostile bounds you came Alloy'd to both the kings of Atreus' name,
Yet hither did thy fame my steps incline,
My own fixt choice, heav'n's oracles divine ;
And the mixt glories of our kindred line.
For know we both from mighty Atlas trace,
Who props th' ethereal spheres, our ancient race.

Our father Dardanus, a glorious name,
From his fam'd daughter, fair Electra, came.
His beauteous Maia, on Cyllene's height,
Disclos'd your fire, great Mercury, to light.
Thus from that common source divided run
Our sacred lines, as first they met in one.
Rais'd by these hopes all caution I ditown,
And sent no envoys to address thy throne,
But came unguarded, fearless, and alone.

Our Daunian foes, with equal rage, destroy
Your fust'ring subjects and the sons of Troy ;
And hope, if they expel the Dardan train,
From sea to sea to propagate their reign.
Then in a league let either nation join,
For know, our Trojans are a martial line,
Valiant and bold, and season'd to alarms,
True to their leagues, and exercis'd in arms !

Thus he—the monarch roll'd his eager eyes
O'er his majestic form, and thus replies :

On all thy features how I dwell with joy !
Welcome, thrice welcome, glorious prince of Troy !

How in thy face, my ancient friend I see !
Anchises looks, and lives, and speaks in thee !
Well I recall great Priam's stately port,
Whence once he fought his * royal sister's court
On Salamanian shores, with all his train ;
And took his way through our Arcadian plain.
Then but a youth, I gaz'd the strangers o'er,
And much admir'd the chiefs, their monarch more ;
But most Anchises ; for, supremely tall,
Thy graceful godlike fire outshin'd them all.
Eager I long'd in friendship's sacred bands
To hold the chief, and join our plighted hands,
Led him to Pheneus' ancient walls, careft
Th' illustrious prince, and claim'd him for my guest.
On me, at parting, generous he bestow'd
Two golden bridles, that resplendent glow'd,
(A glorious present by my son possess'd),
With a rich quiver and embroider'd vest.

The peace you ask, we give ; our friendship plight,
And, soon as morn reveals the purple light,
With our confederate troops, a martial train,
Safe I'll dismiss thee from these walls again.
Now, since as friends you honour our abode,
Assist, and pay due offerings to the god.
With us pursue the solemn annual feasts,
And from this hour commence our constant guests.

He said ; the bowls replac'd in open view,
The joyful train the holy rites renew ;
The hoary king dispos'd his guests around,
And plac'd the Trojans on the verdant ground.
But for their prince an ample couch was spread ;
A lion's spoils adorn'd the rural bed.
Now brought the chosen youths and priests again

The sacred banquet to the stranger train ;
Dispens'd from canisters the bread around,
And with the foaming wine the goblets crown'd :
The Darian prince and every Trojan guest,
Reclin'd at ease, partake the solemn feast.
But when the rage of craving hunger fled,
Thus to the chief the hoary monarch said :

'Tis not for nought we pay these rites divine
To great Alcides' ever-honour'd shrine ;
Our worship springs from gratitude sincere,
Not heady zeal, nor superstitious fear ;
Nor are our tribes by blind devotion aw'd ;
But, sav'd by Hercules, adore the god.
For lo ! in air yon hanging rock behold !
Sea heaps on heaps, on ruins ruins roll'd !
See yon huge cavern, yawning wide around !
Where still the shatter'd mountain spreads the
ground.

That spacious hold, grim Cacus once possess'd,
Tremendous fiend ! half human, half a beast :
Deep, deep as hell, the dismal dungeon lay,
Dark and impervious to the beams of day.
With copious slaughter smok'd the purple floor ;
Pale heads hung horrid on the lofty door,
Dreadful to view ! and dropp'd with crimson
gore.

The fiend from Vulcan sprung ; and, like his sire,
The mighty monster breath'd a storm of fire,
So fierce he rag'd ; till time at length bestow'd
The presence, aid, and vengeance of a god.
For now Alcides leit the realms of Spain,
Proud of the spoils of huge Geryon slain, * Heliene.

To these fair shores the bellowing droves he led ;
 Along the banks and flow'ry vales they fed.
 The fiend resolves to bear the prize away
 By fraud or force ; and meditates the prey.
 Four beauteous heifers, four fair bulls he took,
 Enclos'd and lodg'd them in the gloomy rock ;
 But by their tails the struggling prey he drew,
 And thought to puzzle the deluded view.
 The turning tracks, inverted, where they tread,
 Back from the monsters darksome cavern led.
 Meantime the mighty drove the hero leads
 To fresher pastures, and untrampled meads.
 The parting herds spread wide, and roar around ;
 Fields, woods and hills, rebel to the sound.
 When lo ! a heifer heard her love complain ;
 And roar'd responsive from the cave again ;
 From vault to vault the sound in thunder flew,
 And the detected fraud appear'd in view.
 Alcides seiz'd his arms, inflam'd with ire,
 Rage in his looks, and all his soul on fire :
 Fierce in his hands the pond'rous club he shook,
 And, mad for vengeance, mounts th' aerial rock.
 Then, first appall'd, the monster we desury,
 Death in his cheek, and horror in his eye.
 Swift as the wind, with terror wing'd, he fled,
 And in the gloomy cavern plung'd his head.
 The pond'rous rock, impenetrably strong,
 On solid hinges by his father hung,
 To guard the dreadful dungeon down he drew :
 The shatter'd chains and bursting barriers flew.
 Scarce had the fiend let down th' enormous weight,
 When fierce the god came thund'ring to the gate.
 He gnash'd his teeth with rage ; the passes try'd,
 And roll'd his eager eyes on every side ;
 Now here, now there, a fiery glance he threw,
 And thrice, impetuous, round the mountain flew ;
 Thrice strove to storm the massy gates in vain ;
 And thrice, o'erspent, sat panting on the plain.
 A pointed rock behind the cavern stood ;
 That to the left frown'd dreadful o'er the flood,
 Black, rough, and vast ; a pile of wond'rous height ;
 A solemn haunt for every bird of night.
 This, from the right, the god incumbent shook ;
 Fierce from the solid base he heav'd the rock.
 Then push'd convulsive with a frightful peal,
 The smoking steep rolls thund'ring down the vale.
 To the loud din, earth, air and heav'n reply ;
 The banks start wide ; and back the surges fly.
 Expos'd to sight the monster's dungeon lay,
 And the huge cave flew open to the day.
 So, if the bolts of Jove should burst the ground,
 And opening earth disclose the vast profound,
 The solemn secrets of the dark abodes,
 Hell's dreadful regions, dreadful ev'n to gods ;
 Full on the black abyfs the beams would play,
 And the pale ghosts start at the flash of day :
 As pale (his dungeon storm'd) with wild affright,
 Glares the dire fiend, surpris'd in open light.
 He roars aloud, while thund'ring from above,
 Full on the foe the furious hero drove.
 With every vengeful instrument in view,
 Whole trunks of trees and broken rocks he threw.
 Now round the cavern, in despair of flight,
 Th' enormous monster breathes a sudden night ;
 To blind or blast his mighty foe, expires
 Thick clouds of smoke, and all his father's fires.

With that the vengeful god in fury grew,
 And headlong through the burning tempest flew.
 Fierce on the fiend, through stifling fumes he came,
 Through streams of spoke and deluges of flame :
 There, while in vain he breath'd the fires around,
 His trembling prize the great Alcides found ;
 Limb lock'd in limb, from earth his feet he rends,
 And on the ground his monstrous bulk extends ;
 Strangled the struggling foe with matchless might,
 And from their caverns tore the balls of fight.
 Thus the huge fiend, exhausted, breathless, tir'd,
 Loud bellowing, in th' Herculean grasp expir'd.
 The god then burst the gates ; and open lie
 The den's vast depths, all naked to the sky.
 Th' expanded caves dismiss th' imprison'd prey,
 From the black darksome dungeon to the day.
 Forth by the feet the crowds the monster drew ;
 On his huge size they feast their eager view ;
 His shaggy limbs, his dreadful eyes admire,
 And gaping throat, that breath'd infernal fire.
 From that blest hour th' Arcadian tribes bestow'd.

These solemn honours on their guardian god.
 Potitius first, his gratitude to prove,
 Ador'd Alcides in the shady grove ;
 And, with the old Pinarian sacred line,
 These altars rais'd, and paid the rites divine,
 Rites, which our sons forever shall maintain ;
 And ever sacred shall the grove remain.
 Come then, with us to great Alcides pray,
 And crown your heads, and solemnize the day.
 Invoke our common god with hymns divine,
 And from the goblet pour the generous wine.
 He said, and with the poplar's sacred boughs,
 Like great Alcides, binds his hoary brows ;
 Rais'd the crown goblet high, in open view :
 With him, the guests the holy rite pursue,
 And on the board the rich libation threw.
 Now from before the rising shades of night,
 Roll'd down the steep of heav'n, the beamy light.
 Clad in the fleecy spoils of sheep, proceed
 The holy priests ; Potitius at their head.
 With flaming brands and offerings, march the train,
 And bid the hallow'd altars blaze again ;
 With care the copious viands they dispose ;
 And for their guests a second banquet rose.
 The fires curl high ; the Saliî dance around
 To sacred strains, with shady poplars crown'd.
 The quires of old and young, in lofty lays,
 Resound great Hercules' immortal praise.
 How first, his infant hands the snakes o'erthrew,
 That Juno sent ; and the dire monsters flew.
 What mighty cities next his arms destroy,
 Th' Oechalian walls, and stately tow'rs of Troy.
 The thousand labours of the hero's hands,
 Enjoin'd by proud Eurystheus' stern commands,
 And Jove's revengeful queen. Thy matchless might
 O'ercame the cloud-born Centaurs in the fight ;
 Hylæus, Pholus sunk beneath thy feet,
 And the grim bull, whose rage dispeopled Crete.
 Beneath thy arm the Nemean monster fell ;
 Thy arm with terror fill'd the realms of hell ;
 Ev'n hell's grim porter shook with dire dismay ;
 Shrank back, and trembled o'er his mangled prey
 No shapes of danger could thy soul affright ;
 Nor huge Typhæus, towering to the fight,

Nor Lerna's fiend thy courage could confound,
With all her hundred heads, that hiss'd around.
Hail mighty chief, advanc'd to heaven's abodes!
Hail son of Jove; a god among the gods!
Be present to the vows thy suppliants pay,
And with a smile, these grateful rites survey.
Thus they—but Cacus' cavern crowns the strain,
Where the grim monster breath'd his flames in vain.

To the glad song, the vales, the woods rebound,
The lofty hills reply, and echo to the sound.

The sacred rites complete, the numerous train
Back to the city bend their course again.
Trembling with age, slow moves the monarch on,
Between the hero and his blooming son.
They pass with pleasure the remains of day
In various converse, that beguiles the way.
Around th' illustrious stranger darts his sight,
And views each place with wonder and delight:
Curious each ancient monument surveys,
And asks of every work of ancient days,
Half sunk in ruins, and by age o'ercome—
When thus, the founder of majestic Rome:

Know, mighty prince, these venerable woods,
Of old, were haunted by the silvan gods,
And savage tribes, a rugged race who took
Their birth primeval from the stubborn oak.
No laws, no manners form'd the barbarous race:
But wild, the natives rov'd from place to place;
Untaught and rough, improvident of gain,
They heap'd no wealth, nor turn'd the fruitful plain.
Their food, the savage fruits the forests yield,
Or haunted game, the fortune of the field,
Till Saturn fled before victorious Jove,
Driv'n down and banish'd from the realms above.
He by just laws embody'd all the train,
Who roam'd the hills, and drew them to the plain;
There fix'd; and Latium call'd the new abode,
Whose friendly shores conceal'd the latent god.
These realms in peace the monarch long controll'd,
And blest the nations with an age of gold.
A second age succeeds, but darker far,
Dimin'd by the lust of gain, and rage of war.
Then the Sicilians and Ausonians came,
And Saturn's realm alternate chang'd her name.
Successive tyrants rul'd the Latian plain;
Then stern, huge Tybris held his cruel reign.
The mighty flood that bathes the fruitful coast,
Receiv'd his name, and Albula was lost.
I came the last, through stormy oceans driv'n
From my own kingdom by the hand of heav'n.
My mother goddess and Apollo bore
My course at length to this auspicious shore.

This said, the prince the gate and altar shows,
That to his parent, great Carmenta, rose;
Whose voice foretold, the sons of Troy should
With everlasting fame the rising town. [crown
Here, Pan, beneath the rocks thy temple fold;
There, the renown'd asylum, in the wood.
Now points the monarch, where by vengeful steel,
His murder'd guest, poor, hapless Argus fell!
Next, to the capitol their course they hold,
Then roof'd with reeds, but blazing now with gold.
Ev'n then her awful sanctity appear'd;
The swains the local majesty rever'd.
All pale with sacred horror, they survey'd
The solemn mountain and the reverend shade.

Some god, the monarch said, some latent god
Dwells in that gloom, and haunts the frowning
wood.

Of our Arcadians deem, their wondering eyes
Have seen great Jove, dread sovereign of the skies;
High o'er their heads, the god has ægis held,
And blacken'd heaven with clouds, and shook th'
immortal shield!

In ruins there, two mighty towns, behold,
Rais'd by our fires; huge monuments of old!
Janus' and Saturn's name they proudly bore,
Their two great founders!—but are now no more!

Thus they converse on works of ancient fame,
Till to the monarch's humble courts they came;
Their oxen stalk'd, where palaces are rais'd,
And bellowing herds in the proud Forum graz'd.
Lo! said the good old king, this poor abode
Receiv'd great Hercules, the victor god!
Thou too, as nobly, raise thy soul above
All pomps, and emulate the seed of Jove.
With that the hero's hands the monarch press'd,
And to the mansion led his godlike guest.
There on a bear's rough spoils his limbs he laid,
And swelling foliage heap'd the homely bed.

Now awful night her solemn darkness brings,
And stretches o'er the world her dusky wings;
When Venus, (trembling at the dire alarms
Of hostile Latium, and her sons in arms),
In those still moments, thus to Vulcan said,
Reclin'd and leaning on the golden bed;
(Her thrilling words her melting consort move,
And every accent fans the flames of love);

When cruel Greece and unrelenting fate
Conspir'd to sink in dust the Trojan state,
As Ilion's doom was seal'd, I ne'er implor'd,
In those long wars, the labours of my lord;
Nor urg'd my dear, dear consort to impart,
For a lost empire, his immortal art;
Though Priam's royal offspring claim'd my care,
Though much I sorrow'd for my godlike heir.
Now as the chief, by Jove's supreme command,
Has reach'd at length the destin'd Latian land;
To thee, my guardian pow'r, for aid I run;
A goddess begs; a mother for her son.
Oh! guard the hero from these dire alarms,
Forge, for the chief, impenetrable arms.
See, what proud cities every hand employ,
To arm new hosts against the sons of Troy;
On me and all my people, from afar
See what assembled nations pour to war!
Yet not in vain her sorrows Thetis shed,
Nor the fair partner of Tithonus' bed,
When they implor'd my lord of old to grace
With arms immortal an inferior race.
Hear then, nor let thy queen in vain implore
The gift, those goddesses obtain'd before.

This said; her arms, that match the winter
snows,

Around her unresolving lord she throws;
When lo! more rapid than the lightning flies,
That gilds with momentary beams the skies,
The thrilling flames of love, without control,
Flew through the sooty god, and fir'd his soul.
With conscious joy her conquest she descri'd;
When, by her charms subdu'd, her lord reply'd:
Why all these reasons urg'd, my mind to move;
When such your beauties, and so fierce my love!

Long since, at your request, my ready care,
 In Troy's fam'd fields, had arm'd your son for war.
 Nor did the high decrees of Jove and fate
 Doom to so swift a fall the Dardan state;
 But, ten years more, old Priam might enjoy
 Th' imperial sceptre, and the throne of Troy.
 Yet, if our queen is bent the war to wage,
 Her sacred cause shall all our art engage.
 The noblest arms our potent skill can frame,
 With breathing bellows or the forming flame,
 Or polish'd steel, resplendent to behold,
 Or mingled metals, damask'd o'er with gold,
 Shall grace the chief: thy anxious fears give o'er,
 And doubt thy interest in my love no more.

He spoke; and, fir'd with transport by her charms,

Clasp'd the fair goddess in his eager arms;
 Then pleas'd, and panting in her bosom lay,
 Sunk in repose, and all dissolv'd away!
 But rose refresh'd, impatient from the bed,
 When half the silent hours of night were fled:
 What time the poor laborious frugal dame,
 Who plies the distaff, stirs the dying flame;
 Employs her handmaids by the winking light,
 And lengthens out their talk with half the night;
 Thus to her children the divides the bread,
 And guards the honours of her homely bed:
 So to his task, before the dawn, retires
 From soft repose the father of the fires.

Amid th' Hesperian and Sicilian flood
 All black with smoke, a rocky island stood,
 The dark Vulcanian land, the region of the god.
 Here the grim cyclops ply, in vaults profound,
 The huge Æolian forge, that thunders round.
 Th' eternal anvils ring, the dungeon o'er;
 From side to side the fiery caverns roar. [blows;
 Loud groans the mass beneath their ponderous
 Fierce burns the flame, and the full furnace glows
 To this dark region, from the bright abode,
 With speed impetuous flew the fiery god.
 Th' alternate blows the brawny brethren deal;
 Thick burst the sparkles from the tortur'd steel.
 Huge strokes, rough Steropes and Brontes gave,
 And strong Pyracmon shook the gloomy cave.
 Before their sovereign came, the cyclops strove
 With eager speed, to forge a bolt for Jove,
 Such as by heaven's almighty lord are hurl'd,
 All charg'd with vengeance, on a guilty world.
 Beneath their hands, tremendous to survey!
 Half rough, half form'd, the dreadful engine lay:
 Three points of rain; three forks of hail conspire;
 Three arm'd with wind; and three were barb'd with fire.

The mass they temper'd thick with livid rays,
 Fear, wrath, and terror, and the lightning's blaze.
 With equal speed, a second train prepare
 The rapid chariot for the god of war;
 The thund'ring wheels and axles, that excite
 The madding nations to the rage of fight.
 Some, in a fringe, the burnish'd serpents roll'd
 Round the dread egis, bright with scales of gold;
 The horrid egis, great Minerva's shield,
 When, in her wrath, she takes the fatal field,
 All charg'd with curling snakes the bois they rais'd,
 And the grim Gorgon's head tremendous blaz'd.
 In agonizing pains the monster frown'd,
 And roll'd in death, her fiery eyes around,

Throw, throw your tasks aside, the sovereign
 Arms for a godlike hero must be made. [said;
 Fly to the work before the dawn of day;
 Your speed, your strength, and all your skill dif-
 play!

Swift as the word, (his orders to pursue)
 To the black labours of the forge they flew;
 Vast heaps of steel in the deep furnace roll'd,
 And bubbling streams of brass, and floods of melted gold.

The brethren first a glorious shield prepare,
 Capacious of the whole Rutulian war.
 Some, orb in orb, the blazing buckler frame;
 Some with huge bellows rouse the roaring flame:
 Some in the stream the hissing metals drown'd;
 From vault to vault the thund'ring strokes re-
 bound,
 And the deep caves rebellow to the sound.
 Exact in time each ponderous hammer plays;
 In time their arms the giant brethren raise,
 And turn the glowing mass a thousand ways.

These cares employ the father of the fires:
 Meantime Evander from his couch retires,
 Call'd by the purple beams of morn away,
 And tuneless birds, that hail'd the dawning day,
 First the warm tunic round his limbs he threw;
 Next on his feet the shining sandals drew.
 Around his shoulders flow'd the panther's hide,
 And the bright sword hung glittering at his side.
 Two mighty dogs, domestic at his board,
 (A faithful guard) attend their aged lord.
 The promis'd aid revolving in his breast,
 The careful monarch sought his godlike guest,
 Who with Achates rose at dawn of day,
 And join'd the king and Pallas on the way.
 Their friendly hands exchang'd, their seats they Amid the hall; and first Evander spoke: [took Great prince, the guardian of the Trojan state!

 Who, safe in thee, defies the frowns of fate;
 Small is our force, and slender our relief;
 Far, far unworthy such a glorious chief.
 For here, old Tyber bounds our lands; and there
 The stern Rutulians gird our walls with war;
 Yet to our court kind fortune led thy way;
 And mighty aids the willing fates display;
 By me whole nations, in thy cause ally'd,
 Whole hosts in arms shall gather to thy side.
 For near these walls, amid the Tuscan lands,
 Seated on rocks, proud Agyllina stands.
 Rais'd by the Lydian train, sublime in air,
 A martial race, and terrible in war,
 For ages flourish'd this distinguish'd town;
 Vast was her wealth, and glorious her renown;
 Till stern Mezentius made her sons obey
 His lawless arms, and arbitrary sway.
 What tongue can such barbarities record,
 Or count the slaughters of his ruthless sword?
 Give him, ye gods! if justice you regard,
 Give him, and all his race the due reward!
 'Twas not enough, the good, the guiltless bled;
 Still worse; he bound the living to the dead.
 These, limb to limb, and face to face he join'd;
 (Oh! monstrous crime of unexampled kind!)
 Till chok'd with stench the ling'ring wretches
 And in the loath'd embraces dy'd away. [lay;
 At length, their patience tir'd, his subjects rose,
 Besiege the tyrant, and his walls enclose,

Subdue his guards, destroy his friends, and aim
 Full at the regal towers the vengeful flame ;
 While for defence to Turnus he withdrew,
 And, safe through all the cloud of slaughter, flew.
 But arm'd by such revenge, the Tuscan band
 To death the royal fugitive demand.
 At once Etruria fires her martial train,
 And all her sons embattled spread the plain,
 By me dispos'd, shall march these mighty hosts ;
 Beneath thy conduct, from their native coasts,
 For now, ev'n now their fleets have reach'd the
 land ;

And the tall ships are rang'd along the strand ;
 They wait the signal, for the fight prepare ;
 But thus a sage retards the moving war :
 " Ye chosen martial train, the glorious grace
 " And flower of all our old Mæonian race ;
 " Though by just rage inspir'd, your hosts are led
 " To pour full vengeance on your tyrants' head,
 " No Latian chief these armies must command ;
 " Choose some brave general from a foreign land."

With that, their forces stopp'd in these abodes,
 Struck with this awful warning of the gods.
 To me, their chief bold Tarchon sent, before,
 The crown, and every type of regal pow'r ;
 Me they request to lead their armies on,
 Accept the sway, and fill the vacant throne.
 But for these silver hairs 'tis far too late
 To mix in battles, or the cares of state ;
 Vain were the thoughts, so great a war to wage ;
 Too rough the task for unperforming age ;
 My son had led them, but his race withstood :
 Born half a native by the mother's blood.
 But thou, great prince, whose years and godlike
 Stand well approv'd by every pow'r divine, [line
 Go thou ; the high imperial task sustain ;
 Go ; to sure conquest lead the vengeful train :
 And let my Pallas by thy side engage ;
 Pallas, the joy of my declining age,
 Beneath so great a master's forming care,
 Let the dear youth learn every work of war ;
 In every field thy matchless toils admire,
 And emulate thy deeds, and catch the glorious
 Beneath his standard rang'd, a chosen force [fire !
 I send, two hundred brave Arcadian horse ;
 And, to support the gathering war, my son
 Shall lead an equal squadron of his own. [found,

He said ; the prince and friend, in cares pro-
 Long fixt their eyes with anguish on the ground,
 Sad, and dejected at the short supply ;
 Till Venus gave a signal from the sky ;
 Swift from the opening heavens, with awful sound,
 A sudden splendor broke, and blaz'd around.
 A rolling general din they heard from far ;
 And the loud Tyrrhene trumpets rend the air.
 While thus, amaz'd, they gaze with wondering
 eyes,

Peal after peal runs rattling round the skies.
 At last bright clashing arms the train behold,
 That flush the skies, and fringe the clouds with gold.

But soon Æneas knew the loud alarms,
 The promis'd present of immortal arms.
 To me alone, my royal friend, he cries,
 This sign belongs, an omen from the skies.
 My mother promis'd these portents in air,
 On the first opening of the wateful war ;

To me she brings through yon ethereal road,
 Those glorious arms, the labour of a god !
 Oh ! what a gathering storm of slaughter spreads
 On yonder hosts, and blackens o'er their heads !
 How shall thou, Turnus, my full rage deplore !
 How shall thy waves, old Tyber, smoke with gore,
 When all thy streams, encumber'd with the slain,
 Roll shields, and helms, and heroes to the main !
 Now let the perjurd train their arms prepare ;
 Since 'tis their wish, I'll give a loose to war !

He said ; and from the sylvan throne retires ;
 Then on Alcides' altar wakes the fires.
 Glad he returns, the offering to renew,
 And to the household gods the victims flew.
 To the same rites return, with equal joy,
 The hoary monarch and the youths of Troy.
 Then to the ship he bends his course again,
 There culls the flower of all the warrior train,
 To wait him to the field ; the rest he sends
 With the glad tidings to his son and friends.
 Smooth o'er the waves the painted vessels glide,
 And with the stream move gently down the tide.
 Steeds are prepar'd to mount the Trojan train,
 And speed their progress to the Tuscan plain.
 But to their prince a courier was assign'd,
 Of matchless spirit and superior kind.

The bounding steed a lion's spoils enfold,
 With paws dependent, sheath'd in shining gold.
 Strait through the city flies the loud report
 Of troops advancing to the Tuscan court.
 The shrieking matrons weary heav'n with pray'r

Near and more near they view in wild despair,
 The horrid image of gigantic war.
 The good old monarch then embrac'd his son,
 And with a flood of tender tears begun :

Oh ! would almighty Jove once more renew
 That vigorous strength of youth which once I
 knew ;

When, by this hand, beneath her rocky wall,
 Prænestæ saw her vanquish'd armies fall ;
 When, victor of the field, and crown'd with fame,
 With piles of hostile shields, I fed the flame,
 And sent great Herilus, of matchless might,
 Their martial monarch, to the shades of night ;
 On whom, descended from celestial blood,
 Three lives his goddesses † mother had bestow'd.
 Wond'rous to tell ! the warrior thrice was slain,
 As oft reviv'd, and arm'd, and fought again.
 Thrice, though renew'd for fight, the monarch
 bled,

And thrice, of all his arms I stripp'd the dead.
 Such were I now---not all these dire alarms,
 Dangers, or deaths, should tear me from thy arms :
 Nor had Mezentius thus his slaughters spread,
 Thus heap'd with wrongs thy father's aged head ;
 Nor thus unpunish'd stretch'd his rage abhorr'd
 O'er towns, dipeopled by his wateful sword.
 But hear, ye gods ! and heaven's great ruler, hear,
 With due regard, a king's and father's pray'r !
 My dear, dear Pallas, if the Fates ordain
 Safe to return, and bless these eyes again :
 With age, pain, sickness, this one blessing give ;
 On this condition I'll endure to live.

But oh ! if fortune has decreed his doom,
 Now, now, by death, prevent my woes to come ;

† Eronia,

Now, while my hopes and fears uncertain flow ;
 Now, ere she lifts her hand to strike the blow ;
 While in these feeble arms I strain the boy,
 My sole delight, my last surviving joy !
 Ere the sad news of his untimely doom [tomb !
 Must bow this hoary head with sorrow to the
 With these last words he swoon'd, and sunk away ;
 His servants to the couch their breathless lord convey.

Now through the opening gates the warriors
 Æneas first, Achates by his side.

The Trojan chiefs succeed : amid the train
 Young Pallas towers, conspicuous o'er the plain.
 All bright his military purple flow'd ;
 His polish'd arms with golden splendors glow'd.
 So, bath'd in ocean with a vivid ray
 Flames the refulgent star that leads the day :
 Wide through the sky, before the sacred light
 Break, and disperse the scattering shades of night.
 High on the battlements the mothers stand,
 And, from the towers, survey the martial band.
 Through the thick woods, embody'd in array,
 The glittering squadrons take the nearest way.
 Loud shouts arise ; the thundering couriers bound
 Through clouds of dust, and paw the trembling
 A mighty grove, rever'd for ages floss [ground.
 Where Cære views with pride her rolling flood :
 Hills clad with fir, to guard the hallow'd bound,
 Rose in the majesty of darkness round.
 In times of old, the pious Argive train,
 The first possessors of the Latian plain,
 To the great † guardian of the fields, had made
 For ever sacred the devoted shade, [paid.
 And, on his solemn day, their annual offerings }
 Not far from hence the Tuscan host dispread
 Their mighty camp, with Tærchon at their head.
 From the tall towering point in full survey,
 Stretch'd o'er the vale, th' embattled army lay.
 Hither Æneas, with his band, succeeds ;
 The train refresh'd release the panting steeds.

Meantime his beauteous mother, from on high,
 Had brought the blazing present down the sky.
 By the cool stream the hero she survey'd
 Within the winding vale, and thus she said :

Behold the promis'd arms ; in every part
 By Vulcan labour'd with immortal art.
 Now dare thy foes, collected in thy might,
 Now call the haughty Turnus to the fight.
 Then the fair queen her joyful son embrac'd,
 And by an oak, the radiant burthen plac'd.
 The wondering chief with sudden rapture glow'd,
 Struck with the glorious labours of the god.
 Astonish'd at the blazing arms he stands,
 And, one by one, he pois'd 'em in his hands.
 The sword, with death all pointed, he admires,
 And the proud helm, that throats a length of fires.
 The mighty corslet cast a vivid ray ;
 With scales of brass and sanguine colours gay ;
 And, like a flaming cloud, refulgent shone,
 Pierc'd with the glancing glories of the sun.
 The polish'd graves his manly thighs infold,
 With mingled metals wrought and ductile gold.
 With joy the weighty spear the prince beheld ;
 But most admir'd the huge mysterious shield ;
 For there had Vulcan, skill'd in times to come,
 Display'd the triumphs of immortal Rome ;

* Sylvanus,

There all the Julian line the god had wrought,
 And charg'd the gold with battles yet unfought.
 Here in a verdant cave's embow'ring shade,
 The fostering wolf and martial *twins were laid ;
 Th' indulgent mother, half reclin'd along,
 While at her dugs the sportive infants hung,
 Look'd fondly back, and form'd 'em with her }
 tongue.

Next Rome appear'd ; here shriek the Sabine
 dames,

Surpris'd, and ravish'd at her solemn games.
 In aims the Cures with their king appear,
 And wage with infant Rome a sudden war.
 At length agreed, from fight the monarchs cease,
 And at the shrine of Jove, conclude the peace.
 Each king beside the bleeding victim stands,
 With lifted eyes, a goblet in his hands.
 Here the mad couriers flew the forest o'er,
 And, limb from limb, the perjurd Metius tore.
 As vengeful Tullus drags him through the wood,
 The sculptur'd trees are all bedropp'd with blood.

Here proud Porfenna, with his martial train,
 Bids Rome receive her banish'd king again.
 Her noble sons surrounded with alarms,
 Fly, in the cause of liberty, to arms.
 While glorious Cocles all his host withstood,
 And Clælia broke her chains, and swam the flood.
 With furious looks, tremendous to behold,
 The raging monarch frown'd, and storm'd in gold.

There, for the Capitol, brave Manlius strove,
 Fought like a god, and look'd a second Jove.
 There stood thy palace, Romulus, (decreed
 The feat of empire) roof'd with homely reed.
 Here fled the silver goose through courts of gold,
 And, cackling loud, th' approaching Gauls foretold.

Through the thick forest move the hostile powers,
 And, favour'd by the night, invade the towers.
 Fair golden tresses grace the comely train,
 And every warrior wears a golden chain.
 Embroider'd vests their snowy limbs infold ;
 And their rich robes are all adorn'd with gold.
 Two Alpine spears with martial pride they wield,
 And guard their bodies with an ample shield.
 The Sali next in solemn garbs advance ;
 And naked here the mad Luperca dance,
 The pledge of future empire from the sky,
 The sacred targe strikes dazzling on the eye.
 In stately cars the pious matrons rode,
 Who sav'd their country, and appeas'd the god.

Far hence remov'd, appear the realms below,
 The horrid mansions of eternal woe ; [chains
 Where howl'd the damn'd ; where Catiline in Roars from the dark abyss, in endless pains ;
 Sees the grim furies all around him spread,
 And the black rock still trembling o'er his head.
 But in a separate space the just remain ;
 And awful Cato rules the godlike train.

Full in the midst, majestically roll'd
 The solemn ocean wrought in figur'd gold :
 But hoary waves curl high on every side,
 And silver dolphins cut the sable tide.
 Amid the flood, two navies rose to fight
 With beaks of brass ; th' immortal AÆlian fight !
 All charg'd with war the boiling billows roll'd,
 And the vast ocean flam'd with arms of gold :

† Romulus and Remus,

Here leads divinè Augustus, through the floods
The sons of Rome, her fathers and her gods:
From his high stern the martial scene surveys,
While streaming splendors round his temples
His sparkling eyes a keener glory shed, [blaze;
Than his great father's star, that glitters o'er his
head.

Next with kind gales, the care of every god,
Agrippa leads his squadron through the flood.
A naval crown adorns the warrior's brows,
And fierce he pours amid th' embattled foes.
There brings proud Antony his various bands,
From distant nations, and from barbarous lands.
Dispeopled Egypt fills the wat'ry plain,
And the whole Eastern world o'eritreads the main.
But O;—the curse of Rome, the shame of war,
His || Pharian comfort follows in the rear!

Rush the fierce fleets to fight! beneath their oars
And clashing beaks, the foaming ocean roars!
All big with war the floating castles ride,
In bulk enormous, o'er the yielding tide;
The frothy surge like moving mountains sweep,
Or isles uprooted, rolling round the deep.
Spears, darts and flames fly furious o'er the main;
The fields of Neptune take a crimson stain.
The beauteous queen, amidst the dire alarms,
With her loud timbrels calls her hosts to arms,
Flies to the fight, nor sees the snakes, that wait
And hiss behind, dread ministers of fate!
Against great Neptune, in his strength array'd,
And beauteous Venus, and the blue-ey'd maid,
Engage the dog Anubis, on the floods,
And the lewd herd of Egypt's monster gods,
In polish'd steel, conspicuous from afar,
Amid the tumult storm the god of war.
Her robes all rent, with many an ample stride,
Grim discord stalk'd, triumphant o'er the tide.
Next, with her bloody scourge Bellona flies,
And leads, in fatal pomp, the furies of the skies.

Meantime, enthron'd on Actium's towering
The god of day surveys the raging fight, [height,
And bends his twanging bow. With sudden dread,
At the dire signal, all Arabia fled:

|| Cleopatra.

At once retire, in wild confusion huri'd,
Egypt, and all th' assembled Eastern world.
Amid the slaughters of the fight was seen,
Pale with the tears of death, the Pharian queen;
Aghast, she calls the kind propitious gales
To speed her flight; and spreads her filken sails.
The god display'd her figure, full in view,
As o'er the floods with western winds she flew.
While sunk in grief, the mighty Nile bemoans.
The flame and slaughter of his vanquish'd sons.
He saw the rout; his mantle he unroll'd,
Spread forth his robes, and open'd every fold,
Expanded wide his arms, with timely care,
And in his kind embrace receiv'd the flying war.

Now moves great Cæsar (all his foes o'ercome,)
With three proud triumphs thro' imperial Rome;
And pays immortal honours to the skies:
Behold at once three hundred temples rise!
The streets resound with shouts and solemn games;
And to the temples through the Roman dames
With ardent prayers: high altars rise around;
And with the blood of victims smoke the ground.
He sits enthron'd in Phœbus' Pharian fane;
In ranks before him pass the vanquish'd train,
While he accepts the gifts that crown his toils,
And hangs on high the consecrated spoils.
Before the victor move the mighty throngs,
With different habits and discordant tongues.
Here pass, distinguish'd by the god of fire,
The sons of Afric in their loose attire;
The Carians march; the bold Numidians ride;
The Gelons shine with quivers at their side.
Here crowd the Dæ; and the nations, there,
From earth's last ends assembled to the war.
Here with diminish'd pride Euphrates mourns;
There the maim'd Rhine bemoans his broken
And fierce Araxes, bridg'd of old in vain, [horns:
Now bends, submissive to the Roman chain.

Such was the glorious gift in every part
By Vulcan finish'd with immortal art:
(The forms unknown, that grac'd its ample field;)
The prince with joy surveys the stor'd shield;
Aloft he bears the triumphs yet to come,
The fortunes of his race, the fates of mighty Rome.

B O O K IX.

THE ARGUMENT.

Turnus takes advantage of Æneas's absence, attempts to fire his ships (which are transformed into sea-nymphs) and assaults his camp. The Trojans, reduced to the last extremities, send Nisus and Euryalus to recal Æneas, which furnishes the poet with that admirable episode of their friendship, generosity, and conclusion of their adventures. In the morning, Turnus pushes the siege with vigour; and, hearing that the Trojans had opened a gate, he runs thither, and breaks into the town with the enemies he pursues. The gates are immediately closed upon him; and he fights his way through the town to the river Tyber. He is forced at last to leap, armed as he is, into the river, and swims to his camp.

Thus while the prince collects auxilial hosts,
And leads new armies from the Tuscan coasts;
Dispatch'd by heav'n's great empress, from the
The goddesses of the bow to Turnus flies; [skies,

Where, cover'd with the shade, he made abode
In his old grandfire's consecrated wood;
There, as at ease reclin'd the godlike man,
Her rosy lips she open'd, and began:

Turnus, this kind auspicious hour bestows
 What scarce a god could promise to thy vows :
 For lo! the Trojan chief has parted hence,
 And for new succours courts th' Arcadian prince.
 Thence to the Tuscan coasts his course he bends,
 And leaves expos'd his walls, his fleets, and friends.
 Now, while the Lydians in his cause unite,
 And the raw peasants gather to the fight :
 Call, call the fiery couriers, and the car ;
 Fly---storm his camp---and give a loofe to war.
 This said ; with levell'd wings she mounts on high,
 And cuts a glorious rainbow in the sky.

He knew the fair ; his lifted hands he spread,
 And with these words pursu'd her as she fled :
 Bright beauteous goddess of the various bow,
 What pow'r dispatch'd thee to the world below ?
 What splendors open to my dazzled eyes !
 What floods of glory burst from all the skies ;
 And lo ! the heav'n's divine, the planets roll !
 Thick shine the stars, and gild the glowing pole !
 Call'd by these omens to the field of blood,
 I follow to the war the great inspiring god !
 Raptur'd he said, and fought the limpid tide,
 Where gurgling streams in silver currents glide ;
 There cleans'd his hands, then raising high in air,
 To ev'ry god address his ardent pray'r.

And now, all gay and glorious to behold,
 Rich in embroider'd vests, and arms of gold,
 On sprightly prancing steeds, the martial train
 Spread wide their ranks o'er all th' embattled plain.

The van with great Messapus at their head ;
 The deep'ning rear the sons of Tyrrheus led.
 Brave Turnus flames in arms, supremely tall,
 Tow'rs in the centre, and outshines them all.
 Silent they march beneath their godlike guide :
 So mighty Ganges leads, with awful pride,
 In sev'n large streams his swelling solemn tide :
 So Nile, compos'd within his banks again,
 Moves in slow pomp, majestic, to the main.

Troy faw from far the black'ning cloud arise :
 Then from the rampart's height Caicus cries :
 See, see, my friends, yon dusky martial train,
 Involv'd in clouds, and sweeping o'er the plain.
 To arms---The foes advance---Your swords prepare ;

Fly---Mount the ramparts, and repel the war.
 With shouts they run ; they gather at the call ;
 They close the gates ; they mount ; they guard the wall.

For so th' experienc'd prince had charg'd the host,
 When late he parted for the Tuscan coast ;
 Whate'er befell, their ardour to refrain,
 Trust to their walls, nor tempt the open plain.
 There, though with shame and wrath their bo-soms glow.

Shut in their tow'rs, they wait th' embattled foe.
 But mighty Turnus rode with rapid speed,
 And furious spurr'd his dappled Thracian steed ;
 Eager before the tardy squadrons flew
 To reach the wall ; and soon appear'd in view
 (With twice ten noble warriors close behind) ;
 His crimson crest stream'd dreadful in the wind.
 Who first he cry'd, with me the foe will dare ?
 'Then hurl'd a dart, the signal of the war.
 Loud shout his train ; deep wonder seiz'd them all,
 To see the Trojans skulk behind their wall ;

Safe in their tow'rs their forces they bestow,
 Nor take the field, nor meet th' approaching foe.

Now furious Turnus, thund'ring round the plain,
 Tries every post and pass, but tries in vain.
 As, beat by tempests, and by famine bold,
 The prowling wolf attempts the nightly fold ;
 Lodg'd in the guarded field beneath their dams,
 Safe from the savage, bleat the tender lambs ;
 The monster meditates the fleecy brood ;
 Now howls with hunger, and now thirsts for blood ;
 Roams round the fences that the prize contain,
 And madly rages at the flock in vain :
 Thus, as th' embattled tow'rs the chief descries,
 Rage fires his soul, and flashes from his eyes :
 Nor entrance can he find, nor force the train
 From the close trench to combat on the plain.
 But to their fleet he bends his furious way,
 That, cover'd by the floods and ramparts, lay
 Beside the camp---He calls for burning brands,
 And rais'd a pine all-flaming in his hands.
 His great example the bold troop inspires ;
 They rob the hearths ; they hurl the missive fires ;
 The black'ning smokes in curling volumes rise,
 With how'ring clouds of cinders, to the skies.

O say, ye muses, what celestial pow'r
 Preserv'd the navy in that dreadful hour,
 And stopp'd the progress of the furious flame ?
 The tale is old, yet of immortal fame !

The Trojan chief, prepar'd to stem the tide,
 Had built his fleet beneath the hills of Ide ;
 When thus to Jove, in heav'n's supreme abodes,
 Spoke the majestic mother of the gods ;
 Hear, and our first request, my son, accord,
 The first, since heav'n has own'd you for her lord.
 To our great name, and honour'd by our love,
 On lofty Ida tow'rs a stately grove ;
 Tall firs and maples there for years have stood,
 And waving pines, a venerable wood !
 To build his navy, I bestow'd with joy
 The hallow'd forest on the chief of Troy.
 Now anxious fears disturb my soul with care :
 But thou, my son, indulge a mother's pray'r :
 Bid seas and tempests spare the ships divine ;
 Be this their safety, that they once were mine.

Thus she---and thus replies her son, who rolls
 The golden planets round the spangled poles :
 What would our mother's rash request intend ?
 To turn the fates from their determin'd end ?
 How ! an immortal state would you demand
 For vessels labour'd by a mortal hand ?
 And shall the chief in certain safety ride,
 O'er rocks, o'er gulfs, and o'er th' uncertain tide ?
 A pow'r so high we never yet bestow'd ;
 No---'tis a pow'r too boundless for a god !
 But this we grant---when, all his labours o'er,
 The Trojan prince shall reach the Latian shore,
 Whatever ships the friendly strand shall gain,
 Sav'd from the storms, and the devouring main,
 Know, we will take the mortal form from these ;
 Each ship shall launch, a goddess of the seas ;
 And with her sister Nereids shall divide
 The silver waves, and bound along the tide.
 This said ; the lord of thunder seal'd the vow
 By his dread brother's awful streams below ;
 By the black whirlpools of the Stygian flood ;
 Then gave the sanction of th' imperial nod ;
 The heav'ns all shook, and fled before the god.

Now was the hour arriv'd, th' appointed date,
Fixt by the high eternal laws of fate;
When the great mother of the thund'rer came
To guard her sacred vessels from the flame.

First from the glowing orient they descry
A blazing cloud that stretch'd from sky to sky;
The golden splendors doubly gild the day,
And high in air the tinkling cymbals play.
At length, with wonder, and religious fear,
A deep majestic voice the list'ning nations hear:

Forbear, forbear, ye sons of Troy, nor lend
Your needless aid, our vessels to defend.
The proud Rutulian shall, with greater ease,
Burn to their beds profound the wat'ry seas;
Launch you my ships; be Nereids of the floods;
So wills the mighty mother of the gods!

Swift at the word, the sacred ships obey,
From their loose anchors break, and bound away;
Like sportive dolphins plunge beneath the main,
Then (wond'rous!) rise in female forms again.
So many nymphs launch swiftly from the shore,
As rode tall galleies in the port before.

The fierce Rutulians shook with wild affright,
Ev'n brave Messapus trembled at the sight,
Nor could he rule his steeds, nor check their rapid flight.

Old mur'm'ring Tyber shrunk with sudden dread,
And to his source the hoary father fled.
All, but the valiant Daunian hero, shook,
Who rais'd their drooping souls, while thus he spoke:

These omens threat our foes (O glorious day)!
Lo! Jove has snatch'd their last relief away!
Lo! from our dreaded arms their ships retire,
And vanish swift before our vengeful fire;
To Troy, imprison'd in yon narrow coast,
The wat'ry half of all the globe is lost.

Their flight, the seas and hostile armies bar;
The land is ours; and Italy from far
Pours forth her sons, by nations, to the war.
Her favouring oracles let Ilion boast:
On Turnus all those empty vaunts are lost.

To 'scape the seas, and reach the Latian land,
Was all, their fates or Venus could demand.
My fates now take their turn; and 'tis in mine,
For my lost spouse, to crush the perjurd line.

Like brave Atrides, I'll redeem the dame,
The same my cause, and my revenge the same.
Will Troy then venture on a rape once more,
Who paid so dearly for the crime before?

Sure they have long ago the thought declin'd,
Forsworn the sex, and curs'd the costly kind!
Fools! will they trust yon feeble wall and gate,
That slight partition betwixt them and fate,

Who not long since beheld their Troy renown'd,
Their god-built Troy, lie smoking on the ground!
Fly then, my friends, and let us force the foe;
Seize, storm the camp, and lay their ramparts low.

Nor want we, o'er these dastards to prevail,
Arms forg'd by Vulcan, and a thousand sail;
Though to support their desprate cause should join

Arcadia's sons with all the Tuscan line:
Nor need the wretches fear, with vain affright,
The sacred thefts or murders of the night.
A robb'd palladium, and an ambush'd force
Lodg'd in the caverns of a monstrous horse.

A conquest in the dark my soul disclaims;
No—let us gird by day their walls with flames.
Soon shall they find no Argive host appears,
Whom Hector baffled ten revolving years.
Now go, my valiant friends, and pass away
In due repast the small remains of day:
But rise, rise early with the dawning light,
Fresh from repose, and vig'rous for the fight.

Meantime it falls to great Messapus' care,
The ramparts to surround with fire and war.
Twice sev'n Rutulian leaders head the bands;
An hundred spears each valiant chief commands:
Proudly they march, in gold and purple gay,
And crimson crests on every helmet play.
They watch, they rest by turns; and, stretch'd supine

On the green carpet, quaff the gen'rous wine.
The fires gleam round, and shoot a ruddy light;
In plays and pleasures, pass the jovial night.

This scene the Trojans from their trenches view;
All seiz'd their arms, and to their ramparts flew;
In wild affright to guard the gates they pour,
Join bridge to bridge with speed, and tow'r to tow'r.
Thus while th'endanger'd bulwarks they maintain,
Mnefthus and brave Serestus fire the train.
(The prince had left to their experienc'd care,
If aught besel, the conduct of the war).

Now all the soldiers to their posts were flown,
And in their turns, successive, guard the town.

The valiant Nisus took his lot, to wait
Before the portal, and defend the gate.
From Ida's native woods the warrior came,
Skill'd with the dart to pierce the flying game:
With him Euryalus, who match'd in arms
Troy's bravest youths, and far excell'd in charms;
So young, the springing down but just began
To shade his blooming cheeks, and promise man.
These boys in sacred friendship were all'd,
And join'd in martial labours, side by side;
In ev'ry danger, ev'ry glory shar'd:

And both alike were planted on the guard.
Has heav'n (cry'd Nisus first) this warmth bestow'd?

Heav'n? or a thought that prompts me like a god?
This glorious warmth, my friend that breaks my rest?

Some high exploit lies throbbing at my breast.
My glowing mind what gen'rous ardors raise,
And set my mounting spirits on a blaze!

See the loose discipline of yonder train; [plain:
The lights, grown thin, scarce glimmer from the
The guards in slumber and debauch are drown'd;
And mark!—a gen'ral silence reigns around:

Then take my thought; the people, fathers, all,
Join in one wish, our leader to recall.
Now, wou'd they give to thee the prize I claim,
(For I cou'd rest contented with the same—)

An easy road, methinks, I can survey
Beneath yon summit to direct my way.
The brave Euryalus, with martial pride,
Fir'd with the charms of glory, thus reply'd:

And will my Nisus then his friend disclaim?
Deny'd his share of danger and of fame?
And can thy dear Euryalus expose
Thy life, alone, unguarded to the foes?
Not to my father taught his gen'rous boy,
Born, train'd and season'd in the wars of Troy,

And, where the great Æneas led the way,
I brav'd all dangers of the land and sea.
Thou too canst witness that my worth is try'd;
We march'd, we fought, we conquer'd side by side.
Like thine, this bosom glows with martial flame;
Burns with a scorn of life, and love of fame;
And thinks, if endless glory can be fought
On such low terms, the prize is cheaply bought.
Let no such jealous fears alarm thy breast:
Thy worth and valour stand to all confest.
But let the danger fall (he cries) on me:
For this exploit, I durst not think on thee!
No:—as I hope the best ethereal train
May bring me glorious to thy arms again!
But should the gods deny me to succeed,
Should I—(which heav'n avert!) but should I
bleed;

Live thou;—in death some pleasure that will give;
Live for thy Nifus' sake; I charge thee, live.
Thy blooming youth a longer term demands;—
Live, to redeem my corse from hostile hands;
And decent to the silent grave commend
The poor remains of him who was thy friend:
Or raise at least, by kind remembrance led,
A vacant tomb in honour of the dead.
Why should I cause thy mother's soul to know
Such heart-felt pangs? Unutterable woe!
Thy dear fond mother, who, for love of thee,
Dar'd every danger of the land and sea!
She left Æcetes' walls, and she alone,
To follow thee, her only, darling son!

In vain, he cry'd, my courage you restrain;
My soul's on fire, and you but plead in vain.
Haste—let us go—He said— and rais'd the guard;
By turns their vacant posts the sentries shar'd.
With eager speed the gen'rous warriors went,
Inflam'd with glory, to the royal tent.

In silence hush'd the whole creation lay,
And lost in sleep the labours of the day.
Not so the chiefs of Ilium, who debate
In solemn council on th' endanger'd state;
Propp'd on their spears, their bucklers in their hand,
Amid the camp the hoary fathers stand,
And vote an instant message may be sent
To their great chief, their ruin to prevent.
The friends now beg admission of the court,
The business arduous, and of high import.
The prince commands them to inform the train;
And first bade Nifus speak, who thus began:

Attend, nor judge, ye venerable peers!
Our bold adventure by our tender years.
As yonder bands in sleep and wine are drown'd,
We, by kind chance, a secret path have found,
Close by the gate, that near the ocean lies;
The fires are thinn'd, and clouds of smoke arise.
If you permit, since fair occasion calls,
Safe can we pierce to great Evander's walls.
Soon shall our mighty chief appear again,
Adorn'd with spoils, and striding o'er the slain,
Lord of the field; nor can we miss the road,
But know the various windings of the flood;
For, as we hunt, we see the turrets rise,
Peep o'er the vales, and dance before our eyes.

Then thus Ælethes, an illustrious sage,
Renown'd for wisdom, and rever'd for age:
Ev'n yet, ye guardian gods, your pow'rs divine
Will spare the relics of the Trojan line,

Since you the bosoms of our youths inspire
With such high courage, such determin'd fire.
Then in his arms the boys by turns he took
With tears of joy; and panting, thus bespoke:
Oh! what rewards, brave youths, can be decreed,
What honours, equal to so great a deed?
The best and fairest, all th' applauding sky,
And your own conscious virtue, shall supply;
The next, our great Æneas will bestow,
And young Ascanius' riper years shall owe.
Whatever boon such merit can receive,
The friend, the monarch, and the man, will give.

And I, brave Nifus! cries the royal boy,
Swear by the sacred guardian pow'rs of Troy,
My hopes, my fortunes, are repos'd in you;
Go then, your gen'rous enterprise pursue.
Oh! to these longing eyes my fire restore;
From that blest hour my sorrows are no more.
Two silver bowls, whose ample margins shine,
All rais'd with costly sculpture, shall be thine;
The same my conqu'ring father brought away,
When low in dust the fair Arisba lay:
Two glittering tripods, beauteous to behold,
And two large talents of the purest gold:
With these a goblet, which the queen of Tyre
Bestow'd in Carthage on my royal fire.
And, when these vanquish'd kingdoms are our
own;

When my great father mounts the Latian throne;
When our victorious hosts by lot shall share
The rich rewards, and glorious spoils, of war;
What late thou saw'st when Turnus took the field,
His prancing courser, helm, and golden shield;
That courser, shield, and helm, of skill divine,
Exempt from lot, brave Nifus, shall be thine.
My fire will give twelve captives with their arms;
Yet more—twelve females of distinguish'd charms;
And, to complete the whole, the wide domain
Of the great Latian lord, a boundless plain.
But thee, dear youth, not yet to manhood grown,
Whose years but just advance before my own,
No fortune henceforth from my soul shall part,
Still at my side, and ever at my heart,
My dangers, glories, counsels, thoughts, to share;
My friend in peace, my brother in the war!

All, all my life, replies the youth, shall aim,
Like this one hour, at everlasting fame.
Though fortune only our attempt can bless,
Yet still my courage shall deserve success.
But one reward I ask, before I go,
The greatest I can ask, or you bestow.
My mother, tender, pious, fond, and good,
Sprung, like thy own, from Priam's royal blood;
Such was her love, the left her native Troy,
And fair Trinacria, for her darling boy;
And such is mine, that I must keep unknown
From her, the danger of so dear a son:
To spare her anguish, lo! I quit the place
Without one parting kiss, one last embrace!
By night, and that respected hand, I swear,
Her melting tears are more than I can bear!
For her, good prince, your pity I implore;
Support her, childless; and relieve her, poor;
Oh! let her, let her find (when I am gone),
In you, a friend, a guardian, and a son!
With that dear hope, embolden'd shall I go,
Brave ev'ry danger, and defy the foe.

Charm'd with his virtue, all the Trojan peers,
But more than all, Ascanius melts in tears,
To see the sorrows of a duteous son,
And filial love, a love to like his own.

I promise all, heroic youth! he said,
That to such matchless valour can be paid;
To me, thy mother still shall be the same
Creüsa was, and only want the name.

Let fortune good or ill success decree;
'Tis merit, sure, to bear a son like thee!
Now by my head, my father's oath, I vow,
Whate'er rewards I purpose to bestow,
When safe return'd, on thee, the same shall grace
Thy mother, and thy whole surviving race.

So spoke the prince; and, weeping at the word,
Gave to the pious youth his costly sword:
The sword with wond'rous art Lycaon made;
An ivory scabbard sheath'd the shining blade.
To Nisus, Mnestheus gave a lion's hide;
And a new helm Alethes' care supply'd.

Thus arm'd, they quit the tent; th' assembly
waits,
With high applause, their progress to the gates.

Mature in wisdom, far above his years,
The fair Iulus in the train appears,
And sends his father many an ardent pray'r;
All lost in wind, and scatter'd wide in air!

Now, favour'd by the shade, the warriors go,
Pass the deep trenches, and invade the foe.

But, ere their dang'rous enterprise is o'er,
With what large slaughter shall they bathe the shore! [around,

All drench'd in wine and sleep, lie stretch'd
The careless soldiers on the verdant ground,
Amid a pile of traces, wheels and reins,
And empty cars, encumbering all the plains.
Here lie the scatter'd arms; the goblets there;
A mad confusion of debauch and war.

Now, now, cries Nisus first, thy courage call;
The place, the hour, my friend, demands it all.
Here lies our road: while I the passage find,
Stay thou, and cautious watch the foe behind.
From side to side, whole squadrons will I slay,
Through death and horrors op'ning wide thy way.

With that, the youth in silence drew his sword, [lord;

And stabb'd proud Rhamnes, a distinguish'd
In ev'ry deep prophetic art approv'd,
A king and augur, and by Turnus lov'd.
On the rich couch in slumbers deep he lay,
And, labouring, slept the full debauch away.
The fate of others he had still foreshewn,
But fail'd, unhappy! to prevent his own.

Then on the 'quire of Remus fierce he flew,
And, as they slept, his three attendants flew.
The driver next; and cut his neck in twain,
As, midst the steeds, he slumber'd on the plain;
Last on their lord employ'd the deadly steel;
Swift flew the head; and mutter'd as it fell.
The purple blood distains the couch around;
The welf'ring trunk lies beating on the ground.

Next Lamyrus and Lamus meet their doom:
Serranus last, in all his sprightly bloom:
By the large draught o'erpow'r'd, outstretch'd
he lay,

Full half the night already spent in play; [day.
Far happier had it been, if lengthen'd to the

Thus o'er th' unguarded fence by hunger bold,
Springs the grim lion, and invades the fold.
All dreadful, growling in the midnight hours,
The trembling flock he murders and devours;
While wrapt in silence lies the fleecy brood,
The savage rages in a foam of blood.

Nor with leis rage Euryalus employ'd
The deadly sword; but nameless crowds destroy'd.
Hebeus, Fadus, as they slept, he goar'd;
But wakeful Rhæfus saw the slaughter'ring sword:
Behind a goblet he retir'd in vain;
For as the foe, detected, rose again,
The furious youth, with all his force impress'd, Plung'd the whole sword, deep-bury'd in his breast; [dy'd;

With blended wine and blood, the ground was
The purple soul came floating in the tide.

So vents the youth his vengeance on his foes,
And scatters death and slaughter as he goes.
Now when to brave Messapus' tents they came,
The fires just glimmer'd with a quiv'ring flame.
The train lie scatter'd, while the steeds, unbound,
Expatriate wide, and graze the verdant ground.
Then Nisus warn'd him; for he saw the boy
Too fierce for blood, too eager to destroy; [way--- Enough of death---our swords have hew'd the
We stand detected by the dawning day.

They part; and leave, in piles confus'dly roll'd, [gold.

Bright arms, embroider'd robes, and bowls of
But yet the fond Euryalus would stay,
Resolv'd to seize one rich distinguish'd prey;
The shining trappings Rhamnes' couriers bore,
And the broad golden belt the monarch wore,
Of old, to Remulus was sent the prize
By Cædicus, the pledge of social ties;
Which with his grandson at his death remain'd,
And last by war the fierce Rutulians gain'd.
This belt he bore, exulting, from the plain,
And in gay triumph wore, but wore in vain!
Next, with Messapus' helm, his brows he spread,
Adorn'd with plumes, that nodded o'er his head.
Then, flush'd with slaughter and the glorious prey,
They quit the camp, and seek a safer way.

Meantime, the Daunian hero to support,
Advanc'd a legion from the Latian court;
Three hundred horse, while slow the foot succeed,
Fly swift before, with Yolscens at their head.
Now to the camp the warriors bend their way,
And, on the left, the hapless youths survey.
Euryalus' bright helm the pair betray'd,
On which the moon in all her glory play'd.

'Tis not for nought, those youths appear; declare [are;
(Cries the stern gen'ral) who, and whence you
And whither bound; and wherefore arm'd for war?

Nought they reply, but took their sudden flight
To the thick forests and the shades of night.
But the fierce warriors spur'd their steeds, and
flood

All round, to guard the op'nings of the wood.
O'ergrown and wild, the darksome forest lay,
And trees and brakes perplex'd the winding way.
Hither, encumber'd with his gaudy prize,
Distress'd Euryalus for shelter flies;
But mis'd the turnings, in his wild surprize.

Not so, swift Nisus, who the foes declin'd,
Nor knew th' endanger'd boy was left behind;
Beyond the once-fam'd Alban fields he fled,
Where the fleet courfers of Latinus fed.
There flood the mournful youth; and from the
plain,

Cast a long look, to find his friend, in vain!
Where is Euryalus, my only joy?
Where shall I find (he cry'd) the hapless boy?
Then he retrac'd his former steps, and trod,
Once more, the winding mazes of the wood,
The trampling steeds and warriors pour behind,
And the loud cries come thick in ev'ry wind.
Here, while he paus'd, a general shout he heard;
And lo! his lov'd Euryalus appear'd,
Surrounded by the foe: the gloomy night,
And pathless thickets, intercept his flight.
With joyful clamours crowd the gath'ring train
Around the captive, who resists in vain.
What can his friend attempt, what means employ,

What arms, what succours, to redeem the boy?
Or through th' embattled squadrons shall he fly,
And, prest by hostile numbers, nobly die?
Then on the moon he cast a mournful look,
And in his hand the pointed jav'lin shook;
Great guardian goddess of the woods! (he cries)
Pride of the stars, and empress of the skies!
If e'er with gifts my father hung thy shrine
For his dear son, and sought thy pow'r divine,
Or I increas'd them with my sylvan toils,
And grac'd thy sacred roof with savage spoils;
Direct my lance, nor let it fly in vain,
But, wing'd with death, disperse the hostile train.
This said; with all his strength the spear he threw;

Swift through the parting shade the weapon flew.
In Sulmo's back the point all-quiv'ring stood,
And pierc'd his heart, but left the broken wood.
He pour'd a purple flood, as prone he lay;
While in thick sobs he gasp'd his soul away.
The crowds gaze round; when lo! a second flies,
Fierce as the first, and sings along the skies.
Through Tagus' temples, o'er the shrinking train,
It flew, and sunk deep-bury'd in the brain.
Now, mad for vengeance, Volscens storm'd, nor
found

The daring author of the distant wound:
But thy curst blood shall pay for both, he said;
Then rush'd impetuous with the flaming blade
Against the trembling boy.—with wild asstight,
All pale, confus'd, distracted at the sight,
From his close covert Nisus rush'd in view,
And sent his voice before him as he flew:
Me, me, to me alone, your rage confine;
Here sheath your javelins; all the guilt was mine.
By yon bright stars, by each immortal god,
His hands, his thoughts, are innocent of blood!
Nor could, nor durst the boy the deed intend;
His only crime (and oh! can that offend?)
Was too much love to his unhappy friend!

In vain he spok'e, for ah! the sword, address'd
With ruthless rage, had pierc'd his lovely breast:
With blood his snowy limbs are purpl'd o'er,
And, pale in death, he welters in his gore.
As a gay flow'r, with blooming beauties crown'd,
Cut by the scare, lies languid on the ground;

Or some tall poppy, that o'er-charg'd with rain
Bends the faint head, and sinks upon the plain;
So fair, so languishingly sweet he lies,
His head declin'd and drooping, as he dies!

Now midst the foe, distracted Nisus flew;
Volscens, and him alone, he keeps in view.
The gath'ring train the furious youth surround;
Dart follows dart, and wound succeeds to wound;
All, all, unfelt; he seeks their guilty lord;
In fiery circles flies his thund'ring sword;
Nor ceas'd, but found, at length, the defin'd way;
And, bury'd in his mouth, the faulchion lay.
Thus cover'd o'er with wounds on ev'ry side,
Brave Nisus slew the murder'er as he dy'd;
Then, on the dear Euryalus his breast,
Sunk down, and slumber'd in eternal rest.

Hail, happy pair! if fame our verse can give,
From age to age, your memory shall live;
Long as th' imperial Capitol shall stand,
Or Rome's majestic lord the conquer'd world command!

The victors first divide the gaudy prey;
Then to the camp their breathless chief convey:
There too a scene of gen'ral grief appears;
There, crowds of slaughter'd princes claim their tears.

Stretch'd o'er the plain their hapless friends they
Some pale in death, some gasping on the ground,
With copious slaughter all the field was dy'd,
And streams of gore run thick on ev'ry side.
All knew the belt and helm divinely wrought;
But mourn the fatal prize, so dearly bought.

Now, dappled streaks of light Aurora shed,
And ruddy rose from Tithon's saffron bed:
Then fiery Phœbus, with his golden ray,
Pour'd o'er the op'ning world a flood of day.
When furious Turnus gave the loud alarms,
First arm'd himself; then call'd the host to arms,
The chiefs their soldiers to the field excite,
Inflame their rage, and lead them to the fight.
On pointed spears, a dreadful fight! they bore
The heads of both the hapless youths, before;
With barb'rous joy survey the bloody prize,
And shout, and follow with triumphant cries.

The Trojans, on the left, sustain the fight
From their high walls; the river guards the right.
They line the trenches, and the tow'rs maintain;
Thick on the ramparts stand the pensive train,
And know the heads too well, though cover'd o'er
With sanguine stains, and all deform'd with gore.

Now to the mother's ears the news had fled,
Her son, her dear Euryalus, was dead:
The vital warmth her trembling limbs forsook,
She dropp'd the shuttle, and with horror shook;
With hair dishevell'd from the walls she flies,
And rends the air with agonizing cries;
Breaks through the foremost troops in wild despair,

Nor heeds the darts, or dangers of the war.
And is it thus, the comfort of my years,
Thus, thus, my dear Euryalus appears?
And could'st thou fly, my child, to certain harms!
To death (oh cruel!) from thy mother's arms?
So fond a mother?—nor thy purpose tell?
Nor let me take my last, my sad farewell?
A prey to dogs, alas! thy body lies,
And ev'ry fowl that wings the Latian skies!

Nor did thy mother close thy eyes in death,
Compose thy limbs, nor catch thy parting breath;
Nor bathe thy gaping wounds, nor cleanse the
gore.

Nor throw the rich embroider'd mantle o'er;
The work that charm'd the cares of age away,
My talk all night, my labour all the day;
The robe I wove, thy absence to sustain,
For thee, my child;—but wove, alas! in vain.
Where shall I find thee now? what land contains Thy mangled members and thy dear remains?
How on thy face these longing eyes I fed!
Ah! how unlike the living is the dead!

For that, o'er lands and oceans have I gone?
Is that the sole sad relic of my son?
That bloody ball!—No more!—ye foes of Troy,
Come all, a poor abandon'd wretch destroy;
Here, here direct in pity ev'ry dart,
Plant ev'ry jav'lin in this breaking heart:
Or with thy bolts, O Jove! conclude my woe,
And plunge me flaming to the shades below.
Strike—and I'll bless the stroke, that sets me free;
'Tis ease, 'tis mercy, to a wretch like me!

Her loud complaints the melting Trojans hear,
Sigh back her sighs, and answer tear for tear.
Their courage slackens; and the frantic dame
With her wild anguish damps the martial flame.
But young Æcanius, while his sorrows flow,
And his full eyes indulge the gust of woe,
With great Ilioneus, commands the train
To bear the matron to her tent again.

Now the shrill trumpet's dreadful voice from far,
With piercing clangors animates the war.
The troops rush on; the deaf'ning clamours rise,
And the long shouts run echoing round the skies.
Strait, in a shell, their shields the Volscians
threw;

And the close cohorts march, conceal'd from view,
To fill the trenches which the camp surround,
And tug th' aspiring bulwarks to the ground.
Where thinly rang'd appear the op'ning pow'rs,
They fix their scaling engines in the tow'rs.
From far the Trojans missive weapons throw,
And with tough poles repel the rising foe;
Thus wont, of old, th' advancing Greeks to dare,
And guard the ramparts in their ten years war.
Long with huge pointed stones, they strove in vain,
To burst the cov'ring of the hostile train.
Yet still the bands maintain the fight, below
The brazen concave, and defy the foe.

At length the Trojans with a mighty shock,
Roll'd down a pond'rous fragment of a rock;
Full lower the thick-embodiy'd squadron spreads,
Th' enormous mass came thund'ring on their heads, Broke through the shining arch, and crush'd the
train;

And with a length of slaughter smok'd the plain.
In this blind fight no more the foes engage,
But with their darts a distant combat wage.

There with a blazing pine Mezentius came,
And tost within the works the dreadful flame;
Tremendous chief!—while bold Messapus calls
To scale the tow'rs; and thunders at the walls.

Ye sacred nine, inspire me to record
What numbers fell by Turnus' slaught'ring sword.
What foes each hero plung'd to hell, declare,
Each death display, and open all the war!

Those mighty deeds which you alone can know,
Repeat, ye muses! to the world below.

Full o'er the wall a turret rose on high,
Stage above stage, unrivall'd, to the sky.
This fort to gain, the Latians bend their care,
Point their full strength, their whole collected war.
Vast fragments from above the Trojans throw,
And through the walls their jav'lins gaul the foe.
A blazing torch the mighty Turnus flung;
Close to the sides the flaming mischief hung;
Then, thund'ring through the planks, in fury grew,
Swell'd in the wind, and round the structure
- flew.

With headlong speed th' imprison'd troops retire,
Throng'd in huge heaps, before the spreading fire.
While on one side their weight incumbent lay,
The beams all burst, the crackling walls give way,
The pond'rous pile comes tumbling to the ground,
And all Olympus trembled at the sound.
With the proud structure fall the Trojan train,
Wrapp'd in the smoky ruins, to the plain,
Their souls crush'd out, the warriors bury'd lie;
Or on the points of their own lances die.
Sav'd from the general fate, but two remain,
And ah! those hapless two were sav'd in vain!
Unblest's Helenor, most advanc'd in years,
At once encompass'd by the foe appears;
Him to the Lydian king, his beauteous slave
Lycimnia bore; unfortunately brave.

Though born of servile blood, the gen'rous boy
In arms forbidden sought the wars of Troy.
With glory fir'd he took the dang'rous field;
Light was his sword; and unadorn'd his shield.
At first with wild surprize the youth descri'd
Th' gath'ring Latian troops on every side;
Then (bent on death) where thick the jav'lins rise,
Fierce on the close embattled war he flies.

So the stern savage, whom the train surrounds
Of shouting hunters, steeds, and op'ning hounds,
On death determin'd, and devoid of fears,
Springs forth undaunted on a grove of spears.

But swifter Lycus urg'd his rapid way,
Though jav'lins hiss, and swords around him play;
Flies to the walls and battlements again,
Leaps high, and reaches at his friends in vain.

For close behind the furious Turnus flew:
Fool! couldst thou hope to 'scape when I pursue,
Though swifter than the wind? (aloud he cries)
Then by the foot he seiz'd his trembling prize;
And, as he hung aloft in dire dismay,

Tugg'd him with half the shatter'd wall away.
So Jove's imperial bird, through fields of air,
Snatches the snowy swan or quiv'ring hare:
So the grim prowling wolf, amidst her play,
Leaps on the lamb, and rends the tender prey;
Wild roams the bleating mother round the plain,
Seeks, and laments her slaughter'd child in vain.
Now with loud shouts they rend the tortur'd air,
Fill the deep trench, and lay the bulwarks bare.
Some load with hostile fires their vengeful hands,
And at the turrets tost the blazing brands.

As to the gates the bold Lucetius came,
Tow'r'd in the front, and shook the waving flame;
The great Ilioneus with vigour threw
A rocky fragment, and the warrior flew.
Young Liger's certain spear, Emation sped;
Aylas' shaft laid Choringæus dead.

Ortygius bleeds by Cæneus' fatal steel,
 But by great Turnus' hand the victor fell;
 Clonius with him, and Dioxippus falls,
 And hapless Idas, while he guards the walls.
 Sagar, the next, with Promulus was slain;
 And Capys stretch'd Privernus on the plain;
 First slightly wounded by Themilla's dart;
 (The shield thrown by) to mitigate the smart,
 His hand the warrior to the wound apply'd;
 Swift flew the second dart, and nail'd it to his side:
 Its fatal course through all his vitals held;
 And the pale corse lay panting on the field.

All bright in arms, the son of Arcens stood,
 Bred in the grove of Mars the warrior god;
 From where Palicus' loaded altars flame,
 In gold and purple gay, the blooming hero came.
 Mezentius mark'd him, as he tow'r'd on high;
 Then seiz'd a sling, and laid the jav'lin by;
 Thrice whirl'd around, the whistling bullet threw;
 The glowing metal melted as it flew;
 Through both his temples cut its dreadful way;
 And, roll'd in dust, the beautiful warrior lay.

Then first in fight the young Afcanius bore
 His bow; employ'd on beasts alone before.
 His vengeful shafts a royal victim found,
 And stretch'd the bold Numanus on the ground.
 Not long before the haughty chief had led Brave Turnus' sister to his bridal bed:
 Now, of his high alliance vain and proud,
 He stalks before the troops, and vaunts aloud:

What shame, ye Phrygians, ye twice-vanquish'd train,
 To lie beleagu'rd in your walls again!
 All pale and trembling, in yon tow'rs to wait!
 That rise, ye cowards, between you and fate!
 Brave chiefs! bold heroes these!--who come so far
 To gain their brides by violence and war!
 From Troy what god, what madness call'd you
 o'er,

To fall and perish on a foreign shore?
 Far other foes than Atreus' sons appear;
 No crafty talking Ithacus is here.
 We plunge our infants in the hard'ning streams,
 And seafon in the frost their tender limbs.
 Our boys the forest range, and lead the course,
 Bend the tough bow, and break the prancing
 horse.

Long thirst, long hunger, our bold youths can bear,
 Plough, fight, or shake embattled towns with war.
 We live in steel; in arms our hinds appear;
 And the turn'd jav'lin goads the lab'ring steer.
 Nor flags our gen'rous warmth, by years declin'd;
 Still flames the noble ardour of the mind.
 Ev'n the grave fire with martial vigour glows,
 And crushes with the casque his hoary brows.
 All, all engag'd alike in warlike toils,
 Substif on rapine, and divide the spoils.
 While you, the fugitives, the dregs of Troy,
 Your hours in pleasures, and the dance employ:
 Warm purple robes defend (ye dastard bands!)
 Your heartless breasts and unperforming hands.
 Your female souls the manly form disgrace--
 Hence then, ye women, to your native place!--
 Hence--to your Phrygian Dindymus away!
 With eunuchs there on pipes and timbrels play!
 Go--the great mother's rites attend you there--
 But leave to men the bus'ness of the war.

Thus while he spoke in scornful strains, no more
 The young Afcanius the proud boaster bore.
 He fits an arrow to the well-strung bow;
 But first to Jove address'd his solemn vow:
 My bold attempt, almighty fire, succeed;
 A milk-white heifer at thy shrine shall bleed;
 Majestic shall he stalk, and paw the ground,
 Pull with his gilded horns, and spurn the sands
 around.

He said--and, to the left, the fire on high
 Roll'd the big thunder through an azure sky.
 At once his twanging bow Afcanius drew,
 And, hissing fierce, the feather'd arrow flew;
 Nor flew the winged wrathful shaft in vain,
 But pierc'd his head, and stung him to the brain.
 Go--and once more a valiant race defy!
 'Twas the twice-vanquish'd Phrygians, thus reply.
 No more he said;--loud shouts and clamorous
 rise;

And transport lifts the Trojans to the skies.

High on a cloud, enthron'd in open air,
 Apollo sat, and thence survey'd the war.
 Then to the conq'ring royal boy he cries;
 Rise, glorious youths; in valour ever rise;
 Rise thus in time to heav'n's supreme abodes,
 The son, and father, of a race of gods!
 Who, great in arms, victorious by their swords,
 Shall rule mankind, the world's majestic lords!
 Go--mount from fame to fame, auspicious boy;
 Proceed, and scorn the narrow bounds of Troy!
 He said; then down th' ethereal road he
 flies

With rapid speed, and cleaves the liquid skies;
 Assumes old Butes' figure and attire,
 Anchises' long-try'd friend, and faithful 'quire
 In fields of old; and now the chief of Troy
 Had trusted to his care the royal boy.
 Like this sage guardian to the youth he came;
 His voice, his visage, and his arms the same.

Then to the victor boy aloud he cries;
 Enough, young warrior--Let it now suffice
 That unreveng'd the great Numanus dies:
 Apollo, pleas'd thy first attempts to crown,
 Gives to thy bow the glories of his own:
 Now tempt no more the dangers of the war,
 Too daring youth--he said; and past in air,
 Past in a moment from his wond'ring eye;
 And the loose shape dissolv'd into the sky.
 The sounding shafts the leaders heard, o'eraw'd
 With the loud quiver, and confess'd the god;
 Then urge the fiery youth, no more to dare,
 Since great Apollo's voice forbade the war.

While, prodigal of life, to fight they fly,
 All nobly fight, to conquer or to die;
 Stones, spears, and jav'lins, from the works they flung;

From tow'r to tow'r the shouts and clamours rung;
 Helms clash with helms, the rattling shields re-
 sound;

Thick fly the darts, and cover all the ground;
 While loud the battle roars, and thunders all
 around:

Thick, as from western clouds, all charg'd with rain,

Pours the black storm, and smokes along the plain;
 Thick as the gather'd hail, tempestuous, flies
 O'er the wide main, and rattles down the skies,

When all the frowning heav'ns are blacken'd
o'er;

When Jove discharges all his wrathful store,
And, deep from every cloud, the bursting thunders roar!

Pand'rus and Bitias at the portal stood,
Two giant brethren, born in Ida's wood;
From great Alcanor and Hiera sprung,
The champions rofe conspicuous o'er the throng.
The mighty champions of prodigious frame,
Bow'd like the groves and mountains whence they came.

Their prince, when parting from the Tufcan ftate,
Appointed thefe, the guardians of the gate.
In proof of their ftrength, the daring heroes throw
The enormous folds wide open to the foe.
Within, all bright in arms, on either hand
Before the tow'rs the haughty warriors ftand:
On their bright helms fat horror plum'd; on high
Their nodding crefts float dreadful in the fky.
Where the fields fair Athefs divides,
Or Po tumultuous rolls his fwelling tides,
With heads unshorn, two mighty oaks appear,
Wave to the winds, and nod fublime in air!

Soon as the foes an open entrance fpy,
The war breaks in; but foon their leaders fly,
Repell'd by hofts; or in the portal die.
Quercens, Equicolus, all bright in fteel,
Læmon and daring Tmarus, fled, or tell,
So dire extremes the rifing rage proceeds;
The flaughter fwells, and the fierce battle bleeds.
No more imprifon'd in their walls they wait;
All Troy at once came pouring to the gate:
Fow, flufh'd with blood, in bold excursion far
Rufh the ftern bands, and mix in clofer war.

But in a diftant quarter long engag'd
Amidft the foes the Daunian hero rag'd:
When to the prince a meffenger relates,
That Troy had open'd wide her mafly gates;
And heaps on heaps the late imprifon'd train Broke forth, and ftretch'd the flaughter o'er the plain.

This heard, with fury fparkling in his eyes,
To engage the giant chiefs he flies.
Firft, by his lance, Antiphates lay dead,
Arpedon's offspring by a Theban bed;
The whizzing lance with all his force addrefs'd,
Transfixt the foe, and panted in his breaft:
Warm'd in the lungs the heaving jav'lin flood:
Wide gapes the wound, and pours a purple flood.
Now Erymanthus, now brave Merops fell;
Then funk Aphydnus to the fhades of hell.
Next, while he threatens revenge with fiery eyes,
Beneath the chief the mighty Bitias dies:
No vulgar lance the valiant victor toft
In that huge bulk a vulgar lance was loft);
A ftiong, vaft, weighty fpear, the hero threw,
A fpear that roar'd like thunder as it flew.
Not two bull-hides, within the buckler roll'd,
Nor double pond'rous plates, and fcales of gold,
Th' impetuous weapon, wing'd with death, could ftay;

But ftretch'd in duft the giant warrior lay:
As the huge champion falls, the fields rebound,
And his broad buckler thunders on the ground.
So from the Baian mole, whose ftructures rife
High o'er the flood, a mafly fragment flies;

The rapid rolling pile all-headlong fweeps,
With one vaft length of ruin, to the deeps;
Thick boil the billows; and on ev'ry fide,
Work the dark fands, and blacken all the tide:
The trembling fhores of Prochyta rebound,
And burning Arime fhakes wide around;
The mafs, by Jove, o'er huge Typhæus fpread;
The giant hears the peal; and, feiz'd with dread,

Starts, turns, and bellows on his fiery bed.

Now Mars himfelf infpires the Latian band,
Warms ev'ry heart, and ftrengthens ev'ry hand;
And, while he turns their trembling foes to fight,
The kindling legions gather to the light:
Danger nor death their furious courfe controls,
And all the god came rufhing on their fouls!

His brother flain when Pandarus beheld,
And faw the changing fortune of the field,
He fetts his ample fhoulders to the weight,
And turns th' enormous hinges of the gate;
But left, unmindful, as the folds he clos'd,
A crowd of friends to certain death expos'd;
And, with himfelf, includes the trembling train
Of troops, who rufh'd tumultuous from the plain.
Fool! not to fee the dreadful Turnus there,
Mix'd with the crowds amidft the flying war;
But in the walls the furious chief to hold,
Like fome fierce tyger 'midft the trembling fold:
Loud clafh his arms; and, as he tow'rs on high,
Flafh the keen flames from his tremendous eye;
Nods his proud creft, and formidably plays;
And from his fhield the ftreamy lightning blaze.

Too foon, with dire fprifme, the Trojans know
The dreadful front of their victorious foe.
Strait fir'd with vengeance for his brother flain,
Springs forth fierce Pandarus, and thus began:

Behold the Trojan camp, a fatal fcene!
No bridal palace of the Latian queen,
No native Ardea, prince, you here defcry,
But hostile walls; and 'tis in vain to fly.

In that vaft bulk if any foul defide,
Come, try thy might (the prince fefidate reply'd;)
Go, and old Priam's trembling fpirit tell,
A new Achilles plung'd thy foul to hell.

Then, firft, his knotted fpear the Trojan threw;
Rough with the bark the pond'rous weapon
flew;

But mighty Juno caus'd it far to glance,
And in the portal fixt the quiv'ring lance.

But hope not thou to 'scape this fword of mine,
Aim'd by a furer, ftronger hand than thine,
The hero cry'd---Then flies againft the foe
With the bright blade; and rifes to the blow.
Sudden the fword tempeftuous cleaves in twain
His cheeks, and finks deep-bury'd in the brain.
Diftain'd with blood, his clafhing arms rebound,
And, as he fell, he fhook the purpled ground:
There, as the mighty bulk lay ftretch'd along,
In equal fhares the parted viſage hung.

Pale with new horror at the dreadful fight,
On ev'ry fide the Trojans urge their flight.
Then had the victor broke the barriers down,
And call'd his focal troops to ftorm the town,
That day had feen their warlike labours o'er;
And ruin'd Troy had been a name no more.
But the mad chief with boundlefs flaughter glows,
And rage infatiate drives him on the foes.

First, valiant Phalaris; next Gyges fell;
 Deep through his knee he drove the pointed steel.
 Then from the dead the reeking darts he drew,
 And in their backs transfix'd the flying crew.
 New strength, new courage, Juno still supply'd:
 And now brave Halys and great Phegeus dy'd:
 Alcander, Prytanis, Noemon fall,
 With warlike Halius, on th' embattled wall,
 High on the works engag'd in other fight---
 Next flew his flaming faulchion to the right,
 And struck bold Lynceus as he call'd around
 For aid, and brav'd him on the lofty mound.
 At one just stroke his head and helmet fly
 Before the sword, and far at distance lie.
 Then fierce, on Amycus the warrior came,
 Whose fatal arrow pierc'd the savage game;
 Who dipp'd the envenom'd steel with matchless
 art,

And double arm'd with death the pointed dart.
 Next Clytius fell, though sprung of race divine;
 Soft Cretheus last, the darling of the nine;
 Well was he skill'd, in sacred strains to sing,
 Tune the sweet lyre, and sweep the trembling
 Arms, and the toils of heroes, to recite, [string;
 The plunging furious steeds, and thunder of the fight. [band,

Now heard the chiefs, who led the Trojan
 What numbers fell by Turnus' conq'ring hand;
 Fierce they advance; when soon appear in fight,
 The slaught'ring hero, and their troops in flight.
 And where? (great Mneftheus rais'd his voice on high)

Where, to what other ramparts would you fly;
 Shall one, and he enclos'd within your wall,
 One rash, imprison'd warrior vanquish all?
 With rage resistless, half an host destroy;
 And open ev'ry bleeding vein of Troy?
 Calm you look on, and see the furious foe
 Plunge crowds of heroes to the shades below;
 Still shall your king, ye base abandon'd train,
 Your country, and your gods, demand your aid in vain?

Rous'd by these words, they rally from afar,
 Breathing revenge, and gath'ring to the war:

The Daunian chief shrinks backward from
 foes,

Where round the works the mighty river flow:
 The Trojans shout; and, with new transport fir
 Rush on embody'd, as the prince retir'd.

As when with tilted spears the clam'rous train
 Invade the brindled monarch of the plain,
 The lordly savage from the shouting foe
 Retires, majestically stern, and slow.

Though singly impotent the crowd to dare,
 Repel, or stand their whole collected war;
 Grim he looks back; he rolls his glaring eye;
 Despairs to conquer; and disdain to fly.

So Turnus paus'd; and by degrees retir'd;
 While shame, disdain, and rage, the hero fir'd.
 Yet twice, ev'n then, he flew amid the train,
 And twice he chas'd them o'er their walls ag
 But now from all the camp their forces ran

Full on the chief; an army on a man!
 Nor longer heav'n's great empress from on high
 Dares with new strength th' exhausted pri
 For winged Iris from the realms above [supp
 Brought the severe decree of angry Jove,

That bad, with threats, th' imperial queen re
 Her favour'd hero from the Trojan wall.

Now his tir'd arm refus'd the sword to wield
 Now flew the darts, and planted all his shield
 The stones now rattle; now the jav'lins sing,
 Indent his arms, and on his helmet ring.

A thousand weapons round his temples lay,
 And strike the honours of his crest away.
 Thick and more thick the foes their lances spe
 With mighty Mneftheus thund'ring at their h
 Pale, breathless, faint, and black with dust
 streams

The sweat descends from all his trembling lim
 Arm'd as he was (thus press'd on ev'ry side),
 He plung'd at last, undaunted, in the tide.

The sacred river, for the welcome load,
 Spreads his wide arms, and wafts him down
 The hero to his hosts the surges bear, [sic Cleans'd from the horrid stains of slaughter, bl and war.

B O O K X.

THE ARGUMENT.

Jupiter calls a council of the gods, and forbids them to engage in either party. At the return Æneas there is a bloody battle. Turnus kills Pallas; Æneas, Lausus, and Mezentius. Mezentius is described as an atheist; Lausus as a pious and virtuous youth. The different actions and deaths of these two are the subject of a noble epifode.

Now wide unfold th' eternal gates of Jove:
 Th' ethereal king convenes the powers above.
 Beneath his eye, both hosts, in full survey,
 The spacious world, and vast creation lay;
 There in the starry courts, enthron'd on high,
 Sate the majestic senate of the sky,
 Rank'd by degrees, along the bright abodes;
 To whom the king of men, and father of the gods;

What discord fires your minds, celestial tra
 Why was our sacred mandate urg'd in vain?
 Did not your sov'reign lord his will declare,
 That Troy and Latium should not wage the war?
 Why are we disobey'd? What vain alarms
 In flame their souls to slaughter, blood, and a
 The destin'd time will wing its fatal way,
 (Nor need your rage anticipate the day)

Yen Carthage, with her proud victorious pow'rs,
 All burst, like thunder, o'er the Roman tow'rs,
 Break the strong Alpine adamantine chains,
 Break down the hills, and deluge all the plains.
 Now, with full licence, your unbounded hate
 And stern revenge may crush the Trojan state.
 I then, ye pow'rs, from wrath and discord
 cease,

And let the nations join in leagues of peace,
 As from the throne, in short, almighty Jove;
 And thus, at large, the beauteous queen of love:
 Fire of men below, and gods on high!

(Or to what other power can Venus fly?)

Art thou not see yon fierce Rutulian train?

With what success proud Turnus sweeps the plain!

Kept by his steeds, triumphant on his car,
 The dreadful hero rules the storm of war.

Let walls can guard my Trojans now from fate;

For, lo! grim slaughter rages in the gate!

With hostile bands the walls are cover'd o'er,
 And the deep trenches float with tides of gore!

My son is absent, while his subjects bleed;

It must we never from a siege be freed?

For, lo, great fire! a second army falls,
 A rising Troy, and thunders at her walls.

Latian fields against the Dardan train,
 Hold the stern Tydides rise again!

Wring though I am from thee, prepar'd I stand
 To bleed once more—and by a mortal hand!

But, if against thy will the Phrygian host
 Have left their Troy, and fought the Latian coast,

Withdraw thy potent aid, O sov'reign god!

And bid the guilty nation mourn in blood!

But since for many signs their course compel,
 The voice of heav'n, and oracles of hell;

Why dares another pow'r thy will debate,
 Or thwart th' unalterable course of fate?

Or boundless vengeance why should I repeat?
 How on Sicilian shores she fir'd the fleet?

How the dispatch'd to yonder world below,
 With that dire charge, the goddess of the bow?

How the grim tyrant of th' Æolian reign
 Let loose th' imprison'd whirlwinds o'er the main?

Well and th' infernal pow'rs were yet untry'd;

Well hell now arms; and rises on her side,
 The fiends, the furies range the realms above,
 And act well worthy of the queen of Jove!

How all the Latian towns Alecto flies,
 And her black visage blasts the golden skies!

How hopes of empire now my thoughts employ
 These were my hopes, when fortune smil'd on Troy.)

Let Troy and Latium fight on yonder plains,
 And fall or conquer as thy will ordains:

Success to the Phrygian race your haughty spouse
 No spot, no corner, of the world allows.

Let I implore thy grace, almighty fire,
 Thy ruin'd Troy, yet smoking from the fire!

Give me, at least, the royal youth to bear
 My dear (Æcanius) from the rage of war!

And let the father, where your vengeful bride
 Fortune points, still wander o'er the tide!

Let h' Idalian realm and Amathus are mine;
 Cythera fair, and Paphos the divine;

Here he may live defended from the foes,
 Off to the charms of fame, in soft repose.

Then, partial goddess, then had been your time,
 To fear for Troy, on that perfidious crime;

Let Aonia let proud Carthage come,
 And hold that empire once decreed to Rome,
 O'er the wide world extend her boundless pow'r;
 Our hopes, and Jove's own promises, no more!

What now avails it, that my godlike heir
 Broke through the hostile fires, and escap'd the Led my poor exiles to the Latian plain, [war;
 And rais'd a city, doom'd to fall again;

What has it now avail'd him, to withstand
 Th' exhausted dangers both of sea and land;

His lot were happier had he scorn'd a crown,
 And slumber'd o'er his ruin'd native town.

O! give their Xanthus to the wretched train,
 Give them their Simois, with their wars again!

Let Greece in arms her vengeful hosts employ Ten long years more, and storm a second Troy!

To whom, with fury sparkling in her eyes,
 Reply'd the haughty empress of the skies:

And why, say, why, O goddess? am I prest
 To wake the wrath, that slumber'd in my breast?

What god, or mortal, bad your son declare,
 Against the Latian lord, so rash a war?

Suppose, fate call'd him to the Latian plains,
 Or (far more likely mad Cassandra's strains!)

Say, did we bid him leave his town behind,
 And trust the mercy of the sea and wind?

Commit the war, and his forsaken Troy,
 To such a head, an unexperienc'd boy?

To court the Tuscan, and with vain alarms!
 To rouse whole nations from repose to arms?

What god, or what perverse intent of ours
 Mov'd the wife prince to leave his rising tow'rs?

Say, does the goddess of the bow appear,
 Or the keen spite of vengeful Juno, here!

'Tis hard, you urge, the Latians should conspire
 To wrap th' unfinished walls of Troy in fire;

That Turnus lives, and holds his native place
 (And yet he sprung from our immortal race);

Was it less hard, that Troy embattled came,
 To waste the Latian lands with sword and flame?

O'er foreign realms to propagate her sway,
 Join fraud to force, and bear their spoils away?

From their own lords the plighted brides to tear?
 To proffer peace, and yet to wage the war?

You, from the foe, your darling son could shroud,
 And, for a man present a figur'd cloud.

You from your navy could the fires restrain,
 And change your ships to Nereids of the main.

Yet in her friends' defence is Juno seen?
 'Tis a high crime in Jove's imperial queen!

Your son, belike, is absent, while the foe
 Invades his tow'rs;—and let him still be so!—

Cythera's isle, and Amathus, are yours;
 The Paphian realms, and soft Idalian shores.

Why shouldst thou then to fights a race incline,
 Long since inur'd to rougher wars than thine?

Did we conspire your empire to destroy?
 Did we urge vengeful Greece to ruin Troy?

We?—or your Paris? your adu't'rous boy?

Who did that black destructive crime inspire?
 Who fann'd the flame, that set two worlds on fire?

Did the lewd youth, at Juno's call, convey,
 From injur'd Sparta's walls, his beauteous prey?

Did we procure? did we retain the fair?
 And, for his lust, support a ten years war?

Then, partial goddess, then had been your time,
 To fear for Troy, on that perfidious crime;

But now, too late, unjustly you complain,
Now vent your anger, and your grief, in vain.

Thus spoke the wrathful queen; the gods divide,

And in mixt murmurs vote on either side:
So, pent in woods, at first with fullen sound
The wind low murmur'ing rolls the forest round;
A dreadful signal to the naval train,
Of the loud storms impending o'er the main.

Then spoke th' almighty father, as he sat
Enthron'd in gold, and clos'd the great debate.
(Th' attentive winds a solemn silence keep;
The wond'ring waves lie level on the deep;
Earth to her centre hook; high heav'n was aw'd; [the god.]

And all th' immortal thrones stood trembling at

Hear then our sacred will, ye pow'rs above;

And mark th' unalterable word of Jove.

Since you refuse to bid your discord cease,

And join the nations in the bonds of peace;

Whatever schemes or hopes the parties frame,

Latium and Troy to Jove are both the same;

Whether in yon fierce leaguer 'tis decreed

That hapless Ilium, or Hesperia bleed.

The stern Rutulians to their toils shall know,

And ev'ry hand shall work its weal or woe.

Your king, inclin'd to neither side, shall wait

The great event, and leave the whole to fate.

This by his brother's awful floods he swore,

That through the black infernal regions roar;

Gave the dreadful signal of the solemn nod,

With his bent brows; the sanction of the god!

From sky to sky the strong concussion rolls;

And all Olympus trembled to the poles.

Thus did the fire the high contention close;

Then from the throne majestically rose;

With him at once the sacred senate rise.

And to his palace wait the sov'reign of the skies.

Meanwhile, at ev'ry gate, the Latian pow'rs

Crowd to destroy their foes, and fire the tow'rs.

By hosts surrounded, in despair to fly,

Close in their trench, the helpless Trojans lie.

Yet some undaunted on the ramparts stand,

And guard the works; a brave but slender band.

There, sprung from Imbrasia, bold Asius shone:

Thymoetes next, fam'd Hicetaon's son.

The dread Asaraci their succour bring;

With them, two brothers of the Lycian king.

Thybris and Castor next, a martial pair,

Full in the front repel the rising war,

These Acmon join'd, from fair Lyrnessus' shore;

With all his strength a broken rock he bore:

He match'd his brother Mnestheus' wond'rous

might,

And his father great Clytius in the fight.

Some, pond'rous stones, some pointed jav'lins aim,

And gaul the foe with shafts, or missile flame.

Amid the train, bright Venus' darling care,

Ascanius shone; his beauteous head was bare;

A golden chain constrains his locks, that deck,

In glossy sable curls, his lovely neck:

So shines a gem, illustrious to behold,

On some fair virgin's neck enchas'd with gold:

So the surrounding ebon's darker hue

Improves the polish'd ivory to the view.

Thee too, stern Ifnarus, O chief divine!

A great descendent of the Lydian line,

(Born where the peasants turn the costly mould, Enrich'd by bright Pactolus' tides of gold)

The hosts admir'd; while fierce thy twanging
bow

Discharg'd thy poison'd arrows at the foe.

Brave Capys next succeeds, a chief of fame,

From whom proud Capua since deriv'd her name.

Great Mnestheus clos'd the band, of high renown,

Since late he cast bold Turnus from the town.

These all the rigid toils of fight sustain;

Meantime, by night, their gen'ral ploughs the
main.

For when th' prince had left th' Arcadian coast,

And fought the leader of the Lydian host;

With pray'rs declar'd his bus'ness, race, and name;

And with what force their vengeful tyrant came;

How the Rutulian rag'd; what turns of fate

And chance of war attend the mortal fate;

Strait with the league propos'd, the chief complies,

And joins his forces to his new allies.

Now, uncontrol'd by fate, the martial train,

Led by a foreign hero, cleave the main:

In pomp, before, Æneas' gally pass;

His lofty stem the Phrygian lions grac'd;

There, banish'd Troy's delight, her sculptur'd Ide,

Hangs o'er the foamy surge, and shades the tide.

Here fate the chief with various thoughts opprest,

The fate of war revolving in his breast;

Close by his side th' Arcadian prince inquires

Of the swift motions of the heavenly fires;

What seas he measur'd; and what lands he sought;

What storms he suffer'd, and what fields he fought.

Ye muses! now unlock your sacred spring,

Inspire the bard, and teach him how to sing,

What ships, what heroes, what auxiliary hosts,

Sail'd with Æneas from the Tuscan coasts.

The Tiger first the foamy flood divides,

And bears a thousand warriors through the tides,

Who came beneath great Mæsticus' command,

From Cosa's turrets, and the Clusian land.

Close to their sides their polish'd quivers fate;

Strung were their bows; their arrows wing'd with fate.

Six hundred move beneath fierce Abas' care,

From Populonia to the field of war.

Rich in her endless beds of steely ore,

The rugged Ilva sends three hundred more:

All, train'd to fight; all, glorious to behold;

And, on the stern, Apollo flam'd in gold.

With groves of waving spears, in thick array,

From Pisa's walls a thousand took their way;

They march embattled from the Tuscan land,

And great Asylas leads the martial band;

Asylas, skillful sage! whose piercing eyes

Discern'd all signs on earth, or in the skies.

His heart from entrails certain omens drew,

From stars and birds, and lightnings as they flew

Next beauteous Astur plough'd the wat'ry field

Proud of his bounding steed and sculptur'd shield

From where old Pyrgus' lofty turrets rise,

And rank Graviccan marshes taint the skies,

Where Cære groan'd beneath Mezentius' reign,

And gurgling Minio glitters o'er the plain;

Three hundred march beneath the leader's care,

Breathing revenge, and eager all for war.

Nor thou unshung, brave Cinyras, shall pass.

The martial chief of the Ligurian race;

For thou, Cúpero, under whose command,
 Advanc'd to fight a small, but valiant band.
 White plumes adorn thy crest, and wave above,
 Expressive of thy fire *, transform'd by love.
 While for his Phæton his sorrows flow,
 And soft harmonious strains beguile his woe ;
 While in the dusky poplar grove he made
 His melting moans, beneath the sisters shade,
 'E'er all the man the snowy feathers rise,
 And in a tuneful swan he mounts the skies.

Now his great offspring with his social train,
 In the huge Centaur plough'd the roaring main.
 High on the prow the figur'd monster stood,
 And shook a rocky fragment o'er the flood,
 The founding keel the thronging waves disjoint'd,
 That foam, and whiten, in long tracks behind.

Next warlike Ocnus brought his troops along,
 From prescient Manto and great Tyber sprung ;
 By him, fair Mantua rose, immortal town !
 And from his mother's name deriv'd her own.
 Her mighty walls, illustrious founders grace,
 Of different countries, and a different race.
 Three tribes distinct possess her fertile lands,
 And four fair cities every tribe commands.
 Proud of her Tuscan line, with glory crown'd,
 She reigns the mistress of the nations round.

Next, generous hate to stern Mezentius draws
 Five hundred more, in freedom's sacred cause.
 Where, crown'd with reeds, the Mincio takes his course

From old Benacus' venerable source,
 In one vast ship he pours the warlike train,
 Down through his native channel to the main.
 Pierced for revenge, the great Auletes guides
 Th' enormous bulk, that labours through the tides.
 An hundred pines the boiling ocean sweep,
 Plough the white waves, and lash the bellowing
 A mighty Triton, figur'd on the prow, [deep.
 With his loud trump alarms the sea below.

Down to his waist the human form descends,
 But in a whale th' amphibious monster ends.
 Swift as he swims, the waters fly before ; [roar.
 And, dash'd beneath the god, the frothy surges
 So many chiefs in thirty vessels ride

To Troy's defence, and cleave the sparkling tide.
 Now radiant Cynthia, through th' ethereal
 height,

Rode in the solemn chariot of the night.
 Fixt at the stern, the helm Æneas plies ;
 No creeping slumber seals his careful eyes.
 Amid the seas, he meets the wond'rous train
 Of ships transform'd to Nereids of the main ;
 As many goddesses, as stood before,
 With brazen beaks, tall vessels on the shore.
 They know the chief from far, and in a ring
 The dancing Nymphs enclose their wond'ring king.
 The first whose eloquence excell'd the rest,
 Above the waves advanc'd her ivory breast ;
 Held with one hand the stern, while one divides,
 With many an easy stroke, the silent tides :
 And dost thou wake, great offspring of the skies ?
 Wake still, and open ev'ry sail (she cries) :
 Thy ships are we that once on Ida stood,
 Now chang'd by heav'n to Nereids of the flood.
 When the perfidious proud Rutulian came
 With the dread sword, and the devouring flame,

* Cycnus,

We burst our anchors, by the foe compell'd,
 And fought our master o'er the wat'ry field.
 These forms the mother of the skies bestow'd,
 And made each ship a goddess of the flood :
 Low in the sacred seas our court we keep.
 And dwell beneath the roarings of the deep,
 Shut in the town, remains thy royal heir,
 Midst all the terrors of the Latian war.
 The brave Arcadian horse, and Tuscan host,
 Have reach'd the land, and seiz'd th' appointed post.

The Daunian chief has sent a squadron down
 To stop their destin'd progress to the town.
 Rise, hero ! rise ; and, with the dawning light,
 Lead all th' impatient warriors to the fight.
 With thy Vulcanian orb invade the field,
 That golden, bright, impenetrable shield.
 The morning sun (nor think my promise vain !)
 Shall see wait heroes of fierce Rutulians slain.
 This said ; the goddess (for she knew the way)
 Push'd the light vessel o'er the glassy sea :
 Swift as a jav'lin, or a storm she flew ;
 And, wing'd with rival speed, her course the rest pursue.

While at the sight the hero stood amaz'd,
 The prosperous sign his bounding spirits rais'd.
 Then, as he fixt on heav'n his joyful eyes,
 To potent Cybele the warrior cries :

Great guardian queen of Ida's hills and woods,
 Supreme, majestic mother of the gods !
 Whose strong defence proud tow'ring cities share,
 While roaring lions whirl thy mighty car !
 Oh ! kindly second this auspicious sign,
 And grace thy Phrygians with thy aid divine.
 Inspir'd by thee, the combat I require,
 My bosom kindles, and my soul's on fire !

He said ; and now the bright revolving day
 Blaz'd o'er the world, and chas'd the shades away ;
 When first the hero bade the train prepare,
 All rang'd beneath their banners, for the war ;
 Rouse for the charge their courage, and excite
 Their martial ardor, to provoke the fight.

As on his stern the godlike warrior stands,
 And views distinct his camp and social bands ;
 High in his hand the golden shield he rais'd :
 Wide o'er the flood the strong effulgence blaz'd.
 Fir'd with new hopes, the joyful Trojans spy
 The shining orb ; their darts and jav'lins fly ;
 And their loud clamours tempest all the sky. }
 Less loud the thick-embod' d cranes repair,
 In ranks embattled, through the clouds of air ;
 When, at the signal giv'n, they leave behind,
 With rapid flight, the pinions of the wind.

Amaz'd stood Turnus, and their Latian foes,
 Not knew from whence the sudden transport rose ;
 Till all th' advancing navy they survey,
 A floating scene, that cover'd half the sea.
 From great Æneas' crest the lightnings stream,
 And his bright helmet darts a ruddy gleam ;
 A length of flames the mighty shield displays,
 Shoots fires on fires, and pours a boundless blaze.
 So the dire comet, with portentous light
 And baleful beams, glares dreadful in the night ;
 So the red dog-star, when he mounts on high,
 And with his fatal splendor fires the sky.
 Scares the pale nations ; for his burning breath
 Darts down disease, blue pestilence, and death.

But still, undaunted, Turnus urg'd the train,
To seize the shore, and drive them to the main.

Lo! what you long have wish'd, to prove your might, [sight!--

The hour!--the place!--the foe!--the promis'd
Your wives, your sons, your country calls you on,
Your great forefathers glories and your own.
Now while, with slidd'ring steps, to gain the land
The Trojans toil; descend we to the strand;
Soon as on yonder shore our bands appear,
One noble stroke, my friends, shall end the war:
The brave command success!--The hero said;
Then with himself for one cool moment weigh'd,
To the bold task what chosen troops to call,
And to what bands intrust the leaguer'd wall.

Meantime the hero lands his warlike train;
Some watch, impatient, the retreating main;
Then vault, and seize the half-recover'd shores;
Some slide, more vent'rous, down the bending
oars.

A place at length the daring Tarchon spy'd,
Where in smooth swellings roll'd an easy tide;
There, as no waters break, no billows roar,
He fears no shoals, but hopes a friendly shore.
Thither his vessels from the deep he drew,
And eager thus exhorts the naval crew:
Now, now my friends, exert your utmost force,
Ply, ply your oars, and urge the furious course.
Push, heave your desprate gallees to the strand;
Plough with your beaks and keels the hostile land.
My sole ambition is to gain the coast:
And then---no matter---let the ship be lost.

So spoke th' impatient chief; and, as he spoke,
They ply their oars, and rise to ev'ry stroke.
Full on the land the rushing vessels bore,
Till with their prows they cleave the sandy shore.
Safe to the shelving beach the gallees run;
All 'scap'd the shock, brave Tarchon, but thy own.
Thy own amid the shallows rush'd, and there
Dash'd on the rock, and sloping hung in air:
Prest by a war of waves, her shatter'd sides
Burst, and the crew plunge headlong in the tides.
They swim, encumber'd with their broken oars:
The floods supplant their feet, and bear them from the shores.

Meantime against the Trojans, on the coast,
Brave Turnus led his close embattled host.
The sprightly trumpets sound with martial strains,
When great Æneas charg'd the Latian swains;
The valiant Theron slew, with matchless might,
The first auspicious omen of the fight;
A giant chief; his furious course he held
Against the prince, the foremost of the field.
Fierce thro' his shield and mail (an op'ning wide!)
Flew the swift sword, and pierc'd the warrior's side.

Then Lycas bled, and stain'd the thirsty shore,
To Phœbus sacred from his natal hour;
Ripp'd from the womb, the infant 'scap'd the steel!
The man, unhappy! by the faulchion fell.
Cyas and Cisseus next the hero slew,
As their huge clubs whole armies overthrew.
Vain was their strength, their bulk, their martial
fire,

Vain their Herculean arms, and boasted fire,
Alcides' friend; whose glorious steps he trod,
While earth-supply'd new monsters for the god.

As loudly vannting, haughty Pharos stood,
Fixt in his throat, the jav'lin drank his blood.
On Cydon next, who, fir'd with lawless joy,
Fair Clytius courted and caref'd the boy,
With all his force the mighty hero drove,
And soon had smish'd his prepost'rous love;
Soon had the youth, expiring on the shore,
Sunk, and indulg'd his guilty flames no more;
But Phorcus' sons, seven valiant warriors, flew,
And all at once their vengeful jav'lins threw;
Some from his buckler and his helm rebound,
Some, turn'd by Venus, glance upon the ground.
Thus prest'd, thus compais'd round on ev'ry side,
The wrathful prince to brave Achates cry'd;
Bring, bring those darts (not one shall fly in vain)
That pierc'd the Grecians on the Trojan plain.
Then a long lance with all his might he cast,
Through Mæon's shield the furious weapon pass'd;
Through the strong cuirais pierc'd the hissing
dart,

Transfix'd his breast, and quiver'd in his heart.
The good Alcanor lends his friendly hand,
To raise his grov'ling brother from the sand;
But, wing'd with death, a second jav'lin flies,
Swift as the first, and sings along the skies;
Through his extended arm the spear was slung;
And by the nerves the dying member hung.
His brother Numitor the weapon drew
From the pale corse, and at the victor threw;
The whizzing dart glanc'd innocently by,
But slightly raz'd Achates' manly thigh.

Next Clausus, flush'd with youthful strength and grace,

(Clausus, the leader of the Sabine race)
Beheld the mighty Dryops from afar,
And launch'd his pointed spear aloft in air,
Which pierc'd his throat; the purple hand o
death

Suppress'd the voice, and stopp'd the vital breath
Headlong he falls; he grovels on the shore,
And his pale mouth ejects a flood of gore.
Still rushing on, the chief the slaughter spread;
By various deaths three sons of Boreas bled.
As many more, poor hapless youths! expire;
Their country Thrace, and Idas was their fire.
Against the prince his bands Halesus leads,
And fierce Messapus lash'd his fiery steed.
In furious conflict mix'd, both armies stand
On the first verge, and margin of the land;
They meet, they fight; but neither gain, no
yield;

And level hung the balance of the field.
As when the winds from different quarters rise,
Pour to the charge, and combat in the skies,
In due suspense the struggling tempests keep
The balanc'd clouds, and poise the rolling deep;
The winds and waves oppos'd with equal might.
Still undecided hangs th' æreal fight:
So join both armies in the dubious fray;
These, scorn'd to yield, nor those can win the day
All, man to man, exert the martial fire;
All, foot to foot, or conquer, or expire.

But, in a diff'rent quarter, where the floods
Had spread the ground with shatter'd rocks ar
woods,

Th' Arcadian squadrons from their steeds alight
And wage on foot an unaccustom'd fight:

Now to an open route their ranks inclin'd,
And close their foes came thund'ring from behind.

This saw their chief, brave Pallas, with despair;
He saw, and strove to stop the flying war;
And thus the troops, as headlong they retir'd,
With pray'rs he mov'd, or with reproaches fir'd:
Whither, ah, whither would you turn your flight?
By your past deeds! by ev'ry former fight!
By all your triumphs! by your for'reign's name!
By my own hopes to match my father's fame!
Trust not your feet; your hands must hew your
way

Through yon black body, and that thick array.
Here, here, your country calls you all, to share
With your young chief the glories of the war.
Rush to the fight; no gods our arms oppose;
Men, like ourselves, and mortal, are our foes.
In us an equal strength and soul appears,
Our hands and spirits are as bold as theirs.
Lo! there the foes our bands imprison'd keep!
And here th' eternal barriers of the deep!
Back on the seas, ye dastards, would ye fall?
Or hide your shameful heads in yon beleaguer'd wall?

He said; and rushing on the hostile bands,
First in his way ill-fated Lagos stands;
Low as he stoop'd, a mighty stone to rear,
Full in the reins descends the pointed spear;
Then, as he disengag'd the dart with pain,
Fir'd at the sight, bold Histon rush'd in vain
Against the prince; the prince his bosom gor'd,
And plung'd into the lungs his thund'ring sword:
Nex., lewd Anchemolus his saulchion sped,
Who dar'd to stain his stepdame's sacred bed.
You too, ye Daumian twins, unhappy pair!
Laris and Thymer! perish'd in the war:
So like your features, that your parents look
On either face, but each for each mistook.
Puzzled, yet pleas'd, they gaz'd on either child,
And fondly in the dear delusion smil'd.
Now clears brave Pallas, in the dire debate,
The nice distinction by a diff'rent fate.
Thy head, fair Thymer, flies before the sword;
Thy hand, poor Laris, fought its absent lord;
Thy dying fingers, quiv'ring on the plain,
With starts convulsive grasp the steel in vain.

The Arcadian squadrons, by their prince inrousd by his words, by his example fir'd, [spir'd,
Disdain to fly, and arms to arms oppose;
Grief, shame, and fury, drive them on the foes.
From Tenthras and from Tyres, on his car
Pale Rhœteus shoots impetuous through the war;
While Pallas his swift dart at Ilus threw,
It pierc'd the hapless warrior as he flew.
The winged death the hapless warrior itay'd,
And for a space, poor Ilus' fate delay'd;
He tumbles from the car, disdain'd, with gore,
And, grim in death, lies foaming on the shore.
As, when the summer glows with fervid rays,
The shepherd sets the forest in a blaze,
The groves all kindle, while the winds conspire,
And with their breath enrage the roaring fire:
Wide and more wide the conflagration flies,
Pours o'er the fields and thunders to the skies:
On some steep mountain sits the joyful swain,
While the victorion flames devour the plain.

VOL. XII.

So pleas'd, brave Pallas sees th' Arcadian pow'rs,
All fir'd with vengeance, sweep along the shores.

Halefus flew to meet the conquer'ing foe;
Sheath'd in bright arms, he rose to ev'ry blow.
First Ladon sunk beneath his pointed steel;
Then great Demodocus and Pheres fell.
While bold Strymonius flies before the band
To seize his throat: the saulchion lops his hand:
Hurl'd from his arm, a stone descended full
On Thoas' head, and crush'd the batter'd skull.
His old prophetic fire, with tender care,
Conceal'd, and warn'd Halefus from the war.
But when in death he clos'd his aged eyes,
The fatal sisters claim'd their destin'd prize.
Now stood the warrior (for his hour drew near)
A victim sacred to th' Evandrian spear.
His jav'lin Pallas at the victor throws,
But first the youth prefers his ardent vows;
O father Tyber! give my winged dart,
To fly direct through proud Halefus' heart!
His arms and spoils thy sacred oak shall bear;
So pray'd the youth; the god allows his pray'r.
Halefus shields Imaon from the foe,
But leaves his breast all naked to the blow.
He fell; his fall alarm'd the Latian host:
They wept, and mourn'd the mighty hero lost.
But soon brave Lausus rais'd them from despair;
Lausus, who shone conspicuous in the war.
Stern Abas first he slew, of matchless might,
Who stood unmov'd, the bulwark of the fight.
Now bled the Tuscan, now th' Arcadian train,
And Troy's bold sons, who scap'd the Greeks in vain.

Fierce to the fight beneath their chiefs they came;
Their chiefs, their numbers, and their strength,
the same.

The rear, close pressing to the dire alarms, [arms.
Th' encumber'd troops scarce wield their useless
Here Pallas fires his train, and Lausus there;
In all their charms the blooming youths appear.
Poor, hapless youths! alas your native plain
Must never, never bless your eyes again!
In vain would you engage! for Jove withstands;
Both, both must fall; but fall by greater hands!

Now Turnus to the aid of Lausus came,
Warn'd by his sister *, the celestial dame;
Through cleaving ranks he drives his kindling car
With furious speed, and thunders through the war.
Forbear, forbear; nor touch my due, he cries;
For Pallas, Pallas is your leader's prize.
To me, to me alone belongs the fight:
Oh! could his fire be witness to the fight!
He said; and at the word, th' obedient train
At once retir'd, and left an open plain.
The youth with wonder saw the parting band,
Heard the bold challenge, and the proud command,

With many a fiery glance he roll'd his eyes
Around his manly limbs, and ample size; }
And to his haughty foe, in short replies:
Now, by thy royal spoils I will acquire Immortal fame; or gloriously expire!
Then vaunt no more, for know, almighty Jove
Beholds the fight impartial, from above.
This said; amid the field the hero strode;
All chill'd with fear, the pale Arcadians stood.

* Juturna.

Q 9

The Daunian chief sprung dreadful from the car,
And rush'd on foot, impetuous to the war;
Rush'd, as a lion, from the mountain's height,
On some stern bull, that meditates the fight.

But soon as Pallas saw the prince appear
Within due distance of the flying spear,
Tho' far o'er-match'd, the youth his fortune tries;
And, ere he threw the dart, invok'd the skies:
O great Alcides! by my father's feat,
Thyself vouchsaf'd to grace, a glorious guest;
Assist his son, and crown his bold design;
Let Turnus fall, and own the conquest mine;
And, while the victor-spoils the bloody prize,
View the proud trophy with his closing eyes.
His ardent pray'r with grief Alcides hears,
And pours a flood of unavailing tears:

While in his breast he check'd the rising groan,
Th' all-gracious father footh'd his sorrowing son:
To all that breathe, is fixt th' appointed date;
Life is but short, and circumscrib'd by fate:
'Tis virtue's work, by fame to stretch the span,
Whose scanty limit bounds the days of man.
How many sons of gods were doom'd to fall,
Great as they were! beneath the Trojan wall?
Great as he was! among the mighty dead,
Ev'n my own son, the brave Sarpedon bled:
Fierce Turnus too the cruel fates attend,
And now, ev'n now, his race is at an end.

This said; th' almighty lov'regn of the skies
Turns from the scene of blood his sacred eyes:
Now with full force his jav'lin Pallas threw
And from the sheath the shining faulchion drew.
The whizzing spear, with erring course impell'd,
Flew through the ringing margin of the shield,
And glancing, raz'd the shoulder of the foe.—
Then Turnus shook the lance; prepar'd to throw;
He shook the lance; and see, he cry'd, if mine
Reach not the mark; a surer dart than thine!
He said, and threw. The spear with forceful sway
Broke, through the solid shield, its destin'd way;
Through ev'ry steely plate, and brazen fold,
Through strong bull-hides, around the buckler
roll'd;

Through the thick cuirass flew the furious dart,
Transfix'd his breast, and planted in his heart.
From the wide wound in vain the lance he tore,
The purple soul came floating with the gore.
Down sunk the youth; his rattling arms rebound;
He spurns, and grinds in blood the hostile ground.
Then, as he strode, exulting, o'er the dead,
Thus to th' Arcadian train the victor said:
Go!—be this message to your master known;
Such as the fire deserv'd, I send the son;
Unbrib'd, unfought his relics I bestow,
If fun'ral honours can relieve his woe.
Dear for the Trojans friendship has he paid!—
Then, with his foot he prest the prostrate dead;
Seiz'd his embroider'd belt, a glorious prey!
And from his bosom rent the prize away.
In this rich belt, with precious gold inlaid,
His utmost art Eurytion had display'd.
Here, thick emboss'd, the fifty daughters shed
Their consorts blood, and stain'd the bridal bed:
The rais'd, bold figures, all divinely bright
Came out, and stood projecting to the sight.
This spoil proud Turnus with triumphant eyes
Surveys, and glories in the costly prize.

But man, too happy in a prosp'rous state,
Grows blind and heedless of his future fate:
The time shall come, when Turnus in dismay,
Shall mourn these spoils, and this victorious day
Shall wish, too late! the golden belt unsought,
And curse the tropics he so dearly bought!

With groans and tears th' Arcadians, on a shield
Bear back their breathless leader from the field.

Thus to thy father's arms dost thou retire,
Brave youth, the grief and glory of thy fire!
O early lost! with strength and beauty grac'd!
This thy first day of warfare was thy last:
Yet didst thou scatter death through half an host
And, ere thy own, a thousand lives were lost.

Now by spectators, not the voice of fame,
To Troy's great chief these mournful tidings came
That round his friends, on danger, danger grows,
Who claim his aid encompass'd by the foes.

With his huge weighty sword, without delay,
Through bleeding ranks he cleaves an ample way
Thee, Turnus, thee he seeks along the plain,
Proud of the spoils of hapless Pallas slain.

The genial feat; the son the fire combin'd,
Leagues, friendship, all, came rushing on his mind.

Four youths by Sulmo, four by Ufens, bred,
Unhappy victims! destin'd to the dead,
He seiz'd alive, to offer on the pyre,
And sprinkle with their blood the funeral fire.
At Magnus next his furious spear he cast,
But o'er his head the quiv'ring weapon past:
The wretch embrac'd his knees, and try'd with art
To bend his stern, inexorable heart.

By thy dead father's shade, thy suppliant spare!
By all the hopes of thy surviving heir!
Preserve, victorious prince, this life alone,
'To glad a longing father and a son!
High in my dome are silver talents roll'd,
With piles of labour'd and unlabour'd gold,
These, to procure my ransom, I resign;
The war depends not on a life like mine!
One, one poor life, can no such difference yield,
Nor turn the mighty balance of the field!

Thy talents (cry'd the prince), thy treasure'd store
Keep for thy sons; but talk of terms no more.
Your chief, when Pallas he depriv'd of breath,
Left no conditions but revenge and death.
So deems my living son; my life below;
And, from this sword, demand the life of ev'ry foe.
This said; he seiz'd his helm; and while he pray'd
Deep-bury'd in his neck the flaming blade.

Apollo's priest, illustrious Æmon's son,
In purple robes and radiant armour shone.
The sacred fillets bind his brows in vain!
Swift flies the gaudy warrior o'er the plain.
Beneath the prince the hapless victim dies,
And fate in endless slumber seals his eyes.
Serestus strips his arms; a costly load;
A trophy destin'd to the Thracian god.

Umbro, the Marlian chief, exerts his might;
And valiant Cæculus renews the fight,
Against the prince he warms the troops in vain!
He pours, he storms, he thunders through the plain
Lops warlike Anxur's arms; the hand and shield
Drop down, an useless burden on the field.
Before he vaulted, and he seem'd to rise
In his proud thought, exalted, to the skies!

But ah! in vain he rais'd his haughty mind,
With the fond hope of years on years behind!

In arms great Tarquitus all-blazing stood,
Sprung from a Dryad and a Sylvan god.

Full in the hero's front he dar'd appear;
But through his shield and corset flew the spear.

Then as he pray'd, and begg'd his life in vain,
He lopp'd his head, that roll'd along the plain.

The trunk still beating on the ground below,
Thus in proud triumph spokè his conqu'ring foe:

Lie 'mighty warrior, there! no mother's hand
Shall now inter thee in thy native land;

But hungry beasts thy wretched corse shall tear,
The fishes of the flood, and fowls of air.

Lycas and brave Antæus next he kill'd,
Fierce as they fought the champions of the field.

Numa; and fair Camertes, then he slew,
Who from bold Volcens his proud lineage drew.

By far the wealthiest of the Latian train;
And soft Amyclæ own'd his easy reign.

And as, of old, the huge Ægeon stood
Engag'd in battle with the thund'ring god;

Shook high Olympus with the dire alarms,
And wag'd the war with all his hundred arms;

Long flames from fifty months the fiend expires
Back to the skies, and answers fires with fires;

As many shining swords he shook, and held,
Oppos'd to ev'ry bolt, a pond'rous shield.

So, when his reeking swords in blood was dy'd,
Fought the brave prince, and rag'd on ev'ry side.

'Now fierce he rush'd again! Nypheus' car,
Who shone conspicuous in the ranks of war;

With wild affright the startled steeds beheld
The tow'ring hero blazing o'er the field;

Tlew back, and cast their master on the plain;
Then whirl'd the bounding chariot to the main.

Liger and Lucagus next came in view:
Drawn by white coursers, through the troops they flew;

Two haughty brothers; that the coursers sway'd;
Their brandish'd high in air the glittering blade.

Their threats the Trojan chief disdain'd to bear,
Cush'd on, and shook aloft the pointed spear.

'O Phrygian fields are these (proud Liger said),
Nor these the steeds of Argive Diomede;

'You 'scape not this, as once Achilles' car;
Here ends thy life, and here shall end the war!

'Thus the mad boaster—but, devoid of fear,
The prince, in answer, launch'd his whizzing spear.

'Then, while the brother, bending o'er the horse,
Vith his keen jav'lin urg'd the hery course.

'And, with one foot protended, rush'd to fight,
The lance, that instant, wing'd its fatal flight;

'Beneath the shining margin of the shield,
Wist through the groin the pointed jav'lin held.

'Down sinks the warrior with a dreadful sound,
And, grim in death, lies grow'ling on the ground.

'The conquering prince beheld him as he bled,
And thus, in scornful terms, bespoke the dead:

'For were your coursers slow; nor vain affright
In empty shadows turn'd your steeds to flight;

'Courself, brave Lucagus, forsook the car,
And, vaulting on the field, declin'd the war!

'His said; he seiz'd the coursers by the reign;

'When thus the brother, cast upon the plain,
Vith lifted hands implor'd the chief in vain;

Now, by thy self, thy mercy I implore;

By those who such a godlike hero bore;

This forfeit life, divine Æneas, spare,

And with soft pity listen to my pray'r.—

In far, far diff'rent terms you talk'd before;

Die then (replies the prince), and plead no more;

Go!—'tis a brother's part—in duty go,

And wait thy brother to the realms below!

He rais'd the sword aloft, as thus he said,

And in his bosom plung'd the pointed blade.

Thus, like a storm or torrent, o'er the ground

He rush'd, and spread the slaughter wide around;

Till from their works, so long besieg'd in vain,

Break forth Æscanius and the Trojan train.

While thus the battle bled; imperial Jove

Address'd his consort in the realms above,

As both from heav'n survey'd the deathful scene:

Say, sister-goddess, and my beauteous queen,

Still, is it still your thought, that Venus' care

Supports her favour'd Trojans in the war?

See! how the martial bands increase in might!

Strong from their wounds! and vig'rous for the fight!

Can such brave heroes, who such dangers prove,

Depend for succour on the queen of love?

And why, my lord, submissive, she rejoin'd,

These words severe, to rack my anxious mind?

Did still your love (as sure it should) remain,

A wife and sister might not plead in vain,

That from the field poor Turnus may retire,

Exempt from death, and glad his longing fire.—

But let him die, since Jove has so decreed!—

To glut the Trojan vengeance, let him bleed!—

And yet his birth might some distinction claim,

Since from our own celestial line he came.

To thy great name, due honours has he paid,

And rich oblations on thy altars laid.

Thus spokè the suppliant queen; and thus replies,

In brief, th' almighty sovereign of the skies:

If 'tis your pray'r to spare his forfeit breath,

By a short respite of approaching death;

Snatch him this instant from the fatal hour.

This grace we grant him;—and we grant no more.

For if you beg his destin'd life to spare;

Or turn the course and fortune of the war;

Vain your request, and vain your hope appears—

To whom once more, the pensive queen, with tears

And what, my lord, if you reverse the doom?

Spare the dear youth, and save him from the tomb!

Ev'n from your soul this grace if you will give,

(Which scarce you promise) that he yet may live!

Ah! now I see, or in my fears portend,

The guiltless youth approaching to his end!

But may those fears, my sov'reign lord, be vain,

And your almighty pow'r recal his doom again!

This said; with momentary speed she flies,

Wrapt in a winged whirlwind, down the skies;

In sable storms she drives the clouds before;

Then to the fields of fight her course she bore;

There, in Æneas' shape, a figur'd shade

Of light impassive air, the goddess made.

A Trojan spear the spectre seem'd to wield,

Wore a proud crest and imitated shield!

And spokè with empty words, in vaunting strain,

And, like the chief, came tow'ring o'er the plain.

(Such are the fleeting forms in visions bred,

And such the gliding spectres of the dead.)

The threat'ning phantom made his bold advance,
On Turnus call'd, and shook his airy lance.
The Daunian prince his founding jav'lin threw;
While with dissembled fear, the phantom flew.
Deluded Turnus thought the Trojan fled,
Burn'd with new hopes, and thus exulting, said:
Flies then Æneas, to his fears resign'd,
And leaves a prince's royal bed behind?---
The land, for which he cross'd the stormy wave,
This arm shall give---and here he finds a grave!
Then shook his sword, and chas'd him through the
war;

But his short triumph soon was lost in air!

By chance a ship stood anchor'd by the shore,
(Which late, from Clusium, king Ofinius bore)
Close shelter'd by a rock, that breaks the tides;
The planks were laid, to climb her lofty sides.
Swift to her darksome hold the shade withdrew;
As swift glad Turnus to the vessel flew.
That instant Juno cut the cords away,
Unmoor'd the bark, and launch'd her on the sea.
Meantime Æneas seeks his absent foe,
And sends whole squadrons to the ghosts below.
No more for shelter now the phantom flies,
But mounts aloft, and mixes with the skies.
While Turnus far in open ocean sails,
(The vessel wafted by the rising gales)
Maay a long look, back on the battle bends,
And hears the cries of his forsaken friends:
On such hard terms abhors to live, and rears
His hands and voice, in anguish, to the stars:

What are my crimes, almighty Jove, that claim

This endless infamy to blast my name?
This dreadful doom is too severe by far;
This load of life is more than I can bear!
Whence came I here? and whither am I borne?
How could I fly?---ah! how shall I return?
Oh! with what eyes can I behold again
Yon regal walls, or yon deserted train?
How will my friends pursue my name with hate?
By me, their worthy chief, expos'd to fate!
Those friends (ye gods) I left on yonder plain,
In my curs'd cause and quarrel, to be slain!
Ha!--- now I see 'em fly, or bite the ground!---
I hear, I start at ev'ry dying sound,
What, what can now be done?---on land or sea
What gulf will open for a wretch like me?
Ye winds, ye storms, your pity I implore,
Drive, drive my bark on some rough rocky shore,
Where, nor my friends, nor fame, may ever find me more!

This said; the prince debates, by shame op-
press'd,

Whether to plunge the saulchion in his breast;
Or from the vessel leap amid the main,
Swim back and mingle in the fight again.
Thrice on each bold resolve his soul was bent;
And thrice great Juno check'd the rash intent.
The goddess waits him down, secure from harms,
Lands, and restores him to his father's arms.

Mezentius now, inspir'd by Jove's commands,
Succeeds the chief, invades the Trojan bands.
On him, and him alone the Tuscans ran,
With a'l their darts; an army on a man,
But, like a rock, the dire alarm he stood;
A rock, whose sides project in to the flood;

That hears, above, the furious whirlwind blow,
And sees the frothy billows break below;
But stands unmov'd, majestically high,
And braves the idle rage of ocean and the sky.

First Dolicaon's son the monarch slew;
Next on the trembling Latagus he flew;
Fierce in his hand a pond'rous stone he took,
And on his visage dash'd the broken rock;
Then drove thro' Palmus knee the pointed steel:
And left the warrior grov'ling where he fell.
His glitt'ring arms young Lausus' shoulders spread,
And the plum'd helmet nodded o'er his head.
Next Evas bleeds beneath his vengeful spear,
With Mimas, Paris' friend and bold compeer;
Theano bore him when the queen of Troy,
Pregnant with flame, produc'd the fatal boy;
Yet in his native land was Paris slain!
But hapless Mimas on a foreign plain!

And as some mighty boar, who long has fed
High on the rough aerial mountain's head,
Chas'd by the hounds, shoots down the hanging
With speed impetuous to the vale below; [brow
When on the toils the furious monster flies,
O'er his bent back the starting bristles rise;
Stopp'd and entangled, now he foams with ire;
Now his red eye-balls glare with living fire.
The clam'rous hunters, cautious to engage,
With shouts and darts a distant combat wage;
He turns, he grinds his teeth; and, void of fear,
Shakes his huge sides, and sheds the scatter'd war Thus (though inflam'd with just revenge they stand)

None dare engage the monarch hand to hand;
But from afar their missile darts they fling,
And with loud shouts provoke the raging king.

Acron, of Argive race, for fame had fled
The joys of love, and left the spousal bed.
In purple plumes he tow'r'd, with gaudy pride,
Grac'd with the favours of his beauteous bride.
The Tufcan king beheld him from afar,
Scatt'ring the ranks, and glitt'ring thro' the war

As when a lion, that, with hunger bold,
Roams grimly round the fences of the fold,
Spies a tall goat, the chief of all the train,
Or beamy stag, high-stalking o'er the plain;
His horrid mane he rears, he runs, he flies,
Expands his jaws, and darts upon the prize;
The prize he rends, with a tremendous roar,
And, growling, rages in a foam of gore:
Thus, on th' embattled foes, Mezentius flew,
And Acron in the pride of beauty flew,
His gushing blood the broken dart distains,
And, as he falls, he spurns the hostile plains.

Now round the king the growing slaughter
Who scorn'd to kill Orodes as he fled; [prea
But with preventive speed, Mezentius ran,
Turn'd short, and bravely fought him, man

man;
Then press'd him with his foot and lance; and
cries;

Behold, behold, my friends, no vulgar prize!
Lo! vanquish'd by your king, the great Orodes dies.

A sudden transport fires the martial train,
And shouts of triumph echo round the plain.
When thus the dying chief: insulting foe!
Soon, like my own, shall thy proud head lie low

Vengeance is on the wing; black fate is nigh;
 And here, e'en here, art thou fore-doom'd to die—
 However, die thou first! the king reply'd
 (All-grimly smiling with disdainful pride);
 And let your boasted jove for me provide.
 Then from the corse the bloody dart he drew;
 The shades of death came hov'ring o'er his view.
 Slow, in deep mists, the heavy vapours rise,
 And in eternal slumber seal his eyes,

Now by brave Cædicus, Alcathous fell;
 Hydaspes sunk beneath Sacrator's steel;
 His weighty spear the valiant Rapo threw,
 And mighty Orfes and Parthenius flew.
 Clonius the next by Neptune's son was slain,
 And Ericetes pres'd the bloody plain:
 This, on the ground, the godlike hero kill'd;
 That, his mad courser cast upon the field.

Next, Tuscan Valerus, as Agis strode
 Before the ranks, thy javelin drank his blood.
 Thy faulchion. Salius, pierc'd Atranius' side;
 The hapless victor by Nealces dy'd,
 Skill'd or to dart the lance, or bend the bow,
 And reach from far the unsuspecting foe.

The god of war, in equal balance, held
 The rage, the woes, and slaughters of the field.
 Fix'd on the spot, the troops disdain to fly;
 By turns, the vanquish'd and the victors die.
 From realms of light, th' immortal pow'rs inclin'd
 Their eyes, and mourn the havock of mankind!
 Here heav'n's imperial queen, and Venus, there,
 Lean forward from the sky to view the war;
 While pale Tisiphone, with dire alarms,
 Inflames the rising rage, and calls the hosts to

Now his last spear aloft Mezentius held; [arms.
 Haughty and high he moves, and blazes o'er the
 So through mid ocean when Orion strides, [field.
 His bulk enormous tow'rs above the tides:
 So, when he grasps in his tremendous hand
 Some mountain oak, and stalks along the land,
 Above the clouds his ample shoulders rise,
 And his huge stature heaves into the skies!

Æneas mark'd the hero from afar,
 And through the ranks rush'd furious to the war.
 The hero stands collected in his might,
 Defies the godlike prince, and waits the fight.
 Soon as he saw the mighty chief advance
 Within due distance of his flying lance,
 Now, now, my spear, and conqu'ring hand, he (Mezentius owns no deity beside!) [cry'd
 Assist my vows; succeed my martial toils,
 To strip yon pirate of his bloody spoils.

Thou, Lanus! thou, Æneas' arms shalt bear,
 A living trophy of my deeds in war!
 He said, and hurl'd the jav'lin o'er the field,
 That sung and glanc'd obliquely from the shield;
 But held its furious course, and, turning wide,
 Drove deep the point in great Antores' side:
 The great Antores (an illustrious name)
 Evander's guest, from ancient Argos came;
 Late in th' Arcadian court he made abode;
 Alcides' former friend, and partner of the god:
 But now, unhappy!—by another's wound
 He bleeds, he falls, he welters on the ground;
 And, while he cast to heav'n his swimming eyes,
 Turns his last thoughts on Argos, as he dies!

Next, his strong lance the pious Trojan cast;
 Swift through the shining orb the jav'lin past,

Through linen plaits, a triple brazen fold,
 And three bull-hides, around the buckler roll'd;
 Deep pierc'd his groin, and there its fury stay'd—
 The streaming blood the chief with joy survey'd;
 Then from the sheath the shining faulchion drew,
 And furious on the wounded monarch flew.

This sees brave Lausus, his illustrious son,
 Fears for his danger, and forgets his own;
 And, while grief, rage, and love, his bosom fire,
 Sighs, weeps, and runs, to disengage his fire.
 Here then, if future times will credit give,
 Thy praise, heroic youth! shall ever live;
 Poor, pity'd youth! in life's first early bloom,
 Snatch'd from the world, and hurry'd to the tomb!
 Encumber'd by the spear that pierc'd the shield,
 With tir'd, slow steps, the monarch quits the field
 Forth springs the son against the Trojan lord,
 And rush'd beneath the long-descending sword;
 Flies to prevent the meditated blow,
 And guard his bleeding father from the foe.
 His friends, with darts, the prince at distance ply,
 And with their loud applauses rend the sky.
 The hero rages, as the jav'lins play'd,
 And lies collected in the buckler's shade.

As when the rattling hail, impetuous, pours,
 And the wide field smokes with the rushing show'rs,
 To the safe shelving banks the swains repair,
 Or to some cavern'd rock; and, shelter'd there,
 Wait till the furious tempest break away;
 And then renew the labours of the day.
 So, ply'd by show'rs of jav'lins from afar,
 The chief sustain'd the tempest of the war
 On his broad shield; and thus the godlike man
 Exhorts, and begs, and threatens the youth in vain:
 Whither, to death, ah! whither wouldst thou run,
 And tempt a hand far mightier than thy own?
 Ah! yet, poor Lausus! from the field remove;
 You fly to ruin, urg'd by filial love.

He warn'd in vain! the youth the prince defies;
 Till all his dreadful wrath began to rise;
 The fates prepare their sheers; the Dardan ord
 Unsheaths, and whirls aloft the thund'ring sword:
 The thund'ring sword, with all his force apply'd,
 Furious he drove, and bury'd in his side.
 The thrilling point, with boundless rage impress'd,
 Pierc'd the light buckler, and the golden vest,
 Which his fond mother's hands embroider'd o'er;
 And his fair breast was stain'd with crimious
 gore:

The pensive spirit leaves the corse behind,
 Flies to the shades, and mixes with the wind.
 But, when the pious godlike prince of Troy
 Saw the pale visage of the hapless boy
 In death's last agonies; a groan he drew
 Deep from his heart, nor cou'd he bear the view.
 His soul now melts with stern Mezentius' woe,
 And in the wretched fire forgets the foe.
 Then to the boy he reach'd his hand, and said;
 To worth like thine, what honours can be paid?
 Lamented youth, too early lost! receive
 The sole reward a gen'rous foe can give:
 Lo! I restore thy arms, unhappy boy!
 Thy sword and buckler, late thy only joy:
 Yet, Lanus, ev'n in death, be this your pride,
 That by the great Æneas' hand you dy'd.
 Then round the corse he calls his social train,
 And rears himself the warrior from the plain.

But ah! how chang'd!--with blood disfigur'd o'er;
And his fair tresses all-deform'd with gore!

Meantime, retir'd to Tyber's flow'ry bounds,
In the cool stream to bathe his glowing wounds,
The wretched father (father now no more!)

In fullen sorrow rested on the shore;
Lean'd on an oak, with pain and anguish stung,
And from a bough his brazen helmet hung.

His heavier arms lie scatter'd o'er the plain;
Round the sad monarch wait the duteous train:
As (o'er his breast his hoary beard declin'd)

The chief enjoy'd the freshness of the wind;
Much of his Lausus, asks the pensive fire;
Sends off in vain, and warns him to retire.

When lo! his soldiers bear him on a shield, [field.
Pale, stretch'd in death, and breathless, from the Deep in his side appear'd the grizly wound;

His groaning friends attend, and mourn around.

Far off, that peal of groans the father knew,
And dust o'er all his hoary locks he threw;

To heav'n, in agonies of anguish, spread
His hands; and, hov'ring o'er, embrac'd the dead!

And oh! can life (he cry'd) such pleasure give?
And bleeds my Lausus, that his fire may live?

Have I then lost thy life, and sav'd my own?
Sav'd by the death of my dear murder'd son!

In my defence could such a son expire?
A son like him, for such a guilty fire!

Now, now, I feel an exile's woe; the smart
Of this deep wound lies raging at my heart.

'Tis keen, 'tis sharp, 'tis terrible at last!
Nor half the bitterness of life is past!

On thy fair fame, my son, I left a stain,
Driv'n by my people from my native reign;

To them, to thee, my murder'd child! I owe
All, all the deaths such guilt shou'd undergo.

And yet I live, and see the golden light!
But soon will leave it, for I loath the sight!

This said; with rage and valour boiling high,
The monarch rear'd him on his halting thigh;

And though his wound retards him in his speed,
He calls impatient for the warrior steed;

The steed, his pride, his solace and delight,
That bore him still victorious from the fight.

Then, as he droop'd, and hung his pensive head,
He clapp'd the gen'rous horse, and thus he said:

Rhœbus, we long have liv'd (if length there be
In mortal life)--'tis now, too long for me!

Soon shalt thou bear me from the bloody fray,
And bring Æneas' head and spoils away;

With thy lov'd lord on yon detested plain,
Avenge my son, my darling Lausus slain,

And share together in the dire debate,
One common conquest, or one common fate.

For thou wilt scorn, I trust, the rule abhorr'd,
And the base burden, of a Phrygian lord.

This said; the hero mounts the gen'rous horse,
And to the foe directs his furious course.

High on his head the crested helm he wore,
And in his hands the steely jav'lins bore.

His conscious valour, his recoiling shame,
Grief, wrath, and fury, set his soul on flame.

Thrice on Æneas' name he calls from far,
Who hears the challenge, and accepts the war.

So may great Jove, an he, the god of light,
Inspire thy soul, to stand the proffer'd fight!

The hero cry'd; then made his bold advance,
Fierce o'er the field, and shook the flaming lance.

And why, reply'd the king, this vaunting strain?
The father perish'd, when the son was slain!

Strike then, and use thy present fortune!--strike--
Death, and the fabled gods, I scorn alike.

No more--I came to die; but first bestow
This parting present on the murder'd foe.

Swift as the word, the vengeful dart he sped;
Lance after lance, in swift succession, fled;

Then, in a spacious ring, he rode the field,
And vainly ply'd th' impenetrable shield;

Thrice round the chief in rapid circles flew,
And at each flight a pointed jav'lin threw.

Collected in himself, the hero bears,
On the broad shield, a rising grove of spears.

But now the prince, impatient of delay,
So long to tug dart after dart away,

Press'd and fatigu'd with such unequal fight,
(At length determin'd to display his might)

Springs forth; and aims his jav'lin's furious course
Betwixt the temples of the fiery horse,

Stung to the brain the horse begins to rear,
Paw with his plunging feet, and lash the air.

Headlong at last, and madding with the steel,
Full on the shoulder of his lord he fell.

The hofts with clamours tempest all the skies.
With his drawn sword the fierce Æneas flies:

And where is now the lofty strain (he cry'd)
Of stern Mezentius, and the scornful pride?

With half-recover'd life, the king replies
(And, as he speaks, stares wildly at the skies;)

Why, why, insulting foe, this waste of breath
To souls determin'd, and resolv'd on death?

In that fond hope to battle did I fly;
And fought far less to conquer than to die.

My son when slaughter'd in the martial strife,
Made no such contract for his father's life;

A worthless gift to live at thy command!
Nor wou'd I take it from his murder's hand!

But, if a vanquish'd foe this grace may crave,
Oh! let me find the refuge of a grave!

Too well my subjects vengeance have I known;
Then guard my corse; and lay me by my son.

Grant, grant that pleasure, e'er I yield my breath,
To share his dear society in death!

This said; the willing warrior to the foe
Extends his throat, and courts the fatal blow.

The sanguine stream his radiant armour dy'd;
The soul came rushing in the purple tide.

B O O K XI.

THE ARGUMENT.

Æneas erects a trophy of the spoils of Mezentius, grants a truce for burying the dead, and sends home the body of Pallas with great solemnity. Latinus calls a council to propose offers of peace to Æneas, which occasions great animosities between Turnus and Drances. In the meantime there is a sharp engagement of the horse; wherein Camilla signalizes herself; is killed; and the Latin troops are entirely defeated.

Now, o'er the waves, Aurora rais'd her head:
The chief (though eager to inter the dead,
And to the wretched father's arms to send
The relics of his dear departed friend)
First to the gods discharg'd a victor's vows,
And bar'd an oak of all her verdant boughs.
High on a lofty point the trunk he plac'd,
Which with Mezentius' radiant arms he grac'd;
The shiver'd lances that the monarch bore,
The plummy crest that dropp'd with recent gore;
The cuirass next; transfixt in ev'ry part
By the keen jav'lin, or the flying dart.
Then on the left, the brazen shield was ty'd;
And the dread sword hung glitt'ring at the side.
Thus the rich spoils he rais'd aloft in air,
A trophy sacred to the god of war.
Then to his arms, a glad triumphant train,
Assembled round their chief, the prince began:
Dismiss your fears; the high exploit is o'er;
The great, the stern Mezentius is no more!
So! where an omen of success he stands!
The glorious trophy of your leader's hands!
When heav'n permits, our standard to display,
To you proud town, intrepid, break your way;
And let your eager hopes, devoid of care,
Fore-run the happy fortunes of the war.
Now let our slaughter'd friends in earth be laid,
The last, last honours we can pay the dead!
On those brave souls be fun'ral rites bestow'd,
Who bought this country with their dearest blood:
But first the cold remains of Pallas send
To his sad father, our unhappy friend;
Since the dire chance of war, in early bloom,
Condemns the valiant hero to the tomb!
Then to the tent his hasty course he sped,
Where old Acetes sits, and guards the dead.
Wander's 'sqaire of old, in fields he shone:
A far-less prosp'rous comrade to the son!
His friends, his soldiers, and the menial train,
With tears bemoan the blooming hero slain.
With lamentable cries, and hair unbound,
The Trojan dames in order stand around.
Soon as Æneas pass the lofty door,
With louder groans the warrior they deplore:
They beat their breasts; tears gush from ev'ry eye;
The rich pavilions to their shrieks reply.
His head now rais'd; the pious prince of Troy
Saw the pale features of the hapless boy;
Saw the wide wound amidst his ivory breast;
And, with a flood of tears, the dead address'd.

Lamented youth! could fortune then intend
To bless my arms, but rob me of my friend?
My friend, I hop'd, (but ah! that hope was vain)!

Would share the glories of my op'ning reign,
And, gay with conquest, glad his fire again.
Far other promise to that fire I pass!
Nor thought thy first, first warfare was thy last:
Then, when he sent me to my high command,
The good old king, at parting, grasp'd my hand,
And told, with all a friend's and father's care,
With what fierce nations we must wage the war.
Now for his son, perhaps, he loads the shrine,
And decks the fane of ev'ry pow'r divine;
While, with vain pomp and many an empty rite,
We bring him back his Pallas from the fight,
Pale, stretch'd in death; and, in his late hour,
Disclaim'd by ev'ry ruthless heav'nly pow'r!

Now, for these triumphs, mutt thy mournful eye
See the sad fun'ral of thy son go by!
Such, hapless monarch, are the spoils we send!
Such, the vain boast and promise of thy friend!
And yet he fell, by Turnus' arms oppress'd,
His wounds all fair, and honest, on the breast!
Better, than to prolong by shame his breath!-- Then hadst thou curs'd thy age, and wish'd for death!

Ah! what a chief have our confederate host,
And what a friend hast thou, Ascanius, lost!

Thus, while a stream of tears he shed in vain,
He bids them raise the body of the slain.
A thousand warriors from the host he chose,
To wait the pomp, and share the father's woes.
The due funereal honours to complete;
A slender solace for a loss so great!
Soft bending twigs they weave; with care they
spread

The swelling foliage o'er the verdant bed,
And decent on the bier dispose the dead.
There like a flow'r he lay, with beauty crown'd,
Pluck'd by some lovely virgin from the ground:
The root no more the mother earth supplies;
Yet still th' unfaded colour charms the eyes,
Two rich embroider'd robes Æneas brought;
Robes, which of old the Tyrian prince's wrought.
One, round the body of the youth he spread,
His last, last gift! and one adorn'd his head,
Drawn o'er his face, that when the flames aspire,
With the fair locks may feed the crackling fire.
Next, in a line, darts, helms, and steeds, appear,
Won by himself; the prizes of the war.

Then with their pinion'd hands the captives came,
 Unhappy youths!—devoted to the flame!
 With fair inscriptions of the foes he flew,
 The noblest chiefs, his glorious trophies drew.
 Supported by his friends, with woes oppress'd,
 Accetes reinds his locks, and beats his breast;
 This moment, pauses; then, in sorrow drown'd, Breaks from their arms, and grovels on the
 ground.

All cover'd o'er with blood, succeeds a train
 Of hostile cars, in honour of the slain.
 Stripp'd of his trappings, and his head declin'd,
 Æthon, his gen'rous warrior-horse, behind,
 Moves with a solemn, slow, majestic pace;
 And the big tears run rolling down his face.
 These, the young hero's lance and helmet bear;
 The rest, the victor seiz'd, the spoils of war.
 The Trojan, Tuscan, and Arcadian train
 Trail their inverted jav'lins on the plain.
 The pomp all past; thus good Æneas said,
 With a deep groan, low bending o'er the dead;
 Hail, mighty spirit, hail!--with dire alarms,
 The Fates recal us to the rage of arms,
 And to new scenes of woe thy friends compel:—
 Farewell, brave prince, a long and last farewell.
 This said; the mournful chief, without delay,
 Back to the lofty ramparts bent his way.

Now from the Latian court a train were sped,
 With wreaths of verdant olives on their head;
 Who ask a truce, to search th' ensanguin'd plain,
 And decent in their graves dispose the slain:
 Beg, that his wrath in conquest may be laid,
 Nor wage a war, relentless, with the dead;
 But spare their nation, late by social ties,
 By plighted love, and friendship, his allies.

The godlike hero grants their just request;
 And in these words his gen'rous soul express'd:
 What fate, ye Latians, urg'd your minds so far,
 To shun our friendship, for this woful war?
 Glad would I grant the truce, you ask for those Who dy'd in fight, to my surviving foes.—
 Had not the Fates assign'd these realms before,
 I had not fail'd to your Hesperian shore;
 I wage the war but in my own defence;
 Not with your people, but your perjurd prince.
 First, from his league, perfidious he withdrew;
 Then to proud Turnus' arms for refuge flew.
 But let proud Turnus stand (tis just and right)
 The terrors of this arm in single fight.
 Would he repel the Trojans from the land?
 Ev'n let him meet their gen'ral hand to hand!
 Soon would be known, in combat when we strive,

Which heav'n ordains to perish, or survive.
 Go then, and burn your slaughter'd friends, that
 spread

The purple fields; I war not with the dead.

Struck by the gen'rous speech, they stood amaz'd,

And on each other, fixt in wonder, gaz'd;
 When Drances, senior of the rev'rend train,
 Th' inveterate foe of Turnus, thus began:
 How shall my tongue so great a prince proclaim,
 Whom fame renowns; whose deeds transcend his fame!

Whose force and wisdom, or in war or peace,
 Thought scarce an equal; and no words express!

Thy answer will we soon report, and bring
 To thy alliance our deluded king.
 And let rash Turnus other courts implore
 His sinking cause and int'rests to restore;
 While we will lend our lab'ring hands with joy,
 To raise this fated town, this second Troy.

He said; the rest assent with equal praise,
 And fix the truce for twelve succeeding days.
 Meantime the Latins and the Trojans rove
 Safe o'er the hills, and mingle in the grove.
 Now the tough ash the founding axes ply;
 Th' unrooted pines turn upward to the sky:
 The wedge divides, with many a vig'rous stroke,
 The scented cedar, and the pond'rous oak.
 And, nodding o'er the cars, (a mighty load)
 The length'ning elms roll lumbering down th'
 road.

Now fame, the messenger of sorrow, bears
 The death of Pallas to the father's ears;
 That on triumphant wings with pride, before,
 The glorious tidings of his conquests bore.
 Strait rushing through the gates, the people
 In ranks, a fun'ral torch in ev'ry hand. [stan
 The mingling blaze a dreadful splendor yields,
 Flames, to the skies, and lightens all the fields.
 The Phrygian train approach, a solemn show!
 And join the mourners in the public woe.
 Loud shriek the matrons, as the corse appears,
 And the whole city seems one scene of tears.
 But nought the wretched father can restrain:
 He breaks, all-frantic, through the parting train
 Then on the bier his aged body threw,
 And kiss'd his son, as to the corse he grew:
 While from his eyes the gushing sorrows flow,
 Fixt in a long dumb agony of woe.

A thousand things in vain he strove to say,
 But scarce could these for anguish find their way

Is this thy promise then, my child, with care
 And cool reserve, to mingle in the war?
 Too well, alas! I knew how honour's charms
 Wou'd fire thy youth to seek the rough alarms.
 In these thy first essays, and rudiments of arms!
 Oh! dire essays!--too fond was thy delight
 To learn the dreadful lessons of the fight!
 Where now are all my vows (my Pallas) where
 Ah! the stern gods grew deaf to ev'ry pray'r!
 How blest art thou, dear partner of my bed,
 Free from this stroke, among the happier dead!
 Thee, heav'n in mercy snatch'd to shades below
 Thee, death deliver'd from this scene of woe!
 I, in the dregs of age, O cruel doom!
 Usurp on nature, and defraud the tomb;
 Still live, and drag a load of sorrows on!
 Live—and (more terrible!) survive my son!
 Me, in the battle, if the foes had slain,
 When, with my force, I join'd the Trojan train
 I (as I should) had perish'd; and, this state
 On the dead father, not the son, should wait!
 Nor yet will I impute my murder'd boy
 To you, O warriors! or my leagues with Troy:
 'Twas not your crime, my friends, he fell
 young;

No!--'tis the father's, who has liv'd so long,
 With his slain son to blast his closing eye,
 And wish, in bitterness of soul, to die.
 Yet, though before his time the Fates requir'd
 My dear, dear boy; he gloriously expir'd!

Yet to the destin'd shore his friends he led,
And pil'd the ground with mountains of the dead :
Ye gods ! I'm satisfy'd---he perish'd well !
His father thanks you ; for in fight he fell !

Nor will I add more honours to the boy,
Than those design'd him by the prince of Troy,
Those, the bold Tuscan hosts and heroes gave,
To wait the corse triumphant to the grave :
With those, his own bright trophies be his share,
Trophies of chiefs, he vanquish'd in the war.
Ah ! to thy years, proud Turnus, had he ran,
Till age confirm'd the hero in the man,
Ev'n thou hadst stood conspicuous to the fight,
The most distinguish'd trophy of the fight.

But why with tears so long have I with-held (Wretch that I am) ! the soldiers from the field ?
Go---tell your prince, that yet I breathe below,
And bear the world, a spectacle of woe !
(Robb'd of my age's pride, my only joy) !

'Tis, that I wait his vengeance for my boy,
His vengeance on proud Turnus' guilty head,
Due to the sad survivor and the dead.

'Tis all, himself, or fortune, now can give ;
'Tis for that only, I endure to live.

Life has no joys for me ; but I should go
Pleas'd with these tidings to my boy below !

And now, to wretched men, the dawning ray
Restor'd their round of labours, and the day.
The Tuscan chief and Trojan prince command,
To raise the fun'ral structures on the strand.

Then to the piles, as ancient rites ordain,
Their friends convey the relics of the slain.

From the black flames the fullen vapours rise,
And smoke in curling volumes to the skies.
The foot thrice compass the high-blazing pyres ;
Thrice move the horse, in circles, round the fires.
Their tears, as loud they howl at ev'ry round,
Dim their bright arms, and trickle to the ground.
A peal of groans succeeds ; and heav'n rebounds
To the mixt cries, and trumpet's martial sounds.
Some, in the flames, the wheels and bridles throw,
The swords and helmets of the vanquish'd foe.
Some, the known shields their brethren bore in
vain,

And unsuccessful jav'lines of the slain.
Now round the piles the bellowing oxen bled,
And bristly swine ; in honour of the dead,
The fields they drove ; the fleecy flocks they slew,
And on the greedy flames the victims threw.
Around their friends the pensive warriors stand,
And watch the dying fires along the strand ;
Many a long look they cast with streaming eyes,
And wait till dewy night had spangled o'er the skies.

Nor with less toil the busy Latian train
Erect unnumber'd structures for the slain ;
Some, to their graves, with pious care commend ;
Some to their native coasts and cities, send.
Some, of distinguish'd rank and high renown,
Are borne with fun'ral trophies to the town ;
The rest, unhonour'd, to the fires they yield ;
The huge promiscuous carnage of the field !
From the thick piles, the streaming flames arise,
Blaze o'er the fields, and kindle half the skies.

When the third morn disclos'd the dawning day,
They search'd the heaps, and bore the bones a-
way :

In the warm ashes their remains they found,
Quench'd with their tears, and bury'd in the
ground ;

Then o'er the relics rais'd a lofty mound.

But more tumultuous shrieks and clamours ring
Through the wide town, and palace of the king :
Boys, mothers, wives, and sisters, there complain
For fathers, children, lords, and brothers, slain.
All with one gen'ral voice the war abhorr'd,
And the dire nuptials of the Daunian lord.
Let him, whose boundless and ambitious pride
Aspires to gain a crown, and regal bride,
Let Turnus (they exclaim) in arms appear,
And with his single sword decide the war.
This, Drances still inflames ; and adds, with spite ;

His godlike foe has dar'd him to the fight.

But Turnus to his side a number draws,
Who warmly plead the blooming hero's cause :
He stands supported by his former fame ;
And the queen's favour shades his injur'd name.

'Midst these debates the pensive envoys bring
The final answer of th' Ætolian king---
Nor pray'rs, nor gifts, avail ; but all the cost,
With all the fruitless embassy, was lost.
New succours must be sought ; or peace im-
plor'd,

In terms submissive, of the Trojan lord.

The Latian king, surrounded by his foes,
Sinks in despair, and bends beneath his woes.

The wrath of heav'n, the recent toms, that
spread

The fields o'ercharg'd and peopled with the dead,
Point out the Trojan chief, ordain'd by fate
To sway the sceptre of the Latian state.

He calls a council ; at the sov'reign's call
The peers, assembled, crowd the regal hall :
There, 'midst the rev'rend fathers of the state,
With mournful looks the hoary monarch fate ;
The monarch bids th' ambassadors report,
Distinct, their answer from th' Ætolian court.
Then, while attention held the solemn train,
With rev'rence due, sage Venulus began :

Ye peers, a length of lands and perils past,
We saw the royal Diomede at last ;
And touch'd, with wonder and respectful joy,
The mighty hand that rais'd imperial Troy.
There, blest with ease, the happy victor builds
A second Argos in the Gargan fields.
Strait to the court admitted, we began,
And in submissive terms address'd the throne ;
Present our gifts, our names and land disclose ;
What war required his aid ; and who his foes.
When, with soft accents and a pleasing look,
Thus, in return, the gracious monarch spoke :

Ye blest Aulonians ! blest, from times of old,
By righteous Saturn, with an age of gold !
What madness rous'd you now with vain alarms,
From long hereditary peace, to arms ?
All, all our Argive kings, who dar'd employ
Their swords to violate the tow'rs of Troy
(Those chiefs I pass that under Ilium dy'd,
Or Simois whelm'd beneath his roaring tide)
Toss'd round the world, in ev'ry distant crime,
Atone the guilt of that presumptuous crime.
From that dire war our des'rate course we bore,
Each driv'n by tempests on a diff'rent shore.

Such scenes of sorrow not a foe could hear,
 Nor Priam's self relate without a tear.
 This truth Minerva's vengeful storm can tell,
 When on Caphareus' rocks Oiléus fell.
 The * Spartan lord, a banish'd wretch, was hurl'd
 To † Proteus' pillars, in a distant world.
 Ulysses, on the dread Sicilian coast,
 Saw the grim Cyclops; and his comrades lost.
 From Crete, Idomeneus, an exile, fled;
 In his own realm, unhappy Pyrrhus bled.
 To Libyan shores the Locrian squadrons fly;
 To flaming suns, that scorch the mid-day sky.
 The ‡ king of kings, ill-fated! lost his life,
 Stabb'd in his palace, by his traitress wife.
 There the great victor of all Asia bled;
 The proud adult'rer mounts his throne and bed.
 Then, what long woes were mine? by heav'n deny'd

To see my native realm, and beauteous bride?
 For that blest fight, sad omens shock my eye;
 Transform'd to birds, my comrades mount the sky.
 Oh dire inflictions!—Now they wander o'er
 The fishy floods, or scream along the shore.
 From that curs'd moment all these woes were due,
 When, fir'd with rage, against the gods I flew;
 And, in the fight, my daring lance profan'd
 (Mad as I was) immortal Venus' hand,
 When Ilium fell; my vengeance then was o'er;
 And with her ruins will I war no more.
 My soul, now calm, no longer dwells with joy
 On those misfortunes which we brought on Troy.
 Bear back the presents, and the gifts you bring,
 ('Tis far, far safer) to the Trojan king.
 For well, too well the mighty chief I know,
 And met in rigid fight the godlike foe;
 Dreadful in arms he tow'r'd before the host;
 Heav'n's! with how fierce a spring the lance he tost!
 How, like a whirlwind, hurl'd it o'er the field!
 How high he shook the sword, and rais'd the pond'rous shield!

Had Troy produc'd two more of equal fame,
 Their conduct, courage, strength, and worth, the same;

All Greece had trembled through her hundred states;

Troy, with a tide of war, had turn'd the fates;
 Pour'd o'er her plains, and thunder'd at her gates.

His conqu'ring sword, and Hector's valiant hand,
 So long of old repell'd the Grecian band:
 Their single valour sav'd their native wall,
 And ten whole years suspended Ilium's fall.

Aeneas shone his equal in the field;
 But in his reverence to the gods excell'd.
 Make peace, my Latian friends; but oh! forbear
 To tempt so terrible a foe to war.—
 This is the sum, great king, of what he said,
 And this th' advice of royal Diomedé.

Thus, of their charge, the legates made report;
 Strait ran a mingled murmur through the court.
 So when by rocks the torrents are withstood,
 In deep hoarse murmurs rolls th' imprison'd flood;
 Beats on the banks; and, with a sudden found,
 Works, foams, and runs in circling eddies round.

Soon as the noise was silenc'd from the throne,
 (Heav'n first invok'd) the hoary prince begun;

* Mærciaus.

† Egypt.

‡ Agamemnon.

I wish, O rev'rend fathers, we had fate,
 Before these perils, on th' endanger'd state:
 Far better than a council now to call,
 When Troy's embody'd pow'r surround our wall!
 An host of heroes to the fight we dare,
 And wage with demigods a fatal war.
 No toils their fiery ardour can restrain;
 Though vanquish'd, strait they fly to arms again.
 Our hopes of great Tydides' aid are flown;
 And now must centre in ourselves alone:
 Nor these how slender, need I here relate,
 Since your own eyes behold our dang'rous state.
 Not but I grant all fought with all their power;
 Arms, strength, and courage, could perform no
 more.

In the dire war, has labour'd ev'ry hand,
 With the whole force and numbers of the land,
 But still in vain our efforts have we try'd;
 Heav'n fights for Troy, and combats on her side.
 Then hear attentive what my thoughts suggest—
 A length of lands, far-stretching to the west,
 Against Scicania, near the Tyber, lies;
 Where, high in air, the tow'ring hills arise.
 These tracts, th' Auruncians and Rutulians plough,
 And feed their flocks along the bending brow.
 These, with their woods, the Trojans shall possess,
 And both the nations join in leagues of peace.
 Since such their wish, ev'n let the warlike band
 Raise a new town, and settle in the land.
 But would they leave our Latian shores again,
 And for some other region cross the main,
 Twice ten strong vessels let us build, or more
 (For thick the forests grow along the shore):
 The form and number let themselves assign;
 The work, the rigging, and the cost, be mine.
 Yet more;—with peaceful olive in their hand,
 An hundred peers and princes of the land,
 To firm the sacred league, in solemn state,
 With ample presents on their prince shall wait;
 Rich gifts of gold, and polish'd ivory bear,
 The robe of purple, and the regal chair.
 Ye peers! with freedom these high points debate;
 Speak, speak your minds, and save the sinking
 state.

Then Drances rose, a proud distinguish'd name,
 With envy fir'd at Turnus' spreading fame.
 His mother's blood illustrious splendours grace,
 By birth as gen'rous as his fire was base.
 Potent and rich, in factious counsels skill'd;
 Bold at the board; a coward in the field;
 Loud he harangu'd the court; and, as he rose,
 These vile reproaches on the warrior throws:

What you propose, great monarch, is so plain
 To all the synod, that replies are vain.
 But none dares speak; though all can understand
 The sole expedient our affairs demand.
 Let him, by whose unhappy conduct led,
 For whose curs'd cause so many chiefs have bled,
 So many princes of our land lie low,
 Till our whole city wears one face of woe,
 Him, who pretends to storm a host; but flies,
 While the proud boastful coward braves the
 skies;

Let Turnus (for I must, I will pursue
 The public good, though death is in my view)
 Grant that high favour to this rev'rend train,
 At least, of these our suff'rings to complain!

king! to those rich gifts design'd before or the great Trojan, add one present more:
 that your duteous senate must request,
 add one he values more than all the rest.
 Fear or violence no longer sway'd
 we to so brave a prince th' imperial maid;
 that sure pledge a lasting peace obtain;
 know, the peace without the pledge is vain.
 It should our king to bold a step disclaim,
 w'd by the terrors of his rival's name;
 O dreadful Turnus we prefer our pray'r or his permission, to bestow the fair, and to our prince and country to restore their rights, and bluster on the throne no more.
 Oh, for thy pride, our lives should we expose,
 fatal chief! the source of all our woes!
 'tis a destructive war; but, to be free from these long ills, we humbly sue to thee;
 O thee, for peace are all our pray'rs apply'd;
 and, the sole pledge of peace, the royal bride.
 And first, myself, thy fancy'd foe (a name scorn alike to own, or to disclaim) when I, a suppliant, beg thy grace to spare our bleeding country, and forsake the war.
 Pity, prince, this wond'rous favour yield:
 'tis time, when routed, to renounce the field!
 too long have we bemoan'd our slaughter'd hosts,
 our lands dispeopled, and our watted coasts.
 Love of glory has thy soul possess'd, fame inspires, or courage warms thy breast;
 none can please thee, but a princel's—go—meet in the list'd field thy gen'rous foe.
 Alas! if our worthy chief a queen can gain,
 or us—no matter—we may well be slain!
 Unwept, unbury'd; to the fowls resign'd;
 he world's last dregs; the refuse of mankind!
 O ye, worthless souls! were born for him alone,
 and, from our necks, he mounts into the throne!
 But go, proud warrior, if one spark remains of courage in thy soul, and warms thy veins;
 O—meet thy rival—answer his demand—
 O—fight the Trojan hero, hand to hand,
 yet the vain boaster soon, I trust, will fly,
 or stand the terrors of that deathful eye!

These scornful words the haughty youth engage in all the fiery violence of rage;
 when, while a groan of indignation broke from his heart, the wrathful hero spoke:
 Drances, that tongue a stream of words can
 yield;
 when, when our hands are wanted in the field,
 't is in debate! but sure 'tis safer far
 With words to flourish, than to wage the war;
 to deal in long harangues, while walls enclose thee and thy tears; and guard thee from thy foes.
 Remov'd from danger, you can talk aloud,
 and mouth and bellow to the list'ning crowd.
 Proceed then, dastard, in thy wonted strain;
 throw forth a storm of eloquence again:
 With all thy malice, all thy art, declaim,
 And brand with cowardice my injur'd fame!
 since the full triumphs of the day are thine,
 And thy own trophies stand as high as mine!
 Fry, try, this hour, thy courage; see! the foes
 Advance, approach us, and our walls enclose:
 Lo! in the battle all the troops are join'd;
 Why halts the fiery Drances yet behind?

Shall all thy valour, wretch! consist so long
 In those swift feet, and in that swifter tongue?
 I routed, monster! and compell'd to fly?—
 Who but thyself could forge that shameful lie!
 Say, was I routed on yon deathful plain,
 When Tyber's streams ran purple to the main?
 Where, wretch, didst thou sit brooding o'er thy
 fear,

When Pallas bled beneath my vengeful spear?
 When, all in heaps, his vanquish'd troops retir'd
 Before this arm, or round their lord expir'd.
 Or where?—when both the giant brethren fell;
 When thousands more my Faulchion plung'd to hell
 In one victorious day, though compass'd round
 With foes, and press'd within the hostile mound?
 All, all, but thou, stood witness to the fight!
 Nor didst thou dare look out upon the fight!
 'Tis a destructive war—Go, dastard, go,
 And preach that rule you practice to the foe;
 At once avow that int'rest you embrace:
 Go, and alarm our friends, our arms disgrace;
 But praise and honour a twice-vanquish'd race.
 Tell, tell the crowd, how ev'ry Argive lord
 And monarch trembled at the Phrygian sword;
 That Tydeus' son, that Peleus' baffled heir,
 Retir'd from Hector, nor could stand his war;
 That Ausidus himself, with sudden dread,
 When on his banks Æneas rais'd his head,
 Ran back, astonish'd, to his native bed.
 Such are his base suggestions, which appear
 False as himself; or his dissembled fear
 Of my revenge: that vanity resign;
 Such blood shall never stain a sword like mine!
 Still may thy foul dismiss that idle care,
 Lurk in that abject breast, and tremble there!—
 But to return, O king! our great debate (Your dread commands) the solemn cares of state:

Since on our arms no farther stress you lay,
 But lose at once all courage, with the day;
 If, on this one defeat, our hopes are o'er;
 If all our future prospects are no more;
 Gods! let us raise these coward hands, to gain
 Peace, pardon, life; and court the victor's chain!
 Yet, O ye princes! did the least remains
 Of our bold fathers' courage warm our veins;
 Those I should ever deem the truly great,
 Those, who in fields of battle brave their fate;
 Those, who, to 'scape that shame, with glory fir'd,
 Bled; and, at once, triumphantly expir'd!
 But since a yet-unbroken force we find,
 Confed'rate towns, and nations still behind;
 Since Troy, so nobly by our troops withstood,
 Has bought her glory with her dearest blood;
 Since, in their turn, the tempest threatens all;
 Since, with the vanquish'd, the proud victors fall;
 Why, on our first attempt, this low despair?
 This flight, before the trumpet calls to war?
 Time oit has succour'd an endager'd state
 By some new change, and snatch'd her from her
 fate!

Some kingdoms strange vicissitudes sustain;
 Now crush'd by fortune, and now rais'd again!
 What though th' Ætolian monarch has deny'd
 To arm, and bring his forces to our side,
 Yet, with Messapus, on our part appears
 Tolumnius, still successful in the wars;

And many a glorious chief who lead their bands,
 Impatient for renown, from distant lands.
 Besides our Latian youth, of matchless might,
 With glory fir'd, and eager for the fight,
 The Volscian prince's leads her valiant train,
 All sheath'd in brazen armour, to the plain.
 But since my foes and friends the fight demand ;
 The public peace no longer I withstand :
 Full well the way to victory I know ;
 In that high hope, I'll dare this dreaded foe,
 This new Achilles to the lifted field,
 In all his heav'nly arms, and huge Vulcanian
 shield !

Nor shall my deeds my ancestry disgrace,
 Nor once degen'rate from my glorious race.
 For you, O king ! for you, my friends, for all,
 Behold your self-devoted Turnus fall !
 Me does my rival to the fight demand ?
 Grant, O ye gods ! the challenge still may stand ;
 Nor let you wretch, however you decide
 My fate, the danger or the fame divide.

Meantime Æneas, 'midst the high debate,
 Leads on his eager troops to seize the gate.
 The Trojan squadrons, and the Tuscan train,
 March from the flood, embattled, o'er the plain.
 Before the godlike prince, the loud report
 Flew swift, and fear'd the city and the court ;
 The crowds all kindle at the dire alarms,
 And, fir'd with martial fury, fly to arms.
 The youth rush forth to war ; the fires complain,
 And strive to stop the growing rage in vain.
 From either side the different murmurs rise,
 And their tumultuous clamours rend the skies,
 So ring the forests with the feather'd brood,
 A thousand notes re-echoing through the wood :
 So scream the swans on fair Padusa's bounds ;
 And down the waters float the mingling sounds.
 Is this an hour, cool methods to devise,
 And talk of peace ? The fiery Turnus cries ;
 Declaim, ye dastards, talk, ye triflers, on,
 While the proud Trojan arms, and forms the
 town !

He said ; and rush'd impetuous to the plain ;
 Lead, lead, brave Volusus, our Ardean train,
 And summon to the fight the Volscian horse ;
 Thou, thou, Messapus, range th' embattled horse,
 And join great Coras, and his brother's care,
 Wide o'er the field to spread the op'ning war.
 All, all be ready ; with divided pow'rs
 Guard you the passes ; you defend the tow'rs.
 Bend you to battle ; and, in firm array,
 Attend your general where he leads the way.

The troops obey ; and, gath'ring at the call,
 Pour in tumultuous heaps to guard the wall.
 The pensive father of the Latian state
 (Confus'd, amaz'd) suspended the debate ;
 And his own conduct blames, that he resign'd
 To the queen's counsel his compliant mind ;
 On such wrong motives rais'd an impious war,
 And robb'd the Trojan of the promis'd fair.

To sink a trench before the gates, they run.
 Fix the strong pile, and roll the pond'rous stone.
 Alarm'd, and summon'd by the trumpet's sound,
 Boys, maids, and matrons, crowd the ramparts
 round.

All aids these dire extremities demand,
 Fire ev'ry heart, and strengthen ev'ry hand.

Now, with the queen, the matrons in a train
 Ride with large presents to Minerva's fane :
 Lavinia grac'd her side : the royal fair ;
 The guiltless cause of this destructive war.
 To earth her streaming eyes the maid inclin'd ;
 In sad procession move the crowd behind.
 They burn rich odours at the sacred shrine,
 And seek, with suppliant pray'r, the pow'rs divi
 Against the Phrygian pirate, lend thy aid,
 O queen of battles ! great Tritonian maid !
 Break, break his jav'lin ; let him meet his fate.
 And grind the dust beneath our lofty gate !

Meanwhile, in arms the furious Turnus shon
 First, the brave hero drew the corset on ;
 Thick scales of brass the costly work infold ;
 His manly legs he cas'd in greaves of gold.
 Bare was his face ; and, with a martial pride,
 The starry sword hung glittering at his side.
 Bold and exulting, with a dauntless air,
 The mighty chief anticipates the war ;
 In his fond hopes already has he won
 The field, before the battle is begun.

The golden splendours, dazzling to the view,
 Flash'd from his arms, and lighen'd as he flew

So the gay pamper'd steed, with loosen'd rein
 Breaks from the stall, and pours along the plain
 With large smooth strokes he rushes to the flood Bathes his bright sides, and cools his fiery blood
 Neighs as he flies ; and, tossing high his head,
 Snuffs the fair females in the distant mead ;
 At ev'ry motion, o'er his neck reclin'd,
 Plays his redundant mane, and dances in the wind

him, at the gate, thus issuing to the plain,
 Camilla meets with all her female train ;
 Leaps in a moment from her gen'rous steed ;
 The beauteous band alight with equal speed :
 Prince, if the bold and brave (she cries) may da
 Trust their own valour for success in war ;
 Myself, with these, will stand the Trojan force
 Myself will vanquish all the Tuscan horse.
 Guard thou the city ; be that province thine ;
 But let the dangers of the field be mine.

O queen ! thy country's pride, the chief repl
 (And on the dread virago fix'd his eyes) ;
 To such uncommon worth, heroic maid !
 What thanks are due ? what honours can be pa
 Since those, and death, you scorn with ec
 pride,

With me, the labours of the day divide.
 The Trojan bent his fraudulent scheme to frame
 (In this my spies confirm the voice of fame),
 Has sent, before, his active troops, who wield
 The lighter arms, to scour along the open field
 Meantime himself, along the lofty crown
 Of yon steep mountain, hastens to the town.
 But, in the wood, an ambush I prepare,
 And try to foil him in the wiles of war.
 He lies imprison'd in that narrow freight ;
 And, if he moves, he rushes on his fate.
 Go thou, supported by our Latian force,
 Go—with spread ensigns meet the Tuscan hor
 Great Tybur's brothers, both renown'd in mi
 With brave Messapus, wait thee to the fight.
 Beneath thy care, shall march the martial bar
 Fir'd by thy high example and command.
 This said ; each chief he rous'd to arms, and g
 With eager speed to circumvent the foes.

A winding vale there lay, within the shade
Of woods, by nature for an ambush made.
To this, a rough and slender passage led ;
Above, a smooth and level plain was spread,
Unknown, and stretching o'er the mountain's
head.

There safe, the soldier, to the left or right,
May dare th' ascending war, and urge the fight ;
Roll rocky fragments from the craggy brow,
And dash the pond'rous ruins on the foe.
Hither the prince (for well he knew the way)
Flew, seiz'd the post, and clost in ambush lay.

But now Latonia, in th' ethereal sphere,
For her Camilla touch'd with anxious fear,
Bespoke swift Opis, in a mournful strain,
A nymph, and one of her own virgin train :
Alas ! dear Opis, my Camilla goes
To seek the fatal war, and brave the foes ;
Spe ! where she rushes to the deathful plain,
And proudly wears Diana's arms in vain !
Still from my soul the darling maid I lov'd ;
And time the growing fondness has improv'd ;
E'er since stern Metabus, her hapless fire,
Forc'd by his rebel subjects to retire,
Fled from Pivernum, his imperial town,
And lost his old hereditary crown.
Safe he convey'd, through crowds of raging foes,
His babe, the dear companion of his woes,
And call'd Camilla, from her mother's name ;
And in his flight through wilds and deserts
came ;

The savage hills and woods he wander'd o'er,
And in his arms the lovely burthen bore ;
While with their jav'lins, in an endless tide,
The Volscians press'd their prince on ev'ry side :
When lo ! old Amasenus' streams delay
His course, and foam across the warrior's way :
For late, the flood, increas'd with sudden rains,
Had burst the banks, and floated half the plains :
First he resolves to swim, and gain the shore ;
But love retards him, and the charge he bore.
Thus, while a thousand schemes divide his breast,
Sudden, on this, he fixes as the best :
His mighty pond'rous spear, of knotted oak,
Long harden'd in the flames, the monarch took ;
To this strong lance the tender babe he bound,
With cork and pliant osiers wrapt around,
Then pois'd the loaded spear, in act to throw ;
But for my favour first address'd his vow :
To thee, chaste goddess of the forest wild,
Behold ! a father dedicates his child :
She flies for refuge to thy pow'r divine,
And the first weapons that she knows are thine.
Thus then I send, to thy protecting care,
Thy little suppliant through the fields of air.
This said ; with all his force the lance he threw ;
High o'er the roaring waves Camilla flew ;
Then the bold warrior, press'd on ev'ry side
By his fierce foes, plung'd headlong in the tide,
The flood surmounted, and the jav'lin tore,
Charg'd with the sacred infant, from the shore.
Each town with stern inhospitable hate,
Against the wand'ring monarch shut her gate :
Nor could he bear (his scorn was grown so high)
To stand distinguish'd by the public eye.
From all society of men he fled ;
A shepherd's life among the mountains led ;

There with his daughter pass the hours away,
In dens of beasts and savages of prey ;
Sought ev'ry softer-mother of the wood,
And in her lips distill'd the milky food.
Soon as the little Amazon could go ;
He on her shoulders hung a slender bow :
A small light quiver at her side she wore,
And in her hand a pointed jav'lin bore :
No rich embroider'd robes her limbs enfold,
Nor were her waving locks adorn'd with gold.
The spoils of some fierce tyger wrapt her round,
That, from her head, hung trailing to the ground :
Ev'n when her tender hand the dart could fling,
Or whirl the pebble from the founding sling,
Strike the long crane, or snowy swan, on high,
And fetch the tow'ring quarry from the sky.
Her charms surpris'd the Tuscan matron train,
Who count the huntress for their sons in vain.
Not all their courtship, nor their pray'rs, could move
The maid, from sworn virginity, to love.
With Dian's love content, she keeps her vow ;
She shoots my arrows, and she bends my bow.
Ah ! from my soul I wish, the hapless fair
Had never mingled in the direful war !
Then still my darling might the maid remain,
The pride and glory of my virgin train !
But, since her doom is seal'd, her fate is nigh,
Descend, my nymph, this instant from the sky.
To yonder plain, impetuous, bend thy flight,
Where, see ! in arms she rushes on the fight.
Here, take my bow ; and, from this dreadful theatre
Draw forth the winged messenger of death.
And, who the sacred virgin shall destroy,
Or of the Latian bands, or sons of Troy,
With this keen arrow make my vengeance good ;
Let him atone the sacrilege with blood.
Then will I bear the breathless maid away,
Her spoils and body in a cloud convey,
To the dark grave commend her dear remains,
And safe dispose 'em in her native plains.
The goddess said ; the nymph obedient flies,
Wrapt in a sounding whirlwind down the skies.
Now to the walls (a close-embod' d force)
March the swift Trojan and the Tuscan horie ;
Beneath their valiant chiefs, in thick array,
The troops embattled urge their fiery way.
Aloft the foaming couriers prance and bound,
Press on the rein, and proudly paw the ground.
Trembling for joy, they hope the dire alarms ;
The fields gleam dreadful with their waving arms.
Spears, nodding helms, and shields, with mingled
Flame round, and set the region in a blaze. [rays,
Nor with less speed, beneath Messapus' care,
The Latian troops pour furious to the war.
Full in the front the mighty Coras came,
With bold Catillus, to the field of fame.
O'er all distinguish'd in the martial scene,
Rode with her female train the Volscian queen.
Fierce to the fight the valiant troops advance,
Portend, and poise, and shake the flaming lance.
Thick clouds of dust their trampling feet excite ;
Th' impatient couriers neigh, and snuff the distant fight.

At length, within a jav'lin's reach appear
Both hosts ; and, shouting, join the horrid war ;
Konse to the fight their gen'rous steeds, and pour
1 heir darts incessant, in a rattling show'r.

In one dark storm the founding lances fly,
Shade the bright sun, and intercept the sky.

First horse to horse, and man to man, oppos'd
The bold Acontes and Tyrrhenus clos'd;
Each eager warrior hurl'd the pointed spear,
And urg'd his courser in a full career;
The steeds, encount'ring with a thund'ring sound,
Shock; and Acontes tumbles to the ground.
Swift, as discharg'd from the loud engine flies
The glowing stone, or lightning from the skies;
Lo swift the warrior, from his courser far, [air.
Shoots with a spring, and breathes his fiery soul in
Now all the Latian horse disorder'd run, (Their shields slung back) tumultuous, to the town,

The chase with cries the joyful Trojans led,
With great Asylas thund'ring at their head.
Soon as they reach'd the walls, the rallying train
Rein round their steeds, and face the foes again.
Then, in their turn, the vanquish'd Trojans wheel'd,
And, pale with terror, measur'd back the field.

Thus, in alternate tides, o'er all the strand
Swells the vast ocean, and invades the land.
Wave after wave, the water's mount on high,
Till o'er the rocks the foamy surges fly.
Then headlong, in her turn, the roaring main
Rolls back, impetuous, to her bounds again;
Rolls back, as rapid as she came before,
With all the floating trophies of the shore.
Twice the Rutulians to the city flew;
And twice they rally, and the foes pursue.
Till in the third assault the hosts engage;
Then burns the fight with unextinguish'd rage.
All, man to man, and breast to breast, oppos'd,
In one dire shock the charging squadrons clos'd.
Then bled the battle; and a load of slain,
Shields, helms, and jav'lines, cover'd wide the
In a red deluge all the fields lie drown'd; [plain.
And cries and agonizing groans resound
Of wounded warriors, lab'ring out their breath,
And couriers plunging in the pangs of death.

With cautious eyes, Orsilochus from far
Observ'd strong Remulus, and mark'd for war;
Nor durst approach the chief; but hurl'd the spear,
With all his strength, beneath his courser's ear.
Stung with the stroke, and madding with the
wound,

He rears and paws in air, with many a bound,
And casts his hapless master on the ground.
Next bled Iolas by Catillus' steel;
By the same hand the huge Herminius fell:
All pale in death the mighty hero lies;
Vain were his giant arms, and giant size;
Th' intrepid chief (his head and shoulders bare,
Tall, and distinguish'd by his golden hair)
Tow'r'd in the front, the mark of all the war!
Through his broad shoulders pass, the deadly
wound

Contracts, and bends him double to the ground.
Now all the fields with crimson streams are dy'd;
And the vast carnage smokes on ev'ry side.
The charms of honour ev'ry bosom fire,
To win the day; or gloriously expire.

Her breast half-naked, through the direful scene
Of blood and slaughter flew the Volsian queen.
The shafts and quiver at her side appear,
The pos'd bow, and ail Diana's war.

Now the swift dart with matchless might the cast
Now with her axe she laid the battle waste:
Ev'n when she flies, she bends the backward bow
And sends the winged vengeance at the foe.
Around, in pomp, her sister warriors ride,
All-bright in arms and combat side by side.
Her brazen pole axe, there, Tarpeia yields;
And, here, Larina glitters o'er the fields;
Italian virgins; her supreme delight;
In piece her friends; her comrades in the fight.

So round their queen, Hippolyte the fair,
Or bold Penthesile's resplendent car,
Move the triumphant Amazonian train,
In bright array, exulting, to the plain.
Proudly they march, and clash their pointed arms
And all Thermopoon rings with proud alarms;
With female shouts they shake the founding field.
And fierce they poise the spear, and grasp the moony shield,

Who first, who last, by thy victorious hand,
Heroic maid! sunk breathless on the sand!
First, Clytius' son, the great Eumenius, dies;
Through his broad breast the quiv'ring jav'lin flies.
Grimly he grinds the dust, distain'd with blood,
And rolls and welters in the crimson flood.
Liris and Pegasus at once are kill'd,
And both, transix'd, fall headlong on the field;
One stoop'd, to reach his wounded courser's rein;
One flew, to prop his sinking friend in vain!
Now Hippotas' brave son Amastrus fell:
And now she threatens, with the pointed steel,
Tereus the swift, Harpalycus the strong;
And drove in heaps the hostile chiefs along.
Demophoon, Chromis, fled her dreadful spear;
She pours, and hangs tempestuous in the rear.
Thus through the ranks of war she rag'd, and slew
A Phrygian foe with ev'ry dart she threw.

The mighty hunter, Ornytus, from far,
On his Apulian courser fought the war:
A bull's black hide his ample shoulders spread;
A wolf's rough spoils grinn'd horrid o'er his head:
A banded spear he brandish'd in his hand,
And tow'r'd conspicuous o'er the martial band.
With ease, as all the troops confus'dly fled,
She slew the foe, and thus insults the dead:
Me, Tuscan, didst thou deem thy destin'd prey,
Like hunted game, the fortune of the day?
Lo! by a woman's arm, this fatal hour,
That boast is answer'd, and thy vaunts no more!
Go!—let thy fire the glorious tidings know;
Camilla sent thee to the shades below!

Then on two Trojan chiefs, of giant size,
Butes, and tall Orsilochus, she flies.
But Butes, face to face, the brav'd in war; [spear,
Swift through the neck she drove the pointed
Where the bright helm and corselet left a part,
To let in fate, wide-open to the dart.
From fierce Orsilochus the virgin whel'd
At first, in flight dissembled, round the field:
But, in a ring still lessening, to delude
The furious chief, she fled, till she pursu'd:
Then while, in vain, her circumvented foe
Implores his life; high-rising on the blow,
Cleaves his broad front with a redoubled wound;
The blood and brains rush smoking to the ground.

The son of Aunus cross'd her in the way,
And for a while stood trembling in dismay;

A wretch, that, like his own Ligurian line,
 Could cheat, while fortune favour'd the design.
 Soon as he found it vain to shun by flight
 The female warrior, or maintain the fight;
 Resolv'd to circumvent the hostile maid,
 Thus to the queen the low dissembler said:
 Where is the mighty praise, to vaunt the force,
 And trust the swiftness, of your rapid horse?
 Dismiss your steed, vain maid! and let us stand
 Engag'd in single combat, hand to hand.
 Soon shall be known, proud princess, what you can,
 When, on these terms, a woman fights a man.
 Thus he:—the queen springs furious on the plain
 From her fleet steed, and gives him to the train.
 On foot she dares the dastard to the field,
 Draws her bright sword, and grasps her maiden
 shield.

Flush'd with gay hopes; to find his fraud succeed,

He turns, he flies, and, to his utmost speed,
 With goring spurs provokes his smoking steed.—
 Deluded fool! (she cries, in lofty strain)
 On me thy little arts are try'd in vain;
 Nor hence, ev'n yet, in safety shalt thou run,
 To please thy fire with falsehoods like his own.
 She said; and, springing with a fiery course,
 The raging maid out-stripp'd the flying horse;
 Turn'd, seiz'd the reins; oppos'd in battle stood;
 Then gluts her vengeance with his reeking blood.
 Not with more ease the falcon, from above, [dove;
 Shoots; seizes, gripes, and rends, the trembling
 All stain'd with blood, the beauteous feathers fly,
 And the loose plumes come flutt'ring down the sky.

Meantime th' almighty fire of men and gods,
 Enthron'd in high Olympus' bright abodes,
 Surveys the war; the Tuscan chief inspires
 With gen'rous rage, and fills with martial fires.

Through all the cleaving ranks, with eager
 speed,

Flies the bold Tarchon on his rapid steed;
 Calls on each chief by name; adjures the train,
 Leads, rallies, and inflames the troops again.

Ye scandal of your race, your country's shame!
 Warm'd with no honour, no regard of fame!
 What fear, ye cowards, ev'ry breast controls,
 Unnerves your limbs, and chills your trembling souls?

Thus then, from one flies all our scatter'd band!
 Gods!—but from one, and from a female hand!
 Oh! cast away the sword, the shield and spear;
 The idle pomp and pageantry of war!
 Yet were you never recreants to delight,
 Nor to the softer battles of the night!
 When pipes proclaim the sacred revels nigh,
 How swift, how eager, to the feast you fly!
 In the full bowls you centre all your love;
 Pleas'd, when the priest invites you to the grove,
 You run, and riot in the rich repast;
 The first in banquets, but in fights the last!

He said; and, bent on death, in deep despair,
 Rush'd on his steed amidst the thickest war:
 Then urg'd at Venus his furious course, [horse.
 Seiz'd him at once, and snatch'd him from his
 Thus in his arms, with matchless strength he bore,
 Fierce as he rode, the hapless chief, before.
 His troops behold the scene with strange surprise,
 And peals of shouts run rattling round the skies;

While with his captive, all in open view,
 O'er the wide field the fiery hero flew.
 The point then breaking from the warrior's dart,
 The chief explores a penetrable part,
 And meditates the wound; the struggling foe
 Defends his throat, and disappoints the blow.
 As when th' imperial eagle soars on high,
 And bears some speckled serpent through the sky:
 While her sharp talons gripe the bleeding prey,
 In many a fold her curling volumes play;
 Her starting brazen scales with horror rise:
 The sanguine flames flash dreadful from her eyes:
 She writhes, and hisses at her foe in vain,
 Who wings at ease the wide aerial plain;
 With her strong hooky beak the captive plies,
 And bears the struggling prey, triumphant thro'
 the skies.

So with the chief the mighty Tarchon flew;
 And, kindling at the sight, the troops their prince pursue.

Now Aruns on the Volscian princess waits
 (Aruns the destin'd victim of the fates;)
 Wheels round, and seeks with ev'ry wily art.
 The favouring moment to discharge the dart.
 Where'er the furious maid her steps inclin'd,
 The wretch in silence follows close behind:
 When from the conquer'd foes he bends her course,
 Thither th' insidious warrior turns his horse;
 Oft shifts his place; runs anxious to and fro;
 Flies round the circuit; and, in act to throw,
 Aims his sure jav'lin at the beauteous foe.

Chloereus, the priest of Cybele, from far
 Shone in bright arms amid the crowded war.
 Magnificently gay, he proudly pres'd
 A prancing steed, in stately trappings dress'd;
 Rich scales of brass and gold, inwrought with art,
 Grac'd with a mimic plumage ev'ry part.
 Himself, in purple clad, amid the foe
 Sent his swift arrows from a Lycian bow.
 Gold was the bow, that from his shoulder sounds,
 And gold the helmet that his head surrounds.
 His robes, with many a rustling silken fold,
 With care were gather'd, and confin'd in gold:
 His crimson tunic was embroider'd o'er;
 And purple buskins on his legs he wore.
 This chief the singles from the warring crew,
 And, blind to danger, through the squadrons flew;
 With the rich spoils to deck Diana's shrine;
 Or that herself in Trojan arms may shine.

All, all the woman in her bosom rose!
 For this bright prize, she plung'd amid the foe!
 When, from his covert, Aruns launch'd his spear;
 But first to heav'n prefer'd his suppliant pray'r:
 O Phœbus! guardian of Soracte's woods,
 And shady hills; a god above the gods!
 To whom our natives pay the rites divine,
 And burn whole crackling groves of hallow'd
 pine;

Walk o'er the fire, in honour of thy name,
 Unhurt, unslung'd, and sacred from the flame;
 Give to my favour'd arms, to clear away
 The deep dark stains of this disgraceful day.
 Nor spoils nor trophies from the maid I claim;
 No—to my future life I trust for fame.
 If by my hand this raging pest be slain,
 I ask no honour; but retire again,
 Pleas'd; though inglorious, to my native plain.

The god consents to half his warm request,
But in the fleeting winds dispers'd the rest.
Camilla's death was granted to his pray'r ;
His safe return was lost in empty air.

Now as the jav'lin sings along the skies,
All to the Volscian princes turn their eyes.
The fair rush'd on, regardless of the sound,
Till in her pap she felt the fatal wound.
Deep, deep infix'd, the pointed weapon stood
Full in her heart, and drank the vital blood.
Swift to her succour fly her female train,
And in their arms the sinking queen sustain ;
But far more swift affrighted Aruns fled,
With fear and joy, nor turn'd his guilty head :
Back he retires, all-trembling and dismay'd ;
Nor could he bear, in death to view the dreadful maid.

As when a prowling wolf, whose rage has slain
Some stately heifer, or the guardian swain,
Flies to the mountain with impetuous speed,
Confus'd, and conscious of the daring deed,
Claps close his quiv'ring tail between his thighs,
Ere yet the peopled country round him rise :
Nor less confus'd, pale Aruns took his flight ;
Shunn'd ev'ry eye, and mingled in the fight.

The dying queen, in agonizing pain,
Tugs at the pointed steel, but tugs in vain.
Deep-riveted within, the rankling dart
Heav'd in the wound, and scar'd in her heart.
She sinks, she swoons, she scarcely draws her
breath,

And, all around her, swim the shades of death.
The starry splendours languish in her eyes,
And from her cheeks the rosy colour flies.
A maid she calls, the partner of her cares,
Her friend in peace ; her sister in the wars.
Acca ; no more :—for mortal is my wound ;
A dizzy mist of darkness swims around :
The victory was mine ; but ah ! 'tis past !
This hour, this fatal moment is my last !
Go, and my dying words to Turnus bear ;
Bid him this instant to the field repair ;
This instant, from the town the foe repel :—
And now, dear friend, a long and last farewell !

With that the queen, expiring, dropp'd the rein,

And from her courser sunk upon the plain.
In thick short sobs the vital spirit flies,
Her head declin'd, and drooping as she dies !
Her radiant arms besew the field of fight :
Her soul, indignant, fought the realms of night.

Then, from the hosts the doubling clamours rise,
And shouts tumultuous echo to the skies.
The Trojan band, a firm determin'd force,
The Tuscan chiefs, with all th' Arcadian horse,
Rush furious to the field ; the slaughter spread ;
The tumult deepen'd, and the combat bled.

Meantime fair Opis, from a mountain's brow,
A while unmov'd survey'd the fight below.
But when from far she saw Camilla slain,
And, round the corse, the shooting hostile train,
Deep from her heaving ivory bosom broke
A mournful groan, and thus the goddess spoke :
Too, too severely, much lamented maid,
For warring with the Trojans, thou hast paid !
In vain made sacred by thy virgin vow
To Dian's name, and grac'd with Dian's bow !

Nor yet in death thy goddess will disclaim
Her favour'd maid, but crown with endless fame
Thy praise shall round the nations be display'd,
And to thy fate due vengeance shall be paid.
This moment will I make that vengeance good ;
The guilty wretch shall render blood for blood.

Beneath a hill, Dercennus' tomb appears,
A potent Latian lord in former years ;
A grove of venerable oaks display'd,
Wide round the monument, a gloomy shade,
Hither the goddess took her rapid flight,
And spy'd gay Aruns from the tow'ring height.
There as the youth exults, and swells with pride
Whither, poor daftard, wouldst thou fly ? (she cryd
Turn, wretch—this moment for thy guilt atone
And for Camilla's death receive thy own.
Go—to the shades of hell, her victim, go—
A prize unworthy of Diana's bow !

She said ; and instant from the golden sheath
Drew forth the feather'd messenger of death—
Fierce in her rage, the circling horns she bends
To the full stretch, and joins the doubling ends.
One hand approach'd the point ; one drew th'
bow,

And to her breast strain'd the tough nerve below
At once the mur'd'rer heard the sounding dart,
And felt the steely vengeance in his heart.

He lies deserted by his social train,
Pale and expiring on a foreign plain !
While, from the field, triumphant Opis flies,
And on spread pinions mounts the golden skies.

First fled Camilla's band (their princes kill'd
Then the Rutulians, routed, quit the field.
Atinas' self, the chiefs, and armies, run,
And spur their smoking couriers to the town.
Nor can the troops sustain, nor dare oppose
The slaughter'd swords of their victorious foes
Athwart their backs th' unbended bows they flung
And with their trampling steeds the sounding champaign rung.

The city now th' advancing host appalls :
A cloud of dust, thick-gath'ring to the walls,
From the tall tow'rs the trembling matrons fly
And female shrieks, tumultuous, rend the sky.
Mixt with their foes, rush headlong through t'
gate

The Latian squadron, nor can shun their fate ;
In vain for shelter to their houses fly ;
Ev'n there transfixt, in heaps the wretches die.
Some close the gates, exclude their social train,
Who beg admision to the town in vain.

While these defend th' endanger'd posts, and th'
Rush on their swords, a dreadful slaughter rose.
With piercing shrieks, and lamentable cries,
The children bleed before their parent's eyes.

While close behind advanc'd the thund'ring foe
Some leap down headlong to the trench below
Some with loose reins, abandon'd to their fate,
Spurr'd their impetuous steeds against the gate.

But, when Camilla's corse appear'd in view,
Warm'd by their country's love, the women flew,
And from the walls a storm of jav'lins threw.
With harden'd clubs th' advancing foe they da
And with tough staves repel the rising war.
Fierce they rush on : they glow with martial fire
And for their native walls with joy and pride pire.

Meanwhile to Turnus, ambush'd in the shade,
The careful nymph the dismal news convey'd;
That in the fight the Volscian queen was slain;
That the proud foe pursu'd the vanquish'd train,
Who, flush'd with full success, rush'd furious on,
And spread the growing terror to the town.
The chief, (for so his adverse fates requir'd!)
Struck with the tidings, and with anger fir'd,
All headlong leaves the guarded hills again;
But scarce descended to the subject plain,
Ere the great Trojan seiz'd the vacant road,
Climb'd the tall hill, and issu'd from the wood.

By the black clouds of dust, Æneas found
The Latian host embattled wide around:
And Turnus knew the Dardan chief was near,
From the loud shouts, that thicken'd on his ear;
Perceiv'd the footsteps of the trampling foe,
And heard distinct the fiery couriers blow.
Soon had the heroes join'd the horrid fight;
But now the sun roll'd down the rapid light;
And plung'd, beneath the red Iberian sea,
The panting steeds that drew the burning day.
Before the city, camp th' impatient pow'rs;
These to defend; and those to storm the tow'rs.

B O O K XII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Turnus challenges Æneas to a single combat. Articles are agreed on, but broken by the Rutulians; who wound Æneas. He is miraculously cured by Venus, and forces Turnus to a duel; with whose death the poem concludes.

WHEN Turnus saw the Latians, in despair,
Sink with the weight of unsuccessful war,
Himself the object of the public spite
Mark'd out, and summon'd to the promis'd fight;
The furious prince the single combat claims,
And conscious courage sets his soul in flames.
As, pierc'd at distance by the hunter's dart,
The Libyan lion rouses at the smart;
And loudly roaring traverses the plain;
Scourges his sides; and rears his horrid mane;
Fugs furious at the spear; the foe defies;
And grinds his teeth for rage, and to the combat
flies;

So form'd proud Turnus; and in wrathful strain,
Thus to the king th' impetuous chief began:
Where is this Trojan foe, so bold and brave?
Would he retract the challenge that he gave?
My soul can brook no more delays; I yield
To his own terms; and dare him to the field.
Renew the truce, perform the sacred rite:
This hour, this moment, I demand the fight.
This hand shall wipe our late disgrace away
'Our hosts may sit spectators of the day!
Th' his trusty sword the dastard shall destroy;
And plunge to hell that fugitive of Troy,
If not... I'll own him victor of the war,
And to his arms resign the royal fair.

So spoke the furious prince, with scornful pride.
The king with mild benevolence reply'd:
The more, brave youth, thy try'd, distinguish'd might

And valour drive thee headlong to the fight,
The more it should concern our royal care,
To weigh the perils and events of war;
This fond and youthful ardour to assuage
With the cool caution of considerate age.
How many vanquish'd cities are thy own,
Besides a fair hereditary throne!
Me too these wealthy warlike lands obey:—
Thus both may reign with independent sway.
Our realm, brave Turnus, other virgins grace,
Of blooming features, and illustrious race.

Then undisguis'd, this truth with patience hear,
Though harsh and wounding to a lover's ear.
All pow'rs forbid, the human and divine,
To match our daughter in the Latian line.
Won by thy birth, my comfort's tears and cries,
And my own love, I broke all sacred ties;
Robb'd the great Trojan of the plighted fair;
Then flew to arms, and wag'd an impious war.
From that dire source to tell what mischiefs flow,
Would be to mention, what too well you know:
Fights, deaths, defeats, that speak the wrath divine;

Where all the sad pre-eminence is thine.
In two fierce battles routed and o'erthrown,
Scarce our last hopes are shelter'd in the town:
Huge heaps of bones still whiten all the shore,
And the full streams of Tyber smoke with gore.
Where am I borne, irresolute and blind?
What changeful phrensy turns my wav'ring mind?
If, on thy death, the Trojan is my friend,
Sure in thy life the stern debate may end!
How would all Italy my name disgrace!
How all my kindred of thy royal race!
Shouldst thou (which heav'n avert!) by me be led
To death; the victim of my daughter's bed!
If I should hasten to so sad an end
My child's fond lover, and my gen'rous friend!
Think on the turns of fate, and chance of wars;
Pity thy rev'rend father's silver hairs,
Who mourns thy absence in thy native town,
Nor knows the danger of so dear a son!

But no success these warm entreaties found:
The proffer'd med'cine but inflam'd the wound.
Scarce cou'd he speak for rage, disdain, and pride,
But thus at length the fiery youth reply'd:
O best of fathers! all this needless care
For Turnus' life, at his request, forbear.
Life is a trifle I with scorn disclaim,
For the bright purchase of immortal fame.
This hand, these weapons too, are fatal found;
And the blood flies, where Turnus deals the
wound.

Nor in this combat shall his mother shroud
The recreant Trojan in an airy cloud.

Nor shield the coward with her aid divine :
This day, ye gods ! this glorious day is mine.

But now the frantic queen, on these alarms,
Half-dead with fear, hung trembling on his arms :
Oh ! grant me, Turnus, grant this one request ;
If ever love or reverence touch'd thy breast
For lost Amata, to these sorrows yield !
Nor meet thy rival in the fatal field.

Regard, dear youth, regard my streaming tears,
Thou only prop of my declining years !
Our sinking house relies on thee alone ;
On thee, our fame, our empire, and the throne.
In thy misfortune must Amata join ;
Her fate and welfare are involv'd in thine.

With thee to death, for refuge, will I run,
Nor live a captive to a Trojan son.

With pity touch'd, the fair Lavinia hears
Her mother's cries, and answers with her tears.
A lovely blush the modest virgin warms,
Glows in her cheek, and lights up all her charms.
So looks the beauteous iv'ry, stain'd with red :
So roses, mixt with lilies in the bed,
Blend their rich hues—Then, gazing on the fair,
The hero rag'd, more eager for the war.
And thus—O royal mother! cease your fears,
Nor send me to the fight with boding tears.
'Tis not in me, if heav'n has fix'd my date,
To check th' unalterable course of fate.

Go, faithful herald, go ! and instant bear
This dreaded message to the Phrygian's ear :

Soon as Aurora's rays the mountain gild,
He need not lead his forces to the field :
Our single valour shall dispute the day
(The hosts in peace the combat shall survey).
Thus shall his death or mine the war decide,
And the proud victor gain the royal bride.

He said : and furious to the palace speeds ;
There, at his call, rush forth the fiery steeds,
Of matchless spirit, and immortal kind,
White as the snow, and swifter than the wind.
Of old, to great Pylumnus, bold and brave,
The fires of these Eretheus' daughter gave.
Before their lord the generous couriers bound,
Neigh, foam, and fly, and paw the trembling
ground ;

The grooms with combs their flowing manes di-
And gently stroke their chests, and sooth their noble pride.

Meantime the hero drew his armour on ;
With gold and burnish'd brais the cuirass shone ;
The glittering helmet, next his temple spread ;
The crimson crest plays dreadful o'er his head ;
He grasps the pond'rous shield, and flaming blade,
The sword that Vulcan for his father made,
Of matchless temper ; which the fiery god
Had plung'd red-lissing in the Stygian flood.
Last the bright spear he seiz'd, large, strong, and tall,

Propp'd on a column 'midst the lofty hall ;
The mighty Actor's spoil. The hero shook
The beamy jav'lin ; and with fury spoke :
My trusty spear, still faithful to my hand !
Still wing'd with death, to answer my command :
Which once brave Actor's arm was wont to wield !
And mine now throws ; the terror of the field !

In this great moment fly, nor fly in vain,
But stretch yon Phrygian eunuch on the plain :
Oh ! give me, through his heart thy point to thrud
And soil his scented tresses in the dust,
The costly cuirass from his breast to tear,
And by one noble stroke to terminate the war !

Thus, fir'd with fury, to the fight he flies ;
Keen flash the flames, and lighten from his eyes.
So the fierce bull, collected in his might,
Roars for his rival, and demands the fight ;
Impatient for the war, with fury burns,
And tries on every tree his angry horns ;
Bends his stern brows, and pushes at the air ;
And paws the flying sands, the prelude of the war

As fierce and eager for the dire alarms,
The Trojan blazes in celestial arms ;
To meet his rival in the field prepares,
Pleas'd with the fight to terminate the wars.
He sets his sorrowing friends and son at ease ;
Expounds the fates' unchangeable decrees ;
And instant bids the messengers report
The terms of combat to the Latian court.

Scarce had the morn (all beauteous to behold !
Tipt the blue mountains with a gleam of gold ;
The sun's fierce steeds, high-bounding o'er the sea
From their wide nostrils snort the beams of day ;
When for the chiefs they drew a line around,
And in just limits close the list'd ground :
Then verdant altars raise to all the pow'rs
Of earth or heav'n, whom either host adores.
In linen robes, with vervain crown'd, they bring
The sacred fire, and water from the spring.

Here, with bright lances, all the Ausonian train
Pour through the op'ning portals to the plain :
The Trojans there, and Tuiscans in array,
And ranks embattled bend their eager way.
Amid the thousands with a grace divine,
In gold and purple gay, the leaders shine.
Here, tow'ring o'er the troops Asylas stood ;
Great Mnestheus there, of Troy's imperial blood
There, brave Messapus, of immortal strain,
Sprung from the mighty monarch of the main.
The sign now giv'n through each impatient host
Each chief retires to his appointed post.
At ease the soldiers fall their pond'rous shields,
And pitch their idle jav'lins in the fields.
Old fires and matrons, with the vulgar throng,
Lean'd o'er the walls, and from the turrets hung
With longing eyes the great event they wait,
And crowds on crowds press forward through the gate.

But from the fam'd Albano's shady brows,
(Though then without a name the mountain rose
The queen of heav'n the Latian town beheld,
The hosts embattled, and the crowded field.
Then to brave Turnus' sister, who presides
O'er lakes and streams, and awes the roaring tide
(On the fair nymph, that province was bestow'd
For her lost honour, by the thrond'ring god)
Her fears the goddess of the skies express'd ;
And thus the regent of the floods address'd :

Queen of the founts and streams, and far above
The race of Latian nymphs in Juno's love,
Those nymphs, who, by my wand'ring lord mislead
Presum'd to mount our own imperial bed ;
Yet thee I suffer'd in his grace to rise,
And share th' immortal honours of the skies.

With deep concern sad tidings must I bear,
 What I must grieve to speak, and you to hear.
 The Latian state and Turnus, in the war,
 While fortune favour'd, were my constant care.
 Now his inevitable hour draws nigh;
 On terms unequal is he doom'd to die.
 But from the fatal field, th' appointed fight,
 Lo! I retire; nor can I bear the sight.
 If thou can'st save him yet from death, descend: }
 Some better fate thy efforts may attend; }
 Fly—and exert the sister and the friend.
 She said; Juturna wept, by grief oppress'd,
 Thrice tore her hair, and beat her ivory breast.
 Fly, Juno cries, and stop the dire debate,
 Fly, fly, and snatch him, if you can, from fate.
 Nor waste the hours in tears, and vain despair;
 Break, break the truce, and wake the slumbering
 war.

On me discharge the crime.—The goddess said;
 And left involv'd in doubts the mournful maid.

Now came the kings: four stately couriers bear,
 In pomp, the Latian lord's imperial car.
 Twelve golden rays around his temple shone,
 To mark his glorious lineage from the sun.
 Young Turnus next appear'd; two spears he held,
 And two white couriers drew him to the field.
 Æneas then advanc'd with grace divine,
 Th' illustrious father of the Roman line;
 High in his hand the starry buckler rais'd;
 And in immortal arms the hero blaz'd.
 With him his son Ascanius took his place,
 The second hope of Rome's majestic race.
 Slow the procession moves: the sacred priest stood by his altar in the linen vest;
 A tender lamb for sacrifice prefer'd,
 And a young victim from the bristly herd.
 They turn their faces to the dawning day;
 The salted cakes with solemn rev'rence pay;
 The victims sign'd; the foremost hairs they drew,
 And on the hearth the first libations threw.
 Then the great Trojan prince unsheath'd his sword,

And thus with lifted hands the gods ador'd.
 Thou land, for which I wage the war, and thou,
 Great source of day, be witness to my vow!
 Almighty king of heav'n, and queen of air
 (Propitious now, and reconcil'd by pray'r);
 Th'ou Mars, enthron'd on great Olympus' height,
 Lord of the field, and master of the fight;
 Ye springs, ye floods, ye various pow'rs who lie
 Beneath the deeps, or tread the golden sky;
 Hear, and attest! if victor in the fray,
 The Daunian leader gains the glorious day,
 My son his claim of empire shall release;
 My Trojan subjects shall depart in peace.
 But should the conquest prove my happy lot,
 (For so I think, and heav'n confirm the thought!)
 The Latians never shall my rule obey;
 Already I disclaim th' imperial sway.
 From fight let each unconquer'd nation cease,
 And join in leagues of everlasting peace.
 To king Latinus I resign the care,
 The pomp of state, with all concerns of war,
 And ev'ry regal claim:—the rites divine,
 And the religious province, shall be mine.
 For me my Trojan friends a town shall frame,
 And grace the tow'rs with fair Lavinia's name.

Thus he. Then old Latinus lifts his eyes.
 And his right hand, with rev'rence, to the skies.
 By the same oath, by heav'n, and earth, and main,
 And all the pow'rs, that all the three contain;
 Latona's twins, that grace the bright abode;
 Janus, the mighty, double-fronted god!
 Th' infernal monarch, and the fiends below,
 And Jove, whose bolts avenge the broken vow!
 To sanctify my word, behold! I stand,
 And on these hallow'd altars lay my hand:
 Whate'er ensues, misfortune, or success,
 No time shall break this solemn league of peace,
 Nor shake my purpose; but entire and whole
 I'll keep the sacred tenor of my soul;
 No art shall win me, and no pow'r compel;
 Not, though the golden skies should plunge to hell;
 Yon starry splendours from their spheres should fall,
 And ocean spread his waters o'er the ball.
 Firm is the sword, and sure the oath I swore;
 Sure, as the sceptre ne'er shall flourish more;
 No more its verdant honours shall renew,
 Lopt from the mother-tree where once it grew;
 Now by the artist's hand adorn'd with brais,
 And worn successive by our regal race!

The princes thus the solemn compact bound
 By mutual oaths, with all the peers around.
 The priests before the fires the victims slay:
 Eager the smoking entrails rend away; } [lay.
 And, on the altars rang'd, the loaded chargers }
 But the Rutulians griev'd, by fears oppress'd,
 And various tumults work'd in every breast.
 Long since they saw their prince o'ermatch'd in might.

And curs'd the terms of such unequal fight.
 Their dread increases, as the chiefs draw near,
 And Turnus' looks augment the gen'ral fear.
 Trembling, aghast, he moves with silent pace:
 A deadly paleness spreads o'er all his face.
 Close by the altar's side, in care profound,
 His pensive eyes he fix'd upon the ground.

Soon as the sister saw the giddy crowd
 Had chang'd their minds, and spoke their fears
 In great Camertes' form, of high renown, [aloud;
 For birth, his father's valour and his own,
 Her slight amidst the murmur'ing bands she took,
 Enslam'd their rage, and thus the host bespoke:

What shame, Rutulians, valiant as we are,
 On one to lay the whole success of war!
 Behold the utmost force the foe can boast,
 The few poor relics of their shatter'd host.
 Heav'n's!—can we shrink from such a slender pow'r!

Are not our men the same? our numbers more?
 Should our whole army to the fight repair,
 Scarce all their troops would half employ our war!
 'Tis true, your hero to the gods shall rise,
 A self-devoted victim to the skies.
 Yet the brave chief eternal praise shall claim,
 And live for ever in a length of fame:
 While we, O shame! a base degenerate host!
 Look tamely on, and see our country loft!
 Stretch our vile hands to servitude abhor'd
 And court the bondage of a foreign lord!

This fiery speech inflam'd the list'ning train;
 Through all the host the gath'ring murmur ran.
 Now chang'd, the Latians wish for peace no more
 But long to break the league they fought before.

They pity Turnus' fortune, and prepare
With eager ardour to renew the war.

His sister sent (the tumult to improve)
A false delusive omen from above
In pomp a tow'ring eagle soars on high,
And sudden, shooting from th' ethereal sky,
Drives a vast flock of wat'ry fowls before,
On sounding wings, along the winding shore ;
Then, where the floods in soft meanders ran,
And his huge talons trufs'd a silver swan.
Th' astonish'd Latian bands in courage rise,
When lo! the flock: (more wond'rous to their eyes)

Turn, and pursue the victor through the skies.
Prest by the foe, encumber'd with the prey,
He drops the prize, and wings th' aerial way ;
With shouts the Latians hail th' auspicious fight,
Range all their troops, and hasten to the fight.

'Tis what I wish'd, the long-expected sign,
(Tolumnius cry'd) I thank the pow'rs divine.
Rise, follow me, my friends, your aid supply,
Forc'd by the foe, like yonder birds to fly ;
While through your wafte'd shores the victor sweeps :

Who now shall soon rush headlong to the deeps.
Haste ; save your leader from the fatal fray ;
Close, close your ranks ; engage ; and win the day.

He said ; sprung forth ; and 'midst the Trojans
His furious dart, that whistled as it flew ; [threw Tumultuous shouts pursue the parting spear,
And all now grow more eager for the war.

Nine brave Arcadians at their squadrons head,
Gilippus' offspring by a Tuscan bed,
Shone in the front ; the spear impetuous flew
Amidst the brothers, and the youngest flew ;
A lovely blooming youth ; with fury cast,
Beneath the belt the steely jav'lin past,
Transfix'd the stripling with a deadly wound,
And stretch'd him pale and gasping on the ground.
All fir'd with vengeance for their brother slain,
Fierce to the combat fly the martial train.
Some draw the glitt'ring sword, and some advance
With the broad spear, and shake the flaming lance.

With equal speed, their ardor to oppose,
Pour forth in endless tides the Latian foes.
As swift th' Arcadian troops, with sculptr'd shields,

Rush'd on with Troy, and delug'd all the fields.
Strait to their ensigns the bold bands repair,
Impatient to decide the great event by war.

The madding crowd the sacred rites confound ;
Strip the bright altars : tofs the fires around ;
And seize the goblets : while the jav'lins fly
In iron storms, and tempest all the sky.

The good old king, affrighted, from the plain
Bears back his violated gods again.
Some yoke the coursers to the car with speed,
Some vault, impetuous, on the snorting steed.
Some to the field the kindling troops excite,
Draw their bright swords, and headlong rush to fight.

Eager to break the peace, with all his force,
The fierce Meffapus spur'd his thund'ring horse
Full on Aulestes, with a furious spring,
Who wore the royal ensigns of a king.
O'er the high altars as the chief gave way,
Headlong he plung'd in dust and grov'ling lay.

There at his length extended, on the plain,
He pleads for mercy ; but he pleads in vain !
Th' impetuous victor flew with rapid speed,
Shook his huge spear, and, bending from the steed,
Transfixt the monarch ; then, insulting, cries ;
He bleeds !—this victim sure must please the skies !
The joyful Latians, eager for the prey,
Strip the warm corse, and bear the spoils away.
Then, as the mighty Ebusus drew near,
And at bold Choriæus shook the spear,
He rush'd against him with a furious pace,
Snatch'd a red brand, and dash'd it on his face.
Through ambient air a noisome scent expires,
As the long beard shrunk crackling in the fires.
Stunn'd as he stood with sudden darkness round,
The raging victor drags him to the ground ;
Then seiz'd his locks ; his forceful knee apply'd,
And plung'd the vengeful falchion in his side.

From Podalirius, eager to pursue,
Through the first ranks, the shepherd Alfus flew ;
Then turn'd, and, with his axe descending full,
Cleaves at one dreadful stroke his slatter'd skull.
With blood and brains his arms are cover'd o'er ;
The thirsty sands are drench'd with streams of
An iron sleep came swimming o'er his fight, [gore.
And wrapt the warrior in eternal night.

But the just Trojan prince, amidst the band,
Without his helmet rush'd, and stretch'd his hand :
Whither, my friends, ah ! whither wou'd you run ?
The terms stand fixt ; the combat is my own.
Dismiss your fears ; nor my revenge pursue ;
For Turnus, Turnus is your gen'ral's due.
That victim, these religious rites demand,
Already sacred to this conq'ring hand.

While yet he spoke ; loud-hissing through the
With thirsty rage, a feather'd arrow flies ; [skies,
And reach'd the hero with a certain aim ;
But from what hand, was never told by fame.
None knew, what fortune, or assisting god,
So proud a triumph on the foe bestow'd,
Nor one in all the mighty host was found,
Who claim'd the merit of so base a wound.

The chiefs astonish'd, Turnus now beheld,
And the brave prince retiring from the field :
High hopes of conquest in his bosom rise ;
Strait for his coursers, and his arms, he cries ;
Vaults, with a furious bound, into the car,
Shakes the loose reins, and rushes to the war.
Raging he spreads the growing slaughter round :
Some foes expire ; some welter on the ground :
Some fly—in vain ! for, swifter than the wind,
His winged lance arrests 'em from behind.
Fierce o'er the prostrate foes the hero rolls
His whirling wheels, and crushes out their souls.

As when on Hebrus' banks the god of war
Flies to the combat on his rattling car ;
Frowns, shouts, and clashing on his dreadful shield,
Lashes his fiery coursers to the field ;
The steeds devour the ground, out-strip the wind,
And leave the pinions of the storm behind :
Thrace feels through all her realms their furious
course,

Shook by the prancings of the thund'ring horse ;
Fear, fraud, and force, and flight, a ghastly train
Of horrid fiends, attend him to the plain.
So drove stern Turnus with resistless might,
His smoking coursers o'er the field of fight ;

Their rapid hoofs through heaps of carnage tore;
Plung'd deep into the sands, distain'd with gore;
O'er piles of dead and dying-warriors bound,
And, as they fly, they dash the bloody dust around.

Now hapless Thamyris and Pholus fell,
And now he sent bold Sthenelus to hell.
These, hand to hand, he flew, approaching near;
The last, at distance, with his pointed spear:
At distance both th' Imbrasidæ expire,
Train'd in fair Lydia, by their valiant fire:
In closer fight, the dauntless warriors join'd;
Or distanc'd with their steeds the winged wind.

There with high vaunts rufh'd proud Eumedes Foredoom'd to fate, ambitious Dolon's son. [on,
Base as his father, with his grandfire's name,
The recreant soldier fought the field of fame,
But with the luckless fortune of his sire,
Who claim'd Pelides' courfers for his hire,
When sent the Grecian army to explore;
Vain fool! he ventur'd, but return'd no more;
Slain by Tydides' hand, resign'd his breath,
And shar'd a juster recompense in death!
Him when the Daunian hero spy'd from far,
First a light dart he launch'd in open air,
Stops the fleet steeds, and, furious, quits the car; }
Stood o'er the Trojan, prostrate as he lay,
Trod on his neck, and wrench'd the sword away.
Then through his throat the deadly faulchion
thrust,

And thus insults him growling in the dust:
Lie there! possess the land thy valour gains!
And measure, at thy length, our Latian plains!
Such, such deserv'd rewards I still bestow,
When call'd to battle, on the vanishing foe;
Thus may you build your town, and thus enjoy,
These realms, ye proud presumptuous sons of Troy!

Next, by his flying spear Asbutus bled:
A second lance laid mighty Chloerus dead.
In Dares' breast he plung'd the pointed steel,
And sent the bold Theribochus to hell:
Then pierc'd Thymætes with a fatal wound, Whose slownd'ring steed had cast him to the
ground.

As o'er th' Ægean deeps when Boreas roars,
And rolls the waves tumultuous to the shores,
The driving clouds before the whirlwind fly,
And break, and scatter, through the ruffled sky:
So where bold Turnus rufh'd, inflam'd with ire,
Their orders scatter, and whole hosts retire.
Whirl'd on his rapid car, the hero gains
New rage, new vigour, as he sweeps the plains.
High o'er his helm his crimson crest, inclin'd
By ev'ry breath, nods dreadful in the wind.

No more, in proud disdain, cou'd Phegeus bear
To see the hero rule the tide of war;
But, rashly furious, to the car proceeds,
Seiz'd the loose reins, and turn'd the flying steeds.
Him, as suspended on the yoke he hung,
By the swift chariot dragg'd in dust along,
Through the bord' corset, the sharp jav'lin found,
And rais'd the warrior with a slender wound.
Yet with his shield oppos'd he dares the blow,
And with his brandish'd sword assaults the foe.
The whirling wheels, the fiery speed impell'd,
Soon shoot him headlong on the sanguine field.
Swift Turnus follow'd; and his faulchion drew;
Between the cuirass and the head it flew:

The gushing blood distains the sands around,
And the pale trunk, lay growling on the ground.

Thus while the conqu'ring chief his progress held,
Rag'd, storm'd, and reign'd the master of the field;
Achates, Mucstheus, and the royal heir,
Attend the Trojan prince with duteous care,
(As propt, and leaning on the spear he went);
And plac'd the bleeding hero in the tent.
The steel, deep-rivett'd, with eager hands
He tugs impatient, and their aid demands,
More wide to lay the wound, a passage bare,
Unroot the dart, and send him to the war.

Now came Iapis to relieve his pain,
Of old by Phœbus lov'd, nor lov'd in vain.
On whom the god had profer'd to bestow
His lyre, his bays, his prescience, and his bow.
But (to prolong his drooping father's days)
The youth refus'd his arrows, lyre, and bays,
And precious skill; but chose the healing part,
A silent, useful, though inglorious art.
Unmov'd with all the sorow and the care
Of friends, attendants, and the royal heir,
His mighty spear, th' impatient chief sustains,
Who grinds his teeth for rage, nor heeds the glowing pains,

The sage now hastens to the task assign'd,
And first dispatchful, tucks his robes behind;
Tries all the vegetable pow'rs around,
To cool the smart, and mitigate the wound.
His hands solicit now with tender art;
Now tug in vain with vigour at the dart.
At length he pray'd; nor Phœbus heard the pray'r;
And nearer every moment pour'd the war,
Thick and more thick the growling horrors rise;
A cloud of dust involves the golden skies.
The trampling steeds, the thundering foes, drew nigh,

And 'midst the camp the show'ring jav'lin's fly.
The mingling cries from ev'ry part rebound;
Some shout, some groan, some gasp upon the
ground.

Now, touch'd with pity for the hero's pain,
Descends the goddess mother on the plain.
A branch of sovereign dittany she bore,
Erom Ida gather'd, on the Cretan shore.
Luxuriant leaves the taper stalk array;
The stalk in flow'rs; the flow'rs in purple gay.
The goats, when pierc'd at distance by the dart,
Apply the medicinè to the wounded part.
This juice, while clouds conceal her radiant face,
The queen infuses in the golden vase
Temper'd with scented panacæe the whole,
And with ambrosial liquors crowns the bowl.
Nor knew the sage the succour that he found,
But with the balmy mixture bathes the wound.
At once the throbbing anguish past away;
Stanch'd was the blood, and in the bottom lay.
The dart, though deeply rooted, at command
Moves up, and answers the physician's hand.
His former vigour now succeeds to pain.
And life burns bright in all her pow'rs again.
Iapis first perceiv'd th' immortal art,
That cool'd the raging pangs, and clos'd the part.
Raptur'd he saw the cure; and first impell'd
The prince, renew'd in courage, to the field.
Arms for the chief, he cries, prepare his arms
And instant send him to the dire alarms.

This cure, great hero is no work of mine,
Not mortal art but done by hands divine.
Thy life some guardian god had made his care,
Who sends thee back to fight, and conquer in the war.

The fierce, impatient prince, had cover'd o'er
His manly legs with golden greaves before.
Now, all on fire, his mighty lance he took,
And in his hand the pond'rous weapon shook.
High on his arm the heav'nly shield he rais'd;
And, on his breast, the radiant cuirafs blaz'd.
Then, with a close embrace he strain'd his son;
And kiss'd him through his helm, and thus begun:

From me true courage, and in camps to dare,
From others learn, my son, success in war.
I go to labour in the bloody fray,
To fight, and guard thee, in the dreadful day;
To crown thee with a bright immortal name;
To teach thy youth the glorious paths to fame.
Thou, in thy riper years, the virtues trace,
And copy all the worthies of thy race.
Thy soul may Hector and Æneas fire,
Thy godlike uncle, and thy martial sire!

So spake the hero, and, by rage impell'd,
Tow'r'd from the tent, majestic, to the field;
Shook a huge jav'lin in his vig'rous hand;
And with their chief pour'd forth the martial band.
Antheus and Mnestheus led th' embattled train,
And all rush'd furious to the deathful plain.
Beneath the warriors groans the trembling ground,
And clouds of dust involve the region round.

Now Turnus and his host the foe beheld
From a high mound, advancing o'er the field.
Th' astonish'd troops a gen'ral fear confounds;
But first his sister heard the dreadful sounds.
Too well she knew the dire alarms from far,
And trembling fled before the moving war.
Fierce, with their leaders, march the Trojan train;
And the black squadrons darken all the plain.
As when some tempest o'er mid ocean roars,
And, wing'd with whirlwinds, gathers to the shores;
With boding hearts the peasants hear from far
The fallen murmurs of the distant war;
Foresee the harvests levell'd with the ground,
And all the forests spread in ruins round;
Swift to the land the hollow grumbling wind
Flies, and proclaims the furious storm behind.
So swift, so furious, great Æneas flew,
And led against the foes the martial crew.
The thick'ning squadrons, wedg'd in close array,
In one black body win their desp'rate way.
By Mnestheus slain, in dust Archefus lies,
And by Thymbræus' sword Orpheus dies.
Next Gyas' lance the mighty Ufens sped,
And Eupolo by brave Achates bled.
Ev'n curs'd Tolumnius fell, whose fatal spear,
Launch'd at the Dardan host, renew'd the war.
A peal of shouts, tumultuous, tore the sky,
And o'er the field the pale Rutulians fly.
But with disdain the Trojan hero glows;
Nor wastes his vengeance on inferior foes.
He scorns to fight the few that stand their ground,
Or in their backs the flying crowds to wound:
Turnus, and him alone, he calls aloud
To fight, and hunts him through the dusty cloud.

On this, his anxious sister, seiz'd with fear,
Hurl'd from his lofty seat the charioteer,

Metiscus the renown'd; tost far away,
The wond'ring chief beneath the harness lay,
Herself assumes his armour, voice and air;
Snatches the reins, and vaults into the car.

As the black swallow, that, in quest of prey,
Round the proud palace wings her wanton way,
When for her children she provides the feast,
To still the clamours of the craving nest;
Now wild excursions round the cloister takes;
Now, sportive winds, or skims along the lakes:
So flies the goddess on the rapid car,
From side to side, and traverses the war:
Now here, now there, she brings the chief to fight,
But still she turns him from the fatal fight.

Nor less the prince unravels all her ways,
And hunts his foes through ev'ry various maze;
Thrids all the shifting course, and breaks the crowd

With furious speed, and calls the chief aloud.
Oft has he spy'd him, and approach'd the car;
As oft his sister plung'd amid the war.
Where'er the Trojan hero bends his course;
Averse the goddess turns the flying horse.
What should he do? a thousand thoughts divide
His wav'ring soul, that points to ev'ry side!
When lo! Messapus cross'd him in the field,
And in his hand two shining jav'lins held.
One, at the prince, with levell'd aim, he threw:
Beneath his shield the cautious prince withdrew;
Low bending on his knee, secure he lay;
But the swift jav'lin strikes his plume away.
Then, when the meditated fraud he view'd,
'T hat still his rival fled, as he pursu'd;
He first invok'd the thund'rer to redress
The rites profan'd, and violated peace;
Then rush'd amid the train; nor check nor bound
His fury knew, but stretch'd the slaughter round.
The faithless foe he thinks it vain to spare,
And, fir'd with vengeance, gives a loose to war.

What god will now inspire me, to display
The rage of death, and horrors of the day!
What crowds of heroes perish'd on the plain,
By mighty Turnus, and Æneas, slain!
Was it thy will the nations should engage (Great sire of heav'n) with such unbounded rage?
So soon from war and violence to cease,
Leagu'd in a bond of everlasting peace?

Æneas first slew Sucre in the fight,
Whose sword had turn'd the Trojan troops to flight.
With a swift stroke, and all his force apply'd,
He plung'd the deadly faulchion in his side.
Then, with his brother, Amycus was kill'd,
Cast from their steed by Turnus on the field.
With the long lance, this tow'ring chief he gor'd:
Through that, impetuous, drove the pointed sword:
Then, on his chariot hung, in triumph bore
Their heads aloft, that dropp'd with livid gore:
Next, at one charge, on three bold chiefs he flew;
Talos, and Tanais, and Cethegus, flew.
With them, of Theban race, Onytes fell,
Fair Peridia's son; and sunk to hell.
Then led two brothers, who from Lycia come;
Nor their own Phœbus could prevent their doom.
Next poor Menœtes by his arm was slain,
Who shunn'd so long the dreadful war in vain;
A skilful angler; once he made abode,
Bless'd with content, by Lerna's plenteous flood.

There dress'd his father, to the great unknown,
A stranger field, and furrows not his own.

As the fierce flames through the tall forest fly,
This way and that, and kindle all the sky;
Or rapid torrents from the mountains sweep,
Roar down the sides, and thunder to the deep;
With weight resistless, and destructive sway,
O'er half a ruin'd country break their way:
So through the field, in different parts engag'd,
As swift and fierce the rival heroes rag'd.
They burst with wrath; they rise to ev'ry blow;
They send their souls with ev'ry lance they throw.

A rock's vast weight the great Æneas threw:
Th' enormous fragment like a whirlwind flew,
And hurl'd Murranus on the ground, who brings
His vaunted lineage from the Latian kings.
Headlong the warrior from the chariot flies
Amidst the harness, and encumber'd lies:
The coursers startle at the flaming sword;
Paw down, and trample on their dying lord.

On Hyllus, Turnus rush'd with all his might,
As, fir'd with rage, the chief advanc'd to fight.
Full at his golden helmet, o'er the plain
The jav'lin flew, and stung him to the brain:
Nor thee, the bravest of the Grecian band,
Thy valour, Creteus, sav'd from Turnus' hand!
Next fell the priest Cupencus in the strife,
Nor his own gods could guard his sacred life;
Full in his breast Æneas plung'd the dart,
That pierc'd the shield, and quiver'd in his heart.

Then bled great Æolus, by Turnus kill'd,
And sunk, a bulk enormous, on the field!
Whom not the Grecian heroes could destroy,
Nor all their armies, in the wars of Troy,
Nor great Achilles with his vengeful steel,
Though by his arm the Phrygian empire fell.
Here ends his life; his stately palace stood
Beneath fair Ida's consecrated wood:
There liv'd the mighty man; his cold remains
At length lie bury'd in the Latian plains.

Now in all parts the martial squadrons wage
A gen'ral war, with undistinguisht rage.
The Latian, Trojan, and Rutulian force,
The Tuscan cohorts, and Arcadian horde,
Beneath their chiefs, embattled, spread the plain;
Here Mnestheus, there Sereftus, fires the train;
Here great Asylus swept the field; and there
Storm'd brave Messapus, the renown'd in war.
Each fights, as in his arm the mighty day,
With all the fate of his great general lay;
No stop, no check the fiery warriors knew;
With their long toils their kindling ardour grew,
And with fresh vigour to the combat flew.

But Venus now inspires her godlike son
To leave the field, and storm th' imperial town.
As following Turnus through the ranks he flies,
From side to side he darts his eager eyes;
When, lo! before him, in a full survey,
Exempt from war, the fenceless city lay.
He views the promis'd prize with stern delight;
His soul takes fire, and kindles at the sight.
Sudden the hero calls his chiefs around,
With all his bands, and mounts a rising ground.
Then, as they rais'd their ample shields, and shook
Their pointed lances, their bold leader spoke.
Attend, and instant these commands obey;
Inspir'd by favouring Jove, who points the way:

All speed this noble enterprise demands,
Claims all your care, and urges all your hands.
This day, this hour, unless the Latians yield,
And own your chief the victor of the field,
Ev'n from the lowest stone my rage shall tear
Yon town, the source of this destructive war.
Yon perjurd court my vengeance shall confound;
And those proud tow'rs lie smoking on the ground.
Twice have we vanquish'd the Rutulian train;
Still must I wait till Turnus will be slain;
No!—at yon walls the sure destruction aim;
Revenge the broken league with sword and flame;
Your arms against the guilty city bend:
There the dire war began, and there shall end.

Rous'd at the word, all wedg'd in firm array,
Strait to the town the squadrons urge their way,
They toss the brands, the scaling engines rear,
And round the ramparts rose the sudden war.
Some to the portals fly with speed, and slay
The guards or citizens, who cross their way.
Some hurl the vengeful darts; the jav'lins fly
In dusky clouds, and intercept the sky.
Æneas rais'd his hand, amid the crowd,
Calls, and upbraids the Latian prince aloud,
Obtesting heaven, that, wounded, and compell'd
By his perfidious foes, he took the field;
That twice the rites of peace their arms profane,
And from their impious rage a second war began.

But mad confusions in the city rise:
'Tis tumult all; for all at once advise.
These arm, and fly to guard the walls; and those,
More loud, demand admission for the foes.
Some, to renew the peace, with clamours bring
Ev'n to the gates the helpless hoary king.

So when the swain invades, with stifling smoke,
The bees close-cluster'd in a cavern'd rock,
They rise; and, trembling for th' endanger'd state,
Inflam'd with wrath, with fell revenge and hate,
This way, and that, in loud tumultuous swarms,
Fly o'er their waxen town with hoarse alarms.
The steams offensive roll the cells around;
Their fullen murmurs through the rock rebound;
While, thick'ning, through the cleft the smokes
arise,

And in a length of vapours mount the skies.
But to complete and aggravate their fears,
A new mischance involv'd the town in tears.
For, when the wretched queen beheld on high
O'er the proud domes the fiery tempest fly;
The ramparts storm'd; th' exulting Trojans near;
Nor Turnus' troops before the town appear;
Many a long look the cast, but cast in vain:
And in her fears concludes the hero slain;
She raves against the gods in wild despair;
She calls herself the auth'ress of the war:
A thousand plaints she vented o'er and o'er,
And in her rage her purple garments tore.
Then, on a lofty beam, the matron ty'd
The noose dishonest, and obscenely dy'd.
Soon through the court the dreadful rumour ran;
With frantic sorrow rave the female train.
Struck with superior grief: Lavinia tears
Her blooming rosy cheeks, and golden hairs.
To their loud shrieks the palace-walls reply;
Thence through the town the fatal tidings fly.
All feel the stroke; and all, the loss lament;
His royal robes the rev'rend monarch rent.

In wild despair, with furious hands he spread
 A cloud of dust o'er all his hoary head;
 And weeps and mourns aloud (a moving scene) !
 His ruin'd empire, and self-murder'd queen.
 Oft, but in vain, he blam'd himself alone,
 That rashly he refus'd the Trojan for his son.
 But now more slow his progress Turnus held,
 And chas'd a few poor stragglers o'er the field.
 With heartless cheer, dejected, he proceeds;
 And with their master flag the fiery steeds.
 He hears the tumult in the walls behind,
 Shrieks, cries, and shouts, that thicken in the wind.
 Alas ! he cries, what clamours strike my ear !
 What sounds distressful from the town I hear !
 Then to the hero, as the steeds he stay'd,
 Thus in the driver's form the sister said :
 This way, my lord, your former course pursue,
 And urge your conquest o'er the hostile crew.
 Your friends defend the town ; th' Italians there
 Wage with the Dardan chief an equal war.
 Against his Trojans let us bend our way,
 As num'rous, valiant, and renown'd, as they.

Sister, the chief replies, whom well I knew (Though in a mortal form conceal'd from view)
 When you dissolv'd the league, by art with-held
 The single fight, and mingled in the field,
 O say ! what pow'r dispatch'd thee from the skies,
 With this sad scene to shock thy mournful eyes ?
 To share the labours of the dire debate,
 A weeping witness of thy brother's fate !
 That brother soon must perish on the plains !
 For ah ! what chance, what beam of hope remains ?
 I saw my dear Murranus yield his breath,
 Who call'd on Turnus in the pangs of death ;
 Ev'n yet I see the warrior bite the ground,
 And the soul rushing through the mighty wound !
 I saw, where, stretch'd in dust, brave Ufens lay,
 Nor liv'd, this scene of ruin to survey,
 But shut out bondage from his closing eyes ;
 His corse and arms remain the victor's prize.
 And shall I see the city wrapt in flame ?
 What else was wanting to complete my shame ?
 How will the Latians hoot their hero's flight !
 Gods !—how will Drances point them to the sight !
 But oh !—shall Latium see her hero fly !—
 Is it so terrible but once to die ?—
 Hear me, oh hear me, all ye gods below !
 Since ev'ry pow'r celestial is my foe ;
 Lo ! I descend to your infernal coast,
 From realms of light, a great and glorious ghost,
 White, and unfully'd with that dire disgrace,
 Nor stain the splendors of my regal race !

While yet he spoke, athwart the war with speed
 Flew bleeding sages on his foaming steed.
 Full in his face a feather'd arrow stood ;
 And to the Daunian chief he calls aloud.
 Turnus, on you, our last, last hope depends ;
 Oh ! haste in pity, and relieve your friends :
 For, raging, to the town Æneas pours,
 To level with the dust the Latian tow'rs.
 See ! o'er the roofs the fires tempestuous rise !
 Hark !—how they roar, and thunder in the skies !
 All eyes are fixt on you, and you alone :
 The king himself stands doubtful which to own,
 You, or your Trojan rival, for his son.
 Yet worse—his queen, till now your chief support,
 Self-murder'd, fills with terror all the court,

Meilappus only with Atinas stands,
 To guard the gates, and animate the bands ;
 Whom in wedg'd ranks the hostile troops enclose
 And round them thick an iron harvest grows ;
 While you, for whom they fight, neglect the train
 And idly wheel your chariot round the plain !
 A thousand various thoughts confound the chief
 He stood ; he gaz'd ; his bosom swell'd with grief
 Pride, conscious valour, fury, love, and shame,
 At once set all the hero in a flame.
 Soon as his soul recover'd from the stroke ;
 Soon as, disper'd, the cloud of passion broke ;
 Back from his car, the ruin to behold,
 His eager eyes the mournful warrior roll'd,
 Where the fierce fires in burning torrents rise
 O'er the tall roofs ; and, curling to the skies,
 Had wrapt a tow'r in flames, sublime and strong Rais'd by himself, that roll'd on wheels along ;
 Whence the bold soldier broke the war below,
 And rain'd an iron tempest on the foe.

Now, sister, fate prevails ; no more delay ;
 I'll go where rigorous fortune points the way,
 Prepar'd the bitterness of death to bear,
 I'll meet this Trojan hand to hand in war.
 No more those eyes shall view thy brother's
 flame,
 Pursu'd, and flying o'er the field of fame ;
 Give, give me, goddess, in this martial fire,
 This high-wrought blaze of fury, to expire.

He said ; and sudden, with an eager bound,
 Leap'd from the trembling chariot to the ground
 Leaves his lamenting sister in despair ;
 Springs through a storm of darts the prince to dare ;
 And bursts impetuous through the ranks of war.
 As when, by age, or rains, or tempests, torn,
 A rock from some high precipice is borne ;
 Trees, herds, and swains, involving in the sweep
 The mass flies furious from th' ærial steep ;
 Leaps down the mountain's side, with many
 bound,
 In fiery whirls, and smokes along the ground ;
 So to the city, through the cleaving train,
 Through streams of blood, that drench'd the pupled plain,
 While round his head the whistling jav'lins play
 As swift, the raging hero breaks his way.
 Then from afar, he beckons with his hand,
 And loudly thus bespoke his social band :
 To me, ye Latians, the whole war resign,
 All, all the fortune of the field is mine.
 'Tis just, ye warriors, that your chief alone
 Assert the compact, or its breach atone.
 I claim, I claim the right, in single fray,
 To meet my rival, and decide the day.
 Back at the word the squadrons are compell'd,
 And for the champions form an open field.

Now the great Trojan chief, at Turnus nam'd
 Fierce from the town in all his terrors came ;
 Leaves ev'ry second work of war behind ;
 Joy, pride, and courage, raise his daring mind.
 All-flush'd with hopes, and glorying in his might
 The godlike prince moves forward to the fight :
 He burns impatient for the dire alarms ;
 And thunders in the bright Vulcanian arms.
 With vast gigantic strides, he tow'rs on high,
 And looks a second Athos in the sky ;

Or Eryx, that in heav'n his forehead shrouds;
Or father Appenine involv'd in clouds,
When with a depth of snows his brows are crown'd,
And all his nodding groves, majestic, wave around.

Meantime the warriors, who defend the town,
Or with huge engines break the bulwarks down,
And all the nations, studious of the fight,
Their arms unbuckled, to survey the fight.
Ev'n death stands still; and, o'er the crowded
plains,

Through the long ranks, a solemn silence reigns.
Nor leis amaz'd, the Latian lord beheld
Two chiefs engag'd in combat on the field,
By love, fate, honour, and ambition, led
To try their title to his daughter's bed.

Soon as each army from the field withdrew,
Fierce, to the fight, the mighty heroes flew.
They launch their spears; their clashing shields resound:

Beneath their fury groans the trembling ground:
Then their bright swords the raging champions
drew,

And with repeated blows the charge renew.
Courage, and chance, and strength, in both unite;
And the bold chiefs maintain an equal fight.

As, where proud Sila's tow'ring summits rise,
Or huge Taburnus heaves into the skies,
With frowning fronts two mighty bulls engage;
A dreadful war the bellowing rivals wage:
Far from the scene the trembling keepers fly;
Struck dumb with terror, stand the heifers by;
Nor know which lord the subject herds shall lead,
And reign at large the monarch of the mead.
Fierce strokes they aim, repeated o'er and o'er;
Their dewlaps, necks, and sides, are bath'd in gore; } [the roar.]

The mountains, streams, and woods, rebel to
So to the fight the furious heroes fly,
So clash their shields, and echo to the sky.

Now Jove suspends his scales; two different weights

He casts in both, and try'd the warrior's fates.
This, light with conquests, to the gods ascends;
That, charg'd with death, sinks downwards to the fiends.

With his drawn Faulchion Turnus strikes the foe
On his full stretch, and rises to the blow.
Loud shouts and groans succeed; each army bent
Their eager eyes, and wait the great event;
When lo! all-shatter'd flies the traitor sword,
And in the stroke deserts the Daunian lord.
A stranger hit he spies, and flakes in vain:
All, all his hopes in flight alone remain;
Aud, swifter than the wind, he darts along } the plain.

For when the chief first vaulted on the car
With headlong haste, and rush'd into the war,
He left his father's temper'd sword, 'tis said,
And seiz'd his charioteer Metiscus' blade;
And, ev'n with this, the growing slaughter spread,
While from his rage the trembling Trojans fled.
But when the mortal steel a stroke bestow'd
On heav'nly arms, the labour of a god!
The Faulchion, faithless to the warrior's hand,
Broke short—the fragments glitter'd on the sand.
O'er the wide field distracted Turnus springs,
And flies with wild affright in mazy rings:

For here he views th' embattled Trojan pow'rs;
Here a vast lake; and there the Latian tow'rs.
But still his foe, though tardy from his wound,
Treads all his steps, unrav'ling ev'ry round.
As the fleet stag, by the staunch hound pursu'd,
Now bounds above the banks, now shoots along
the flood;

Now from the meshy toils with terror springs,
Scar'd by the plumes, that dance upon the strings:
He starts, he pants, he stares, with wild amaze,
And flies his op'ning foe a thousand ways.
Close at his heels, the deep-mouth'd furious hound
Turnus as he turns, and traces all the ground.
On his full stretch he makes his eager way,
And holds, or thinks he holds, the trembling prey.
Forth darts the stag—his foe cast far behind,
Catches but empty air, and bites the wind,
The hunters shout; the streams, the rocks reply;
And the tumultuous pearls run rattling round the
Thus, flying in distress, the Daunian lord [fky.
Calls on his friends; demands his trusty sword.

But the great Trojan, with a lofty cry,
Forbids the bands the weapon to supply;
Denouncing death, and threat'ning all around,
Th' imperial town to level with the ground.
O'er ten large circuits, with a rapid pace,
This hero leads, and that pursues the chase.
No light reward must crown their eager strife;
The long-contended prize is Turnus' noble life!

To Faunus sacred had an olive stood:
The shipwreck'd sailors on the hallow'd wood,
Hung their devoted vests in honour of the god.
But late, to leave the field for combat free,
The Trojans fell'd the venerable tree.

Full in the root, Æneas drove his spear:
The dart, deep riveted, stood trembling there:
The hero struggling with incessant pain,
Now bends to disengage the lance again;
And with his dart, at least, o'ertake the foe,
Who, frighted, to the god prefer'd his vow.

Thy suppliant's pray'r, in pity, Faunus, hear,
And thou, kind mother earth, detain the spear;
If still I honour'd with a pious hand
Your plant, by guilty Troy with steel profan'd.
Thus he; the god attends his humble strain:
The Trojan labours at the root in vain:

There as he tugs the lance with all his might,
Fierce, and impatient no renew the fight,
Once more Juturna to the chief restor'd
(In brave Metiscus' form) his temper'd sword.
This heav'nly Venus view'd with high disdain,
And from the root releas'd the dart again.
Renew'd in might, the tow'ring chiefs advance;
One thook the sword, and one the flaming lance.
Their heaving bosoms swell with stern delight,
Pant for the combat, and demand the fight.

Then to his consort, who the war survey'd
Thron'd on a golden cloud, the thund'rer said:
What schemes, my queen, are left, with vain debate,

Ev'n yet to check the ripe events of fate?
You know, and own, Æneas soon must rise
From earth, already sacred to the skies.
Long since, those glories to the chief are ow'd.
And heav'n now opens to receive the god.
To what fond purpose then his fruitless care?
To linger in the clouds, and urge the war?

Say, was it just, to wake the dire alarms?
To violate a god with mortal arms,
When the bold sister to the chief restor'd,
By the assistance, his paternal sword?
(For what without thy succour could she dare)?
And sent the vanquish'd Turnus to the war?
At length, at length, the needless strife give o'er;
At my request, indulge your rage no more;
Nor let revenge, dire enemy to rest,
For ever prey on that immortal breast.
Oh! let thy lord thy secret sorrow share,
Or, more than share it, give me all thy care!
To their last sacred point the fates are come;
Here, here they fix th' unalterable doom.
The Latian court in ruins could you lay,
And drive the Trojans o'er the land and sea;
Profane with blood the holy bridal site,
Rekindle war, and urge them to the fight;
This we indulg'd: now give thy efforts o'er
At our command; and thwart the Fates no more.

So spoke th' imperial lov'reign of the skies;
And, in submissive terms, the queen replies:
Great fire: because thy sacred will I know,
I left my Turnus to his doom below.
Nor had I far, but at the will of Jove,
Disgrac'd and pensive, in the clouds above;
But in the front of sight my foes engag'd,
And, wrapt in flames, through all the battle rag'd;
I bade Juturna mingle in the strife,
Nay, venture more, to save a brother's life.
That charge I own; but not to bend a bow,
Or hurl a single jav'lin at the foe.
This, this, I swear, by the black Stygian floods,
The sole dread sanction of th' immortal gods:
Now back to heav'n, great father, I repair,
And from this hour renounce the hateful war.
But yet I beg, O sov'reign of the sky!
What not the hardest laws of fate deny;
For your own Latium, I implore this grace,
This honour for your own majestic race;
When by these nuptials both the realms combine,
And in firm leagues of peace and friendship join;
Still may the Latians, still remain the same,
Nor take from Troy their language, garb, or name!

May the great race of Alban monarchs reign;
Kings after kings the regal line sustain;
And from th' Italian blood may Rome arise,
In all her pride and glory, to the skies.
But may a long oblivion quite destroy
The last, last ruins, with the name of Troy!

The goddess spoke; and, with a smile, replies:
The fire of men, and monarch of the skies:
Can Saturn's other heir, who reigns above,
Th' imperial sister, and the wife of Jove,
With endless schemes of vengeance break her rest?
Why burns such wrath in a celestial breast?
Cease, cease, at length, and lay your anger by,
Since with your wish, my empress, we comply.
Th' Ausonians ever shall remain the same
In customs, garb, religion, and the name;
And the lost Trojan race forget from whence
they came:

In manners, laws, and language, shall they join,
And Ilion shall increase the Latian line.
From hence a pious godlike race shall rise;
The first of men; the darlings of the skies,

Nor all the nations of the world shall pay
More glorious honours to thy name, than they.

Then, pleas'd and reconcil'd, the queen of Jove
Flies to her palace, in the realms above.
'Twas then th' eternal fire of heav'n expell'd
The wat'ry goddesses from the fighting field:
Two hideous monsters wait obsequious by,
Tremendous fiends! the furies of the sky;
Hell-born and horrible, they sprung to light,
With dire Megæra, from the womb of Night.
Huge wreaths of serpents spires their temples
bound:

Their wings in whirlwinds drove the air around,
When bent the minds of mortal men to scare
With the black horrors of the last despair;
When for the guilty world the god prepares
Woes, death, disease, blue pestilence, and wars;
In pomp terrific, frown the fiends abhor'd;
Before the throne of heav'n's Almighty Lord,
To wreak his vengeance, in his courts they stand,
Watch his imperial nod, and fly at his command.

Of these, the swiftest from the skies he sent,
To fright the goddesses with a dire portent,
Fir'd with her charge, the fiend, with rapid flight,
Shot in a whirlwind from Olympus' height.
As when the Partian dips, with fatal art,
And doubly arms, with death, th' venom'd dart;
He draws the circling bow; the quiv'ring string
Twangs; and the weapon whizzes on the wing:
So swift to earth the baleful fury flew,
Till Turnus and the hosts appear'd in view.
When lo! contract'd, to the bird the turns,
That hoots o'er desolated piles and urns,
Whose piercing strains the midnight hours invade,
And break the solemn silence of the shade.
Chang'd to this form obscene, the fury flies
Round Turnus' head, and chills him with surprise;

This way and that she flutters o'er the field,
And screams his death, and beats his sounding
shield.

His inmost soul a sudden horror stung;
Stiff rose his hair; amazement chain'd his tongue:
But soon, too soon, the goddesses knew the sound
Of the black Fury as she flies around:
She tore her beauteous face in wild despair,
Beat her white breast, and rent her golden hair.
Ah me! she cries, in this unequal strife,
How can thy sister now defend thy life?
What can I more to lengthen out thy date,
(Wretch that I am)! and stop the course of fate?
How can I stand that hideous fiend of night?
Hence, hence, ye furies!—Lo, I quit the fight.
Your threats, ye baleful birds of night, forbear,
Nor fright a trembling goddess to despair.
Too well I know your pinions clatt'ring round.—
There was a scream!—Hell, hell, is in the sound!
You came (I know) commission'd from above,
Sent by the high command of haughty Jove.
This then, is this the sole reward bestow'd,
For my lost honour, by the grateful god?
Ah! why this lengthen'd lie must I endure,
Deny'd the taste of death, its only cure!
Curs'd with the fruitless honours of the sky!
Condemn'd to bear impos'd eternity!
Pleas'd, with my brother, would I yield my breath,
And share his fate, unprivileg'd from death.

oy is no more ; and nothing Jove bestows a life immortal, but immortal woes !
'arth ! earth ! thy inmost centre open throw,
and rest a goddess in the shades below !

Then in her azure robes she wrapt her head,
igh'd, sobb'd, and plung'd into her wat'ry bed ;
er last low murmurs, as the stream divides,
Vork up in air, and bubble on the tides.

Now at the foe, the Trojan hero hook his pointed spear, and sternly thus bespoke :
What methods, Turnus, yet remain for flight ?
His strength, not swiftness, must decide the fight.

Cry all thy arts and vigour to escape
Thy instant doom, and vary ev'ry shape ;
With for the morning's rapid wings, to fly,
shoot down to hell ; or vault into the sky.—
Not those insulting empty vaunts I dread,
Reply'd the mournful chief (and shook his head) ;
No—but the gods with fear my bosom move,
And he, my greatest foe, Almighty Jove !

The warrior said ; and cast his fiery eyes
Where an huge stone, a rocky fragment, lies ;
black, rough, prodigious, vast !—the common
bound

For ages past, and barrier of the ground.
scarce twelve strong men the pond'rous mass could raise,

such as disgrace these dark degen'rate days.
This in his trembling hand he heav'd to throw,
Ran with the load, and hurl'd it at the foe :

But ran all-giddy with affright, nor knew
Which way he took, nor what a weight he threw.
His loose knees tremble, nor support their load :

Round his cold heart congeals the settling blood.
Short of the mark, and guiltless of a wound,
Th' unwieldy mass came thund'ring to the ground.

And, as when slumber seals the closing sight,
The sick wild fancy labours in the night :
Some dreadful visionary foe we shun

With airy strides, but strive in vain to run ;
in vain our baffled limbs their pow'rs essay ;
We faint, we stagger, sink, and fall away ;

Drain'd of our strength, we neither fight nor fly,
And on the tongue the struggling accents die :
The chief so labours, but with fruitless pain ;

The fiend still thwarts him, and he toils in vain !
Amidst a thousand doubts, he stands oppress'd,
A thousand terrors working in his breast.

Now to the Latian battlements on high,
Now to his friends, he turns his trembling eye,
Now to the threat'ning lance, already wing'd
to fly.

No friendly aid, no glimm'ring hopes appear,
No car, no steeds, nor goddess charioteer :

With levell'd eye the Trojan mark'd the
part ;

Then whirls, with all his force the whizzing dart,
A stone dislodged, with less fury far,
Flies from the brazen engine of war :

And wrapp'd in flames, far less enrag'd and loud,
Bursts the big thunder from the breaking cloud.
Swift as the whirlwind sweeps along the skies,

The jav'lin, charg'd with sure destruction, flies ;
Its rapid progress through the sev'n-fold shield,
And the thick mail, with matchless fury held ;

Thence, through his thigh, drove deep the grid-
ing wound,
And bent the hapless warrior to the ground.

With peals of groans the pale Rutulians rise ;
The groves and mountains ring with mournful
cries.

His eyes and hands the vanquish'd hero rear'd,
And to the chief his moving pray'r prefer'd :

Prince, I deserve, nor deprecate my death :
Then, use thy fortune ; take my forfeit breath !

Yet, if a parent's woes thy soul incline,
Think what thy father was ; then pity mine !

Think at thy feet the hoary monarch thrown,
Groveling, and pleading for an only son !

Then save the son ! in him the father save !
Nor bow his age, with sorrow, to the grave !

Or, oh ! at least, this mercy I implore,
My breathless relics to my friends restore.

Thine is the conquest ; lo ! the Latian bands
Behold their gen'ral stretch his suppliant hands !

Restrain thy farther vengeance ; I resign
My former claim ; the royal fair is thine.

A while, the hero, touch'd with gen'rous woe,
Repress'd his hand, and gaz'd upon the foe.

His melting words to mercy now inclin'd,
Still more and more, the victor's noble mind ;

When lo ! by chance, the golden belt he spy'd,
The belt of Pallas, glitt'ring at his side ;

Which from the dying youth the warrior tore,
And the resurgent prize in triumph wore.

His eyes, fierce-flaming, o'er the trophy roll,
That wakes the slumb'ring vengeance in his soul.

Then with loud accents, and a dreadful look,
Stern, and terrific, to the prince he spoke :

Thou ! wretch accus'd ! canst thou to grace pretend ?

Clad in the spoils of my dear murder'd friend ?
Go then, a victim to his spirit, go ;

'Tis Pallas, Pallas, gives the fatal blow.
Thus is his ghost aton'd.—The hero said ;

And bury'd in his breast the furious blade.
With a deep groan the dying warrior fell,

And the majestic soul disdainful plung'd to hell.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

CHARLES EARL OF DORSET AND MIDDLESEX,

LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF HIS MAJESTY'S HOUSEHOLD, KNIGHT OF THE MOST NOBLE
ORDER OF THE GARTER, &c.

MY LORD,

THE wishes and desires of all good men, which have attended your Lordship from your first appearance in the world, are at length accomplished, in your obtaining those honours and dignities, which you have so long deserved. There are no factions, though irreconcilable to one another, that are not united in their affection to you, and the respect they pay you. They are equally pleased in your prosperity, and would be equally concerned in your affliction. Titus Vespasian was not more the delight of human-kind. The universal empire made him only more known, and more powerful, but could not make him more beloved. He had greater ability of doing good, but your inclination to it is not less: and though you could not extend your beneficence to so many persons, yet you have lost as few days as that excellent emperor, and never had his complaint to make when you went to bed, that the sun had shone upon you in vain, when you had the opportunity of relieving some unhappy man. This, my Lord, has justly acquired you as many friends as there are persons who have the honour to be known to you: mere acquaintance you have none; you have drawn them all into a nearer line; and they who have conversed with you are for ever after inviolably yours. This is a truth so generally acknowledged, that it needs no proof: it is of the nature of a first principle, which is received as soon as it is proposed; and needs not the reformation which Descartes used to his: for we doubt not, neither can we properly say, we think we admire and love you, above all other men: there is a certainty in the proposition, and we know it. With the same assurance can I say, you neither have enemies, nor can scarce have any; for they who have never heard of you, can neither love or hate you; and they who have, can have no other notion of you, than that which they receive from the public, that you are the best of men. After this, my testimony can be of no farther use, than to declare it to be day-light at high-noon; and all who have the benefit of sight, can look up as well, and see the sun.

It is true, I have one privilege, which is almost particular to myself; that I saw you in the east at your first arising above the hemisphere: I was as soon sensible as any man of that light, when it was but just shooting out, and beginning to travel upward to the meridian. I made my early addresses to your Lordship, in my essay of Dramatic Poetry; and therein bespoke you to the world, wherein I have the right of a first discoverer. When I was myself in the rudiments of my Poetry, without name or reputation in the world, having rather the ambition of a writer, than the skill; when I was drawing the out-lines of an art, without any living master to instruct me in it; an art which had been better praised than studied here in England, wherein Shakspeare, who created the stage among us, had rather written happily, than knowingly and justly: and Jonson, who, by studying Horace, had been acquainted with the rules, yet seemed to envy posterity that knowledge, and like an inventor of some useful art, to make a monopoly of his learning: when thus, as I may say, before the use of the loadstone, or knowledge of the compass, I was sailing in a vast ocean, without other help than the pole-star of the ancients, and the rules of the French stage amongst the moderns, which are extremely different from ours, by reason of their opposite taste; yet, even then, I had the presumption to dedicate to your Lordship: a very unfinished piece, I must confess, and which only can be excused by the little experience of the author, and the modesty of the title, An Essay. Yet I was stronger in prophecy than I was in criticism; I was inspired to foretel you to mankind, as the restorer of poetry, the greatest genius, the truest judge, and the best patron.

Good sense and good nature are never separated, though the ignorant world has thought otherwise. Good nature, by which I mean beneficence and candour, is the product of right reason; which of necessity will give allowance to the failings of others, by considering that there is nothing perfect in mankind; and, by distinguishing that which comes nearest to excellency, though not absolutely free from faults, will certainly produce a candour in the judge. It is incident to an elevated understanding, like your Lordship's, to find out the errors of other men: but it is your prerogative to pardon them; to look with pleasure on those things, which are somewhat congenial, and of a remote kindred to your own conceptions: and to forgive the many failings of those, who, with their wretched art, cannot arrive to those heights that you possess from a happy, abundant, and native genius, which are as inborn to you, as they were to Shakspeare; and, for aught I know, to Homer; in either of whom we find all arts and sciences, all moral and natural philosophy, without knowing that they ever studied them.

There is not an English writer this day living, who is not perfectly convinced, that your Lordship excels all others, in all the several parts of poetry which you have undertaken to adorn. The most vain, and the most ambitious of our age, have not dared to assume so much, as the competitors of Themistocles; they have yielded the first place without dispute: and have been arrogantly content to be as second to your Lordship; and even that also with a "longe sed proximi intervallo." If there have been, or are any, who go farther in their self-conceit, they must be very singular in their opinion; they must be like the officer in a play, who was called Captain, Lieutenant, and Company. The world will easily conclude, whether such unattended generals can ever be capable of making a revolution in Parnassus.

I will not attempt, in this place, to say any thing particular of your lyric poems, though they are the delight and wonder of this age, and will be the envy of the next. The subject of this book confines me to satire; and in that, an author of your own quality (whose aches I shall not disturb), has given you all the commendation, which his self-sufficiency could afford to any man: "The best good man, with the worst-natured muse." In that character, methinks, I am reading Jonson's verses to the memory of Shakspeare: an insolent, sparing, and invidious panegyric: where good-nature, the most godlike commendation of a man, is only attributed to your person, and denied to your writings: for they are every where so full of candour, that, like Horace, you only expose the follies of men, without arraigning their vices; and in this excel him, that you add that pointedness of thought, which is visibly wanting in our great Roman. There is more of salt in all your verses, than I have seen in any of the moderns, or even of the ancients: but you have been sparing of the gall; by which means you have pleased all readers, and offended none. Donne alone, of all our countrymen, had your talent; but was not happy enough to arrive at your verification. And were he translated into numbers and English, he would yet be wanting in the dignity of expression. That which is the prime virtue and chief ornament of Virgil, which distinguishes him from the rest of writers, is so conspicuous in your verses, that it casts a shadow on all your contemporaries; we cannot be seen, or but obscurely, while you are present. You equal Donne in the variety, multiplicity, and choice of thoughts; you excel him in the manner, and the words. I read you both with the same admiration, but not with the same delight. He affects the metaphysics, not only in his satires, but in his amorous verses, where nature only should reign; and perplexes the minds of the fair sex with nice speculations of philosophy, when he should engage their hearts, and entertain them with the softness of love. In this (if I may be pardoned for so bold a truth) Mr. Cowley has copied him to a fault; so great a one, in my opinion, that it throws his Mistress infinitely below his Pindarics, and his latter compositions, which are undoubtedly the best of his poems; and the most correct. For my own part, I must avow it freely to the world, that I never attempted any thing in satire, wherein I have not studied your writings as the most perfect model. I have continually laid them before me; and the greatest commendation, which my own partiality can give to my productions, is, that they are copies, and no farther to be allowed, than as they have something more or less of the original. Some few touches of your Lordship, some secret graces which I have endeavoured to express after your manner, have made whole poems of mine to pass with approbation: but take your verses altogether, and they are inimitable. If therefore I have not written better, it is because you have not written more. You have not let me sufficient copy to transcribe; and I cannot add one letter of my own invention, of which I have not the example there.

It is a general complaint against your Lordship, and I must have leave to upbraid you with it, that, because you need not write, you will not. Mankind that wishes you so well, in all things that relate to your prosperity, have their intervals of wishing for themselves, and are within a little of grudging you the fullness of your fortune: they would be more malicious if you used it not so well, and with so much generosity.

Fame is in itself a real good, if we may believe Cicero, who was perhaps too fond of it. But even fame, as Virgil tells us, acquires strength by going forward. Let Epicurus give indulgence as an attribute to his gods, and place it in the happiness of the blest: the divinity which we worship has given us not only a precept against it, but his own example to the contrary. The world, my lord, would be content to allow you a seventh day for rest; or, if you thought that hard upon you, we would not refuse you half your time: if you come out, like some great monarch, to take a town but once a year, as it were for your diversion, though you had no need to extend your territories: in short, if you were a bad, or which is worse, an indifferent poet, we would thank you for your own quiet, and not expose you to the want of yours. But when you are so great and so successful, and when we have that necessity of your writing, that we cannot subsist entirely without it; any more (I almost say) than the world without the daily course of ordinary providence, methinks this argument might prevail with you, my Lord, to forego a little of your repose for the public benefit. It is not that you are under any force of working daily miracles, to reduce your being; but now and then somewhat extraordinary, that is, any thing of your production, is requisite to refresh your character.

This, I think, my Lord, is a sufficient reproach to you; and, should I carry it as far as mankind could authorise me, would be little less than satire. And, indeed, a provocation is almost necessary, in behalf of the world, that you might be induced sometimes to write; and in relation to a multitude of scribblers, who daily pester the world with their insufferable stuff, that they might be discouraged from writing any more. I complain not of their lampoons, and libels, though I have been the public mark for many years. I am indictive enough to have repelled force by force, I could imagine that any of them had ever reached me; but they either shot at rovers, and therefore missed, or their power was so weak, that might safely stand them, at the nearest distance. I answered not the Rehearsal, because I knew the author sat to himself when he drew the picture, and was the very Bayes of his own farce. Because I knew, that my betters were more concerned than I was in that satire: and, lastly, because Mr. Smith and Mr. Jonson, the main pillars of it were two such languishing gentlemen in their conversation, that I could liken them to nothing but to their own relations, those noble characters of wit and pleasure about the town. The same considerations have hindered me from dealing with the lamentable companions of their prose and doggerel: I am so far from defending my poetry against them, that I will not so much as expose theirs. And for my morals, if they are not proof against their attacks, let me be thought by posterity, what those authors would be thought, if any memory of them, or of their writings, could endure so long, as to another age. But these dull makers of lampoons, as harmless as they have been to me, are yet of dangerous example to the public: some witty men may perhaps succeed to their designs, and mixing sense with malice, blast the reputation of the most innocent amongst men, and the most virtuous amongst women.

Heaven be praised, our common libellers are free from the imputation of wit, as of morality; and therefore whatever mischief they have done, they have performed but little of it. Yet these ill writers, in all justice ought themselves to be exposed: as Persius has given us a fair example in his first satire, which is levelled particularly at them: and none is so fit to correct their faults, as he who is not only clear from any in his own writings, but also so just, that he will never blame the good; and is armed with the power to punish and make examples of the bad. It of this I shall have occasion to speak further, when I come to give the definition and character of true satires.

In the mean time, as a counsellor, bred up in the knowledge of the municipal and statute laws, may honestly inform a just prince how far his prerogative extends; so I may be allowed to tell your Lordship, who, by an undisputed title, are the king of poets, what an extent of power you have, and how lawfully you may exercise it, over the petulant scribblers of this age. As Lord Chamberlain, I know you are absolute by your office, in all that belongs to the decency and good manners of the stage. You can banish from thence scurrility and profaneness, and restrain the licentious insolence of poets and their actors in all things that shock the public quiet, or the reputation of private persons, under the notion of humour. But I mean not the authority which is annexed to your office: I speak of that only which is inborn, and inherent to your person. What is produced in you by an excellent wit, a masterly and commanding genius over all writers: whereby you are empowered, when you please, to give the final decision of wit; to put your stamp on all that ought to pass for current; and set a brand of reprobation on clipt poetry and false coin. A shilling, dipt in the bath, may go for gold amongst the ignorant; but the sceptres on the guineas show the difference. That your Lordship is formed by nature for this supremacy, I could easily prove (were it not already granted by the world), from the distinguishing character of your writings; which is so visible to me, that I never could be imposed on to receive for yours what is written by any others; or to mistake your genuine poetry for their spurious productions. I can farther add with truth (though not without some vanity in saying it), that in the same paper, written by divers hands, whereof your Lordship was only part, I could separate your gold from their copper: and though I could not give back to every author his own brass (for there is not the same rule for distinguishing between bad and bad, as betwixt ill and excellently good), yet I never failed of knowing what was yours, and what was not; and was absolutely certain, that this or the other part, was positively yours, and could not positively be written by any other.

True it is, that some bad poems, though not all, carry their owner's mark about them. There is some peculiar awkwardness, false grammar, imperfect sense, or, at the least, obscurity; some brand or other on this buttock, or that ear, that it is notorious who are the owners of the cattle, though they should not sign it with their names. But your Lordship, on the contrary, is distinguished, not only by the excellency of your thoughts, but by your style and manner of expressing them. A painter, judging of some admirable piece, may affirm with certainty that it was of Holben, or Van Dyck: but vulgar designs, and common draughts, are easily mistaken and misapplied. Thus, by my long study of your Lordship, I am arrived at the knowledge of your particular manner. In the good poems of other men, like those artists, I can only say, this is like the draught of such a one, or like the colouring of another. In short, I can only be sure, that it is the hand of a good master; but in your performances, it is scarcely possible for me to be deceived. If you write in your strength, you stand revealed at the first view; and should you write under it, you cannot avoid some peculiar graces, which only cost me a second consideration to discover you: for I must say it, with all the severity of truth, that every line of yours is precious. Your Lordship's only fault is, that you have not written more; unless I could add another, and that yet a greater, but I fear for the public the accusation would not be true, that you have written, and out of vicious modesty will not publish.

Virgil has confined his works within the compass of eighteen thousand lines, and has not treated many subjects; yet he ever had, and ever will have, the reputation of the best poet. Martial says of him, that he could have excelled Varius in tragedy, and Horace in lyric poetry, but, out of deference to his friends, he attempted neither.

The same prevalence of genius is in your Lordship: but the world cannot pardon your concealing it, on the same consideration; because we have neither a living Varius, nor a Horace, in whose excellencies both of poems, odes, and satires, you have equalled them, if our language had not yielded to the Roman majesty, and length of time had not added a reverence to the works of Horace. For good sense is the same in all or most ages; and course of time rather improves nature, than impairs her. What has been, may be again: another Homer, and another Virgil, may possibly arise from those very causes which produced the first: though it would be imprudence to affirm that any such have appeared.

It is manifest, that some particular ages have been more happy than others in the production of great men, in all sorts of arts and sciences; as that of Euripides, Sophocles, Aristophanes, and the rest for stage poetry amongst the Greeks: that of Augustus for heroic, lyric, dramatic, elegiac, and indeed all sorts of poetry in the persons of Virgil, Horace, Varius, Ovid, and many others; especially if we take into that century the latter end of the commonwealth; wherein we find Varro, Lucretius, and Catullus: and at the same time lived Cicero, Sallust, and Cæsar. A famous age in modern times, for learning in every kind, was that of Lorenzo de Medici, and his son Leo X. wherein painting was revived, and poetry flourished, and the Greek language was restored.

Examples in all these are obvious: but what I would infer is this, That, in such an age, it is possible some great genius may arise, equal to any of the ancients: abating only for the language. For great contemporaries whet and cultivate each other: and mutual borrowing and commerce makes the common riches of learning, as it does of the civil government.

But suppose that Homer and Virgil were the only of their species, and that nature was so much worn out in producing them, that she is never able to bear the like again; yet, the example only holds in heroic poetry: in tragedy and satire, I offer myself to maintain against some of our modern critics, that this age and the last, particularly in England, have excelled the ancients in both those kinds; and, I would instance in Shakspeare of the former, of your Lordship in the latter sort.

Thus I might safely confine myself to my native country; but, if I would only cross the seas I might find in France a living Horace and a Juvenal, in the person of the admirable Boileau; whose numbers are excellent, whose expressions are noble, whose thoughts are just, whose language is pure, whose satire is pointed, and whose sense is close: what he borrows from the ancients, he repays with usury of his own, in coin as good, and almost as universally valuable: for, setting prejudice and partiality apart, though he is our enemy, the stamp of Louis, the patron of all arts, is not much inferior to the medal of an Augustus Cæsar. Let this be said without entering into the interest of factions and parties, and relating only to the bounty of that king to men of learning and merit: a praise so just, that even we, who are his enemies, cannot refuse it to him.

Now, if it be permitted me to go back again to the consideration of epic poetry, I have confessed, that no man hitherto has reached, or so much as approached to, the excellencies of Homer, or of Virgil; I must further add, that Statius, the best versificator next Virgil, knew not how to design after him, though he had the model in his eye; that Lucan is wanting both in design and subject, and is, besides, too full of heat and affectation; that, among the moderns, Ariosto neither designed justly, nor observed any unity of action, or compass of time, or moderation in the vastness of his draught: his style is luxurious, without majesty or decency; and his adventures, without the compass of nature and possibility: Tasso, whose design was regular, and who observed the rules of unity in time and place more closely than Virgil, yet was not so happy in his action; he confesses himself to have been too lyrical; that is, to have written beneath the dignity of heroic verse, in his episodes of Sophronia, Erminia, and Armida; his story is not so pleasing as Ariosto's; he is too flatulent sometimes, and sometimes too dry; many times unequal, and almost always forced; and besides, is full of conception, points of epigram and witticism; all which are not only below the dignity of heroic verse, but contrary to its nature: Virgil and Homer have not one of them. And those who are guilty of so boyish an ambition in so grave a subject, are so far from being considered as heroic poets, that they ought to be turned down from Homer to the Anthologia, from Virgil to Martial and Owen's epigrams, and from Spenser to Fleecoe; that is, from the top to the bottom of all poetry. But to return to Tasso: he borrows from the invention of Boyardo, and in his alteration of his poem, which is infinitely the worse, imitates Homer so very servilely, that (for example) he gives the king of Jerusalem fifty sons, only because Homer had bestowed the like number on king Priam; he kills the youngest in the same manner, and has provided his hero with a Patroclus, under another name, only to bring him back to the wars, when his friend was killed. The French have performed nothing in this kind, which is not as below those two Italians, and subject to a thousand more reflections, without examining their St. Lewis, their Pucelle, or their Alarique: the English have only to boast of Spenser and Milton, who neither of them want-either genius or learning, to have been perfect poets; and yet both of them are liable to many defects. For there is no uniformity in the design of Spenser: he aims at the accomplishment of one action: he raises up a hero for every one of his adventures; and endows each of them with some particular moral virtue, which renders them all equal, without subordination or pre-eminence. Every one is most valiant in his own kind; and only we must do them that justice to observe, that magnanimity, which is the character of prince Arthur, shines throughout the whole poem; and succours the rest, when they are in distress. The original of every knight was then living in the court of Queen Elizabeth; and he attributed to each of them, that virtue which he thought most conspicuous in them: an ingenious piece of flattery, though it turned not much to his account. Had he lived to finish his poem, in the six remaining legends, it had certainly been more of a piece; but could not have been perfect, because the model was not true. But prince Arthur, or his chief patron, Sir Philip Sidney, whom he intended to make happy by the marriage of his Gloriana, dying before him, deprived the poem both of means and spirit, to accomplish his design: for the rest, his obsolete language, and the choice of his stanza, are faults but of the second magnitude. For, notwithstanding the first, he still intelligible, at least, after a little practice; for the last, he is the more to be admired, that, labouring under such a difficulty, his verses are so numerous, so various, and harmonious, that only Virgil, whom he professedly imitated, has surpassed him, among the Romans; and only Mr. Waller among the English.

For Mr. Milton, whom we all admire with such justice, his subject is not that of an Heroic Poem, properly so called. His design is the loss of our happiness: his event is not prosperous, like that of all other epic works: his heroic machines are many, and human persons are but few. But I will not take Mr. Rymer's work out of his hands: he has promised the world a critique on that author; wherein, though he will not allow his poem for Heroic, I hope he will grant us, that his thoughts are elevated, his words flowing, and that no man has so happily copied the manner of Homer, or so copiously translated his rhapsodies, and the Latin elegancies of Virgil. It is true, he runs into a flat thought, sometimes for a hundred lines together, but it is when he is got to a track of scripture: his antiquated words were his choice, not his necessity; for therein he imitated Spenser, as Spenser imitated Chaucer. And though, perhaps the love of their masters may have transported both too far, in the frequency of them; yet, in my opinion, obsolete words may then be laudably revived, when either they are more founding, or more significant, than they are in practice; and, when their obscurity is taken away, by joining other words to them, which clear the sense; according to the rule of Horace, for the admission of new words. But in all cases, a moderation is to be observed in the use of them. For unnecessary coinage, as well as unnecessary revival, runs into affectation; a fault avoided on either hand. Neither will I justify Milton for this blank verse, though I may excuse him, by the example of Hannibal Caro, and other Italians, who have used it: for whatever causes he alleges for the abolishing of rhyme (which I have not now the leisure to examine) his own particular reason is plainly this, that rhyme was not his talent; he had neither the ease of doing it, nor the graces of it; which is manifest in his Juvenilia, or verses written in his youth; where his rhyme is always constrained and forced, and comes hardly from him, at an age when the soul is most pliant, and the passion of love makes almost every man a rhymist, though not a poet.

By this time, my Lord, I doubt not but that you wonder, why I have run off from my bias so long together, and made so tedious a digression from satire to heroic poetry. But, if you will not excuse it, by the tattling quality of age, which, as Sir William Davenant says, is always narrative; yet I hope the usefulness of what I have to say on this subject, will qualify the remoteness of it; and this is the last time I will commit the crime of prefaces, or trouble the world with my notions of any thing that relates to verse. I have then, as you see, observed the failings of many great wits amongst the moderns, who have attempted to write an epic poem: besides these, or the like animadversions of them, or other men, there is yet a farther reason given, why they cannot possibly succeed so well as the ancients, even though we could allow them not to be inferior, either in genius or learning, or the tongue in which they write, or all those other wonderful qualifications which are necessary to the forming of a true accomplished heroic poet. The fault is laid on our religion: they say, that Christianity is not capable of those embellishments which are afforded in the belief of those ancient heathens.

And it is true, that in the severe notions of our faith, the fortitude of a Christian consists in patience and suffering, for the love of God, whatever hardships can befall in the world; not in any great attempts, or in performance of those enterprises which the poets call heroic; which are commonly the effects of interest, ostentation, pride, and worldly honours. That humility and resignation are our prime virtues; and that these include no action, but that of the soul: whereas, on the contrary, an heroic poem requires to its necessary design, and as its last perfection, some great action of war, the accomplishment of some extraordinary undertaking, which requires the strength and vigour of the body, the duty of a soldier, the capacity and prudence of a general; and, in short, as much, or more, of the active virtue, than the suffering. But to this, the answer is very obvious. God has placed us in our several stations; the virtues of a private Christian are patience, obedience, submission, and the like: but those of a magistrate, or general, or a king, are prudence, counsel, active fortitude, coercive power, awful commands, and the exercise of magnanimity, as well as justice. So that this objection hinders not, but that an epic poem, or the heroic action of some great commander, enterprised for the common good and honour of the Christian cause, and executed happily, may be as well written now, as it was of old by the heathens; provided the poet be endued with the same talents; and the language, though not of equal dignity, yet, as near approaching to it as our modern barbarism will allow, which is all that can be expected from our own or any other now extant, though more refined; and therefore we are to rest contented with that only inferiority, which is not possibly to be remedied.

I wish I could as easily remove that other difficulty which yet remains. It is objected by a great French critic, as well as an admirable poet, yet living, and whom I have mentioned with that honour which his merit exacts from me, I mean Boileau, That the machines of our Christian religion, in heroic poetry, are much more feeble to support the weight than those of heathenism. Their doctrine, grounded as it was on ridiculous fables, was yet the belief of the two victorious monarchies, the Grecian and Roman. Their gods did not only interest themselves in the event of wars (which is the effect of a superior providence); but also espoused the several parties, in a visible corporeal descent, managed their intrigues, and fought their battles sometimes in opposition to each other; though Virgil (more discreet than Homer in that last particular) has contented himself with the partiality of his deities, their favours, their counsels, or commands, to those whose cause they had espoused, without bringing them to the outrageousness of blows. Now our religion (says he) is deprived of the greatest part of those machines; at least the most shining in epic poetry. Though St. Michael, in Ariosto, seeks out Discord, to send her among the pagans, and finds her in a convent of friars, where peace should reign, which indeed is fine satire; and Satan, in Tasso, excites Solyman to an attempt by night on the Christian camp, and brings an host of devils to his assistance; yet the archangel, in the former example, when Discord was restive, and would not be drawn from her beloved monastery with fair words, has the whip hand of her, drags her out with many stripes, sets her, in God's name, about her business; and makes her know the difference of strength betwixt a nuncio of heaven, and a minister of hell. The same angel, in the latter instance from Tasso (as if God had never another messenger belonging to the court, but was confined like Jupiter to Mercury, and Juno to Iris) when he sees his time, that is, when half of the Christians are already killed, and all the rest are in a fair way of being routed, rickles betwixt the remainder of God's host, and the race of fiends; pulls the devils backwards by the tails, and drives them from their quarry; or otherwise the whole business had miscarried, and Jerusalem remained untaken. This, says Boileau, is a very unequal match for the poor devils, who are sure to come by the worst of it in the combat; for nothing is more easy, than for an Almighty Power to bring his old rebels to reason, when he pleases. Consequently, what pleasure, what entertainment, can be raised from so pitiful a machine, where we see the success of the battle, from the very beginning of it; unless that, as we are Christians, we are glad that we have gotten God on our side, to maul our enemies, when we cannot do the work ourselves? For, if the poet had given the faithful more courage, which had cost him nothing, or at least had made them exceed the Tur in number, then he might have gained the victory for us Christians, without interesting Heaven in the quarrel; and that with as much ease, and little credit to the conqueror, as when a party one hundred soldiers defeats another, which consists only of fifty.

This, my Lord, I confess, is such an argument against our modern poetry, as cannot be answered by those mediums which have been used. I cannot hitherto boast, that our religion has furnished us with any such machines, as have made the strength and beauty of the ancient building.

But what if I venture to advance an invention of my own, to supply the manifest defects of our new writers? I am sufficiently sensible of our weakness; and it is not very probable that I should succeed in such a project, whereof I have not the least hint from any of my predecessors, poets, or any of their seconds, and coadjutors, or critics. Yet we see the art of war is improved since sieges, and new instruments of death are invented daily: something new in philosophy and the mechanics is discovered almost every year: and the science of former ages is improved by the succeeding. I will not detain you with a long preamble to that, which better judges will, perhaps, conclude to be little worth.

It is this, in short, that Christian poets have not hitherto been acquainted with their own strength. If they had searched the Old Testament as they ought, they might there have found the machines which are proper for their work, and those more certain in their effect, than it can be the New Testament is, in the rules sufficient for salvation. The perusing of one chapter in prophecy of Daniel, and accommodating what there they find, with the principles of Plato's philosophy, as it is now Christianized, would be the ministry of angels as strong an engine, for working up heroic poetry, in our religion, as that of the ancients has been to raise theirs by all fables of their gods, which were only received truths by the most ignorant and weakest of people.

It is a doctrine almost universally received by Christians, as well Protestants as Catholics. That there are guardian angels appointed by the Almighty as his vicegerents, for the protection and government of cities, provinces, kingdoms and monarchies; and those as well of heathens of true believers. All this is so plainly proved from those texts of Daniel, that it admits of farther controversy. The prince of the Persians and that other of the Grecians, are granted to the guardians and protecting ministers of the empires. It cannot be denied, that they were polite, and resisted one another. St. Michael mentioned by his name, as the patron of the Jews and now taken by the Christians, as the proper general of our religion. These tutelary gods who presided over the several people and regions committed to their charge, were watchful of them for good, as far as their commissions could possibly extend. The general purpose, and design of all, was certainly the service of their gods.

But it is an undoubted truth, that, for the best known to the Almighty Majesty of Heaven, his providential designs for the benefit of his creatures, for the debasing and punishing of some nations, and the exaltation and temporal reward of others, were not wholly known to these ministers; else why those factious quarrels, controversies, and battles, amongst themselves, when they are all united in the same design, the peace and honour of their common master? But being instructed only in the general, and zealous of the main design; and, as finite beings, not admitted into the secrets of government, the last resort of providence, or capable of discovering the secret purposes of God, who can work good out of evil, as he pleases; and irresistibly sways all mankind on earth, directing them finally for the best, to his creation in general, and to the ultimate end of his own glory in particular; they might be sometimes ignorant of the means conducing to those ends, in which alone they can jar and oppose each other. One angel, we suppose the prince of Persia, as he is called, judging that it would be more for God's honour, as the benefit of his people, that the Median and Persian monarchy, when delivered from the Babylonish captivity, should still be uppermost: at the patron of the Grecians, to whom the will of God might be more particularly revealed, contending on the other side, for the rise of Alexander and his successors, who were appointed to punish the backsliding Jews, and thereby to put them in mind of their offences, that they might repent, and become more virtuous, and more obedient of the law revealed. But how far these controversies and appearing enmities of those glorious creatures may be carried; how these oppositions may best be managed, and by what means conducted, is not my business to show or determine: these things must be left to the invention and judgment of the poet: if any of us happy a genius be now living, or any future age can produce a man, who, being conversant in the philosophy of Plato, as it is now accommodated to Christian use; for (as Virgil gives us to understand by his example) he is the only proper person of all others, for an epic poem, who, to his natural endowments, of a large invention, a ripe judgment, and a strong memory, has joined the knowledge of the liberal arts and sciences, and particularly moral philosophy, the mathematics, geography, and history, and with all these qualifications is born a poet; knows, and can practise, the variety of numbers, and is master of the language in which he writes; if such a man, I say, be arisen, or shall arise, I am vain enough to think, that I have proposed a model to him, by which he may build a nobler, a more beautiful, a more perfect poem, than any yet extant, since the ancients.

There is another part of these machines yet wanting; but, by what I have said, it would have been easily supplied by a judicious writer. He could not have failed to add the opposition of ill spirits to good; they have also their design, ever opposite to that of heaven; and this alone has hitherto been the practice of the moderns: but this imperfect system, if I may call it such, which I have given, will infinitely advance and carry farther that hypothesis of the evil spirits contending with the good. For, being so much weaker since their fall than those blessed beings, they are yet supposed to have a permitted power of God, of acting ill, as, from their own depraved nature, they have always the will of designing it. A great testimony of which we find in holy writ, when God Almighty suffered Satan to appear in the holy synod of the angels (a thing not hitherto drawn into example by any of the poets), and also gave him power over all things belonging to his servant Job, excepting only life.

Now, what these wicked spirits cannot compass by the vast disproportion of their forces to those of the superior beings, they may by their fraud and cunning carry farther, in a seeming league, confederacy, or subservency to the designs of some good angel, as far as consists with his purity, to suffer such an aid, the end of which may possibly be disguised, and concealed from his finite knowledge. This is indeed to suppose a great error in such a being: yet since a devil can appear like an angel of light; since craft and malice may sometimes blind for a while a more perfect understanding; and, lastly, since Milton has given us an example of the like nature, when Satan appearing like a cherub to Uriel, the intelligence of the sun circumvented him even in his own province, and passed only for a curious traveller through those new-created regions, that he might observe therein the workmanship of God, and praise him in his works.

I know not why, upon the same supposition, or some other, a field may not deceive a creature of more excellency than himself, but yet a creature; at least by the connivance, or tacit permission, of the omniscient Being.

Thus, my Lord, I have, as briefly as I could, given your Lordship, and by you the world, a rude draught of what I have been long labouring in my imagination, and what I had intended to have put in practice (though far unable for the attempt of such a poem); and to have left the stage, to which my genius never much inclined me, for a work which would have taken up my life in the performance of it. This too, I had intended chiefly for the honour of my native country, to which a poet is particularly obliged: of two subjects, both relating to it, I was doubtful, whether I should choose that of King Arthur, conquering the Saxons; which, being farther distant in time, gives the greater scope to my invention: or that of Edward the Black Prince, in subduing Spain; and restoring it to the lawful prince, though a great tyrant, Don Pedro the Cruel: which, for the compass of time, including only the expedition of one year; for the greatness of the action, and its answerable event; for the magnanimity of the English hero, opposed to the ingratitude of the person whom he restored; and for the many beautiful episodes which I had interwoven with the principal design, together with the characters of the chiefest English persons; wherein, after Virgil and Spenser, I would have taken occasion to represent my living friends and patrons of the noblest families, and also shadowed the events of future ages, in the succession of our imperial lines:

with these helps, and those of the machines, which I have mentioned, I might perhaps have done as well as some of my predecessors; or at least chalked out a way for others to amend my errors in a like design. But, being encouraged only by fair words by king Charles II. my little salary ill-paid, and no prospect of a future subsistence, I was then discouraged in the beginning of my attempt; and now age has overtaken me, and want, a more insufferable evil, through the change of times, has wholly disabled me. Though I must ever acknowledge, to the honour of your Lordship, and the eternal memory of your charity, that since this revolution, wherein I have patiently suffered the ruin of my small fortune, and the loss of that poor subsistence which I had from two kings, whom I had served more faithfully than profitably to myself; then your Lordship was pleased, out of no other motive but your own nobleness, without any desert of mine, or the least solicitation from me, to make me a most bountiful present, which, at that time, when I was most in want of it, came most seasonably and unexpectedly to my relief. That favour, my Lord, is of itself sufficient to bind any grateful man to a perpetual acknowledgement, and to all the future service, which one of my mean condition can ever be able to perform. May the Almighty God return it for me, both in blessing you here, and rewarding you hereafter. I must not presume to defend the cause for which I now suffer, because your Lordship is engaged against it: but the more you are so, the greater is my obligation to you: for your laying aside all the considerations of factions and parties, to do an action of pure disinterested charity. This is one among many of your shining qualities, which distinguish you from others of your rank: but let me add a farther truth, that without these ties of gratitude, and abstracting from them all, I have a most particular inclination to honour you; and, if it were not too bold an expression, to say, I love you. It is no shame to be a poet, though it is to be a bad one. Augustus Cæsar of old, and Cardinal Richlieu of late, would willingly have been such; and David and Solomon were such. You, who without flattery, are the best of the present age in England, and would have been so had you been born in any other country, will receive more honour in future ages, by that one excellency, than by all those honours to which your birth has entitled you, or your merits have acquired you.

“ Ne, forte, pudori

“ Sit tibi musa lyræ solis, & cantor Apollo.”

I have formerly said in this epistle, that I could distinguish your writings from those of any others: it is now time to clear myself from any imputation of self-conceit on that subject. I assume not to myself any particular lights in this discovery; they are such only as are obvious to every man of sense and judgment, who loves poetry, and understands it. Your thoughts are always so remote from the common way of thinking, that they are, as I may say, of another species than the conceptions of other poets; yet, you go not out of nature for any of them: gold is never bred upon the surface of the ground; but lies so hidden, and so deep, that the mines of it are seldom found; but the force of waters casts it out from the bowels of mountains, and exposes it amongst the sands of rivers: giving us the bounty, what we could not hope for by our search. This success attends your Lordship's thoughts, which would look like chance, if I were not perpetual, and always of the same tenor. If I grant that there is care in it, it is such a care as would be ineffectual and fruitless in other men. It is the “curiosa felicitas” which Petronius ascribes to Horace in his Odes. We have no wherewithal to imagine so strongly, so justly, and so pleasantly: in short, if we have the same knowledge, we cannot draw out of it the same quintessence: we cannot give it such a term, such a propriety, and such a beauty: something is deficient in the manner, or the words, but more in the nobleness of our conception. Yet when you have finished all, and it appears in its full lustre when the diamond is not only found, but its roughness smoothed, when it is cut into a form and set in gold, then we cannot but acknowledge that it is the perfect work of art and nature: an every one will be so vain to think he himself could have performed the like, till he attempts it. It is just the description that Horace makes of such finished piece: it appears so easy, “Ut sibi quivis speret idem; fudet multum, frustra que labore aufus idem.” And besides all this, it is your Lordship's particular talent to lay your thoughts close together, that were they closer they would be crowded, and even a due connection would be wanting. We are not kept in expectation of two good lines, which are to come after a long parenthesis of twenty bad; which is the April-poetry of other writers; a mixture of rain and sunshine by fits you are always bright, even almost to a fault, beyond the excess. There is continual abundance, a magazine of thought, and yet a perpetual variety of entertainment; which creates such an appetite in your reader, that he is not cloyed with any thing, but satisfied with all. It is that which the Romans call “Cæna dubia;” where there is such plenty, yet, withal, so much diversity and good order, that the choice is difficult betwixt one excellency and another; and yet the conclusion, by a due climax, is evermore the best; that is, as conclusion ought to be, ever the most proper to its place. See, my Lord, whether I have not studied your Lordship with some application: as since you are so modest, that you will not be judged and party, I appeal to the whole world, if I have not drawn your picture to a great degree of likeness, though it is but in miniature: and, that some of the best features are yet wanting. Yet, what have done is enough to distinguish you from most others, which is the proposition I took upon me to demonstrate.

And now, my Lord, to apply what I have said to my present business. The Satires of Juvenal and Persius appearing in this new English dress cannot so properly be inscribed to any man as your Lordship, who are the first of the age in that way of writing. Your Lordship, amongst many other favours, has given me your permission for this address; and you have particularly encouraged me by your perusal and approbation of the six and tenth satires of Juvenal, as I have translated em. My fellow-labourers have likewise commissioned me to perform in their behalf this office of a dedication to you; and will acknowledge, with all possible respect and gratitude, your acceptance of their work. Some of them have the honour to be known to your Lordship already; and they who have not yet that happiness, desire it now. Be pleased to receive our common endeavours with your wonted candour, without entitling you to the protection of our common failings, so difficult an undertaking. And allow me your patience, if it be not already tired with this long epistle, to give you, from the best authors, the origin, the antiquity, the growth, the change, and the complement of satire among the Romans. To describe, if not define, the nature of that poem, with its several qualifications and virtues, together with the several sorts of it. To compare the excellencies of Horace, Persius, and Juvenal, and show the particular manners of their styles. And lastly, to give an account of this new way of version which is attempted in our performance. All which, according to the weakness of my ability, and the best lights which I can get from others, shall be the subject of my following discourse.

The most perfect work of poetry, says our master, Aristotle, is Tragedy. His reason is, because it is the most united; being more severely confined within the rules of action, time, and place. The action is entire, of a piece, and one, without episodes: the time limited to a natural day; and the place circumscribed at least within the compass of one town or city. Being exactly proportioned to us, and uniform in all its parts, the mind is more capable of comprehending the whole beauty of it without distraction.

But after all these advantages, an heroic poem is certainly the greatest work of human nature.—The beauties and perfections of the other are but mechanical; those of the epic are more noble. Though Homer has limited his place to Troy and the fields about it; his action to forty-eight natural days, whereof twelve are holidays, or cessation from business, during the funerals of Patroclus. To proceed, the action of the epic is greater: the extension of time enlarges the pleasure of the reader, and the episodes give it more ornament, and more variety. The instruction is equal; but in the first is only instructive, the latter forms a hero and a prince.

If it signifies any thing which of them is of the more ancient family, the best and most absolute heroic poem was written by Homer long before tragedy was invented; but if we consider the natural endowments, and acquired parts, which are necessary to make an accomplished writer in either kind, tragedy requires a less and more confined knowledge: moderate learning, and observation of the rules is sufficient, if a genius be not wanting. But in an epic poem, one who is worthy of that name, besides an universal genius, is required universal learning, together with all those qualities and acquisitions which I have named above, and as many more as I have, through haste or negligence, omitted. And after all, he must have exactly studied Homer and Virgil as his patterns, Aristotle and his guides, and Vida and Boffu as their commentators, with many others, both Italian and French critics, which I want leisure here to recommend.

In a word, what I have to say in relation to this subject, which does not particularly concern satire, is, that the greatness of an heroic poem, beyond that of a tragedy, may easily be discovered, by observing how few have attempted that work, in comparison of those who have written dramas; and of those few, how small a number have succeeded. But leaving the critics on either side, to contend about the preference due to this or that sort of poetry; I will hasten to my present business, which is the antiquity and origin of satire, according to those informations which I have received from the learned Casaubon, Heinsius, Rigaltius, Dacier, and the Dauphin's Juvenal; to which I shall add some observations of my own.

There has been a long dispute among the modern critics, whether the Romans derived their satire from the Grecians, or first invented it themselves. Julius Scaliger, and Heinsius, are of the first opinion; Casaubon, Rigaltius, Dacier, and the publisher of the Dauphin's Juvenal, maintain the latter. If we take satire in the general signification of the word, as it is used in all modern languages for an invective, it is certain that is almost as old as verse; and though hymns, which are praises of God, may be allowed to have been before it, yet the defamation of others was not long after it. After God had cursed Adam and Eve in Paradise, the husband and wife excused themselves, by laying the blame on one another; and gave a beginning to those conjugal dialogues in prose, which the poets have perfected in verse. The third chapter of Job is one of the first instances of this poem in Holy Scripture: unless we will take it higher, from the latter end of the second; where his wife advises him to curse his Maker.

The original, I confess, is not much to the honour of satire; but here it was nature, and that depraved! When it became an art, it bore better fruit. Only we have learnt thus much already, that scoffs and revilings are of the growth of all nations; and consequently that neither the Greek poets borrowed from other people their art of railing, neither needed the Romans to take it from them. But considering satire as a species of poetry, here the war begins amongst the critics. Scaliger the father will have it descend from Greece to Rome; and derives the word satire from satyrus, that mixt kind of animal, or, as the ancients thought him, rural god, made up betwixt a man and a goat; with a human head, hooked nose, pouting lips, a bunch of struma under the chin, pricked ears, and upright horns; the body shagged with hair, especially from the waist, and ending in a goat, with the legs and feet of that creature. But Casaubon, and his followers, with reason, condemn this derivation; and prove, that from satyrus, the word satira, as it signifies a poem, cannot possibly descend. For satira is not properly a substantive, but an adjective; to which the word lanx, in English, a charger, or large platter, is understood: so that the Greek poem, made according to the manner of a satyr, and expressing his qualities, must properly be called satyrical, and not fatyr. And thus far it is allowed that the Grecians had such poems; but that they were wholly different in species from that to which the Romans gave the name of satire.

Aristotle divides all poetry, in relation to the progress of it, into nature without art, art begun, and art completed. Mankind, even the most barbarous, have the seeds of poetry implanted in them. The first specimen of it was, certainly shown in the praises of the Deity, and prayers to him: and as they are of natural obligation, so they are likewise of divine institution. Which Milton observing, introduces Adam and Eve every morning adoring God in hymns and prayers. The first poetry was thus begun, in the wild notes of natural poetry, before the invention of feet and measures. The Grecians and Romans had no other original of their poetry. Festivals and holidays soon succeeded to private worship, and we need not doubt but they were enjoyed by the true God to his own people; as they were afterwards imitated by the heathens; who by the light of reason knew they were to invoke some superior Being in their necessities, and to thank him for his benefits. Thus the Grecian holidays were celebrated with offerings to Bacchus and Ceres, and other deities, to whose bounty they supposed they were owing for their corn and wine, and other helps of life. And the ancient Romans, Horace tells us, paid their thanks to mother earth, or Vesta, to Silvanus, and their genius, in the same manner. But as all festivals have a double reason for their institution; the first of religion, the other of recreation, for the unbending of our minds; so both the Grecians and Romans agreed, after their sacrifices were performed, to spend the remainder of the day in sports and merriments; amongst which, songs and dances, and that which they called wit (for want of knowing better) were the chiefest entertainments. The Grecians had a notion of satires, whom I have already described; and taking them, and the Sileni, that is, the young satyrs and the old, for the tutors, attendants, and humble companions of their Bacchus, habited themselves like those rural deities, and imitated them in their rustic dances, to which they joined songs, with some sort of rude harmony, but without certain numbers: and to these they added a kind of chorus.

The Romans also (as nature is the same in all places) though they knew nothing of those Grecian demigods, nor had any communication with Greece, yet had certainly young men, who, at their festivals, danced and sung after their uncouth manner, to a certain kind of verse, which they called Saturnian: what it was, we have no certain light from antiquity to discover; but we may conclude, that, like the Grecian, it was void of art, or at least with very feeble beginnings of it. Those ancient Romans, at these holidays, which were a mixture of devotion and debauchery, had a custom of reproaching each other with their faults, in a sort of extempore poetry, or rather a tuneable hobbling verse; and they answered in the same kind of gross raillery; their wit and their music being of a piece. The Grecians, says Casaubon, had formerly done the same in the persons of their petulant satyrs: but I am afraid he mistakes the matter, and confounds the singing and dancing of the satyrs, with the rustic entertainments of the first Romans. The reason of my opinion is this; that Casaubon, finding little light from antiquity, of these beginnings of poetry, amongst the Grecians, but only their representations of satyrs, who carried canisters, and cornucopias full of several fruits in their hands, and danced wild them at their public feasts: and afterwards reading Horace, who makes mention of his homely Romans jesting at one another in the same kind of solemnities, might suppose those wanton satyr did the same. And especially because Horace possibly might seem to him to have shown the original of all poetry in general, including the Grecians as well as Romans. Though it is plain otherwise, that he only described the beginning and first rudiments of poetry in his own country. The verses are these, which he cites from the first epistle of the second book, which was written to Augustus:

“Agricolæ prisci, fortes, parvoque beati,
“Coudita post frumenta, levantes tempore festi
“Corpus et ipsum animum spe finis dura ferentem, “Cum fociis operum pueris, et conjuge fidâ,
“Tellurem porco, Silvanum lacte piabant,
“Floribus et vino Genium memorem brevis ævi
“Fœcennina per hunc inventa licentia morem
“Versibus alternis opprobrio rustica fudit.”

Our brawny clowns of old, who turn'd the soil
Content with little, and inur'd to toil,
At harvest-home, with mirth and country-cheer
Restor'd their bodies for another year;
Refresh'd their spirits and renew'd their hope
Of such a future feast, and future crop.
Then, with their fellow-joggers of the plough
Their little children and their faithful spouse,
A sow they flew to Vesta's deity,
And kindly milk, Silvanus, pour'd to thee.
With flowers, and wine, their genius the ador'd;

A short life, and a merry, was the word.
From flowing cups, defaming rhymes enue,
And at each other homely taunts they threw.

Yet since it is a hard conjecture, that so great a man as Casaubon should misapprehend what Horace writ concerning ancient Rome, to the ceremonies and manners of ancient Greece, I will not insist on this opinion, but rather judge in general, that since all poetry had its original from religion, that of the Grecians and Romans had the same beginning: both were invented at festivals of thanksgiving: and both were prosecuted with mirth and raillery, and rudiments of verse: amongst the Greeks, by those who represented satyrs; and amongst the Romans by real clowns.

For, indeed, when I am reading Casaubon on these two subjects, methinks I hear the same story told twice over, with very little alteration. Which Dacier taking notice in his interpretation of the Latin verses which I have translated, says plainly, that the beginning of poetry was the same with a small variety, in both countries: and that the mother of it, in all nations, was devotion. But what is yet more wonderful, that most learned critic takes notice also, in his illustrations on the first epistle of the second book, that as the poetry of the Romans, and that of the Grecians, had the same beginning, at feasts of thanksgiving, as it has been observed: and the old comedy of the Greeks, which was invective, and the satire of the Romans, which was of the same nature, were begun on the very same occasion, for the fortune of both, in process of time, was just the same; the old comedy of the Grecians was forbidden, for its too much licence in exposing of particular persons, and the rude satire of the Romans was also punished by a law of the Decemviri, as Horace tells us, in these words:

“ Libertasque recurrentes accepta per annos
 “ Lusti anabiliter, donec jam sævus apertam
 “ In rabiem verti cœpit jocus; et per honestas
 “ Ire domus impune minax: dolere cruento
 “ Dente læcessiti; fuit intactis quoque cura
 “ Conditione super communi, quinetiam lex, “ Pœnaque lata, malo quæ nollit carmini quem“ quam
 “ Describi, vertere modum formidine fustis;
 “ Ad bene dicendum delectandumque re“ dacti.”

The law of the Decemviri was this; “ Siquis “ occentastit malum carum, sivi condidistit, quod
 “ infamiam faxit, flagitiameve alteri, capital esto.”
 A strange likeness, and barely possible; but the critics being all of the same opinion, it becomes me to be silent, and to submit to better judgments than my own.

But to return to the Grecians, from whose satiric dramas, the elder Scaliger and Heinſius will have the Roman satire to proceed; I am to take a view of them first, and see if there be any such descent from them as those authors have pretended.

Theſpis, or whatsoever he were that invented Tragedy (for authors differ) mingled with them a chorus, and dancers, and satyrs, which had been used in the celebration of their festivals; and there they were ever afterwards retained. The character of them was also kept, which was mirth and wantonness; and this was given, I suppose, to the folly of the common audience, who soon grow weary of good sense; and, as we daily see, in our own age and country, are apt to forsake poetry, and still ready to return to buffoonry and farce. From hence it came, that the Olympic games, where the poets contended for four prizes, the satiric tragedy was the last of them; for, in the rest, the satyrs were excluded from the chorus. Among the plays of Euripides which are yet remaining, there is one of these satiries, which is called the Cyclops; in which we may see the nature of those poems, and from thence conclude what likeness they have to the Roman satire.

The story of this Cyclops, whose name was Polyphemus, so famous in the Grecian fables, was, That Ulyſſus, who, with his company, was driven on the coast of Sicily, where those Cyclops inhabited, coming to ask relief from Silenus, and the satyrs, who were herdsmen to that one-eyed giant, was kindly received by them, and entertained; till, being perceived by Polyphemus, they were made prisoners against the rites of hospitality, for which Ulyſſes eloquently pleaded; were afterwards put down in the den, and some of them devoured; after which, Ulyſſes, having made him drunk, when he was asleep, thrust a great fire-brand into his eye; and so revenging his dead followers, escaped with the remaining party of the living; and Silenus, and the satyrs, were freed from their servitude under Polyphemus, and remitted to their first liberty of attending and accompanying their patron Bacchus.

This was the subject of the tragedy; which being one of those which end with a happy event, is therefore by Aristotle judged below the other sort, whose success is unfortunate. Notwithstanding which, the satyrs, who were part of the “ dramatis personæ,” as well as the whole chorus, were properly introduced into the nature of the poem, which is mixed of farce and tragedy. The adventure of Ulyſſes was to entertain the judging part of the audience, and the uncouth persons of Silenus, and the satyrs, to divert the common people with their gross raileries.

Your Lordship has perceived by this time, that this satiric tragedy, and the Roman satire, have little resemblances in any other features. The very kinds are different: for what has a pastoral tragedy to do with a paper of verses satirically written? The character and raillery of the satyrs is the only thing that could pretend to a likeness; were Scaliger and Heinſius alive to maintain their opinion. And the first farces of the Romans, which were the rudiments of their poetry, were written before they had any communication with the Greeks; or, indeed, any knowledge of that people.

And here it will be proper to give the definition of the Greek satiric poem, from Casaubon, before I leave this subject. The satiric, says he, is a dramatic poem, annexed to a tragedy; having a chorus, which consists of satyrs: the persons represented in it, are illustrious men: the action of it is great; the style is partly serious, and partly jocular; and the event of the action most commonly is happy.

The Grecians, besides these satiric tragedies, had another kind of poem, which they called Silli; which were more of kin to the Roman satire: those Silli were indeed invective poems, but of a different species from the Roman poems of Ennius, Pacuvius, Lucilius, Horace, and the rest of their successors. They were so called, says Casaubon in one place, from Silenus, the foster-father to Bacchus; but in another place, bethinking himself better, he derives their name κρότος ἰλλίωνος, from their scoffing and petulance. From some fragments of the Silli, written by Timon, we may find, that they were satiric poems, full of parodies; that is, of verses patched up from great poets, and turned into another sense than their author intended them. Such among the Romans is the famous Cento of Ausonius, where the words are Virgil's: but by applying them to another sense, they are made the relation of a wedding-night; and the act of consummation fulsomely described in the very words of the most modest amongst all poets. Of the same manner are our songs which are turned into burlesque, and the serious words of the author perverted into a ridiculous meaning. Thus in Timon's Silli, the words are generally those of Homer, and the tragic poets; but he applies them satirically to some customs and kinds of philosophy, which he arraigns. But the Romans not using any of these parodies in their satires; sometimes, indeed, repeating verses of other men, as Persius cites some of Nero's; but not turning them into another meaning, the Silli cannot be supposed to be the original of Roman satire. To these Silli, consisting of parodies, we may properly add the satires which were written against particular persons; such as were the iambics of Archilochus against Lycambes, which Horace undoubtedly imitated in some of his odes and epodes, whose titles bear a sufficient witness of it: I might also name the invective of Ovid against Ibis, and many others: but these are the underwood of satire, rather than the timber-tree, they are not a general extension, as reaching only to some individual person. And Horace seems to have purged himself from those spleenetic reflections in those odes and epodes, before he undertook the noblework of satires, which were properly so called.

Thus, my Lord, I have at length disengaged myself from those antiquities of Greece: and have proved, I hope, from the best critics, that the Roman satire was not borrowed from thence, but of their own manufacture: I am now almost gotten into my depth; at least by the help of Dacier I am swimming towards it. Not that I will promise always to follow him, any more than he follows Casaubon; but to keep in my eye, as my truest guide; and where I think he may possibly mislead me, there to have recourse to my own lights, as I expect that others should do by me.

Quintillian says, in plain words, "Satira quæ dem tota nostra est:" and Horace has said the same thing before him, speaking of his predecessor in that sort of poetry, "Et Græcis intacti carminis auctor." Nothing can be clearer than the opinion of the poet, and the orator, both the best critics of the two best ages of the Roman empire, that satire was wholly of Latin growth, and not transplanted from Athens to Rome. Yet, as I have said, Scaliger the father, according to his custom, that is, insolently enough, contradicts them both; and gives no better reason, than the derivation of satyrus from σατυρ, salacitas; and so, from the lechery of those fauns, thinks he has sufficiently proved, that satire is derived from them. As if wantonness and lubricity were essential to that sort of poem, which ought to be avoided in it. His other allegation, which I have already mentioned, is as pitiful: that the satyrs carried platters and canisters full of fruit in their hands. If they had entered empty-handed, had they been ever the less satyrs? Or were the fruits and the flowers, which they offered, any thing of kin to satire? Or any argument that this poem was originally Grecian? Casaubon judged better, and his opinion is grounded on sure authority, that satire was derived from satúra, a Roman word which signifies full, and abundant, and full also of variety, in which nothing is wanting in its due perfection. It is thus, says Dacier, that we lay a full colour, when the wool has taken the whole tincture, and drunk in as much of the dye as it can receive. According to this derivation from satúr, comes satúra, or satúra, according to the new spelling; as optimus and maximus are now spelled optimus and maximus. Satura, as I have formerly noted, is an adjective, and relates to the word lanx, which is underfoot. And this lanx in English, a charger, or large platter, was yearly filled with all sorts of fruits, which were offered to the gods at their festivals, as the premises, or first-gatherings. These offerings of the several sorts thus mingled, it is true, were not known to the Grecians, who called them πανάρπρον θυρίαν, a sacrifice of all sorts of fruits; and παντερίπιον, when they offered all kinds of grain. Virgil has mentioned these sacrifices in his Georgics.

"Lancibus et pandis fumantia reddimus exta."

And in another place, "Lanceque et liba ferimus:" that is, we offer the smoking entrails in great platters, and we will offer the chargers and the cakes.

This word satúra has been afterwards applied to many other sorts of mixtures; as Festus calls it a kind of olla, or hotchpotch, made of several sorts of meats. Laws were also called leges satúra, when they were of several heads and titles; like our tacked bills of parliament. And per satúram legem ferre, in the Roman senate, was to carry a law without telling the senators, or counting voices when they were in haste. Sallust uses the word per satúram sententias exquirere: when the majority was visibly on one side. From whence it might probably be conjectured, that the discourses or satires of Ennius, Lucilius, and Horace, as we now call them, took their name; because they are full of various matters, and are also written on various subjects, as Porphyrius says. But Dacier affirms that it is not immediately from thence that these satires are so called: for that name had been used formerly for other things, which bore a nearer resemblance to those discourses of Horace, in explaining of which (continues Dacier) a method it to be pursued, of which Casaubon himself had never thought, and which will put all things into so clear a light, that no farther room will be left for the least dispute.

During the space of almost four hundred years since the building of their city, the Romans had never known any entertainments of the state chance and jollity first found out those verse which they called Saturnian and Fescennine: or rather human nature, which is inclined to poetry first produced them, rude and barbarous, and unpolished, as all other operations of the soul are in their beginnings, before they are cultivated with art and study. However, in occasions of merriment they were first practised; and this rough cast unlearned poetry was instead of stage-plays, for the space of one hundred and twenty years together. They were made extempore, and were, as the French call them, impromptus; for which the Tartars of old were much renowned; and we see the daily examples of them in the Italian farces of Harlequin and Scaramucha. Such was the poetry of that savage people, before it was turned into numbers, and the harmony of verse. Little of the Saturnian verses is now remaining; we only know from authors, that they were nearer prose than poetry, without feet or measure. They were

Agrippæ, but not Agrippæ: perhaps they might be used in the solemn part of their ceremonies; and the Fescennine, who were invented after them, in their afternoon's debauchery, because they were scoffing and obscene.

The Fescennine and Saturnian were the same; for as they were called Saturnian from their ancientness, when Saturn reigned in Italy; they were also called Fescennine, from Fescennina, a town in the same country, where they were first practised. The actors, with a gross and rustic kind of raillery, reproached each other with their failings; and at the same time were nothing sparing of it to their audience. Somewhat of this custom was afterwards retained in their Saturnalia, or feasts of Saturn, celebrated in December; at least all kind of freedom in speech was then allowed to slaves, even against their masters; and we are not without some imitation of it in our Christmas gambols. Soldiers also used those Fescennine verses, after measure and numbers had been added to them, at the triumph of their generals: of which we have an example in the triumph of Julius Cæsar over Gaul, in these expressions: "Cæsar Gallias subegit, Nicomedes Cæsarem; ecce Cæsar nunc triumphat, qui subegit Gallias; Nicomedes non triumphat, qui subegit Cæsarem." The vapours of wine made the first satirical poets amongst the Romans; which, says Dacier, we cannot better represent, than by imagining a company of clowns on a holiday, dancing lubberly, and upbraiding one another in extempore doggerel, with their defects and vices, and the stories that were told of them in bake-houses and barbers-shops.

When they began to be somewhat better bred, and were entering, as I may say, into the first rudiments of civil conversation, they left these hedge-notes, for another sort of poem, somewhat polished, which was also full of pleasant raillery, but without any mixture of obscenity. This sort of poetry appeared under the name of satire, because of its variety; and this satire was adorned with compositions of music, and with dances; but lascivious postures were banished from it. In the Tuscan language, says Livy, the word bisler signifies a player: and therefore those actors, which were first brought from Etruria to Rome, on occasion of a pestilence; when the Romans were admonished to avert the anger of the gods by plays, in the year a5 Urbe Condita cccxc: those actors, I say, were therefore called bisleriones: and that name has since remained, not only to actors Roman born, but to all others of every nation. They played not the former extempore stuff of Fescennine verses, or clownish jests; but what they acted was a kind of civil cleanly farce, with music and dances, and motions that were proper to the subject.

In this condition Livius Andronicus found the stage, when he attempted first, instead of farces, to supply it with a nobler entertainment of tragedies and comedies. This man was a Grecian born, and being made a slave by Livius Salinator, and brought to Rome, had the education of his patron's children committed to him. Which trust he discharged so much to the satisfaction of his master, that he gave him his liberty.

Andronicus, thus become a freeman of Rome, added to his own name that of Livius his master; and, as I observed, was the first author of a regular play in that commonwealth. Being already instructed in his native country, in the manners and decencies of the Athenian theatre, and conversant in the Archæ commætiæ, or old comedy of Aristophanes, and the rest of the Grecian poets; he took from that model his own designing of plays for the Roman stage. The first of which was represented in the year ccccxciv since the building of Rome, as Tully, from the commentaries of Atticus, has assured us: it was after the end of the first Punic war, the year before Ennius was born. Dacier has not carried the matter altogether thus far; he only says, that one Livius Andronicus was the first stage-poet at Rome: but I will adventure on this hint, to advance another proposition, which I hope the learned will approve. And though we have not any thing of Andronicus remaining to justify my conjecture, yet it is exceeding probable, that having read the works of those Grecian wits, his countrymen, he imitated not only the ground-work, but also the manner of their writing. And how grave soever his tragedies might be, yet in his comedies he expressed the way of Aristophanes, Eupolis, and the rest, which was to call some persons by their own names, and to expose their defects to the laughter of the people. The examples of which we have in the forementioned Aristophanes, who turned the wife Socrates into ridicule; and is also very free with the management of Cleon, Alcibiades, and other ministers of the Athenian government. Now if this be granted, we may easily suppose, that the first hint of satirical plays on the Roman stage was given by the Greeks. Not from the satyrica, for that has been reasonably exploded in the former part of this discourse; but from their old comedy, which was imitated first by Livius Andronicus. And then Quintilian and Horace must be cautiously interpreted, where they affirm; that satire is wholly Roman; and a sort of verse, which was not touched on by the Grecians. The reconciliation of my opinion to the standard of their judgment, is not, however, very difficult, since they speak of satire, not as in its first elements, but as it was formed into a separate work; begun by Ennius, pursued by Lucilius, and completed afterwards by Horace. The proof depends only on this postulatum: that the comedies of Andronicus, which were imitations of the Greek, were also imitations of their railleries, and reflections on particular persons. For if this be granted me, which is a most probable supposition, it is easy to infer, that the first light which was given to the Roman theatrical satire, was from the plays of Livius Andronicus. Which will be more manifestly discovered, when I come to speak of Ennius. In the mean time I will return to Dacier.

The people, says he, ran in crowds to these new entertainments of Andronicus, as to pieces which were more noble in their kind, and more perfect than their former satires, which for some time they neglected and abandoned. But not long after, they took them up again, and then they joined them to their comedies: playing them at the end of every drama; as the French continue at this day to act their farces; in the nature of a separate entertainment from their tragedies. But more particularly they were joined to the Attelane fables, says Casaubon; which were plays invented by the Ofci. Those fables, says Valerius Maximus, out of Livy, were tempered with the Italian severity, and free from any note of infamy or obscencens; and, as an old commentator on Juvenal affirms, the Exordiarii, which were singers and dancers, entered to entertain the people with light songs, and mimical gestures, that they might not go away oppressed with melancholy, from those serious pieces of the theatre. So that the ancient satire of the Romans was in extemporary reproaches: the next was farce, which was brought from Tuscany: to that succeeded the plays of Andronicus, from the old comedy of the Grecians: and out of all these, sprung two several branches of new Roman satire; like different scions from the same root: which I shall prove with as much brevity as the subject will allow.

A year after Andronicus had opened the Roman stage with his new dramas, Ennius was born; who, when he was grown to man's estate, having seriously considered the genius of the people, and how eagerly they followed the first satires, thought it would be worth his pains to refine upon the project, and to write satires, not to be acted on the theatre, but read. He preserved the ground-work of their pleafantry, their venom, and their raillery on particular persons, and general vices: and by this means, avoiding the danger of an ill success, in a public representation, he hoped to be as well received in the cabinet as Andronicus had been upon the stage. The event was answerable to his expectation. He made discourses in several sorts of verse, varied often in the same paper; retaining still in the title their original name of satire. Both in relation to the subjects, and the variety of matters contained in them, the satires of Horace are entirely like them; only Ennius, as I said, confines not himself to one sort of verse, as Horace does; but taking example from the Greeks, and even from Homer himself in his Margites, which is a kind of satire, as Scaliger observes, gives himself the licence, when one sort of numbers runs not easily, to run into another, as his fancy dictates. For he makes no difficulty to mingle hexameter with iambic tetrameters; or with trochaic tetrameters; as appears by those fragments which are yet remaining of him: Horace has thought him worthy to be copied; inserting many things of his into his own satires, as Virgil has done in his Æneid.

Here we have Dacier making out that Ennius was the first satirist in that way of writing, which was of his invention; that is, satire abstracted from the stage, and new modelled into papers of verse, on several subjects. But he will have Ennius take the ground-work of satire from the first farces of the Romans, rather than from the formed plays of Livius Andronicus, which were copied from the Grecian comedies. It may possibly be so; but Dacier knows no more of it than I do. And it seems to me the more probable opinion, that he rather imitated the fine railleries of the Greeks, which he saw in the pieces of Andronicus, than the coarseness of all his old countrymen, in their clownish extemporary way of jeering.

But, besides this, it is universally granted, that Ennius, though an Italian, was excellently learned in the Greek language. His verses were stuffed with fragments of it, even to a fault: and he himself believed, according to the Pythagorean opinion, that the soul of Homer was transfused into him: which Perlius observes in his sixth satire: "postquam desertuit esse Mæonides." But this being only the private opinion of so inconsiderable a man as I am, I leave it to the farther disquisition of the critics, if they think it worth their notice. Most evident it is, that whether he imitated the Roman farce, or the Greek comedies, he is to be acknowledged for the first author of Roman satire, as it is properly so called, and distinguished from any sort of stage-play.

Of Pacuvius, who succeeded him, there is little to be said, because there is so little remaining of him: only that he is taken to be the nephew of Ennius, his sister's son; that in probability he was instructed by his uncle; in his way of satire, which we are told he has copied; but what advances he made, we know not.

Lucilius came into the world, when Pacuvius flourished most; he also made satires after the manner of Ennius, but he gave them a more graceful turn; and endeavoured to imitate more closely the Vetus Comæda of the Greeks: of the which the old original Roman satire had no idea, till the time of Livius Andronicus. And though Horace seems to have made Lucilius the first author of satire in verse amongst the Romans, in these words, "Quid cum est Lucilius ausus primus in hunc operis componere carmina morem:" he is only thus to be understood, that Lucilius had given a more graceful turn to the satire of Ennius and Pacuvius; not that he invented a new satire of his own: and Quintilian seems to explain this passage of Horace in these words: "Satira quidem tota nostra est, in qua primus insignem laude adeptus est Lucilius."

Thus, both Horace and Quintilian give a kind of primacy of honour to Lucilius, among the Latin satirists. For as the Roman language grew more refined, so much more capable it was of receiving the Grecian beauties in his time: Horace and Quintilian could mean no more, than that Lucilius writ better than Ennius and Pacuvius on the same account we prefer Horace to Lucilius: both of them imitated the old Greek comedy; and so did Ennius and Pacuvius before them. The polishing of the Latin tongue, in the succession of times, made the only difference. And Horace himself, in two of his satires, written purposely on this subject, thinks the Romans of his age were too partial in their commendations of Lucilius; who writ not only loosely, and mudily, with little art, and much less care, but also in a time when the Latin tongue was not yet sufficiently purged from the dregs of barbarism; and many significant and sounding words, which the Romans wanted, were not admitted even in the times of Lucretius and Cicero, of which both complain.

But, to proceed, Dacier justly taxes Casaubon, saying, that the satires of Lucilius were wholly different in specie, from those of Ennius and Pacuvius. Casaubon was led into that mistake by Diomedes the grammarian, who in effect says this satire, among the Romans, but not among the Greeks, was a biting invective poem, made after the model of the ancient comedy for the reprehension of vices: such as were the poems of Lucilius, of Horace, and of Persius. But in former times, the name of satire was given to poems, which were composed of several sorts of verses: such as were made by Ennius and Pacuvius: more fully expressing the etymology of the word satire, from satura, which we have observed. Here it is manifest, that Diomedes makes a specific distinction betwixt the satires of Ennius and those of Lucilius. But this, as we say in English, is only a distinction without a difference; for the reason of it is ridiculous, and absolutely false. This was that which cozened honest Casaubon, who, relying on Diomedes, had not sufficiently examined the origin and nature of those two satires: which were entirely the same, both in the matter and the form. For all that Lucilius performed beyond his predecessors, Ennius and Pacuvius, was only the adding of more politeness, and more salt; without any change in the substance of the poem: and though Lucilius put not together in the same satire several sorts of verses, as Ennius did; yet he composed several satires of several sorts of verses, and mingled them with Greek verses: one poem consisted only of hexameters; and another was entirely of iambs; a third of trochaics; as is visible, by the fragments yet remaining of his works. In short, if the satires of Lucilius are therefore said to be wholly different from those of Ennius, because he added much more of beauty and polishing to his own poems, than are to be found in those before him; it will follow from hence, that the satires of Horace are wholly different from those of Lucilius, because Horace has not less surpassed Lucilius in the elegance of his writing, than Lucilius surpassed Ennius in the turn and ornament of his. This passage of Diomedes has also drawn Doufa, the son, into the same error of Casaubon, which I say, not to expose the little failings of those judicious men, but only to make it appear, with how much diffidence and caution we are to read their works; when they treat a subject of so much obscurity, and so very ancient, as is this of satire.

Having thus brought down the history of satire from its original, to the times of Horace, and shown the several changes of it; I should here discover some of those graces which Horace added to it, but that I think it will be more proper to defer that undertaking, till I make the comparison betwixt him and Juvenal. In the meanwhile, following the order of time, it will be necessary to say somewhat of another kind of satire, which also was descended from the ancients: it is that which we call the Varronian satire, but which Varro himself calls the Menippean; because Varro, the most learned of the Romans, was the first author of it, who imitated, in his works, the manner of Menippus, the Gadarenian, who professed the philosophy of the Cynics.

This sort of satire was not only composed of several sorts of verse, like those of Ennius, but was also mixed with prose; and Greek was sprinkled amongst the Latin. Quintilian, after he had spoken of the satire of Lucilius, adds what follows: "There is another and former kind of satire, composed by Terentius Varro, the most learned of the Romans: in which he was not satisfied alone with mingling in it several sorts of verse." The only difficulty of this passage is, that Quintilian tells us, that this satire of Varro was of a former kind. For how can we possibly imagine this to be, since Varro, who was contemporary to Cicero, but must consequently be after Lucilius? Quintilian meant not, that the satire of Varro was in order of time before Lucilius; he would only give us to understand, that the Varronian satire, with a mixture of several sorts of verses, was more after the manner of Ennius and Pacuvius, than that of Lucilius, who was more severe, and more correct; and gave himself less liberty in the mixture of his verses, in the same poem.

We have nothing remaining of those Varronian satires, excepting some inconsiderable fragments, and those for the most part much corrupted. The titles of many of them are indeed preserved, and they are generally double: from whence, at least, we may understand, how many various subjects were treated by that author. Tully, in his Academics, introduces Varro himself giving us some light concerning the scope and design of those works. Wherein, after he had shown his reasons why he did not ex professo write of philosophy, he adds what follows. Notwithstanding, says he, that those pieces of mine, wherein I have imitated Menippus, though I have not translated him, are sprinkled with a kind of mirth and gaiety: yet many things are there inserted which are drawn from the very entrails of philosophy, and many things severely argued: which I have mingled with pleasantries on purpose that they may more easily go down with the common sort of unlearned readers. The rest of the sentence is so lame, that we can only make thus much out of it; that in the composition of his satires, he tempered philology with philosophy. That his work was a mixture of them both. And Tully himself confirms us in this opinion; when, a little after, he addresses himself to Varro in these words: "And you yourself have composed a most elegant and complete poem; you have begun philosophy in many places: sufficient to incite us, though too little to instruct us." Thus it appears, that Varro was one of those writers whom they called σασυρολογιστοι, studious of laughter; and that, as learned as he was, his business was more to divert his reader, than to teach him. And he intitled his own satires Menippean: not that Menippus had written any satires (for his were either dialogues or epistles), but that Varro imitated his style, his manner, his facetiousness. All that we know farther of Menippus and his writings, which are wholly lost, is, that by some he is esteemed, as, amongst the rest, by Varro; by others he is noted of Cynical impudence, and obscenity: that he was much given to those parodies, which I have already mentioned; that is, he often quoted the verses of Homer and the Tragic Poets, and turned their serious meaning into something that was ridiculous; whereas Varro's satires are by Tully called absolute, and most elegant, and various poems. Lucian who was emulous of this Menippus, seems to have imitated both his manners and his style in many of his dialogues; where Menippus himself is often introduced as a speaker in them, and as a perpetual buffoon: particularly his character is expressed in the beginning of that dialogue, which is called Nicomachia. But Varro, in imitating him, avoids his impudence and filthiness, and only expresses his witty pleasantry.

This we may believe for certain, that as his subjects were various, so most of them were tales or stories of his own invention. Which is also manifest from antiquity, by those authors who are acknowledged to have written Varronian satires, in imitation of his: of whom the chief is Petronius Arbitrator, whose satire, they say, is now printed in Holland, wholly recovered and made complete: when it is made public, it will easily be seen by any one sentence, whether it be supposititious or genuine. Many of Lucian's dialogues may also be properly called Varronian satires; particularly his True History: and consequently the Golden Ass of Apuleius, which is taken from him. Of the same stamp is the Mock Deification of Claudius, by Seneca: and the Symposium, or Cæsars of Julian the Emperor. Amongst the moderns we may reckon the Encomium Moræ of Erasmus, Barclay's Euphormio, and a volume of German authors, which my ingenious friend Mr. Charles Killigrew once lent me. In the English I remember none, which are mixed with prose, as Varro's were: but of the same kind is Mother Hubbard's Tale in Spenser; and (if it be not too vain to mention any thing of my own) the poems of Abfalom and Mac Flecko.

This is what I have to say in general of satire: only, as Dacier has observed before me, we may take notice that the word satire is of a more general signification in Latin, than in French or English. For amongst the Romans it was not only used for those discourses which decried vice, or exposed folly; but for others also, where virtue was recommended. But in our modern languages we apply it only to the invective poems, where the very name of satire is formidable to those persons, who would appear to the world what they are not in themselves. For in English, to say satire, is to mean reflection, as we use that word in the worst sense; or as the French call it, more properly, Médisance. In the criticism of spelling, it ought to be with i and not with y, to distinguish its true derivation from satūra, not from Satyrus. And if this be so, then it is false spelled throughout this book; for here it is written satyr. Which having not considered at the first, I thought it not worth correcting afterwards. But the French are more nice, and never spell it any other way than satire.

I am now arrived at the most difficult part of my undertaking, which is, to compare Horace with Juvenal and Persius. It is observed by Rigaltius, in his preface before Juvenal, written to Thuanus, that these three poets have all their particular partisans, and favourers: every commentator, as he has taken pains with any of them, thinks himself obliged to prefer his author to the other two; to find out their failings, and decry them, that he may make room for his own darling. Such is the partiality of mankind, to set up that interest which they have once espoused, though it be to the prejudice of truth, morality, and common justice: and especially in the productions of the brain. As authors generally think themselves the best poets, because they cannot go out of themselves to judge sincerely of their betters; so it is with critics, who, having first taken a liking to one of these poets, proceed to comment on him, and to illustrate him: after which they fall in love with their own labours, to that degree of blind fondness, that at length they defend and exalt their author, not so much for his sake as for their own. It is a folly of the same nature, with that of the Romans themselves, in their games of the circus; the spectators were divided in their factions, betwixt the Veneti and the Præfiniti: some were for the charioteer in blue, and some for him in green. The colours themselves were but a fancy; but when once a man had taken pains to set out those of his party, and had been at the trouble of procuring voices for them, the case was altered: he was concerned for his own labour; and that so earnestly, that disputes and quarrels, animosities, commotions, and bloodshed, often happened: and in the declension of the Grecian empire, the very sovereigns themselves engaged in it, even when the Barbarians were at their doors; and stickled for the preference of colours, when the safety of their people was in question. I am now myself on the brink of the same precipice; I have spent some time on the translation of Juvenal and Persius; and it behoves me to be wary, lest, for that reason, I should be partial to them, or take a prejudice against Horace. Yet on the other side, I would not be like some of our judges, who would give the cause for a poor man, right or wrong; for though that be an error on the better hand, yet it is still a partiality: and a rich man unheard cannot be concluded an oppressor. I remember a saying of King Charles II. on Sir Matthew Hales (who was doubtless an uncorrupt and upright man), That his servants were sure to be cast on a trial which was heard before him; not that he thought the judge was possible to be bribed, but that his integrity might be too scrupulous; and that the causes of the crown were always suspicious, when the privileges of subjects were concerned.

It had been much fairer, if the modern critics, who have embarked in the quarrels of their favourite authors, had rather given to each his proper due, without taking from another's heap, to raise their own. There is praise enough for each of them in particular, without encroaching on his fellows, and detracting from them, or enriching themselves with the spoils of others. But to come to particulars: Heinsius and Dacier are the most principal of those, who raise Horace above Juvenal and Persius. Scaliger the father, Rigaltius, and many others, debase Horace, that they may set up Juvenal: and Casaubon, who is almost single, throws dirt on Juvenal and Horace, that he may exalt Persius, whom he understood particularly well, and better than any of the former commentators; even Stelluti, who succeeded him.

I will begin with him, who, in my opinion, de-ends the weakest cause, which is that of Perſius;
 and labouring, as Tacitus profeſſes of his own writings, to diſturb myſelf of partiality, or prejudice, conſider Perſius, not as a poet whom I have wholly tranſlated, and who has coſt me more labour and time than Juvenal; but according to what I judge to be his own merit; which I think not equal, in the main, to that of Juvenal or Horace; and yet, in ſome things to be preferred to both of them.

Fiſt, then, for the verſe, neither Caſaubon himſelf nor any for him, can defend either his numbers, or the purity of his Latin. Caſaubon gives this point for loſt; and pretends not to juſtify either the meaſures, or the words of Per-ſius: he is evidently beneath Horace and Juvenal, in both.

Then, as his verſe is ſcabrous, and hobbling, and his words not every where well choſen, the purity of Latin being more corrupted than in the time of Juvenal, and conſequently of Horace, who writ when the language was in the height of its perfection; ſo his diction is hard; his figures are generally too bold and daring; and his tropes, particularly his metaphors, inſufferably ſtrained.

In the third place, notwithstanding all the diligence of Caſaubon, Stelluti, and a Scotch gentleman (whom I have heard extremely commended or his illuſtrations of him); yet he is ſtill obſcure; whether he affected not to be underſtood, but with difficulty; or whether the fear of his ſafety under Nero, compelled him to this darkneſs in ſome places; or, that it was occaſioned by his loſe way of thinking, and the brevity of his ſtyle, and crowding of his figures; or, laſtly, whether, after ſo long a time, many of his words have been corrupted, and many cuſtoms, and ſtories relating to them, loſt to us; whether ſome of theſe reaſons, or all, concurred to render him ſo cloudy; we may be bold to affirm, that the eſt of commentators can but gueſs at his meaning, in many paſſages: and none can be certain what he has divined rightly.

After all, he was a young man like his friend and contemporary Lucan: both of them men of extraordinary parts, and great acquired knowledge, conſidering their youth. But neither of them had arrived to that maturity of judgment, which is neceſſary to the accompliſhing of a formed poet. And this conſideration, as on the one hand it lays ſome imperfections to their charge: ſo on the other ſide, it is a candid excuſe or thoſe failings, which are incident to youth and inexperience; and we have more reaſon to wonder how they, who died before the thirtieth year of their age, could write ſo well, and think ſo ſtrongly; than to accuſe them of thoſe faults, from which human nature, and more eſpecially
 a youth, can never poſſibly be exempted.

To conſider Perſius yet more cloſely: he rather ſuſtained over vice and folly, than expoſed them, like Juvenal and Horace. And as chaſte and modeſt as he is eſteemed, it cannot be denied, but that in ſome place he is broad and ſuſſome, as the latter verſes of the fourth ſatire, and of the ſixth ſufficiently witneſſed. And it is to be believed that he who commits the ſame crime often, and without neceſſity, cannot but do it with ſome kind of pleaſure.

To come to a concluſion: he is manifeſtly below Horace, becauſe he borrows moſt of his greateſt beauties from him: and Caſaubon is ſo far from denying this, that he has written a treatiſe purpoſely concerning it; wherein he ſhows a multitude of his tranſlations from Horace, and his imitations of him, for the credit of his author, which he calls “Imitatio Horatiana.”

To theſe defects, which I caſually obſerved while I was tranſlating this author, Scaliger has added others: he calls him, in plain terms, a ſilly writer, and a triſter; full of oſtentation of learning; and after all, unworthy to come into competition with Juvenal and Horace.

After ſuch terrible accuſations, it is time to hear what his patron Caſaubon can allege in his defence. Inſtead of anſwering, he excuſes for the moſt part; and when he cannot, accuſes others of the ſame crimes. He deals with Scaliger, as a moſt ſcholar with a matter. He compliments him with ſo much reverence, that one would ſwear he regarded him at leaſt as much as he reſpected him. Scaliger will not allow Perſius to have any wit; Caſaubon interprets this in the mildeſt ſenſe; and confeſſes his author was not good at turning things into a pleaſant ridicule;
 or, in other words, that he was not a laughable writer. That he was ineptus, indeed, but that was non aptiſſimus ad jocandum. But that he was oſtentatious of his learning, that, by Scaliger’s good favour, he denies. Perſius ſhewed his learning, but was no boaſter of it; he did oſtendere, but not oſtentare; and ſo, he ſays, did Scaliger: where, methinks, Caſaubon turns it haſhdſomely upon that ſupercilious critic, and ſilently inſinuates that he himſelf was ſufficiently vain-glorious, and a boaſter of his own knowledge. All the writings of this venerable cenſor, continues Caſaubon, which are χρυσῶς χρυσοτέρα, more golden than gold itſelf, are everywhere ſwelling of thyme, which, like a bee, he has gathered from ancient authors: but far be oſtentation and vain-glorious from a gentleman, ſo well-born, and ſo nobly educated, as Scaliger. But ſays Scaliger, he is ſo obſcure, that he has got himſelf the name of Scotinus, a dark writer: now, ſays Caſaubon, it is a wonder to me that any thing could be obſcure to the divine wit of Scaliger; from which nothing could be hidden. This is indeed a ſtrong compliment, but no defence. And Caſaubon, who could not but be ſenſible of his author’s blind ſide, thinks it time to abandon a poſt that was untenable. He acknowledges that Perſius is obſcure in ſome places:
 but ſo is Plato, ſo is Thucydides, ſo are Pindar, Theocritus, and Ariſtophanes, amongſt the Greek poets; and even Horace and Juvenal, he might have added, amongſt the Romans. The truth is, Perſius is not ſometimes, but generally obſcure;
 and therefore Caſaubon, at laſt, is forced to ex-cuſe him, by alleging, that it was ſe defendendo, for fear of Nero; and that he was commanded to write ſo cloudily by Cornutus, in virtue of holy obedience to his maſter. I cannot help my own opinion; I think Cornutus needed not to have read many lectures to him on that ſubject. Per-ſius was an apt ſcholar; and when he was bidden

to be obscure in some places, where his life and safety were in question, took the same counsel for all his books; and never afterwards wrote ten lines together clearly. Casaubon, being upon this chapter, has not failed, we may be sure, of making a compliment to his own dear comment. If Perſius, ſays he, be in himſelf obſcure, yet my interpretation has made him intelligible. There is no queſtion but he deſerves that praiſe, which he has given to himſelf: but the nature of the thing, as Lucretius ſays, will not admit of a perfect explanation. Beſides many examples, which I could urge, the very laſt verſe of his laſt ſatire, upon which he particularly values himſelf in his preface, is not yet ſufficiently explicated. It is true, Holiday has endeavoured to juſtify his conſtruction; but Steliat is againſt it: and for my part, I can have but a very dark notion of it. As for the clarity of his thoughts, Casaubon denies not but that one particular paſſage, in the fourth ſatire, "At ſi unctus ceſſus," &c. is not only the moſt obſcure, but the moſt obſcene of all his works: I underſtood it; but, for that reaſon, turned it over. In defence of his boiſterous metaphors, he quotes Longinus, who accounts them as inſtruments of the ſublime, fit to move and ſtir up the affections, particularly in narration. To which it may be replied, that where the trope is far fetched, and hard, it is fit for nothing but to puzzle the underſtanding; and may be reckoned amongſt theſe things of Demoiſthenes which Æſchines called δαρύματα not ῥήματα, that is, prodigies, not words. It muſt be granted to Casaubon, that the knowledge of many things is loſt in our modern ages, which were of familiar notice to the ancients; and that ſatire is a poem of a difficult nature in itſelf, and is not written to vulgar readers. And, through the relation which it has to comedy, the frequent change of perſons makes the ſenſe perplexed, when we can but divine who it is that ſpeaks; whether Perſius himſelf, or his friend and monitor; or, in ſome places, a third perſon. But Casaubon comes back always to himſelf, and concludes, that if Perſius had not been obſcure, there had been no need of him for an interpreter. Yet when he had once enjoined himſelf ſo hard a taſk, he then conſidered the Greek proverb, that he muſt χιλῶνεις φαρῖν ἢ μὴ φαρῖν, either eat the whole ſnail, or let it quite alone; and ſo he went through with his laborious taſk, as I have done, with my difficult tranſlation.

Thus far, my lord, you ſee it has gone very hard with Perſius: I think he cannot be allowed to ſtand in competition, either with Juvenal or Horace. Yet for once, I will venture to be ſo vain, as to affirm, that none of his hard metaphors, or forced expreſſions, are in my tranſlation: but more of this in its proper place, where I ſhall ſay ſomewhat in particular of our general performance, in making theſe two authors Engliſh. In the mean time, I think myſelf obliged to give Perſius his undoubted due, and to acquaint the world with Casaubon, in what he has equalled, and in what excelled, his two competitors.

A man who is reſolved to praiſe an author, with any appearance of juſtice, muſt be ſure to ſee him on the ſtrongeſt ſide, and where he is leaſt liable to exceptions. He is therefore obliged, to chooſe his mediums accordingly; Caſaubon, who ſaw that Perſius could not laugh with a becoming grace, that he was not made for jeſting, and that a merry conceit was not his talent, turned his feather, like an Indian, to another light, that he might give it the better gloſs. Moral doctrine, ſays he, and urbanity, or well-mannered wit, are the two things which conſtitute the Roman ſatire. But of the two, that which is moſt eſſential to this poem, and is, as it were, the very ſoul which animates it, is the ſcourging of vice, and exhortation to virtue. Thus wit, for a good reaſon, is already almoſt out of doors; and allowed only for an inſtrument, a kind of tool, or a weapon, as he calls it, of which the ſatiriſt makes uſe, in the compaſſing of his deſign. The end and aim of our three rivals, is conſequently the ſame. By what methods they have profected their intention, is farther to be conſidered. Satire is of the nature of moral philoſophy, as being inſtructive: he, therefore, who inſtructs moſt uſefully, will carry the palm from his two antagoniſts. The philoſophy in which Perſius was educated, and which he profeſſes through his whole book, is the Stoic: the moſt noble, moſt generous, moſt beneficial to human kind, amongſt all the ſects, who have given us the rules of ethics, thereby to form a ſevere virtue in the ſoul; to raiſe in us an undaunted courage, againſt the aſſaults of fortune; to eſteem as nothing the things that are without us, becauſe they are not in our power; not to value riches, beauty, honours, fame, or health, any farther than as conveniences, and ſo many helps to living as we ought, and doing good in our generation. In ſhort, to be any ways happy, while we poſſeſs our minds with a good conſcience, are free from the ſlavery of vices, and conform our actions and converſations to the rules of right reaſon. See here, my Lord, an epitome of Epictetus; the doctrine of Zeno, and the education of our Perſius. And this he expreſſed, not only in all his ſatires, but in the manner of his life. I will not leſſen this commendation of the Stoic philoſophy, by giving you an account of ſome abſurdities in their doctrine, and ſome, perhaps, impieties, if we conſider them by the ſtandard of Chriſtian faith: Perſius has fallen into none of them; and therefore is free from thoſe imputations. What he teaches might be taught from pulpits, with more profit to the audience, than all the nice ſpeculations of divinity, and controverſies concerning faith; which are more for the profit of the ſhepherd than for the edification of the flock. Paſſion, intereſt, ambition and all their bloody conſequences of diſcord and of war, are baniſhed from this doctrine. Here is nothing propoſed but the quiet and tranquillity of the mind; virtue lodged at home, and afterwards diſſuſed in her general effects, to the improvement and good of human kind. And therefore I wonder not that the preſent Biſhop of Saluſbury has recommended this our author, and the tenth ſatire of Juvenal, in his Paſtoral Letter, to the ſerious peruſal and practice of the divines in his diocèſe, as the beſt common-places for their ſermons, as the ſtore houſes and magazines of moral virtues, from whence they may draw out, as they have occasion, all manner of assistance for the accomplishment of a virtuous life, which the Stoics have assigned for the great end and perfection of mankind. Herein then it is, that Persius has excelled both Juvenal and Horace. He sticks to his own philosophy: he shifts not sides, like Horace, who is sometimes an Epicurean, sometimes a Stoic, sometimes an Eclectic, as his present humour leads him; nor declaims, like Juvenal, against vices, more like an orator, than a philosopher. Persius is everywhere the same; true to the dogmas of his master. What he has learnt, he teaches vehemently; and what he teaches, that he practises himself. There is a spirit of sincerity in all he says: you may easily discern that he is in earnest, and is persuaded of that truth which he inculcates. In this I am of opinion, that he excels Horace, who is commonly in jest, and laughs while he instructs: and is equal to Juvenal, who was as honest and serious as Persius, and more he could not be.

Hitherto I have followed Casaubon, and enlarged upon him; because I am satisfied that he says no more than truth; the rest is almost all frivolous. For he says, that Horace, being the son of a tax-gatherer, or a collector, as we call it, smells everywhere of the meanness of his birth and education: his conceits are vulgar, like the subjects of his satires; that he does plebeium sapere; and writes not with that elevation which becomes a satirist: That Persius being nobly born, and of an opulent family, had likewise the advantage of a better master; Cornutus being the most learned of his time, a man of the most holy life, the chief of the Stoic sect at Rome; and not only a great philosopher, but a poet himself; and in probability a coadjutor of Persius: That, as for Juvenal, he was long a declaimer, came late to poetry, and has not been much conversant in philosophy.

It is granted that the father of Horace was Libertinus, that is, one degree removed from his grandfather, who had been once a slave: but Horace, speaking of him, gives him the best character of a father, which I ever read in history; and I wish a witty friend of mine, now living, had such another. He bred him in the best school, and with the best company of young noblemen. And Horace, by his gratitude to his memory, gives a certain testimony that his education was ingenuous. After this, he formed himself abroad, by the conversation of great men. Brutus found him at Athens, and was so pleased with him, that he took him thence into the army, and made him "tribunus militum," a colonel in a legion; which was the preferment of an old soldier. All this was before his acquaintance with Æcænas, and his introduction into the court of Augustus, and the familiarity of that great emperor; which, had he not been well-bred before, had been enough to civilize his conversation, and ender him accomplished and knowing in all the arts of complacency and good behaviour; and, in short, an agreeable companion for the retired hours and privacies of a favourite, who was first minister. So that, upon the whole matter, Persius may be acknowledged to be equal with him in those respects, though better born, and, Juvenal inferior to both. If the advantage be any where, it is on the side of Horace; as much as the court of Augustus Cæsar was superior to that of Nero. As for the subjects which they treated, it will appear hereafter, that Horace writ not vulgarly on vulgar subjects, nor always chose them. His style is constantly accommodated to his subject, either high or low: if his fault be too much lowness, that of Persius is the fault of the hardness of his metaphors and obscurity: and so they are equal in the failings of their style; where Juvenal manifestly triumphs over both of them.

The comparison betwixt Horace and Juvenal is more difficult; because their forces were more equal: a dispute has always been, and ever will continue, betwixt the favourers of the two poets. "Non nostrum est tantas componere lites." I shall only venture to give my opinion, and leave it for better judges to determine. If it be only argued in general, which of them was the better poet, the victory is already gained on the side of Horace. Virgil himself must yield to him in the delicacy of his turns, his choice of words, and perhaps the purity of his Latin. He who says that Pindar is inimitable, is himself inimitable in his odes. But the contention betwixt these two great masters, is for the prize of satire: in which controvertedly, all the odes and epodes of Horace are to stand excluded. I say this, because Horace has written many of them satirically, against his private enemies: yet these, if justly considered, are somewhat of the nature of the Greek Silli, which were invectives against particular sects and persons. But Horace has purged himself of this choler, before he entered on those discourses, which are more properly called the Roman satire: he has not now to do with a Lyce, a Canidia, a Cassius Severus, or a Menas; but is to correct the vices and the follies of his time, and to give the rules of a happy and virtuous life. In a word, that former sort of satire, which is known in England by the name of lampoon, is a dangerous sort of weapon, and for the most part unlawful. We have no moral right on the reputation of other men. It is taking from them what we cannot restore to them. There are only two reasons, for which we may be permitted to write lampoons; and I will not promise that they can always justify us: the first is revenge, when we have been affronted in the same nature, or have been anywise notoriously abused, and can make ourselves no other reparation. And yet we know, that in Christian charity, all offences are to be forgiven, as we expect the like pardon for those which we daily commit against Almighty God. And this consideration has often made me tremble when I was saying our Saviour's prayer; for the plain condition of the forgiveness which we beg, is the pardoning of others the offences which they have done to us: for which reason I have many times avoided the commission of that fault, even when I have been notoriously provoked. Let not this, my Lord, pass for vanity in me; for it is truth. More libels have been written against me, than almost any man now living: and I had reason on my side, to have defended my own innocence: I speak not on my poetry, which I have wholly given up to the critics; let them use it as they please; posterity, perhaps, may be more favourable to me: for interest and passion will lie buried in another age; and partiality and prejudice be forgotten. I speak of my morals, which have been sufficiently aspersed; that any sort of reputation ought to be dear to every honest man, and is to me. But let the world witness for me, that I have been often wanting to myself in that particular; I have seldom answered any scurrilous lampoon, when it was in my power to have exposed my enemies: and, being naturally vindictive, have suffered in silence, and, possessed my soul in quiet.

Any thing, though never so little, which a man speaks of himself, in my opinion, is still too much; and therefore I will waive this subject, and proceed to give the second reason, which may justify a poet, when he writes against a particular person: and that is, when he is become a public nuisance. And those, whom Horace in his satires, and Persius and Juvenal have mentioned in theirs, with a brand of infamy, are wholly such. It is an action of virtue to make examples of vicious men. They may and ought to be upbraided with their crimes and follies: both for their own amendment, if they are not yet incorrigible, and for the terror of others, to hinder them from falling into those enormities, which they see are so severely punished in the persons of others. The first reason was only an excuse for revenge; but this second is absolutely of a poet's office to perform: but how few lampooners are there now living, who are capable of this duty! When they come in my way, it is impossible sometimes to avoid reading them. But, good God! how remote they are, in common justice, from the choice of such persons as are the proper subject of satire! and how little wit they bring, for the support of their injustice! The weaker sex is their most ordinary theme; and the best and fairest are sure to be the most severely handled. Amongst men, those who are prosperously unjust, are entitled to panegyric; but afflicted virtue is insolently stabbed with all manner of reproaches; no decency is considered, no fullness omitted; no venom is wanting, as far as dullness can supply it: for there is a perpetual dearth of wit; a barrenness of good sense and entertainment. The neglect of the readers will soon put an end to this sort of scribbling. There can be no pleasure where there is no wit: no impression can be made, where there is no truth for the foundation. To conclude, they are like the fruits of the earth in this unnatural season: the corn which held up its head, is spoiled with rankness; but the greater part of the harvest is laid along, and little of good income and wholesome nourishment is received into the barns. This is almost a digression, I confess to your Lordship; but a just indignation forced it from me. Now I have removed this rubbish, I will return to the comparison of Juvenal and Horace.

I would willingly divide the palm betwixt them, upon the two heads of profit and delight, which are the two ends of poetry in general. It must be granted by the favourers of Juvenal, that Horace is the more copious and profitable in his instructions of human life: but in my particular opinion, which I set not up for a standard to better judgments, Juvenal is the more delightful author. I am profited by both, I am pleased with both; but I owe more to Horace for my instruction; and more to Juvenal, for my pleasure. This, as I said, is my particular taste of these two authors: they who will have either of them to excel the other in both qualities, can scarce give better reasons for their opinion, than I for mine: but all unbiassed readers will conclude, that my moderation is not to be condemned: to such impartial men I must appeal: for they who have already formed their judgments, may justly stand suspected of prejudice: and though all who are my readers, will set up to be my judges, I enter my caveat against them, that they ought not so much as to be of my jury: or, if they be admitted, it is but reason that they should first hear what I have to urge in the defence of my opinion.

That Horace is somewhat the better instructor of the two, is proved from hence, that his instructions are more general: Juvenal's more limited. So that granting, that the counsels which they give are equally good for moral use; Horace, who gives the most various advice, and most applicable to all occasions which can occur to us in the course of our lives; as including in his discourses not only all the rules of morality, but also of civil conversation; is undoubtedly to be preferred to him who is more circumscribed in his instructions makes them to fewer people, and on fewer occasions, than the other. I may be pardoned for using an old saying, since it is true, and to the purpose, "Bonum quo communis, eo melius." Juvenal, excepting only his first satire, is in all the rest confined, to the exposing of some particular vice; that he lashes, and there he flicks. His sentences are truly shining and instructive: but they are sprinkled here and there. Horace is teaching us in every line, and is perpetually moral; he has found out the skill of Virgil, to hide his sentences to give you the virtue of them, without showing them in their full extent: which is the ostentation of a poet, and not his art: and this Petronius charges on the authors of his time, as a vice in writing, which was then growing on the age. "Ne sententiæ extra corpus orationis eminent: he would have them weaved into the body of the work, and not appear embossed upon it, as striking directly on the reader's view. Folly was the proper quarry of Horace, and not vice: as there are but few notoriously wicked men, comparison with a shoal of fools and fops; so it is a harder thing to make a man wise, than to make him honest. For the will is only to be reclaimed in the one; but the understanding is to be formed in the other. There are blind sides at follies, even in the professors of moral philosophy and there is not any one sect of them that Horace has not exposed. Which, as it was not the design of Juvenal, who was wholly employed in lash vices, some of them the most enormous that can be imagined; so perhaps, it was not so much his talent. "Omne vas erit vitium ridenti Flaccus amico, tangit, et admittit circum præcorum ludit." This was the commendation which Persius gave him; where by vitium, he meant those little vices, which we call follies, the defects of human understanding, or at most the peccadillos of life, rather than the tragical vices, to which men are hurried by their unruly passions and exorbitant desires. But in the word omne, which is universal, he concludes with me, that the divine wit of Horace left nothing untouched; that he entered into the inmost recesses of nature; found out the imperfections even of the most wise and brave, as well as of the most common people; discovering, even in the great Trebatius, to whom he addresses the first satire, his hunting after business, and following the court, as well as in the executioner Crispinus, his impertinence and impurity. It is true, he exposes Crispinus openly, as common nuisance: but he rallies the other as a friend, more finely. The exhortations of Persius are confined to noblemen: and the Stoic philosophy is that alone which he recommended to them: several exhort to particular virtues, as they are opposed to those vices against which he declaims: it Horace laughs to shame all follies, and insinuates virtue, rather by familiar examples, than by the severity of precepts.

The last consideration seems to incline the balance on the side of Horace, and to give him the preference to Juvenal, not only in profit, but in pleasure. But, after all, I must confess that the slight which Horace gives me, is but languishing. Be pleased still to understand, that I speak my own taste only: he may ravish other men; it I am too stupid and insensible to be tickled. Where he barely grins himself, and as Scaliger says, only shows his white teeth, he cannot provoke me to any laughter. His urbanity, that is, his good manners, are to be commended: but his wit is faint; and his salt, if I may dare to say so, most insipid. Juvenal is of a more vigorous and acuteline wit; he gives me as much pleasure as I can bear: he fully satisfies my expectation; he eats his subject home: his spleen is raised, and he raises mine: I have the pleasure of concernment in all he says: he drives his reader along with him; and when he is at the end of his way, willingly stop with him. If he went another way, it would be too far, it would make a journey of a progress, and turn delight into fatigue. When he gives over, it is a sign the subject is exhausted, and the wit of man can carry it no farther. If a fault can justly be found in him, it is that he is sometimes too luxuriant, too redundant; yes more than he needs, like my friend the Plaindealer, but never more than pleases. Add to this, at his thoughts are as just as those of Horace, and much more elevated. His expressions are sonorous and more noble; his verbiage more numerous, and his words are suitable to his thoughts, sublime and lofty. All these contribute to the pleasure of a reader: and the greater the soul of him who reads, his transports are the greater. Horace is ways on the amble, Juvenal on the gallop; but his way is perpetually on carpet-ground. He goes with more impetuosity than Horace, but as severely; and the swiftness adds a more lively agitation to the spirits. The low style of Horace is according to his subject, that is generally grave: question not but he could have raised it: for the last epistle of the second book, which he writes to

Augustus, (a most instructive satire, concerning poetry), is of so much dignity in the words, and of so much elegance in the numbers, that the author plainly shows, the sermo pedestris, in his other satires, was rather his choice than his necessity. He was a rival to Lucilius, his predecessor, and was resolved to surpass him in his own manner. Lucilius, as we see by his remaining fragments, minded neither his style nor his numbers, nor his purity of words, nor his run of verse: Horace therefore copes with him in that humble way of satire, writes under his own force, and carries a dead weight, that he may match his competitor in the race. This I imagine was the chief reason, why he minded only the clearness of his satire, and the cleanness of expression, without ascending to those heights, to which his own vigour might have carried him. But limiting his desires only to the conquest of Lucilius, he had the ends of his rival, who lived before him; but made way for a new conquest over himself, by Juvenal his successor. He could not give an equal pleasure to his reader, because he used not equal instruments. The fault was in the tools, and not in the workman. But verifications and numbers are the greatest pleasures of poetry: Virgil knew it, and practised both so happily, that, for aught I know, his greatest excellency is in his diction. In all other parts of poetry, he is faultless; but in this he placed his chief perfection. And, give me leave, my Lord, since I have here an apt occasion, to say, that Virgil could have written sharper satires, than either Horace or Juvenal, if he would have employed his talent that way. I will produce a verse and a half of his, in one of his eclogues, to justify my opinion; and with commas after every word, to show, that he has given almost as many lathes, as he has written syllables; it is against a bad poet, whose ill verses he describes: "Non tu, in trivivi doctæ, solebas, fridenti, miscrum, stipula, disperdere, carmen?" But to return to my purpose: when there is any thing deficient in numbers and sound, the reader is uneasy and unsatisfied; he wants something of his complement, desires somewhat which he finds not: and this being the manifest defect of Horace, it is no wonder that, finding it supplied in Juvenal, we are more delighted with him. And besides this, the sauce of Juvenal is more poignant, to create in us an appetite of reading him. The meat of Horace is more nourishing; but the cookery of Juvenal more exquisite; so that, granting Horace to be the more general philosopher, we cannot deny that Juvenal was the greater poet, I mean in satire. His thoughts are sharper, his indignation against vice is more vehement; his spirit has more of the commonwealth genius; he treats tyranny, and all the vices attending it, as they deserve, with the utmost rigour: and consequently a noble soul is better pleased with a zealous vindicator of Roman liberty, than with a temporizing poet, a well-mannered court-slave, and a man who is often afraid of laughing in the right place; who is ever decent, because he is naturally servile. After all, Horace had the disadvantage of the times in which he lived; they were better for the man, but worse for the satirist. It is generally said, that those enormous vices which were practised under the reign of Domitian, were not known in the time of Augustus Cæsar: that therefore Juvenal had a larger field than Horace. Little follies were out of doors, when oppression was to be scourged instead of avarice; it was no longer time to turn into ridicule the false opinions of philosophers, when the Roman liberty was to be asserted. There was more need of a Brutus in Domitian's days, to redeem or mend, than of a Horace, if he had then been living, to laugh at a fly-catcher. This reflection at the same time excuses Horace, but exalts Juvenal. I have ended, before I was aware, the comparison of Horace and Juvenal, upon the topics of pleasure and delight; and, indeed, I may safely here conclude that common-place; for if we make Horace our minister of state in satire, and Juvenal of private pleasures; I think the latter has no ill bargain of it. Let profit have the pre-eminence of honour, in the end of poetry. Pleasure, though but the second in degree, is the first in favour. And who would not choose to be loved better, rather than to be more esteemed? But I am entered already upon another topic; which concerns the particular merits of these two satirists. However, I will pursue my business where I left it; and carry it farther than that common observation of the several ages in which these authors flourished. When Horace writ his satires, the monarchy of his Cæsar was in its newness, and the government but just made easy to the conquered people. They could not possibly have forgotten the usurpation of that prince upon their freedom, nor the violent methods which he had used, in the compassing that vast design: they yet remembered his proscriptions, and the slaughter of so many noble Romans, their defenders. Amongst the rest, that horrible action of his, when he forced Livia from the arms of her husband, who was constrained to see her married, as Dion relates the story, and, big with child as she was, conveyed to the bed of his insulting rival. The same Dion Cassius gives us another instance of the crime before mentioned: that Cornelius Siscinna, being reproached in full senate, with the licentious conduct of his wife, returned this answer: That he had married her by the counsel of Augustus: intimating, says my author, that Augustus had obliged him to that marriage, that he might, under that covert, have the more free access unto her. His adulteries were still before their eyes, but they must be patient, where they had not power. In other things that emperor was moderate enough: propriety was generally secured; and the people entertained with public shows, and donatives, to make them more easily digest their lost liberty. But Augustus, who was conscious to himself of so many crimes which he had committed, thought in the first place to provide for his own reputation, by making an edict against lampoons and satires, and the authors of those defamatory writings, which my author Tacitus, from the law-term, calls "famofos libellos."

In the first book of his Annals, he gives the following account of it, in these words: "Primus Augustus cognitionem de famosis libellis specie legis ejus, tractavit; commotus Cassii Severi libidini, quâ virus feminasque illustres, procacibus scriptis diffamaverat." Thus, in English:

"Augustus was the first who, under the colour of that law, took cognizance of lampoons; being provoked to it, by the petulancy of Cassius Severus: who had defamed many illustrious persons: both sexes, in his writings." The law to which Tacitus refers, was "Lex læsæ Majestatis;" commonly called, for the sake of brevity, "Majestas;" or, as we say, high treason: he means not that this law had not been enacted formerly: for it had been made by the Decemviri, and was inscribed among the rest in the twelve tables: to prevent the a person of the Roman majesty, either of the people themselves, or their religion, or their magistrates and the infringement of it was capital; that if the offender was whipt to death with the fasces which were borne before the chief officers of Rome. But Augustus was the first, who reformed that intermitted law: by the words, "under colour of that law," he insinuates that Augustus caused it to be executed, on pretence of those laws which were written by Cassius Severus, against the nobility: but, in truth, to save himself from such defamatory verses. Suetonius likewise makes mention of it thus: "Spartos de se in Curia famofos libellos, nec expavit, et magnâ curâ darguit. Ac ne requisitis quidem actoribus id modo censuit, cognoscendum post hac, de qui libellos aut carmina ad infamiam injuspiam sub alieno nomine edant." Augustus was not afraid of libels, says that author: yet he took care imaginable to have them answered; and decreed, that for the time to come, the authors thereof should be punished. But Aurelius makes it more clear, according to my sense, that this error, for his own sake, durst not permit them. "Fecit id Augustus in speciem, et quasi gratificetur populo Romano, et primoribus urbis; revera ut sibi confideret: nam habuit in animo comprimere nimiam quorundam procacitatem in loquendo, à quâ nec ipse exemptus fuit. Nihil suo nomine comperere erat inviduosum, sed alieno facile et utile. Ergo specie legis tractavit, quasi populi Romani Majestatis infamaretur." This, I think, is a sufficient comment on that passage of Tacitus; I will add only, by the way, that the whole family of the Cæsars, and all their relations, were included in the law; because Majesty of the Romans, in the time of the empire was wholly in that house; "omnia Cæsar erat: they were all accounted sacred who belonged to him. As for Cassius Severus, he was contemned with Horace; and was the same poet against whom he writes in his epodes, under this title: "In Cassium Severum maledicum poetam;" perhaps intending to kill two crows, according to their own proverb, with one stone, and revenge both himself and his emperor together.

From hence I may reasonably conclude, that Augustus, who was not altogether so good as was said, had some respect in the enacting of this law: for to do any thing for nothing, is not his maxim. Horace, as he was a courtier, complied with the interest of his master; avoiding the lashing of greater crimes, confined himself to the ridiculing of petty-vices, and common follies; excepting only some reserved in his Odes and Epodes, of his own particular quarrels, which, either with permission of the magistrate, or without it, every man will reveal.

though I say not that he should; for prior le fit, is a good excuse in the civil law, if Christianity had not taught us to forgive. However, he was not the proper man to arraign great vices, at least if the stories which we hear of him are true, that he practised some, which I will not here mention, out of honour to him. It was not for a Clodius to accuse adulterers, especially when Augustus was not of that number: so that though his age was exempted from the worst of villainies, there was no freedom left to reprehend them, by reason of the dict. And our poet was not fit to represent them in an odious character, because himself was dipt in the same actions. Upon this account, without farther insisting on the different tempers of Juvenal and Horace, I conclude, that the subjects which Horace chose for satire, are of a lower nature than those of which Juvenal has written.

Thus I have treated, in a new method, the comparison betwixt Horace, Juvenal, and Persius; somewhat of their particular manner belonging to all of them is yet remaining to be considered. Persius was grave, and particularly opposed his ravity to lewdness, which was the predominant vice in Nero's court, at the time when he published his satires, which was before that emperor fell into the excess of cruelty. Horace was a mild dmonisher, a court satirist, fit for the gentle times of Augustus, and more fit, for the reasons I have already given. Juvenal was as proper for his times, as they for theirs: his was an age that deserved a more severe chastisement: vices were more gross and open, more flagitious, more encouraged by the example of a tyrant, and more protected by his authority. Therefore, wheresoever Juvenal mentions Nero, he means Domitian, whom he dares not attack in his own person, but scourges him by proxy. Heinsius urges in praise of Horace, that, according to the ancient art and use of satire, it should be nearer to comedy than tragedy; not declaiming against vice, but only laughing at it. Neither Persius nor Juvenal were ignorant of this, for they had both studied Horace. And the thing itself is plainly true. But as they ad read Horace, they had likewise read Lucilius, of whom Persius says, "securit Urbem; & genitum fregit in illis;" meaning Mutius and Laus: and Juvenal also mentions him in these words: "Ense velut stricto, quotius Lucilius ardens infremuit." &c. So that they thought the imitation of Lucilius was more proper to their purpose than that of Horace. They changed satire, says Holiday; but they changed it for the better: the business being to reform great vices, chastisement goes farther than admonition; whereas perpetual grin, like that of Horace, does rather rather than amend a man.

Thus far that learned critic, Barten Holiday, whose interpretation and illustrations of Juvenal are as excellent, as the verse of his translation and his English are lame and pitiful. For it is not enough to give us the meaning of a poet, which I acknowledge him to have performed most faithfully, but he must also imitate his genius, and his numbers, as far as the English will come up to the elegance of the original. In few words, it only for a poet to translate a poet. Holiday and Stapylton had not enough considered this, when they attempted Juvenal: but I forbear reflections; only I beg leave to take notice of this sentence, where Holiday says, "a perpetual grin, like that of Horace, rather angers than amends a man." I cannot give him up the manner of Horace, in low satire, so easily: let the chastisement of Juvenal be never so necessary for his new kind of satire; let him declaim as wittily and sharply as he pleases, yet still the nicest and most delicate touches of satire consist in fine raillery. This, my Lord, is your particular talent, to which even Juvenal could not arrive. It is not reading, it is not imitation of an author, which can produce his fineness: it must be inborn, it must proceed from a genius, and particular way of thinking, which is not to be taught; and therefore not to be imitated by him who has it not from nature: how easy is it to call rogue and villain, and that wittily! But how hard to make a man appear a fool, a blockhead, or a knave, without using any of those opprobrious terms! To spare the grossness of the names, and to do the thing yet more severely, is to draw a full face, and to make the nose and cheeks stand out, and yet not to employ any depth of shadowing. This is the mystery of that noble trade, which yet no master can teach to his apprentice: he may give the rules, but the scholar is never the nearer in his practice. Neither is it true, that this fineness of raillery is offensive. A witty man is tickled while he is hurt in this manner; and a fool feels it not. The occasion of an offence may possibly be given, but he cannot take it. If it be granted, that in effect this way does more mischief; that a man is secretly wounded, and though he be not sensible himself, yet the malicious world will find it out for him; yet there is still a vast difference betwixt the slovenly butchering of a man, and the fineness of a stroke that separates the head from the body, and leaves it standing in its place. A man may be capable, as Jack Ketch's wife said of his servant, of a plain piece of work, a bare hanging; but to make a malefactor die sweetly, was only belonging to her husband. I wish I could apply it to myself: if the reader would be kind enough to think it belongs to me. The character of Zimri in my Ab-salom, is, in my opinion, worth the whole poem: it is not bloody, but it is ridiculous enough: and he for whom it was intended, was too witty to resent it as an injury. If I had railed, I might have suffered for it justly; but I managed mine own works more happily, perhaps more dextrously. I avoided the mention of great crimes, and applied myself to the representing of blind-fides, and little extravagancies: to which, the wittier a man is, he is generally the more obnoxious. It succeeded as I wished; the jest went round, and he was laughed at in his turn who began the frolic.

And thus, my Lord, you see I have preferred the manner of Horace, and of your Lordship, in the kind satire, to that of Juvenal; and I think, reasonably. Holiday ought not to have arraigned so great an author, for that which was his excellency and his merit: or if he did, on such a palpable mistake, he might expect that some one might possibly arise, either in his own time, or atter him, to rectify his error, and restore to Horace that commendation, of which he has so unjustly robbed him. And let the manes of Juvenal forgive me, if I say, that this way of Horace was the best for amending manners, as it is the most difficult. His was, an "ense rescindendum;" but that of Horace was a pleasant cure, with all the limbs preserved entirely; and, as our mountebanks tell us in their bills, without keeping the patient within doors for a day. What they promise only, Horace has effectually performed: yet I contradict not the proposition which I formerly advanced: Juvenal's times required a more painful kind of operation: but if he had lived in the age of Horace, I must needs affirm, that he had it not about him. He took the method which was prescribed him by his own genius; which was sharp and eager; he could not rally, but he could declaim; and as his provocations were great, he has revenged them tragically. This, notwithstanding, I am to say another word, which, as true as it is, will yet displease the partial admirers of our Horace. I have hinted it before; but it is time for me now to speak more plainly.

This manner of Horace is indeed the best; but Horace has not executed it altogether so happily, at least not often. The manner of Juvenal is confessed to be inferior to the former; but Juvenal has excelled him in his performance. Juvenal has railed more wittily than Horace has rallied. Horace meant to make his reader laugh; but he is not sure of his experiment. Juvenal always intends to move your indignation; and he always brings about his purpose. Horace, for aught I know, might have tickled the people of his age; but amongst the moderns he is not so successful. They who say he entertains so pleasantly, may perhaps value themselves on the quickness of their own understandings, that they can see a jest farther off than other men: they may find occasion of laughter in the wit-battle of the two buffoons, Sarmenius and Sicerus; and hold their sides for fear of bursting, when Rupilius and Perſius are scolding. For my own part, I can only like the characters of all four, which are judiciously given: but for my heart I cannot so much as smile at their insipid raillery. I see not why Perſius should call upon Brutus to revenge him on his adversary; and that because he had killed Julius Cæsar for endeavouring to be a king; therefore he should be desired to murder Rupilius, only because his name was Mr. King. A miserable clench, in my opinion, for Horace to record: I have heard honest Mr. Swan make many a better, and yet have had the grace to hold my countenance. But it may be puns were then in fashion, as they were wit in the sermons of the last age, and in the court of King Charles II. I am sorry to say it, for the sake of Horace; but certain it is, that he has no fine palate who can feed so heartily on garbage.

But I have already wearied myself, and doubt not but I have tired your Lordship's patience, with this long, rambling, and I fear trivial discourse. Upon the one half of the merits, that is, pleasure I cannot but conclude that Juvenal was the better satirist: they who will descend into his particular praises, may find them at large in the dissertation of the learned Rigaltius to Thuanus. As for Perſius, I have given the reason why I think him inferior to both of them: yet I have one thing to add on that subject.

Barten Holiday, who translated both Juvenal and Perſius, has made this distinction betwixt them, which is no less true than witty; That, in Perſius, the difficulty is to find a meaning; in Juvenal to choose a meaning: so crabbed is Perſius, and so copious is Juvenal: so much the understanding is employed in one, and so much the judgment in the other. So difficult is it to find any sense in the former, and the best sense of the latter.

If, on the other side, any one suppose I have commended Horace below his merit, when I have allowed him but the second place, I desire him to consider, if Juvenal, a man of excellent natural endowments, besides the advantages of diligence and study, and coming after him, and building upon his foundations, might not probably, with all these helps, surpass him? And whether it be any dishonour to Horace to be thus surpassed; since no art, or science, is at once begun and perfected; but that it must pass first through many hands and even through several ages? If Lucilius could add to Ennius, and Horace to Lucilius, why, without any diminution to the fame of Horace, might not Juvenal give the last perfection to that work? Or rather, what disreputation is it to Horace that Juvenal excels in the tragical satire, as Horace does in the comical? I have read over attentively both Heinſius and Dacier, in their commendations of Horace: but I can find no more in either of them, for the preference of him to Juvenal, than the instructive part; the part of wisdom and not that of pleasure; which therefore is her allowed him, notwithstanding what Scaliger and Rigaltius have pleaded to the contrary for Juvenal. And, to show that I am impartial, I will here translate what Dacier has said on that subject.

I cannot give a more just idea of the two books of satires made by Horace, than by comparing them to the statues of the Seleni, to which Alcibiades compares Socrates, in the Symposium. They were figures, which had nothing of agreeable, nothing of beauty on their outside: but when any one took the pains to open them, and search into them, he there found the figures of the deities. So, in the shape that Horace prefer himself to us, in his satires, we see nothing at first view which deserves our attention. It fees that he is rather an amusement for children, than for the serious consideration of men: but when we take away his crust, and that which hides him from our sight, when we discover him to the bottom, then we find all the divinities in a full assembly: that is to say, all the virtues which ought to be the continual exercise of those, who seriously endeavour to correct their vices.

It is easy to observe, that Dacier, in this not dissimilitude, has confined the praise of his author wholly to the instructive part; the commendations turn on this, and so does that which follows.

In these two books of satire, it is the business to instruct us how to combat our vices, to regulate our passions, to follow nature, to give us to our desires, to distinguish betwixt truth and falsehood, and betwixt our conception of things, and things themselves: to come back in our prejudicate opinions, to understand exactly the principles and motives of all our actions; and to avoid the ridicule, into which all men necessarily fall, who are intoxicated with those notions which they have received from their masters: and which they obstinately retain, without examining whether or no they be founded on right reason.

In a word, he labours to render us happy in relation to ourselves, agreeable and faithful to our friends, and discreet, serviceable, and well-bred in relation to those with whom we are obliged to be, and to converse. To make his figures intelligible, to conduct his readers through the labyrinth of some perplexed sentence, or obscure parenthesis, is no great matter: and, as Epictetus says, there is nothing of beauty in all this, or what is worthy of a prudent man. The principal business, and which is of most importance to us, is to show the use, the reason, and the proof of his precepts.

They who endeavour not to correct themselves, according to y<sup>e</sup> exact a model, are just like the patients, who have open before them a book of admirable receipts for their diseases, and please themselves with reading it, without comprehending the nature of the remedies, or how to apply them to their cure.

Let Horace go off with these encomiums, which he has so well deserved.

To conclude the contention betwixt our three poets, I will use the words of Virgil, in his fifth eclogue, when Æneas proposes the rewards of the first-race, to the three first who should reach the goal. "Tres præmia primi accipient, flavaque apud necentur olivâ." Let these three ancients be preferred to all the moderns; as first arriving at the goal: let them all be crowned as victors, with the wreath that properly belongs to laurel. But, after that, with this distinction amongst themselves, "Primus equum phaleris insignem victor habeto." Let Juvenal ride first in triumph. "Alter Amazoniam pharetram, plenamque sagittis Threiciis, lato quam circumplectitur auro balteus, & tereti subnectit gula gemma." Let Horace, who is the second, and but just the second, carry off the quiver and the arrows, as the badges of his satire; as the golden-belt, and the diamond-button. "Tertius, Argolic hoc Clypeo contentus abito." And let Persius, the last of the three first worthies, be contented with this Grecian shield, and with glory, not only over all the Grecians, who were ignorant of the Roman satire, but over all the moderns in succeeding ages; excepting Boileau and your Lordship.

And thus I have given the history of satire, and divided it from Ennius, to your Lordship; that is, in its first rudiments of barbarity, to its last polishing and perfection; which is, with Virgil, in address to Augustus,

"—nomen famâ tot ferre per annos,
"Tithoni primâ quot abest ab origine Cæsar."

I said only from Ennius; but I may safely carry it higher, as far as Livius Andronicus; who, as I have said formerly, taught the first play at Rome, in the year "ab urbe conditâ cccclxxiv." I have since desired my learned friend, Mr. Maidwell, to compute the difference of times, betwixt Aristophanes and Livius Andronicus, and he assures me from the best chronologers, that Plutus, the last of Aristophanes's plays, was represented at Athens, in the year of the 97th Olympiad; which agrees with the year Urbs condita cccclxxiv. So that the difference of years betwixt Aristophanes and Andronicus is 150; from whence I have probably deduced, that Livius Andronicus, who was a Grecian, had read the plays of the old comedy, which were satirical, and also of the new; for Menander was fifty years before him, which must needs be a great light to him, in his own plays, that were of the satirical nature. That the Romans had farces before this, it is true; but then they had no communication with Greece: so that Andronicus was the first who wrote after the manner of the old comedy, in his plays; he was imitated by Ennius, about thirty years afterwards. Though the former writ fables; the latter, speaking properly, began the Roman satire. According to that description, which Juvenal gives of it in his first; "quicquid agunt homines, votum, timor, ira, voluptas, gaudia, discursus, nostri est farrago libelli." This is that in which I have made bold to differ from Casaubon, Rigaltius, Dacier, and indeed from all the modern critics, that not Ennius, but Andronicus was the first, who by the Archæa Comœdia of the Greeks, added many beauties to the first rude and barbarous Roman satire: which sort of poem, though we had not derived from Rome, yet nature teaches it mankind, in all ages, and in every country.

It is but necessary, that, after so much has been said of satire, some definition of it should be given. Heinsius, in his dissertation on Horace, makes it for me, in these words; "Satire is a kind of poetry, without a series of action, invented for the purging of our minds; in which human vices, ignorance, and errors, and all things besides, which are produced from them, in every man, are severely reprehended; partly dramatically, partly simply, and sometimes in both kinds of speaking; but for the most part figuratively, and occultly; consisting in a low familiar way, chiefly in a sharp and pungent manner of speech; but partly, also, in a facetious and civil way of jesting: by which either hatred, or laughter, or indignation, is moved." Where I cannot but observe, that this obscure and perplexed definition, or rather description of satire, is wholly accommodated to the Horatian way; and excluding the works of Juvenal and Persius, as foreign from that kind of poem: the clause in the beginning of it ("without a series of action") distinguishes satire properly from stage-plays, which are all of one action, and one continued series of action. The end or scope of satire is to purge the passions; so far it is common to the satires of Juvenal and Persius: the rest which follows, is also generally belonging to all three; till he comes upon us, with the excluding clause "consisting in a low familiar way of speech," which is the proper character of Horace; and from which, the other two, for their honour be it spoken, are far distant: but how come lowness of style, and the familiarity of words, to be so much the propriety of satire, that without them, a poet can be no more a satirist, than without risibility he can be a man? Is the fault of Horace to be made the virtue and standing rule of this poem? Is the grande soppbos of Persius, and the sublimity of Juvenal to be circumscribed, with the meanness of words, and vulgarity of expression? If Horace refused the pains of numbers, the loftiness of figures, are they bound to follow so ill a precedent? Let him walk a-foot with his pad in his hand, for his own pleasure; but let not them be accounted no poets, who choose to mount and show their horsemanship. Holiday is not afraid to say, that there never was such a fall, as from his odes to satires, and that he, injuriously to himself, untuned his harp. The majestic way of Persius and Juvenal was new when they began it, but it is old to us; and what poems have not, with time, received an alteration in their fashion? Which alteration, says Holiday, is to after times, as good a warrant as the first. Has not Virgil changed the manners of Homer's heroes in his Æneid? Certainly he has, and for the better. For Virgil's age was more civilized, and better bred: and he writ according to the politeness of Rome, under the reign of Augustus Caesar; not to the rudeness of Agamemnon's age, or the times of Homer. Why should we offer to confine free spirits to one form, when we cannot so much as confine our bodies to one fashion of apparel? Would not Donne's satires, which abound with so much wit, appear more charming, if he had taken care of his words, and of his numbers? But he followed Horace so very close, that of necessity he must fall with him: and I may safely say it of this present age, that if we are not so great wits as Donne, yet certainly, we are better poets.

But I have said enough, and it may be too much, on this subject. Will your Lordship be pleased to prolong my audience, only so far, till I tell you my own trivial thoughts how a modern satire should be made. I will not deviate in the least from the precepts and examples of the ancients, who were always our best masters. I will only illustrate them, and discover some of the hidden beauties in their designs, that we thereby may form our own in imitation of them. Will you please but to observe, that Persius, the least in dignity of all the three, has notwithstanding been the first, who has discovered to us this important secret, in the designing of a perfect satire, that it ought only to treat of one subject; to be confined to one particular theme; or, at least, to one principally. If other vices occur in the management of the chief, they should only be transiently lashed, and not be insisted on, so as to make the design double. As in a play of the English fashion, which we call a tragi-comedy, there is to be but one main design: and though there be an underplot, or second-walk of comical characters and adventures, yet they are subservient to the chief fable, carried along under it, and helping to it; so that the drama may not seem a monster with two heads. Thus the Copernican system of the planets makes the moon to be moved by the motion of the earth, and carried about her orb, as a dependent of hers. Mafcardi, in his discourse of the "Doppia favola," or double tale in plays, gives an instance of it, in the famous pastoral of Guarini, called "Il Pastor Fido;" where Corfica and the satire are the under-parts: yet we may observe, that Corfica is brought into the body of the plot, and made subservient to it. It is certain that the divine wit of Horace was not ignorant of this rule, that a play, though it consists of many parts, must yet be one in the action, and must drive on the accomplishment of one design; for he gives this very precept, "Sit quodvis simplex duntaxat & unum;" yet he seems not much to mind it in his satires, many of them consisting of more arguments than one; and the second without dependence on the first. Gafaubon has observed this before me, in his preference of Persius to Horace: and will have his own beloved author to be the first, who found out, and introduced this method of confining himself to one subject. I know it may be urged in defence of Horace, that this unity is not necessary; because the very word satira signifies a dish plentifully stored with all variety of fruit and grains. Yet Juvenal, who calls his poems a farrago, which is a word of the same signification with satira, has chosen to follow the same method of Persius, and not of Horace. And Boileau, whose example alone is a sufficient authority, has wholly confined himself, in all his satires, to this unity of design. That variety which is not to be found in any one satire, is at least, in many, written on several occasions. And if variety be of absolute necessity in every one of them, according to the etymology of the word; yet it may arise naturally from one subject, as it is diversely treated in the several subordinate branches of it; all relating to the chief. It may be illustrated accordingly with variety of examples in the subdivisions of it; and with a many precepts as there are members of it; which altogether may complete that olla, or hotch potch, which is properly a satire.

Under this unity of theme, or subject, is comprehended another rule for perfecting the design of true satire. The poet is bound, and that ex officio, to give his reader some one precept of moral virtue; and to caution him against some one particular vice or folly. Other virtues, subordinate to the first, may be recommended, under the chief head; and other vices or follies may be scourged, besides that which he principally intends. But he is chiefly to inculcate one virtue and insist on that. Thus Juvenal, in every satire, excepting the first, ties himself to one principal instructive point, or to the shunning of moral evil. Even in the sixth, which seems only an arraignment of the whole sex of womankind, there is a latent admonition to avoid ill women; b showing how very few, who are virtuous and good, are to be found amongst them. But this, though the wittiest of all his satires, has yet the least of truth or instruction in it. He has run himself into his old declamatory way, and almost forgotten that he was now setting up for a moral poet.

Perfius is never wanting to us in some profitable doctrine, and in exposing the opposite vices to it. His kind of philosophy is one, which is the Stoic; and every satire is a comment on one particular dogma of that sect; unless we will except the first, which is against bad writers; and yet even there he forgets not the precepts of the porch. In general, all virtues are every where to be praised and recommended to practice; and all vices to be reprehended, and made either odious or ridiculous; or else there is a fundamental error in the whole design.

I have already declared who are the only persons that are the adequate object of private satire, and who they are that may properly be exposed by name, for public examples of vices and follies: and therefore I will trouble your Lordship no farther with them. Of the best and finest manner of satire, I have said enough in the comparison betwixt Juvenal and Horace: it is that sharp, well-mannered way of laughing a folly out of countenance, of which your Lordship is the best master in this age. I will proceed to the versification, which is most proper for it, and add somewhat to what I have said already on that subject. The sort of verse which is called burlesque, consisting of eight syllables, or four feet, is that which our excellent Hudibras has chosen. I ought to have mentioned him before, when I spake of Donne; but by a slip of an old man's memory, he was forgotten. The worth of his poem is too well known to need any commendation, and he is above my censure: his satire is of the Varronian kind, though unmix'd with prose. The choice of his numbers is suitable enough to his design, as he has managed it: but in any other hand, the shortness of his verse, and the quick turns of rhyme, had debas'd the dignity of style. And besides, the double rhyme (a necessary companion of burlesque writing) is not so proper for manly satire, for it turns earnest too much to jest, and gives us a boyish kind of pleasure. It tickles awkwardly with a kind of pain, to the best sort of readers; we are pleas'd ungratefully, and if I may say so, against our liking. We thank him not for giving us that unseasonable delight, when we know he could have given us a better, and more solid. He might have left that task to others, who, not being able to put in thought, can only make us grin with the excrescence of a word of two or three syllables in the close. It is, indeed, below so great a master to make use of such a little instrument. But his good sense is perpetually shining through all he writes; it affords us not the time of finding faults. We pass through the levity of his rhyme, and are immediately carried into some admirable useful thought. After all, he has chosen this kind of verse; and has written the best in it: and had he taken another, he would always have excelled. As we say of a court-favourite, that whatsoever his office be, he still makes it uppermost, and most beneficial to himself.

The quickness of your imagination, my Lord, has already prevented me; and you know beforehand, that I would prefer the verse of ten syllables, which we call the English heroic, to that of eight. This is truly my opinion: for this sort of number is more roomy: the thought can turn itself with greater ease in a larger compass. When the rhyme comes too thick upon us, it straitens the expression; we are thinking of the close, when we should be employ'd in adorning the thought. It makes a poet giddy with turning in a space too narrow for his imagination; he loses many beauties, without gaining one advantage. For a burlesque rhyme, I have already concluded to be none; or if it were, it is more easily purchased in ten syllables than in eight: in both occasions it is as in a tennis-court, when the strokes of greater force are given, when we strike out and play at length. Tassone and Boileau have left us the best examples of this way, in the Secchia Rapita, and the Lutrin. And next them, Merlin Coccajus in his Baldus. I will speak only of the two former, because the last is written in Latin verse. The Secchia Rapita is an Italian poem, a satire of the Varronian kind. It is written in the stanza of eight, which is their measure for heroic verse. The words are stately, the numbers smooth, the turn both of thoughts and words is happy. The first six lines of the stanza seem majestic and severe; but the two last turn them all into a pleasant ridicule. Boileau, if I am not much deceived, has modelled from hence his famous Lutrin. He had read the burlesque poetry of Scarron, with some kind of indignation, as witty as it was, and found nothing in France that was worthy of his imitation. But he copied the Italian so well, that his own may pass for an original. He writes it in the French heroic verse, and calls it an heroic poem: his subject is trivial, but his verse is noble. I doubt not but he had Virgil in his eye, for we find many admirable imitations of him, and some parodies; as particularly this passage in the fourth of the Æneids:

“Nec tibi Diva parens; generis nec Dardanus “auctor,
“Perfide; sed duris genuit te cantibus horrens
“Caucasus; Hyrcanæque <sup>admor</sup>ant ubera ti“gres.”

Which he thus translates, keeping to the words, but altering the sense:

“Non, ton Pere a Paris, ne fut point Boulanger:
“Et tu n'es point du sang de Gervais Horo“loger:
“Ta Mere ne fut point la Maitresse d'un Coche;
“Caucaus dans ses flancs, te forma d'une Roché:
“Une Tigresse affreuse, en quelque Antre “écarté,
“Te fit, avec son lait, succer sa Cruauté.”

And as Virgil in his fourth Georgic of the Bees, perpetually raises the lowness of his subject, by the loftiness of his words; and ennobles it by comparisons drawn from empires, and from monarchs.

“Admiranda tibi levium spectacula rerum, “Magnanimosque Duces, totiusque ordine “gentis
 “Mores et studia, et populos, et prælia dicam.”

And again :

“Sic Genus immortale manent; multosque
 “per annos
 “Stat fortuna domus, et avi numerantur a-“vorum.”

We see Boileau pursuing him in the same flights; and scarcely yielding to his master. This, I think, my Lord, to be the most beautiful, and most noble kind of satire. Here is the majesty of the heroic, finely mixed with the venom of the other; and raising the delight which otherwise would be flat and vulgar, by the sublimity of the expression. I could say somewhat more of the delicacy of this and some other of his satires; but it might turn to his prejudice, if it were carried back to France.

I have given your Lordship but this bare hint, in what manner this sort of satire may best be managed. Had I time, I could enlarge on the beautiful turns of words and thoughts; which are as requisite in this, as in heroic poetry itself; of which the satire is undoubtedly a species. With these beautiful turns I confess myself to have been unacquainted, till about twenty years ago, in a conversation which I had with that noble wit of Scotland, Sir George Mackenzie: he asked me why I did not imitate in my verses the turns of Mr. Waller and Sir John Denham; of which he repeated many to me. I had often read with pleasure, and with some profit, those two fathers of our English poetry; but had not seriously enough considered those beauties which give the last perfection to the works. Some sprinklings of this kind I had also formerly in my plays; but they were casual, and not designed. But this hint, thus seasonably given me, first made me sensible of my own wants, and brought me afterwards to seek for the supply of them in other English authors. I looked over the darling of my youth, the famous Cowley; there I found, instead of them, the points of wit, and quirks of epigram, even in the Davids, an heroic poem, which is of an opposite nature to those puerilities; but no elegant turns either on the word or on the thought. Then I consulted a greater genius (without offence to the manes of that noble author); I mean Milton: but as he endeavours every where to express Homer, whose age had not arrived to that fineness, I found in him a true sublimity, lofty thoughts, which were clothed with admirable Grecisms, and ancient words, which he had been digging from the mines of Chaucer and Spenser, and which, with all their rusticity, had somewhat of venerable in them. But I found not there neither that for which I looked. At last I had recourse to his master, Spenser, the author of that immortal poem called the Fairy Queen; and there I met with that which I had been looking for so long in vain. Spenser had studied Virgil to as much advantage as Milton had done Homer; and among the rest of his excellencies had copied that. Looking farther into the Italian, I found Tasso had done the same; may more, that all the sonnets in that language, are on the turn of the first thought; which Mr. Walsh, in his late ingenious preface to his poems, has observed. In short, Virgil and Ovid are the two principal fountains of them in Latin poem. And the French at this day are so fond of them, that they judge them to be the first beauties. “Delicate et bien tourné,” are the highest commendations which they bestow on somewhat which they think a masterpiece.

An example on the turn of words, amongst a thousand others, is that in the last book of Ovid's Metamorphoses:

“Heu quantum scelus est, in viscera, viscera “condi!
 “Congestoque avidum pinguescere corpore cor-“Alteriusque, animantem animantis vivere
 “læto!”

An example on the turn both of thoughts and words, is to be found in Catullus; in the complaint of Ariadne, when she was left by Theseus:

“Tum jam nulla viro juranti foemina credat;
 “Nulla viri speret sermones esse fideles:
 “Qui dum aliquid cupiens animus prægessit “apici,
 “Nil metuunt jurare; nihil promittere parcunt.
 “Sed simul ac cupidæ mentis fatiata libido est,
 “Dicta nihil metueri; nihil perjuria curant.”

An extraordinary turn upon the words, is that in Ovid's Epistolæ Heriodum, of Sappho to Phaon:

“Si nisi quæ formâ poterit te digna videri,
 “Nulla futura tua est; nulla futura tua est.”

Lastly, a turn which I cannot say is absolutely on words, for the thoughts turn with them, is in the fourth Georgic of Virgil; where Orpheus is to receive his wife from hell, on express condition not to look on her till she was come on earth:

“Cum subita incautum dementia cepit Aman“tem;
 “Ignoscenda quidem, scirent si ignoscere ma-
 “nes.”

I will not burden your Lordship with more of them; for I write to a master who understands them better than myself. But I may safely conclude them to be great beauties: I might descend also to the mechanic beauties of heroic verse; but we have yet no English prosodia, not so much as a tolerable dictionary, or a grammar; so that our language is in a manner barbarous; and what government will encourage any one, or more, who are capable of refining it, I know not: but nothing under a public expence can go through with it. And I rather fear a declination of the language, than hope an advancement of it in the present age.

I am still speaking to you, my Lord: though, in all probability, you are already out of hearing. Nothing, which my meanness can produce, is worthy of this long attention. But I am come to he last petition of Abraham: if there be ten righteous lines in this vast preface, spare it for their sake; and also spare the next city, because it is but a little one.

I would excuse the performance of this translation, if it were all my own; but the better, though not the greater part, being the work of some gentlemen, who have succeeded very happily in their undertaking; let their excellencies tone for my imperfections, and those of my sons.

I have perused some of the satires, which are gone by other hands; and they seem to me as perfect in their kind, as any thing I have seen in English verse. The common way which we have taken, is not a literal translation, but a kind of paraphrase; or somewhat which is yet more loose, betwixt a paraphrase and imitation. It was not possible for us, or any men, to have made it pleasant any other way. If rendering the exact sense of those authors, almost line for line, had been our business, Barten Holiday had done it already in our hands: and, by the help of his learned notes and illustrations, not only Juvenal and Persius, but what is yet more obscure, his own verses might be understood.

But he wrote for fame, and wrote to scholars: we write only for the pleasure and entertainment of those gentlemen and ladies, who, though they are not scholars, are not ignorant: persons of understanding and good sense, who not having been conversant in the original, or at least not having made Latin verse so much their business as to be critics in it, would be glad to find, if the wit of our two great authors be answerable to their fame and reputation in the world. We have therefore endeavoured to give the public all the satisfaction we are able in this kind.

And if we are not altogether so faithful to our author, as our predecessors, Holiday and Stapylton; yet we may challenge to ourselves this praise, that we shall be far more pleasing to our readers. We have followed our authors at greater distance, though not step by step, as they have done. For oftentimes they have gone so close, that they have trod on the heels of Juvenal and Persius, and hurt them by their too near approach. A noble author would not be pursued too close by a translator. We lose his spirit, when we think to take his body. The grosser part remains with us, but the soul is flown away, in some noble expression, or some delicate turn of words or thought. Thus Holiday, who made this way his choice, seized the meaning of Juvenal; but the poetry has always escaped him.

They who will not grant me, that pleasure is one of the ends of poetry, but that it is only a means of compassing the only end, which is instruction; must yet allow, that without the means of pleasure, the instruction is but a bare and dry philosophy; a crude preparation of morals, which we may have from Aristotle and Epictetus, with more profit than from any poet: neither Holiday nor Stapylton have imitated Juvenal, in the poetical part of him, his diction and his elocution. Nor had they been poets, as neither of them were; yet in the way they took, it was impossible for them to have succeeded in the poetic part.

The English verse, which we call heroic, consists of more than ten syllables; the Latin hexameter sometimes rises to seventeen; as for example, this verse in Virgil:

“ Pulverulenta putrem sonitu quatit ungula
“ campum.”

Here is the difference of no less than seven syllables in a line betwixt the English and the Latin. Now the medium of these is about fourteen syllables; because the dactyle is a more frequent foot in hexameters than the spondee.

But Holiday, without considering that he writ with the disadvantage of four syllables less in every verse, endeavours to make one of his lines to comprehend the sense of one of Juvenal's. According to the falsity of the proposition was the success. He was forced to crowd his verse with ill-sounding monosyllables, of which our barbarous language affords him a wild plenty: and by that means he arrived at his pedantic end, which was to make a literal translation: his verses have nothing of verse in them, but only the worst part of it, the rhyme; and that, into the bargain, is far from good. But, which is more intolerable, by cramming his ill-chosen, and worse-sounding monosyllables so close together, the very sense, which he endeavours to explain, is become more obscure than that of his author. So that Holiday himself cannot be understood, without as large a commentary, as that which he makes on his two authors. For my own part, I can make a shift to find the meaning of Juvenal without his notes: but his translation is more difficult than his author. And I find beauties in the Latin to recompense my pains; but in Holiday and Stapylton, my ears, in the first place, are mortally offended; and then their sense is so perplexed, that I return to the original, as the more pleasing talk, as well as the more easy.

This must be said for our translation, that if we give not the whole sense of Juvenal, yet we give the most considerable part of it: we give it, in general, so clearly, that few notes are sufficient to make us intelligible. We make our author at least appear in a poetic dress. We have actually made him more sounding, and more elegant, than he was before in English: and have endeavoured to make him speak that kind of English, which he would have spoken had he lived in England, and had written to this age. If sometimes any of us (and it is but seldom) make him express the customs and manners of our native country, rather than of Rome, it is, either when there was some kind of analogy, betwixt their customs and ours; or when, to make him more easy to vulgar understandings, we give him those manners which are familiar to us. But I defend not this innovation, it is enough if I can excuse it. For, to speak sincerely, the manners of nations and ages are not to be confounded: we should either make them English, or leave them Roman. If this can neither be defended, nor excused, let it be pardoned, at least, because it is acknowledged: and so much the more easily, as being a fault which is never committed without some pleasure to the reader.

Thus, my Lord, having troubled you with a tedious visit, the best manners will be shown in the least ceremony. I will slip away while your back is turned, and while you are otherwise employed: with great confusion for having entertained you so long with this discourse; and for having no other recompence to make you, than the worthy labours of my fellow-undertakers in this work, and the thankful acknowledgments, prayers, and perpetual good wishes, of,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's

Most obliged, most humble,

And most obedient Servant,

Aug. 18. 1692.

JOHN DRYDEN

S A T I R E I.

TRANSLATED BY MR. DRYDEN.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE poet gives us first a kind of humourous reason for his writing: that, being provoked by hearing so many ill poets rehearse their works, he does himself justice on them, by giving them as bad as they bring. But, since no man will rank himself with ill writers, it is easy to conclude, that such wretches could draw an audience, he thought it no hard matter to excel them, and gain greater esteem with the public. Next he informs us more openly, why he rather addicts himself to satire, than any other kind of poetry. And here he discovers that it is not so much his indignation to ill poets, as to ill men, which has prompted him to write. He therefore gives us a summary and general view of the vices and follies reigning in his time. So that this first satire is the natural ground-work of all the rest. Herein he confines himself to no one subject, but strikes it differently at all men in his way: in every following satire he has chosen some particular more which he would inculcate; and lashes some particular vice or folly (an art with which our lat pooners are not much acquainted). But our poet being desirous to reform his own age, but not daring to attempt it by an overt-act of naming living persons, inveighs only against those who were infamous in the times immediately preceding his, whereby he not only gives a fair warning to great men, that their memory lies at the mercy of future poets and historians, but also, with finer stroke of his pen, brands even the living, and persouates them under dead men's names.

I have avoided as much as I could possibly, the borrowed learning of marginal notes and illustration and for that reason have translated this satire somewhat largely. And freely own (if it be a fault that I have likewise omitted most of the proper names, because I thought they would not much edify the reader. To conclude, if in two or three places I have deserted all the commentators, it is because they first deserted my author, or at least have left him in so much obscurity, that too much room is left for guessing.

STILL shall I hear, and never quit the score,
Stunn'd with hoarse Codrus' Theſeid, o'er and o'er?
Shall this man's elegies and t' other's play
Unpunish'd murder a long summer's day?
Huge Telephus, a formidable page,
Cries vengeance; and Orestes' bulky rage
Unsatisfy'd with margins closely writ,
Poems o'er the covers, and not finish'd yet.
No man can take a more familiar note
Of his own home, than I of Vulcan's grot,
Or Mars his grove, or hollow winds that blow
From Ætna's top, or tortur'd ghosts below.
I know by rote the fam'd exploits of Greece;
The centaurs' fury, and the golden fleece;
Through the thick shades th' eternal scribbler
bawls,

And shades the statues on their pedestals.
The best and worst on the same theme employs
His muse, and plagues us with an equal noise.

Provok'd by these incorrigible fools,
I left declaiming in pedantic schools;

Where, with men-boys, I strove to get renown,
Advising Sylla to a private gown.
But, since the world with writing is possest,
I'll versify in spite; and do my best,
To make as much waste paper as the rest.

But why I lift aloft the Satire's rod,
And tread the path which fam'd Lucilius trod,
Attend the causes which my muse have led:
When sapless eunuchs mount the marriage-bed,
When mannish Mevia, that two-handed whore,
Astride on horseback hunts the Tuscan boar,
When all our lords are by his wealth outy'd,
Whose razor on my callow beard was try'd;
When I behold the spawn of conquer'd Nile,
Crispinus, both in birth and manners vile,
Pacing in pomp, with cloak of Tyrian dye,
Chang'd oit a-day for needles luxury;
And finding oft occasion to be fann'd,
Ambitious to produce his lady-hand;
Charg'd with light summer rings his fingers sweet
Unable to support a gem of weight:

Such fulsome objects meeting every where,
 'Tis hard to write, but harder to forbear.
 To view so lewd a town, and to refrain,
 What hoops of iron could my spleen contain!
 When pleading Matho, borne abroad for air,
 With his fat paunch fills his new-fashion'd chair,
 And, after him, the wretch in pomp convey'd,
 Whose evidence his lord and friend betray'd,
 And but the with'd occasion does attend,
 From the poor nobles the last spoils to rend,
 Whom ev'n spies dread as their superior fiend,
 And bribe with presents; or, when presents fail,
 They send their prostituted wives for bail:
 When night-performance holds the place of merit,
 And brawn and back the next of kin disherit;
 For such good parts are in preferment's way,
 The rich old madam never fails to pay
 Her legacies, by nature's standard given,
 One gains an ounce, another gains eleven:
 A dear-bought bargain, all things duly weigh'd,
 For which their thrice-concocted blood is paid.
 With looks as wan, as he who in the brake
 At unawares has trod upon a snake;
 Or play'd at Lyons a declaiming prize,
 For which the vanquish'd rhetorician dies.

What indignation boils within my veins,
 When perjurd guardians, proceed with impious gains,
 Choke up the streets, too narrow for their trains!
 Whose wards, by want betray'd, to crimes are led

Too foul to name, too fulsome to be read!
 When he who pill'd his province scapes the laws,
 And keeps his money, though he lost his cause:
 His fine begg'd off, contemns his infamy,
 Can rise at twelve, and get him drunk ere three:
 Enjoys his exile, and, condemn'd in vain,
 Leaves thee, prevailing province, to complain?

Such villain'es rous'd Horace into wrath:
 And 'tis more noble to pursue his path,
 Than an old tale of Diomed repeat,
 Or labouring after Hercules to sweat,
 Or wandering in the winding maze of Crete;
 Or with the winged smith aloft to fly,
 Or fluttering perish with his foolish boy,

With what impatience must the muse behold
 The wife, by her procuring husband sold!
 For though the law makes null th' adulterer's deed
 Of lands to her, the cuckold may succeed;
 Who his taught eyes up to th' ceiling throws,
 And sleeps all over but his wakeful nose.
 When he dares hope a colonel's command,
 Whose couriers kept, ran out his father's land;
 Who yet a stripling, Nero's chariot drove,
 Whirl'd o'er the streets, while his vauv maffer strove

With boasted art to please his eunuch-love.
 Would it not make a modest author dare
 To draw his table-book within the square,
 And fill with notes, when lolling at his ease,
 Mæcenas-like, the happy rogue he sees
 Borne by six weary'd slaves in open view,
 Who cancel'd an old will, and forg'd a new:
 Made wealthy at the small expence of signing
 With a wet seal, and a fresh interlining?
 The lady, next, requires a lashing line,
 Who squeeze'd a toad into her husband's wine:

So well the fashionable medicine thrives,
 That now 'tis practis'd ev'n by country wives:
 Poisoning, without regard of fame or fear:
 And spotted corple are frequent on the Bier.
 Would'st thou to honours and preferments climb?
 Be bold in mischief, dare some mighty crime,
 Which dungeons, death, or banishment deserves:
 For virtue is but drily prais'd, and starves.
 Great men, to great crimes, owe their plate em-
 Fair palaces, and furniture of cost; } [boft, }
 And high commands: a sneaking sin is lost.
 Who can behold that rank old lecher keep
 His son's corrupted wife, and hope to sleep?
 Or that male-harlot, or that unledg'd boy,
 Eager to sin, before he can enjoy?
 If nature could not, anger would indite
 Such woful stuff as I or Shadwell write.

Count from the time, since old Deucalion's boat,
 Rais'd by the flood, did on Parnassus float;
 And, scarcely mooring on the cliff, implor'd
 An oracle how man might be restor'd;
 When soften'd stones and vital breath ensu'd,
 And virgins naked were by lovers view'd;
 What ever since that golden age was done,
 What human kind desires, and what they shun,
 Rage, passions, pleasures, impotence of will,
 Shall this satirical collection fill.

What age so large a crop of vices bore,
 Or when was avarice extended more?
 When were the dice with more profusion thrown?
 The well-fill'd sob not empty'd now alone,
 But gamesters for whole patrimonies play;
 The steward brings the deeds which must convey

The lost estate: what more than madness reigns,
 When one short sitting many hundreds drains,
 And not enough is left him to supply
 Board-wages, or a footman's livery?

What age so many summer-seats did see?
 Or which of our forefathers far'd so well,
 As on seven dishes, at a private meal?
 Clients of old were feasted; now a poor
 Divided dole is dealt at th' outward door;
 Which by the hungry rout is soon dispatch'd:
 The paltry largess, too, severely watch'd,
 Ere given; and every face observ'd with care,
 That no intruding guests usurp a share.

Known, you receive: the crier calls aloud
 Our old nobility of Trojan-blood, } [food, }
 Who gape among the crowd for their precarious
 The praetors, and the tribunes voice is heard;
 The freedman justles, and will be preferr'd;
 First come, first serv'd, he cries; and I, in spite
 Of your great lordships, will maintain my right.
 Though born a slave, though my torn ears are bord,

'Tis not the birth, 'tis money makes the Lord.
 The rent of five fair houses I receive;
 What greater honours can the purple give?
 The poor patrician is reduc'd to keep,
 In melancholy walks a grafter's sheep:
 Not Pallus nor Licinius had my treasure;
 Then let the sacred tribunes wait my leisure.
 Once a poor rogue, 'tis true, I trod the street,
 And trudg'd to Rome upon my naked feet:
 Gold is the greatest god; though yet we see
 No temples rais'd to money's majesty,

No altars fuming to her power divine,
Such as to valour, peace, and virtue shine,
And faith, and concord : where the stork on high }
Seems to salute her infant progeny :
Presaging pious love with her auspicious cry. }
But since our knights and senators account,
To what their sordid begging veils amount,
Judge what a wretched share the poor attends,
Whose whole subsistence on those alms depends !
Their household fire, their raiment, and their food,
Prevented by those harpies ; when a wood
Of litters thick besiege the donor's gate,
And begging lords and teeming ladies wait
The promis'd dole : nay, some have learn'd the trick

To beg for absent persons ; feign them sick,
Close mew'd in their sedans, for fear of air : }
And for their wives produce an empty chair. }
This is my spouse : dispatch her with her share. }
'Tis Galla : let her ladyship but peep :
No, sir, 'tis pity to disturb her sleep.

Such fine employments our whole days divide :
The salutations of the morning-tide
Call up the sun ; those ended, to the hall
We wait the patron, hear the lawyers bawl ;
Then to the statues ; where, amidst the race }
Of conquering Rome, some Arab shows his face, }
Inscrib'd with titles, and profanes the place ; }
Fit to be piss'd against, and somewhat more. }
The great man, home-conducted, shuts his door ;
Old clients, weary'd out with fruitless care,
Dismiss their hopes of eating, and despair.
'Though much against the grain forc'd to retire,
Buy roots for supper, and provide a fire.

Meantime his lordship lolls within at ease,
Pampering his paunch with foreign rarities ;
Both sea and land are ransack'd for the feast ;
And his own gut the sole invited guest.
Such plate, such tables, dishes dress'd so well,
That whole estates are swallow'd at a meal.
Ev'n parasites are banish'd from his board
(At once a sordid and luxurious lord) :
Prodigious throat, for which whole boars are dress'd
(A creature form'd to furnish out a feast).
But present punishment pursues his maw,
When surfeit'd and swell'd, the peacock raw

He bears into the bath ; whence want of breath
Repletions, apoplex, intestate death.
His fate makes table-talk, divulg'd with scorn,
And he, a jest, into his grave is borne.

No age can go beyond us ; future times
Can add no farther to the present crimes.
Our sons but the same things can wish and do ;
Vice is at stand, and at the highest flow.
Then, satire, spread thy sails ; take all the winds can blow.

Some may, perhaps, demand what muse can yield

Sufficient strength for such a spacious field ?
From whence can be deriv'd so large a vein,
Bold truth to speak, and spoken to maintain ?
When godlike freedom is so far bereft
The noble mind, that scarce the name is left ?
Ere scandalum magnatum was begot,
No matter if the great forgave or not :
But if that honest licence now you rake.

If into rogues omnipotent you take,
Death is your doom, impal'd upon a stake ;
Smear'd o'er with wax, and set on blaze, to lig
The streets, and make a dreadful fire by night.

Shall they who drench'd three uncles in a draug
Of poisonous juice be then in triumph brought,
Make lanes among the people where they go,
And, mounted high on downy chariots, throw
Disdainful glances on the crowd below ?
Be silent, and beware, if such you see ;
'Tis defamation but to say, That's he !
Against bold Turnus the great Trojan arm,
Amidst their strokes the poet gets no harm :
Achilles may in epic verse be slain,
And none of all his myrmidous complain :
Hylas may drop his pitcher, none will cry ;
Not if he drown himself for company :
But when Lucilius brandishes his pen,
And flashes in the face of guilty men,
A cold sweat stands in drops on every part ;
And rage succeeds to tears, revenge to smart :
Muse, be advis'd ; 'tis past considering time,
When enter'd once the dangerous lists of rhyme
Since none the living villains dare implead,
Arraign them in the persons of the dead.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE poet, in this satire, inveighs against the hypocrisy of the philosophers, and priests of his tin the effeminacy of military officers, and magistrates. Which corruption of manners in general, more particularly of unnatural vices, he imputes to the atheistical principle that then prevailed

I'M sick of Rome, and wish myself convey'd
Where freezing seas obstruct the merchants trade,
When hypocrites read lectures, and a sot,
Because into a gown and pulpit got,
Though surfeit-gorg'd, and reeking from the stews,
Nothing but abstinence for's theme will choose.

The rakehells to pretend to learning.—Why ?
Cryppus statue decks their library.
Who makes his closet finest is most read ;
The dolt that with an Aristotle's head,
Carv'd to the life, has once adorn'd his shelf,
Streight sets up for a Stagyrite himself.

Precise their look, but to the brothel come,
 You'll know the price of philosophic bum.
 You'd swear, if you there bristled hides survey'd,
 That for a bear's carcasses they are made;
 Yet of their obscene part they take such care,
 That (like baboons) they still keep podex bare;
 To see't so sleek and trimm'd the furgeon smiles,
 And scarcely can for laughing launce the piles.
 Since silence seems to carry wisdom's pow'r,
 Th' affected rogues, like clocks speak once an hour.
 Those grizzled locks which nature did provide,
 In plenteous growth, their asses ears to hide,
 The formal slaves reduce to a degree
 Short of their eye-brows.—Now I honour thee,
 I see Peribonius, thou profest he-whore,
 And all thy crimes impute to nature's score:
 Thou, as in harlots drests thou art attir'd,
 For ought I know, with harlots itch art fir'd,
 Thy form seems for the pathic trade design'd,
 And generously thou dost own thy kind.
 But what of those lewd miscreants must become,
 Who preach morality and shake the bum?

Varillus cries, shall I fear Sextus doom,
 Whose haunches are the common sink of Rome?
 Let him cry blackmoor-devil, whose skin is white
 And bandy-legs, who treats himself upright;
 Let him reprove that's innocent—In vain
 The Gracchi of sedition must complain. [spheres, Two'd make you swear the planets from their Shou'd Verres peach thieves, Milo murderers,
 Clodius tax bawds, Sethegus Catiline,
 Or Scylla's pupils Scylla's rules decline.
 Yet we have seen a modern magistrate
 Restore those rigid laws that did create
 In Mars and Venus dread; himself the while,
 With impious drugs and potions, did beguile
 The teeming Julia's womb, and thence did wrest
 Crude births, that yet th' incestuous fire confess,
 How shall such hypocrites reform the state,
 On whom the brothels can recriminate?

Of this we have an instance great and new
 In a cock-zealot of this preaching crew,
 Whose late harangue the gaping rabble drew,
 His theme, as fate wou'd hav't, was fornication,
 And as i'th' fury of his declamation,
 He cry'd, why sleeps the Julian law, that aw'd
 His voice?—Laronia, an industrious bawd,
 As bawds will run to lectures) nettled much
 To have her copy-hold so nearly touch'd,
 With a disdainful smile, reply'd, blest times,
 That made the censor of the age's crimes!
 Come now must needs reform, and vice be stopt,
 Ince a third Cato from the clouds is dropt.
 But tell me, Sir, what perfume strikes the air
 'or your most rev'rend neck o'ergrown with
 'or modestly we may presume, I trow [hair?
 'tis not your nat'ral grain—the price I'd know,
 And where 'tis sold; direct me to the street,
 And shop, for I with no such essence meet.
 Let me entreat you, Sir, for your own sake.
 Let caution, and permit the laws to take
 A harmless nap, lest the Scantinian wake.
 Our wise forefathers took their measures right,
 For wreak'd on fornicators all their spite,
 But left a limbo for the Sodomite.
 If you commission-courts must needs erect
 'or manners, put the test to your own sect.

But you by number think yourselves secure,
 While our thin squadron must the brunt endure.
 With grief I must confess our muster's few,
 And much with civil broils impair'd, while you }
 Are to the dev'l and to each other true.
 Your penal laws against us are enlarg'd,
 On whom no crimes, like what you act are charg'd.
 Flavia may now and then turn up for bread,
 But chastly with Catulla lies a bed.
 Your Hispo acts both sexes parts, before
 A fornicator; and behind, a whore:
 We ne'er invade your walks; the clients cause
 We leave to your confounding and the laws.
 If now and then an Amazonian dame
 Dares fight a public prize, 'tis sure less shame,
 Than to behold your unnerv'd sex set in
 To needle-work, and like a damsel spin.
 How Hister's bondman his sole heir became,
 And his conniving spouse so rich a dame,
 Is known; that wife with wealth must needs be
 Who is content to make a third in bed. [sped,
 You nymphs that would to coach and six arrive,
 Marry, keep counsel, and y're sure to thrive!
 Yet these obnoxious men, without remorse,
 Against our tribe will put the laws in force,
 Clip the dove's wing, and give the vulture }
 course,

Thus spoke the matron—the convicted crew
 From to direct a charge like lightning flew.
 It must be so—nor; vain Metellus, shall
 From Rome's tribunal, thy harangues prevail
 'Gainst harlotry, while thou art clad } thin,
 That through thy cobweb-robe we see thy skin
 As thou declaim'st—Fabulla is you say,
 A whore—I own it; so's Carinia;
 Rank prostitutes, therefore without remorse
 Punish the strumpets, give the law its course:
 But when y'ave sentenc'd them, Metellus, know
 They'd blush t' appear so loosely drest as you.
 You say the dog-itar reigns, whose sultry fire
 Melts you to death ev'n in that light attire;
 Go naked then, 'twere better to be mad,
 (Which has a priv'lege) than so lewdly clad!
 How wou'd our mountain fires, return'd from
 Or battle, such a silken judge allow? [plough
 Canst thou restore old manners, or retrench
 Rome's pride, who com't transparent to the bench?
 This mode in which thou singly do'it appear,
 By thy example shall get footing here,
 Till it has quite deprav'd the Roman stock
 As one infected sheep confounds the flock.

Nor will this crime, Metellus, be thy worst,
 No man e'er reach'd the heights of vice at first:
 For vice like virtue by degrees must grow;
 Thus, from this wanton drest, Metellus, thou
 With those polluted priests at last shall join }
 Who female chaplets round their temples twine,
 And with perverted rites profane the goddess'
 shrine.
 Where such vile practises 'twixt males are past,
 As makes our matrons lewd nocturnal chaste.
 Cottytus orgies scarce are more obscene,
 For thus th' effeminate priests themselves demean.
 With jet-black pencils one his eye-brows dyes,
 And adds new fire to his lascivious eyes:
 Another in a glass-nriapus swill-
 While twisted gold has platted tresses fills;

A female robe, and to complete the farce,
His servant not by Jove but Juno swears.
One holds a mirror, pathic Otho's shield,
In which he view'd before he march'd to field,
Nor Ajax with more pride his seven-fold targe did wield.

Oh noble subject for new annals fit,
In musty fame's records unmention'd yet!
A looking-glass must load th' imperial car,
The most important carriage of the war!
Galba to kill he thought a general's part,
But, as a courtier, us'd the nicest art
To keep his skin from tan: before the fight
Wou'd paint, and set his foil'd complexion right.
A softness which Semiramis ne'er knew,
When once she had the field and foe in view,
Nor Egypt's queen, when she from Actium flew.

No chaste discourse their festivals afford,
Obsceneness is the language of their board:
Soft lisping tones, taught by some bald-pate priest,

For skilful palate, master of the feast.
A pack of prostitutes; unnerv'd, and rife
For the operation of a Phrygian knife;
For from such pathics 'twere but just to take
Those manly parts, of which no use they make.

Gracchus, 'tis said, gave to his trumpeter
Four hundred sesterces—for what?—In dow'r.
The motion's lik'd, the parties are agreed;
And for performance seal a formal deed;
Guests are bespoke, a wedding-supper made,
The wanted joy is wish'd, that done—
The he bride in his bridegroom's arms is laid!
O peers of Rome! need these stupendous times
A censor or aruspex for such crimes?
The prodigy less monstrous wou'd appear,
If women calves, or heifers lambs shou'd bear!
In bridal robe and veil the pathic's dress,
Who bore the pondrous shield at Mars his feast.

Father of Rome, say what detested clime
Taught Latian shepherds so abhorr'd a crime?
Say, thund'ring Mars, from whence the nettle sprung,

Whose venom first thy noble offspring stung?
Behold! a man by birth and fortune great
Weds with a man; yet from th' ethereal feat
No rattling of thy brazen wheels we hear,
Nor is earth pierc'd with thy avenging spear!
Oh! if thy jurisdiction (Mars) falls short
To punish mischiefs of so vast import,
Complain to Jove, and move the higher court.
For shame redress this scandal, or resign
Thy province to some pow'r that's more divine.

To-morrow early in Quirinus vale
I must attend—why?—Thereby hangs a tale,
A male-friend's to be marry'd to a male.
'Tis true the wedding's carry'd privately,
The parties being at present somewhat shy;
But that they own the match, e'er long you
And see it in the public register.

But one fore grief does these he-brides perplex:
Though they debate, they cannot change the
Nor yet, by help of all their wicked art, [c:
Bring offspring to secure their husband's heart.
Nature too much i'th' dire embrace is forc'd,
But ne'er joins influence with desires so curs'd:
Incestuous births, and monsters many may appear.
But teeming males not earth nor hell can bear.

Yet Gracchus, thou degen'rate son of fame,
Thy pranks are stigmatiz'd with greater blame:
Theirs was a private, thine an open shame.
Who like a fencer on a public stage,
Hast made thyself the scandal of the age.
Nor can Rome's noblest blood with thine compar
While thou mak'st pastime for the theatre.

To what dire cause can we assign these crimes
But to that reigning atheism of the times?
Ghosts, stygian lakes, and frogs with croaki
note,

And Charon wasting souls in leaky boat,
Are now thought fables, to fright fools conceiv
Or children, and by children scarce believ'd.
Yet give thou credit. What can we suppose
The temperate Curii, and the Scipio's;
What will Fabricius or Camillus think,
When they behold, from their Elysium's brink,
An atheist's soul to last perdition sink?
How will they from th' assaulted banks rebound
And wish for sacred rites to purge th' unhallow
ground.

In vain, O Rome! thou dost thy conquest boast
Beyond the Orcades short-nighted coast,
Since free the conquer'd provinces remain.
From crimes that thy imperial city stain:
Yet rumour speaks, if we may credit fame,
Of one Armenian youth, who since he came
Has learn'd the impious trade; and does exceed
The low'dest pathics of our Roman breed.
Blessings of commerce! he was sent, 'tis said,
For breeding hither; and he's fairly bred.
Fly foreign youths from our polluted streets,
And e'er unmann'd, regain your native seats;
Left, while for traffic here too long you stay,
You learn at last to trade th' Italian way;
And, with curs'd merchandize returning home,
Stock all your country with the figs of Rome.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE story of this satire speaks itself. Umbricitus, the supposed friend of Juvenal, and himself a poet leaving Rome, and retiring to Cumæ. Our author accompanies him out of town. Before they take leave of each other, Umbricitus tells his friend the reasons which oblige him to lead a private li in an obscure place. He complains that an honest man cannot get his bread at Rome: that none but flatterers make their fortunes there: that Grecians and other foreigners raise themselves by those sordid arts which he describes, and against which he bitterly inveighs. He reckons up the several inconveniences which arise from a city-life: and the many dangers which attend it. Uprobates the noblemen with covetousness, for not rewarding good poets; and arraigns the government for starving them. The great art of this satire is particularly shown, in common places; and a drawing in as many vices, as could naturally fall into the compass of it.

IRIEV'D though I am an ancient friend to love, like the solitary feat he chose:
 In quiet Cumæ fixing his repose:
 Where far from noisy Rome secure he lives,
 and one more citizen to Sibyl gives.
 The road to Bajæ, and that soft recess
 Which all the gods with all their bounty bless.
 Though I in Prochyta with greater ease could live, than in a street of palaces.
 What scenes so desert, or so full of fright,
 as towering houses tumbling in the night,
 and Rome on fire beheld by its own blazing
 light?
 Not worse than all the clattering tiles, and worse than thousand padders, is the poet's curse.
 Verses that in dog-days cannot rhyme forbear:
 sit without mercy read, and make you hear.
 Now while my friend, just ready to depart,
 was packing all his goods in one poor cart;
 he stopp'd a little at the Conduit gate,
 Where Numa model'd once the Roman state,
 in mighty councils with his nymph retir'd, though now the sacred shades and founts are hir'd by banish'd Jews, who their whole wealth can lay in a small basket, on a wisp of hay;
 yet such our avarice is, that every tree says for his head; nor sleep itself is free:
 for place, nor persons, now are sacred held,
 from their own grove the muses are expell'd.
 Into this lonely vale our steps we bend,
 and my sullen discontented friend:
 he marble caves, and aqueducts, we view;
 ut how adulterate now, and different from the true!
 How much more beauteous had the fountain been embellish'd with her first created green, where crystal streams through living turf had run,
 oriented with an urn of native stone!
 Then thus Umbricius (with an angry frown, and looking back on this degenerate town),
 since noble arts in Rome have no support,
 and ragged virtue not a friend at court,
 so profit rises from th' ungrateful stage,
 by poverty increasing with my age,
 'Tis time to give my just disdain a vent,
 and, cursing, leave so base a government.
 Where Dædalus his borrow'd wings laid by,
 or that obscure retreat I choose to fly:
 While yet few furrows on my face are seen,
 while I walk upright, an old age is green,
 and Lachesis has somewhat left to spin.
 Now, now, 'tis time to quit this curst place,
 and hide from villains my too honest face:
 ere let Arturius live, and such as he:
 such manners will with such a town agree.
 Wives, who in full assemblies have the knack of turning truth to lies, and white to black;
 an hire large houses, and oppress the poor
 by farm'd excise: can cleanse the common shore;

And rent the fishery: can bear the dead;
 And teach their eyes dissembled tears to shed,
 All this for gain; for gain they sell their very
 head.
 These fellows see (what fortune's power can do)
 Were once the minstrels of a country show:
 Follow'd the prizes through each paltry town,
 By trumpet cheeks and blotted faces known.
 But now, grown rich, on drunken holidays,
 At their own costs exhibit public plays:
 Where, influenc'd by the rabble's bloody will,
 With thumbs bent back, they popularly kill.
 From thence return'd, their sordid avarice rakes
 In excrements again, and hires the jakes.
 Why hire they not the town, not every thing,
 Since such as they have fortune in a string?
 Who, for her pleasure, can her fools advance;
 And toss them topmost on the wheel of chance.
 What's Rome to me, what business have I there,
 I who can neither lie, nor falsely swear?
 Nor praise my patron's undervalving rhymes,
 Nor yet comply with him, nor with his times;
 Unkill'd in schemes by planets to foreshow,
 Like canting rascals, how the wats will go:
 I neither will, nor can prognosticate
 To the young gaging heir, his father's fate:
 Nor in the entrails of a toad have pry'd,
 Nor carry'd bawdy presents to a bride:
 For want of these town virtues, thus, alone,
 I go conducted on my way by none;
 Like a dead member from the body rent;
 Maim'd, and useless to the government.
 Who now is lov'd, but he who loves the times,
 Conicous of close intrigues, and dipt in crimes;
 Labouring with secrets which his bosom burn,
 Yet never must to public light return?
 They get reward alone who can betray:
 For keeping honest counsels none will pay.
 He who can Verres, when he will, accuse,
 The purse of Verres may at pleasure use:
 But let not all the gold which Tagus hides,
 And pays the sea in tributary tides,
 Be bribe sufficient to corrupt the breast;
 Or violate with dreams thy peaceful rest.
 Great men with jealous eyes the friend behold,
 Whose secrecy they purchase with their gold.
 I haste to tell thee, nor shall shame oppose
 What confidence our wealthy Romans choose:
 And whom I must abhor: to speak my mind,
 I hate in Rome, a Grecian town to find:
 To see the scum of Greece transplanted here,
 Receiv'd like gods, is what I cannot bear.
 Nor Greeks alone, but Syrians here abound,
 Obscene Orontes, diving under ground,
 Conveys his wealth to Tyber's hungry shores,
 And fattens Italy with foreign whores:
 Hither their crooked harps and customs come:
 All find resceit in hospitable Rome.

The barbarous harlots crowd the public place :
 Go, fools, and purchase an unclean embrace :
 The painted mitre court, and the more painted
 face. }
 Old Romulus, and father Mars, look down,
 Your herdsman primitive, your homely clown,
 Is turn'd a beau in a loose tawdry gown. }
 His once unkem'd and horrid looks behold
 Stilling sweat oil : his neck enchain'd with gold :
 Aping the foreigners in every dress ;
 Which, bought at greater cost, becomes him less.
 Meantime they wisely leave their native land,
 From Sycion, Samos, and from Alaband,
 And Amydon, to Rome they swarm in shoals :
 So sweet and easy is the gain from fools.
 Poor refugees at first, they purchase here :
 And, soon as denizen'd, they domineer.
 Grow to the great, a flattering servile rout :
 Work themselves inward, and their patrons out.
 Quick-witted, brazen-fac'd, with fluent tongues,
 Patient of labours, and dissembling wrongs.
 Riddle me this, and guess him if you can,
 Who bears a nation in a single man ?
 A cook, a conjurer, a rhetorician, }
 A painter, pedant, a geometrician,
 A dancer on the ropes, and a physician. }
 All things the hungry Greek exactly knows :
 And bid him go to heaven, to heaven he goes.
 In short, no Scythian, Moor, or Thracian born,
 But in that town which arms and arts adorn,
 Shall he be plac'd above me at the board,
 In purple cloth'd, and lolling like a lord ?
 Shall he before me sign, whom t' other day }
 A small craft vessel hither did convey ; [lay ? }
 Where stow'd with prunes, and rotten figs, he }
 How little is the privilege become
 Of being born a citizen of Rome !
 The Greeks get all by fulsome flatteries ;
 A most peculiar stroke they have at lies.
 They make a wit of their insipid friend ;
 His blobber-lip and betetle-brows commend ;
 His long crane-neck and narrow shoulders praise ;
 You'd think they were describing Hercules.
 A creaking voice for a clear treble goes ;
 Though harsher than a cock that treads and crows.
 We can as grossly praise ; but, to our grief,
 No flattery but from Grecians gains belief.
 Besides these qualities, we must agree
 Thy mimic better on the stage than we :
 The wife, the whore, the sapherdeis, they play,
 In such a free, and such a graceful way,
 That we believe a very woman shown,
 And fancy something underneath the gown.
 But not Antiochus, nor Stratocles, }
 Our ears and ravish'd eyes can only please : }
 The nation is compos'd of such as these. }
 All Greece is one comedian : laugh, and they Return it louder than an ass can bray :
 Grieve, and they grieve ; if you weep silently, }
 There seems a silent echo in their eye : }
 They cannot mourn like you, but they can cry. }
 Call for a fire, their winter clothes they take :
 Begin but you to shiver, and they shake :
 In frost and snow, if you complain of heat, [sweat.
 They rub th' unwearing brow, and swear they
 We live not on the square with such as these,
 Such are our betters, who can better please :

Who day and night are like a looking-glass ;
 Still ready to reflect their patron's face.
 The panegyric hand, and lifted eye,
 Prepared for some new piece of flattery.
 Ev'n nastiness, occasions will afford ;
 They praise a belching, or well-pissing lord.
 Besides, there's nothing sacred, nothing free,
 From bold attempts of their bold lechery.
 Through the whole family their labours run ;
 The daughter is debauch'd, the wife is won :
 Nor 'scape the bridegroom, or the blooming son.
 If none they find for their lewd purpose fit,
 They with the walls and very floors commit.
 They search the secrets of the house, and so
 Are worshipping there, and fear'd for what the know.

And, now we talk of Grecians, cast a view
 On what, in schools, their men of morals do ;
 A rigid Stoic his own pupil flew :
 A friend, against a friend of his own cloth,
 Turn'd evidence, and murder'd on his oath.
 What room is left for Romans in a town [gown
 Where Grecians rule, and cloaks controul th
 Some Diphilus, or some Protogenes,
 Look sharply out, our senators to seize :
 Engross them wholly, by their native art,
 And fear'd no rivals in their bubble's heart :
 One drop of poison in my patron's ear,
 One slight suggestion of a senseless fear,
 Infus'd with cunning, serves to ruin me ;
 Disgrac'd, and banish'd from the family.
 In vain forgotten services I boast ;
 My long dependence in an hour is lost :
 Look round the world, what country will appear
 Where friends are left with greater ease than here
 At Rome (nor think me partial to the poor)
 All offices of ours are out of door :
 In vain we rise, and to the levees run ;
 My lord himself is up, before, and gone :
 The praetor bids his victors mend their pace,
 Left his colleague outstrip him in the race :
 The childish matrons are, long since awake :
 And, for affronts, the tardy visits take.
 'Tis frequent, here, to see a free-born son
 On the left-hand of a rich hireling run ;
 Because the wealthy rogue can throw away,
 For half a race of bouts, a tribune's pay :
 But you, poor sinner, though you love the vice,
 And, like the whore, demur upon the price :
 And, frighted with the wicked sum, forbear
 To lend a hand, and help her from the chair.
 Produce a witness of unblemish'd life,
 Holy as Numa, or as Numa's wife,
 Or him who bid th' unhallow'd flames retire,
 And snatch'd the trembling goddess from the fire
 The question is not put, how far extends
 His piety, but what he yearly spends :
 Quick to the business ; how he lives, and eats ;
 How largely gives ; how splendidly he treats :
 How many thousand acres feed his sheep,
 What are his rents ? what servants does he keep
 Th' account is soon cast up ; the judges rate
 Our credit in the court by our estate.
 Swear by our gods, or those the Greeks adore,
 Thou art as sure forsworn, as thou art poor :
 The poor must gain their bread by perjury ;
 And ev'n the gods, that other means deny,
 In conscience must absolve them, when they lie.

Add, that the rich have still a gibe in store;
 And will be monstrous witty on the poor:
 Or the torn surtout and the tatter'd vest,
 The wretch and all his wardrobe are jest:
 The greasy gown, fully'd with often turning,
 Gives a good hint to say, The man's in mourning:
 Or if the shoe be ript, or patches put,
 He's wounded! see the plaiter on his foot.
 Vain is the scorn of every wealthy fool;
 And wit in rags is turn'd to ridicule.
 Back hence, and from the cover'd benches rise,
 The master of the ceremonies cries)
 'Tis no place for you, whose small estate
 Is not the value of the settled rate:
 The sons of happy punks, the pandar's heir,
 Are privileg'd to sit in triumph there,
 To clap the first, and rule the theatre,
 To go to the galleries, for shame, retreat; } [seat,
 Or, by the Roscian law, the poor can claim no
 Who ever brought to his rich daughter's bed,
 The man that poll'd but twelve-pence for his head?
 Who ever nam'd a poor man for his heir,
 Or call'd him to assist the judging-chair?
 The poor were wife, who, by the rich oppress'd,
 Withdrew, and sought a secret place of rest.
 Hence they did swell, to free themselves from scorn;

But had done better never to return.
 Scarcely they rise by virtue's aid, who lie
 Lung'd in the depth of helpless poverty.
 In Rome 'tis worse; where house-rent by the }
 And servants bellies cost so devilish dear; } [year,
 And tavern-bills run high for hungry cheer.
 To drink or eat in earthen-ware we scorn,
 Which cheaply country-cupboards does adorn:
 And coarse blue hoods on holidays are worn. }
 Some distant parts of Italy are known,
 Where none but only dead men wear a gown:
 In theatres of turf, in homely state,
 Old plays they act, old feasts they celebrate:
 The same rude song returns upon the crowd,
 And, by tradition, is for wit allow'd.
 The mimic yearly gives the same delights;
 And in the mother's arms the clownish infant
 frights.

Their habits (undistinguish'd by degree)
 Are plain alike; the same simplicity,
 Both on the stage, and in the pit, you see.
 His white cloak the magistrate appears;
 The country-bumkin the same livery wears.
 At here, attir'd, beyond our purse we go,
 Or useless ornament and flaunting show.
 We take on trust, in purple robes to shine;
 And, poor, are yet ambitious to be fine.
 This is a common vice, though all things here
 Are sold, and sold unconscionably dear.
 What will you give that Cossus may but view
 Our face, and in the crowd distinguish you;
 Lay take your incense like a gracious God,
 And answer only with a civil nod?
 To please our patrons, in this vicious age,
 We make our entrance by the favourite page:
 We rave his first down, and when he pulls his hair,
 He consecrated locks to temples bear:
 They tributary cracknels, which he sells,
 And, with our offerings, help to raise his vails.
 Who fears in country-towns a house's fall,
 Or to be caught betwixt a riven wall?

But we inhabit a weak city here;
 Which buttresses and props but scarcely bear:
 And 'tis the village-mason's daily calling,
 To keep the world's metropolis from falling,
 To cleanse the gutters, and the chimks to close;
 And, for one night, secure his lord's repose.
 At Cumæ we can sleep quite round the year,
 Nor falls, nor fires, nor nightly dangers fear;
 While rolling flames from Roman turrets fly,
 And the pale citizens for buckets cry.
 Thy neighbour has remov'd his wretched store
 (Few hands will rid the lumber of the poor)
 Thy own third story smokes, while thou, supine,
 Are drench'd in fumes of undigested wine.
 For if the lowest floors already burn,
 Cock-loft and garrets soon will take the turn.
 Where thy tame pigeons next the tiles were bred,

Which, in their nests unsafe, are timely fled.
 Codrus had but one bed, so short to boot,
 That his short wife's short legs hung dangling out;
 His cupboard's head fix earthen pitcher's grac'd,
 Beneath them was his trusty tankard plac'd.
 And, to support this noble plate, there lay
 A bended Chiron cast from honest clay;
 His few Greek books a rotten chest contain'd
 Whose covers much of mouldiness complain'd:
 Where mice and rats devour'd poetic bread,
 And with heroic verse luxuriously were fed.
 'Tis true, poor Codrus nothing had to boast,
 And yet poor Codrus all that nothing lost.
 Begg'd naked through the streets of wealthy Rome,
 And found not one to feed, or take him home.

But if the palace of Arturius burn, } [mourn;
 The nobles change their clothes, the matrons
 The city-prætor will no pleadings hear;
 The very name of fire we hate and fear:
 And look aghast, as if the Gauls were here. }
 While yet it burns, th' officious nation flies,
 Some to condole, and some to bring supplies:
 One sends him marble to rebuild, and one
 With naked statues of the Parian stone,
 The work of Polyclete, that seem to live;
 While other images for altars give;
 One books and screens, and Pallas to the breast:
 Another bags of gold, and he gives best.
 Childless Arturios, vastly rich before,
 Thus by his losses multiplies his store:
 Suspected for accomplice to the fire,
 That burnt his palace but to build it higher.

But, could you be content to bid adieu
 To the dear play-house, and the players too:
 Sweet country-seats are purchas'd every where,
 With lands and gardens, at less price than here, }
 You hire a darksome doghole by the year.
 A small convenience decently prepar'd,
 A shallow well that rises in your yard,
 That spreads his easy crystal streams around,
 And waters all the pretty spot of ground.
 There, love the fork, thy garden cultivate,
 And give thy frugal friends a Pythagorean treat,
 'Tis somewhat to be lord of some small ground,
 In which a lizard may, at least, turn round.

'Tis frequent, here, for want of sleep to die;
 Which fumes of undigested feasts deny; } [fry.
 And, with imperfect heat, in languid stomachs
 What house secure from noise the poor can keep,
 What ev'n the rich can scarce afford to sleep;

So dear it costs to purchase rest in Rome;
 And hence the sources of diseases come.
 The drover who his fellow-drover meets
 In narrow passages of winding streets;
 The waggoners that curse their standing teams,
 Would wake ev'n drowsy Drusus from his dreams.
 And yet the wealthy will not brook delay,
 But sweep above our heads, and make their way;
 In lofty litters borne, and read and write,
 Or sleep at ease: the shutters make it night.
 Yet still he reaches, first, the public place:
 The press before him stops the client's pace:
 'The crowd that follows crush his panting-sides,
 And trip his heels; he walks not, but he rides.
 One elbows him, one juffles in the shoal:
 A rafter breaks his head, or chairman's pole;
 Stocking'd with loads of fat town-dirt he goes;
 And some rogue-foldier, with his hob-nail'd
 Indents his legs behind in bloody rows. [shoes,
 See with what smoke our doles we celebrate:
 A hundred guests, invited, walk in state:
 A hundred hungry slaves, with their Dutch kitchen, wait.
 Huge pans the wretches on their heads must bear,
 Which scarce gigantic Corbulus could rear.
 Yet they must walk upright beneath the loan:
 Nay, run, and running blow the sparkling flames abroad, [torn.
 Their coats, from botching newly bought, are Unwieldy timber-trees in waggons borne,
 Stretch'd at their length, beyond their carriage lie;
 'That nod, and threaten ruin from on high.
 For should their axle break, its overthrow
 Would crush, and pound to dust, the crowd below:
 Nor friends their friends, nor fires their sons
 Nor limbs, nor bones, nor carcase would remain:
 But a mass'd heap, a hotch-potch of the slain.
 One vast destruction; not the foul alone,
 But bodies, like the foul, visibly are flown.
 Meantime, unknowing of their fellows' fate;
 The servants wash the platter, scour the plate,
 Then blow the fire, with puffing cheeks, and lay
 'The rubbers, and the bathing sheets display;
 And oil them first; and each is handy in his
 way.
 But he, for whom this busy care they take,
 Poor ghost! is wandering by the Stygian lake:
 Affrighted with the ferryman's grim face;
 New to the horrors of that uncouth place;
 His passage begs with unregarded prayer:
 And wants two farthings to discharge his fare.
 Return we to the dangers of the night;
 And, first, behold our houses dreadful height:
 From whence come broken pots herds tumbling
 down;
 And leaky ware, from garret-windows thrown;
 Well may they break our heads, and mark the flinty stone.
 'Tis want of sense to sup abroad too late,
 Unless thou first hast settled thy estate.
 As many fates attend thy steps to meet,
 As there are waking windows in the street.
 Bless the good gods, and think thy chance is rare
 To have a piss-pot only for thy share.
 The scouring drunkard, if he does not fight
 Before his bed-time, takes no rest that night.

Passing the tedious hours in greater pain
 Than stern Achilles, when his friend was slain:
 'Tis so ridiculous, but so true withal,
 A bully cannot sleep without a brawl:
 Yet, though his youthful blood be fir'd with wine,
 He wants not wit the danger to decline:
 Is cautious to avoid the coach and fix,
 And on the laquies will no quarrel fix.
 His train of flambeaux, and embroider'd coat,
 May privilege my lord to walk secure on foot.
 But me, who must by moon-light homeward bend,
 Or lighted only with a candle's end,
 Poor me he fights, if that be fighting, where
 He only cudgels, and I only bear.
 He stands, and bids me stand: I must abide;
 For he's the stronger, and is drunk beside.
 Where did you whet your knife to-night, h
 cries,
 And shred the leeks that in your stomach rise?
 Whose windy beans have stuf't your guts, and wher
 Have your black thumbs been dipt in vinegar?
 With what companion-cobler have you fed,
 On old ox-checks, or he-goat's tougher head?
 What, are you dumb? Quick with your answer quick,
 Before my foot salutes you with a kick.
 Say, in what nasty cellar under ground,
 Or what church-porch, your rogueship may I
 found?
 Answer, or answer not, 'tis all the same:
 He lays me on, and makes me bear the blame.
 Before the bar, for beating him you come;
 'This is a poor man's liberty in Rome.
 You beg his pardon; happy to retreat
 With some remaining teeth, to chew your meat.
 Nor is this all; for when retir'd, you think
 To sleep securely; when the candles wink,
 When every door with iron chains is barr'd,
 And roaring taverns are no longer heard;
 The ruffian-robbers by no justice aw'd,
 And unpaid cut-throat soldiers, are abroad,
 Those venal souls, who, harden'd in each ill,
 To save complaints and persecution, kill.
 Chas'd from their woods and bogs, the padder
 come
 To this vast city, as their native home;
 To live at ease, and safely skulk in Rome.
 The forge in letters only is employ'd;
 Our iron-mines exhausted and destroy'd
 In shackles; for these villains scarce allow Goads for teams, and plough-shares for
 Oh, happy ages of our ancestors, [plow
 Beneath the kings and tribunial powers!
 One jail did all their criminals restrain;
 Which now the walls of Rome can scarce cont
 More I could say, more causes I could show
 For my departure; but the sun is low:
 The waggoner grows weary of my stay;
 And whips his horses forwards on their way.
 Farewell; and when, like me, o'erwhelm'd wi
 care,
 You to your own Aquinum shall repair,
 To take a mouthful of sweet country air,
 Be mindful of your friend; and send me word
 What joys your fountains and cool shades aff
 Then, to assist your fatires, I will come;
 And add new venom when you write of Rom

THE ARGUMENT.

THE poet in this satire first brings in Crispinus, whom he had a lash at in his first satire, and whom he promises here not to be forgetful of for the future. He exposes his monstrous prodigality and luxury in giving the price of an estate for a barbel; and from thence takes occasion to introduce the principal subject, and true design of this satire, which is grounded upon a ridiculous story of a turbut presented to Domitian, of so vast a bigness that all the emperor's scullery had not a dish large enough to hold it; upon which the senate in all haste is summoned, to consult in this exigency, what is fittest to be done. The poet gives us a particular of the senators names, their distinct characters, and speeches, and advice; and after much and wise consultation, an expedient being found out and agreed upon, he dismisses the senate, and concludes the satire.

NONE more Crispinus call'd upon the stage,
(for shall once more suffice) provokes my rage:
monster, to whom ev'ry vice lays claim,
without one virtue to redeem his fame,
 feeble and sick, yet strong in lust alone,
 he rank adult'rer preys on all the town,
 I but the widows nauseous charms go down.
 What matter then how stately is the arch here his tir'd mules flow with their burden march?

What matter then how thick and long the shade rough which, by sweating slaves, he is convey'd?
 How many acres near the city-walls,
 new-built palaces, his own he calls?
 Will man's happy; least of all is he whose study 'tis to corrupt chastity.
 The incestuous brute, who the veil'd vestal maid traitor to his impious bed betray'd, no for her crime, if laws their course might ought to descend alive into the grave. [have,
 But now of slighter faults; and yet the same others done, the censors justice claim.
 What good men ignoble count and base,
 virtue here, and does Crispinus grace:
 Is this he's safe, whate'er we write of him,
 The person is more odious than the crime.
 Is all his satire's lost. The lavish slave : thousand pieces for a barbel gave;
 sefter for each pound it weigh'd, as they ve out, that hear great things, but greater say.
 By this bribe well-plac'd, he would ensnare
 The saple's usurer that wants an heir, if this present the sly courtier meant,
 ould to some punk of quality be sent,
 at in her easy chair in state does ride,
 e glasses all drawn up on ev'ry side, praise his cunning; but expect not this,
 r his own gut he brought the stately fish.
 w ev'n Apicius frugal seems, and poor,
 tvy'd in luxury unknown before.

Gave you, Crispinus, you this mighty sum?
 u, that for want of other rags, did come,
 your own country paper wrapp'd, to Rome.
 scales and fins bear price to this excess?
 u might have bought the fisherman for less.

For less some provinces whole acres sell,
 Nay, in Apulia, if you bargain well,
 A manor wou'd cost less than such a meal.

What think we then of his luxurious lord?
 What banquets loaded that imperial board?
 When in one dish, that taken from the rest,
 His constant table you'd have hardly mist,
 So many sesterties were swallow'd down,
 To stuff one scarlet-coated court buffoon,
 Whom Rome of all her knights now chiefeft greets,

From crying stinking fish about her streets.

Begin, Calliope, but not to sing:
 Plain, honest truth, we for our subject bring.
 Help then, ye young Pierian maids to tell
 A downright narrative of what befall.
 Afford me willingly your sacred aids,
 Me that have call'd you young, me that have sty'd you maids.

When he, with whom the Flavian race decay'd,
 The groaning world with iron sceptre sway'd,
 When a bald Nero reign'd, and servile Rome obey'd.

Where Venus shrine does fair Ancona grace,
 A turbut taken of prodigious space,
 Fill'd the extended net, not less than those
 That dull Mæotis does with ice enclose,
 I'll conquer'd by the sun's prevailing ray,
 It opens to the Pontic sea their way;
 And throws them out unwieldy with their growth;
 Fat with long ease, and a whole winter's sloth,
 The wile commander of the boat and lines,
 For our high-priest the stately prey designs;
 For who that lordly fish durst sell or buy,
 So many spies and court-informers nigh?
 No shore but of this vermin swarms does bear, Searchers of mud and sea-weed! that would swear,

The fish had long in Cæsar's ponds been fed,
 And from its lord undutifully fled;
 So, justly ought to be again restor'd:
 Nay, if you credit sage Palphurius word,
 Or dare rely on Armillatus skill,
 Whatever fish the vulgar fry excel

Belong to Cæsar, wherefoe'er they swim,
By their own worth confiscated to him.
The boatman then shall a wife present make,
And give the fish before the feizers take.
Now sickly autumn to dry frosts gave way,
Cold winter rag'd, and fresh preserv'd the prey;
Yet with such haste the busy fisher flew,
As if a hot south-wind corruption blew:
And now he reach'd the lake, where what re-
Of Alba, still her ancient rites retains, [mains
Still worships Vesta, though an humbler way,
Nor lets the hallow'd Trojan fire decay. [fort,

The wondring crowd that to strange sights re-
And chok'd a while his passage to the court,
At length gives way; ope flies the palace-gate,
The turbot enters in, without the fathers wait.
The boatman strait does to Astrides press,
And thus presents his fish, and his address:

Accept, dread Sir, this tribute from the main,
Too great for private kitchens to contain.
To your glad genius sacrifice this day,
Let common meats respectfully give way.
Haste to unload your stomachs to receive
This turbot, that for you did only live.
So long preserv'd to the imperial food,
Glad of the net, and to be taken proud. [well,

How fulsome this! how gross! yet this takes
And the vain prince with empty pride does swell.
Nothing so monstrous can be said or feign'd,
But with belief and joy is entertain'd,
When to his face the worthless wretch is prais'd,
Whom vile court-flattery to a god has rais'd.

But oh, hard fate! the palace stores no dish
Afford, capacious of the mighty fish.
To sage debate are summon'd all the peers,
His trusty and much-hated counsellors,
In whose pale look that ghastly terror sat,
That haunts the dangerous friendships of the great.

The loud Liburnian that the senate call'd,
Run, run; he's set, he's set, no sooner bawl'd,
But with his robe snatch'd up in haste does come
Pegasus, baliff of affrighted Rome.
What more were prefects then? The best he was,
And faithfullest expounder of the laws.
Yet in ill times, thought all things manag'd best,
When justice exercis'd her sword the least.

Old Crispus next, pleasant though old appears,
His wit nor humour yielding to his years.
His temper mild, good nature join'd with sense,
And manners charming as his eloquence.

Who fitter for a useful friend than he,
To the great ruler of the earth and sea, [free,
If as his thoughts were just, his tongue were }
If it were safe to vent his gen'rous mind
To Rome's dire plague, and terror of mankind,
If cruel pow'r could soft'ning counsel bear?
But what's so tender as a tyrant's ear?

With whom whoever, though a favourite spake,
At ev'ry sentence set his life at stake,
Though the discourse were of no weightier things,
Than sultry summers, or unhealthful springs.
This well he knew, and therefore never try'd,
With his weak arms to stem the stronger tide.
Nor did all Rome, grown spiritless, supply
A man that for bold truth durst bravely die.
So safe by wise complying silence, he h'v'n in that court did sanicore summers see.

Next him Acilius, though his age the same,
With eager haste to the grand council came:
With him a youth, unworthy of the fate
That did too near his growing virtues wait,
Urg'd by the tyrant's envy, fear, or hate.
(But 'tis long since old age began to be
In noble blood no less than prodigy,
Whence 'tis I'd rather be of giants birth,
A pigny-brother to those sons of earth).
Unhappy youth! whom, from his destin'd end,
No well dissembled madness could defend;
When naked in the Alban theatre,
In Libyan bears he fixt his hunting spear.
Who sees not now through the lord's thin disguise
That long seem'd fools to prove at last more wife
That state-court trick is now too open laid,
Who now admires the part old Brutus play'd?
Those honest times might swallow this pretence,
When the king's beard was deeper than his sense.

Next Kubrius came, though not of noble race,
With equal marks of terror in his face,
Pale with the gnawing guilt and inward flame
Of an old crime that is not fit to name.
Worse, yet in scandal taking more delight,
Than the vile Pathic that durst satire write.

Montanus belly next, advancing slow
Before the sweating senator did go.

Crispinus after, but much sweeter comes,
Scented with costly oils and eastern gums,
More than would serve two sensual perfumes.

Then Pompey, none more skill'd in the court
game

Of cutting throats, with a soft whisper, came:
Next Fufens, he who many a peaceful day
For Dacian vultures was reserv'd a prey,
I'll having study'd war enough at home,
He led abroad the unhappy arms of Rome.

Cunning Vegento next, and by his side
Bloody Catullus leaning on his guide.
Decrepit, yet a furious lover he,
And deeply smit with charms he could not see.
A monster, that even this worst age out-vies,
Conspicuous, and above the common size.
A blind base flatt'rer, from some bridge or gate,
Rais'd to murdering minister of state.

Deserving still to beg upon the road,
And blest each passing waggon and its load.
None more admir'd the fish; he in its praise
With zeal his voice, with zeal his hands did raise
But to the left all his fine things did say,
Whilst on his right the unseen turbot lay.

So he the fam'd Cilician fencer prais'd,
And at each hit with wonder seem'd amaz'd.
So did the scenes and stage machines admire,
And boys that flew through canvas clouds in wire.

Nor came Vegento short; but as inspir'd
By thee, Bellona, by thy fury fir'd,
Thy'n prophet: see, the mighty omien, see,
He cries, of some illustrious victory!
Some captive king; thee his new lord shall own,
Or from his British chariot headlong thrown
The proud Aviragus came tumbling down!
The monster's foreign. Mark the pointed spear
That from thy hand on his pierc'd back he wears
Who nobler could, or plainer things preface?
Yet one thing 'scap'd him, the prophetic rage
Show'd not the turbot's country, nor its age.

At length by Cæsar the grand question's put:
My lords, your judgment: shall the fifth be cut?

Far be it, far from us, Montanus cries;
Let's not dishonour thus the noble prize!
A pot of finest earth, thin, deep, and wide,
Some skilful quick Prometheus must provide.
Clay and the forming earth prepare with speed.
But Cæsar, be it from henceforth decreed,
That porters on the royal progress wait,
Let assist in these emergencies of state.

This council pleas'd; nor could it fail to take,
So fit, so worthy of the man that spake.
The old court riots he remember'd well,
Could tales of Nero's midnight suppers tell,
When Falern wines the lab'ring lungs did fire,
And to new dainties kindled false desire.
In arts of eating none more early train'd,
None in my time had equal skill attain'd.
He whither Circe's rock his oysters bore,
Or Lucrine lake, or the Rutupian shore,

Knew at first taste, nay, at first sight cou'd tell,
A crab or lobster's country by its shell.

They rise, and straight all, with respectful ave,

At the word giv'n, obsequiously withdraw,
Whom full of eager haste, surprisè, and fear,
Our mighty prince had summon'd to appear;
As if some news he'd of the Catti tell,
Or that the fierce Sicambrians did rebel:
As if expresses from all parts had come
With fresh alarms threatening the fate of Rome.

What folly this! but oh! that all the rest
Of his dire reign had thus been spent in jest!
And all that time such trifles had employ'd,
In which so many nobles he destroy'd!
He safe, they unreveng'd, to the disgrace
Of the surviving, tame, patrician race!
But when he dreadful to the rabble grew,
Him, whom so many lords had slain, they flew.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE poet dissuades a parasite from frequenting the tables of great men, where he is certain to be treated with the highest scorn and contempt: and, at the same time, inveighs against the luxury and insolence of the Roman nobility.

Harden'd by affronts, and still the same,
Lost to all sense of honour, and of shame, [board,
Thou yet canst love to haunt the great man's
And think no supper good but with a lord:
If yet thou can'st hold out, and suffer more
Than lewd Sarmenus, or vile Galba bore,
Thy solemn oath ought to be set aside:
But sure the belly's easily supply'd.
Suppose, what frugal Nature would suffice,
Suppose that wanting, hunger is not nice,
Is no bridge vacant, no convenient seat,
Where thou may'st cringe, and gnaw thy broken
meat,

And with a matt, and crutch, and ty'd up leg,
More honestly and honourably beg?

First, if he please to say, sit down, and smile
Behold the full reward of all thy toil!

All thy old services are largely paid,
And thou a proud and happy man art made.

See! of thy boasted friendship, see the fruits!
And these too he upbraids, and these imputes.

If after two cold months thy lord think fit
His poor, neglected client to admit,

And say, sup with me, thou hast thy desire,
Be thankful, mortal, and no more require.

Thus blest, must Trebius to his levees run,
When the stars languish near the rising sun;

Break off sweet slumbers, drowsily, and undrest,
To show his zeal, and to prevent the rest;

Run to prevent the fawning humble train,
While slow Bootes drives his frozen wain,

Perhaps the gen'rous entertainment may
For all the state and dear attendance pay.

For him is kept a liquor more divine,
You sponges must be drunk with lees of wine,

Drunk for your patron's pleasure and his jest;
Then raving like a coribas possit,

Thou and the freed-men first begin to jar,
From mutual jeers the prelude to the war;

Thou and thy fellow parasites engage,
And battle with a troop of servants wage;

Then glasses and Saguntine pitchers fly,
And broken pates discolour'd napkins dye.

While happy he, stretch'd, on his couch, supine
Looks on with scorn, and drinks old gen'rous wine,

Prest from the grape, when warlike Rome was
But kindly, never lends one glass to thee. [tree,

Perhaps to-morrow he may change his wine,
And drink old sparkling Alban, or Setine,

Whose title, and whose age, with mould o'ergrown,
The good old cask for ever keeps unknown:

Such bold Helvidius drank, and Thrasea crown'd
With garlands, when the flowing bowl went
round

On Brutus birth-day: and to raise delight,
To please at once the taste, and charm the sight,

He in bright amber drinks, or brighter gold,
And cups with shining berils set does hold.

Thou art not suffer'd or to touch or taste;
And if thou dar'st, a guard on thee is plac'd

To watch the gems. This may perhaps surprisè
But, Sir, you'll pardon, they are stones of price.

For Firro does, as many do of late,
Gems from his fingers to his cups translate,
Which the bold youth to Dido's love preferr'd,
Wore on the scabbard of his shining sword.
Thou may'st at distance gaze, and sigh in vain,
A crack'd black pot's reserv'd for thee to drain.

If his blood boil, and th' adventitious fire
Rais'd by high meats, and higher wines, require
To temper and allay the burning heat,
Waters are brought, which by decoction get
New coolness, such plain nature does not know,
Not ice so cool, nor hyperborean snow.
Did I complain but now, and justly too,
That the same wine is not allow'd to you?
Another water's reach'd you, when you call,
From hands of Moorish footmen, lean and tall;
The grim attendance he assigns t' affright
Rather than wait; rogues who wou'd scare by night

If met among the tombs; the ghastly slaves
Look as if newly started from their graves.
Before himself the flower of Asia stands,
To watch his looks; and to receive commands.
A boy of such a price as had undone
Old Roman kings, and drain'd the treasure of a
If thou or any of thy tribe want wine, crown.
Look back, and give thy Ganymedes th' sign.
The lovely boy, and bought at such a rate,
Is much too handsome, and too proud to wait
On the despis'd and poor: will he descend
To give a glass to a declining friend?
No, his good mien, his youth, and blooming face
Tempt him to think, that with a better grace
Himself might sit, and thou supply his place. }
Behold there yet remains, which must be borne,
Proud servants more insufferable scorn.

With what disdain another gave thee bread!
The meanest wretches are with better fed;
Th' impenetrable crust thy teeth defies,
And petrify'd with age securely lies:
Hard, mouldy, black, if thou presume t' invade,
With sacrilegious hands, thy patron's bread,
There stands a servant ready to chastise
Your insolence, and teach you to be wise.
Will you a bold intruder, ever learn
To know your basket, and your bread discern?
'Tis just, ye gods! and what I well deserve;
Why did not I more honourably starve?
Did I for this abandon wife and bed?
For this, alas! by vain ambition led,
Through cold Eiquillias run so oft, and bear
The storms and fury of the vernal air,
And then with cloak wet through attend, and dropping hair?

See! by the tallest servant borne on high,
A sturgeon fills the largest dish and eye!
With how much pomp he's plac'd upon the board!
With what a tail and breast salutes his lord!
With what expence and art, how richly dress'd!
Garnish'd with 'sparagus, himself a feast!
Thou art to one small dismal dish confin'd,
A crab ill dress'd, and of the vilest kind.

He on his own fish pour the noblest oil,
The product of Venatrum's happy soil.
That to your marcid dying herbs assign'd,
By the rank smell and taste betrays its kind, }
By Moors imported, and for lamps alone design,

Well rubb'd with this, when Boccar comes t'
town,

He makes the theatres and baths his own,
All round from him, as from th' infected run.
The pois'nous stink ev'n their own serpents shun.

Behold a mullet ev'n from Corfu brought!
Or near the rocks of Taurominium caught:

Since our own seas no longer can supply,
Exhausted by our boundless luxury:
The secret deep can no protection give,
No Tyrrhene fish is suffer'd now to live
To his just growth. The provinces from far Furnish our kitchens, and revenge our war.
Baits for the rich, and childless they supply;
Aurelia thence must sell, and Lenas buy.

The largest lamprey which their seas afford,
Is made a sacrifice to Virro's board.
When Auster to the Æolian caves retires
With dropping wings, and murmuring there re-
spires,

Rash daring nets, in hope of such a prize,
Carybdis, and the treacherous deep despise.
An eel for you remains, in Tiber bred,
With foulest mud, and the rank ordure fed,
Discharg'd by common shores from all the town;
No secret passage was to him unknown;
In ev'ry noisome sink the serpent slept,
And through dark vaults oft to Suburra crept.
One word to Virro now, if he can bear,
And 'tis a truth which he's not us'd to hear;
No man expects, (for whom so much a sot,
Who has the times he lives in so forgot?)
What Seneca, what Piso us'd to send,
To raise, or too support a sinking friend.
Those godlike men, to wanting virtue kind,
Bounty well-plac'd preferr'd, and well design'd,
To all their titles, all their height of power,
Which turns the brains of fools, and fools alone adore.

When your poor client is condemn'd t' attend,
'Tis all we ask, receive him like a friend,
At least, let him be easy if you can,
Let him be treated like a free-born man.
Descend to this, and then we ask no more,
Rich to yourself, to all beside be poor.

Near him is plac'd the liver of a goose,
That part alone which luxury wou'd choose,
A boar entire, and worthy of the sword
Of Meleager, smokes upon the board.
Next mushrooms, larger when the clouds descend
In fruitful showers, and desir'd thunders rend
The vernal air. No more plough up the ground,
O Lybia, where such mushrooms can be found,
Aledius cries, but furnish us with store
Of mushrooms, and import thy corn no more,
Meanwhile thy indignation yet to raise,

The carver dancing round each dish surveys,
With flying knife; and as his art directs,
With proper gestures ev'ry fowl dissects.
A thing of so great moment to their taste,
That one false slip had surely marr'd the feast.
If thou dare murmur, if thou dare complain
With freedom, like a Roman gentleman,
Thou'rt seiz'd immediately by his commands,
And dragg'd, like Cacus, by Herculean hands
Out from his presence. When does haughty he Descend to take a glass once touch'd by thee?

That wretch were lost, who shou'd presume to think

He might be free, who durst say, come, Sir, drink,
Will any freedom here from you be borne Whose clothes are threadbare, and whose cloaks are torn ?

Wou'd any god, or godlike man below,
Four hundred thousand Sesterces bestow !
How mightily wou'd Trebius be improv'd !
How much a friend to Virro, how below'd !
Will Trebius eat of this ? What sot attends
My brother ? Who carves to my best of friends ?
O Sesterces, this honour's done to you !

You are his friends, and you his brethren too.
Wouldst thou become his patron and his lord ;
Wouldst thou be in thy turn by him ador'd ?
No young Æneas in thy hall must play,
Nor sweeter daughter lead thy heart astray.

O how a barren wife does recommend !
How dear, how pleasant is a childless friend ?
But if thy Mycale, thy t'geming wife
Pour out three boys, the comfort of thy life ;
He too will in the prating nest rejoice,
Farthings and nuts provide, and various toys,
For the young smiling parasites, the wanton boys. }

He viler friends with doubtful mushrooms treats,
Secure for you, himself champignons eats ;
Such Claudius lov'd, of the same sort and taste,
Till Agrippina kindly gave the last,
To him are order'd, and those happy few
Whom fate has rais'd above contempt and you, }

Most fragrant fruits, such in Phœcian gardens grew ;
Where a perpetual autumn ever smil'd,
And golden apples loaded branches fill'd.
By such swift Atalanta was betray'd,
The vegetable gold soon stopt the flying maid.

To you such scabb'd harsh fruit is giv'n, as raw
Young foldiers at their exercisings gnaw,
Who trembling learn to throw the fatal dart,
And under rods of rough centurions smart.

Thou tak' it all this as done to save expence ;
No ! 'tis on purpose done to give offence :
What comedy, what farce can more delight,
Than grinning hunger, and the pleasing sight
Of your bill'd hopes ? No ! he's resolv'd t' extort
Tears from your eyes : 'tis barb'rous jest and sport.
Thou think'st thyself companion of the great,
Art free and happy in thy own conceit.

He thinks thou'rt tempted by th' attractive smell
Of his warm kitchen, and he judges well.
For who so naked, in whose empty veins
One single drop of noble blood remains ;
What freeborn man, who, though of mungrel
strain,

Wou'd twice support the scorn, and proud disdain
With which those idols you adore, the great,
Their wretched vassals and dependants treat ?
O slaves most abject ! you still gaping sit,
Deavouring with your eyes each pleasing bit ;
Now sure we parasites at last shall share
That boar, and now that wild-fowl, or that hare ;
Thus you expecting gaze, with your teeth set ;
With your bread ready, and your knives well
whet ;

Demure and silent ; but, alas ! in vain ;
He mocks your hunger, and derides your pain.
If you can bear all this, and think him kind,
You well deserve the treatment which you find.
At last thou wilt beneath the burthen bow,
And, glad, receive the manumitting blow
On thy slav'd flavish head ; meanwhile attend,
Worthy of such a treat, and such a friend.

THE ARGUMENT.

THIS satire, of almost double length to any of the rest, is a bitter invective against the fair sex. It is indeed a common-place, from whence all the moderns have notoriously stolen their sharpest raileries. In his other satires, the poet has only glanced on some particular women, and generally scourged the men. But this he reserved wholly for the ladies. How they had offended him, I know not : but upon the whole matter he is not to be excused for imputing to all, the vices of some few amongst them. Neither was it generously done of him, to attack the weakest as well as the fairest part of the creation : neither do I know what moral he could reasonably draw from it. It could not be to avoid the whole sex, if all had been true which he alleges against them : for that had been to put an end to human kind. And to bid us beware of their artifices, is a kind of silent acknowledgment, that they have more wit than men : which turns the satire upon us, and particularly upon the poet ; who thereby makes a compliment, where he meant a libel. If he intended only to exercise his wit, he has forfeited his judgment, by making the one half of his readers his mortal enemies : and amongst the men, all the happy lovers, by their own experience, will disprove his accusations. The whole world must allow this to be the wittiest of his satires ; and truly he had need of all his parts to maintain, with so much violence, so unjust a charge. I am satisfied he will bring but few over to his opinion : and on that consideration chiefly I ventured to translate him. Though there wanted not another reason, which was, that no one else would undertake it : at least, Sir C. S. who could have done more right to the author, after a long delay, at length absolutely refused so ungrateful an employment: and every one will grant, that the work must have been imperfect and lame, if it had appeared without one of the principle members belonging to it. Let the poet therefore bear the blame of his own invention; and let me satisfy the world, that I am not of his opinion. Whatever his Roman ladies were, the English are free from all his imputations. They will read with wonder and abhorrence the vices of an age, which was the most infamous of any on record. They will bless themselves when they behold those examples, related of Domitian's time: they will give back to antiquity those monsters it produced: and believe with reason, that the species of those women is extinguished; or at least, that they were never here propagated. I may safely therefore proceed to the argument of a satire, which is no way relating to them: and first observe, that my author makes their lust the most heroic of their vices: the rest are in a manner but digression. He skims them over; but he dwells on this: when he seems to have taken his last leave of it; or the sudden he returns to it: it is one branch of it in Hippia, another in Messalina, but lust is the main body of the tree. He begins with his text in the first line, and takes it up with intermissions to the end of the chapter. Every vice is a loader, but that's a ten. The fillers, or intermediate parts, are their revenge; their contrivances of secret crimes; their arts to hide them; their wit to excuse them; and their impudence to own them, when they can no longer be kept secret. Then the persons to whom they are most addicted; and on whom they commonly bestow the last favours as stage-players, fiddlers, singing-boys and fencers. These who pass for chaste amongst them, are not really so; but only, for their vast dowries, are rather suffered than loved by their own husbands. That they are imperious, domineering, scolding wives: set up for learning and criticism in poetry, but are false judges. Love to speak Greek (which was then the fashionable tongue, as the French is now with us.) That they plead causes at the bar, and play prizes at the bear-garden. That they are gossips and news-mongers: wrangle with their neighbours abroad, and beat their servants at home. That they lie-in for new faces once a month, are fluttish with their husbands in private; and paint and dress in public for their lovers. That they deal with Jews, diviners, and fortune-tellers: learn the arts of misfarrying, and barrenness. Buy children, and produce them for their own. Murder their husbands sons, if they stand in their way to his estate; and make their adulterers his heirs. From hence the poet proceeds to show the occasion of all these vices, their original and how they were introduced in Rome, by peace, wealth, and luxury. In conclusion, if we, will take the word of our malicious author, bad women are the general standing rule: and the good, but some few exceptions to it.

In Saturn's reign, at nature's early birth,
There was that thing call'd chastity on earth;
When in a narrow cave, their common shade,
The sheep, the shepherds, and their gods were laid:
When reeds and leaves, and hides of beasts were
spread.

By mountain-housewives for their homely bed,
And mossy pillows rais'd, for the rude husband's head.

Unlike the niceness of our modern dames
(Affected nymphs with new-affected names):
The Cynthia's and the Lesbia's of our years,
Who for a sparrow's death dissolve in tears,
Those first unpolish'd matron's, big and bold,
Gave suck to infants of gigantic mold;
Rough as their savage lords who rang'd the wood,
And, fat with acorns, belch'd their windy food.
For when the world was bucksome, fresh, and
young,

Her sons were undebauch'd, and therefore strong;
And whether born in kindly beds of earth,
Or straggling from the timid oaks to birth,
Or from what other atoms they began,
No fires they had, or, if a fire, the fun.
Some thin remains of chastity appear'd,
Ev'n under Jove, but Jove without a beard;
Before the servile Greeks had learnt to swear
By heads of kings; while yet the bounteous year
Her common fruits in open plains expos'd,
Ere thieves were fear'd, or gardens were enclos'd.
At length uneasy justice upwards flew,
And both the sisters to the stars withdrew;
From that old era whoring did begin,
So venerably ancient is the sin.

Adulterers next invade the nuptial state,
And marriage-beds creak'd with a foreign weight;
All other ills did iron times adorn;
But whores and silver in one age were born.
Yet thou, they say, for marriage dost provide:
Is this an age to buckle with a bride?
They say thy hair the curling art is taught,
The wedding ring perhaps already bought:
A sober man like thee, to change his life!
What fury would possess thee with a wife?
Art thou of every other death bereft,
No knife, no ratbane, no kind halter left?
(For every noose compar'd to her's is cheap)
Is there no city-bridge from whence to leap?
Would'st thou become her drudge, who dost enjoy
A better sort of bedfellow, thy boy?
He keeps thee not awake with nightly brawls,
Nor with a begg'd reward thy pleasure palls;
Nor with insatiate heavings calls for more.
When all thy spirits were drain'd out before.
But still Urfidius courts the marriage-bait,
Longs for a son to settle his estate,
And takes no gifts, though every gaping heir
Would gladly grease the rich old bachelor.
What revolution can appear so strange,
As such a leacher such a life to change?
A rank, notorious whoremaster, to choose
To thrust his neck into the marriage-nose?
He who so often with a dreadful fright
Had in a coffer 'scap'd the jealous cuckold's sight,
That he to wedlock dotingly betray'd,
Should hope in this lewd town to find a maid!
The man's grown mad: to ease his frantic pain,
Run for the surgeon; breathe the middle vein;

But let a heifer with gilt horns be led
 To Juno regent of the marriage-bed,
 And let him every deity adore,
 If his new bride prove not an arrant whore
 In head and tail, and every other pore.
 On Ceres' feast restrain'd from their delight,
 Few matrons there, but curse the tedious night:
 Few whom their fathers dare salute, such lust
 Their kisses have, and come with such a guilt.
 With ivy now adorn thy doors, and wed;
 Such is thy bride, and such thy genial bed,
 Think'st thou one man is for one woman meant!
 She sooner with one eye would be content.

And yet 'tis nois'd, a maid did once appear
 In some small village, though fame says not where:
 'Tis possible; but sure no man she found;
 'Twas desert, all, about her father's ground:
 And yet some lustful god might there make bold,
 Are Jove and Mars grown impotent and old?
 Many a fair nymph has in a cave been spread,
 And much good love without a feather-bed.
 Whither wouldst thou to choose a wife resort,
 The park, the mall, the play-house, or the court?
 Which way soever thy adventures fall,
 Secure alike of chastity in all.

One sees a dancing-master capering high,
 And raves, and piffes, with pure extasy:
 And one is charm'd with the new opera notes,
 Admires the song, but on the finger dotes:
 The country lady in the box appears,
 Softly she warbles over all the hairs;
 And sucks in passion both at eyes and ears.

The rest (when now the long vacation's come,
 The noisy hall and theatres grown dumb)
 Their memories to refresh and cheer their hearts,
 In borrow'd breeches act the player's parts.
 The poor, that scarce have wherewithal to eat,
 Will pinch to make the singing-boy a treat.
 The rich, to buy him, will refuse no price;
 And stretch his quail-pipe, till they crack his voice.

Tragedians, acting love, for lust are fought
 (Though, but the parrots of a poet's thought).
 The pleading lawyer, though for counsel us'd,
 In chamber practice often is refus'd.
 Still thou wilt have a wife, and father heirs
 (The product of concurring theatres).

Perhaps a fencer did thy brows adorn,
 And a young sword-man to thy lands is born.
 Thus Hippia loath'd her old patrician lord,
 And left him for a broker of the sword:
 To wondering Pharos with her love she fled,
 To show one monster more than Afric bred:
 Forgetting house and husband left behind
 Ev'n children too; she fails before the wind;
 False to them all, but constant to her kind,
 But, stranger yet, and harder to conceive,
 She could the play-house and the players leave.
 Born of rich parentage, and nicely bred,
 She lodg'd on down, and in a damask bed;
 Yet daring not the dangers of the deep,
 On a hard mattress is content to sleep.

Ere this, 'tis true, she did her fame expose:
 But that, great ladies with great ease can lose.
 The tender nymph could the rude ocean bear:
 So much her lust was stronger than her fear.
 But had some honest cause her passage press'd,
 The smallest hardship had disturb'd her breast:

Each inconvenience makes their virtue cold;
 But woman-kind, in ills, is ever bold.
 Were she to follow her own lord to sea,
 What doubts or scruples would she raise to stay?
 Her stomach sick, and her head giddy grows;
 The tar and pitch are nauseous to her nose.
 But in love's voyage nothing can offend;
 Women are never sea-sick with a friend.
 Amidst the crew, she walks upon the board;
 She eats, she drinks, she handles every cord:
 And if she spews, 'tis thinking of her lord.
 Now ask, for whom her friends and fame she lost?
 What youth; what beauty, could th' adulterer boast?

What was the face, for which she could sustain
 To be call'd mistress to so base a man?
 The gallant, of his days had known the best:
 Deep scars were seen indented on his breast;
 And all his batter'd limbs requir'd their needful rest.

A promontory wen, with grisly grace,
 Stood high upon the handle of his face:
 His bleak eyes ran in gutters to his chin:
 His beard was stubble, and his cheeks were thin.
 But 'twas his fencing did her fancy move:
 'Tis arms, and blood, and cruelty, they love.
 But should he quit his trade, and sheath his
 sword,

Her lover would begin to be her lord.
 This was a private crime; but you shall hear
 What fruits the sacred brows of monarchs bear:
 The good old fluggard but began to snore,
 When from his side uprose th' imperial whore:
 She who prefer'd the pleasures of the night
 To pomps, that are but impotent delight:
 Strode from the palace, with an eager pace,
 To cope with a more masculine embrace:
 Muffled the march'd, like Juno in a cloud,
 Of all her train but one poor wench allow'd,
 One whom in secret service she could trust;
 The rival and companion of her lust.

To the known brothel-house she takes her way;
 And for a nasty room gives double pay;
 That room in which the rankest harlot lay.
 Prepar'd for fight, expectingly she lies,
 With heaving breasts, and with desiring eyes.
 Still as one drops, another takes his place,
 And baffled still succeeds to like disgrace.
 At length, when friendly darkness is expir'd,
 And every strumpet from her cell retir'd,
 She lags behind, and lingering at the gate,
 With a repining sigh submits to fate:
 All silt without, and all a fire within,
 Tir'd with the toil, unsated with the sin.
 Old Cesar's bed the modest matron seeks;
 The steam of lamps still hanging on her cheeks,
 In rosy smut: thus foul, and thus bedight,
 She brings him back the product of the night.

Now should I sing what poisons they provide;
 With all their trumphy of charms beside;
 And all their arts of death: it would be known
 Lust is the smallest sin the sex can own.
 Cæstina still, they say, is guiltless found
 Of every vice, by her own lord renown'd:
 And well the may, she brought ten thousand pound.

She brought him wherewithal to be call'd chaste;
 His tongue is ty'd in golden fetters fast;

He sighs, adores, and courts her every hour;
Who would not do as much for such a dower?
She writes love-letters to the youth in grace;
Nay, tips the wink before the cuckold's face;
And might do more; her portion makes it good;
Wealth has the privilege of widowhood.

These truths with his example you disprove,
Who with his wife is monstrously in love;
But know him better; for I heard him swear,
'Tis not that she's his wife, but that she's fair.
Let her but have three wrinkles in her face,
Let her eyes lessen, and her skin unbrace,
Soon you will hear the faucy steward say,
Pack up with all your trinkets, and away:
You grow offensive both at bed and board:
Your betters must be had to please my lord.

Meantime she's absolute upon the throne:
And, knowing time is precious, loses none:
She must have flocks of sheep, with wool more fine

Than silk, and vineyards of the noblest wine:
Whole droves of pages for her train she craves:
And sweeps the prisons for attending slaves.
In short, whatever in her eyes can come,
Or others have abroad, she wants at home.
When winter shuts the seas, and fleecy snows
Makes houses white, she to the merchant goes;
Rich chrystrals of the rock she takes up there,
Huge agate vases, and old china-ware:

But is none worthy to be made a wife
In all this town? Suppose her free from strife,
Rich, fair, and fruitful, of unblemish'd life;
Chaste as the Sabines, whose prevailing charms
Dismiss'd her husbands, and their brothers arms;
Grant her, besides, of noble blood, that ran
In ancient veins ere heraldry began:
Suppose all these, and take a poet's word,
A black swan is not half so rare a bird.
A wife, so hung with virtues, such a freight,
What mortal shoulders could support the weight!
Some country-girl, scarce to a courtsey bred,
Would I much rather than Cornelia wed:
If supercilious, haughty, proud, and vain,
She brought her father's triumphs in her train.
Away with all your Carthaginian state,
Let vanquish'd Hannibal without-doors wait,
Too bury and too big to pass my narrow gate.

O Pæan, cries Amphion, bend thy bow
Against my wife, and let my children go:
But fullen Pæan shoots at sons and mothers too.
His Niobe and all his boys he lost;
Ev'n her, who did her numerous offspring boast,
As fair and fruitful as the sow that carry'd
The thirty pigs at one large litter farrow'd.
- What beauty or what chastity can bear
So great a price? If stately and severe,
She still insults, and you must still adore;
Grant that the honey's much, the gall is more.
Upbraided with the virtues she displays, [praise:
Seven hours in twelve, you loath the wife you
Some faults, though small, intolcrable grow;
For what so nauseous and affected too,
As those that think they due perfection want,
Who have not learnt to lip the Grecian cant?
In Greece their whole accomplishments they seek:
Their fashion, breeding, language, must be Greek:
But raw, in all that does to Rome belong,
They scorn to cultivate their mother-tongue.

In Greek they flatter, all their fears they speak,
Tell all their secrets; nay, they scold in Greek:
Ev'n in the feat of love, they use that tongue.
Such affectations may become the young:
But thou, old hag, of threescore years and three
Is showing of thy parts in Greek for thee?
Zav̄ kai ψυχή! All those tender words
'The momentary trembling bliss affords
'The kind soft murmurs of the private sheets
Are bawdy, while thou speak'st in public streets.
Those words have fingers; and their force is such
They raise the dead, and mount him with a touch
But all provocatives from thee are vain:
No blandishment the slacken'd nerve can strain.

If then thy lawful spouse thou canst not love,
What reason should thy mind to marriage move?
Why all the charges of thy nuptial feast,
Wine and deserts, and sweetmeats to digest?
Th' endowing gold that buys the dear delight,
Giv'n for their first and only happy night?
If thou art thus uxoriously inclin'd,
To bear thy bondage with a willing mind,
Prepare thy neck, and put it in the yoke:
But for no mercy from thy woman look.
For though, perhaps, she loves with equal fires,
To absolute dominion she aspires;
Joys in the spoils, and triumphs o'er thy purse;
The better husband makes the wife the worse.
Nothing is thine, to give, or sell, or buy
All offices of ancient friendship die;
Nor hast thou leave to make a legacy:
By thy imperious wife thou art bereft;
A privilege, to pimps and panders left;
Thy testament's her will; where she prefers
Her ruffians, drudges, and adulterers,
Adopting all thy rivals for thy heirs.

Go drag that slave to death: your reason, why
Should the poor innocent be doom'd to die?
What proofs? For, when man's life is in debate,
The judge can ne'er too long deliberate.
Call't thou that slave a man, the wife replies:
Prov'd, or unprov'd, the crime, the villain dies.
I have the sov'reign pow'r to save or kill;
And give no other reason but my will.

Thus the she-tyrant reigns, till, pleas'd with change,

Her wild affections to new empires range:
Another subject-husband she desires,
Divorc'd from him, she to the first retires,
While the last wedding-feast is scarcely o'er,
And garlands hang yet green upon the door.
So still the reckoning rises, and appears,
In total sum, eight husbands in five years.
The title for a tomb-stone might be fit;
But that it would too commonly be writ.
Her mother living, hope no quiet day;
She sharpens her, instructs her how to flea
Her husband bare, and then divides the prey.
She takes love-letters, with a crafty smile,
And, in her daughter's answer, mends the style.
In vain the husband sets his watchful spies;
She cheats their cunning, or she bribes their eyes.
The doctor's call'd; the daughter, taught the trick
Pretends to faint; and in full health is sick:
The panting stallion, at the closet-door,
Hears the consult, and wishes it were o'er.
Canst thou, in reason, hope, a bawd to know,
Should teach her other manners than her own?

Her interest is in all th' advice she gives:
'Tis on the daughter's rents the mother lives.

No cause is try'd at the litigious bar,
But women plaintiffs or defendants are,
They form the proccs, all the briefs they write;
The topics furnish, and the pleas indite;
And teach the toothless lawyer how to bite.

They turn viragos too; the wrestler's toil
They try, and smear their naked limbs with oil:
Against the post their wicker shields they crush,
Flourish the sword, and at the sashtron push.

Of every exercise the manish crew
Fulfils the parts, and oft' excels us too;
Prepar'd not only in feign'd fights t' engage,
But rout the gladiators on the stage.

What sense of shame in such a breast can lie,
Inur'd to arms, and her own sex to fly?
Yet to be wholly man she would disclaim;
To quit her tenfold pleasure at the game,
For frothy praises and an empty name.

Oh what a decent sight 'tis to behold
All thy wife's magazine by auction fold!
The belt, the crusted plume, the several suits
Of armour, and the Spanish-leather boots!
Yet these are they, that cannot bear the heat
Of figur'd silks, and under farcenet sweat.

Behold the strutting Amazonian whore
She stands in guard with her right-foot before:
Her coats tuck'd up; and all her motions just,
She stamps, and then cries hah! at every truss.

The ghosts of ancient Romans, should they rise,
Would grin to see their daughters play a prize.
Besides, what endless brawls by wives are bred:
The curtain-lecture makes a mournful bed.

Then, when she has thee sure within the sheets,
Her cry begins, and the whole day repeats.
Conscious of crimes herself, she teazes first;
'Thy servants are accus'd; thy whore is curs'd;

She acts the jealous, and at will she cries:
For women's tears are but the sweat of eyes.
Poor cuckold-fool, 'thou think'st that love sincere,
And suck'st between her lips the falling tear:

But search her cabinet, and thou shalt find
Each tiller there with love-epistles lin'd.
Suppose her taken in a close embrace,
This you would think so manifest a case,

No rhetoric could defend, no impudence offence;
And yet, ev'n then, she cries, the marriage-vow
A mental reservation must allow;

And there's a silent bargain still imply'd,
The parties should be pleas'd on either side:
And both may for their private needs provide.
Though men yourselves, and women us you call,
Yet homo is a common name for all.

There's nothing bolder than a woman caught;
Guilt gives them courage to maintain their fault.
You ask from whence proceed these monstrous crimes?

Once poor, and therefore chaste, in former times,
Our matrons were: no luxury found room
In low-roof'd houses, and bare walls of lome;
Their hands with labour harden'd while 'twas
A frugal sleep supply'd the quiet night,

While pinch'd with want, their hunger held them
straight:
When Hannibal was hovering at the gate:
But wanton now, and lolling at our ease,
We suffer all th' inveterate ills of peace,

And wasteful riot, whose destructive charms
Revenge the vanquish'd world, of our victorious
arms.

No crime, no lustful postures are unknown;
Since poverty, our guardian god, is gone:
Pride, laziness, and all luxurious arts,
Pour like a deluge in, from foreign parts:
Since gold obscene, and silver, found the way,
Strange fashions with strange bullion to convey,
And our plain simple manners to betray.

What care our drunken dames to whom they
spread?

Wine no distinction makes of tail or head.
Who, lewdly dancing at a midnight ball,
For hot eringoes and fat oysters call:
Full brimmers to their fuddled noses thrust;
Brimmers, the last provocatives of lust.

When vapours to their swimming brains advance,
And double tapers on the tables dance.

Now think what bawdy dialogues they have,
What Tullia talks to her confiding slave,
At modesty's old statue; when by night
They make a stand, and from their litters light;
The good man early to the levee goes,
And treads the nasty paddlè of his spouse.

The secrets of the goddesses nam'd the good,
Arc ev'n by boys and barbers understood:
Where the rank matrons, dancing to the pipe,
Gig with their bums, and are for action ripe;

With music rais'd, they spread abroad their hair:
And toss their heads like an enamour'd mare:
Rank'd with the lady the cheap sinner lies;
For here, not blood, but virtue, gives the prize.

Nothing is feign'd in this venereal firie;
'Tis downright lust, and acted to the life.
So full, so fierce, so vigorous, and so strong,
That, looking on, would make old Nestor young.

Impatient of delay, a general found,
And universal groan of lust, goes round;
For then, and only then, the sex sincere is found.
Now is the time of action: Now begin,
They cry, and let the lusty lovers in.

The whoresons are asleep; then bring the slaves,
And watermen, a race of strong-back'd knaves.
I wish, at least, our sacred rites were free
From those pollutions of obscenity:

But 'tis well known what sinner, how disguis'd,
A lewd audacious action enterpris'd;
Into the fair, with women mix'd, he went,
Arm'd with a huge two-handed instrument;

A grateful present to those holy choirs,
Where the mouse, guilty of his sex, retires;
And ev'n male-pictures modestly are veil'd,
Yet no profaneness on that age prevail'd;

No scoffers at religious rites are found;
Though now, at every altar they abound.
I hear your cautious counsel, you would say,
Keep close your women under lock and key:

But, who shall keep those keepers? Women, nurs't,
In craft: begin with those, and bribe them first.
The sex is turn'd all whore; they love the game:
And mistresses and maids are both the same.

The poor Ogulnia, on the poet's day,
Will borrow clothes; and chair, to see the play:
She, who before had mortgag'd her estate,
And pawn'd the last remaining piece of plate.
Some are reduc'd their utmost shifts to try:
But women have no shame of poverty:

They live beyond their stint; as if their store,
The more exhausted, would increase the more:
Some men, instructed by the labouring ant,
Provide against th' extremities of want;
But womankind, that never knows a mean,
Down to the dregs their sinking fortune drain:
Hourly they give, and spend, and waste, and wear:
And think no pleasure can be bought too dear. . . .
. . . . If songs they love, the finger's voice they force
Beyond his compass till his quail-pipe's hoarse;
His lute and lyre with their embrace is worn;
With knots they trim it, and with gems adorn:
Run over all the strings, and kiss the case;
And make love to it, in the master's place.

A certain lady once, of high degree,
To Janus vow'd, and Vesta's deity,
That Pollio might, in singing, win the prize;
Pollio the dear, the darling of her eyes:
She pray'd and brib'd; what could she more have done

For a sick husband, or an only son?
With her face veil'd, and heaving up her hands,
The shameless suppliant at the altar stands;
The forms of prayer she solemnly pursues:
And, pale with fear, the offer'd entrails views.
Answer, ye powers; for, if you heard her vow,
Your godships, sure, had little else to do.

This is not all; for actors they implore:
An impudence not known to heaven before.
Th' Aruspex, tir'd with this religious rout,
Is forc'd to stand so long, he gets the goat.
But suffer not thy wife abroad to roam,
If the loves singing, let her sing at home;
Not strut in streets, with Amazonian pace;
For that's to cuckold thee before thy face.

Their endless itch of news comes next in play;
They vent their own, and hear what others say.
Know what in Thrace, or what in France, is done;
Th' intrigues betwixt the stepdame and the son.
Tell who loves who, what favours some partake:
And who is jilted for another's sake.

What pregnant widow in what month was made,
How oft she did, and doing, what she said.
She, first, beholds the raging comet rise:
Knows whom it threatens, and what lands destroys.
Still for the newest news she lies in wait;
And takes reports just entering at the gate.
Wrecks, floods, and fires: whatever she can meet,
She spreads, and is the fame of every street.
This is a grievance; but the next is worse;
A very judgment, and her neighbour's curse;
For, if their barking dog disturb her ease,
No prayer can bind her, no excuse appease.

Th' unmanner'd malefactor is arraign'd;
But first the master, who the cur maintain'd,
Must feel the scourge: by night she leaves her bed,
By night her bathing equipage is led,
That marching armies a less noise create;
She moves in tumult, and she sweats in state.
Meanwhile, her guests their appetites must keep;
Some gape for hunger, and some gasp for sleep.
At length she comes, all stufh'd; but ere she sup,
Swallows a swinging preparation-cup;
And then, to clear her stomach, spews it up.
The deluge vomit all the floor o'erflows,
And the four favour nauseates every nose.
She drinks again; again she spews a lake;
Her wretched husband sees, and dares not speak:

But mutters many a curse against his wife;
And damns himself for chusing such a life.

But of all the plagues the greatest is untold:
The book-learn'd wife in Greek and Latin bold.
The critic-dame who at her table sits:
Homer and Virgil quotes, and weighs their wits;
And pities Dido's agonizing fits.
She has so far th' ascendunt of the board,
The prating pedant puts not in one word:
The man of law is non-plust in his suit;
Nay, every other female tongue is mute.
Hammers, and beating anvils, you would swear,
And Vulcan with his whole militia there.
Tabor and trumpets cease; for she alone
Is able to redeem the labouring moon.
Ev'n wit's a burthen, when it talks too long:
But she who has no continence of tongue,
Should walk in breeches, and should wear a beard:
And mix among the philosophic herd.

O what a midnight curse has he, whose side
Is pester'd with a mood and figure bride!
Let mine, ye gods! (if such must be my fate)
No logic learn, nor history translate;
But rather be a quiet, humble fool:
I hate a wife to whom I go to school,
Who climbs the grammar-tree, distindly knows
Where noun, and verb, and participle grows;
Corrects her country neighbour; and, a-bed,
For breaking Priscian's, breaks her husband's head.
The gaudy gossip, when she's set agog,
In jewels dress'd, and at each ear a bob,
Goes flaunting out, and, in her trim of pride,
Thinks all the fays or does is justify'd.
When poor, she's scarce a tolerable evil;
But rich, and fine, a wife's a very devil.

She duly, once a month, renews her face;
Meantime, it lies in dawb, and hid in grease;
Those are the husband's nights; she craves her due,

He takes fat kisses, and, is stuck with glue.
But to the lov'd adulterer when she steers,
Fresh from the bath, in brightness she appears:
For him the rich Arabia sweats her gum;
And precious oils from distant Indies come:
How haggardly soe'er she looks at home.
Th' eclipse then vanishes; and all her face
Is open'd, and restor'd to every grace,
The crust remov'd, her cheeks as smooth as silk,
Are polish'd with a wash of asses milk;
And should she to the farthest north be sent,
A train of these attend her banishment.
But hadst thou seen her plaister'd up before,
'Twas so unlike a face, it seem'd a fore.

'Tis worth our while, to know what all the day
They do, and how they pass their time away,
For, if o'er night the husband has been slack,
Or counterfeited sleep, and turn'd his back,
Next day, be sure, the servants go to wrack.
The chamber-maid and dresser are call'd whores;
The page is stript, and beaten out of doors.
The whole house suffers for the master's crime:
And he himself is warn'd, to wake another time:

She hires tormentors for the year; she treats
Her visitors, and talks; but still she beats.
Beats while she paints her face, surveys her gown,
Casts up the day's account, and still beats on:
Tir'd out, at length, with an outrageous tone,
She bids them in the devil's name be gone;

Skill'd in the globe and sphere, he gravely stands,
And, with his compass, measures seas and lands.

The poorest of the sex have still an itch
To know their fortunes, equal to the rich.
The dainty-maid inquires, if she shall take
The trusty taylor, and the cook forsake.

Yet these, though poor, the pain of childbed bear;
And, without nurses, their own infants rear:
You seldom hear of the rich mantle, spread
For the babe, born in the great lady's bed.
Such is the power of herbs; such arts they use
To make them barren, or their fruit to lose.
But thou, whatever stops she will have bought,
Be thankful, and supply the deadly draught:
Help her to make man-slaughter; let her bleed,
And never want for saving at her need.
For, if she holds till her nine months be run,
Thou may'st be father to an Æthiop's son.
A boy, who, ready gotten to thy hands,
By law is to inherit all thy lands:
One of that hue, that, should he cross the way,
His women would discolour all the day.

I pass the foundling by, a race unknown,
At doors expos'd, whom matrons make their own:
And into noble families advance
A nameless issue, the blind work of chance.
Indulgent fortune does her care employ,
And, smiling, broods upon the naked boy:
Her garment spreads, and laps him in the fold,
And covers with her wings, from nightly cold:
Gives him her blessing; puts him in a way;
Sets up the farce, and laughs at her own play.
Him she promotes; she favours him alone,
And makes provision for him, as her own.

The craving wife, the force of magic tries,
And philters for th' unable husband buys:
The potion works not on the part design'd;
But turns his brains, and stupifies his mind.
The fotted moon-calf gapes, and staring on,
Sees his own business by another done:
A long oblivion, a benumbing frost,
Constrains his head; and yesterday is lost:
Some nimbler juice would make him foam and rave,

Like that Cæsonia to her Caius gave:
Who, plucking from the forehead of the sole
His mother's love, infus'd it in the bowl:
The boiling blood ran hissing in his veins,
Till the mad vapour mounted to his brains.
The thunderer was not half so much on fire,
When Juno's girdle kindled his desire
What woman will not use the poisoning trade,
When Cæsar's wife the precedent has made;

Let Agrippina's mushroom be forgot,
Giv'n to a flaving, old, unuseful foot;
That only clos'd the driveling dotard's eyes,
And sent his godhead downward to the skies.
But this fierce potion calls for fire and sword;
Nor spares the common, when it strikes the lord.
So many mischiefs were in one combin'd;
So much one single poisoner cost mankind.

If stepdames seek their sons-in-law to kill,
'Tis venial trespass; let them have their will:
But let the child, intrusted to the care
Of his own mother, of her bread beware:
Beware the food she reaches with her hand;
The morsel is intended for thy land.
Thy tutor be thy taster, ere thou eat;
There's poison in thy drink, and in thy meat.

You think this feign'd; the satire in a rage
Struts in the buskins of the tragic stage,
Forgets his business is to laugh and bite;
And will of deaths and dire revenges write.
Would it were all a fable, that you read;
But Drymon's wife pleads guilty to the deed.
I (she confesses) in the fact was caught,
Two sons dispatching at one deadly draught.
What two! Two sons, thou viper, in one day!
Yes, seven, she cries, if seven were in my way.
Medea's legend is no more a lie;
One age adds credit to antiquity.
Great ills, we grant, in former times did reign,
And murders then were done: but not for gain.
Lest admiration to great crimes is due, [pursue.
Which they through wrath, or through revenge,
For, weak of reason, impotent of will,
The sex is hurry'd headlong into ill:
And, like a cliff from its foundation torn,
By raging earthquakes, into seas, is borne.
But those are fiends, who crimes from thought begin:

And, cool in mischief, meditate the sin.
They read th' example of a pious wife,
Redeeming with her own, her husband's life;
Yet, if the laws did that exchange afford,
Would save their lapdog sooner than their lord.
Where'er you walk, the Belides you meet;
And Clytemnestras grow in every street:
But here's the difference; Agamemnon's wife
Was a gross butcher with a bloody knife;
But murder, now, is to perfection grown,
And subtle poisons are employ'd alone:
Unless some antidote prevents their arts,
And lines with balsam all the nobler parts:
In such a case, reserv'd for such a need,
Rather than fail, the dagger does the deed.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE hope and encouragement of all the learned, is only reposed in Cæsar; whether in Domitian, Nero, or Trajan, is left doubtful by the poet. The nobility, which in reason ought to patronize poetry, and reward it, are now grown fordidly covetous; and think it enough for them barely to praise

The writers, or to write ill-verses themselves. This gives occasion to our author, to lament likewise the hard fortune and necessities of other arts, and their professors; particularly historians, lawyers, rhetoricians, and grammarians.

ON Cæsar all our studies must depend ;
 For Cæsar is alone the muses friend :
 When now the celebrated wits, for need
 Hire Bagnio's, to the crier's trade succeed,
 Or get their own, by baking other's bread ;
 Or by the porter's lodge, with beggars, wait
 For greasy fragments at the great man's gate.
 'Tis better, so ; if thy poetic fob
 Refuse to pay an ordinary's club ;
 And much more honest, to be hir'd, and stand
 With auctionary hammer in thy hand,
 Provoking to give more, and knocking thrice
 For the sold household stuff, or picture's price ;
 Exposing play-books, full of fustian lines,
 Or the dull libraries of dead divines.

Ev'n this is better, though 'tis hardly got,
 Than be a perjurd witness of a plot,
 To swear he saw three inches through a door,
 As Asiatic evidences swore ;
 Who hither coming, out at heels and knees,
 For this had pensions, titles, and degrees.
 Henceforward let no poet fear to starve,
 Cæsar will give, if we can but deserve.
 Tune all your lyres, the monarch's praise invites
 The lab'ring muse, and vast reward excites.
 But if from other hands than his, you think
 To find supply, 'tis loss of pen and ink :
 Let flames on your unlucky papers prey,
 Or moths through written pages eat their way :
 Your wars, your loves, your praises be forgot,
 And make of all an universal blot.
 The muses ground is barren desert all,
 If no support from Cæsar's bounty fall ;
 The rest is empty praise, an ivy crown,
 Or the lean statue of a starv'd renown.

For now the cunning patron never pays,
 But thinks he gives enough, in giving praise ;
 Extols the poem, and the poets vein,
 As boys admire the peacock's gaudy train :
 Meanwhile thy manhood, sit for toils and wars,
 Patient of seas, and storms, and household cares,
 Ebbs out apace, and all thy strength impairs,
 Old age, with silent pace, comes creeping on,
 Naufricates the praise, which in her youth she won,
 And hates the muse by which she was undone.

The tricks of thy base patron now behold,
 To spare his purse, and save his darling gold :
 In his own coin the starving wit he treats ;
 Himself makes verses, which himself repeats ;
 And yields to Homer on no other score,
 Than that he liv'd a thousand years before.
 But if to fame alone thou dost pretend,
 The miser will his empty palace lend ;
 Set wide his doors, adorn'd with plated brass,
 Where doves, as at a city-gate may pass ;
 A spacious hall afford thee to rehearse,
 And send his clients to applaud thy verse ;
 But not one farthing to defray the costs
 Of carpenters, the pulpit, and the posts.

House-room that costs him nothing, he bestows,
 Yet still we scribble on, though still we lose ;
 We drudge, and cultivate with care, a ground
 Where no return of gain was ever found :

The charms of poetry our souls bewitch ;
 The curse of writing is an endless itch.

But he whose noble genius is allow'd ;
 Who with stretch'd pinions soars above the crowd ;
 Who mighty thought can clothe with manly dress,
 He, who I fancy, but can ne'er express ;
 Such, such a wit, though rarely to be found,
 Must be secure from want, if not abound.
 Nice is his make, impatient of the war,
 Avoiding bus'ness, and abhorring care ;
 He must have groves, and lonely fountains choose,
 And easy solitudes to bait his muse ;
 Unvex'd with thought of wants, which may betide, .

Or for to morrow's dinner to provide.
 Horace ne'er wrote but with a rosy cheek,
 His belly pamper'd, and his sides were sleek.
 A wit should have no care, or this alone,
 To make his rising numbers justly run,
 Phœbus and Bacchus, those two jolly gods,
 Bear no starv'd poets to their blest abodes.
 'Tis not for hungry wit, with wants controll'd,
 The face of Jove in council to behold :
 Or fierce Alecto, when her brand she tofs'd,
 Betwixt the Trojan and Rutulian host :
 If Virgil's suit Mæcænas had not sped,
 And sent Alexis to the poet's bed,
 The crested snakes had dropt upon the ground,
 And the loud trumpet languish'd in the sound.

Yet we expect that Lappa's muse should please,
 As much as did immortal Sophocles ;
 When he his dithes and his clothes has sent
 To pawn, for payment of a quarter's rent :
 His patron Numitor will nothing lend,
 Pleads want of money to his wretched friend,
 Yet can large presents to his harlot send ;
 Can purchase a tame lion, and can treat
 The kingly slave with sev'ral sorts of meat :
 It seems he thinks th' expence is more, to feast
 The famish'd poet, than the hungry beast.

Lucan, content with praise, may lie at ease
 In costly grotts, and marble palaces :
 But to poor Bassius what avails a name ;
 To starve on compliments, and empty fame ?

All Rome is pleas'd, when Statius will rehearce,
 And longing crowds expect the promis'd verse :
 His lofty numbers with so great a gust
 They hear, and swallow with such eager lust :
 But, while the common suffrage crown'd his cause,
 And broke the benches with their loud applause ;
 His muse had starv'd, had not a piece unread,
 And by a player bought, supply'd her bread.

He could dispose of honours, and commands,
 The pow'r of Rome was in an actor's hands ;
 The peaceful gown, and military sword :
 The pouncetous play'r out-give the pinching lord.
 And would thou, poet, rise before the sun,
 And to his honour's lazy levee run ?
 Stick to the stage, and leave thy fordid peer ;
 And yet, heav'n knows, 'tis earn'd with hardship
 there.

The former age did one Mæcænas see,
 One giving lord of happy memory.

Then, then, 'twas worth a writer's pains, to pine,
Look pale, and all December taste no wine.

Such is the poet's lot: what luckier fate
Does on the works of grave historians wait?
More time they spend, in greater toils engage;
Their volumes swell beyond the thousandth page:
For thus the laws of history command;
And much good paper suffers in their hand.
What harvest rises from this labour'd ground?
Where they get pence, a clerk can get a pound.
A lazy tribe, just of the poet's pitch,
Who think themselves above the growing rich.

Next show me the well-lung'd Civilian's gain,
Who bears in triumph an artill'ry train
Of chancery libels; opens first the cause,
Then with a pick-lock tongue perverts the laws;
Talks loud enough in conscience for his fee,
Takes care his client all his zeal may see;
Twitch'd by the sleeve, he mouths it more and
more,

Till with white froth his gown is flaver'd o'er.
Ask what he gains by all this lying prate,
A captain's plunder trebles his estate.
The magistrate assumes his awful seat;
Stand forth, pale Ajax, and thy speech repeat:
Assert thy client's freedom; bawl, and tear
So loud, thy country-judge at least may hear,
If not discern; and when thy lungs are sore,
Hang up the victor's garland at thy door:
Ask for what price thy venial tongue was sold:
A rusty gammon of some sev'n years old:
Tough, wither'd treuffles; rosy wine, a dish
Of stotten herrings, or stale stinking fish.
For four times talking, if one piece thou take,
That must be cantled, and the judge go snack.
'Tis true, Emilius takes a five-fold fee,
Though some plead better, with more law than he:
But then he keeps his coach, six Flanders mares
Draw him in state, whenever he appears:
He shows his statue too, where plac'd on high,
The ginner, underneath him, seems to fly;
While with a lifted spear, in armour bright,
His aiming figure meditates a fight.
With arts like these, rich Matho when he speaks,
Attracts all fees, and little lawyers breaks.

Tongillus, very poor, has yet an itch
Of gaining wealth, by feigning to be rich;
Bathes often, and in state, and proudly vain,
Sweeps through the streets with a long dirty
train:

From thence with lackeys running by his side,
High on the backs of brawney slaves will ride,
In a long litter, through the market-place;
And with a nod the distant rabble grace:
Clad in a gown, that glows with Tyrian dye,
Surveys rich moveables with curious eye,
Beats down the price, and threatens still to buy.
Nor can I wonder at such tricks as these,
The purple garments raise the lawyer's fees:
And sell him dearer to the fool that buys;
High pomp and state are useful properties.
The luxury of Rome will know no end;
For still the less we have, the more we spend.
Trust eloquence to show our parts and breeding!
Not Tully now could get ten groats by pleading;
Unless the diamond glitter'd on his hand;
Wealth's all the rhet'ric clients understand:

Without large equipage, and loud expence,
The prince of orators would scarce speak sense.
Paulus, who with magnificence did plead,
Grew rich, while tatter'd Gallus begg'd his bread.
Who to poor Bassus his cause would trust,
Though ne'er so full of pity, ne'er so just?
His clients, unregard'd, claim their due:
For eloquence in rags was never true.
Go, wretch, thy pleadings into Afric send;
Or France, where merit never needs a friend.

But oh, what stock of patience wants the fool,
Who wastes his time and breath in teaching school!

To hear the speeches of declaiming boys,
Deposing tyrants with eternal noise!
Sitting or standing, still confin'd to roar
In the same verse, the same rules o'er and o'er:
What kind the speech, what colours, how to purge
Objections, state the case, and reasons urge.
All would learn these; but at the quarter-day,
Few parents will the pedant's labour pay.
Pay, Sir! for what? The scholar knows no more
At six months end, than what he knew before:
Taught, or untaught, the dunce is still the same,
Yet still the wretched master bears the blame.
Once ev'ry week poor Hannibal is maul'd;
The theme is giv'n, and streight the council's
call'd,

Whether he should to Rome directly go,
To reap the fruit of the dire overthrow;
Or into quarters put his harais'd men
Till spring returns, and take the field again.
The murder'd master cries, Would parents hear
But half that stuff which I am bound to bear.
For that revenge I'll quit the whole arrears.

The same complaints most other pedants make;
Plead real causes, and the feign'd forsake:
Medea's poison, Jason's perjury,
And Philomela's rape, are all laid by;
The accusing stepdame, and the son accus'd:
But if my friendly counsel might be us'd,
Let not the learn'd this course or t'other try,
But, leaving both, profess plain poverty;
And show his tally for the dole of bread,
With which the parish poor are daily fed:
Ev'n that exceeds the price of all thy pains.

Now look into the music-master's gains,
Where noble youth at vast expence is taught;
But eloquence not valu'd at a groat.
On sumptuous baths the rich their wealth bestow
On some expensive airy portico;
Where safe from showers they may be borne in state
And free from tempests, for fair weather wait:
Or rather, not expect the clearing sun,
Through thick and thin their equipage must run
Or staying, 'tis not for the servant's sake,
But that their mules no prejudice may take.
At the walk's end, behold, how rais'd on high,
A banquet-house salutes the southern sky;
Where from afar the winter-sun displays
The milder influence of his weaken'd rays.

The cook, and fewer each his talent tries;
In various figures scenes of dishes rise:
Besides, a master-cook, with greasy fist,
Dives in luxurious sauces to the wrist.
Amidst this wasteful riot, there accrues
But poor ten shillings for Quintilian's dues:

For, to breed up the son to common sense
Is evermore the parents least expence.
From whence then comes Quintilian's vast estate?

Because he was the darling son of fate;
And luck, in scorn of merit, made him great.
Urge not th' example of one single man,
As rare as a white crow, or fable swan,
Quintilian's fate was to be counted wise,
Rich, noble, fair, and in the state to rise:
Good fortune grac'd his action, and his tongue;
His colds became him, and when hoarse he sung.
O, there's strange difference, what planets stied
Their influence on th' new-born infant's head!
'Tis fate that flings the dice; and as the flings,
Of kings makes pedants, and of pedants kings.
What made Vintidius rise, and Tullus great,
But their kind stars, and lidden pow'r of fate?

Few pedagogues but curse the barren chair;
Like him who hang'd himself for mere despair
And poverty; or him, whom Caius sent
For liberty of speech to banishment.
Ev'n Socrates in rags at Athens taught,
And wanted to deiray the deadly draught.
In peace, ye shades of our great grandfies rest,
No heavy earth your sacred bones molest:
Eternal spring, and rising flow'rs adorn
The relics of each venerable urn,
Who pious rev'rence to their tutors paid,
As parents honour'd, and as gods obey'd.
Achilles, grown in stature, fear'd the rod,
And stood corrected at the Centaur's nod;
His tender years in learning did employ,
And promis'd all the hero in the boy.
The scene's much alter'd in the modern school,
The boys of Rufus call their master fool;
A just revenge on him, who durst defame
The merit of immortal Tully's name.

But ask, what fruit Palemon's pains have earn'd,
Or who has paid the price of what he learn'd;

Though grammar profits less than rhetoric are,
Yet ev'n in those his uther claims a share;
Besides, the servants' wages must be paid:
Thus of a little, still a less is made:
As merchants gains come short of half the mart,
For he who drives their bargains, dribs a part.
The covetous father now includes the night,
And cov'nants, thou shalt teach by candle-light;
When puffing smiths, and ev'ry painful trade
Of handicrafts in peaceful beds are laid:
Then thou art bound to smell on either hand
As many stinking lamps, as school-boys stand;
Where Horace could not read in his own fully'd book:

And Virgil's sacred page is all besmear'd with smoke.

But when thou dunn't their parents, seldom they

Without a suit before the tribune, pay,
And yet hard laws upon the master lay.
Be sure he knows exactly grammar-rules,
And all the best historians read in schools;
All authors, ev'ry poet to an hair;
That, ask'd the question, he may scarce despair,
To tell who nurs'd Anchises; or to name
Anchemolus's stepmother, and whence she came:
How long Acestes liv'd, what stores of wine
He gave to the departing Trojan line.
Bid him besides, his daily pains employ,
To form the tender manners of the boy;
And work him, like a waxen babe, with art
To perfect symmetry in ev'ry part:
To be his better parent, to beware
No young obscenities his strength impair,
No mutual filth; to mark his hands and eyes,
Distorted with unnatural ecstasies:
This be thy talk; and yet for all thy pains,
At the year's end expect no greater gains,
Than what a fencer, at a prize, obtains.

THE ARGUMENT.

In this satire, the poet proves that nobility does not consist in statues and pedigrees, but in honourable and good actions: He lashes Rubellius Plancus, for being insolent, by reason of his high birth; and lays down an instance that we ought to make the like judgment of men, as we do of horses, who are valued rather according to their personal qualities, than by the race of whence they come. He advises his noble friend Ponticus (to whom he dedicates the satire) to lead a virtuous life, dissuading him from debauchery, luxury, oppression, cruelty, and other vices, by his severe censures on Lateranus, Damassippus, Gracchus, Nero, Catiline; and in opposition to these, displays the worth of persons meanly born, such as Cicero, Marius, servius Tullius, and the Decii.

WHAT the advantage, or the real good,
In tracing from the source our ancient blood?
To have our ancestors in paint or stone,
'reserv'd as relics, or, like monsters, shown?
The brave Æmilii, as in triumph plac'd,
The virtuous Curii, half by time defac'd;
Cornutus, with a mould'ring nose, that bears
Injurious scars, the sad effect of years;
And Galba grinning without nose or ears?

So Vain are their hopes, who fancy to inherit
By trees of pedigrees, or fame, or merit;
Though plodding heralds through each branch may trace
Old captains and dictators of their race,
While their ill lives that family belie,
And grieve the brass which stands dishonour'd by.
'Tis mere burlesque, that to our gen'ral's praise,
Their progeny immortal statues raise,

Yet (far from that old gallantry) delight
To game before their images all night,
20 And steal to bed at the approach of day,
The hour when these their ensigns did display.
Why should soft Fabius impudently bear
Names gain'd by conquests in the Gallic war?
Why lays he claim to Hercules's strain,
Yet dares be base, effeminate, and vain?
The glorious altar to that hero built,
Adds but a greater lustre to his guilt,
Whose tender limbs, and polish'd skin, disgrace
The grisly beauty of his manly race;
30 And who by practising the dismal skill
Of pois'ning, and such treacherous ways to kill,
Makes his unhappy kindred-marble sweat,
When his degen'rate head by theirs is fet.
Long galleries of ancestors, and all
Those follies which ill-grace a country-hall,
Challenge no wonder or esteem from thee;
"Virtue alone is true nobility."
Live therefore well: To men and gods appear,
Such as good Paulus, Cossus, Drusus were;
40 And in thy consular triumphal show,
Let these before thy father's statues go;
Place 'em before the ensigns of the state,
As choosing rather to be good than great.
Convince the world that you're devout and
true,
Be just in all you say, and all you do;
Whatever be your birth, you're sure to be
A peer of the first magnitude to me:
Rome for your sake shall push your conquests on,
And bring new titles home from nations won,
50 To dignify so eminent a son:
With your blest name shall ev'ry region sound,
Loud as mad Egypt, when her priests have found
A new Osiris, for the ox they drown'd.
But who will call those noble, who deface,
By meaner acts, the glories of their race;
Whose only title to our father's fame
Is couch'd in the dead letters of their name?
A dwarf as well may for a giant pass;
A negro for a swan; a crook-back'd lass
60 Be call'd Europa; and a cur may bear
The name of tiger, lion, or whate'er
Denotes the noblest or the fiercest beast:
Be therefore careful, lest the world in jest
Should thee just so with the mock-titles greet,
Of Cainerinus, or of conquer'd Crete.
To whom is this advice and censure due?
Rubellius Plancus, 'tis apply'd to you;
Who think your person second to divine,
Because descended from the Drusian line;
70 Though yet you no illustrious act have done
To make the world distinguish Julia's son
From the vile offspring of a trull, who sits
By the town-wall, and for her living knits.
You are poor rogues (you cry), the baser scum
And inconsiderable dregs of Rome;
Who knew not from what corner of the earth
The obscure wretch, who got you, stole his birth:
Mine, I derive from Cecrops—May your grace
Live, and enjoy the splendour of your race.
80 Yet of these base plebeians we have known
Some, who, by charming eloquence have grown
Great senators, and honours to that gown;

Some at the bar with subtilty defend
The cause of an unlearned noble friend;
Or on the bench the knotty laws untie:
Others their stronger youth to arms apply,
Go to Euphrates, or those forces join
Which garrison the conquests near the Rhine.
While you, Rubellius, on your birth rely;
90 Though you resemble your great family
No more, than those rough statues on the road
(Which we call Mercuries) are like that God:
Your blockhead though excels in this alone,
You are a living statue, that of stone.
Great son of Troy, who ever praids a beast
For being of a race above the rest,
But rather meant his courage, and his force?
To give an instance—We commend an horse
(Without regard of pasture, or of breed)
100 For his undaunted mettle and his speed;
Who wins most plates with greatest ease, and first
Prints with his hoofs his conquest on the dust.
But if fleet Dragon's progeny at last
Proves jaded, and in frequent matches cast,
No favour for the stallion we retain,
And no respect for the degenerate strain;
The worthless brute is from Newmarket brought
And at an under rate in Smithfield bought,
To turn a mill, or drag a loaded life
Beneath two panniers, and a baker's wife.
That we may therefore you, not yours, admire
First, Sir, some honour of your own acquire;
Add to that stock which justly we bestow
On those blest shades to whom you all thing
owe.
This may suffice the haughty youth to shame,
Whose swelling veins (if we may credit fame)
Burst almost with the vanity and pride,
That their rich flood to Nero's is ally'd:
The rumour's likely; for "We seldom find 110 Much sense with an exalted fortune join'd."
But, Ponticus, I would not you should raise
Your credit by hereditary praise;
Let your own acts immortalize your name;
" 'Tis poor relying on another's fame;"
For, take the pillars but away, and all
The superstructure must in ruins fall;
As a vine droops, when by divorce remov'd
From the embraces of the elm she lov'd.
Be a good soldier, or upright trustee,
120 An arbitrator from corruption free,
And if a witness in a doubtful cause,
Where a brib'd judge means to elude the laws;
Though Phalaris's brazen bull were there,
And he would dictate what he'd have you swear
Be not so profligate, but rather choose
To guard your honour, and your life to lose,
Rather than let your virtue be betray'd;
Virtue, the noble cause for which you're made.
"Improperly we measure life by breath;
130 Such do not truly live who merit death;"
Though they their wanton senses nicely please
With all the charms of luxury and ease;
Though mingled flow'rs adorn their careless brow
And round 'em costly sweets neglected flow,
As if they in their funeral state were laid,
And to the world, as they're to virtue, dead.
When you the province you expect, obtain,
From passion and from avarice refrain;

Let our associates poverty provoke
Thy generous heart not to increase their yoke,
Since riches cannot rescue from the grave,
Which claims alike the monarch and the slave.

To what the laws enjoin, submission pay;
And what the senate shall command, obey;
Think what rewards upon the good attend,
And how those fall unopitied who offend:
Tutor and Capitô may warnings be,
Who felt the thunder of the states decree,
For robbing the Cilicians, though they (Like lesser pikes) only subsist on prey:
But what avails the rigour of their doom?
Which cannot future violence o'ercome,
Nor give the miserable province ease,
Since what one plund'rer left, the next will seize.

Cherippus then, in time yourself bethink,
And what your rags will yield by auction, sink;
Ne'er put yourself to charges to complain
Of wrongs which heretofore you did sustain,
Make not a voyage to detect the theft,
Tis mad to lavish what their rapine left.

When Rome at first our rich allies subdu'd,
From gentle taxes noble spoils accru'd;
Each wealthy province, but in part oppress'd,
Thought the loss trivial, and enjoy'd the rest.
All treasuries did then with heaps abound;
In every wardrobe costly silks were found;
The least apartment of the meanest house
Could all the wealthy pride of art produce;
Pictures which from Parrhasius did receive
Motion and warmth; and statues taught to live;
Some Polyclete's, some Myron's work declar'd,
In others Phidia's masterpiece appear'd;
And crowding plate did on the cupboard stand,
Emboss'd by curious Mentor's artful hand.
Prizes like these oppressors might invite,
These Dolabella's rapine did excite,
These Anthony for his own theft thought fit,
Verres for these did sacrilege commit;
And when their reigns were ended, ships full fraught

The hidden fruits of their exaction brought,
Which made in peace a treasure richer far,
Than what is plunder'd in the rage of war.

This was of old; but our confederates now
Have nothing left but oxen for the plough,
Or some few mares reserv'd alone for breed;
Yet lest this provident design succeed,
They drive the father of the herd away,
Making both stallion, and his pasture, prey.
Their rapine is so abject and profane,
They nor from trifles, nor from gods refrain;
But the poor Lares from the niches seize,
If they be little images that please.
Such are the spoils which now provoke their theft,

And are the greatest, nay, they're all that's left.

Thus may you Corinth, or weak Rhodes oppress'd,
Who dare not bravely what they feel redress:
(For how can sops thy tyranny controul
Smooth limbs are symptoms of a servile soul)
But trespass not too far on sturdy Spain,
Sclavonia, France; thy gripes from those re-
strain,

Who with their sweat Rome's luxury maintain

And send us plenty, while our wanton day
Is lavish'd at the Circus, or the play.
For, should you to extortion be inclin'd,
Your cruel guilt will little booty find,
Since gleaming Marius has already seiz'd
All that from sun-burnt Afric can be squeez'd.

But above all, "Be careful to withhold
"Your talons from the wretched and the bold;
"Tempt not the brave and needy to despair;
"For, though your violence should leave 'em bare
"Of gold and silver, swords and darts remain,
"And will revenge the wrongs which they sustain:
"The plunder'd still have arms."——

Think not the precept I have here laid down
A fond, uncertain notion of my own;
No, 'tis a sibyl's leaf what I relate,
As fix'd and sure, as the decrees of fate.

Let none but men of honour you attend;
Choose him that has most virtue for your friend,
And give no way to any darling youth
To sell your favour, and pervert the truth.
Reclaim your wife from strolling up and down,
To all affizes, and through every town,
With claws like harpies, eager for the prey;
For your justice, and your fame will pay.
Keep yourself free from scandals such as these;
Then trace your birth from Picus, if you please:
If he's too modern, and your pride aspire
To seek the author of your being higher,
Choose any Titan who the gods withstood,
To be the founder of your ancient blood,
Prometheus, and that race before the flood,
Or any other story you can find
From heralds, or in poets, to your mind.

But should you prove ambitious, lustful, vain:
Or could you see with pleasure and disdain,
Rods broke on our associates' bleeding backs,
And heads men lab'ring till they blunt their axes:
Your father's glory will your sin proclaim,
And to a clearer light expose your shame;
"For, still more public scandal vice extends,
"As he is great and noble who offends."

How dare you then your high extraction plead?
Yet blush not when you go to forge a deed,
In the same temple which your grandfire built,
Making his statue privy to the guilt.
Or in a bawdy masquerade are led
Muffled by night to some polluted bed.

Fat Lateranus does his revels keep
Where his forefathers' peaceful ashes sleep;
Driving himself a chariot down the hill,
And (though a consul) links himself the wheel:
To do him justice, 'tis indeed by night,
Yet the moon sees, and ev'ry smaller light
Pries as a witness of the shameful fight:
Nay, when his year of honour's ended, soon
He'll leave that nicety, and mount at noon:
Nor blush should he some grave acquaintance
meet,

But (proud of being known,) will jerk and greet:
And when his fellow-beasts are weary grown,
He'll play the groom, give oats, and rub 'em
down.

If after Numa's ceremonial way
He at Jove's altar would a victim slay,
To no clean goddess he directs his pray'rs,
But by Hippona most devoutly swears,

Or some rank deity whose filthy face
We suitably o'er stinking stables place.

When he has run his length, and does begin
280 To teer his courie directly for the inn (Where they have watch'd, expecting him all night)

A greasy Syrian, ere he can alight,
Presents him essence, while his courteous host
(Well knowing nothing by good breeding's lost)
Tags every sentence with some fawning word,
Such as my king, my prince, at least my lord;
And a tight maid, ere he for wine can ask,
Gueeses his meaning, and un oils the flask.

Some (friends to vice) industriously defend 290 These innocent diversions, and pretend
That I the tricks of youth too roughly blame,
Alleging that, when young, we did the same.

I grant we did; yet when that age was past,
The frolic humour did no longer last;
We did not cherish and indulge the crime:
What's foul in acting, shou'd be left in time.
'Tis true, some faults, of course, with childhood end,

We therefore wink at wags when they offend
And spare the boy, in hopes the man may mend.

300 But Lateranus (now his vig'rous age
Shou'd prompt him for his country to engage,
The circuit of our empire to extend,
And all our lives, in Cæsar's, to defend)
Maturè in riots, places his delight
All day in plying bumpers, and at night
Reels to the bawds, over whose doors are set Pictures and bills, with—Here are whores to let.
Shou'd any desperate unexpected fate

Summon all heads and hands to guard the state,
310 Cæsar, send quickly to secure the port;
But where's the general? Where does he resort?
Send to the sutler's: There you're sure to find
The bully match'd with rascals of his kind,
Quacks, coffin-makers; fugitives and sailors;
Rooks, common soldiers, hangmen, thieves, and tailors; [cessions,

With Cybele's priests, who, weary'd with pro-Drink there, and sleep with knaves of all professions,

A friendly gang! each equal to the best;
And all, who can, have liberty to jest; [think 320 One flagon walks the round (that none shou'd
They either change, or flint him of his drink),
And lest exceptions may for place be found,
Their stools are all alike, their table round.

What think you, Ponticus, your self might do,
Shou'd any slave, so low, belong to you?

No doubt, you'd send the rogue in fetters bound,
To work in bridewell, or to plough your ground:
But, nobles, you who trace your birth from Troy,
Think, you the great prerogative enjoy

330 Of doing ill, by virtue of that race;
As it what we esteem in coblers base,
Wou'd the high family of Brutus grace.

Shameful are these examples, yet we find (To Rome's disgrace) far worse than these behind:

Poor Damasippus, whom we once have known
Flut'ring with coach and six about the town,
Is forc'd to make the stage his last retreat,
And pawns his voice, the all he has, for meat:

For now he must (since his estate is lost)
Or represent, or be himself, a ghost: 340
And Læstulus acts hanging with such art,
Were I a judge, he shou'd not feign the part.
Nor wou'd I their vile insolence acquit,
Who can with patience, nay diversion, sit,
Applauding my lord's buffoonry for wit.
And clapping farces, acted by the court,
While the peers cuff, to make the rabble sport:
Or hirelings, at a prize, their fortunes try;
Certain to fall unpy'd if they die;
Since none can have the favourable thought 350
That to obey a tyrant's will they fought,
But that their lives they willingly expose,
Bought by the prætors to adorn their shows.

Yet say the stage and lists were both in fight,
And you must either choose to act, or fight;
Death never sure bears such a ghastly shape,
That a rank coward basely wou'd escape
By playing a foul harlot's jealous tool,
Or a feign'd Andrew to a real fool.
Yet a peer actor is no monstrous thing, 360
Since Rome has own'd a fiddler for a king:
After such pranks, the world itself at best
May be imagin'd nothing but a jest.

Go to the lists where seats of arms are shown,
There you'll find Gracchus (from patrician)
grown

A fencer, and the scandal of the town.
Nor will he the Mirmillo's weapons bear,
The modest helmet he disdain'd to wear;
As Retarius he attacks his foe;
First waves his trident ready for the throw, 370
Next casts his net, but neither level'd right,
He stares about, expos'd to public fight,
Then places all his safety in his flight.
Room for the noble gladiator! See
His coat and hatband show his quality;
Thus when at last the brave Mirmillo knew
'Twas Gracchus was the wretch he did pursue,
To conquer such a coward griev'd him more,
Than if he many glorious wounds had bore.

Had we the freedom to express our mind, 380
There's not a wretch so much to vice inclin'd,
But will own Seneca did far excel
His pupil, by whose tyranny he fell:
To expiate whose complicated guilt,
With some proportion to the blood he spilt,
Rome shou'd more serpents, apes, and sacks provide

Than one, for the compendious parricide.
'Tis true Orestes a like crime did act;
Yet weigh the cause, there's difference in the fact
He slew his mother at the god's command, 390
They bid him strike, and did direct his hand
To punish falsehood, and appease the ghost
Of his poor father treacherously lost,
Just in the minute when the flowing bowl
With a full tide enlarg'd his cheerful soul.
Yet kill'd he not his sister, or his wife,
Nor aim'd at any near relation's life:
Orestes, in the heat of all his rage,
Ne'er play'd, or sung upon a public stage:
Never on verse did his wild thoughts employ, 400
To paint the horrid scene of burning Troy,
Like Nero, who to raise his fancy higher,
And finish the great work, set Rome on fire.

Such crimes make treason just, and might compel Virginus, Vindex, Galba, to rebel :

For what could Nero's self have acted worse,
To aggravate the wretched nation's curse.

These are the blest endowments, studies, arts,
Which exercise our mighty emperor's parts ;

Such frolics with his roving genius suit,
On foreign theatres to prostitute

His voice and honour, for the poor renown
Of putting all the Grecian actors down,

And winning at a wake their parsley crown.

Let this triumphal chaplet find some place
Among the other trophies of thy race ;

By thee Domitii's statues shall be laid
The habit and the mask in which you play'd

Antigone's, or bold Thyestes' part,
(While your wild nature little wanted art)

And on the marble pillar shall be hung
The lute to which the royal madman lung.

Who, Catiline, can boast a nobler line,
Than thy lewd friend Cethegus his, and thine ?

Yet you took arms, and did by night conspire
To set our houses, and our gods on fire :

(An enterprize which might indeed become
Our enemies, the Gauls, not fons of Rome,

To recompence whose barbarous intent
Pitch'd shirts would be too mild a punishment)

But Tully, our wife consul, watch'd the blow,
With care discover'd, and disarm'd the foe :

Tully, the humble murtherer, scarcely known :
The lowly native of a country town,

(Who till of late could never reach the height
Of being honour'd as a Roman knight)

Throughout the trembling city plac'd a guard,
Dealing an equal share to every ward,

And by the peaceful robe got more renown
Within our walls, than young Octavius won

By victories at Actium on the plain
Of Theffaly discolour'd by the slain :

Him therefore Rome in gratitude decreed
The father of his country, which he freed.

Marius (another consul we admire)
In the same village born, first plough'd for hire ;

His next advance was to the soldier's trade,
Where, if he did not nimbly ply the spade,

His surly officer ne'er fail'd to crack
His knotty cudgel on his tougher back.

Yet he alone secur'd the tottering state,
Withstood the Cimbrians, and redeem'd our

fate :

So when the eagles to their quarry flew (Who never such a goodly banquet knew)

Only a second laurel did adorn
His colleague Catulus, though nobly born ;

He shar'd the pride of the triumphal bay,
But Marius won the glory of the day.

From a mean stock the pious Decii came ;
Small their estates, and vulgar was their name ;

Yet such their virtue, that their loss alone
For Rome and all our legions did atone ;

Their country's doom, they by their own, re-triev'd,

Themselves more worth than all the host they sav'd.
The last good king whom willing Rome obey'd,

Was the poor offspring of a captive maid ;
Yet he those robes of empire justly bore

Which Romulus our sacred founder wore :
Nicely he gain'd, and well possess'd the throne,

Not for his father's merits but his own,

And reign'd, himself a family alone.

When Tarquin, his proud successor, was quell'd,
And with him lust and tyranny expell'd ;

The consuls' sons (who for their country's good,
And to enhance the honour of their blood,

Should have asserted what their father won ;
And, to confirm that liberty, have done

Actions which Cocles might have wish'd his
own ;

What might to Mutius wonderful appear ;
And what bold Clelia might with envy hear)

Open'd the gates, endeavouring to restore
Their banish'd king, and arbitrary power.

Whilst a poor slave, with scarce a name, betray'd
The horrid ills these well-born rogues had laid ;

Who therefore for their treason justly bore
The rods and ax, ne'er us'd in Rome before.

If you have strength Achilles' arms to bear,
And courage to sustain a ten year's war ;

Though foul,* Therfites got thee, thou shalt be
More lov'd by all, and more esteem'd by me,

Than if by chance you from some hero came,
In nothing like your father, but his name.

Boast then your blood, and your long lineage stretch

As high as Rome, and its great founders reach ;
You'll find, in these hereditary tales,

Your ancestors the scum of broken jails :
And Romulus, your honours ancient source,

But a poor shepherd's boy, or something worse.
* The ugly buffoon of the Grecian army.

TRANSLATED BY STEPHEN HARVEY, ESQ.

THE ARGUMENT.

JUVENAL here (in dialogue with Nevulus) exposes the detestable vice then practis'd in Rome, and the covetousness of a rich old citizen, which so prevail'd over his pleasure, that he would not gratify the drudge who had so often obliged him in the lewd enjoyment of his desire.

JUVENAL.

TELL me why, faunt'ring thus from place to place,

I meet thee (Nevulus) with a clouded face ?

What human ills can urge to this degree ;
Not vanquish'd Marস্য had a brow like thee,

Nor Ravola so sneak'd and hung his head,
Catch'd with that lewd bawd Rhodope in bed :

X x iij

Our grand bean Pollio seem'd not half so sad
 When not a drachma could in Rome be had.
 When treble use he proffer'd for a friend
 And tempting bribes did to the scriv'ners send,
 Yet none he found so much a fool to lend.
 Hard fate! unroll'd is now the charming dye
 The play-house and the parks unvisited must lie;
 The beauteous nymph in vain he does adore,
 And his gilt chariot-wheels must roll no more.

But why these frightful wrinkles in thy prime?

That show old age so long before the time;
 At lowest ebb of fortune when you lay
 (Contented then) how merry was the day.
 But of the curse of wishing to be great:
 Dazzled with hope we cannot see the cheat;
 Where wild ambition in the heart we find,
 Farewell content and quiet of the mind.
 For glittering clouds we leave the solid shore,
 And wonted happiness returns no more;
 Till such aspiring thoughts had fill'd thy breast,
 No man so pleasant, such a cheerful guest;
 So brisk, so gay, of that engaging air,
 No mirth was crown'd 'till Nevolus was there:
 The scene's now chang'd, that frolic genius fled,
 And gloomy thought seems enter'd in its stead;
 Thy clothes worn-out, not hands nor linen clean,
 And thy bare skin through the large rents is seen;
 Thy locks uncomb'd like a rough wood appear,
 And every part seems suited to thy care.
 Where now that labour'd niceness in thy dress,
 And all those arts that did the spark express?

A look so pale no quartane ever gave,
 Thy dwindled legs seem crawling to a grave:
 When we are touch'd with some important ill,
 How vainly silence would our grief conceal!
 Sorrow nor joy can be disguis'd by art,
 Our foreheads blab the secrets of our heart;
 By which (alas) 'tis evident and plain
 Thy hopes are dash'd, and thy endeavours vain;
 And yet 'tis strange! but lately thou wert known
 For the most envied stallion of the town.
 What conscious shrine, what cell by thee unsought,
 Where love's dark pleasures might be sold and bought?

From human view you hid these deeds of lust,
 But gods in brass and marble you cou'd trust:
 Ceres herself nor scap'd, for where can be
 From bawds and prostitutes an altar free?
 Nor didst thou only for the females burn,
 The husband and the wife succeeded in their turn.

NEVOLUS.

This life, I own, to some has prosp'rous been;
 But I have no such golden minutes seen:
 Right have you hit the cause of my distress,
 None has earn'd more, and been rewarded less:
 All I can gain is but a threadbare coat,
 And that with utmost pains and drudging got;
 Some single money too, but that (alas)
 Broken and counterfeit will hardly pass.
 Whilst others pamper'd in their shameless pride,
 Are serv'd in plate, and in their chariots ride;
 Tell me what mortal can his grief contain,
 That has, like me, such reason to complain?
 On fate alone man's happiness depends,
 To parts conceal'd fate's prying pow'r extends:
 And if our stars of their kind influence fail,
 The gifts of nature, what will they avail?

The gifts of nature! curse upon the thought,
 By that alone I am to ruin brought.
 Old Viro did the fatal secret hear
 (But curst on fame that bore it to his ear)
 What fortune address his wooing did begin?
 What oaths what promises to draw me in?
 Scarce could they fail to make a virgin sin.
 Who would't not then swear Nevolus had sped,
 And golden show'rs were dropping on his head?
 But oh this wretch, this prodigy behold!

A slave at once to lechery and gold!
 For in the act of his lewd brutal joy,
 Sirrah! my rogue (he cries) mine own dear boy
 My lad, my life! already ask for more?
 I paid last bout, and you must quit the score:
 "Poor five festertia have been all my gains,
 "And what is that for such detested pains?"
 Was it an ease and pleasure, cou'd'st thou say
 (Where nature's laws forbids) to force my way
 To the digested meals of yesterday?
 The slave more toil'd and harass will be found,
 Who digs his master's buttocks, than his ground:
 But sure old Virri thinks himself a boy,
 Whom Jove once more might languish to enjoy:
 Sees not his wither'd face and grizly hair,
 But would be thought smooth, charming, soft, and
 fair:

With female pride wou'd have his love be sought
 And every smile with a rich present bought.

Say, goat, for whom this mass of wealth you heap?

For whom thy hoarded bags in silence sleep?
 Apulian farms for the rich soil admir'd?
 And thy large fields where falcons may be tir'd?
 Thy fruitful vineyards on Campanian hills?
 (Tho' none drinks less, yet none more vessels fill
 From such a store 'tis barbarous to grudge
 A small relief to your exhausted drudge:
 Weigh well the matter, we're not fitter much
 The poor inhabitants of yonder thatch
 Call'd me their lord (who to extremes am driven
 Than to some worthless sycophant be given?
 (Yet what smooth sycophant by thee can gain?
 When lust itself strikes thy flint-heart in vain?
 A beggar! fie! 'tis impudence (he cry'd),
 And such mean shifting answers still reply'd;
 But rent unpaid, says beg till Viro grant;
 (How ill does modesty consist with want?)
 My single boy (like Polyphemus eye)
 Mourns his harsh fate, and weeps for a supply.
 One will not do, hard labour'd and hard fed,
 How then shall hungry two expect their bread?
 What shall I say, when rough December storms
 When frosts and snow, have cramp't their naked arms?

What comforts without money can I bring?
 Will they be satisfy'd to think on spring?

These motives urg'd to his obdurate mind,
 Is casting water to the adverse wind;
 But one thing yet, base wretch, I must impart,
 Thyself shalt own, ungrateful as thou art;
 At your entreaties, had not I obey'd?
 Still your deluded wife had been a maid:
 Down on the bridal-bed a maid she lay,
 A maid she rose, at the approaching day.
 Another night, thy lumpsish love she try'd,
 But still she rose, a virgin, and a bride:

What cou'd have touch'd her more! away she
 And every street of thy lost manhood rung. [flung,
 Her speaking eyes were full of thy disgrace;
 And her vext thoughts abhorr'd the cold embrace.
 Such wrongs, what wishing woman could have
 In rage, the marriage articles were torn: [borne?
 Yet when she vow'd, to see thy face no more,
 And heartless, thou stood'st whining at the door,
 I met the angry fair, all over charms,
 And catch'd her flying from thy frozen arms:
 Much pains it cost to right the injur'd dame;
 A whole night's vigour, to repair thy flame:
 Witnefs yourself, who heard the lab'ring bed,
 And shrieks at the departing maidenhead:
 " Thus many a spouse, who wou'd her choice re-
 " Is kept obedient by a kind gallant:" [cant;
 Now cou'd you shift all this and pass it o'er,
 Yet (monster) I have left one instance more.
 Think, if so well her business I have done,
 As that night's service may produce a son,
 Our Roman laws great privilege afford
 To him that stands a father on record:
 Thyself, 'tis true, a cuckold thou must own,
 But that reproach is in my breast alone,
 To me the pleasure be, to thee the fame,
 My brat shall thy abilities proclaim;
 And free thee ever, from inglorious shame. }
 Let circling wreaths adorn thy crowded door,
 Matrons, and girls, shall hoot at thee no more,
 But stories to thy lasting credit raise, [praise.
 While fumbling fribbles grudge thy borrow'd

JUVENAL.

True, Nevulus, most aptly you complain,
 But though your griefs are just, they are in vain;
 Your service past, he does with scorn forget,
 And seeks some other fool, like thee, to cheat.

NEVULUS.

Beware, my friend, and what I now reveal,
 As the great secret of thy life conceal;
 A lustful pathic, when he turns a foe;
 He gives like destiny a wardless blow;
 His crimes are such, they will not bear a jest,
 And fire and sword, pursue the conscious breast.
 For sweet rev'enge no drugs will be too dear,
 In lust a miser, but a spendthrift here.
 Then slight him not, nor with his scandal sport,
 But be as mute as was th' Athenian court.

JUVENAL.

Dull Corydon! art thou so stupid grown,
 To think a rich man's faults can be unknown?
 Has he not slaves about him? Wou'd not they Rejoice, and laugh, such secrets to betray?
 What more effectual to revenge thy wrongs?
 Than the unbounded freedom of thy tongues?
 Or grant it possible to silence those,
 Dumb beasts and statues wou'd his crimes expose:
 Try to imprison the resistless wind,
 So swift is guilt, so hard to be confin'd;
 Though crafty tears shou'd cast a veil between,
 Yet in the dark, his vices wou'd be seen:
 And there's a lust in man no charm can tame,
 Of loudly publishing our neighbour's shame:

On eagles wings immortal scandals fly,
 While viruous actions are but born, and die.

Let us live well, were it alone for this,
 The baneful tongues of servants to despise,
 Slander (the worst of poisons) ever finds
 An easy entrance, to ignoble minds:
 And they whose vicious lives, such abject foes must fear, [appear-
 More mean and wretched far than their own slaves

NEVULUS.

Your counsel's good and useful, 'tis confess'd;
 But (oh) to me it is in vain address'd:
 Let the great man, whom gaping crowds attend,
 Fear a scourg'd slave, or a dissembling friend;
 No matter what I do, or what I say,
 I have no spies about me to betray:
 And you advise me now my time is lost,
 And all my hopes of prosperous hours are cross't;
 My full-blown youth already fades apace,
 (Of our short being, 'tis the shortest space.)
 While melting pleasures in our arms are found,
 While lovers smile, and while the bowl goes round;
 While in surprising joys entranc'd we lie
 Old age creeps on us, ere we think it nigh.

JUVENAL.

Fear not, thy trade will never find an end,
 While yon hills stand thou canst not want a friend;
 By land, and sea, from every point they come,
 Then dread no dearth of prostitutes at Rome.

NEVULUS.

Tell this to happier men, for I am sped;
 If all my drudging can procure me bread.

Ye deities! the substitutes of Heav'n!
 To whom the guide of humane life is giv'n;
 At whose lov'd altars, with an ample zeal,
 (Though slender sacrifice) I daily kneel,
 His ebbing hours let your poor suppliant see
 From the mean crutch, and a thatcht cottage free;
 No shameful want, nor troublesome disease,
 But easy death approaching by degrees;
 Necessity supply'd, wou'd comfort bring:
 Yet constant store, wou'd be a glorious thing:
 To treat a friend, methinks, I wou'd afford,
 While silver bowls stand smiling on my board:
 And when the cares of Rome to pleasure yield;
 Two Mæssian slaves shou'd bear me to the field:
 Where, on their brawny shoulders mounted high,
 While the brave youth their various manhood try,
 I wou'd the thrones of emperors defy.
 Superfluous wealth, and pomp, I not desire;
 But what content and decency require.
 Then might I live by my own surly rules,
 Not forc'd to worship knaves, and flatter souls.
 And thus secur'd of ease, by thunning strife,
 With pleasure wou'd I sail down the swift stream of life.

But oh ridiculous vain wish for one
 Already lost, and doom'd to be undone.
 Alas, what hope remains! For to my pray'rs
 Regardless fortune stops her wounded ears;
 As to the syrens charms Ulysses' mariners.

TRANSLATED BY MR. DRYDEN.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE poet's design, in this divine satire, is to represent the various wishes and desires of mankind; and to set out the folly of them. He runs through all the several heads of riches, honours, eloquence, fame for martial achievements, long life, and beauty; and gives instances, in each, how frequently they have proved the ruin of those that owned them. He concludes, therefore, that since we generally choose so ill for ourselves, we should do better to leave it to the gods, to make the choice for us. All we can safely ask of heaven, lies within a very small compass. It is but health of body and mind. And if we have these, it is not much matter what we want besides; for we have already enough to make us happy.

Look round the habitable world, how few
Know their own good; or, knowing it, pursue.

How void of reason are our hopes and fears!
What in the conduct of our life appears
So well design'd, so luckily begun,
But, when we have our wish, we wish undone?

Whole houses, of their whole desires possess'd,
Are often ruin'd, at their own request.
In wars, and peace, things hurtful we require,
When made obnoxious to our own desire.

With laurels some have fatally been crown'd;
Some, who the depths of eloquence have found,
In that unnavigable stream were drown'd.

The brawny fool, who did his vigour boast;
In that presuming confidence was lost:

But more have been by avarice oppress'd,
And heaps of money crowded in the chest:
Unwieldy sums of wealth, which higher mount
Than files of marshal'd figures can account.

To which the stores of Cæsus, in the scale,
Would look like little dolphins, when they fail
In the vast shadow of the British whale.

For this, in Nero's arbitrary time,
When virtue was a guilt, and wealth a crime,
A troop of cut-throat guards were sent to seize
The rich mens' goods, and gut their palaces:
The mob, commission'd by the government,
Are seldom to an empty garret sent.

The fearful passenger, who travels late,
Charg'd with the carriage of a paltry plate,
Shakes at the moonshine shadow of a rush;
And fees a red-coat rise from every bush:
The beggar sings, ev'n when he sees the place
Beset with thieves, and never mends his pace.

Of all the vows, the first and chief request
Of each, is to be richer than the rest:
And yet no doubts the poor man's draught control,
He dreads no poison in his homely bowl,
Then fear the deadly drug, when gems divine
Enchase the cup, and sparkle in the wine.

Will you not now the pair of sages praise,
Who the same end pursued, by several ways?
One pity'd, one contemn'd, the woeful times:
One laugh'd at follies, one lamented crimes:
Laughter is easy; but the wonder lies,
What store of brine supply'd the weeper's eyes.

Democritus could feed his spleen, and shake
His sides and shoulders till he felt them ache;
Though in his country town nolictors were,
Nor rods, nor axe, nor tribune did appear:
Nor all the foppish gravity of show,
Which cunning magistrates on crowds bestow.

What had he done, had he beheld, on high;
Our prator seated, in mock majesty;
His chariot rolling o'er the dusty place,
While, with dumb pride, and a set formal face,
He moves, in the dull ceremonial tract,
With Jove's embroider'd coat upon his back:
A suit of hangings had not more oppress'd
His shoulders, than that long, laborious vest:
A heavy gewgaw (call'd a crown) that spread
About his temples, drown'd his narrow head:
And would have crush'd it with the maffy freight.
But that a sweating slave sustain'd the weight:

A slave in the same chariot seen to ride,
To mortify the mighty madman's pride.
And now th' imperial eagle, rais'd on high,
With golden beak (the mark of majesty)
Trumpets before, and on the left and right,
A cavalcade of nobles, all in white:
In their own natures false and flattering tribes,
But made his friends, by places and by bribes.

In his own age, Democritus could find Sufficient cause to laugh at human-kind:
Learn from so great a wit; a land of bogs
With ditches fence'd, a heaven made fat with fogs,
May form a spirit fit to sway the state; [state.
And make the neighbouring monarchs fear their

Hè laughs at all the vulgar cares and fears;
At their vain triumphs, and their vainer tears:
An equal temper in his mind he found,
When fortune flatter'd him, and when she frown'd.
'Tis plain, from hence, that what our vows request,
Are hurtful things, or usefess at the best.

Some ask for envy'd power; which public hate
Pursues, and hurries headlong to their fate:
Down go the titles; and the statue crown'd,
Is by base hands in the next river drown'd.
The guiltless horses, and the chariot wheel,
The same effects of vulgar fury feel:
The smith prepares his hammer for the stroke,
While the lung'd bellows hissing fire provoke;

Sejanus, almost first of Roman names,
The great Sejanus crackles in the flames:
Form'd in the forge, the pliant bras is laid
On anvils; and of head and limbs are made,
Pans, cans, and piss-pots, a whole kitchen trade.

Adorn your doors with laurels; and a bull,
Milk-white, and large, lead to the capitol;
Sejanus, with a rope, is dragg'd along;
The sport and laughter of the giddy throng!
Good Lord, they cry, what Ethiop lips he has,
How foul a snout, and what a hanging face!
By heaven, I never could endure his sight;
But say, how came his monstrous crimes to light?

What is the charge, and who the evidence,
(The favour of the nation and the prince?)
Nothing of this; but our old Cæsar sent
A noisy letter to his parliament:
Nay, sirs, if Cæsar writ, I ask no more,
He's guilty, and the question's out of door.
How goes the mob? (for that's a mighty thing)
When the king's trump, the mob are for the king:
They follow fortune, and the common cry
Is still against the rogue condemn'd to die.

But the same very mob, that rascal crowd,
Had cry'd Sejanus, with a shout as loud;
Had his designs (by fortune's favour blest)
Succeeded, and the prince's age oppress. [face,

But long, long since, the times have chang'd their
The people grown degenerate and base:
Not fustic'd now the freedom of their choice,
To make their magistrates, and sell their voice.

Our wise forefathers, great by sea and land,
Had once the power and absolute command;
All offices of trust, themselves dispos'd; [depos'd.
Rais'd whom they pleas'd, and whom they pleas'd
But we, who give our native rights away,
And our enslav'd posterity betray,
Are now reduc'd to beg an alms, and go
On holidays to see a puppet-show.

There was a damn'd design, cries one, no doubt;
For warrants are already issued out;
I met Brutidius in a mortal fright;
He's dipt for certain, and plays least in fight:

I fear the rage of our offended prince,
Who thinks the senate slack in his defence!
Come let us haste, our loyal zeal to show,
And spurn the wretched corps of Cæsar's foe:

But let our slaves be present there, lest they Accuse their masters, and for gain betray.
Such were the whispers of those jealous times,
About Sejanus' punishment and crimes.

Now tell me truly, would'st thou change thy fate
To be, like him, first minister of state?
To have thy levees crowded with resort,
Of a depending, gaping, servile court:

Dispose all honours of the sword and gown,
Grace with a nod, and ruin with a frown:
To hold thy prince in pupilage, and sway
That monarch, whom the master'd world obey?

While he, intent on secret lust alone,
Lives to himself, abandoning the throne;
Coop'd in a narrow isle, observing dreams
With flattering wizards, and creeling schemes!

I well believe, thou would'st be great as he;
For every man's a fool to that degree;
All with the dire prerogative to kill; [will:
E'en they would have the power, who want the

But would'st thou have thy wishes understood,
To take the bad together with the good,
Would'st thou not rather choose a small renown,
To be the mayor of some poor paltry town,
Bigly to look, and barbarously to speak;
To pound false weights, and scanty measures break?
Then, grant we that Sejanus went astray
In every wish, and knew not how to pray:
For he who grasp'd the world's exhausted store
Yet never had enough, but wish'd for more,
Rais'd a top-heavy tower, of monstrous height,
Which, mouldering, crush'd him underneath the weight.

What did the mighty Pompey's fall beget?
It ruin'd him, who, greater than the great,
The stubborn pride of Roman nobles broke;
And bent their haughty necks beneath his yoke:
What else but his immoderate lust of power,
Prayers made and granted in a luckless hour?
For few usurpers to the shades descend
By a dry death, or with a quiet end.

The boy, who scarce has paid his entrance down
To his proud pedant, or declin'd a noun,
(So small an elf, that when the days are foul,
He and his fatchel must be borne to school),
Yet prays, and hopes, and aims at nothing less,
To prove a Tully, or Demosthenes:
But both those orators, so much renown'd,
In their own depths of eloquence were drown'd:
The hand and head were never lost, of those
Who dealt in doggrel, or who punn'd in prose.

" Fortune foretun'd the dying notes of Rome:
" Till I, thy consul sole, consol'd thy doom."
His fate had crept below the list'd swords,
Had all his malice been to murder words.

I rather would be Mævius, thrash for rhymes
Like his the scorn and scandal of the times,
Than that Philippic fatally divine,
Which is inscrib'd the second, should be mine.
Nor he, the wonder of the Grecian throng,
Who drove them with the torrent of his tongue,
Who shook the theatres, and sway'd the state
Of Athens, found a more propitious fate.
Whom, born beneath a boding horoscope,
His fire, the bleak-cy'd Vulcan of a shop,
From Mars's forge, sent to Minerva's schools,
To learn th' unlucky art of wheedling fools.

With itch of honour, and opinion, vain,
All things beyond their native worth we strain:
The spoils of war, brought to Feretrian Jove,
An empty coat of armour hung above
The conqueror's chariot, and in triumph borne,
A streamer from a boarded galley torn,
A chap-fall'n beaver loosely hanging by
The cloven helm, an arch of victory,
On whose high convex sits a captive foe,
And sighing casts a mournful look below;

Of every nation, each illustrious name,
Such toys as these have cheated into fame:
Exchanging solid quiet, to obtain
The windy satisfaction of the brain.

So much the thirst of honour fires the blood;
So many would be great, so few be good.
For who would virtue for herself regard,
Or wed, without the portion of reward?

Yet this mad chafe of fame, by few pursu'd,
Has drawn destruction on the multitude:

This avarice of praise in times to come,
Those long inscriptions, crowded on the tomb,
Should some wild fig-tree take her native bent,
And heave below the gaudy monument,
Would crack the marble-tiles, and disperse
The characters of all the lying verse.
For sepulchres themselves must crumbling fall
In time's abyss, the common grave of all.

Great Hannibal within the balance lay;
And tell how many pounds his ashes weigh;
Whom Afric was not able to contain,
Whose length runs level with th' Atlantic main,
And wears fruitful Nirus, to convey
His sun-beat waters by so long a way;
With Ethiopia's double clime divides,
And elephants in other mountains hides.
Spain first he won, the Pyreneans past,
And steepy Alps, the mounds that nature cast:
And with corroding juices, as he went,
A passage through the living rocks he rent.
Then, like a torrent, rolling from on high,
He pours his headlong rage on Italy;

In three victorious battles over-run;
Yet still uneasy, cries, There's nothing done,
Till level with the ground their gates are laid;
And Punic flags on Roman towers display'd.
Ask what a face belong'd to his high fame:
His picture scarcely would deserve a frame.
A sign-post dauber would disdain to paint
The one-ey'd hero on his elephant.

Now what's his end, O charming glory! say
What rare fifth act to crown his huffing play?
In one deciding battle overcome,
He flies, is banish'd from his native home:
Begs refuge in a foreign court, and there
Attends, his mean petition to prefer;
Repuls'd by surly grooms, who wait before
The sleeping tyrant's interdicted door.

What wondrous sort of death has Heav'n design'd,

Distinguish'd from the herd of human kind,
For so untam'd, so turbulent a mind!
Nor swords at hand, nor hissing darts afar,
Are doom'd t' avenge the tedious bloody war;
But poison, drawn through a ring's hollow plate,
Must finish him; a suckling infant's fate.

Go, climb the rugged Alps, ambitious fool,
To please the boys, and be a theme at school,
One world suffic'd not Alexander's mind;
Coop'd up, he seem'd in earth and seas confin'd:
And, struggling, stretch'd his restless limbs about

The narrow globe, to find a passage out.
Yet, enter'd in the brick-built town, he try'd
The tomb, and found the strait dimensions
wide:

"Death only this mysterious truth unfolds,
"The mighty soul, how small a body holds."
Old Greece a tale of Athos would make out,
Cut from the continent, and sail'd about;
Seas hid with navies, chariots passing o'er
The channel, on a bridge from shore to shore:
Rivers, whose depth nor sharp beholder sees,
Drunk at an army's dinner, to the lees;
With a long legend of romantic things,
Which in his cups the browy poet sings.
But how did he return, this haughty brave,
Who whipt the winds, and made the sea his slave?

(Though Neptune took unkindly to be bound;
And Eurus never such hard usage found
In his Æolian prison under ground);
What god so mean, ev'n he who points the way,
So mercilefs a tyrant to obey!

But how return'd he, let us ask again?
In a poor skiff he pass'd the bloody main,
Chok'd with the slaughter'd bodies of his train:
For fame he pray'd, but let th' event declare
He had no mighty penn'worth of his prayer.

Jove grant me length of life, and years good fort
Heap on my bended back, I ask no more.
Both sick and healthful, old and young conspire
In this one filthy mischievous desire.
Mistaken blessing which old age they call,
'Tis a long, nasty, darksome hospital,
A ropy chain of rheums; a visage rough,
Deform'd, unfeatur'd, and a skin of buff.
A sitch-fall'n cheek, that hangs below the jaw;
Such wrinkles, as a skilful hand would draw
For an old grandam-ape, when, with a grace,
She sits at squab, and scrubs her leathern face.

In youth, distinctions infinite abound;
No shape, or feature, just alike are found;
The fair, the black, the feeble, and the strong;
But the same foulness does to age belong,
The self-same palsy, both in limbs and tongue.
The skull and forehead one bald barren plain,
And gums unarm'd to mumble meat in vain.
Besides th' eternal drivel, that supplies
The dropping beard, from nostrils, mouth, and eyes
His wife and children lothe him, and what's worse
Himself does his offensive carrion curse!
Flatterers forsake him too; for who would kill Himself, to be remember'd in a will?
His taste not only pall'd to wine and meat,
But to the relish of a nobler treat.

Those senses lost, behold a new defeat;
The soul dislodging from another seat.
What music, or enchanting voice, can cheer
A stupid, old, impenetrable ear?
No matter in what place, or what degree
Of the full theatre he sits to see;
Cornets and trumpets cannot reach his ear:
Under an actor's nose, he's never near.

His boy must bawl, to make him understand
The hour o' th' day, or such a lord's at hand:
The little blood that creeps within his veins,
Is but just warm'd in a hot fever's pains.
In sine, he wears no limb about him found:
With sores and sicknesses beleagu'r'd round:
Ask me their names, I sooner could relate
How many drugges on salt Hippia wait;
What crowds of patients the town-doctor kills,
Or how, last fall, he rais'd the weekly bills.
What provinces by Basilus were spoil'd;
What herds of heirs by guardians are beguill'd;
What lands and lordships for their owner know
My quondam barber, but his worship now.

This dotard of his broken back complains,
One his legs fail, and one his shoulders pains:
Another is of both his eyes bereft;
And envies who has one for aiming left.
A fifth, with trembling lips expecting stands,
As in his childhood, cramm'd by others hands;
One, who at sight of supper open'd wide
His jaws before, and whetted grinders ty'd;
Now only yawns, and waits to be supply'd:

Like a young swallow, when with weary wings
Expected food her fasting mother brings.

His loss of members is a heavy curse,
But all his faculties decay'd, are worse!
His servants names he has forgotten quite;
Knows not his friend who suppd with him last
Not ev'n the children he begot and bred; [night.
Or his will knows them not: for, in their stead,
In form of law, a common hackney-jade,
Sole heir, for secret services, is made:

So lewd and such a batter'd brothel-whore,
That she defies all comers, at her door.
Well, yet suppose his senses are his own,
He lives to be chief mourner for his son:
Before his face his wife and brother burns;
He numbers all his kindred in their urns.
These are the fines he pays for living long;
And dragging tedious age in his own wrong:
Griefs always green, a household still in tears,
Sad pomps: a threshold throng'd with daily
And liveries of black for length of years. [biers; }

Next to the raven's sage, the Pylian king
Was longest liv'd of any two leggd-thing;
Blest, to defraud the grave so long, to mount
His number'd years, and on his right-hand count;
Three hundred seasons, guzzling must of wine:
But, hold a while, and hear himself repine
At fate's unequal laws; and at the clue
Which, merciless in length, the midmost sister
When his brave son upon the funeral pyre [drew.
He saw extended, and his beard on fire;
He turn'd, and, weeping, ask'd his friends, what crime

Had curs'd his age to this unhappy time?

Thus mourn'd old Peleus for Achilles slain,
And thus Ulysses' father did complain,
How fortunate an end had Priam made,
Amongst his ancestors a mighty shade,
While Troy yet stood: when Hector, with the race
Of royal bastards, might his funeral grace:
Amidst the tears of Trojan dames inurn'd,
And by his loyal daughters truly mourn'd!
Had Heaven so blest him, he had dy'd before
The fatal fleet of Sparta Paris bore.
But mark what age produc'd; he liv'd to see
His town in flames, his falling monarchy:
In fine, the feeble fire, reduc'd by fate,
To change his sceptre for a sword, too late,
His last effort before Jove's altar tries;
A soldier half, and half a sacrifice:
Falls like an ox, that waits the coming blow;
Old and unprofitable to the plough.

At least he dy'd a man; his queen surviv'd,
To howl, and in a barking body liv'd.

I hasten to our own; nor will relate
Great Mithridates, and rich Cresus' fate;
Whom Solon wisely counsel'd to attend
The name of happy, till he knew his end.

That Marius was an exile, that he fled,
Was ta'en, in ruin'd Carthage beggd his bread,
All these were owing to a life too long:
For whom had Rome beheld so happy, young!
High in his chariot, and with laurel crown'd,
When he had left the Cymbrian captives round
The Roman streets; descending from his state,
In that blest hour he should have beggd his fate;
Then, then he might have dy'd of all admir'd,
And his triumphant soul with shouts expir'd.

Campania, fortune's malice to prevent,
To Pompey an indulgent favour lent:
But public prayers impos'd on heaven, to give
Their much-lov'd leader an unkind reprieve.
The city's fate and his conspir'd to save
The head, refer'd for an Egyptian slave.

Cethegus, though a traitor to the state,
And tortur'd, 'scap'd this ignominious fate:
And Sergius, who a bad cause bravely try'd,
All of a piece, and undiminish'd, dy'd.

To Venus, the fond mother makes a prayer,
That all her sons and daughters may be fair:
True, for the boys a mumbling vow she sends;
But for the girls, the vaulted temple rends:
They must be finish'd pieces: 'tis allow'd
Diana's beauty made Latona proud:
And pleas'd, to see the wondering people pray
To the new-rising sister of the day.

And yet Lucretia's fate would bar that vow:
And fair Virginia would her fate bestow
On Rutila; and change her faultless make
For the foul rump of her carnel-back.

But, for his mother's boy the beau, what frights
His parents have by day, what anxious nights!
Form, join'd with virtue, is a sight too rare:
Chaste is no epithet to suit with fair.
Suppose the same traditory strain
Of rigid manners, in the house remain;
Inveterate truth, an old plain Sabine's heart;
Suppose that Nature, too, has done her part;
Infus'd into his soul a sober grace,
And bluish'd a modest blood into his face,
(For Nature is a better guardian far,
Than saucy pedants, or dull tutors are):
Yet still the youth must ne'er arrive at man;
(So much almighty bribes, and presents, can);
Ev'n with a parent, where persuasions fail,
Money is impudent, and will prevail.

We never read of such a tyrant king
Who gelt a boy deform'd, to hear him sing.
Nor Nero, in his more luxurious rage,
E'er made a mistress of an ugly page:
Sporus, his spouse, nor crooked was, nor lame,
With mountain-back, and belly, from the game
Cross-barr'd: but both his sexes well became.
Go, boast your Springal, by his beauty curst
To ills; nor think I have declar'd the worst;
His form procures him journey-work; a strife
Betwixt town-madams, and the merchant's wife;
Guests, when he undertakes this public war,
What furious beasts offended cuckolds are.

Adulterers are with dangers round beset;
Born under Mars, they cannot 'scape the net;
And from revengeful husbands oft have try'd
Worse handling, than severest laws provide:
One stabs; one slashes; one, with cruel art,
Makes Colin suffer for the peccant part.

But your Endymion, your smooth, smock-fac'd boy,

Unrival'd, shall a beauteous dame enjoy;
Not so: one more fallacious, rich, and old,
Outbids, and buys her pleasure for her gold;
Now he must moil, and drudge, for one he lothes;
She keeps him high, in equipage and clothes:
She pawns her jewels, and her rich attire,
And thinks the workman worthy of his hire;
In all things else immortal, stingy, mean;
But, in her lusts, a conscionable quacan.

She may be handsome, yet be chaste, you say;
 Good observator, not so fast away:
 Did it not cost the modest youth his life,
 Who shunn'd th' embraces of his father's wife?
 And was not t' other straggling forc'd to fly,
 Who coldly did his patron's queen deny;
 And pleaded laws of hospitality?
 The ladies charg'd them home, and turn'd the tale,
 With shame they redd'n'd, and with spite grew pale.

'Tis dangerous to deny the longing dame;
 She loses pity, who has lost her shame.

Now Silius wants thy counsel, gives advice;
 Wed Cæsar's wife, or die; the choice is nice.

Her comet-eyes she darts on every grace;
 And takes a fatal liking to his face.

Adorn'd with bridal pomp she sits in state:
 The public notaries and Aruspex wait:

The genial bed is in the garden dress'd:

The portion paid and every rite express'd,
 Which in a Roman marriage is profess'd.

'Tis no stol'n wedding, this, rejecting awe,
 She scorns to marry, but in form of law:

In this moot case, your judgment; to refuse,
 Is present death, besides the night you lose:

If you consent, 'tis hardly worth your pain;
 A day or two of anxious life you gain:

Till loud reports through all the town have pass'd,
 And reach the prince: for cuckolds hear the last.

Indulge thy pleasure, youth, and take thy swing;
 For not to take is but the self-same thing:

Inevitable death before thee lies;
 But looks more kindly through a lady's eyes.

What then remains? Are we depriv'd of will,
 Must we not wish, for fear of wishing ill?

Receive my counsel, and securely move;
 Intrust thy fortune to the powers above.

Leave them to manage for thee, and to grant
 What their unerring wisdom sees thee want:

In goodness, as in greatness, they excel;
 Ah, that we lov'd ourselves but half so well!

We, blindly by our headstrong passions led,
 Are hot for action, and desire to wed;

Then wish for heirs: but to the gods alone
 Our future offspring, and our wives, are known;

Th' audacious strumpet, and ungracious son.

Yet not to rob the priests of pious gain,
 That altars be not wholly built in vain;

Forgive the gods the rest, and stand confin'd
 To health of body and content of mind:

A soul, that can securely death defy,
 And count it nature's privilege to die;

Serene and manly, harden'd to sustain
 The load of life, and exercis'd in pain:

Guiltless of hate, and proof against desire;
 That all things weighs, and nothing can admire;

'That dares prefer the toils of Hercules
 To dalliance, banquet and ignoble ease.

The path to peace is virtue; what I show,
 Thyself may freely on thyself bestow:

Fortune was never worship'd by the wise;
 But, set aloft by fools, usurps the skies.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE design of this satire is to expose and reprehend all manner of intemperance and debauchery; but more particularly touches that exorbitant luxury used by the Romans, in their feasting. The poet draws the occasions from an invitation, which he here makes to his friend, to dine with him: very artfully preparing him, with what he was to expect from his treat, by beginning the satire with a particular invective against the vanity and folly of some persons, who having but mean fortunes in the world, attempted to live up to the height of men of great estates and quality. He shows us the miserable end of such spendthrifts and gluttons; with the manner and courtes which they took to bring themselves to it; advising men to live within bounds, and to proportion their inclinations to the extent of their fortune. He gives his friend a bill of fare, of the entertainment he has provided for him; and from thence takes occasion to reflect upon the temperance and frugality of the greatest men in former ages: to which he opposes the riot and intemperance of the present; attributing to the latter a visible remissness, in the care of Heaven over the Roman state. He instances some lewd practices at their feasts, and by the bye, touches the nobility, with making vice and debauchery the chiefest of their pleasures. He concludes with a repeated invitation to his friend; advising him (in one particular somewhat freely) to a neglect of all cares and disquiets, for the present; and a moderate use of pleasures, for the future.

If noble Atticus make plenteous feasts,
 And with luxuriant food indulge his guests;
 His wealth and quality support the treat;
 In him nor is it luxury, but state.
 But when poor Rutilus spends all his worth,
 In hopes of setting one good dinner forth;
 'Tis downright madness; for what greater jests,
 Than begging gluttons, or than beggars feasts?

But Rutilus, is so notorious grown,
 That he's the common theme of all the town.

A man, in his full tide of youthful blood,
 Able for arms, and for his country's good;
 Urg'd by no pow'r, restrain'd by no advice,
 But following his own inglorious choice,
 'Mongst common fencers, practises the trade,
 That end debasing, for which arms were made;

rms, which to man ne'er-dying fame afford,
 ut his disgrace is owing to his sword.
 Any there are of the same wretched kind,
 Whom their despairing creditors, may find urking in shambles; where with borrow'd coin,

hey buy choice meats, and in cheap plenty dine.
 ich, whose sole bliss, is eating; who can give ut that one brutal reason why they live.

nd yet what's more ridiculous: Of these he poorest wretch, is still more hard to please:
 nd he whose thin transparent rags, declare ow much, his tatter'd fortune wants repair, Vou'd ransack ev'ry element, for choice
 fev'ry fish and fowl at any price;

brought from far, it very dear has cost,
 has a flavour then, which pleases most,
 nd he devours it with a greater gust.

In riot, thus, while money lasts, he lives,
 nd that exhausted, still new pledges gives;
 ill forc'd of mere necessity, to eat,
 se comes to pawn his dish, to buy his meat.

Using of silver or of gold he spares,
 ot what his mother's sacred image bears;
 he broken relic he with speed devours,
 as he would all the rest of 's ancestors,
 wrought in gold, or if expos'd to sale,
 hey'd pay the price of one luxurious meal,
 hus certain ruin treads upon his heels,
 he stings of hunger, soon, and want he feels;
 nd thus is he reduc'd at length, to serve encers, for miserable scraps, or starve.

Imagine now you see a splendid feast:
 he question is, at whose expence 'tis dress'd.
 a great Ventidius, we the bounty prize;
 a Rutilus, the vanity despise.

trange ignorance! that the same man, who knows

low far yond' mount above this mole-hill shows, ould not perceive a difference as great,
 etween small incomes and a vast estate!
 rom heaven, to mankind, sure, that rule was sent,
 f know thy self, and by some god was meant
 o be our never-erring pilot here,

hrough all the various courses which we steer, herites, though the most presumptuous Greek,
 et durst not for Achilles armour speak;
 hen scarce Ulysses had a good pretence,
 With all th' advantage of his eloquence.

Who'er attempts weak causes to support,
 ight to be very sure, he's able for't;
 nd not mistake strong lungs and impudence,
 or harmony of words, and force of sense:
 ools only make attempts beyond their skill;
 a wife man's pow'r's the limit of his will.

If fortune has a niggard been to thee,
 devote thyself to thrift, not luxury;
 nd wisely make that kind of food thy choice,
 o which necessity confines thy price.

Vell may they fear some miserable end,
 Whom gluttony and want, at once attend;
 Whose large voracious throats have swallow'd all,
 oth land, stock, int'rest, and principal:
 Vell may they fear, at length, vile Pollio's fate,
 Who sold his very ring, to purchase meat;
 And, though a knight, 'mongst common slaves
 now stands

begging an alms, with undistinguisht hands.

Sure heaven death to such should welcome be,
 On whom, each added year heaps misery, }
 Scorn, poverty, reproach and infamy.
 But there are steps, in villany, which these Observe to tread and follow, by degrees.
 Money they borrow, and from all that lend,
 Which, never meaning to restore, they spend;
 But that and their small stock of credit gone,
 Left Rome should grow too warm, from thence they run:

For of late years 'tis no more scandal grown,
 For debt and roguery to quit the town,
 Than in the midst of summer's scorching heat,
 From crowds, and noise, and business to retreat:
 One only grief such fugitives can find;
 Reflecting on the pleasures left behind;
 The plays, and loose diversions of the place,
 But not one blush appears for the disgrace.
 Ne'er was of modesty so great a dearth,
 That out of count'nance virtue's fled from earth;
 Baffled, expos'd to ridicule and scorn,
 She's with Astræa gone, ne'er to return.

This day, my Periclus, thou shalt perceive Whether myself I keep those rules I give,
 Or else, an unsuspected glutton live;

If mod'rate fare and abstinence I prize
 In public, yet in private gormandize.
 Evander's feast reviv'd, to-day thou'lt see,
 The poor Evander I, and thou shalt be Alcides and Æneas both to me.

Meantime, I send you now your bill of fare;
 Be not surpris'd that 'tis all homely cheer:
 For nothing from the shambles I provide,
 But from my own small farm, the tend'rest kid
 And fattest of my flock, a suckling yet,
 That ne'er had nourishment but from the teat;
 No bitter willow-tops have been its food,
 Scarce grass; its veins have more of milk than
 blood.

Next that shall mountain 'sparagus be laid,
 Pull'd by some plain, but cleanly, country-maid.
 The largest eggs, yet warm within the nest,
 Together with the hens which laid 'em, dress'd;
 Clusters of grapes, preserv'd for half a year,
 Which, plump and fresh as on the vines appear;
 Apples, of a ripe flavour, fresh and fair.
 Mix with the Syrian, and the Signian pear,
 Mellow'd by winter, from their cruder juice,
 Light of digestion now, and fit for use.

Such food as this would have been heretofore
 Accounted right, in a senator:

When the good Curius thought it no disgrace,
 With his own hands, a few small herbs to dress;
 And from his little garden cull'd a feast,
 Which fetter'd slaves would now disdain to taste;
 For scarce a slave, but has to dinner, now,
 The well-dress'd paps of a fat pregnant sow.

But heretofore 'twas thought a sumptuous treat;

On birth-days, festivals, or days of state;
 A salt, dry slice of bacon to prepare;
 If they had fresh meat, 'twas delicious fare!
 Which rarely happen'd, and 'twas highly priz'd,
 If ought was left of what they sacrific'd.
 To entertainments of this kind would come
 The worthiest and the greatest men in Rome;
 Nay, seldom any at such treats were seen,
 But those who had at least thrice consuls been,

Or the dictator's office had discharg'd,
 And now from honourable toil enlarg'd;
 Retir'd to husband and manure their land,
 Humbling themselves to those they might command.

Then might y<sup>e</sup> have seen the good old gen'ral haste,
 Before th<sup>e</sup> appointed hour, to such a feast;
 His spade aloft, as 'twere in triumph held,
 Proud of the conquest of some stubborn field.
 Oh then, when pious consuls bore the sway!
 When couchant vice all pale and trembling lay!
 Our censors then were subject to the law,
 Ev'n pow'r itself, of justice stood in awe.
 It was not then, a Roman's chiefest thought,
 Where largest tortoise-shells were to be bought,
 Where pearls might of the greatest price be had,
 And shining jewels to adorn his bed,
 That he at va't expence might loll his head.
 Plain was his couch, and only rich his mind;
 Contentedly he slept, as cheaply as he din'd.
 The soldier then, in Grecian arts unkill'd,
 Returning rich with plunder, from the field:
 If cups of silver, or of gold he brought,
 With jewels set, and exquisitely wrought,
 To glorious trappings, streight the plate he turn'd,
 And with the glitt'ring spoil his horse adorn'd;
 Or else a helmet for himself he made,
 Where various warlike figures were inlaid:
 The Roman wolf, suckling the twins was there;
 And Mars himself, arm'd with his shield and spear,

Hov'ring above his crest, did dreadful show,
 As threat'ning death, to each resisting foe.
 No use of silver, but in arms was known,
 Splendid they were in war, and there alone.
 No side-boards then, with gilded plate were dress'd,
 No sweating slaves with massy dishes press'd;
 Expensive riot was not understood,
 But earthen platters held their homely food.
 Who would not envy them that age of blifs,
 That sees with shame the luxury of this?
 Heav'n unwearied then, did blessings pour,
 And pitying Jove foretold each dang'rous hour;
 Mankind were then familiar with the god,
 He snuff'd their incense with a gracious nod;
 And would have still been bounteous, as of old,
 Had we not left him for that devil god.
 His golden statues, hence the god have driven:
 For well he knows, where our devotion's giv'n,
 'Tis gold we worship, though we pray to heav'n.
 Woods of our own afforded tables then,
 Though none can please us now but from Japan.
 Invite my Lord to dine, and let him have
 The nicest dish his appetite can crave;
 But let it on an oaken board be set,
 His Lordship will grow sick, and cannot eat:
 Something 's amiss, he knows not what to think,
 Either your ven'fon 's rank, or ointments stink.
 Order some other table to be brought,
 Something, at great expence in India bought,
 Beneath whose orb large yawning panthers lie,
 Carv'd on rich pedestals of ivory:
 He finds no more of that offensive smell,
 The meat recovers, and my Lord grows well.
 An iv'ry table is a certain whet;
 You would not think how heartily he'll eat.
 As if new vigour to his teeth were sent,
 By sympathy from those o' th' elephant.

But such fine feeders are no guests for me;
 Riot agrees not with frugality;
 Then that unfashionable man am I,
 With me they'd starve for want of ivory:
 For not one inch does my whole house afford,
 Not in my very tables, or chefs-board;
 Of common bone, the handles of my knives
 Are made, yet no unpleasant taste it gives
 To what I carve; nor is there ever left
 An unfav'ry haut-gutt from the haft.

A hearty welcome, to plain wholesome meat,
 You'll find, but serv'd up in no formal state;
 No few'rs, nor dextrous carvers have I got,
 Such as by skilful Trypherus are taught:
 In whose fam'd schools the various forms appear
 Of fishes, beasts, and all the fowls o' th' air;
 And where, with blunted knives his scholars learn
 How to dissect, and the nice joints discern;
 While all the neighb'rhoo'd are with noise oppress'd,
 From the harsh carving of his wooden feast.
 On me attends a raw unskilful lad,
 On fragments fed, in homely garments clad,
 At once my carver, and my ganymede;
 With diligence he'll serve us while we dine,
 And in plain beechen vessels fill our wine.
 No beauteous boys I keep, from Phrygia brought,
 No Catamites, by shameful panders taught:
 Only to me two home-bred youths belong,
 Unkill'd in any but their mother-tongue;
 Alike in feature both, and garb appear,
 With honest faces, though with uncurl'd hair
 This day thou shalt my rural pages see,
 For I have dress'd 'em both to wait on thee.
 Of country swains they both were born, and one
 My ploughman is, t'other my shepherd's son;
 A cheerful sweetness in his looks he has,
 And innocence unartful in his face:
 Though sometimes sadncfs will o'ercast the joy,
 And gentle sighs break from the tender boy;
 His absence from his mother oft he'll mourn,
 And with his eyes look wishes to return,
 Longing to see his tender kids again;
 And feed his lambs upon the flow'ry plain;
 A modest blush he wears, not form'd by art,
 Free from deceit his face, and full as free his heart.
 Such looks, such bashfulness, might well adorn
 The cheeks of youths that are more nobly born,
 But noblemen those humble graces scorn.
 This youth to day shall my small treat attend,
 And only he with wine shall serve my friend,
 With wine from his own country, brought, and made [shade
 From the same vines, beneath whose fruitful
 He and his wanton kids have often play'd.
 But you, perhaps, expect a modish feast,
 With am'rous songs and wanton dances grac'd;
 Where sprightly females, to the middle bare,
 Trip lightly o'er the ground, and frisk in air,
 Whose pliant limbs, in fifty postures move,
 And twine, and bound, as in the feat of love.
 Such sights the languid nerves to action stir,
 And jaded lust springs forward with this spur.
 Virtue would shrink, to hear this lewdness told,
 Which husbands, now, do with their wives, behold;
 A needful help, to make 'em both approve
 The dry embraces of long-wedded love.
 In nuptial cinders, this revives the fire,
 And turns their mutual loathing to desire,

it she, who by her sexes charter, must ave double pleasure paid, feels double lust;
 pace she warms, with an immoderate heat, rongly her bosom heaves, and pulses beat;
 ith glowing cheeks, and trembling lips she lies,
 ith arms expanded, and with naked thighs,
 cking in passion both at ears and eyes.
 t this becomes not me, nor my estate;
 ese are the vicious follies of the great.
 t him who does on iv'ry tables dine,
 hose marble floors with drunken spawlings shine;
 t him lascivious songs and dances have,
 hich, or to see, or hear, the lewdest slave,
 e vilest prostitute in all the stews,
 ith bashful indignation would refuse.
 t fortune, there, extenuates the crime;
 hat's vice in me, is only mirth in him:
 e fruits which murder, cards, or dice afford,
 uestal ravish'd, or a matron whor'd,
 e laudable diversions in a lord.
 But my poor entertainment is design'd afford you pleasures of another kind:
 t with your taste your hearing shall be fed,
 d Homer's sacred lines, and Virgil's read;
 her of whom does all mankind excel,
 t which exceeds the other, none can tell.
 matters not with what ill tone they're sung,
 rse so sublimely good, no voice can wrong.
 Now then be all thy weighty cares away,
 y jealousies and fears, and while you may eace and soft repose, give all the day.
 om thoughts of debt, or any worldly ill free, be all uneasy passions still.
 hat though thy wife do with the morning light, hen thou in vain hast toil'd and drudg'd all
 night)
 Sal from thy bed and house, abroad to roam,
 d having gorg'd her lust, come recking home,
 ck'd in her face, and with disorder'd hair,
 r garments ruffled, and her bosom bare;
 r ears still tingling, and her eyes on fire,
 f drown'd in lust, still burning in desire:

Whilst you are forc'd to wink and seem content,
 Swelling with passion, which you dare not vent:
 Nay, if you would be free, from night alarms,
 You must seem fond, and doating on her charms,
 Take her (the last of twenty) to your arms.
 Let this, and ev'ry other anxious thought,
 At the entrance of my threshold be forgot;
 All thy domestic griefs at home be left,
 Thy wife's adult'ry, with thy servants theft;
 And (the most racking thought which can intrude)
 Forget false friends, and their ingratitude.
 Let us your peaceful mirth at home begin,
 While Megalensian shows are in the circus seen:
 There (to the bane of horses) in high state
 The pretor sits, on a triumphal seat;
 Vainly with ensigns, and with robes adorn'd,
 As if with conquest from the wars return'd.
 This day all Rome (if I may be allow'd,
 Without offence to such a num'rous crowd,
 To say all Rome) will in the circus sweat;
 Echoes already do their shouts repeat:
 Methinks I hear the cry—Away, away,
 The green have won the honour of the day.
 Oh, should these sports be but one year for-born,
 Rome would in tears her lov'd diversion mourn;
 For that would now a cause of sorrow yield,
 Great as the loss of Cannæ's fatal field.
 Such shows as these were not for us design'd,
 But vig'rous youth to active sports inclin'd.
 On beds of roses laid, let us repose,
 While round our heads refreshing ointment flows;
 Our aged limbs we'll bask in Phœbus rays,
 And live this day devoted to our ease.
 Early to-day we'll to the bath repair,
 Nor need we now the common censure fear:
 On festivals, it is allow'd no crime
 To bathe and eat before the usual time;
 But that continu'd, would a loathing give,
 Nor could you thus a week together live:
 For, frequent use, would the delight exclude;
 Pleasure's a toil, when constantly pursu'd.

TRANSLATED BY MR. THOMAS POWER.

THE ARGUMENT.

The poet invites Corvinus to assist at the performance of a sacrifice he had vowed to the gods, and as now thankfully offering up for the safety of his friend Catullus the merchant, who with the loss of his goods, had escaped the double danger of fire and water. He professes the reality of his friendship, and the sincerity of his intentions; that what he did in this nature was without any design upon Catullus, or prospect of advantage from him, who had three children to leave his estate to. And ere taking the hint, he exercises his satirical vein upon the Hæredipetæ, or legacy-hunters, who made their court to, and largely presented, and in their sickness sacrificed for the health of rich childless men, in hopes to be considered in their will: among the rest, he singles out one Pacuvius, fellow very dexterous at, and notorious for this practice: and concludes all with a wish for Pacuvius; which some covetous persons would think pleasant enough, but really is a curse.

This day's, this joyful day's solemnity
 Is with my birth-days more than equal vie:
 OL. XII.

Of grassy turfs the rural altars rear'd,
 Expect the firstlings of the flock and herd;
 Y y

To royal Juno and the warlike maid,
Shall in a lamb to each my vows be paid:
A steer, of the first head in the whole drove,
Reserve we sacred to Tarpeian Jove:
Forward he bounds his rope's extended length,
With pushing front; proud since he tri'd his
strength,

And budding horns against an adverse oak;
Fit for the altar, and the fatal stroke.
Were but my fortunes equal to my mind,
My bounteous love more nobly had design'd,
A bull high fed should fall the sacrifice;
One of Hispulla's huge prodigious size:
Not one of those our neighb'ring pastures feed,
But of Cctumrus whitest sacred breed;
The lively tincture of whose gushing blood,
Should clearly prove the richness of his food:
A neck so strong, so large, as would demand
The speeding blow of some uncommon hand.

This for my friend, or more I would perform;
Who, danger free, still trembles at the storm,
Presenting forms so hideous to his sight,
As safety scarce allays the wild affright.

First from a cloud that heav'n all o'ercast,
With glance so swift the subtle lightning past,
As split the sail-yards; trembling and half dead
Each thought the blow was level'd at his head:
The flaming shrouds so dreadful did appear,
All judg'd a wreck could no proportion bear.
So fancy paints, so does the poet write,
When he would work a tempest to the height.
This danger past, a second does succeed;
Again with pity, and attention heed:
No less this second, though of different kind;
Such as, in Isis temple, you may find
Of votive tablets, to the life portray'd;
Where painters are employ'd, and earn their bread.

What painters in their liveli'st draughts express,
May be a copy of my friend's distress.
For now a sea into the hold was got;
Wave upon wave another sea had wrought,
And nigh o'erfet the stern on either side:
The hoary pilot his best skill apply'd,
But useless all when he despairing found,
Catullus then did with the winds compound.
Just as the beaver, that wise-thinking brute,
Who, when hard hunted on a close pursuit,
Bites off his stones, the cause of all the strife,
And pays 'em down a ransom for his life.
Over with all, he cries, with all that's mine;
Without reserve I freely do resign.
Rich garments, purple dy'd in grain, go o'er;
No soft Mæcenas ever choicer wore:
And others of that fleece, that never dy'd,
Or stain'd by art, is rich in nature's pride;
Such as its tincture from the soil does bear,
By noble springs improv'd, and Bætic air.
Nor stopp'd he so, but over went his plate
Made by Parthenius, follow'd by a great
And massy goblet, a two gallon draught,
Might set a lusty Centaur when he quaff,
Or drench the wife of Fuscus: add to these Baskets of Britain, rarities of Greece,
A set of plate most artfully imboft,
No less a bribe than what Olynthus cost.
Show me the man, that other he, would dare
His very life and soul to gold prefer:

Now money serves not life's most noble ends,
But slavish life imperious wealth attends.
Thus most of the ship's freight went overboard
Yet all this waste could small relief afford;
So fierce the storm, necessity at last
Does loudly call to ease her of her mast:
Hard is the case, and dang'rous the distress,
When what we would preserve, we must necessarily lose.

Go now, go trust the wind's uncertain breath
Remov'd four fingers from approaching death
Or seven at most, when thickest is the board
Go with provision, bisket, brandy stor'd;
But if you reasonably hope to speed,
You must produce your axe in time of need.
Now when the sea grew calm, the winds were
And the pleas'd Parca spun a whiter thread;
When fate propitious sent a gentle gale;
The shatter'd vessel, with one wretched sail,
Beside what gowns and coats her crew could
To help her on her course, did homeward bend
The south wind left 'ning still, the sun appear'd
And into lively hope converts their fears:
And now, in prospect sweet, his cheerful light
The Alban cliffs confesses to their sight;
Where Albas pile Julius founding rear'd,
When to Lavinium he that feat prefer'd;
And call'd it Alba, from the white flow nam'd
That for her thirty sucking pigs was fam'd.
At last within the mighty mole she gets,
Our Tuscan Pharos, that the mid sea meets
With its embrace, and leaves the land behind;
A work so wond'rous nature ne'er design'd.
Through it the joyful steersman clears his way
And comes to anchor in its inmost bay;
Where smallest vessels ride, and are secur'd,
And then shorn sailors boast what they endur'd.

Go then, my boys, the sacred rites prepare;
With awful silence and attention hear:
With bran the knives, with flow'rs the altars dr
And in your diligence your zeal express.
I'll follow streight, and having paid my vows,
Thence home again, where chaplets wreath
brows

Of all my little waxen deities:
And incense shall domestic Jove appease:
My shining household gods shall revel there,
And all the colours of the violet wear.
All's right; my portal shines with verdant bay
And consecrated tapers early blaze.

Suspect me not, Corvinius, of design,
Far be such guilt from any thought of mine:
My altars smoke not for so base an end;
Catullus, though a father, is my friend,
Add his three children bare a foreign claim.
Who on a friend so hopeless, such a name
As father, would a sickly hen bestow?
Or on such slender grounds a quail forego?
If Paccius or Gallita breathe a vein,
The temples streight are crowded with a train
Of fawning rascals, utt'ring each his pray'r;
Nothing's too precious for a life so dear:
A hecatomb is scarce enough to bleed:
And, but an elephant's no common breed,
Nor seen, nor known in Italy before
They were transported from the Afric shore;
Since which, in the Rutilian forest rear'd,
They range at large, great Cæsar's royal herd!

As once they learnt King Pyrrhus to obey;
 And with submission to our consuls sway,
 For Tyrian Hannibal's, part of the war
 Turrets on their backs they us'd to bear:
 Could Novius or Pacuvius but procure
 These iv'ry portents, death should seal 'em sure Victim for Gallita, nothing less
 The greatness of their friendship can express.
 Pacuvius, were he not by law withstood,
 Could manifest his own in human blood;
 He best, the loveliest slaves of either sex,
 To serve his complement should yield their necks:
 Nay, to that height the wicked rogue proceeds,
 Is Iphigenia, his daughter, bleeds
 Need require, though he was sure to find
 A dext'rous sligh't to change her for a hind.

My fellow-citizen I must commend,
 For what's a fleet to a bequeathing friend?
 For, if he chance to 'scape this dismal bout,
 The former legatees are blotted out;
 Upon Pacuvius all must be conferr'd;
 So great a merit claims no less reward:
 Pacuvius struts it, and triumphant goes
 In the dejected crowd of rival foes:
 You see the fruit of his projecting brain,
 In off'ring up his daughter to his gain.
 As great as Nero's plunder be his store;
 High, mountain-high, be pil'd the shining ore;
 Then may he life to Nestor's age extend,
 Nor ever be, nor ever find a friend.

SATIRE XIII.

TRANSLATED BY MR. THOMAS CREECH.

THE ARGUMENT.

CORVINUS had trusted one of his old friends and acquaintance with a bag of money; this friend denies the trust, and forewears it too: Corvinus is very much disturbed at this cheat, storms and rages; accuses Providence, and is ready to conclude that God takes no care of things below, because some sudden and remarkable vengeance did not fall upon this perjured false wretch: Juvenal hearing of Corvinus's loss, and unmanly behaviour, writes this satire to him, both to comfort him after his loss, and instruct him how to bear it; and thence takes occasion to speak of the vileness and villainy of his times. He begins with the condition of the wicked man; and tells him, 1. That the sinner must needs hate himself; and, 2. That he will be hated by all mankind. 3. He puts Corvinus in mind that he hath a good estate, and that this loss will not break him. 4. and 5. That a great many have suffered the like misfortunes; that cheats were common, his loss but little, and therefore not to be repented with so violent a passion. Hence, 6. He expatiates on the vileness of the times; and, 7. compares his age with the golden one, which he tedious describes. 8. He continues his reflections on the general wickedness of the times. 9. Makes some observations on the confidence of sinners: And, 10. endeavours to give some account of this: He observes that some are Atheists. 11. Others believe a God, but fancy the money they get by their perjury, will do them more good than the punishments he inflicts will do them harm: At least, 12. that God is merciful, they may be pardoned or escape in the crowd of sinners; since some are forgiven, and all do not meet with punishments equal to their deserts. 13. He corrects his friend for his Atheistical passion, and rude accusations of Providence; and, 14. advises him to be more cool; and consider, that, 15. such cheats are common, and he hath suffer'd no more than other men; and, 16. that every day we may meet with greater crimes which require his concernment. That, 17. his passion is idle and fruitless; because revenge, which is the only end of passion, will do him no good; it will not retrieve his loss; and besides is an argument of a base mind, and mean temper. Then coming closer to his point, he tells him, 18. The wicked are severely punished by their own consciences; 19. Vengeance waits upon them: And, 20. describes the miserable life, and terrible death of the wicked man. And, 21. loses all with observing, that few men stop at their first sin, but go on till their crimes provoke Providence: And therefore, 22. Corvinus need not fear but this perjured friend of his would do so too, and then he should see some remarkable judgment fall upon him.

I.
 He that commits a sin, shall quickly find
 The pressing guilt lie heavy on his mind;
 Though bribes or favour shall assert his cause,
 He nounce him guiltless, and elude the laws:
 He quits himself; his own impartial thought
 Will damn, and conscience will record the fault.

II.
 His first the wicked feels: Then public hate
 Pursues the cheat, and proves the villain's fate.

III.
 But more, Corvinus, thy estate can bear
 A greater loss, and not implore thy care;
 Thy stock's sufficient, and thy wealth too great
 To feel the damage of a petty cheat.

IV.
 Nor are such losses to the world unknown,
 A rare example, and thy chance alone;
 Most feel them, and in Fortune's lottery lies
 A heap of blanks, like this, for one small prize.

Abate thy passion, nor too much complain,
Grief should be forc'd, and it becomes a man
To let it rise no higher than his pain:
But you, too weak the slightest loss to bear,
Too delicate the common fate to share,
Are on the fret of passion, boil and rage,
Because, in so debauch'd and vile an age,
Thy friend and old acquaintance dares disown
The gold you lent him, and fore swear the loan.

What, start at this? When sixty years have
spread

Their gray experience o'er thy hoary head!
Is this the all-observing age could gain,
Or hast thou known the world so long in vain?

Let Stoics Ethics' haughty rules advance,
To combat fortune, and to conquer chance;
Yet happy those, though not so learn'd, are thought,

Whom life instructs, who by experience taught,
For new to come from past misfortunes look;
Nor shake the yoke, which galls the more 'tis shook.

VI.

What day's so sacred, but its rest's profan'd
By violent robbers, or by murders stain'd?
Here hir'd assassins for their gain invade,
And treacherous pois'ners urge their fatal trade.

Good men are scarce, the just are thinly sown,
They thrive but ill, nor can they last when grown.
And should we count them, and our store compile,
Yet Thebes more gates would show, more mouths
the Nile.

Worse than the Iron Age, and wretched times
Roll on; and life hath fo improv'd our crimes,
That baffled Nature knows nor how to frame
A metal base enough to give the age a name:
Yet you exclaim, as loud as those that praise
For scraps and coach-hire, a young noble's plays
You thunder, and, as passion rolls along,
Call heaven and earth to witness to your wrong.

Gray-headed infant! and in vain grown old!
Art thou to learn that in another's gold
Lie charms resistless? That all laugh to find Unthinking plainness fo o'er'spread thy mind,
That thou could'st seriously persuade the crowd
To keep their oaths, and to believe a God?

VII.

This they could do whilst Saturn fill'd the throne,

Ere Juno burnish'd, or young Jove was grown;
Ere private he left Ida's close retreat,
Or made rebellion by example great:
And whilst his hoary sire to Latium fled,
Usurp'd his empire, and desil'd his bed.
Whilst Gods din'd singly, and few feasts above,
No beauteous Hebe mixt the wine with love;
No Phrygian boy: But Vulcan stain'd the pole
With sooty hands, and fill'd the sparing bowl.
Ere gods grew numerous, and the heavenly crowd
Prest wretched Atlas with a lighter load:
Ere chance unenvy'd Neptune's lot confin'd
To rule the ocean, and oppose the wind:
Ere Proserpine with Pluto shar'd the throne,
Ere furies lash'd, or ghost had learn'd to groan:
But free from punishment as free from sin
The shades liv'd jolly, and without a king.

Then vice was rare; e'en rudeness kept in awe
Felt all the rigour of avenging law;
And had not men the hoary heads rever'd,
Or boys paid reverence when a man appear'd,
Both must have dy'd, though richer skins t
wore,

And saw more heaps of acorns in their store:
Four years advance did such respect engage,
And youth was reverenc'd then like sacred age

VIII.

Now if one honest man I chance to view,
Contemning int'rest, and to virtue true;
I rank him with the prodigies of fame,
With plough'd-up fishes, and with icy flame;
With things which start from Nature's comm rules,

With bearded infants, and with teeming mule
As much amaz'd at the prodigious sign,
As if I saw bees cluster'd on a shrine;
A show'r of stones, or rivers chang'd to blood
Roll wondrous waves, or urge a milky flood.

IX.

A little sum you mourn, whilst most have me
With twice the loss, and by as vile a cheat:
By treacherous friends, and secret trust betray'd
Some are undone; nor are the gods our aid.
Those conscious powers we can with ease co
temn,

If hid from men, we trust our crimes with them
Observe the wretch who hath his faith fo hook,

How clear his voice, and how assur'd his look!
Like innocence, and as serenely bold
As truth, how loudly he fore swears thy gold!
By Neptune's trident, by the bolts of Jove,
And all the magazine of wrath above.
Nay, more, in curses he goes boldly on,
He damns himself, and thus devotes his son:
If I'm forsworn, you injur'd gods renew
Thyestes' feast, and prove the fable true.

X.

Some think that chance rules all, that Natu
steers

The moving seasons, and turns round the years.
These run to ev'ry shrine, these boldly swear,
And keep no faith, because they know no fear.

XI.

Another doubts, but as his doubts decline,
He dreads just vengeance, and he starts at sin;
He owns a God: And yet the wretch fore swear
And thus he reasons to relieve his fears.

Let Isis rage, so I securely hold
The coin forsworn, and keep the ravish'd gold;
Let blindness, lameness come; are legs and eyes
Of equal value to so great a prize?
Would starving Ladas, had he leave to choose,
And were not frantic, the rich gout refuse?
For can the glory of the swiftest pace
Procure him food? Or can he feast on praise?

XII.

The gods take aim before they strike the
blow,

Though sure their vengeance, yet the stroke
And should at ev'ry sin their thunder fly,
I'm yet secure, nor is my danger nigh:
But they are gracious, but their hands are free,
And who can tell but they can reach to me?

Some they forgive, and ev'ry age relates
That equal crimes have met unequal fates;
That sins alike, unlike rewards have found,
And whilst this villain's crucify'd, the other's
crown'd.

The man that shiver'd on the brink of sin,
Hus steel'd and harden'd ventures boldly in;
Are him to swear, he with a cheerful face
Lies to the shrine, and bids thee mend thy pace;
He urges, goes before thee, shows the way,
Says, pulls thee on, and chides thy dull delay:
Of confidence in sin, when mix'd with zeal,
Seems innocence, and looks to most as well.

XIII.

Thus like the waggish slave in — play,
He spreads the net, and takes the easy prey,
In rage and storm, and blasphemously loud,
His Stentor bellowing to the Grecian crowd,
For Homer's Mars with too much warmth ex-
claim;
Says, dost thou hear, and is thy thunder tame?
Wert thou all brass, thy brazen arm should rage,
And fix the wretch a sign to future age:
Why should mortals to thy feasts repair,
Send useles incense, and more useles prayer?
Athyllus' statue at this rate may prove
By equal rival, or a greater Jove.

XIV.

Be cool, my friend, and hear my muse dispense
Some sovereign comforts, drawn from common sense;
Not fetch'd from Stoic's rigid schools, nor wrought
By Epicurus' more indulgent thought;
Who led by Nature, did with ease pursue
The rules of life; guests'd best, though mis'd
The true:

A desperate wound must skilful hands employ,
That thine is curable by Philip's boy.

XV.

Look o'er the present and the former time,
No example of so vile a crime
Appears; then mourn; admit no kind relief,
At beat thy breast, and I applaud thy grief.
That sorrow then appear in all her state,
Deep mournful silence, and shut fast thy gate.
That solemn grief on money lost attend,
Greater than waits upon a dying friend;
One feigns, none acted mourning's forc'd to show,
He squeezes his eyes to make that torrent flow;
Or money lost demands a heartier due;
Tears are real, and to the grief is true.
But if at each affize, and term, we try
A thousand rascals of as deep a dye;
Men forswear the deeds and bonds they draw,
Though sign'd with all formality of law,
And though the writing and the seal proclaim
He barefac'd perjury, and fix the shame;
O, fortune's darling, nor expect to bear
The common lot, but to avoid thy share!
Thy favourite thou, for better fates design'd,
Hast we the dregs and rubbish of mankind!

XVI.

This petty sinner scarce deserves thy rage,
Compar'd with the great villains of the age.
These hir'd assassins kill, these sulphur thrown,
These treacherous hands, destroys the frighted town.

Bold sacrilege, invading things divine,
Breaks through a temple, or destroys a shrine,
The reverend goblets, and the ancient plate,
Those grateful presents of a conqu'ring state,
Or pious king; or if the shrine be poor,
The image spoils: nor is the god secure.
One seizes Neptune's beard, one Castor's crown,
Or Jove himself, and melts the thunderer down.

Here pois'ners murder, there the impious son,
With whom a guiltless ape is doom'd to drown,
Prevents old age, and with a hasty blow
Cuts down his fire, and quickens fates too slow.

Yet what are these to those vast heaps of crimes,
Which make the greatest business of our times,
Which terms prolong, and which from morn to night

Amaze the juries, and the judges fright!

Attend the court, and thou shalt briefly find
In that one place the manners of mankind;
Hear the indictments, then return again,
Call thyself wretch, and if thou dar'st, complain.
Whom 'midst the Alps do hanging throats surpris'd?
Who stares in Germany at watchet eyes?
Or who in Meroe, when the beast reclind,
Hangs o'er the shoulder to the child behind,
And bigger than the boy? for wonders lost
When things grow common, and are found in most.

When cranes invade, his little sword and shield,
The pigmy takes, and freight attends the field;
The fight's soon o'er; the cranes descend, and
bear

The sprawling warriors through the liquid air:
Now hear, should'st such a fight appear to view,
All men would split, the fight wou'd please whilst
new:

There none's concern'd, where every day they
fight,

And not one warrior is a foot in height.

XVII.

But shall the villain 'scape? shall perjury
Grow rich and safe, and shall the cheat be free?
Hadst thou full power (rage asks no more) to kill,

Or measure out his torments by thy will;
Yet what couldst thou, tormenter, hope to gain?
Thy loss continues, unrepaid by pain,
Inglorious comfort thou shalt poorly meet,
From his mean blood. But, oh! revenge is sweet.

Thus think the crowd, who, eager to engage,
Take quickly fire, and kindle into rage;
Who ne'er consider, but without a pause,
Make up in passion what they want in cause.
Not so mild Thales, nor Cryppus thought,
Nor that good man, who drank the pois'ners'
draught

With mind serene; and cou'd not wish to see
His vile accuser drink as deep as he:
Exalted Socrates! divinely brave!
Injur'd he fell, and dying he forgave,
Too noble for revenge; which still we find
The weakest frailty of a feeble mind;
Degenerous passion, and for man too base,
It seats its empire in the female race,
There rages; and, to make its blow secure,
Puts flatt'ry on, until the aim be sure.

XVIII.

But why must those be thought to 'scape, that feel

Those rods of scorpions, and those whips of steel
Which conscience shakes, when she with rage con-trouls,

And spreads amazing terrors through their souls?

Not sharp revenge, not hell itself can find
A fiercer torment than a guilty mind,
Which day and night doth dreadfully accuse,
Condemns the wretch, and still the charge renews.

XIX.

A trusted Spartan was inclin'd to cheat,
(The coin look'd lovely, and the bag was great, Secret the trust) and with an oath defend
The prize, and baffle his deluded friend:
But weak in sin, and of the gods afraid,
And not well vers'd in the forswearing trade,
He goes to Delphos, humbly begs advice:
And thus the priests by command replies:
Expect sure vengeance by the gods decreed,
To punish thoughts, not yet improv'd to deed.
At this he started, and forbore to swear,
Not out of conscience of the sin, but fear.
Yet plagues ensu'd, and the contagious sin
Destroy'd himself, and ruin'd all his kin.

Thus suffer'd he for the imperfect will
To sin, and bare design of doing ill;
For he that but conceives a crime in thought,
Contracts the danger of an actual fault:
Then what must he expect that still proceeds
To finish sin, and work up thoughts to deeds?

XX.

Perpetual anguish fills his anxious breast,
Not stopt by business, nor compos'd by rest:
No music cheers him, and no feasts can please,
He sits like discontented Damocles,
When by the sportive tyrant wisely shown
The dangerous pleasures of a flatter'd throne.

Sleep flies the wretch, or when his cares oppress,
And his toss'd limbs are weary'd into rest;
Then dreams invade, the injur'd gods appear,
All arm'd with thunder, and awake his fear.
What frights him most, in a gigantic size,
Thy sacred image flashes in his eyes;
These shake his soul, and as they boldly press,
Bring out his crimes, and force him to confess.

This wretch will start at ev'ry flash that flies,
Grow pale at the first murmur of the skies,
Ere clouds are form'd and thunder roars, afraid
And Epicurus can afford no aid,
His notions fail: and the destructive flame Commission'd falls, not thrown by chance, but aim:

One clap is past, and now the skies are clear,
A short reprieve, but to increase his fear:
Whilst arms divide, revenging crimes below,
Are gathering up to give the greater blow.

But if a fever fires his sulphurous blood,
In ev'ry fit, he feels the hand of God,
And heaven-borne flame: then, drown'd in deep
despair,

He dares not offer one repenting prayer;
Nor vow one victim to preserve his breath.
Amaz'd he lies, and sadly looks for death:
For how can hope with desperate guilt agree?
And the worst beast is worthier life than he.

XXI.

He that once sins, like him that slides on ice,
Goes swiftly down the slippery ways of vice;
Though conscience checks him, yet, those ru-gone o'er,

He slides on smoothly, and looks back no more;
What sinners finish where they first begin?
And with one crime content their lust to sin?
Nature, that rude, and in her first essay,
Stood bogging at the roughness of the way,
Us'd to the road, unknowing to return,
Goes boldly on, and loves the path when worn.

XXII.

Fear not, but pleas'd with this successful bait
Thy perjur'd friend will quickly tempt his fate
He will go on, until his crimes provoke
The arm Divine to strike the fatal stroke;
Then thou shalt see him plung'd, when least he fears,

At once accounting for his deep arrears;
Sent to those isles, which through'd we see
With mighty exiles, once secure as he;
Drawn to the gallows, or condemn'd to chains:
Then thou shalt triumph in the villain's pains,
Enjoy his groans; and with a grateful mind
Confess, that Heav'n is neither deaf nor blind.

TRANSLATED BY MR. JOHN DRYDEN.

THE ARGUMENT.

SINCE domestic examples easily corrupt our youth, the poet prudently exhorts all parents, that the themselves should abstain from evil practices: Amongst which, he chiefly points at dice and gaming, taverns, drunkenness, and cruelty, which they exercised upon their slaves: Left after the pernicious example, their sons should copy them in their vices, and become gamesters, drunkard and tyrants, lestrigons, and cannibals to their servants. For, if the father, says Juvenal, love the box and dice, the boy will be given to an itching elbow: Neither is it to be expected, that the daughter of Larga the actress, should be more continent than her mother: Since we are all b nature more apt to receive ill impressions than good ; and are besides more pliant in our infancy and youth, than when we grow up to riper years. Thus we are more apt to imitate a Catiline, than a Brutus, or the uncle of Brutus, Cato Uticensis. For these reasons, he is instant with all parents, that they permit not their children, to hear lascivious words, and that they banish pimps, whores, and parasites from their houses. If they are careful, says the poet, when they make any invitation to their friends, that all things shall be clean, and set in order ; much more is it their duty to their children, that nothing appear corrupt or unbecoming in their family. Storks and vultures, because they are fed by the old ones, with snakes and carrion, naturally, and without instruction, feed on the same uncleanly diet. But the generous eaglet, who is taught by her parent, to fly at hares, and fowle on kids, disdains afterwards to pursue a more ignoble game. Thus the son of Centronius was prone to the vice of raising stately structures, beyond his fortune ; because his father had ruined himself by building. He whose father is a Jew, is naturally prone to superstition, and the observation of his country laws. From hence the poet descends to a satire against avarice, which he esteems to be of worse example than any of the former. The remaining part of the poem is wholly employed on this subject, to show the misery of this vice. He concludes with limiting our desire of riches to a certain measure ; which he confines within the compass of what hunger, and thirst, and cold, require for our preservation and subsistence : With which necessaries if we are not contented, then the treasures of Cræsus, of the Persian king, or of the eunuch Narcissus, who commanded both the will and the fortunes of Claudius the emperor, would not be sufficient to satisfy the greediness of our desires.

FUSCINUS, those ill deeds that fully fame,
And lay such blots upon an honest name,
In blood once tainted, like a current run
From the lewd father, to the lewder son.
If gaming does an aged fire entice,
Then my young master swiftly learns the vice,
And shakes, in hanging-sleeves, the little box
And dice.

Thus the voluptuous youth bred up to dress
For his fat grandfire, some delicious mess ;
In feeding high, his tutor will surpass,
As heir apparent of the Gourmand race.
And, shou'd a thousand grave philosophers
Be always hollowing virtue in his ears,
They wou'd at last their loss of time lament,
And give him o'er for glutton in descent.

Can cruel Rutilus, who loves the noise
Of whips far better than a Syren's voice,
Can Polyphemus, or Antiphates,
Who gorge themselves with man, can such as these Set up to teach humanity, and give
By their example, rules for us to live ?
Can they preach up equality of birth,
And tell us how we all began from earth ?
Th' inhuman lord, who with a cruel gust
Can a red fork in his slave's forehead thrust,
Because th' unlucky criminal was caught
With little theft of two coarse towels draught ?
Can he a son to soft remorse incite,
Whom gaols, and blood, and butchery delight ?
Who wou'd expect the daughter shou'd be other
Than common punk, if Larga be the mother !
Whose lovers names in order to run o'er,
The girl took breath full thirty times, and more :
She, when but yet a tender mixt, began
To hold the door, but now sets up for man ;
And to her gallants, in her own hand-writing
Sends billets-doux of the old bawd's inditing.
So nature prompts ; so soon we go astray,
When old experience puts us in the way :
Our green youth copies what gray sinners act ;
When venerable age commends the fact.

Some sons, indeed, some very few, we see
Who keep themselves from this infection free,
Whom gracious Heaven for nobler ends design'd,
Their looks erected, and their clay refin'd.

The rest are all by bad example led,
And in their father's slimy track they tread.
Is't not enough we should ourselves undo,
But that our children we must ruin too ?
Children, like tender offers, take the bow,
And as they first are fashion'd, always grow.
By nature, headlong to all ills we run,
And virtue, like some dreadful monster, shun.

Survey the world, and where one Cato shines,
Count a degenerate herd of Catilines.
Suffer no lewdness, or unbecoming speech,
Th' apartment of the tender youth to reach ;
Far be from thence the glutton parasite,
Singing his drunken catches all the night :
But farther still be woman ; woman first
Was evil's cause, herself of ills the worst.
Boys ev'n from parents may this reverence claim ;
For when thou dost at some vile action aim,
Say, thou'd the harmless child with-hold thy hand,
Wou'd it not put thy fury to a stand ?
Then may we not conclude the fire unjust,
Who (when his son o'ercome with drink and lust,
Is by the censor of good manners caught,
And suffers public penance for his fault)
Rails, and reviles, and turns him out of door,
For what so off himself has done before :
A son so copy'd from his vice, so much
The very same in every little touch ;
That should he not resemble too his life,
The father justly might suspect his wife.

This very reverend lecher, quite worn out
With rheumatism, and crippled with his gout,
Forgets what he in youthful times has done,
And swings his own vices in his son.
To entertain a guest, with what a care
Would he his household ornaments prepare !
Harafs his servants, and o'erseer stand,
To keep 'em working with a threatening wand :
Clean all my plate, he cries, let not one stain
Sully the figur'd silver, or the plain ;
Rub all the floors, make all the pillars bright,
No hanging cobwebs leave to shock the sight.

O wretched man ! is all this hurry made
On this account, because thou art afraid
A dirty hall or entry should offend
The curious eyes of thy invited friend ?

Reform thy family ; one son at home
 Concerns thee more than many guests to come.
 If to some useful art he be not bred,
 He grows mere lumber, and is worse than dead.
 For what we learn in youth, to that alone
 In age we are by second nature prone.
 The callow storks with lizard and with snake
 Are fed, and soon as ere to wing they take,
 At sight those animals for food pursue,
 The first delicious bit they ever knew.
 Ev'n so 'tis nature in the vulture's breed,
 On dogs and human carcases to feed.
 Jove's bird will fowle upon the tim'rous hare,
 And tender kids with his sharp talions tear ;
 Because such food was laid before him first,
 When from his shell the lab'ring eaglet burst.
 Centronius does high costly Villa's raise
 With Grecian marble, which the sight amaze :
 Some stand upon Cajeta's winding shore,
 At Tybur's tow'r, and at Prænestè more.
 The dome of Hercules and fortune show,
 To his tall fabrics, like small cots below :
 So much his palaces o'er-look 'em all,
 As gilt Possides does our capital.
 His ion builds on, and never is content,
 Till the last farthing is in structure spent.

The Jews, like their bigotted fires before,
 By gazing on the clouds their god adore :
 So superstitious, that they'll sooner dine
 Upon the flesh of men than that of swine.
 Our Roman customs they contemn and jeer,
 But learn and keep their country rites with fear.
 That worship only they in rev'rence have,
 Which in dark volumes their great Moses gave.
 Ask 'em the road, and they shall point you wrong.
 Because you do not to their tribe belong.
 They'll not betray a spring to quench your thirst,
 Unless you show 'em circumcision first.
 So they are taught, and do it to obey
 Their fathers, who observe the Sabbath day.

Young men to imitate all ills are prone,
 But are compell'd to avarice alone :
 For then in virtue's shape they follow vice ;
 Because a true distinction is so nice,
 That the base wretch who hoards up all he can,
 Is prais'd, and call'd a careful, thrifty man :
 The fabled dragon never guarded more
 The golden fleece, then he his ill-got store :
 What a profound respect where'er he goes
 The multitude to such a monster shows ?
 Each father cries, " My son, example take,
 " And led by this wise youth, thy fortunes make,
 " Who day and night ne'er ceas'd to toil and
 " sweat,

" Drudg'd like a smith, and on the anvil beat,
 " Till he had hammer'd out a vast estate.
 " Side with that sect, who learnedly deny,
 " That e're content was join'd with poverty :
 " Who measure happiness by wealth increas'd,
 " And think the money'd man alone is blest.
 Parents the little arts of saving teach,
 Ere ions the top of avarice can reach ;
 When with false weights their servants' guts they cheat,

And pinch their own to cover the deceit :
 Keep a stale crust till it looks blue, and think
 Their flesh ne'er fit for eating till it sink ;

The least remains of which they mince, and dress
 It o'er again to make another mess :
 Adding a leek, whose ev'ry string is told,
 For fear some pil'ring hand should make too bold :
 And with a mark distinct, seal up a dish
 Of thrice-boil'd beans, and putrid summer-fish :
 A beggar on the bridge would loath such food,
 And send it to be wash'd in Tyber's flood.

But, to what end these ways of fordid gain ?
 It shows a manifest unsettled brain,
 Living, to suffer a low starving fate,
 In hopes of dying in a wealthy state.
 For, as thy strutting bags with money rise,
 The love of gain is of an equal size :
 Kind fortune does the poor man better bless,
 Who though he has it not, desires it less.
 One villa therefore is too little thought ;
 A larger farm at a vast price is bought :
 Uneasy still within these narrow bounds,
 Thy next design is on thy neighbour's grounds ;
 His crop invites, to full perfection grown,
 Thy own seems thin, because it is thy own :
 The purchase therefore is demanded streight,
 And if he will not sell, or makes thee wait,
 A team of oxen in the night are sent,
 (Starv'd for the purpose, and with labour spent)
 To take free quarter, which in one half hour
 The pains and product of a year devour :
 Then, some are basely brib'd, to vow it looks
 Most plainly done by thieves with reaping-hooks ;
 Such mean revenge, committed underhand,
 Has ruin'd many an acre of good land.
 What if men talk, and whispers go about,
 Pointing the malice and its author out ?
 He values not what they can say, or do ;
 For who will dare a monied man to sue ?
 Thus he would rather cur's'd, and envy'd be,
 Than lov'd and prais'd in honest poverty.

But to possess a long and happy life,
 Freed from diseases, and secure from strife,
 Give me, ye gods ! the product of one field,
 As large as that which the first Romans till'd ;
 That so I neither may be rich nor poor,
 And having just enough, not covet more.

'Twas then, old soldiers cover'd o'er with scars,
 (The marks of Pyrrhus, or the Punic wars),
 Thought all past services rewarded well,
 If to their share at last two acres fell :
 (Their country's frugal bounty) ; so of old
 Was blood, and life, at a low market sold.

Yet, then, this little spot of earth well till'd,
 A num'rous family with plenty fill'd ;
 The good old man and thrifty housewife spent
 Their days in peace, and fatten'd with content.
 Enjoy'd the dress of life, and liv'd to see
 A long-defending healthful progeny.
 The men were fashion'd in a larger mould ;
 The women fit for labour, big and bold.
 Gigantic hinds, as soon as work was done,
 To their huge pots of boiling pulse would run :
 Fell too, with eager joy, on homely food ;
 And their large veins beat strongly with wholesome
 blood.

Of old, two acres were a bounteous lot,
 Now, scarce they serve to make a garden-plot.
 From hence the greatest part of ills descend,
 When lust of getting more will have no end ;

That, still our weaker passions does command,
And puts the sword and poison in our hand.
Who covets riches, cannot brook delay,
But spurs and bears down all that stops his way :
For law, nor checks of conscience will he hear,
When in hot scent of gain, and full career.

But hark, how ancient Marfus did advise ;
My sons let these small cots and hills suffice :
Let us the harvest of our labour eat ;
His labour makes the coarsest diet sweet :
Thus much to the kind rural gods we owe,
Who pity'd suff'ring mortals long ago ;
When on harsh acorns hungrily they fed,
And gave 'em nicer palates, better bread.
The country peasant meditates no harm,
When clad with skins of beasts to keep him
warm :

In winter weather, unconcern'd, he goes
Almost knee-deep through mire, in clumsy shoes :
Ice dwells in palaces, is richly dress'd,
Here glows in scarlet, and the Tyrian vest.
The wiser ancients these instructions gave :
But now a covetous old crafty knave,
At dead of night shall rouse his son, and cry,
Turn out you rogue, how like a beast you lie !
O, buckle to the law ; is this an hour
To stretch your limbs ? You'll ne'er be chancellor :
Or else yourself to Lælius recommend,
O such broad shoulders Lælius is a friend :
Fight under him, there's plunder to be had ;
Captain is a very gainful trade :
And when in service your best days are spent,
Time you may command a regiment.
It is the trumpet's clangour you abhor,
And dare not be an alderman of war ;
Take to a shop, behind a counter lie,
Eat half in half ; none thrive by honesty :
Never reflect upon the sordid ware
Which you expose ; be gain your only care.
See that grows rich by scouring of a sink,
Sets wherewithal to justify the stink.
His sentence, worthy Jove himself, record
True, and take it on a poet's word :
To have money, is a necessary task,
From whence 'tis got the world will never ask."
Taught by their nurses, little children get
His saying, sooner than their alphabet.
What care a father takes to teach his son,
With ill-tim'd industry, to be undone !
Leave him to nature, and you'll quickly find
The tender cock'ril takes just after kind :
The forward youth will without driving go,
And learn t' outshoot you in your proper bow,
As much as Ajax his own fire excell'd,
And was the brawnier blockhead in the field.
His nature in the boy but stronger grow,
And all the father soon itself will show :
When first the down appears upon his chin,
Or a small sum he swears through thick and thin ;
Ceres altar vents his perjury,
And blasts her holy image with a lie :
A rich wife he marries, in her bed
He's found, by dagger or by poison dead.
While merchants make long voyages by sea,
To get estates, he cuts a shorter way.
The mighty mischiefs little labour lies :
Never counsell'd this, the father cries.

But still, base man, he copy'd this from thee ;
Thine was the prime, original villany.
For he who covets gain to such excess,
Does by dumb signs himself as much express,
As if in words at length he show'd his mind :
Thy bad example made him sin by kind.
But who can youth, let loose to vice, restrain ?
When once the hard-mouth'd horse has got the rein,

He's past thy pow'r to stop ; young Phaeton,
By the wild courfers of his fancy drawn,
From east to north, irregularly hurl'd,
First set on fire himself, and then the world.

Astrologers assure long life, you say,
Your son can tell you better much than they,
Your fon and heir whose hopes your life delay. }
Poison will work against the stars, beware ;
For ev'ry meal an antidote prepare :
And let Archigenes some cordial bring
Fit for a wealthy father, or a king.

What sight more pleasant, in his public shows
Did ever prætor on the stage expose,
Than are such men as ev'ry day we see,
Whose chief mishap, and only misery
Is to be overstock'd with ready coin,
Which now they bring to watchful Castor's shrine ;
Since Mars, whom we the great revenger call,
Lost his own helmet, and was stript of all.
'Tis time dull-theatres we should forsake,
When busy men much more diversion make.
The tumblers gambols some delight afford,
No less the nimble cap'rer on the cord ;
But these are still insipid stuff to thee,
Coop'd in a ship, and tofs'd upon the sea.
Base wretch, expos'd by thy own covetous mind,
To the deaf mercy of the waves and wind.
The dancer on the rope, with doubtful tread,
Gets wherewithal to clothe and buy him bread,
Nor covets more than hunger to prevent ;
But nothing less than millions thee content :
What shipwrecks and dead bodies choke the
sea ;

The numerous fools that were betray'd by thee !
For at the charming call of pow'rful gain,
Whole fleets equipt appear upon the main,
And spite of Lybian and Carpathian gale,
Beyond the limits of known earth they sail.
A labour worth the while, at last to brag
(When safe return'd, and with a strutting bag),
What finny sea-gods thou hast had in view,
More than our lying poets ever knew.
What several madneses in men appear !
Orestes runs from fancy'd furies here ;
Ajax belabours there an harmless ox,
And thinks that Agamemnon feels the knocks.
Nor is indeed that man less mad than these,
Who freights a ship to venture on the seas :
With one frail interposing plank to save
From certain death roll'd on by ev'ry wave :
Yet silver makes him all his toil embrace,
Silver, with titles stamp'd, and a dull monarch's
face.

When gath'ring clouds o'ershadow all the skies,
And shoot quick lightnings, weigh my boys, he
cries,
A summer's thunder, soon it will be past !
Yet, hardy fool, this night may prove thy last ;

When thou (thy ship o'erwhelm'd with waves) shalt be

Forc'd to plunge naked in the raging sea;
Thy teeth hard press'd, a purseful of dear gold,
The last remains of all thy treasure, hold.

Thus he—

Whose sacred hunger, all the stores that lie
In yellow Tagus could not satisfy;
Does now in tatter'd clothes at some lane's end
A painted storm for charity extend.

With care and trouble great estates we gain,
When got, we keep 'em with more care and pain.
Rich Licinus's servants ready stand,
Each with a water-bucket in his hand,
Keeping a guard, for fear of fire, all night,
Yet Licinus is always in a fright.

His curious statues; amber-works, and plate,
Still fresh increasing pangs of mind create.
The naked Cynic's jar ne'er flames; if broken
'Tis quickly foder'd, or a new bespoken.

When Alexander first beheld the face
Of the great Cynic in that narrow space;
His own condition thus he did lament:
How much more happy thou, that art content
To live within this little hole, than I
Who after empire, that vain quarry, fly;
Grappling with dangers wherefoe'er I roam,
While thou hast all the conquer'd world at home.

Fortune a goddess is to fools alone,
The wise are always masters of their own,
If any ask me what would satisfy
To make life easy, thus I would reply:
As much as keeps out hunger, thirst, and cold,
Or what contented Socrates of old:
As much as made wise Epicurus blest,
Who in small gardens spacious realms possess;
This is what nature's wants may well suffice:
He that would more, is covetous, not wise.
But since among mankind so few there are,
Who will conform to philosophic fare;
Thus much I will indulge thee for thy ease,
And mingle something of our times to please.
Therefore enjoy a plentiful estate,
As much as will a knight of Rome create
By Rofcian law: And if that will not do,
Double, and take as much as will make two;
Nay, three, to satisfy the last desire:
But if to more than this thou dost aspire;
Believe me, all the riches of the east,
The wealth of Cræsus cannot make thee blest:
The treasure Claudius to Narcissus gave,
Would make thee, Claudius-like, an errant-slave;
Who to obey his mighty minion's will,
Did his lov'd empris Messalina kill.

THE ARGUMENT.

IN this satire against the superstition and cruelty of the Egyptians, it is probable our author had his old friend Crispinus (who was of that country) in his eye; and to whom he had paid his respects more than once before. The scene is now removed from Rome, which shows our author a professed enemy of vice wherefoever he meets with it. But if by the change of place, his subject and performance in this satire be, as some think, more barren than in his others (the people being obscure and mean rabble, whose barbarous fact he relates) we find in it, however, sprinklings of the same moral sentiments and reflections that adorn the rest.

How Egypt, mad with superstition grown,
Makes gods of monsters, but too well is known:
One sect, devotion to Nile's serpent pays;
Others to Ibis that on serpent preys.
Where Thebes, thy hundred gates lie unrepair'd,
And where maim'd Memno's magic harp is heard,
Where these are mould'ring, lest the fots combine
With pious care a monkey to enshrine!
Fish-gods you'll meet with fins and scales o'er-
grown;
Diana's dogs ador'd in ev'ry town,
Her dogs have temples, but the goddess none? }
'Tis mortal sin an onion to devour,
Each clove of garlic is a sacred pow'r.
Religious nations sure and blest abodes,
Where ev'ry orchard is o'errun with gods.
To kill, is murder, sacrilege to eat
A kid or lamb—Man's flesh is lawful meat!

Of such a practice when Ulysses told,
What think you? Could Alcino's guests withhold
From scorn or rage? Shall we (cries one) permit
This lewd romancer, and his bant'ring wit?
Nor on Charybdis rock beat out his brains,
Or fend him to the Cyclops whom he feigns.
Of Scylla's dogs, and stranger flams than these,
Cyane's rocks that juttle in the seas,
Of winds in bags (for mirth-fake) let him tell,
And of his mates turn'd swine by Circe's spell,
But men to eat men, human faith surpasses:
This traveller takes us islands for asses.
Thus the incred'ulous Phæac (having yet Drank but one round) reply'd in sober fret.
Nor without reason truly, since the board
(For proof o' th' fact had but Ulysses' word.)
What I relate 's more strange, and ev'n exceeds
All registers of purple tyrants deeds;

Portentous mischief they but singly act,
A multitude conspir'd to this more horrid fact.
Prepare, I say, to hear of such a crime
As tragic poets, since the birth of time,
Ne'er feign'd, a thronging audience to amaze;
But true, and perpetrated in our days.

Ombus and Tentyr, neighb'ring towns, of late
Broke into outrage of deep-sest'rd hate.
A grutch in both, time out of mind, begun,
And mutually bequeath'd from fire to son.
Religious spight and pious spleen bred first
This quarrel, which so long the bigots nurst.
Each calls the other's god a senseless stock,
His own, divine; though from the self-same block
One carver fram'd them, diff'ring but in shape,
A serpent this resembling, that an ape.

The Tentyrites to execute their crime
Think none so proper, as a sacred time;
Which call'd to Ombites forth to public rites,
Sev'n days they spent in feasts, sev'n sleepless nights.

(For scoundrel as these wretched Ombites be, Canopus they exceed in luxury).
Them rev'ling thus the Tentyrites invade,
By giddy heads and stagg'ring legs betray'd:
Strange odds! where crop-sick drunkards must engage

A hungry foe, and arm'd with sober rage.
At first both parties in reproaches jar,
And make their tongues the trumpets of the war.
Words break no bones, and in a railing fray,
Women and priests can be as stout as they.
Words serve but to inflame our warlike lists,
Who wanting weapons clutch their horny fists.
Yet thus make shift t' exchange such furious blows,
Scarce one escapes with more than half a nose.
Some stand their ground with half their visage
gone,

But with the remnant of a face fight on.
Such transform'd spectacles of horror grow,
That not a mother her own son would know.
One eye, remaining, for the other spies,
Which now on earth a trampled gelly lies.
Yet hitherto both parties think the fray
But mockery of war, mere children's play:
Though traversing, with streams of blood they
meet,

They tread no carcase yet beneath their feet:
And scandal think't to have none slain outright,
Between two hosts that for religion fight.

This whets their rage to search for stones, as large
As they could lift, or with both hands discharge.
Not altogether of a size, if match'd
With those which Ajax once, or Turnus snatch'd
For their defence, or by Tydides thrown,
That brush'd Æneas crest, and struck him down,
Of weight would make two men strain hard to raise,
Such men as liv'd in honest Homer's days:
Whom giants yet to us we must allow,
Dwindled into a race of pigmies now;
The mirth and scorn of gods, that see us fight,
Such little wafers, and yet to full of spite:
For bulk mere insects, yet in mischief strong,
And spent so ill, our short life's much too long!

Fresh forces now of Tentyrites from town,
With swords and darts, to aid their friends, come
down.

Who with fleet arrows levell'd from afar,
Ere they themselves approach'd, secure the war.
Hard set before, what could the Ombites do?
They fly; their pressing foes as fast pursue.
An Ombite wretch (by headlong haste betray'd
And falling down i' th' rout) is pris'ner made:
Whose flesh torn off by lumps, the rav'nous foe
In morsels cut, to make it farther go,
His bones clean pick'd, his very bones they gnaw;
No stomach's baulk'd, because the corps is raw.
'T had been lost time to dress him—keen desire
Supplies the want of kettle, spit, and fire.
(Prometheus' ghost is sure o'erjoy'd to see
His heav'n-stol'n fire from such disaster free:
Nor seems the sparkling element less pleas'd than he.)

The guests are found too num'rous for the treat,

But all, it seems, who had the luck to eat,
Swear they ne'er tasted more delicious meat.
They swear, and such good palates you should truit,
Who doubts the relish of the first free gust?
Since one who had i' th' rear excluded been,
And could not for a taste o' th' flesh come in.
Licks the soil'd earth, which he thinks full as good;
While reeking with a mangled Ombite's blood.

The Vascons once with man's flesh (as 'tis said)
Kept life and soul together—grant they did,
Their case was foul'rent; with long siege distress'd,
And all extremities of war oppress'd.

(For miserable to the last degree,
Th' excuse of such a practice ought to be).
With creatures, vermin, herbs, and weeds sus-
tain'd,

[main'd: While creatures, vermin, herbs, or weeds re-
Till to such meagre spectacles reduc'd,
As ev'n compassion in the foe produc'd:
Acquitted by the manes of the dead,
And ghosts of carcases on which they fed,
By Zeno's doctrine we are taught, 'tis true,
For life's support no harmless thing to do.
But Zeno never to the Vascons read;
( 'Tis since their days that civil arts have spread):
'Twas lately British lawyers, from the Gaul
Learnt to harangue, and eloquently hawl.

Thule hopes next t' improve her northern style,
And plant (where yet no spring did ever smile
With flow'rs of rhetoric her frozen isle).

That brave the Vascons were, we must confess,
Who fortitude preserv'd in such distress.
Yet not the brightest their example shines,
Eclips'd by the more noble Saguntines;
Who, both the foe, and famine to beguile,
For dead and living rais'd one common pile.

Mæotis first did impious rites devise
Of treating gods with human sacrifice;
But savage Egypt's cruelty exceeds
The Scythian shrine, where, though the captive bleeds,

Secure of burial when his life is fled,
The murdering knife's thrown by, when once the victim's dead.

Did famine to this monstrous fact compel,
Or did the miscreants try this conj'ring spell,
In time of drought to make the Nile to swell?
Amongst the rugged Cymbrians, or the race
Of Gauls, or fiercer Tartars can you trace

An outrage of revenge like this, pursu'd
By an effeminate scoundrel multitude.
Whose outmost daring is to cross the Nile
In painted boats to fright the crocodile.
Can men, or more relenting gods, invent,
Or hell inflict proportion'd punishment
On varlets, who could treat revenge and spite
With such a feast, famine's self would fright?
Compassion proper to mankind appears,
Which nature witness'd when she let us tears.
Of tender sentiments we only give
Those proofs: To weep in our prerogative;
To show by pitying looks, and melting eyes,
How with a suffering friend we sympathize!
Nay, tears will ev'n from a wrong'd orphan slide,

When his false guardian at the bar is try'd:
So tender, so unwilling to accuse,
So soft the roses on his cheek bedews,
So soft his tresses, fill'd with trickling pearl,
You doubt his sex, and take him for a girl.
B' impulse of nature (though to us unknown
The party be) we make the loss our own;
And tears steal from our eyes when in the street
With some betrothed virgin's berse we meet,
Or infant's fun'ral, from the cheated womb
Convey'd to earth, and cradled in a tomb.
Who can all sense of others ills escape,
Is but a brute at best in human shape.
This nat'ral piety did first refine
Our wit, and rais'd our thoughts to things divine:

This proves our spirit of the gods descent,
While that of beasts is prone and downward bent.
To them but earth-born life they did dispense
To us, for mutual aid, celestial fence.
From straggling mountainers, for public good,
To rank in tribes, and quit the savage wood.
Houses to build, and them contiguous make,
For cheerful neighbourhood and safety's sake.
In war, a common standard to erect,
A wounded friend in battle to protect;
The summons take of the same trumpet's call,
To fall from one port or man on public wall.
But serpents now more amity maintain!
From spotted skins the leopard does refrain:
No weaker lion's by a stronger slain:
Nor, from his larger tusks, the forest boar,
Commission takes his brother-swine to gore.
Tyger with tyger, bear with bear you'll find
In leagues offensive and defensive join'd,
But lawless man the anvil dares profane,
And forg'd that steel by which a man is slain!
Which earth, at first, for ploughshares did afford,
Nor yet the smith had learnt to form a sword.
An impious crew we have beheld, whose rage
Their enemies very life could not assuage,
Unless they banquet on the wretch they flew,
Devour the corps, and lick the blood they drew!
What think you, would Pythagoras have laid
Of such a feast, or to what desert fled?
Who flesh of animals refus'd to eat,
Nor held all sorts of pulse for lawful meat.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE poet, in this satire, proves, that the condition of a soldier is much better than that of a country-man: first, because a country-man, however affronted, provoked, and struck himself, dares not strike a soldier; who is only to be judged by a court-martial: and by the law of Camillus, which obliges him not to quarrel without the trenches, he is also assured to have a speedy hearing, and quick dispatch: whereas, the townsman or peasant is delayed in his suit by frivolous pretences, and not sure of justice when he is heard in the court: The soldier is also privileged to make a will, and to give away his estate, which he got in war, to whom he pleases, without consideration of parentage or relations; which is denied to all other Romans. This satire was written by Juvenal, when he was a commander in Egypt: it is certainly his, though I think it not finished. And if it be well observed, you will find he intended an invective against a standing army.

WHAT vast prerogatives, my Gallus, are Accruing to the mighty man of war!
For, if into a lucky camp I light,
Though raw in arms, and yet afraid to fight,
Besfriend me, my good stars, and all goes right:
One happy hour is to a soldier better,
Than mother Juno's recommending letter,
Or Venus, when to Mars she would prefer
My suit, and own the kindness done to her.

See, what our common privileges are:
As, first, no saucy citizen should dare

To strike a soldier, nor, when struck, resent
The wrong, for fear of farther punishment:
Not though his teeth are beaten out, his eyes
Hang by a string, in bumps his forehead rise,
Shall he presume to mention his disgrace,
Or beg amends for his demolish'd face.
A booted judge shall sit to try his cause,
Not by the statute, but by martial laws;
Which old Camillus order'd, to confine
The brawls of soldiers to the trench and line:

A wife provision; and from thence 'tis clear,
That officers a soldier's cause should hear:
And, taking cognizance of wrongs receiv'd,
An honest man may hope to be reliev'd,
So far 'tis well: but with a general cry,
The regiment will rise in mutiny,
The freedom of their fellow-rogue demand,
And, if refus'd, will threaten to disband.
Withdraw thy action, and depart in peace;
The remedy is worse than the disease:
This cause is worthy him, who in the hall
Would for his fee, and for his client, bawl:
But wouldst thou, friend, who hast two legs alone,
(Which, heaven be prais'd, thou yet may'st call thy own)
Wouldst thou, to run the gauntlet, these expose
To a whole company of hob-nail'd shoes?
Sure the good-breeding of wise citizens
Should teach them more good-nature to their shins.
Besides, whom can'st thou think so much thy
friend,

Who dares appear thy business to defend?
Dry up thy tears, and pocket up th' abuse,
Nor put thy friend to make a bad excuse.
The judge cries out, your evidence produce.
Will he, who saw the soldier's mutton-suit,
And saw thee man'd, appear within the list.
To witness truth? When I see one so brave,
The dead, think I, are risen from the grave;
And with their long spade beards, and matted hair,

Our honest ancestors are come to take the air.
Against a clown, with more security,
A witness may be brought to swear a lie,
Than, though his evidence be full and fair,
To vouch a truth against a man of war.

More benefits remain, and claim'd as rights,
Which are a standing army's perquisites.
If any rogue vexatious suits advance
Against me for my known inheritance,

Enter by violence my fruitful grounds,
Or take the sacred land-mark from my bounds,
Those bounds, which with possession and with prayer,

And offer'd cakes, have been my annual care:
Or if my debtors do not keep their day,
Deny their hands, and then refuse to pay;
I must, with patience, all the terms attend,
Among the common causes that depend,
Till mine is call'd; and that long look'd-for day
Is still encumber'd with some new delay:
Perhaps the cloth of state is only spread,
Some of the quorum may be sick a-bed;
That judge is hot, and doffs his gown, while this
O'er night was bowfy, and goes out to pifs:
So many rubs appear, the time is gone
For hearing, and the tedious suit goes on:
But buff and belt-men never know these cares,
No time, nor trick of law their action bars:
Their cause they to an easier issue put:
They will be heard, or they lug out, and cut.

Another branch of their revenue still Remains, beyond their boundless right to kill,
Their father, yet alive, empower'd to make a will.

For, what their prowess gain'd, the law declares
Is to themselves alone, and to their heirs:
No share of that goes back to the begetter,
But if the son fights well, and plunders better,
Like stout Coranus, his old shaking fire
Does a remembrance in his will desire:
Inquisitive of fights, and longs in vain
To find him in the number of the slain:
But still he lives, and rising by the war,
Enjoys his gains, and has enough to spare:
For 'tis a noble general's prudent part
To cherish valour, and reward desert:
Let him be daub'd with lace, live high, and whore;

Sometimes be lousy, but be never poor.

ARGUMENT OF THE PROLOGUE TO THE FIRST SATIRE.

The design of the author was to conceal his name and quality. He lived in the dangerous times of the tyrant Nero; and aims particularly at him in most of his satires. For which reason, though he was a Roman knight, and of a plentiful fortune, he would appear in this prologue but a beggarly poet, who writes for bread. After this, he breaks into the business of the first satire; which is chiefly to decry the poetry then in fashion, and the impudence of those who were endeavouring to pass their stuff upon the world.

PROLOGUE TO THE FIRST SATIRE.

NEVER did on cleft Parnassus pream,
Nor taste the sacred Heliconian stream;
Nor can remember when my brain, inspir'd,
Was, by the muses, into madness fir'd.
No share in pale Pyrene I resign;
And claim no part in all the mighty Nine.
Snares, with winding ivy crown'd, belong
To nobler poets, for a nobler song:
Idle of verse, and hopelefs of the crown,
Since half a wit, and more than half a clown,
Before the shrine I lay my rugged numbers down.

Who taught the parrot human notes to try;
Or with a voice endu'd the chattering pie?
'Twas witty want, fierce hunger to appease:
Want taught their masters, and their masters these.

Let gain, that gilded bait, be hung on high,
The hungry wittings have it in their eye;
Pies, crows, and daws, poetic presents bring:
You say they squeak; but they will swear they sing.

THE ARGUMENT.

I need not repeat, that the chief aim of the author is against bad poets in this satire. But I must add, that he includes also bad orators, who began at that time (as Petronius in the beginning of his book tells us) to enervate manly eloquence, by tropes and figures, ill-placed and worse applied. Amongst the poets, Persius covertly strikes at Nero; some of whose verses he recites with scorn and indignation. He also takes notice of the noblemen and their abominable poetry, who, in the luxury of their fortunes, set up for wits and judges. The satire is in dialogue, betwixt the author and his friend or monitor; who dissuades him from this dangerous attempt of exposing great men. But Persius, who is of a free spirit, and has not forgotten that Rome was once a commonwealth, breaks through all those difficulties, and boldly arraigns the false judgment of the age in which he lives. The reader may observe that our poet was a Stoic philosopher; and that all his moral sentences, both here and in all the rest of his satires, are drawn from the dogmas of that sect.

IN DIALOGUE BETWIXT THE POET AND HIS FRIEND OR MONITOR.

Persius.

I'm anxious are our cares, and yet how vain
The bent of our desires!

Friend. Thy spleen contain:
For none will read thy satires.

Persius. This to me?

Friend. None; or what's next to none, but two or three.

Hard, I grant,

Vol. XII.

Persius. 'Tis nothing; I can bear
That paltry scribblers have the public ear:
That this vast universal fool, the town,
Should cry up Labeo's stuff, and cry me down.
They damn themselves; nor will my muse descend
To clap with such, who fools and knaves commend:

Their smiles and censures are to me the same:
I care not what they praise, or what they blame.
In full assemblies let the crowd prevail:
I weigh no merit by the common scale.
The conscience is the test of every mind;
"Seek not thyself, without thyself, to find."

But where's that Roman?—Somewhat I would say,

But fear;—let fear, for once, to truth give way.

Truth lends the Stoic courage: when I look

On human acts, and read in nature's book,

From the first pastimes of our infant-age,

To slder cares, and man's severer page;

When stern as tutors, and as uncles hard,

We lash the pupil, and defraud the ward:

'Then, then I say,—or would say, if I durst—

But thus provok'd, I must speak out, or burst.

Friend. Once more forbear.

Persius. I cannot rule my spleen;
My scorn rebels, and tickles me within.

First, to begin at home: our authors write

In lonely rooms, secur'd from public sight;

Whether in prose or verse, 'tis all the same:

'Tis prose in fustian, and the numbers lame.

All noise, and empty pomp, a storm of words,

Labouring with sound, that little sense affords.

They comb, and then they order every hair:

A gown, or white, or scour'd to whiteness, wear:

A birth-day jewel bobbing at their ear.

Next, gargle well their throats, and thus prepar'd,

They mount, a God's name, to be seen and heard.

From their high scaffold, with a trumpet creak,

And ogling all their audience ere they speak.

The nauseous nobles, ev'n the chief of Rome,

With gaping mouths to these rehearsals come,

And pant with pleasure, when some lusty line

The marrow pierces, and invades the chine.

At open fulsome bawdry they rejoice,

And slimy jest applaud with broken voice.

Base prostitute, thus dost thou gain thy bread?

Thus dost thou feed their ears, and thus art fed?

At his own filthy stuff he grins and brays:

And gives the sign where he expects their praise.

Why have I learn'd, say'st thou, if, thus con-

I choke the noble vigour of my mind? [fin'd,

Know, my wild fig-tree, which in rocks is bred,

Will split the quarry, and shoot out the head.

Fine fruits of learning! old ambitious fool,

Dar'st thou apply that adage of the school:

As if 'tis nothing worth that lives conceal'd,

And "science is not science till reveal'd?"

Oh, but 'tis brave to be admir'd, to see

The crowd, with pointing fingers, cry, That's he;

That's he whose wondrous poem is become

A lecture for the noble youth of Rome!

Who, by their fathers, is at casts renown'd;

And often quoted when the bowls go round.

Full gorg'd and stuf'd, they wantonly rehearse;

And add to wine the luxury of verse.

One, clad in purple, not to lose his time,

Eats, and recites some lamentable rhyme:

Some senseless Phillis, in a broken note,

Snuffing at nose, and croaking in his throat:

'Then graciously the mellow audience nod:

Is not th' immortal author made a god?

Are not his manes blest, such praise to have?

Lies not the turf more lightly on his grave?

And roses (while his loud applause they sing)

Stand ready from his sepulchre to spring?

All these, you cry, but light objections are;

More malice, and you drive the jest too far.

For does there breathe a man who can reject

A general fame, and his own lines neglect?

In cedar tablets worthy to appear,

That need not fish, or frankincense to fear?

Thou, whom I make the adverse part, to bear

Be answer'd thus:—If I by chance succeed—

In what I write (and that's a chance indeed),

Know, I am not so stupid, or so hard,

Not to feel praise, or fame's deserv'd reward;

But this I cannot grant, that thy applause

Is my work's ultimate or only cause.

Prudence can'er propose to mean a prize;

For mark what vanity within it lies.

Like Labeo's Iliads, in whose verse is found

Nothing but trifling care, and empty sound:

Such little elegies as nobles write,

Who would be poets, in Apollo's spite.

Them and their woeeful works the muse defies:

Products of citron-beds, and golden canopies.

To give thee all thy due, thou hast the heart

To make a supper with a fine desert. [part

And to thy thread-bare friend a cast old suit im-

Thus brib'd, thou thus bespeak'st him, Tell

friend,

(For I love truth, nor can plain speech offend)

What says the world of me and of my muse?

The poor dare nothing tell but flattering news

But shall I speak? Thy verse is wretched rhyme

And all thy labours are but loss of time.

Thy flutting belly swells, thy paunch is high;

Thou writ'st not, but thou pisset poetry.

All authors to their own defects are blind;

Hadst thou but, Janus-like, a face behind,

To see the people, what splay-mouths they make

To mark their fingers, pointed at thy back:

Their tongues loll'd out, a foot beyond the pitch

When most abhorr'd of an Apulian bitch:

But noble scribblers are with flattery fed;

For none dare find their faults who eat their bread

To pass the poets of patrician blood,

What is't the common reader takes for good?

The verse in fashion is when numbers flow:

Soft without sense, and without spirit flow:

So smooth and equal, that no sight can find

The rivet, where the polish'd piece was join'd.

So even all, with such a steady view,

As if he shut one eye to level true.

Whether the vulgar vice his satire stings,

The people's riots, or the rage of kings,

The gentle poet is alike in all;

His reader hopes to rise, and fears no fall.

Friend. Hourly we see, some raw pin-feather'd thing

Attempt to mount, and fights and heroes sing;

Who, for false quantities, was whipt at school

But t'other day, and breaking grammar-rule,

Whose trivial art was never try'd above

The brave description of a native grove:

Who knows not how to praise the country store,

The fests, the baskets, nor the fatted boar;

Nor paint the flowery fields that paint themselves before.

Where Romulus was bred, and Quintus born,

Whose shining plough-share was in furrows worn,

Met by his trembling wife, returning home,

And rustically joy'd, as chief of Rome:

She wip'd the sweat from the dictator's brow;

And o'er his back his robe did rudely throw;

The listers bore in state their lord's triumphant plough.

ne love to hear the fustian poet roar;
 Some on antiquated authors pore:
 Umage for fustian; and think those only good
 Wh labour most, and least are understood.
 Wh thou shalt see the blear-eyed fathers teach
 Their sons, this harsh and mouldy sort of speech;
 Or hers, new affected ways to try,
 Of anton smoothness, female poetry;
 Thou would inquire from whence this motly style
 Did first our Roman purity defile:
 Thou old dotards cannot keep their seat;
 They reap and catch at all that's obsolete.
 Others, by foolish ostentation led,
 When call'd before the bar, to save their head,
 Bring trifling tropes, instead of solid sense:
 And mind their figures more than their defence.
 And pleas'd to hear their thick-skull'd judges cry,
 We mov'd, oh finely said, and decently:
 He (says th' accuser) to thy charge I lay,
 O Diuius! what does gentle Pedius say?
 I would to please the genius of the times,
 I would in periods, points, and tropes, he flurs his crimes:
 He robb'd not, but he borrow'd from the poor;
 And took but with intention to restore.
 He deals with flourishes his long harangue; [hang?
 I think, say'st thou; what, to be prais'd, and
 To flinginate Roman, shall such stuff prevail
 To cottle thee, and make thee wag thy tail?
 I say thou'd a shipwreck'd fallor sing his woe,
 Wou'd'st thou be mov'd to pity, or bestow
 Anons? What's more preposterous than to see
 A sorry beggar? Mirth in misery?
 Pedius. He seems a trap, for charity, to lay:
 Anons, by night, his lesson for the day.
 Ped. But to raw numbers, and unfinished verse,
 Some found is added now, to make it terse:
 'Tis tagg'd with rhyme, like Berecynthian Atys,
 The mid-part chimes with art, which never
 " flat is.
 The dolphin brave, that cuts the liquid wave,
 Che who in his line, can chine the long-ribb'd
 " Apennine."
 Ped. All this is doggrel stuff.
 Friend. What if I bring
 Under verse? " Arms and the man I sing."
 Ped. Why name you Virgil with such tops as He ruly great, and must for ever please: [these?
 Not erce, but awful, in his manly page;
 Boln his strength, but sober in his rage. [read
 Ped. What poems think you soft? and to be Wit languishing regards, and bended head? [crew
 Ped. " Their crooked horns the Mimalonian
 Wh blasts inspir'd; and Bassaris who flew
 Th scornful calf, with sword advanc'd on high,
 Made from his neck his haughty head to fly.
 Al Mænas, when, with ivy bridles bound,
 Slid the spotted lynx, then Evion rung
 " around; [found."
 Ped. From woods and floods repairing echo's
 Cold such rude lines a Roman mouth become,
 We any manly greatneis left in Rome?
 Mænas and Atys in the mouth were bred;
 And never hath'd within the labouring head:
 No bod from bitten nails those poems drew:
 But turn'd, like spittle, from the lips they flew,
 Ped. 'Tis fustian all; 'tis execrably bad;
 But they will be fools, must you be mad?

Your fatires, let me tell you, are too fierce;
 The great will never bear so blunt a verse.
 Their doors are barr'd against a bitter flout:
 Snarl, if you please, but you shall snarl without.
 Expect such pay as railing rhymes deserve,
 Y' are in a very hopeful way to starve.
 Pedius. Rather than so, uncensur'd let them be;
 All, is admirably well, for me.
 My harmless rhyme shall 'scape the dire disgrace
 Of common-shores, and every pissing place.
 Two painted serpents shall, on high, appear;
 'Tis holy ground; you must not urine here.
 This shall be writ to fright the fry away,
 Who draw their little baubles, when they play.
 Yet old Lucilius never fear'd the times,
 But last'd the city, and dissected crimes.
 Mutius and Lupus both by name be brought;
 He mouth'd 'em, and betwixt his grinders caught;
 Unlike in method, with conceal'd design,
 Did crafty Horace his low numbers join:
 And, with a sly insinuating grace,
 Laugh'd 'at his friend, and look'd him in the face.
 Would raise a blush, where secret vice he found;
 And tickle, while he gently prob'd the wound.
 With seeming innocence the crowd beguil'd;
 But made the desperate passers when he snail'd.
 Could he do this, and is my muse control'd
 By servile awe? Born free, and not be bold?
 At least, I'll dig a hole within the ground;
 And to the trusty earth commit the found:
 The reeds shall tell you what the poet fears,
 " King Midas has a snout, and asses ears."
 This mean conceit, this darling mystery, [buy,
 Which thou think'st nothing, friend, thou shalt not
 Nor will I change for all the flashy wit,
 That flattering Libe'o, in his Illiads, writ.
 Thou, if there be a thou in this safe town,
 Who dares, with angry Eupolis, to frown;
 He, who, with bold Cratinus, is inspir'd
 With zeal, and equal indignation fir'd:
 Who, at enormous villany, turns pale,
 And steers against it with a full-blown sail,
 Like Ariophanes, let him but smile [style;
 On this thy honest work, though writ in homely
 And if two lines or three in all the vein
 Appear less drossy, read those lines again.
 May they perform their author's just intent,
 Glow in thy ears, and in thy breast ferment.
 But from the reading of my book and me,
 Be far, ye foes of virtuous poverty:
 Who fortune's fault upon the poor can throw;
 Point at the tatter'd coat, and ragged shoe;
 Lay Nature's failings to their charge, and jeer
 The dim weak eye-sight, when the mind is clear,
 When thou thyself, thus insolent in state,
 Art but, perhaps, some country magistrate:
 Whose power extends no farther than to speak
 Big on the bench, and scanty weights to break.
 Him, also, for my censor I disdain,
 Who thinks all science, as all virtue, vain;
 Who counts geometry, and numbers, toys;
 And, with his foot, the sacred dust destroys:
 Whose pleasure is to see a strumpet tear
 A Cynic's beard, and lug him by the hair.
 Such, all the morning, to the pleadings run;
 But when the business of the day is done,
 On dice, and drink, and drabs, they spend their afternoon.

S A T I R E II.

DEDICATED TO HIS FRIEND PLOTIUS MACRINUS, ON HIS BIRTH-DAY.

THE ARGUMENT.

THIS satire contains a most grave and philosophical argument, concerning prayers and wishes. Undoubtedly it gave occasion to Juvenal's tenth satire; and both of them had their original from one of Plato's dialogues, called the "Second Alcibiades." Our author has induced it with great mystery of art, by taking his rise from the birth-day of his friend; on which occasions, prayers were made and sacrifices offered by the native. Persius, commending the purity of his friend's vows, defends to the impious and immoral requests of others. The satire is divided into three parts: the first is the exordium to Micrinus, which the poet confines within the compass of four verses. The second relates to the matter of the prayers and vows, and an enumeration of those things, wherein men commonly sinned against right reason, and offended in their requests. The third part consists in showing the repugnances of those prayers and wishes, to those of other men, and inconsistencies with themselves. He shows the original of these vows, and sharply inveighs against them: and lastly not only corrects the false opinion of mankind concerning them, but gives the true doctrine of all addresses made to Heaven, and how they may be made acceptable to the powers above, in excellent precepts, and more worthy of a Christian than a Heathen.

LET this auspicious morning be express
With a white stone, distinguish'd from the rest:
White as thy fame, and as thy honour clear;
And let new joys attend on thy new added year:
Indulge thy genius, and o'erflow thy soul,
Till thy wit sparkle, like the cheerful bowl.
Pray; for thy prayers the test of heaven will
bear;

Nor need'st thou take the gods aside, to hear:
While others, ev'n the mighty men of Rome,
Big swell'd with mischief, to the temples come;
And in low murmurs, and with costly smoke,
Heaven's help, to prosper their black vows, invoke.
So boldly to the gods mankind reveal
What from each other they, for shame, conceal.
Give me good fame, ye powers, and make me just:
Thus much the rogue to public ears will trust:
In private then:—When wilt thou, mighty Jove,
My wealthy uncle from this world remove?
Or—O thou thunderer's son, great Hercules,
That once thy bounteous deity would please
To guide my rake, upon the chinking sound
Of some vast treasure, hidden under ground!

O were my pupil fairly knock'd o' th' head;
I should possess th' estate, if he were dead!
He's so far gone with rickets, and with th' evil,
That one small dose will send him to the devil.

This is my neighbour Nerius's third spouse,
Of whom in happy time he rids his house.
But my eternal wife!—Grant heaven I may Survive to see the fellow of this day!
Thus, that thou may'st the better bring about
Thy wishes, thou art wickedly devout:
In Tyber ducking thrice, by break of day,
To wash th' obscenities of night away.
But pr'ythee tell me ('tis a small request),
With what ill thoughts of Jove art thou possess'd?
Would'st thou prefer him to some man? Suppose
I dipp'd among the worst, and Statius chose?

Which of the two would thy wife head declare
The truster tutor to an orphan-heir?
Or, put it thus:—Unfold to Statius, straight,
What to Jove's ear thou didst impart of late:
He'll stare, and, O good Jupiter! will cry;
Canst thou indulge him in this villany!
And think'st thou, Jove himself, with patience thee
Can hear a prayer condemn'd by wicked men?
That, void of care, he lolls supine in state,
And leaves his business to be done by fate?
Because his thunder splits some burley-tree,
And is not darted at thy house and thee?
Or that his vengeance falls not at the time,
Just at the perpetration of thy crime:
And makes thee a sad object of our eyes,
Fit for Ergenna's prayer and sacrifice?
What well sed offering to appease the god,
What powerful present to procure a nod,
Hast thou in store? What bribe hast thou prepar'd
To pull him, thus unpunish'd, by the beard?

Our superstitions upon our life begin:
Th' obscene old grandam, or the next of kin.
The new born infant from the cradle takes,
And first of spittle a lustration makes:
Then in the spawl her middle finger dips,
Anoints the temples, forehead, and the lips,
Pretending force of magic to prevent,
By virtue of her nasty excrement.
Then dandles him with many a mutter'd prayer
That heaven would make him some rich miser's heir,
Lucky to ladies, and in time a king;
Which to ensure, she adds a length of navel-string.
But no fond nurse is fit to make a prayer:
And Jove, if Jove be wife, will never hear;
Not though she prays in white, with lifted hands:
A body made of brass the crone demands:
Or her lov'd nursing, string with nerves of wire,
Tough to the fait, and with no toil to tire.

Unconscionable vows, which when we use,
 Ne teach the gods, in reason, to refuse.
 Suppose they were indulgent to thy wish:
 Yet the fat entrails, in the spacious dish,
 Would stop the grant: the very overcare
 Ad nauseous pomp, would hinder half the prayer.
 Thou hop'st it with sacrifice of oxen slain
 To compass wealth, and bribe the god of gain,
 To give thee flocks and herds, with large increase,
 Full to expect them from a bullock's grease!
 Al! think 't that, when the fatten'd flames aspire,
 Thou see'st th' accomplishment of thy desire!
 Now, now, my bearded harvest gilds the plain,
 The scanty folds can scarce my sheep contain,
 All showers of gold come pouring in amain!
 Thou measur'st by thyself the powers divine,
 The gods are burnish'd gold, and silver is their shrine.
 Thy godlings of inferior race,
 Whose humble statues are content with brass,
 Shalt some of these, in visions purg'd from Fœtal events, or in a morning dream; [phlegm,
 E'en those thou would'st in veneration hold;
 Al, if not faces, give them beards of gold.

The priests in temples, now, no longer care
 For Saturn's bras, or Numa's earthen ware;
 Or vestal urns, in each religious rite:
 This wicked gold has put them all to flight.
 O souls, in whom no heavenly fire is found,
 Fat minds, and ever groveling on the ground!
 We bring our manners to the blest abodes,
 And think what pleases us must please the gods.
 Of oil and cassia one th' ingredients takes,
 And, of the mixture, a rich ointment makes:
 Another finds the way to dye in grain;
 And ma's Calabrian wool receive the Tyrian stain;
 Or from the shells their orient treasure takes,
 Or, for their golden ore, in rivers rakes;
 Then melts the mass: all these are vanities!
 Yet still some profit from their pains may rise:
 But tell me, priest, if I may be so bold,
 What are the gods the better for this gold!
 The wretch that offers from his wealthy store
 These presents, bribes the powers to give him more:
 As maids to Venus, offer baby-toys,
 To bless the marriage-bed with girls and boys.
 But let us for the gods a gift prepare,
 Which the great man's great charges cannot bear:
 A soul, where laws both human and divine,
 In practice more than speculation shine:
 A genuine virtue, of a vigorous kind,
 Pure in the last recesses of the mind:
 When with such offerings to the gods I come,
 A cake, thus given, is worth a hecatomb.

S A T I R E III.

THE ARGUMENT.

The author has made two satires concerning study; the first and the third: the first related to men; is to young students, whom he desired to be educated in the Stoic philosophy: he himself sustains the person of the master, or preceptor, in this admirable satire; where he upbraids the youth of sloth and negligence in learning. Yet he begins with one scholar reproaching his fellow students with their rising to their books. After which he takes upon him the other part of the teacher. And addressing himself particularly to young noblemen, tells them, that by reason of their high birth, and the great possession of their fathers, they are careless of adorning their minds with precepts of moral philosophy: and withal, inculcates to them the miseries which will attend them in the whole course their life, if they do not apply themselves to the knowledge of virtue, and the end of their creation, which he pathetically insinuates to them. The title of this satire, in some ancient manuscripts, was "The reproach of Idleness;" though in others of the scholiasts it is inscribed, Against the luxury and vices of the rich." In both of which the intentions of the poet is pursued; principally in the former.

[I remember I translated this satire, when I was a king's scholar at Westminster-school, for a Thursday night's exercise; and believe that it, and many other of my exercises of this nature, in English verse, are in the hands of my learned master, the reverend Dr. Busby.]

Is this thy daily course? The glaring sun
 Breaks in at every chink: the cattle run
 Through shades, and noon-tide rays of summer shun,
 Yet slung'd in sloth we lie; and snore supine,
 All'd with fumes of indigested wine.
 His grave advice some sober student bears;
 At loudly rings it in his fellow's ears.
 The yawning youth, scarce half awake, essays
 His lazy limbs and dozy head to raise:
 He rubs his gummy eyes, and scrubs his pate;
 Al! cries, I thought it had not been so late:

My clothes make haste: why then! if none be near,
 He mutters first, and then begins to swear:
 And brays aloud, with a more clamorous note,
 Than an Arcadian ass can stretch his throat.
 With much ado, his book before him laid,
 And parchment with the smoother side display'd;
 He takes the papers; lays them down again;
 And with unseeing fingers, tries the pen.
 Some peevish quarrel straight he strives to pick;
 His quill writes double, or his ink's too thick:

Infuse more water; now 'tis grown so thin
It sinks, nor can the characters be seen.

O wretch, and still more wretched every day!
Are mortals born to sleep their lives away?
Go back to what thy infancy began,
Thou who were never meant to be a man:
Eat pap and spoon-meat; for thy gewgaws cry:
Be fullen, and refuse the lullaby.
No more accuse thy pen: but charge the crime
On native sloth, and negligence of time.
Think'st thou thy master, or thy friends, to cheat?
Fool, 'tis thyself, and that's a worse deceit.
Beware the laughter of the town;
'Thou spring'st a leak already in thy crown.
A flaw is in thy ill back'd vessel found;
'Tis hollow, and return's a jarring sound.

Yet, thy moist clay is pliant to command;
Unwrought, and easy to the potter's hand:
Now take the mold; now bend thy mind to feel
The first sharp motions of the forming wheel.

But thou hast land; a country-seat, secure
By a jill tittle; costly furniture;
A fuming-pan thy Lares to appease:
What need of learning when a man's at ease?
If this be not enough to swell thy soul,
Then please thy pride, and search the herald's roll,
Where thou shalt find thy famous pedigree,
Drawn from the root of some old Tuscan tree; }
And thou, a thousand off, a fool of long degree. }
Who, clad in purple, canst thy censor greet;
And, loudly, call him cousin, in the street.

Such pageantry be to the people shown:
There boast thy horse's trappings, and thy own:
I know thee to thy bottom; from within
Thy shallow centre, to the utmost skin:
Dost thou not blush to live so like a beast,
So trim, so dissolute, so loosely dress'd?

But 'tis in vain: the wretch is drench'd too deep;
His soul is stupid, and his heart asleep;
Fatten'd in vice; so callous, and so gross,
He sins, and fees not; senseless of his loss.
Down goes the wretch at once, unskill'd to swim,
Hopeless to babble up, and reach the waters brim.

Great father of the gods, when, for our crimes,
Thou send'st some heavy judgment on the times;
Some tyrant-king, the terror of his age,
The type, and true vicegerent of thy rage;
Thus punish him: set virtue in his fight,
With all her charms adorn'd, with all her graces
bright:

But set her distant, make him pale to see
His gains outweigh'd by lost felicity!

Sicilian tortures, and the brazen bull,
Are emblems rather than exprets the full
Of what he feels: yet what he fears is more;
The wretch, who sitting at his plenteous board,
Look'd up, and view'd on high the pointed sword
Hang o'er his head, and hanging by a twine,
Did with less dread, and more securely dine.
Ev'n in his sleep he starts, and fears the knife,
And, trembling, in his arms takes his accomplice
wife;

Down, down, he goes; and from his darling friend
Conceals the woes his guilty dreams portend.

When I was young, I, like a lazy fool,
Would blear my eyes with oil, to stay from school:
I vers'd from pains, and loath to learn the part
Of Cato, dying with a dauntless heart:

Though much my master, that stern virtue part
Which o'er the vanquisher the vanquish'd part
And my pleas'd father came, with pride,
His boy defend the Roman liberty.

But then my study was to cog the dice,
And dextrously to throw the lucky dice:
To shun ames-ace, that swept my stakes away
And watch the box, for fear they should con-
False-bones, and put upon me in the play.
Careful, besides, the whirling top to whip,
And drive her giddy, till she fell asleep.

Thy years are ripe, nor art thou yet to learn
What's good or ill, and both their ends discern
Thou in the Stoic-porch, severely bred,
Hast heard the dogmas of great Zeno read:
There on the walls, by Polygnotus' hand;
The conquer'd Medians in trunk-breeches stand,
Where the thorn youth to midnight lectures
Rous'd from their slumbers to be early wile
Where the coarse cake, and homely hulks of bread,
From pampering riot the young stomach feed
And where the Samian Y directs thy steps
To virtue's narrow steep, and broad-way vices to shun.

And yet thou snor'st; thou draw'st thy drunken
Sour with debauch; and sleep'st the sleep of death
Thy chaps are fallen, and thy frame disjoint
Thy body is dissolv'd, as is thy mind.

Hast thou not, yet, propos'd some certain
To which thy life, thy every act, may tend?
Hast thou no mark, at which to bend thy bow
Or like a boy pursuest the carrion crow
With pellets, and with stones, from tree to tree
A fruitless toil, and liv'st extempore?
Watch the disease in time: for, when within
The dropsy rages, and extends the skin,
In vain for hellebore the patient cries,
And fees the doctor; but too late is wife:
Too late, for cure, he proffers half his wealth
Conquest and Guibbons cannot give him heal
Learn, wretches, learn the motions of the mind
Why you were made, for what you were design'd
And the great moral end of human kind,
Study thyself: what rank or what degree
The wise Creator has ordain'd for thee:
And all the offices of that estate
Perform; and with thy prudence guide thy fate
Pray what justly, to be heard: nor more de-
That the decencies of life require.

Learn what thou ow'st thy country, and thy friends
What's requisite to spare, and what to spend Learn this; and after, envy not the store
Of the great's advocate, that grinds the poor
Fat fees from the defended Umbrian draws;
And only gains the wealthy client's cause.
To whom the Marfians more provision send,
Than he and all his family can spend.
Gammons, that give a relish to the taste,
And potted fowl, and fish, come in so fast,
That ere the first is out, the second stinks:
And mouldy mother gathers on the drinks.
But here, some captain of the land or sea,
Stout of his hands, but of a soldier's wit;
Cries, I have sense to serve my turn, in store
And he's a rascal who pretends to more.
Damme, whate'er these book-learn'd blockheads
Solon's the veryest fool in all the play.

op-heavy drones, and always looking down,
 As over-ballasted within the crown!)
 futtering betwixt their lips some mystic thing, /hich, well examin'd, is flat conjuring, fere madmen's dreams: for what the schools have taught,
 only this, that nothing can be brought rom nothing; and, what is, can ne'er be turn'd to nought.
 it for this they study? to grow pale,
 nd miss the pleasures of a glorious meal?
 or this in rags accoutter'd, are they seen,
 nd made the may-game of the public spleen?
 Proceed, my friend, and rail; but hear me tell story, which is just thy parallel.
 spark, like thee, of the man-killing trade,
 ell sick, and thus to his physician said:
 e thinks I am not right in every part;
 feel a kind of trembling at my heart:
 y pulse unequal, and my breath is strong;
 efides a filthy fur upon my tongue.
 he doctor heard him, exercis'd his skill:
 nd, after, bid him for four days be still.
 hree days he took good council, and began
 o mend, and look like a recovering man:
 he fourth, he could not hold from drink; but sends is boy to one of his old trusty friends:
 d juring him by all the powers divine,
 o pity his distress, who could not dine
 Without a flaggon of his healing wine, e drinks a swilling draught; and, lin'd within,
 Vill supple in the bath his outward skin:
 Whom should he find but his physician there,
 Who, wisely, bade him once again beware.
 ir, you look wan, you hardly draw your breath;
 rinking is dangerous, and the bath is death.
 tis nothing, says the fool: but, says the friend,
 his nothing, Sir, will bring you to your end.
 o I not see your dropy belly swell?
 our yellow skin?—No more of that; I'm well.
 have already buried two or three hat flood betwixt a fair estate and me, nd, doctor, I may live to bury thee.
 ou tell't me, I look ill; and thou look't worse.
 'vc done, says the physician; take your course.
 he laughing sot, like all unthinking men,
 athes and gets drunk; then bathes and drinks again:

His throat half throttled with corrupted phlegm,
 And breathing through his jaws a belching steam:
 Amidst his cups with fainting shivering seiz'd,
 His limbs disjointed, and all o'er diseas'd,
 His hand refuses to sustain the bowl:
 And his teeth chatter, and his eye-balls roll:
 Till, with his meat, he vomits out his soul:
 Then trumpets, torches, and a tedious crew
 Of hireling mourners, for his funeral due.
 Our dear departed brother lies in state,
 His heels stretch'd out, and pointing to the gate:
 And slaves, now manumiz'd, on their dead master wait.
 They hoist him on the bier, and deal the dole:
 And there's an end of a luxurious fool.
 But what's thy fulsome parable to me?
 My body is from all diseases free:
 My temperate pulse does regularly beat;
 Feel, and be satisfi'd, my hands and feet:
 These are not cold, nor those oppress'd with heat.
 Or lay thy hand upon my naked heart,
 And thou shalt find me hale in every part.
 I grant this true: but, still, the deadly wound
 Is in thy soul; 'tis there thou art not found.
 Say, when thou seest a heap of tempting gold,
 Or a more tempting harlot dost behold;
 Then, when she cast on thee a side-long glance,
 Then try thy heart, and tell me if it dance.
 Some coarse cold fallad is before thee set;
 Bread with the bran, perhaps, and broken meat;
 Fall on, and try thy appetite to eat.
 These are not dishes for thy dainty tooth:
 What, hast thou got an ulcer in thy mouth;
 Why stand'st thou picking? is thy pallet sore?
 That bett and radishes will make thee roar?
 Such is th' unequal temper of thy mind;
 Thy passions in extremes, and unconfin'd:
 Thy hair so bristles with unmanly fears,
 As fields of corn, that rise in bearded ears.
 And when thy cheeks with flushing fury glow,
 The rage of boiling caldrons is more slow;
 When fed with fuel and with flames below.
 With foam upon thy lips and sparkling eyes,
 Thou say'st, and dost in such outrageous wise;
 That mad Orestes if he saw the show,
 Would swear thou wert the madder of the two.

S A T I R E IV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Our author, living in the time of Nero, was contemporary and friend to the noble poet Lucan; both of them were sufficiently sensible, with all good men, how unskillfully he managed the commonwealth: and perhaps might guess at his future tyranny, by some passages, during the latter part of his first five years; though he broke not out into his great excesses, while he was restrained by the councils and authority of Seneca. Lucan has not spared him in the poem of his Pharsalia; for his very compliment looked afloat as well as Nero. Persius has been bolder, but with caution likewise. For here, in the person of young Alcibiades, he arraigns his ambition of meddling with state-affairs, without judgment or experience. It is probable that he makes Seneca, in this satire, sustain the part of Socrates under a borrowed name. And, withal, discovers some secret vices of Nero, concerning his lust, his drunkenness, and his effeminacy, which had not yet arrived to public notice.

He also reprehends the flattery of his courtiers, who endeavour'd to make all his vices pass for virtues. Covetousness was undoubtedly none of his faults; but it is here described as a veil cast on the true meaning of the poet, which was to satirise his prodigality and voluptuousness; to which makes a transition. I find no instance in history of that emperor's being a Pathique, though Persius seems to brand him with it. From the two dialogues of Plato, both called Alcibiades, the poet takes the argument of the second and third satires, but he inverted the order of them: for the third satire is taken from the first of these dialogues.

The commentators, before Casaubon, were ignorant of our author's secret meaning; and thought had only written against young noblemen in general, who were too forward in aspiring to public magistracy: but this excellent scholiast has unravelled the whole mystery; and made it appear that the sting of this satire was particularly aimed at Nero.

WHOLEYER thou art, whose forward years are bent

On state affairs the guide to government;
Hear, first, what Socrates of old has said
To the lov'd youth, whom he at Athens bred,

Tell me, thou pupil to great Pericles,
O'er second hope, my Alcibiades,
What are the grounds, from whence thou dost prepare

To undertake, so young, so vast a care?
Perhaps thy wit (a chance not often heard,
That parts and prudence should prevent the beard):

'Tis seldom seen, that senators so young Know when to speak, and when to hold their tongue.

Sure thou art born to some peculiar fate;
When the mad people rise against the state,
To look them into duty: and command
A awful silence with thy lifted hand,
Then to bespeak them thus: Athenians, know
Against right reason all your counsels go;

This is not fair; not profitable that;
Nor t'other question proper for debate.
But thou, no doubt, can'st set the business right,
And give each argument its proper weight:
Know'st, with an equal hand, to hold the scale:
Seest where the reasons pinch, and where they fail,

And where exceptions o'er the general rule pre-
And, taught by inspiration, in a trice,
Canst punish crimes, and brand offending vice.

Leave, leave to fathom such high points as these,
Nor be ambitious, ere the time to please:
Unreasonably wife, till age, and cares,

Have form'd thy soul, to manage great affairs.
Thy face, thy shape, thy outside, are but vain;
Thou hast not strength such labours to sustain;
Drink hellebore, my boy, drink deep, and purge thy brain.

What aim'st thou at, and whither tends thy care,
In what thy utmost good? Delicious fare;
And, then, to sun thyself in open air.

Hold, hold; are all thy empty wishes such?
A good old woman would have said as much,
But thou art nobly born, 'tis true; go boast
Thy pedigree, the thing thou valu'st most:
Besides, thou art a beau: what's that, my child?
A top well dress'd, extravagant, and wild:
She, that cries herbs, has less impertinence;
And, in her calling, more of common sense.

None, none descends into himself, to find
The secret imperfections of his mind:
But every one is eagle-ey'd, to see
Another's faults, and his deformity.

Say, dost thou know Vestidius? Who, wretch

Whose lands beyond the Sabines largely stretch
Cover the country, that a sailing kite
Can scarce o'er-fly them, in a day and night;
Him dost thou mean, who, spite of all his store,
Is ever craving, and will still be poor?

Who cheats for halfpence, and who doffs his coat
To save a farthing in a ferry-boat?

Ever a glutton at another's cost,
But in whose kitchen dwells perpetual frost?
Who eats and drinks with his domestic slaves;
A verier hind than any of his knives?

Born with the curse and anger of the gods,
And that indulgent genius he defrauds?

At harvest-home, and on the shearing day,
When he should thanks to Pan and Pales pay,
And better Ceres; trembling to approach
The little barrel, which he fears to broach:
He, says the wimble, often draws it back,
And deals to thirsty servants but a snack.

To a short meal he makes a tedious grace,
Before the barley-pudding comes in place:
Then, bids fall on; himself, for saving charges,
A peel'd lic'd onion eats, and tipples verjuice.

Thus fares the drudge: but thou, whose life's dream

Of lazy pleasures, tak'st a worse extreme.
'Tis all thy business, business how to shun;
To bask thy naked body in the sun;
Suppling thy stiffen'd joints with fragrant oil:
Then, in the spacious garden, walk awhile,
To suck the moisture up, and soak it in:
And this, thou think'st, but vainly think'st, unseen.

But, know, thou art observ'd: and there are thro'
Who, if they durst, would all thy secret sins expose.

The depilation of thy modest part:
Thy catamite, the darling of thy heart,
His engine-hand, and every lewdier art.
When, prone to bear, and patient to receive,
Thou tak'st the pleasure which thou canst not give.

With odorous oil thy head and hair are sleek;
And then thou kemb'st the tuzzes on thy cheek:

Of these thy barbers take a costly care,
While thy salt tail is overgrown with hair.

Not all thy pinchers nor unmanly arts,
Can smooth the roughness of thy shameful parts.
Not five, the strongest that the Circus breeds,
From the rank soil can root those wicked weeds:
Though suppled first with soap, to ease thy pain,
The stubborn fern springs up, and sprouts again.

Thus others we with defamations wound,
While they stab us: and so the jest goes round.
Vain are thy hopes, to 'scape censorious eyes;
Truth will appear through all the thin disguise:
Thou hast an ulcer which no leech can heal,
Though thy broad shoulder-belt the wound conceal.
Say thou art found and hale in every part, [ceal.
We know, we know thee rotten at thy heart,
We know thee fullen, impotent, and proud:
Nor canst thou cheat thy nerve, who cheat'st the crowd.

But when they praise me, in the neighbourhood,
When the pleas'd people take me for a god,
Shall I refute thy incense? Not receive
The loud applauses which the vulgar give?

If thou dost wealth, with longing eyes, behold;
Aud, greedily, are gaping after gold;

If some alluring girl, in gliding by,
Shall tip the wink with a lascivious eye,
And thou with a consenting glance reply;
If thou thy own solicitor become,
And bid'st arise the lumpish pendulum:
If thy lewd lust provokes an empty storm,
And prompts to more than nature can perform;
If, with thy guards, thou scour'st the streets by night,
And dost in murders, rapes, and spoils delight;
Pleas'd not thyself, the flattering crowd to hear;
'Tis fullsome stuff to feed thy itching ear,
Reject the nauseous praises of the times;
Give thy base poets back thy cobbled rhymes:
Survey thy soul, not what thou dost appear,
But what thou art; and find the beggar there.

SATIRE V.

INSCRIBED TO THE REVEREND DR. BUSBY.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE judicious Casaubon, in his poem to this satire, tells us, that Aristophanes the grammarian being asked, what poem of Archilochus's Iambics he preferred before the rest, answered, the longest. His answer may justly be applied to this fifth satire; which, being of a greater length than any of the rest, is also, by far, the most instructive: for this reason I have selected it from all the others, and inscribed it to my learned master, Doctor Busby; to whom I am not only obliged myself for the best part of my own education, and that of my two sons; but have also received from him the first and truest taste of Persius. May he be pleas'd to find in this translation, the gratitude, or at least some small acknowledgment of his unworthy scholar, at the distance of twenty-four years, from the time when I departed from under this tuition.

This satire consists of two distinct parts: the first contains the praises of the Stoic philosopher Cornutus, master and tutor to our Persius. It also declares the love and piety of Persius, to his well deserving master; and the mutual friendship which continued betwixt them, after Persius was now grown a man. As also his exhortation to young noblemen, that they would enter themselves into his institution. From whence he makes an artful transition into the second part of his subject: wherein he first complains of the sloth of scholars, and afterwards persuades them to the pursuit of their true liberty: here our author excellently treats that paradox of the Stoics, which affirms, that only the wife or virtuous man is free; and that all vicious men are naturally slaves. And, in the illustration of this dogma, he takes up the remaining part of this inimitable satire.

The Speakers PERSIUS AND CORNUTUS.

PERSIUS.

OF ancient use to poets it belongs, [tongues:
To wish themselves an hundred mouths and
Whether to the well lung'd tragedian's rage
They recommend the labours of the stage,
Or sing the Parthian, when transfix'd he lies,
Wrenching the Roman javelin from his thighs.

CORNUTUS.

And why would'st thou these mighty morsels choose,
Of words unchew'd, and fit to choke the muse?
Let fustian poets, with their stuff, be gone,
And suck the mists that hang o'er Helicon;
When Progne or Thyestes' least thy write;
And, for the mouthing actor, verse indite,
Thou neither, like a bellows, swell'st thy face,
As if thou wert to blow the burning anaf

Of melting ore; nor canst thou strain thy throat,
Or murmur in an undistinguish'd note,
Like rolling thunder till it breaks the cloud,
And rattling nonsense is discharg'd aloud.
Soft elocution does thy style renoun,
And the sweet accents of the peaceful gown:
Gentle or sharp, according to thy choice,
To laugh at follies, or to lash at vice,
Hence draw thy theme, and to the stage permit
Raw-head and bloody-bones, and hands and feet,
Ragouts for Terrens or Thyestes dress;
'Tis talk enough for thee t' expose a Roman feast.

PERSIUS.

'Tis, not, indeed, my talent to engage
In lofty trifles, or to swell my page
With wind and noise; but freely to impart,
As to a friend, the secret of my heart;
And, in familiar speech, to let thee know
How much I love thee and how much I owe

Knock on my heart; for thou hast skill to find
If it sound solid, or be fill'd with wind;
And through the veil of words, thou view'st the naked mind.

For this a hundred voices I desire,
To tell the what a hundred tongues would tire;
Yet never could be worthily exprest,
How deeply thou art feated in my breast.
When first my childish robe resign'd the charge,
And left me, unconfin'd, to live at large;
When now my golden bulla (hung on high
To household gods) declar'd me past a boy;
And my white shield proclaim'd me liberty:
When with my wild companions, I could roll
From street to street and sin without control;
Just at that age, when manhood set me free,
I then depos'd myself, and left the reins to thee.
On thy wife bosom I repos'd my head,
And by my better Socrates was bred.
Then thy straight rule set virtue in my sight,
'The crooked line reforming by the right.
My reason took the bent of thy command,
Was form'd and polish'd by thy skilful hand:
Long summer days thy precepts I rehearse;
And winter nights were short in our converse:
One was our labour, one was our repose,
One frugal supper did our studies close.

Sure on our birth some friendly planet shone;
And, as our souls, our horoscope was one:
Whether the mounting twins did heaven adorn,
Or with the rising balance we were borne;
Both have the same impressions from above;
And both have Saturn's rage, repell'd by Jove.
What star I know not, but some star I find,
Has given thee an ascendant o'er my mind.

CORNUTUS.

Nature is ever various in her frame:
Each has a different will; and few the same:
The greedy merchants, led by lucre, run
To the parch'd Indies, and the rising sun;
From thence hot pepper and rich drugs they bear,
Bartering, for spices, their Italian ware;
The lazy glutton safe at home will keep,
Indulge his sloth, and batten with his sleep:
Another shakes the bed, dissolving there,
Till knots upon his gouty joint appear,
And chalk is in his crippled fingers found;
Rots like a doddard oak, and piecemeal falls to
ground:

Then his lewd follies he would late repent;
And his past years, that in a mist were spent.

PERSIUS.

But thou art pale, in nightly studies, grown,
To make the Stoic institutes thy own:
Thou long with studious care hast till'd our youth,
And frown our well-purg'd ears with wholesome truth.

From thee both old and young, with profit, learn
The bounds of good and evil to discern.

CORNUTUS.

Unhappy he who does this work adjourn.
And to to-morrow would the search delay:
His lazy morrow will be like to-day.

PERSIUS.

But is one day of ease too much to borrow?

CORNUTUS.

Yes, sure: for yesterday was once to-morrow.

That yesterday is gone, and nothing gain'd:
And all thy fruitless days will thus be drain'd;
For thou hast more to-morrows yet to ask,
And wilt be ever to begin thy talk;
Who, like the hindmost charriot-wheels, are curst,
Still to be near, but ne'er to reach the first.
O freedom! first delight of human kind!
Not that which bondmen from their masters find,
The privilege of doles: not yet t' inscribe
Their names in this or t' other Roman tribe:
That false enfranchisement with ease is found:
Slaves are made citizens, by turning round:
How, replies one, can any be more free?
Here's Dama, once a groom of low degree,
Not worth a farthing, and a sot beside;
So true a rogue, for lying's sake he ly'd;
But, with a turn, a freeman he became:
Now Marcus Dama is his worship's name.
Good gods! who would refuse to lend a sum,
If wealthy Marcus surety will become!
Marcus is made a judge, and for a proof
Of certain truth, he said, it is enough.
A will is to be prov'd; put in your claim;
'Tis clear, if Marcus has subscrib'd his name.
This is true liberty, as I believe:
What can we farther from our caps receive,
Than as we please without control to live?
Not more to noble Brutus could belong.
Hold, says the Stoic, your assumption's wrong:
I grant, true freedom you have well defin'd:
But, living as you list, and to your mind,
And loosely tack'd, all must be left behind.
What, since the prætor did my fetters loose,
And left me freely at my own dispose,
May I not live without control and awe,
Excepting still the letter of the law?

Hear me with patience while thy mind I free
From those fond notions of false liberty:
'Tis not the prætor's province to bestow
True freedom; nor to teach mankind to know
What to ourselves, or to our friends, we owe.
He could not set thee free from cares and strife,
Nor give the reins to a rude vicious life:
As well he for an ass a harp might string,
Which is against the reason of the thing;
For reason still is whispering in your ear,
Where you are sure to fail, th' attempt forbear.
No need of public sanctions this to bind,
Which nature has implanted in the mind:
Not to pursue the work, to which we're not design'd.

Unskill'd in hellebore, if thou should'st try
To mix it, and mistake the quantity,
The rules of physic would against thee cry.
The high-shoe'd ploughman, shou'd he quit the
To take the pilot's rudder in his hand, } land,
Artle's of stars, and of the moving sand,
The gods would leave him to the waves and wind,
And think all shame was lost in human kind.

Tell me, my friend, from whence hadst thou the
So nicely to distinguish good from ill? } [skill,
Or by the sound to judge of gold and brass,
What piece is tinker's metal, what will pass?
And what thou art to follow, what to fly,
This to condemn, and that to ratify?
When to be bountiful, and when to spare,
But never craving, or oppress with care?

The baits of gifts, and money to despise,
And look on wealth with undesiring eyes?
When thou can'st truly call these virtues thine,
Be wife and free, by heaven's consent, and mine.

But thou, who lately, of the common strain,
Wert one of us, if still thou dost retain
The same ill habits, the same follies too,
Glofs'd over only with a faint-like show,
Then I resume the freedom which I gave,
Still thou art bound to vice, and still a slave.
Thou canst not wag my finger, or begin

"The least light motion, but it tends to sin."

How's this? Not wag thy finger, he replies?
No, friend; nor fuming gums, nor sacrifice,
Can ever make a madman free, or wife.

"Virtue and vice are never in one soul:

"A man is wholly wife, or wholly is a fool."

A heavy bumpkin, taught with daily care,
Can ever dance three steps with a becoming air.

PERSIUS.

In spite of this, my freedom still remains.

CORNUTUS.

Free! what, and fetter'd with so many chains?
Canst thou no other master understand
Than him that freed thee by the prætor's wand?

Should he, who was thy lord, command thee now,
With a harsh voice, and supercilious brow,
To serve duties, thou would'st fear no more;
The gallows and the whip are out of door.

But if thy passions lord it in thy breast;
Art thou not still a slave, and still oppress'd?

Whether alone, or in thy harlot's lap,
When thou would'st take a lazy morning's nap;
Up, up, says Avarice; thou snor'st again,
Stretchest thy limbs, and yawn'st, but all in vain;
The tyrant Lucre no denial takes;

At his command th' unwilling saggard wakes:
What must I do? he cries: What? says his lord;

Why, rise, make ready, and go straight abroad.
With fish, from Euxine seas, thy vessel freight;

Flax, castor, Coan vines, the precious weight
Of pepper, and Sabæan incense, take

With thy own hands, from the tir'd camel's
And with post-haste thy running markets make.

Be sure to turn the penny; lie and swear;
'Tis wholesome sin: but Jove, thou say'st, will hear:

Swear, fool, or starye; for the dilemma's even:
A tradesman thou! and hope to go to heaven?

Resolv'd for sea, the slaves thy baggage pack,
Each saddled with his burden on his back;

Nothing retards thy voyage, now, unless
Thy other lord forbids, Voluptuousness:

And he may ask this civil question: Friend,
What dost thou make a ship-board? to what end?

Art thou of Bethlam's noble college free?
Stark, staring mad, that thou would'st tempt the Cubb'd in a cabbín, on a mattress laid, [sea?

On a brown george, with lousy swobbers sed,

Dead wine, that stinks of the borrachio, sup
From a foul jack, or greasy maple-cup?

Say, would'st thou bear all this, to raise thy store
From six i' th' hundred, to six hundred more?

Indulge, and to thy genius freely give;
For, not to live at ease, is not to live;

Death stalks behind thee, and each flying hour
Does some loose remnant of thy life devour.
Live, while thou liv'st; for death will make us all
A name, a nothing but an old wife's tale.

Speak; wilt thou Avarice, or Pleasure, choose
To be thy lord? Take one, and one refuse.
But both, by turns, the rule of thee will have;
And thou, betwixt them both, wilt be a slave.

Nor think, when once thou hast resisted one,
That all thy marks of servitude are gone:
The struggling greyhound gnaws his leash in
vain;

If, when 'tis broken, still he drags the chain.

Says Phædra to his man, Believe me, friend,
To this uneasy love I'll put an end:

Shall I run out of all? my friends disgrace,

And be the first lewd unthrif of my race?

Shall I the neighbours' nightly rest invade
At her deaf doors, with some vile serenade?

Well hast thou freed thyself, his man replies,
Go, thank the gods, and offer sacrifice.

Ah, says the youth, if we unkindly part,
Will not the poor fond creature break her heart?

Weak soul! and blindly to destruction led!

She breaks her heart! she'll sooner break your head.

She knows her man, and, when you rant and swear,
Can draw you to her, with a single hair.

But shall I not return? Now, when she sues!

Shall I my own, and her desires refuse?

Sir, take your course: but my advice is plain:

Once freed, 'tis madness to resume your chain.

Ay; there's the man, who, loos'd from lust and self,

Less to the prætor owes, than to himself.

But write him down a slave, who, humbly proud,
With presents begs preferments from the crowd;

That early suppliant, who salutes the tribes,
And sets the mob to scramble for his bribes:

That some old dotard, sitting in the sun,
On holidays may tell, that such a feat was done:

In future times this will be counted rare.

Thy superstition too may claim a share;

When flowers are strew'd, and lamps in order
plac'd,

And windows with illuminations grac'd,
On Herod's day; when sparkling bowls go
round,

And tunnies tails, in favoury sauce are drown'd,
Thou mutter'st prayers obscene; nor dost refuse
The fasts and Sabbaths of the curtain'd Jews.

Then a crack'd egg-shell thy sick fancy frights,
Besides the childist fear of walking sprights.

Of o'ergrown gelding priests thou art afraid;

The timbrel, and the Quintifego maid

Of Isis, awe thee: lest the gods, for sin,
Should, with a swelling dropfy, stuff thy skin!

Unless three garlic-heads the curse avert,
Eaten each morn, devoutly, next thy heart,

Preach this among the brawny guards, say'st thou,
And see if they thy doctrine will allow;

The dull fat captain, with a hound's deep throat,

Would bellow out a laugh, in a base note;

And prize a hundred Zeno's just as much
As a clipt sixpence, or a schilling Dutch.

S A T I R E VI.

TO CÆSIUS BASSUS, A LYRIC POET.

THE ARGUMENT.

THIS sixth satire treats an admirable common-place of moral philosophy; of the true use of riches. They certainly are intended, by the power who bestows them, as instruments and helps of living commodiously ourselves; and of administering to the wants of others, who are oppressed by fortune. There are two extremes in the opinion of men concerning them. One error, though on the right hand, yet a great one, is, that they are no helps to a virtuous life; the other places all our happiness in the acquisition and possession of them; and this is, undoubtedly, the worse extreme. The mean betwixt these, is the opinion of the Stoics; which is, that riches may be useful to the leading a virtuous life; in case we rightly understand how to give according to right reason; and how to receive what is given us by others. The virtue of giving well, is called liberality: and it is of this virtue that Persius writes in this satire; wherein he not only shows the lawful use of riches, but also sharply inveighs against the vices which are opposed to it; and especially of those, which consist in the defects of giving or spending; or in the abuse of riches. He writes to Cæsius Bassus his friend, and a poet also. Inquires first of his health and studies; and afterwards informs him of his own, and where he is now resident. He gives an account of himself, that he is endeavouring, by little and little, to wear off his vices; and particularly, that he is combating ambition, and the desire of wealth. He dwells upon the latter vice: and, being sensible that few men either desire or use riches as they ought, he endeavours to convince them of their folly; which is the main design of the whole satire.

HAS winter caus'd thee, friend, to change thy seat,

And seek in Sabine air a warm retreat?
Say, dost thou yet the Roman harp command?
Do the strings answer to thy noble hand?
Great master of the muse, inspir'd to sing
The beauties of the first-created spring;
The pedigree of nature to rehearse,
And found the Maker's work, in equal verse.
Now sporting on thy lyre the loves of youth,
Now virtuous age, and venerable truth;
Expressing justly Sappho's wanton art
Of odes, and Pindar's more majestic part.

For me, my warmer constitution wants
More cold, than our Ligurian winter grants;
And therefore, to my native shores retir'd,
I view the coast old Ennius once admir'd;
Where cliffs on either sides their points display;
And, after, opening in an ampler way,
Afford the pleasing prospect of the bay.
'Tis worth your while, O Romans, to regard
The port of Luvo, says our learned bard;
Who in a drunken dream beheld his soul
The fifth within the transmigration roll;
Which first a peacock, then Euphorbus was,
Then Homer next, and next Pythagoras;
And last of all; the line did into Ennius pass.
Secure and free from business of the state,
And more secure of what the vulgar prate,
Here I enjoy my private thoughts; nor care
What rots for sheep the southern winds prepare:
Survey the neighbouring fields, and not repine,
When I behold a larger crop than mine:
To see a beggar's brat in riches flow,
Adds not a wrinkle to my even brow;
Nor, envious at the sight, will I forbear
My plenteous bowl, nor bate my bounteous cheer.

Nor yet unseal the dregs of wine that stink
Of cask; nor in a nasty flagon drink;
Let others stuff their guts with homely fare;
For men of different inclinations are;
Though born perhaps beneath one common star.

In minds and manners twins oppos'd we see
In the same sign, almost the same degree:
One, frugal, on his birth-day fears to dine;
Does at a penny's cost in herbs repine,
And hardly dares to dip his fingers in the brine.
Prepar'd as priest of his own rites to stand,
He sprinkles pepper with a sparing hand.
His jolly brother, opposite in sense,
Laughs at his thrift; and, lavish of expence,
Quaffs, crams, and guttles, in his own defence.

For me, I'll use my own; and take my share;
'Yet will not turbots for my slaves prepare;
Nor be so nice in taste myself to know
If what I swallow be a thruth, or no.
Live on thy annual income; spend thy store;
And freely grind, from thy full threshing-floor;
Next harvest promises as much, or more.
Thus I would live: but friendship's holy band,
And offices of kindness, hold my hand:
My friend is shipwreck'd on the Brutian strand,
His riches in th' Ionian main are lost;
And he himself stands shivering on the coast;
Where, destitute of help, forlorn and bare,
He wears the deaf gods with fruitless prayer.
Their images, the relics of the wreck,
Torn from the naked poop, are tid'd back
By the wild waves, and, rudely thrown ashore,
Lie impotent; nor can themselves restore.
The vessel sticks, and shows her open'd side,
And on her shatter'd mast the news in triumph ride.

rom thy new hope, and from thy growing store,
low lend assistance, and relieve the poor.
ome; do a noble act of charity;
pittance of thy land will fet him free.
et him not bear the badges of a wreck,
or beg with a blue table on his back:
or tell me that thy frowning heir will fay,
'Tis mine that wealth thou squander'ft thus
away;

What is 't to thee, if he neglect thy urn,
r without spices lets thy body burn?
odours to thy ashes he refuse.
r buys corrupted cassia from the Jews?
ll these, the wiser Bestius will reply,
re empty pomp, and dead-men's luxury:
Ve never knew this vain expence, before
h' effeminated Grecians brought it o'er:
ow toys and trifles from their Athens come;
nd dates and pepper have unfinew'd Rome.
ur sweating hind's thy fallads now desile,
rfecting homely herbs with iragrant oil.
ut to thy fortune be not thou a slave:
or what hast thou to fear beyond the grave?
nd thou who gap'st for my estate, draw near;
or I would whisper somewhat in thy ear.
ear'ft thou the news, my friend? th' express is
come

With laurel'd letters from the camp to Rome:
Cæsar salutes the queen and senate thus:
My arms are on the Rhine victorious.
rom mourning altars sweep the dust away:
ease fasting, and proclaim a fat thanksgiving day.
he goodly empress, jollily inclin'd,
to the welcome bearer wondrous kind:
nd, setting her good housewifery aside,
repares for all the pageantry of pride.
he captive Germans, of gigantic size,
re rank'd in order, and are clad in frieze:
he spoils of kings and conquer'd camps we
boast,
heir arms in trophies hang on the triumphant
post.

Now, for so many glorious actions done
Foreign parts, and mighty battles won:
or peace at home, and for the public wealth,
mean to crown a bowl to Cæsar's health;
esides, in gratitude for such high matters,
now I have vow'd two hundred gladiators.
ay, would'ft thou hinder me from this expence;
disinherit thee, if thou dar'st take offence.
et more, a public largess I design
f oil and pies, to make the people dine:
ontrol me not, for fear I change my will.

And yet methinks I hear thee grumbling still,
ou give as if you were the Persian king:
our land does not so large revenues bring.
Well! on my terms thou wilt not be my heir?
thou car'st little, less shall be my care:
Were none of all my father's sisters left:
fay, were I of my mother's kin bereft:
gone by an uncle's or a grandame's side,
let I could some adopted heir provide.

I need but take my journey half a day
From haughty Rome, and at Aricia stay,
Where Fortune throws poor Manius in my way. }
Him will I choose: What! him of humble birth,
Obscure, a foundling, and a son of earth?
Obscure? Why pr'ythee what am I? I know
My father, grandfire, and great-grandfire too.
if farther I derive my pedigree,
I can but guess beyond the fourth degree.
The rest of my forgotten ancestors
Were sons of earth, like him, or sons of whores.

Yet, why would'it thou, old covetous wretch, aspire

To be my heir, who might'ft have been my fire?
In Nature's race, should'it thou demand of me
My torch, when I in course run after thee?
Think I approach thee, like the god of gain,
With wings on head and heels, as poets feign:
Thy moderate fortune from my gift receive;
Now fairly take it, or as fairly leave.
But take it as it is, and ask no more.
What, when thou hast embezzled all thy store?
Where's all thy father left? 'Tis true, I grant,
Some I have mortgag'd, to supply my want:
The legacies of Tadius too are flown;
All spent, and on the self-same errand gone.
How little then to my poor share will fall!
Little indeed; but yet that little's all.

Nor tell me, in a dying father's tone,
Be careful (till of the main chance, my son;
Put out thy principal in trusty hands:
Live on the use; and never dip thy lands;
But yet what's left for me? What's left, my friend!

Ask that again, and all the rest I spend.
Is not my fortunes at my own command!
Pour oil, and pour it with a plenteous hand,
Upon my fallads, boy: shall I be fed
With sodden nettles, and a sing'd sow's head?
'Tis holiday; provide me better cheer;
'Tis holiday, and shall be round the year.
Shall I my household gods and genius cheat,
To make him rich, who grudges me my meat?
That he may loll at ease; and, pamper'd high,
When I am laid, may feed on giblet-pie?
And, when his throbbing lust extends the vein,
Have wherewithal his whores to entertain?
Shall I in home-spun cloth be clad, that he
His paunch in triumph may before him see?
Go, miser, go; for lucre sell thy soul;
Truck wares for wares, and trudge from pole to pole:

That men may say when thou art dead and gone,
See what a vast estate he left his son!
How large a family of brawny knaves,
Well fed, and fat as Cappadocian slaves!
Increase thy wealth, and double all thy store;
'Tis done: now double that, and swell the score;

To every thousand add ten thousand more.
Then say, Chryssippus, thou who would'ft confine Thy heap, where I shall put an end to mine,

TO THE KING:

SIR,

WHILE my deceased husband was engaged in the following long and laborious work, he was not a little supported in it, by the honour which he proposed to himself of dedicating it to your sacred Majesty. This design, which had given me so much pleasure for some years, outlasted his abilities to put it in execution: for, when his health was despaired of, and this part of the book remained unfinished, he expressed to me his desire, that this translation should be laid at your Majesty's feet, as a mark of that zeal and veneration which he had always entertained for your Majesty's royal person and virtues. Had he lived to have made his own address to your Majesty upon this occasion, he would have been able in some measure to have done justice to that exalted character, which it becomes such as I am to admire in silence: being incapable of representing my dear husband in any thing, but in that profound humility and respect, with which I am,

May it please your Majesty,

Your Majesty's most dutiful

and most obedient servant,

ANNE ROWE.

P R E F A C E,

GIVING SOME ACCOUNT OF LUCAN AND HIS WORKS.

BY JAMES WELWOOD, M. D. FELLOW OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF PHYSICIANS, LONDON.

COULD not resist Mr. Rowe's request in his last moments, nor the importunities of his friends since, to introduce into the world this his posthumous translation of Lucan, with something by way of preface. I am very sensible how much it is out of my sphere, and that I want both leisure and materials, to do justice to the author, or to the memory of the translator. The works of both I best plead for them; the one having already lived seventeen ages, and both one and the other like to endure as long as there is any taste of liberty or polite learning left in the world. It had been the fate of many a great genius, that while they have conferred immortality on others, they have wanted themselves some friend to embalm their names to posterity. This has been the fate of Lucan, and perhaps may be that of Mr. Rowe.

All the accounts we have handed down to us of the first, are but very lame, and scattered in fragments of ancient authors. I am of opinion, that on a reason why his life is not to be found at any length, in the writings of his contemporaries, is the fear they were in of Nero's resentment, who could not bear to have the life of a man set in a true light, whom, together with his uncle

Seneca, he had sacrificed to his revenge. Notwithstanding this, we have some hints in writers who lived near this time, that leave us not altogether in the dark, about the life and works of this extraordinary young man.

Marcus Annæus Lucan was of an equestrian family of Rome, born at Corduba in Spain, about the year of our Saviour 39, in the reign of Caligula. His family had been transplanted from Italy to Spain a considerable time before, and were invested with several dignities and employments in that remote province of the Roman empire. His father was Marcus Annæus Mela, or Mella, a man of a distinguished merit and interest in his country, and not the less in esteem for being the brother of the great philosopher Seneca. His mother was Acilia, the daughter of Acilius Lucanus, one of the most eminent orators of his time: and it was from his grandfather that he took the name of Lucan. The story that is told of Hesiod and Homer, of a swarm of bees hovering about them in their cradle, is likewise told of Lucan, and probably with equal truth: but whether true or not, it is a proof of the high esteem paid to him by the ancients, as a poet.

He was hardly eight months old when he was brought from his native country to Rome, that he might take the first impression of the Latin tongue in the city where it was spoke in the greatest purity. I wonder then to find some critics detract from his language, as if it took a tincture from the place of his birth; nor can I be brought to think otherwise, than that the language he writes in is as pure Roman as any that was writ in Nero's time. As he grew up, his parents educated him with a care that became a promising genius, and the rank of his family. His masters were Rhemmius Polæmon, the grammarian; then Flavius Virginius, the rhetorician; and lastly, Cornutus, the Stoic philosopher; to which fell he ever after addicted himself.

It was in the course of these studies he contracted an intimate friendship with Aulus Perſius, the satirist. It is no wonder that two men, whose geniuses were so much alike, should unite and become agreeable to one another; for if we consider Lucan critically, we shall find in him a strong bent towards satire. His manner, it is true, is more declamatory and diffuse than Perſius; but satire is still in his view, and the whole Pharsalia appears to me a continued invective against ambition and unbounded power.

The progress he made in all parts of learning must needs have been very great, considering the pregnancy of his genius, and the nice care that was taken in cultivating it by a suitable education: nor is it to be questioned, but besides the masters I have named, he had likewise the example and instructions of his uncle Seneca, the most conspicuous man then of Rome for learning, wit, and morals. Thus he set out in the world with the greatest advantages possible, a noble birth, an opulent fortune, great relations, and withal, the friendship and protection of an uncle, who, besides his other preferments in the empire, was favourite, as well as tutor, to the emperor. But rhetoric seems to have been the art he excelled most in, and valued himself most upon; for all writers agree, he declaimed in public when but fourteen years old, both in Greek and Latin, with universal applause. To this purpose it is observable, that he has interspersed a great many orations in the Pharsalia, and these are acknowledged by all to be very shining parts of the poem. Whence it is that Quintilian, the best judge in these matters, reckons him among the rhetoricians, rather than the poets, though he was certainly master of both these arts in a high degree.

His uncle Seneca being then in great favour with Nero, and having the care of that prince's education committed to him, it is probable he introduced his nephew to the court, and acquaintance of the emperor: and it appears from an old fragment of his life, that he sent for him from Athens, where he was at his studies, to Rome for that purpose. Every one knows that Nero, for the first five years of his reign, either really was, or pretended to be, endowed with all the amiable qualities that became an emperor and a philosopher. It must have been in this stage of Nero's life, that Lucan has offered up to him that poetical incense we find in the first book of the Pharsalia; for it is not to be imagined, that a man of Lucan's temper would flatter Nero in so gross a manner, if he had then thrown off the mask of virtue, and appeared in such bloody colours as he afterwards did. No! Lucan's soul seems to have been cast in another mold: and he that durst, throughout the whole Pharsalia, espouse the party of Pompey, and the cause of Rome against Cæsar, could never have stooped so vilely low, as to celebrate a tyrant and a monster in such an open manner. I know some commentators have judged that compliment to Nero to be meant ironically; but it seems to me plain to be in the greatest earnest: and it is more than probable, that if Nero had been as wicked at that time as he became afterwards, Lucan's life had paid for his irony. Now it is agreed on by all writers, that he continued for some time in the highest favour and friendship with Nero; and it was to that favour, as well as his merit, that he owed his being made quæstor, and admitted into the college of Augurs, before he attained the age required for these offices: in the first of which posts he exhibited to the people of Rome a show of gladiators at a vast expence. It was in this sun-shine of life Lucan married Polla Argentaria, the daughter of Pollius Argentarius, a Roman senator; a lady of noble birth, great fortune, and famed beauty; who, to add to her other excellencies, was accomplished in all parts of learning; inasmuch that the three first books of the Pharsalia are said to have been revised and corrected by her in his life-time.

How he came to decline in Nero's favour, we have no account that I know of in history; and it is agreed by all that he lost it gradually, till he became his utter aversion. No doubt, Lucan's virtue, and his principles of liberty, must make him hated by a man of Nero's temper. But there appears to have been a great deal of envy in the case, blended with his other prejudices against him, upon the account of his poetry.

Though the spirit and height of the Roman poetry was somewhat declined from what it had been in the time of Augustus, yet it was still an art beloved and cultivated. Nero himself was not only fond of it to the highest degree, but, as most bad poets are, was vain and conceited of his performances in that kind. He valued himself more upon his skill in that art, and in music, than on the purple he wore; and bore it better to be thought a bad emperor, than a bad poet or musician. Now Lucan, though then in favour, was too honest and too open to applaud the bombast stuff that Nero was every day repeating in public. Lucan appears to have been much of the temper of Philoxenus, the philosopher; who, for not approving the verses of Dionysius the tyrant of Syracuse, was by his order condemned to the mines. Upon the promise of amendment, the philosopher was set at liberty; but Dionysius repeating to him some of his wretched performances in full expectation of having them approved, "Enough," cries out Philoxenus, "carry me back to the mines." But Lucan carried this point further, and had the imprudence to dispute the prize of eloquence with Nero in a solemn public assembly. The judges in that trial were to just and bold as to adjudge the reward to Lucan which was fame and a wreath of laurel; but in return he lost for ever the favour of his competitor. He soon felt the effects of the emperor's resentment, for the next day he had an order sent him, never more to plead at the bar, nor repeat any of his performances in public, as all the eminent orators and poets were used to do. It is no wonder that a young man, an admirable poet, and one conscious enough of a superior genius, should be stung to the quick by this barbarous treatment. In revenge, he omitted no occasion to treat Nero's verses with the utmost contempt, and expose them and their author to ridicule.

In this behaviour towards Nero, he was seconded by his friend Persius; and, no doubt, they verted themselves often alone at the emperor's expense. Persius went so far, that he dared to attack openly some of Nero's verses in his first satire, where he brings in his friend and himself repeating them. I believe a sample of them may be unacceptable to the reader, as translated by Mr. Dryden:

FRIEND. But to raw numbers and unfinished verse,

What found is added now, to make it terse.
Is tagg'd with rhyme like Berecynthian Atys,
The mid part chimes with art that never flat is.

"The Dolphin brave,
That cut the liquid wave,
Or he who in his line,
Can chime the long-rib Apennine."

PERSIUS. All this is dogrel stuff.

FRIEND. What if I bring
A nobler verse? "Arms and the man I sing."

PERSIUS. Why name you Virgil with such tops as these!

It's truly great, and must for ever please;

But fierce, but awful in his manly page,

And in his strength, but sober in his rage.

FRIEND. What poems think you soft? and to be read

With languishing regards, and bending head?

PERSIUS. "Their crooked horns the Mimalonian crew

Wh blasts inspir'd; and Bassaris, who flew

The scornful calf, with sword advanc'd on high,

Made from his neck his haughty head to fly.

All Mænas, when with ivy brides bound,

Sleed the spotted lynx, then Evion rung around,

From woods and floods repairing echoes
found."

His verses marked with commas are Nero's, and it is no wonder that men of so delicate a taste as Lucan and Persius could not digest them, though made by an emperor.

About this time the world was grown weary of Nero for a thousand monstrous cruelties of his life and the continued abuse of the imperial power. Rome had groaned long under the weight of him, till at length several of the first rank, headed by Piso, formed a conspiracy to rid the world of that abandoned wretch. Lucan hated him upon a double score; as his country's enemy in his own, and went heartily into the design. When it was just ripe for execution it came to be discovered by some of the accomplices, and Lucan was found among the first of the conspirators. They were condemned to die, and Lucan had the choice of the manner of his death. Upon this occasion some authors have taxed him with an action, which, if true, had been an eternal stain upon his name, that, to save his life, he informed against his mother. This story seems to me to be a mere calumny, and invented only to detract from his fame. It is certainly the most unlikely thing in the world, considering the whole conduct of his life, and that noble scheme of philosophy and morals he had imbibed from his infancy, and which shines in every page of his Pharsalia. It is probable, Nero himself, or some of his flatterers, might invent the story, to blacken his rival to posterity; and some unwary authors have afterwards taken it up on trust, without examining into the truth of it. We have several fragments of his life, where this particular is not to be found; and which makes it still the more improbable to me, the writers that mention it, have tacked to it another calumny yet more improbable, that he accused her unjustly. As this accusation contradicts the whole tenor of his life, so it does the manner of his death. It is universally agreed, that having chose to have the arteries of his arms and legs opened in a hot bath, he supped cheerfully with his friends, and then taking leave of them with the greatest tranquillity of mind, and the highest contempt of death, went into the bath and submitted to the operation. When he found the extremities of his body growing cold, and death's last alarm in every part, he called to mind a passage of his own in the IXth book of the Pharsalia, which he repeated to the standers-by, with the same grace and accent with which he used to declaim in public, and immediately expired, in the 27th year of his age, and 10th of Nero. The passage was that where he describes a soldier of Cato's dying much after the same manner, being bit by a serpent, and is thus translated by Mr. Rowe:

"So the warm blood at once from every part
Ran purple poison down, and drain'd the fainting heart.

Blood falls for tears, and o'er his mournful face

The ruddy drops their tainted passage trace.

Where'er the liquid juices find a way,

There streams of blood, there crimson rivers stray:

His mouth and gushing nostrils pour a flood,

And ev'n the pores ooze out the trickling blood;

In the red deluge all the parts lie drown'd,

And the whole body seems one bleeding wound."

He was buried in his garden at Rome; and there was lately to be seen, in the church of Santo Paulo, an ancient marble with the following inscription:

MARCO ANNAEO LUCANO CORDVBENSI POETAE; BENEFICIO NERONIS, FAMA SERVATA.

This inscription, if done by Nero's order, shows that, even in spite of himself, he paid a secret homage to Lucan's genius and virtue, and would have atoned in some measure for the injuries and the death he gave him. But he needed no marble or inscription to perpetuate his memory; his Pharsalia will outlive all these.

Lucan wrote several books, that have perished by the injury of time, and of which nothing remains but the titles. The first we are told he wrote, was a poem on the combat between Achilles and Hector, and Priam's redeeming his son's body, which, it is said, he wrote before he had attained eleven years of age. The rest were, The Descent of Orpheus into Hell; The burning of Rome, in which he is said not to have spared Nero that set it on fire; and a poem in praise of his wife Polla Argentaria. He wrote likewise several books of Saturnalia; ten books of Sylvæ; an imperfect Tragedy of Medea; a Poem upon the burning of Troy, and the fate of Priam; to which some have added the Panegyric to Calpurnius Piso, yet extant, which I can hardly believe is his, but of a later age. But the book he staked his fame on was his Pharfalia; the only one that now remains, and which Nero's cruelty has left us imperfect in respect of what it would have been, if he had lived to finish it.

Statius in his Sylvæ gives us the catalogue of Lucan's works in an elegant manner, introducing the Muse Calliope accosting him to this purpose: "When thou art scarce past the age of childhood (says Calliope to Lucan) thou shalt play with the valour of Achilles, and Hector's skill in driving of a chariot. Thou shalt draw Priam at the feet of his unrelenting conqueror, begging the dead body of his darling son. Thou shalt set open the gates of hell for Eurydice, and thy Orpheus shall have the preference in a full theatre, in spite of Nero's envy;" alluding to the dispute for the prize between him and Nero, where the piece exhibited by Lucan was Orpheus's descent into hell. "Thou shalt relate (continues Calliope) that flame which the execrable tyrant kindled, to lay in ashes the mistress of the world; nor shalt thou be silent in the praises that are justly due to thy beloved wife; and when thou hast attained to riper years, thou shalt sing, in a lofty strain, the fatal fields of Philippi, white with Roman bones, the dreadful battle of Pharfalia, and the thundering wars of that great captain, who, by the renown of his arms, merited to be enrolled among the gods. In that work (continues Calliope) thou shalt paint, in never-fading colours, the austere virtues of Cato, who scorned to outlive the liberties of his country; and the fate of Pompey, once the darling of Rome. Thou shalt, like a true Roman, weep over the crime of the young tyrant Ptolemy; and shalt raise to Pompey, by the power of thy eloquence, a higher monument than the Egyptian pyramids. The poetry of Ennius (adds Calliope) and the learned fire of Lucretius, the one that conducted the Argonauts through such vast seas to the conquest of the golden fleece, the other that could strike an infinite number of forms from the first atoms of matter, both of them shall give place to thee without the least envy, and even the divine Æneid shall pay thee a just respect."

Thus far Statius concerning Lucan's work; and even Lucan in two places of the Pharfalia has promised himself immortality to his poem. The first is the seventh book, which I beg leave to give in prose, though Mr. Rowe has done it a thousand times better in verse. "One day (says he) when these wars shall be spoken of in ages yet to come, and among nations far remote from this clime whether from the voice of fame alone, or the real value I have given them by this my history, thou that read it shall alternately hope and fear for the great events therein contained. In vain (continue he) shall they offer up their vows for the righteous cause, and stand thunderstruck at so many various turns of fortune; nor shall they read them a things that are already past, but with that concern as if they were yet to come, and shall range themselves, O Pompey, on thy side."

The other passage, which is in the ninth book may be translated thus: "Oh! Cæsar, profane thou not through envy the funeral monuments of these great patriots, that fell here sacrifices to thy ambition. If there may be allowed any renown to a Roman muse, while Homer's verses shall be thought worthy of praise, they that shall live after us, shall read his and mine together: M. Pharfalia shall live, and no time nor age shall consign it to oblivion."

This is all that I can trace from the ancients, of himself, concerning Lucan's life and writings and indeed there is scarce any one author, either ancient or modern, that mentions him but with the greatest respect and the highest encomiums of which it would be tedious to give more in places.

I design not to enter into any criticism on the Pharfalia, though I had ever so much leisure or ability for it. I hate to oblige a certain set of men, that read the ancients only to find fault with them, and seem to live only on the excrements of authors. I beg leave to tell these gentlemen, that Lucan is not to be tried by those rules of an epic poem, which they have drawn from the Iliad or Æneid; for if they allow him not the honour to be on the same foot with Homer or Virgil, they must do him the justice at least, not to try him by laws founded on their mode. The Pharfalia is properly an historical heroic poem, because the subject is a known true story. Now, with our late critics, truth is an unnecessary trifle for an epic poem, and ought to be thrown aside as a curb to invention. To have every part a mere web of their own brain, is with them distinguishing mark of a mighty genius in the epic way. Hence it is, these critics observe, the favourite poems of that kind do always produce in the mind of the reader the highest wonder and surprize; and the more improbable the story is, still the more wonderful and surprizing. Much good may this notion of theirs do them; but, to my taste, a fact very extraordinary in its kind that is attended with surprizing circumstance big with the highest events, and conducted with all the arts of the most consummate wisdom, do not strike the less strong, but leaves a more lasting impression on my mind, for being true.

If Lucan, therefore, wants these ornaments, he might have borrowed from Helicon, or his own invention; he has made us more than ample amends by the great and true events that fall within the compass of his story. I am of opinion, that, if his first design of writing this poem of the civil wars, he resolved to treat the subject fairly and plainly, and that fable and invention were to have had no share in the work; but the force of custom and the design he had to induce the generality of readers to fall in love with liberty, and abhor slavery, the principal design of the poem, induced him to embellish it with some fables, that without them his books would not be so universally read: so much was fable the delight of the Roman people.

If any shall object to his privilege of being examined and tried as an historian, that he has given in to the poetical province of invention and fiction, in the sixth book, where Sixtus inquires of the Thesalian witch Erichtho the event of the civil war, and the fate of Rome: it may be answered, that perhaps the story was true, or at least it was commonly believed to be so in his time, which is a sufficient excuse for Lucan to have inserted it. It is true, no other author mentions it. But it is usual to find some one passage in one historian, that is not mentioned in any other, though they treat of the same subject. For though I am fully persuaded that all these oracles and responses, so famous in the pagan world, were the mere cheats of priests; yet the belief of them, and of magic and witchcraft, was universally received at that time. Therefore Lucan may very well be excused for falling in with a popular error, whether he himself believed it or no, especially when it served to enliven and embellish his story. If it be an error, it is an error all the ancients have fallen into, both Greek and Roman: and Livy, the prince of the Latin historians, abounds in such relations. That is not below the dignity and veracity of an historian to mention such things, we have a late instance in a noble author of our time, who has likewise wrote the civil wars of his country, and intermixed in it the story of the ghost of the Duke of Buckingham's father.

In general, all the actions that Lucan relates in the course of his history are true; nor is it any impeachment of his veracity, that sometimes he differs in place, manner, or circumstances of actions, from other writers, any more than it is an imputation on them, that they differ from him. We ourselves have seen, in the course of the late two famous wars, how differently almost every battle and siege has been represented, and sometimes by those of the same side, when at the same time there be a thousand living witnesses, ready to contradict any falsehood, that partiality should impose upon the world. This I may affirm, the most important events, and the whole thread of action in Lucan, are agreeable to the universal consent of all authors, that have treated of the civil wars of Rome. If now and then he differs from them in a lesser incidents or circumstances, let the critics in history decide the question: for my part, I am willing to take them for anecdotes first discovered and published by Lucan, which may at least coniliate to him the favour of our late admirers of secret History.

After all I have said on this head, I cannot but in some measure call in question some parts of Caesar's character as drawn by Lucan; which seem to me not altogether agreeable to truth, nor to the universal consent of history. I wish I could vindicate him in some of his personal representations of men, and Caesar in particular, as I can do in the narration of the principal events and series of his story. He is not content only to deliver him down to posterity, as the subverter of the laws and liberties of his country, which he truly was, and than which, no greater infamy can possibly be cast upon any name: but he describes him as pursuing that abominable end, by the most execrable methods, and some that were not in Caesar's nature to be guilty of. Caesar was certainly a man far from revenge, or delight in blood; and he made appear, in the exercise of the supreme power, a noble and generous inclination to clemency upon all occasions: even Lucan, though never so much his enemy, has not omitted his generous usage of Domitius at Corfinium, or of Afranius and Petreius, when they were his prisoners in Spain. What can be then said for Lucan, when he represents him riding in triumph over the field of Pharsalia, the day after the battle, taking delight in that horrid landscape of slaughter and blood, and forbidding the bodies of so many brave Romans to be either buried or burnt? Not any one passage of Caesar's life gives countenance to a story like this: and how commendable soever the zeal of a writer may be, against the oppressor of his country, it ought not to have transported him to such a degree of malevolence, as to paint the most merciful conqueror that ever was, in colours proper only for the most savage natures. But the effects of prejudice and partiality are unaccountable; and there is not a day of life, in which even the best of men are not guilty of them in some degree or other. How many instances have we in history of the best princes treated as the worst of men, by the pens of authors that were highly prejudiced against them!

Shall we wonder, then, that the Roman people, smarting under the lashes of Nero's tyranny, should exclaim in the bitterest terms against the memory of Julius Caesar, since it was from him that Nero derived that power to use mankind as he did? Those that lived in Lucan's time, did not consider so much what Caesar was in his own person, or temper, as what he was the occasion of to them. It is very probable, there were a great many dreadful stories of him handed about by tradition among the multitude; and even men of sense might give credit to them so far as to forget his clemency, and remember his ambition, to which they imputed all the cruelties and devastations committed by his successors. Repentments of this kind in the soul of a man, fond of the ancient constitution of the commonwealth, such as Lucan was, might betray him to believe, upon too slight grounds, whatever was to the disadvantage of one he looked upon as the subverter of that constitution. It was in that quality, and for that crime alone, that Brutus afterwards stabbed him; for personal prejudice against him he had none, and had been highly obliged by him: and it was upon that account alone, that Cato scorned to owe his life to him, though he well knew Caesar would have esteemed it one of the greatest civilities of his, to have had it in his power to pardon him. I would not be thought to make an apology for Lucan's thus traducing the memory of Caesar; but would only beg the same indulgence to his partiality, that we are willing to allow to most other authors; for I cannot help believing all historians are more or less guilty of it.

I beg leave to observe one thing further on this head, that it is odd, Lucan should thus mistake this part of Cæsar's character, and yet do him so much justice in the rest. His greatness of mind, his intrepid courage, his indefatigable activity, his magnanimity, his generosity, his consummate knowledge in the art of war, and the power and grace of his eloquence, are all set forth in the best light upon every proper occasion. He never makes him speak, but it is with all the strength of argument and all the flowers of rhetoric. It were tedious to enumerate every instance of this; and I shall only mention the speech to his army before the battle of Pharfalia, which, in my opinion, surpasses all I ever read, for the easy nobleness of expression, the proper topics to animate his soldiers, and the force of an inimitable eloquence.

Among Lucan's few mistakes in matters of fact, may be added those of geography and astronomy; but finding Mr. Rowe has taken some notice of them in his notes, I shall say nothing of them. Lucan had neither time nor opportunity to visit the scenes where the actions he describes were done, as some further historians both Greek and Roman had, and therefore it was no wonder he might commit some minute errors in these matters. As to astronomy, the schemes of that noble science were but very conjectural in his time, and not reduced to that mathematical certainty they have been since.

The method and disposition of a work of this kind, must be much the same with those observed by other historians, with one difference only, which I submit to better judgments: an historian who like Lucan has chosen to write in verse, though he is obliged to have strict regard to truth in every thing he relates, yet perhaps he is not obliged to mention all facts, as other historians are. He is not tied down to relate every minute passage, or circumstance, if they be not absolutely necessary to the main story; especially if they are such as would appear heavy and flat, and consequently encumber his genius, or his verse. All these trifling parts of action would take off from the pleasure and entertainment, which is the main scope of that manner of writing. Thus the particulars of an army's march, the journal of a siege, or the situation of a camp, where they are not subservient to the relation of some great and important event, had better been spared than inserted in a work of that kind. In a prose writer, these perhaps ought, or at least may be properly and agreeably enough mentioned; of which we have innumerable instances in most ancient historians, and particularly in Thucydides and Livy.

There is a fault in Lucan against this rule, and that is his long and unnecessary enumeration of the several parts of Gaul, where Cæsar's army was drawn together, in the first book. It is enlivened, it is true, with some beautiful verses he throws in, about the ancient bards and druids; but still in the main it is dry, and but of little consequence to the story itself. The many different people and cities there mentioned were not Cæsar's confederates, as those in the third book were Pompey's; and these last are particularly named, to express how many nations espoused the side of Pompey. Those reckoned up in Gaul were only the places where Cæsar's troops had been quartered, and Lucan might with as great propriety have mentioned the different routes by which they marched, as the garrisons from which they were drawn. This, therefore, in my opinion, had been better left out; and I cannot but likewise think, that the digression of Thessaly, and an account of its first inhabitants, is too prolix, and not of any great consequence to his purpose. I am sure, it signifies but little to the civil war in general, or the battle of Pharfalia in particular, to know how many rivers there are in Thessaly, or which of its mountains lies east or west.

But if these be faults in Lucan, they are such as will be found in the most admired poets, nay, and thought excellencies in them; and besides, he has made us most ample amends in the many extraordinary beauties of his poem. The story itself is noble and great; for what can there be in history more worthy of our knowledge and attention, than a war of the highest importance to mankind, carried on between the two greatest leaders that ever were, and by a people the most renowned for arts and arms; and who were at that time masters of the world? What a poor subject is that of the Æneid, when compared with this of the Pharfalia! And what a despicable figure does Agamemnon, Homer's King of Kings, make, when compared with chiefs, who, by saying only, "be thou a king," made far greater kings than him! The scene of the Iliad contained but Greece, some islands in the Ægean and Ionian seas, with a very little part of the Lesser Asia: this of the civil war of Rome drew after it almost all the nations of the then known world. Troy was but a little town, of the little kingdom of Phrygia; whereas Rome was then mistress of an empire, that reached from the straits of Hercules, and the Atlantic ocean, to the Euphrates, and from the bottom of the Euxine and the Caspian seas, to Ethiopia and Mount Atlas. The inimitable Virgil is yet more straitened in his subject. Æneas, a poor fugitive from Troy, with a handful of followers, settles at last in Italy; and all the empire that immortal pen could give him, is but a few miles upon the banks of the Tiber. So vast a disproportion there is between the importance of the subject of the Æneid and that of the Pharfalia, that we find one single Roman, Crassus, master of more slaves on his estate, than Virgil's hero had subjects. In fine, it may be said, nothing can excuse him for his choice, but that he designed his hero for the ancestor of Rome, and the Julian race.

I cannot leave this parallel, without taking notice, to what a height of power the Roman empire was then arrived, in an instance of Cæsar himself, when but proconsul of Gaul, and before it is thought he ever dreamed of what he afterwards attained to: it is one of Cicero's letters to him wherein he repeats the words of Cæsar's letters to him some time before. The words are these: "As to what concerns Marcus Furius, whom you recommended to me; I will, if you please, make him king of Gaul; but, if you would have me advance any other friend of yours, send him to me." It was no new thing for citizens of Rome, such as Cæsar was, to dispose of kingdoms as they pleased; and Cæsar himself had taken away Deiotarus's kingdom from him, and given it to a private gentleman of Pergamum. But here is one surprising instance more, of the prodigious greatness of the Roman power, in the affair of king Antiochus, and that long before the height it arrived to, at the breaking forth of the civil war. That prince was master of all Egypt; and, marching to the conquest of Phœnicia, Cyprus, and the other appendices of that empire, Popilius overtakes him in his full march, with letters from the senate, and refuses to give him his hand till he had read them. Antiochus, started at the command that was contained in them, to stop the progress of his victories, asked a short time to consider of it. Popilius makes a circle about him with a stick he had in his hand. "Return me an answer," says he, "before thou stirtest out of this circle, or the Roman people are no more thy friends." Antiochus, after a short pause, told him with the lowest submission, he would obey the senate's commands. Upon which, Popilius, gives him his hand, and salutes him a friend of Rome. After Antiochus had given up to great a monarchy, and such a torrent of success, upon receiving only a few words in writing, he had indeed reason to send word to the senate, as he did by his ambassadors, that he had obeyed their commands with the same submission as if they had been sent him from the immortal gods.

To leave this digression. It were the height of arrogance to detract ever so little from Homer or Virgil, who have kept possession of the first places among the poets of Greece and Rome, for so many ages: yet I hope I may be forgiven, if I say there are several passages in both, that appear to me rival, and below the dignity that shines almost in every page of Lucan. It were to take both the Iliad and Æneid in pieces, to prove this: but I shall only take notice of one instance, and that is, the different colouring of Virgil's hero, and Lucan's Cæsar, in a storm. Æneas is drawn weeping, and in the greatest confusion and despair, though he had assurance from the gods that he would one day settle and raise a new empire in Italy. Cæsar, on the contrary, is represented perfectly sedate, and free from fear. His courage and magnanimity brighten up as much upon this occasion, as afterwards they did at the battles of Pharsalia and Munda. Courage would have cost Virgil nothing, to have bestowed it on his hero: he might as easily have thrown him upon the oar of Carthage in a calm temper of mind, as in panic fear.

St. Evremont is very severe upon Virgil on this account, and has criticised upon his character of Æneas in this manner. When Virgil tells us,

*Extemplo Æneæ solvuntur frigore membra,
Ingemit, & duplices tendens ad sidera palmas, &c.
Seized as he is,"* says St. Evremont, "with this chillness through all his limbs, the first sign of life we find in him, is his groaning; then he lifts up his hands to heaven, and, in all appearance, would implore its succour, if the condition wherein the good hero finds himself, would afford him strength enough to raise his mind to the gods, and pray with attention. His soul, which could not apply itself to any thing else,

"abandons itself to lamentations; and like those desolate widows, who, upon the first trouble they meet with, wish they were in the grave with their dear husbands, the poor Æneas bewails his not having perished before Troy with Hector, and esteems them very happy who left their bones in the bosom of so sweet and dear a country. "Some people," adds he, "may perhaps believe he says so, because he envies their happiness; but I am persuaded," says St. Evremont, "it is for fear of the danger that threatens him." The same author, after he has exposed his want of courage, adds, "The good Æneas hardly ever concerns himself in any important or glorious design: it is enough for him that he discharges his conscience in the office of a pious, tender, and compassionate man. He carries his father on his shoulders, he conjugally laments his dear Creüsa, he causes his music to be interred, and makes a funeral pile for his trusty pilot Palinurus, for whom he sheds a thousand tears. Here is (says he) a sorry hero in paganism, who would have made an admirable saint among some Christians." In short, it is St. Evremont's opinion, "he was fitter to make a founder of an order than a state."

Thus far, and perhaps too far, St. Evremont: I beg leave to take notice, that the storm in Lucan is drawn in stronger colours, and strikes the mind with greater horror than that of Virgil; notwithstanding the first has no supernatural cause assigned for it, and the latter is raised by a god, at the intigation of a goddess, that was both wife and sister of Jupiter.

In the Pharsalia, most of the transactions and events, that compose the relation, are wonderful and surprising, though true, as well as instructive and entertaining. To enumerate them all, were to transcribe the work itself, and therefore I shall only hint at some of the most remarkable. With what dignity, and justness of character, are the two great rivals, Pompey and Cæsar, introduced in the first book; and how beautifully, and with what a masterly art, are they opposed to one another? add to this, the justest similitudes by which their different characters are illustrated in the second and ninth book. Who can but admire the figure that Cato's virtue makes, in more places than one? And I persuade myself, if Lucan had lived to finish his design, the death of that illustrious Roman had made one of the most moving, as well as one of the most sublime episodes of his poem. In the third book, Pompey's dream, Cæsar's breaking open the temple of Saturn, the siege of Marseilles, the sea-fight, and the sacred grove, have each of them their particular excellence, that in my opinion come very little short of any thing we find in Homer or Virgil.

In the fourth book, there are a great many charming incidents, and among the rest, that of the soldiers running out of their camp to meet and embrace one another, and the deplorable story of Vulteius. The fifth book affords us a fine account of the oracle of Delphi, its origin, the manner of its delivering answers, and the reason of its then silence. Then, upon the occasion of a mutiny in Cæsar's camp near Placentia, in his manner of passing the Adriatic in a small boat, amidst the storm I hind at, he has given us the noblest and best image of that great man. But what affects me above all, is the parting of Pompey and Cornelia, in the end of the book. It has something in it as moving and tender, as ever was felt, or perhaps imagined.

In the description of the witch Erichth in the sixth book, we have a beautiful picture of horror, for even works of that kind have their beauties in poetry, as well as in painting. The seventh book is most taken up with what relates to the famous battle of Pharsalia, which decided the fate of Rome. It is so related, that the reader may rather think himself a spectator of, or even engaged in, the battle, than so remote from the age in which it was fought. There is, towards the end of this book, a noble majestic description of the general conflagration, and of that last catastrophe, which must put an end to this frame of heaven and earth. To this is added, in the most elevated style, his sentiments of the "immortality of the soul," and of rewards and punishments after this life. All these are touched with the nicest delicacy of expression and thought, especially that about the universal conflagration; and agrees with what we find of it in holy writ. In so much that I am willing to believe Lucan might have conversed with St. Peter at Rome, if it be true he was ever there; or he might have seen that epistle of his, wherein he gives us the very same idea of it.

In the eighth book, our passions are again touched with the misfortunes of Cornelia and Pompey; but especially with the death, and unworthy funeral, of the latter. In this book is likewise drawn, with the greatest art, the character of young Ptolemy and his ministers; particularly that of the villain Photinus is exquisitely exposed in his own speech in council.

In the ninth book, after the apotheosis of Pompey, Cato is introduced as the fittest man after him to head the cause of liberty and Rome. This book is the longest, and, in my opinion, the most entertaining in the whole poem. The march of Cato through the deserts of Lybia, affords a noble and agreeable variety of matter; and the virtue of his hero, amidst these distresses through which he leads him, seems every where to deserve those raptures of praise he bestows upon him. Add to this, the artful descriptions of the various poisons with which these deserts abounded, and their different effects upon human bodies, than which nothing can be more moving or poetical.

But Cato's answer to Labienus in this book, upon his desiring him to consult the oracle of Jupiter Hammon about the event of the civil war, and the fortune of Rome, is a masterpiece not to be equalled. All the attributes of God, such as his omnipotence, his prescience, his justice, his goodness, and his unsearchable decrees, are painted in the most awful and the strongest colours, and such as may make Christians themselves blush, for not coming up to them in most of their writings upon that subject. I know not but St. Evremont has carried the matter too far, when, in mentioning this passage, he concludes, "If all the ancient poets had spoke as worthy of the oracles of the gods, he should make no scruple to prefer them to the divines and philosophers of our time. "We may see," says he, "in the concurrence of many people, that came to consult the oracle of Hammon, what effect a public opinion can produce, where zeal and superstition mingle together. We may see in Labienus, a pious sensible man, who to his respect for the gods joins the consideration and esteem we ought to pay to virtue in good men. Cato is a religious severe philosopher, weaned from all vulgar opinions, who entertains those lofty thoughts of the gods, which pure undebauched reason and true elevated knowledge can give us of the every thing here," says St. Evremont, "is poetical, every thing is consonant to truth and reason. It is not poetical upon the score of a ridiculous fiction, or for some extravagant hyperbole, but for the daring greatness and majesty of the language, and for the noble elevation of the discourse. It is thus," adds he, "that poetry is the language of the gods, and that poets are wise; and it is so much the greater wonder to find it in Lucan," says he, "because it is neither to be met with in Homer nor Virgil." I remember Montaigne, who is allowed by all to have been an admirable judge, in these matters, prefers Lucan's character of Cato to Virgil, or any other of the ancient poets. He thinks all of them flat and languishing, but Lucan's more strong, though overthrown by the extravagancy of his own force.

The tenth book, imperfect as it is, gives us among other things, a view of the Egyptian magnificence, with a curious account of the then received opinions of the increase and decrease of the river Nile. From the variety of the story, many other particulars I need not mention in this short account, it may easily appear, that a true history may be a romance or fiction, when the author makes choice of a subject that affords so many and so surprising incidents.

Among the faults that have been laid to Lucan's charge, the most justly imputed are those of his style; and indeed how could it be otherwise? Let us but remember the imperfect state, in which his sudden and immature death left the Pharsalia, the design itself being probably but half finished, and what was writ of it, but slightly, if at all, revised. We are told, it is true, he either corrected the three first books himself, or his wife did it for him, in his own life-time. Be it so: but what are the corrections of a lady, or a young man, six and twenty, to those he might have made forty, or a more advanced age? Virgil, the more correct and judicious poet that ever was, continued correcting his Æneid for near as long a series of years together as Lucan lived, and yet died with a strong opinion that it was imperfect still. If Lucan had lived to his age, the Pharsalia, without doubt, would have made another kind of figure than it now does, notwithstanding the difference to be found in the Roman language, between the times of Nero and Augustus.

It must be owned he is in many places obscure and hard, and therefore not so agreeable, as comes short of the purity, sweetness, and delicate propriety of Virgil. Yet it is still universally agreed among both ancients and moderns, that his genius was wonderfully great, but at the same time too haughty and headstrong to be governed by art; and that his style was like his genius, earned, bold, and lively, but withal too tragical and blustering.

I am by no means willing to compare the Pharsalia to the Æneid; but I must say with St. Evremont, that for what purely regards the elevation of thought, Pompey, Cæsar, Cato, and Labienus, shine much more in Lucan, than Jupiter, Mercury, Juno, or Venus, do in Virgil. The ideas which Lucan has given us of these great men are truly greater, and affect us more sensibly, than those which Virgil has given us of his deities: the latter has clothed his gods with human infirmities, to adapt them to the capacity of men: the other has raised his heroes so, as to bring them into competition with the gods themselves. In a word, the gods are not so valuable in Virgil, as the heroes: In Lucan, the heroes equal the gods. After all, it must be allowed, that most things throughout the whole Pharsalia are greatly and justly said, with regard even to the language and expression; but the sentiments are every where so beautiful and elevated, that they appear, as he describes Cæsar in Amyclus's cottage in the fifth book, noble and magnificent in any dress. It is in this elevation of thought that Lucan justly excels: his is his forte, and what raises him up to an equality with the greatest of the ancient poets.

I cannot omit here the delicate character of Lucan's genius, as mentioned by Strada, in the emblematic way. It is commonly known that Pope Leo the tenth was not only learned himself, but a great patron of learning, and used to be present at the conversations and performances of all the polite writers of his time. The wits of Rome entertained him one day, at his villa on the banks of the Tiber, with an interlude in the nature of a poetical masquerade. They had their Parnassus, their Pegasus, their Helicon, and every one of the ancient poets in their several characters, where each acted the part that was suitable to his manner of writing, and among the best one acted Lucan. "There was none," says he, "that was placed in a higher station, or had a greater prospect under him, than Lucan. He vaulted upon Pegasus with all the heat and intrepidity of youth, and seemed desirous of mounting into the clouds upon the back of him. But as the hinder feet of the horse stuck to the mountain, while the body reared up in the air, the poet with great difficulty kept himself from sliding off, inasmuch that the spectators often gave him for gone, and cried out now and then, he was tumbling." Thus Strada.

I shall sum up all I have time to say of Lucan, with another character, as it is given by one of the most polite men of the age he lived in, and who, under the protection of the same Pope Leo X. was one of the first restorers of learning in the latter end of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth century: I mean, Johannes Sulpitius Verulanus, who, with the assistance of Bervaldus, Badius, and some others of the first form in the republic of letters, published Lucan with notes at Rome in the year 1514, being the first impression, if I mistake not, that ever was made of him. Poetry and painting, with the knowledge of the Greek and Latin tongues, rose about that time to a prodigious height in a small compass of years; and whatever we may think to the contrary, they have declined ever since. Verulanus, in his dedication to Cardinal Palavacini, prefixed to that edition, has not only given us a delicate sententious criticism on his Pharsalia, but a beautiful judicious comparison between him and Virgil, and that in a style which in my opinion comes but little short of Sallust, or the writers of the Augustan age. It is to the following purpoise.

I come now to the author I have commented upon, says Sulpitius Verulanus, and shall endeavour to describe him, as well as observe in what he differs from that great poet Virgil. Lucan, in the opinion of Fabius, is no less a pattern for orators than for poets; and always adhering strictly to truth, he seems to have as fair a pretence to the character of an historian: for he equally performs each of these offices. His expression is bold and lively; his sentiments are clear, his fictions within compass of probability, and his digressions proper: his orations artful, correct, manly, and full of matter. In the other parts of his work, he is grave, fluent, copious, and elegant; abounding with great variety, and wonderful erudition. And in unriddling the intricacy of contrivances, designs, and actions, his style is so matterly, that you rather seem to see, than read of those transactions. But as for enterprises and battles, you imagine them not related, but acted: towns alarmed, armies engaged, the eagerness and terror of the several soldiers, seem present to your view. As our author is frequent and fertile in descriptions; and none more skillful in discovering the secret springs of action, and their rise in human passions: as he is an acute searcher into the manners of men, and most dextrous in applying all sorts of learning to his subject: What other cosmographer, astrologer, philosopher, or mathematician, do we stand in need of, while we read him? who has more judiciously handled, or treated with more delicacy, whatever topics his fancy has led him to, or have casually fallen in his way? Maro is, without doubt, a great poet; so is Lucan. In so apparent an equality, it is hard to decide which excels: For both have justly obtained the highest commendations. Maro is rich and magnificent; Lucan sumptuous and splendid: The first is discreet, inventive, and sublime; the latter free, harmonious, and full of spirit. Virgil seems to move with the devout solemnity of a reverend prelate: Lucan to march with the noble haughtiness of a victorious general. One owes most to labour and application; the other to nature and practice: one lulls the soul with the sweetness and music of his verse, the other raises it by his fire and rapture. Virgil is sedate, happy in his conceptions, free from faults; Lucan quick, various, and florid: He seems to fight with stronger weapons, This with more. The first surpasses all in solid strength; the latter excels in vigour and poignancy. You would think that the one sounds rather a larger and deeper toned trumpet; the other a less indeed, but clearer. In short, so great is the affinity, and the struggle for precedence between them, that though nobody be allowed to come up to that divinity in Maro; yet had He not been possessed the chief feat on Parnassus, our author's claim it had been indisputable.

THE PHARSALIA.

BOOK I.

THE ARGUMENT.

In the first book, after a proposition of his subject, a short view of the ruins occasioned by the civil war in Italy, and a compliment to Nero, Lucan gives the principal causes of the civil war, together with the characters of Cæsar and Pompey: after that, the story properly begins with Cæsar's passing the Rubicon, which was the bound of his province towards Rome, and his march to Arminium. Then the tribunes and Curio, who had been driven out of the city by the opposite party, come to him, and demand his protection. Then follows his speech to his army, and a particular mention of the several parts of Gaul from which his troops were drawn together to his assistance. From Cæsar the poet turns to describe the general consternation at Rome, and the flight of great part of the senate and people at the news of his march. From hence he takes occasion to relate the foregoing prodigies, which were partly on occasion of those panic terrors, and likewise the ceremonies that were used by the priests for purifying the city, and averting the anger of the gods; and then ends the book with the inspiration and prophecy of a Roman matron, in which she enumerates the principal events which were to happen in the course of the civil war.

EMATHIAN plains with slaughter cover'd o'er,
And rage unknown to civil wars before,
Establish'd violence, and lawless might,
Avow'd and hallow'd by the name of right;
A race renown'd, the world's victorious lords,
Turn'd on themselves with their own hostile swords;
Piles against piles oppos'd in impious fight,
And eagles against eagles bending sight;
Of blood by friends, by kindred, parents, spilt,
One common horror and promiscuous guilt;
A shatter'd world in wild disorder tost,
Leagues, laws, and empire, in confusion lost;
Of all the woes which civil discords bring,
And Rome o'ercome by Roman arms, I sing,

What blind, detested madness could afford
Such horrid licence to the murdering sword?
Say, Romans, whence so dire a fury rose,
To glut with Latian blood your barbarous foes?
Could you in wars like these provoke your fate?
Wars, where no triumphs on the victor wait!
While Babylon's proud spires yet rise so high,
And rich in Roman spoils invade the sky;
While yet no vengeance is to Crassus paid,
But unatton'd repines the wandering shade!
What tracts of land, what realms unknown before,

What seas wide-stretching to the distant shore,
What crowns, what empires, might that blood
have gain'd,

With which Emathia's fatal fields were stain'd!
Where Seres in their silken woods reside,
Where swift Araxes fills his rapid tide;
Where'er (if such a nation can be found)
Nile's secret fountain springing cleaves the ground;
Where southern suns with double ardour rise,
Flame o'er the land, and scorch the mid-day skies;

Where winter's hand the Scythian seas constrain
And binds the frozen floods in crystal chains:
Where'er the shady night and day-spring come,
All had submitted to the yoke of Rome.

O Rome! if slaughter be thy only care,
If such thy fond desire of impious war;
Turn from thyself, at least, the destin'd wound,
Till thou art mistress of the world around,
And none to conquer but thyself be found.
Thy foes as yet a juster war afford,
And barbarous blood remains to glut thy sword
But see! her hands on her own vitals seize,
And no destruction but her own can please.
Behold her fields unknowing of the plough!
Behold her palaces and towers laid low!
See where o'erthrown the massy column lies,
While weeds obscure above the cornice rise.
Here gaping wide, half-ruin'd walls remain,
There mouldering pillars nodding roots sustain.
The landscape, once in various beauty spread,
With yellow harvests and the flowery mead,
Displays a wild uncultivated face,
Which bushy brakes and brambles vile disgrace:
No human footstep prints th' untrodden green,
No cheerful maid nor villager is seen.
Ev'n in her cities famous once and great,
Where thousands crowded in the noisy street,
No sound is heard of human voices now,
But whistling winds through empty dwelling
blow;

While passing strangers wonder, if they spy
One single melancholy face go by.
Nor Pyrrhus's sword, nor Cannæ's fatal field,
Such universal desolation yield:
Her impious sons have her worst foes surpass'd,
And Roman hands have laid Hesperia waste,

But if our fates severely have decreed
 N way but this for Nero to succeed;
 Nly thus our heroes can be gods,
 A earth must pay for their divine abodes;
 Eaven could not the thunderer obtain,
 T giants wars made room for Jove to reign,
 's just, ye gods, nor ought we to complain:
 Crest with death though dire Pharsalia groan,
 Trough Latian blood the Punic ghosts atone;
 Trough Pompey's hapless sons renew the war,
 Ad Munda view the slaughter'd heaps from far;
 Trough meagre famine in Perusia reign,
 Trough Mutina with battles fill the plain;
 Trough Leuca's isle, and wide Ambracia's bay,
 Eord the rage of Actium's fatal day;
 Trough servile hands are arm'd to man the fleet,
 Ad on Sicilian seas the navies meet;
 Crimes, all horrors, we with joy regard,
 See thou, O Cæsar, art the great reward.
 Vast are the thanks thy grateful Rome should pay
 T wars, which usher in thy sacred sway.
 Men, the great business of the world achiev'd,
 Ie by the willing itars thou art receiv'd,
 Trough all the blissful feats the news shall roll,
 Ad heaven resound with joy from pole to pole.
 Vether great Jove resign supreme command,
 Ad trust his sceptre to thy abler hand;
 Cif thou choose the empire of the day,
 Ad make the sun's unwilling steeds obey;
 Apicious if thou drive the flaming team,
 Vile earth rejoices in thy gentler beam;
 Vhere'er thou reign, with one consenting voice,
 Te gods and nature shall approve thy choice.
 E, oh! whatever be thy godhead great,
 F not in regions too remote thy seat;
 F r deign thou near the frozen bear to shine,
 F r where the sultry southern stars decline;
 I s kindly thence thy influence shall come,
 Ad thy blest rays obliquely visit Rome.
 F is not too much on any part the sphere:
 F rd were the task thy weight divine to bear;
 S n would the axis feel th' unusual load,
 Ad groaning bend beneath th' incumbent god:
 C r the mid orb more equal shalt thou rise,
 Ad with a juster balance fix the skies.
 S ene for ever be that azure space,
 T blackening clouds the purer heaven disgrace,
 F r hide from Rome her Cæsar's radiant face.
 E n shall mankind consent in sweet accord,
 Ad warring nations sheath the wrathful sword;
 K ice shall the world in friendly leagues compose,
 Ad Janus' dreadful gates for ever close.
 C me thy present godhead stands confess,
 C let thy sacred fury fire my breast!
 S thou vouchsafe to hear, let Phœbus dwell
 S il uninvok'd in Cyrrha's mystic cell;
 I me uncall'd, let sprightly Bacchus reign,
 Ad lead the dance on Indian Nyssa's plain.
 T hee, O Cæsar, all my vows belong;
 I thou alone inspire the Roman song.
 And now the mighty task demands our care,
 T e fatal source of discord to declare;
 V at cause accurs'd produc'd the dire event,
 V y rage so dire the madding nations rent,
 Ad peace was driven away by one consent.
 I t thus the malice of our fate commands,
 Ad nothing great to long duration stands;

Aspiring Rome had risen too much in height,
 And sunk beneath her own unwieldy weight.
 So shall one hour at last this globe controul,
 Break up the vast machine, dissolve the whole,
 And time no more through measur'd ages toil,
 Then chaos hoar shall seize his former right,
 And reign with anarchy and eldest night;
 The itary lamps shall combat in the sky,
 And lost and blended in each other die;
 Quench'd in the deep the heavenly fires shall fall,
 And ocean cast abroad o'er spread the ball: [run,
 The moon no more her well-known course shall
 But rise from western waves, and meet the sun;
 Ungovern'd shall she quit her ancient way,
 Herself ambitious to supply the day:
 Confusion wild shall all around be hurl'd,
 And discord and disorder tear the world.
 Thus power and greatness to destruction haste,
 Thus bounds to human happiness are plac'd,
 And Jove forbids prosperity to last.
 Yet fortune, when the meant to wreak her hate,
 From foreign foes preserv'd the Roman state,
 Nor suffer'd barbarous hands to give the blow,
 That laid the queen of earth and ocean low;
 To Rome herself for enemies she fought,
 And Rome herself her own destruction wrought;
 Rome, that ne'er knew three lordly heads before,
 First fell by fatal partnership of power.
 What blind ambition bids your force combine?
 What means this frantic league in which you join?
 Mistaken men! who hope to share the spoil,
 And hold the world within one common toil!
 While earth the seas shall in her bosom bear,
 While earth herself shall hang in ambient air,
 While Phœbus shall his constant task renew;
 While through the Zodiac night shall day pursue;
 No faith, no trust, no friendship, shall be known
 Among the jealous partners of a throne;
 But he who reigns, shall strive to reign alone.
 Nor seek for foreign tales to make this good,
 Were not our walls first built in brother's blood?
 Nor did the feud for wide dominion rise,
 Nor was the world their impious fury's prize;
 Divided power contention still affords,
 And for a village strove the petty lords.
 The fierce triumvirate combin'd in peace,
 Persev'd the bond but for a little space,
 Still with an awkward disagreeing grace.
 'Twas not a league by inclination made,
 But bare agreement, such as friends persuade.
 Desire of war in either chief was seen,
 Though interposing Crassus stood between.
 Such in the midst the parting isthmus lies,
 While swelling seas on either side arise;
 The solid boundaries of earth restrain
 The fierce Ionian and Ægean main;
 But, if the mound gives way, straight roaring loud
 In at the breach the rushing torrents crowd;
 Raging they meet, the dashing waves run high,
 And work their foamy waters to the sky.
 So when unhappy Crassus, sadly slain,
 Dy'd with his blood Assyrian Carre's plain;
 Sudden the seeming friends in arms engage,
 The Parthian sword let loose the Latian rage.
 Ye fierce Arsacidæ! ye foes of Rome,
 Now triumph, you have more than overcome:
 The vanquis'd felt your victory from far,
 And from that field receiv'd their civil war.

The sword is now the umpire to decide,
 And part what friendship knew not to divide.
 'Twas hard, an empire of so vast a size,
 Could not for two ambitious minds suffice;
 The peo, led earth, and wide extended main,
 Could furnish room for only one to reign.
 When dying Julia first forsook the light,
 And Hymen's tapers sunk in endless night,
 The tender ties of kindred love were torn,
 Forgotten all, and bury'd in her urn.
 Oh! if her death had haply been delay'd,
 How might the daughter and the wife persuade!
 Like the fam'd Sabine dames she had been seen
 To stay the meeting war, and stand between:
 On either hand had woo'd them to accord,
 Sooth'd her fierce father, and her furious lord,
 To join in peace, and sheath the ruthless sword. }
 But this the fatal sister's doom deny'd;
 The friends were fever'd, when the matron dy'd.
 The rival leaders mortal war proclaim,
 Rage fires their souls with jealousy of fame,
 And emulation fans the rising flame. }

These Pompey thy past deeds by turns infect,
 And jealous glory burns within thy breast;
 Thy fam'd piratic laurel seems to fade,
 Beneath successful Cæsar's rising shade;
 His Gallic wreaths thou view'st with anxious eyes
 Above thy naval crowns triumphant rise,
 Thee, Cæsar, thy long labours past incite,
 Thy use of war, and custom of the fight;
 While bold ambition prompts thee in the race,
 And bids thy courage scorn a second place.
 Superior power, fierce faction's dearest care,
 One could not brook, and one diddain'd to share.
 Justly to name the better cause were hard,
 While greatest names for either side declar'd:
 Victorious Cæsar by the gods was crown'd,
 The vanquish'd party was by Cato own'd.
 Nor came the rivals equal to the field;
 One to increasing years began to yield,
 Old age come creeping in the peaceful gown,
 And civil functions weigh'd the soldier down;
 Difus'd to arms, he turn'd him to the laws,
 And pleas'd himself with popular applause;
 With gifts and liberal bounty fought for fame,
 And lov'd to hear the vulgar shout his name;
 In his own theatre rejoic'd to sit,
 Amidst the noisy praises of the pit.
 Careless of future ills that might betide,
 No aid he fought to prop his failing side,
 But on his former fortune much rely'd.
 Still seem'd he to possess, and fill his place;
 But stood the shadow of what once he was.
 So, in the field with Ceres' bounty spread,
 Upcreas some ancient oak his reverend head;
 Chaplets and sacred gifts his boughs adorn,
 And spoils of war by mighty heroes worn.
 But, the first vigour of his root now gone,
 He stands dependent on his weight alone;
 All bare his naked branches are display'd,
 And with his leafless trunk he forms a shade:
 Yet though the winds his ruin daily threat,
 As every blast would heave him from his seat;
 Though thousand fairer trees the field supplies,
 That rich in youthful verdure round him rise;
 Fix'd in his ancient state he yields to none,
 And wears the honours of the grove alone.

But Cæsar's greatness, and his strength, was more Than past renown and antiquated power;
 'Twas not the fame of what he once had been,
 Or tales in old records and annals seen,
 But 'twas a valour, restless, unconfin'd,
 Which no success could fate, nor limits bind;
 'Twas shame, a soldier's shame untaught to yield
 That blush'd for nothing but an ill-fought field
 Fierce in his hopes he was, nor knew to stay,
 Where vengeance or ambition led the way;
 Still prodigal of war when'er withstood,
 Nor spar'd to stain the guilty sword with blood
 Urging advantage, he improv'd all odds,
 And made the most of fortune and the gods;
 Pleas'd to o'erturn whate'er withheld his prize,
 And saw the ruin with rejoicing eyes. [low
 Such while earth trembles, and heaven thunde
 Darts the swift lightning from the rending cloud
 Fierce through the day it breaks, and in its flight
 The dreadful blast confounds the gazer's sight;
 Restless in its course delights to rove,
 And cleaves the temples of its master Jove:
 Alike where'er it passes or returns,
 With equal rage the fell destroyer burns;
 Then with a whirl full in its strength retires,
 And recollects the force of all its scatter'd fires.
 Motives like these the leading chiefs inspir'd;
 But other thoughts the meaner vulgar fir'd.
 Those fatal seeds luxurious vices sow,
 Which ever lay a mighty people low.
 To Rome the vanquish'd earth her tribute paid,
 And ready treasures to her view display'd:
 Then truth and simple manners left the place,
 While riot rear'd her lewd dishonest face;
 Virtue to sullen prosperity gave way,
 And fled from rapine, and the lust of prey.
 On every side proud palaces arise,
 And lavish gold each common use supplies.
 Their fathers frugal tables stand abhor'd,
 And Asia now and Afric are explor'd, }
 For high-rob'd dainties, and the citron board.
 In silken robes the minion men appear,
 Which maids and youthful brides should blush to
 That age by honest poverty adorn'd [wear
 Which brought the manly Romans forth, i scorn'd;
 Wherever ought pernicious does abound,
 For luxury all lands are ransack'd round, }
 And dear-bought deaths the sinking state con-
 found.
 The Curii's and Camilli's little field,
 To vast extended territories yield;
 And foreign tenants reap the harvest now,
 Where once the great dictator held the plough.
 Rome, ever fond of war, was tir'd with ease;
 Ev'n liberty had lost the power to please:
 Hence rage and wrath their ready minds invade,
 And want could every wickedness persuade:
 Hence impious power was first esteem'd a good,
 Worth being fought with arms, and bought with
 blood:
 With glory, tyrants did their country awe,
 And violence prescrib'd the rule to law.
 Hence pliant servile voices were constrain'd,
 And force in popular assemblies reign'd;
 Consuls and tribunes, with opposing might,
 Join'd to confound and overturn the right:

Hence shameful magistrates were made for gold,
 And a base people by themselves were sold :
 Hence slaughter in the vernal field returns,
 And Rome her yearly competitions mourns :
 Hence death unthrifty, careless to repay,
 And usury still watching for its day :
 Hence perjuries in every wrangling court ;
 And war, the needy bankrupt's last resort.
 Now Cæsar, marching swift with winged haste,
 The summits of the frozen Alps had pass'd ;
 With vast events and enterprises fraught,
 And future wars revolving in his thought.
 Now near the banks of Rubicon he stood ;
 When lo ? as he survey'd the narrow flood,
 Amidst the dusky horrors of the night,
 A wondrous vision flood consent to fight.
 Her awful head Rome's reverend image rear'd,
 Trembling and sad the matron form appear'd ;
 A flowery crown her hoary temples bound,
 And her torn tresses rudely hung around :
 Her naked arms uplifted ere she spoke,
 Then groaning thus the mournful silence broke.
 O sumptuous men ! oh, whither do you run ?
 O, whither bear you these my ensigns on ?
 Friends to right, if citizens of Rome,
 Are to your utmost barrier are you come.
 He said ; and sunk within the closing shade :
 Confusion and dread the chief invade ;
 His rose his starting hair, he stood dismay'd,
 And on the bank his slackening steps were stay'd.
 Thou (at length he cry'd) whose hand controls
 The forked fire, and rattling thunder rolls ;
 Who from thy capitol's exalted height,
 Hast o'er the wide-spread city cast thy sight !
 Phrygian gods, who guard the Julian line !
 The mysteries of Romulus divine !
 Thou, Jove ! to whom from young Ascanius
 Came
 My Alban temple and thy Latian name :
 And thou, immortal sacred Vestal flame !
 O chief, oh ! chiefly, thou, majestic Rome !
 My first, my great divinity, to whom
 My still successful Cæsar am I come ;
 Or do thou fear the sword's destructive rage,
 With thee my arms no impious war shall wage.
 O him thy hate, on him thy curse bestow,
 Who would persuade thee Cæsar is thy foe ;
 And since to thee I consecrate my toil,
 In favour thou my cause, and on thy soldier smile.
 He said ; and straight, impatient of delay,
 Cross'd the swelling flood pursu'd his way.
 When on sultry Libya's desert sand
 He lion spies the hunter hard at hand,
 Such'd on the earth the doubtful savage lies,
 And waits awhile till all his fury rise ;
 His lashing tail provokes his swelling sides,
 And high upon his neck his mane with horror
 When if at length the flying dart insect, [rides :
 For the broad spear invade his ample breast,
 Mordant the wound, he yawns a dreadful roar,
 And flies like lightning on the hostile Moor.
 While with hot skies the fervent summer glows,
 The Rubicon an humble river flows ;
 Through lowly vales he cuts his winding way,
 And rolls his ruddy waters to the sea,
 Is bank on either side a limit stands,
 Between the Gallic and Ausonian lands.

But stronger now the wintery torrent grows,
 The wetting winds had thaw'd the Alpine snows,
 And Cynthia rising with a blunted beam
 In the third circle, drove her watery team,
 A signal sure to raise the swelling stream.
 For this, to stem the rapid water's course
 First plung'd amidst the flood the bolder horse :
 With strength oppos'd against the stream they Lead, [succeed,

While to the smoother ford, the foot with ease

The leader now had pass'd the torrent o'er,
 And reach'd fair Italy's forbidden shore :
 Then rearing on the hostile bank his head,
 Here farewell peace and injur'd laws ! (he said.)
 Since faith is broke, and leagues are set aside,
 Henceforth thou, goddess's fortune, art my guide ;
 Let fate and war the great event decide.
 He spoke ; and, on the dreadful task intent,
 Speedy to near Ariminum he bent ;
 To him the Balearic sling is slow,
 And the shaft loiters from the Parthian bow.
 With eager marches swift he reach'd the town,
 As the shades fled, the sinking stars were gone,
 And Lucifer the last was left alone.

At length the morn, the dreadful morn arose,
 Whose beams the first tumultuous rage disclose :
 Whether the stormy south prolong'd the night,
 Or the good gods abhor'd the impious fight,
 The clouds awhile withheld the mournful light.
 To the mid forum on the soldier pass'd,
 There halted, and his victor ensigns plac'd :
 With dire alarms from band to band around,
 The sife, hoarse horn, and rattling trumpets found.
 The starting citizens uprear their heads ;
 The lustier youth at once forsake their beds ;
 Hasty they snatch the weapons, which among
 Their household gods in peace had rested long ;
 Old bucklers of the covering hides bereft,
 The mouldering frames disjoin'd and barely left ;
 Swords with foul rust indented deep they take,
 And useless spears with points inverted shake.
 Soon as their crests the Roman eagles rear'd,
 And Cæsar high above the rest appear'd ;
 Each trembling heart with secret horror shook,
 And silence thus within themselves they spoke :

Oh, hapless city ! oh, ill-fated walls !
 Rear'd for a curse to near the neighbouring Gauls !
 By us destruction ever takes its way,
 We first become each bold invader's prey ;
 Oh, that by fate we rather had been plac'd
 Upon the confines of the utmost east !
 The frozen north much better might we know,
 Mountains of ice, and everlasting snow.
 Better with wandering Scythians choofe to roam,
 Than fix in fruitful Italy our home,
 And guard these dreadful passages to Rome.
 Through these the Cimbrians laid Hesperia waste ;
 Through these the swarthy Carthaginian pass'd ;
 Whenever fortune threatens the Latian states,
 War death, and ruin, enter at these gates.

In secret murmurs thus they sought relief,
 While no bold voice proclaim'd aloud their grief.
 O'er all one deep, one horrid silence reigns ;
 As when the rigour of the winter's chains
 All nature, heaven, and earth at once constrains ;
 The tuneless feather'd kind forget their lays,
 And shivering tremble on the naked sprays ;

Ev'n the rude seas compos'd forget to roar,
 And freezing billows stiffen on the shore.
 The colder shades of night forsook the sky,
 When, lo! Bellona lifts her torch on high:
 And, if the chief, by doubt or shame detain'd,
 A while from battle and from blood abstain'd;
 Fortune and fate, impatient of delay,
 Force every soft relenting thought away.
 A lucky chance a fair pretence supplies,
 And justice in his favour seems to rise.
 New accidents new flings to rage suggest,
 And fiercer fires inflame the warrior's breast.
 The senate threatening high, and haughty grown,
 Had driv'n the wrangling tribunes from the town;
 In scorn of law, had chas'd them through the gate,

And urg'd them with the factious Gracchi's fate.
 With these, as for redress their course they sped
 To Cæsar's camp, the busy Curio fled;
 Curio, a speaker turbulent and bold,
 Of venal eloquence, that serv'd for gold,
 And principles that might be bought and sold. }
 A tribune once himself, in loud debate,
 He strove for public freedom and the state:
 Essay'd to make the warring nobles bow,
 And bring the potent party-leaders low.
 To Cæsar thus, while thousand cares infest,
 Revolving round the warrior's anxious breast,
 His speech the ready orator address: }

While yet my voice was useful to my friend;
 While 'twas allow'd me, Cæsar to defend,
 While yet the pleading bar was left me free,
 While I could draw uncertain Rome to thee;
 In vain their force the moody fathers join'd,
 In vain to rob thee of thy power combin'd;
 I lengthen'd out the date of thy command,
 And fix'd thy conquering sword within thy hand.

But since the vanquish'd laws in war are dumb,
 To thee, behold, an exil'd hand we come;
 For thee, with joy our banishment we take,
 For thee our household hearths and gods forsake;
 Nor hope to see our native city more,
 'Till victory and thou the loss restore.
 Th' unready faction, yet confus'd with fear,
 Defenceless, weak, and unresolv'd, appear.
 Hasten then thy towering eagles on their way:
 When fair occasion calls, 'tis fatal to delay.
 If twice five years the stubborn Gaul withheld,
 And set thee hard in many a well-fought field;
 A nobler labour now before thee lies,
 The hazard less, yet greater far the prize;
 A province that, and portion of the whole;
 This the vast head that does mankind control.
 Success shall sure attend thee, boldly go
 And win the world at one successful blow.
 No triumph now attends thee at the gate;
 No temples for thy sacred laurel wait:
 But blasting envy hangs upon thy name,
 Denies thee right, and robs thee of thy fame;
 Imputes as crimes, the nations overcome,
 And makes it treason to have fought for Rome:
 Ev'n he who took thy Julia's plighted hand,
 Waits to deprive thee of thy just command.
 Since Pompey then, and those upon his side,
 Forbid thee, the world's empire to divide;
 Assume that sway which best mankind may bear,
 And rule alone what they disdain to share.

He said; his words the listening chief engag'd
 And fire his breast, already prone to rage.
 Not peals of loud applause with greater force,
 At Grecian Elis, rous'd the fiery horse;
 When eager for the course each nerve he strain'd
 Hangs on the bit, and tugs the stubborn reins
 At every shout erects his quivering ears,
 And his broad breast upon the barrier bears.
 Sudden he bids the troops draw out, and strain
 The thronging legions round their ensigns wa
 Then thus the crowd composing with a look,
 And, with his hand commanding silence, spok
 Fellows in arms, who chose with me to bear
 The toils and dangers of a tedious war,
 And conquer to this tenth revolving year;
 See what reward the grateful senate yield,
 For the lost blood which stains yon northern fi
 For wounds, for winter camps, for Alpine snow
 And all the deaths the brave can undergo.
 See! the tumultuous city is alarm'd,
 As if another Hannibal were arm'd:
 The lusty youth are cull'd to fill the bands,
 And each tall grove falls by the shipwrights hand
 Fleets are equip'd, the field with armies spread
 And all demand devoted Cæsar's head.
 If thus, while fortune yields us her applause,
 While the gods call us on and own our cause,
 If thus returning conquerors they treat,
 How had they us'd us flying from defeat;
 If sickle chance of war had prov'd unkind,
 And the fierce Gauls pursu'd us from behind!
 But let their boasts here leave his home,
 Let him, dissolv'd, with lazy leisure, come,
 With every noisy talking tongue in Rome:
 Let loud Marcellus troops of gown-men head,
 And their great Cato peaceful burghers lead.
 Shall his base followers, a venal train,
 For ages bid their idol Pompey reign?
 Shall his ambition still be thought no crime,
 His breach of laws, and triumph ere the time?
 Still shall he gather honours and command,
 And grasp all rule in his rapacious hand?
 What need I name the violated laws,
 And famine made the servant of his cause?
 Who knows not how the trembling judge beheld
 The peaceful court with armed legions fill'd;
 When the bold soldier, justice to defy,
 In the mid forum rear'd his ensigns high;
 When glittering swords the pale assembly fear'd,
 When all for death and slaughter stood prepar'd,
 And Pompey's arms were guilty Milo's guard? }
 And now, disdain'g peace and useful ease,
 Nothing but rule and government can please.
 Aspiring still, as ever, to be great,
 He robs his age of rest to vex the state:
 On war intent, to that he bends his cares,
 And for the field of battle now prepares.
 He copies from his master Sylla well,
 And would the dire example far excel.
 Hyrcanian tygers fierceness thus retain,
 Whom in the woods their horrid mothers train. }
 To chase the herds, and surfeit on the slain.
 Such, Pompey, still has been thy greedy thirst,
 In early love of impious slaughter nurs'd;
 Since first thy infant cruelty essay'd
 To lick the curst dictator's reeking blade.
 None ever give the savage nature o'er, }
 Whose jaws have once been drench'd in floods of gore.

But whither would a power so wide extend?
 here will thy long ambition find an end?
 remember him who taught thee to be great;
 it him who chose to quit the sovereign seat,
 it thy own Sylla warn thee to retreat. }
 Perhaps, for that too boldly I withstand, or yield my conquering eagles on command;
 see the Cilician pirate strikes his sail,
 see o'er the Pontic king thy arms prevail;
 see the poor prince, a weary life o'er-past,
 see thee and poison is subdu'd at last;
 perhaps one latest province yet remains,
 and vanquish'd Cæsar must receive thy chains.
 it though my labours lose their just reward,
 it that the senate, these my friends regard;
 hate'er my lot, my brave victorious bands deserve to triumph, whose'er commands.
 here shall my weary veteran rest? O where all virtue worn with years and arms repair?
 what town is for his late repose assign'd?
 here are the promis'd lands he hop'd to find,
 here the poor remains of life with peace?
 it march! Your long victorious ensigns rear, it valour in its own just cause appear.
 when for redress entreating armies call,
 they who deny just things, permit them all.
 the righteous gods shall surely own the cause,
 which seeks not spoil, nor empire, but the laws.
 proud lords and tyrants to depose we come,
 and save from slavery submissive Rome.
 He said; a doubtful sullen murmuring sound in through the unresolving vulgar round;
 he seeds of piety their rage restrain'd,
 and somewhat of their country's love remain'd;
 these the rude passions of their soul withstood,
 ate to conquest, and inur'd to blood:
 it soon the momentary virtue fail'd,
 and war and dread of Cæsar's frown prevail'd.
 straight Lælius from amongst the rest stood forth,
 an old centurion of distinguish'd worth;
 an oaken wreath his hardy temples wore,
 an ark of a citizen preserv'd he bore.
 If against thee (he cry'd) I may exclaim, thou greatest leader of the Roman name;
 truth for injur'd honour may be bold,
 what lingering patience does thy arms withhold?
 wilt thou distrust our faith so often try'd?
 thy long wars not shrinking from thy side?
 while in my veins this vital torrent flows,
 his heaving breath within my bosom blows;
 while yet these arms sufficient vigour yield to dart the javelin, and to lift the shield;
 while these remain, my general, wilt thou own the vile dominion of the lazy gown?
 wilt thou the lordly senate choose to bear,
 rather than conquer in a civil war?
 with thee the Scythian wilds we'll wander o'er,
 with thee the burning Lybian sands explore, and tread the Syrt's inhospitable shore. }
 Hold! this hand, to nobler labours train'd, or thee the servile oar has not disdain'd,
 or thee the swelling seas were taught to plow, through the Rhine's whirling stream to force thy prow, }
 that all the vanquish'd world to thee might bow.

Each faculty, each power, thy will obey,
 And inclination ever leads the way.
 No friend, no fellow-citizen I know,
 Whom Cæsar's trumpet once proclaims a foe,
 By the long labours of thy sword, I swear,
 By all thy fame acquir'd in ten years war,
 By thy past triumphs, and by those to come,
 (No matter where the vanquish'd be, or whom)
 Bid me to strike my dearest brother dead,
 To bring my aged father's hoary head, }
 Or stab the pregnant partner of my bed;
 Though nature plead, and stop my trembling
 I swear to execute thy dread command. [hand,
 Dost thou delight to spoil the wealthy gods,
 And scatter flames through all their proud abodes?
 See through thy camp our ready trophies burn,
 Moneta soon her sinking fane shall mourn.
 Wilt thou yon haughty factious senate brave,
 And awe the Tuscan river's yellow wave?
 On Tiber's banks thy ensigns shall be plac'd,
 And thy bold soldier lay Hesperia waste.
 Dost thou devote some hostile city's walls?
 Beneath our thundering rams the ruin falls;
 She falls, ev'n though thy wrathful sentence doom'd
 The world's imperial mistress, mighty Rome.
 He said; the ready legions vow to join
 Their chief belov'd, in every bold design;
 All lift their well-approving hands on high,
 And rend with peals of loud applause the sky.
 Such is the found when Thracian Boreas spreads
 His weighty wing o'er Ossæ's piny heads:
 At once the noisy groves are all inclin'd,
 And, bending, roar beneath the sweeping wind;
 At once their rattling branches all they rear,
 And drive the leafy clamour through the air.
 Cæsar with joy the ready bands beheld,
 Urg'd on by fate, and eager for the field;
 Swift orders straight the scatter'd warriors call,
 From every part of wide-extended Gaul;
 And, lest his fortune languish by delay,
 To Rome the moving ensigns speed their way.
 Some, at the bidding of the chief, forsake
 Their fix'd encampment near the Lemnan lake:
 Some from Vogesus' lofty rocks withdraw,
 Plac'd on those heights the Lingones to awe;
 The Lingones still frequent in alarms,
 And rich in many-colour'd painted arms.
 Others from Isara's low torrent came,
 Who winding keeps through many a mead his
 But seeks the sea with waters not his own, [name;
 Lost and confounded in the nobler Rhone.
 Their garrison the Ruthen city send,
 Whose youths long locks in yellow rings depend.
 No more the Varus and the Atax feel
 The lordly burden of the Latian keel.
 Alcides' fane the troops commanded leave,
 Where winding rocks the peaceful flood receive;
 Nor Corus there, nor Zephyrus resort,
 Nor roll rude surges in the sacred port;
 Circius' loud blast alone is heard to roar,
 And vex the safety of Monæchus' shore.
 The legions move from Gallia's farthest side,
 Wash'd by the restless ocean's various tide;
 Now o'er the land flows in the pouring main,
 Now rears the land its rising head again, }
 And seas and earth alternate rule maintain.
 If driven by winds from the far distant pole,
 This way and that, the floods revolving roll;

Or if, compell'd by Cynthia's silver beam,
 Obedient Tethys heaves the swelling stream;
 Or if, by heat attracted to the sky,
 Old ocean lifts his heavy waves on high,
 And briny deeps the waſting fun ſully;
 What cauſe ſoe'er the wondrous motion guide,
 And preſs the ebb, or raiſe the flowing tide;
 Be that your taſk, ye ſages, to explore,
 Who ſearch the ſecret ſprings of nature's power:
 To me, for ſo the wiſer gods ordain,
 Untrac'd the mystery ſhall ſtill remain.
 From fair Nemofus moves a warlike band,
 From Atur's banks, and the Tarbellian ſtrand,
 Where winding round the coaſt purſues its way,
 And folds the ſea within a gentle bay.
 The Santones are now with joy releas'd
 From hoſtile inmates, and their Roman gueſt,
 Now the Bituriges forget their fears,
 And Sueſſons nimble with unwieldy ſpears:
 Exult the Leuci, and the Remi now,
 Expert in javelins, and the bending bow.
 The Belgæ taught on cover'd wains to ride,
 The Sequani the wheeling horſe to guide;
 The bold Averni who from Ilium come,
 And boaſt an ancient brotherhood with Rome;
 The Nervi oft rebelling, oft ſubdu'd,
 Whoſe hands in Gotta's ſlaughter were imbru'd;
 Vangiones, like looſe Sarmatians dreſt,
 Who with rough hides their brawny thighs inveſt:
 Batavians fierce, whom brazen trumpets delight,
 And with hoarſe rattlings animate to fight;
 The nations where the Cinga's waters flow,
 And Pyrenæan mountains ſtand in ſnow;
 Thoſe where ſlow Arar meets the rapid Rhone,
 And with his ſtronger ſtream is hurry'd down;
 Thoſe o'er the mountains lofty ſummit ſpread,
 Where high Gebenna liſts her hoary head;
 With theſe the Trevir and Ligurian ſhorn,
 Whoſe brow no more long falling locks adorn;
 Though chief amongſt the Gauls he went to deck,
 With ringlets comely ſpread, his graceful neck:
 And you where Heſus' horrid altar ſtands,
 Where dire Teutates human blood demands;
 Where Taranis by wretches is obey'd,
 And vies in ſlaughter with the Scythian maid:
 All ſee with joy the war's departing rage,
 Seek diſtant lands, and other foes engage.
 You too, ye bards! whom ſacred raptures fire,
 To chaunt your heroes to your country's lyre;
 Who conſecrate in your immortal ſtrain,
 Brave patriot ſouls in righteous battle ſlain;
 Securely now the tuneful taſk renew,
 And nobleſt themes in deathleſs ſongs purſue.
 The Druids now, while arms are heard no more,
 Old mysteries and barbarous rites reſtore:
 A tribe who ſingular religion love,
 And haunt the lonely coverts of the grove.
 To theſe, and theſe of all mankind alone,
 'The gods are ſure reveal'd, or ſure unknown.
 If dying mortals doom they ſing aright,
 No ghoſts deſcend to dwell in dreadful night:
 No parting ſouls to griſly Pluto go,
 Nor ſeek the dreary ſilent ſhades below:
 But forth they fly immortal in their kind,
 And other bodies in new worlds they find.
 'Thus life for ever runs its endless race,
 And like a line, death but divides the ſpace,

A ſtop which can but for a moment laſt,
 A point between the future and the paſt.
 Thrice happy they beneath their northern ſkies,
 Who that worſt fear, the fear of death, deſpiſe;
 Hence they no cares for this frail being feel,
 But ruſh undaunted on the pointed ſteel;
 Provoke approaching fate, and bravely ſcorn
 To ſpare that life which muſt ſoon return.
 You too tow'rds Rome advance, ye warlike band,
 That wont the ſhaggy Cauci to withſtand;
 Whom once a better order did aſſign,
 To guard the paſſes of the German Rhine;
 Now from the fenceleſs banks you march away,
 And leave the world the fierce barbarians prey.

While thus the numerous troops, from every part,
 Aſſembling, raiſe their daring leader's heart;
 O'er Italy he takes his warlike way, [obey,
 The neighbouring towns his ſummons ſtraight
 And on their walls his enſigns high diſplay.]
 Meanwhile the buſy meſſenger of ill,
 Officiouſ ſame ſupplies new terror ſtill:
 A thouſand ſlaughters, and ten thouſand fears,
 She whiſpers in the trembling vulgar's ears.
 Now comes a frighted meſſenger, to tell
 Of ruins which the country round beſel;
 The foe to fair Mevania's walls is paſt,
 And lays Clitumnus' fruitful paſtures waſte;
 Where Nar's white waves with Tiber mingling
 fall,

Range the rough German and the rapid Gaul.
 But when himſelf, when Cæſar they would paint,
 The ſtronger image makes deſcription faint;
 No tongue can ſpeak with what amazing dread
 Wild thought preſents him at his army's head;
 Unlike the man familiar to their eyes,
 Horrid he ſeems, and of gigantic ſize:
 Unnumber'd eagles riſe amidſt his train,
 And millions ſeem to hide the crowded plain.
 Around him all the various nations join,
 Between the ſnowy Alps and diſtant Rhine.
 He draws the fierce barbarians from their home,
 With rage ſurpaſſing theirs he ſeems to come,
 And urge them on to ſpoil devoted Rome.
 Thus fear does half the work of lying fame,
 And towards thus their own miſfortunes frame;
 By their own feigning fancies are betray'd,
 And groan beneath thoſe ills themſelves have
 made.

Nor theſe alarms the crowd alone infeſt,
 But ran alike through every beating breaſt;
 With equal dread the grave patricians ſhook,
 Their ſeats abandon'd, and the court forſook.
 The ſcattering fathers quit the public care,
 And bid the conſuls for the war prepare.
 Reſolv'd on flight, yet ſtill unknowing where
 To fly from danger, or for aid repair,
 Haſty and headlong differing paths they tread,
 As blind impuſe and wild diſtraction lead;
 The crowd, a hurrying, heartleſs train, ſucceed.
 Who that the lamentable ſight beheld,
 The wretched fugitives that hid the field, [haſte
 Would not have thought the flames, with rapid Deſtroying wide, had laid their city waſte;
 Or groaning earth had ſhook beneath their feet,
 While threatening fabrics nodded o'er the ſtreet.
 By ſuch unthinking raſhneſs were they led;
 Such was the madneſs which their fears had bred,

if, of every other hope bereft,
 fly from Rome were all the safety left.
 When the stormy south is heard to roar,
 And rolls huge billows from the Libyan shore;
 When rending sails flit with the driving blast,
 And with a crash down comes the lofty mast;
 The coward master leaps from off the deck,
 And, hasty to despair, prevents the wreck;
 And though the bark unbroken hold her way,
 As trembling crew all plunge into the sea.
 Some doubtful thus they run to certain harms,
 And flying from the city rush to arms.
 Ten sons forfook their fires unnerv'd and old,
 For weeping wives their husbands could withhold;
 Each left his guardian Lares unador'd,
 Or with one parting prayer their aid implor'd:
 Some stop'd, or fighting turn'd for one last view,
 To bid the city of his birth adieu.
 The headlong crowd regardless urge their way,
 Though ev'n their gods and country ask their stay?
 And pleading nature beg them to delay.
 What means, ye gods! this changing in your
 doom?
 Truly you grant, but quickly you resume.
 What is the short-liv'd sovereignty you lend;
 The pile you raise you deign not to defend.
 Where, forsaken by her native bands,
 Shall desolate the once-great city stand!
 For whom her swarming citizens made proud,
 Here once the vanquish'd nations wont to crowd,
 Within the circuit of whose ample space
 An king might meet at once, and find a place;
 A wide defenceless desert now she lies,
 And yields herself the victor's easy prize.
 The camp intrench'd securest slumbers yields,
 Though hostile arms beset the neighbouring fields;
 The banks of earth the hasty soldier rears,
 And in the turfy wall forgets his fears:
 While, Rome, thy sons all tremble from afar,
 And scatter at the very name of war;
 Or on thy towers depend, nor rampart's height,
 Or trust their safety with thee for a night.
 Yet one excuse absolv'd the panic dread;
 The vulgar justly fear'd when Pompey fled.
 And, lest sweet hope might mitigate their woes,
 And expectation better times disclose,
 In every breast presaging terror fate,
 And threaten'd plain some yet more dismal fate.
 The gods declare their menaces around,
 Earth, air, and seas, in prodigies abound;
 Ten stars, unknown before, appear'd to burn,
 And foreign flames about the pole to turn;
 Numerous fires by night were seen to fly,
 And dart obliquely through the gloomy sky.
 When horrid comets shook their fatal hair,
 And bade proud royalty for change prepare:
 How dart swift lightnings through the azure clear,
 And meteors now in various forms appear:
 Some like the javelin shoot extended long,
 While some like spreading lamps in heaven are hung.
 And though no gathering clouds the day control,
 Through skies serene portentous thunders roll;
 And fierce blasting bolts from northern regions come,
 And aim their vengeance at imperial Rome.
 The stars, that twinkled in the lonely night,
 Now lift their bolder head in day's broad light.

VOL. XII.

The moon, in all her brother's beams array'd,
 Was blotted by the earth's approaching shade:
 The sun himself, in his meridian race,
 In sable darkness veil'd his brighter face:
 The trembling world beheld his fading ray,
 And mourn'd despairing for the loss of day.
 Such was he seen, when backward to the east
 He fled, abhorring dire Thyestes' feast.
 Sicilian Ætna then was heard to roar,
 While Mulciber let loose his fiery store;
 Nor rose the flames, but with a downward tide
 Tow'rd's Italy their burning torrent guide;
 Charybdis' dogs howl doleful o'er the flood,
 And all her whirling waves run red with blood;
 The vestal fire upon the altar dy'd,
 And o'er the sacrifice the flames divide;
 The parting points with double streams ascend,
 To show the Latian festivals must end:
 Such from the Theban brethren's pile arose,
 Signal of impious and immortal foes.
 With openings fast the gaping earth gave way,
 And in her inmost womb receiv'd the day.
 The swelling seas o'er lofty mountains flow,
 And nodding Alps shook off their ancient snow.
 Then wept the demi-gods of mortal birth,
 And sweating Lares trembled on the hearth:
 In temples then, recording stories tell,
 Untouch'd the sacred gifts and garlands fell.
 Then birds obscene, with inauspicious flight,
 And screaming dire, profan'd the hallow'd
 light.
 The savage kind forfook the desert wood,
 And in the streets disclos'd their horrid brood.
 Then speaking beasts with human sounds were
 heard,
 And monstrous births the teeming mothers fear'd.
 Among the crowd, religious fears disperse
 The faws of Sibyls, and foreboding verse.
 Bellona's priests, a barbarous frantic train,
 Whose mangled arms a thousand wounds disdain,
 Toss their wild locks, and, with a dismal yell,
 The wrathful gods and coming woes foretell.
 Lamenting ghosts amidst their ashes mourn,
 And groanings echo from the marble urn:
 The rattling clank of arms is heard around,
 And voices loud in lonely woods resound.
 Grim spectres everywhere affright the eye,
 Approaching slow, and pass with horror by.
 A fury fierce about the city walks,
 Hell-born, and horrible of size, she stalks:
 A flaming pine she brandishes in air,
 And hissing loud uplift her snaky hair:
 Where'er her round accurst the monster takes,
 The pale inhabitant his house forsakes.
 Such to Lycurgus was the phantom seen,
 Such the dire visions of the Theban queen;
 Such, at his cruel stepmother's command,
 Before Alcides, did Megæra stand:
 With dread, till then unknown, the hero shook,
 Though he had dar'd on hell's grim king to look.
 Amidst the deepest silence of the night,
 Shrill founding clarions animate the sight;
 The shouts of meeting armies seem to rise,
 And the loud battle shakes the gloomy skies.
 Dead Sylla in the Martian field ascends,
 And mischief's mighty as his own portends.
 Near Anio's stream old Marius rears his head,
 The hinds beheld his grisly form, and fled.

The state thus threaten'd, by old custom taught,
For counsel to the Tuscan prophets sought:
Of these the chief for learning fam'd, and age,
Aruns by name, a venerable sage,
At Luna liv'd; none better could descry
What bodes the lightning's journey through the sky;

Prefaging veins and fibres well he knew,
And omens read aright, from every wing that flew.
First he commands to burn the monstrous breed,
Sprung from mix'd species, and discordant seed;
Forbidden and accursed births, which come
Where nature's laws design'd a barren womb.
Next, the remaining trembling tribes he calls,
To pass with solemn rites about their walls,
In holy march to visit all around,
And with lustrations purge the utmost bound.
The sovereign priests the long procession lead,
Inferior orders in the train succeed,
Arur'd all duly in the Gabine weed.
There the chaste head of Vesta's choir appears,
A sacred fillet binds her reverend hairs;
To her, in sole pre-eminence, is due,
Phrygian Minerva's awful shrine to view.

Next the fifteen in order pass along,
Who guard the fatal Sibyl's secret song:
To Almon's stream Cybele's form they bear,
And wash the goddess each returning year.
The Titian brotherhood, the Argurs band,
Observing flights on the left lucky hand;
The seven ordain'd Jove's holy feast to deck;
The Sallii blithe, with bucklers on the neck;
All marching in their order just appear:
And last the generous Flamens close the rear.
While these through ways uncouth, and tire-some
ground,

Patient perform their long laborious round,
Aruns collects the marks of heaven's dread
flame;

In earth he hides them with religious hand,
Murmurs a prayer, then gives the place a name,
And bids the fix'd bidental hallow'd stand.
Next from the herd a chosen male is sought,
And seen before the ready altar brought.

And now the fear the sacrifice began,
The pouring wine upon the victim ran;
The mingled meal upon his brow was plac'd;
The crooked knife the destin'd line had trac'd;
When with reluctant rage th' impatient beast
The rites unpleasing to the god confest.
At length compell'd his stubborn head to bow,
Vanquish'd he yields him to the fatal blow;
The gushing veins no cheerful crimson pour,
But stain with poisonous black the sacred floor.
The paler prophet stood with horror struck;
Then with a hasty hand the entrails took,
And sought the angry gods again; but there
Prognostics worse, and sadder signs, appear;
The pallid guts with spots were marbled o'er,
With thin cold serum stain'd, and livid gore;
The liver wet with putrid streams he spy'd,
And veins that threaten'd on the hostile side:
Part of the heaving lungs is no where found,
And thinner films the fever'd entrails bound;
No usual motion stirs the panting heart;
The chinky vessels oze on every part;
The cawl, where wrapt the close intestines lie,
Betrays its dark recesses to the eye.

One prodigy superior threaten'd still,
The never-failing harbinger of ill:
Lo! by the fibrous liver's rising head,
A second rival prominence is spread;
All sunk and poor the friendly part appears,
And a pale, sickly, withering visage wears;
While high and full the adverse vessels ride,
And drive, impetuous, on their purple tide.
Amaz'd, the sage forelaw th' impending fate;
Ye gods! (he cry'd) forbid me to relate,
What woes on this devoted people wait;
Nor dost thou, Jove, in these our rites partake,
Nor smile propitious on the prayer we make;
The dreadful Stygian gods this victim claim,
And to our sacrifice the furies came,
The ills we fear command us to be dumb;
Yet somewhat worse than what we fear shall come.
But may the gods be gracious from on high,
Some better prosperous event supply,
Fibres may err, and augury may lie;
Arts may be false, by which our fires divin'd,
And Tages taught them, to abuse mankind;
Thus darkly he the prophecy exprest,
And riddling sung the double-dealing priest.

But Figulus exclaims (to science bred,
And in the gods mysterious secrets reed,
Whom nor Egyptian Memphis' sons excell'd,
Nor with more skill the rolling orbs beheld,
Well could he judge the labours of the sphere,
And calculate the just revolving year),
The stars (he cries) are in confusion hurl'd,
And wandering error quite misguides the world;
Or, if the laws of nature yet remain,
Some swift destruction now the fates ordain.
Shall earth's wide opening jaws for ruin call,
And sinking cities to the centre fall?
Shall raging drought infect the sultry sky?
Shall faithless art the promis'd crop deny?
Shall poisonous vapours o'er the waters brood,
And taint the limpid spring and silver flood?
Ye gods! what ruin does your wrath prepare!
Comes it from heaven, from earth, from seas, or
The lives of many to a period haste,
And thousands shall together breathe their last?
If Saturn's fullen beams were lifted high,
And baneful reign'd ascendant o'er the sky,
Then moist Aquarius deluges might rain,
And earth once more lie sunk beneath the main:
Or did thy glowing beams, O Phœbus, shine
Malignant in the Lion's scorching sign,
Wide o'er the world consuming fires might roll,
And heaven be seen to flane from pole to pole:
Through peaceful orbits these unangry glide,
But, God of Battles! what dost thou provide?
Who in the threatening Scorpion dost preside?
With potent wrath around thy influence streams,
And the whole monster kindles at thy beams:
While Jupiter's more gentle rays decline,
And Mercury with Venus faintly shine;
The wandering lights are darken'd all and gone,
And Mars now lords it o'er the heavens alone.
Orion's stary falchion blazing wide,
Refulgent glitters by his dreadful side.
War comes, and savage slaughter must abound,
The sword of violence shall right confound:
The blackest crimes fair virtue's name shall
wear,
And impious fury rage for many a year.

Yet ask not thou an end of arms, O Rome,
Thy peace must with a lordly master come.
Protract destruction, and defer thy chain,
The sword alone prevents the tyrant's reign,
And civil wars thy liberty maintain.

The heartless vulgar to the sage give heed,
New rising fears his words foreboding breed.
When, lo! more dreadful wonders strike their eyes,
For through the streets a Roman matron flies,
Mad as the Thracian dames that bound along,
And chant Lyæus in their frantic song:
Enthusiastic heavings swell'd her breast,
And thus her voice the Delphic god confess:

Where dost thou snatch me, Pæan! wherefore
bear

Through cloudy heights and tracts of pathless air?
I see Pangean mountains white with snow,
Æmeus and wide Philippi's fields below.

Say, Phœbus, wherefore does this fury rise?

What mean these spears and shields before my eyes?

I see the Roman battles crowd the plain!
I see the war, but seek the foe in vain.
Again I fly, I seek the rising day,
Where Nile's Egyptian waters take their way:
I see, I know upon the guilty shore,
The hero's headless trunk besmear'd with gore.
The Syrts and Libyan sands beneath me lie,
Thither Emathia's scatter'd relics fly.
Now o'er the cloudy Alps I stretch my flight,
And soar above Pyrene's airy height:
To Rome, my native Rome, I turn again,
And see the senate reeking with the slain.
Again the moving chiefs their arms prepare;
Again I follow through the world the war.
Oh, give me, Phœbus! give me to explore,
Some region new, some undiscover'd shore;
I saw Philippi's fatal fields before.

She said: the weary rage began to cease,
And left the fainting prophets in peace.

B O O K II.

THE ARGUMENT.

AMIDST the general consternation that foreran the civil war, the poet introduces an old man giving an account of the miseries that attended on that of Marius and Sylla; and comparing their present circumstances to those in which the commonwealth was when that former war broke out. Brutus consults with Cato, whether it were the duty of a private man to concern himself in the public troubles; to which Cato replies in the affirmative: Then follows his receiving Marcia again from the tomb of Hortensius. While Pompey goes to Capua, Cæsar makes himself master of the greatest part of Italy, and among the rest of Corfinium, where Domitius, the governor for Pompey, is seized by his garrison, and delivered to Cæsar, who pardons and dismisses him.

Pompey, in an oration to his army, makes a trial of their disposition to a general battle; but not finding it to answer his expectation, he sends his son to solicit the assistance of his friends and allies; then marches himself to Brundisium, where he is like to be shut up by Cæsar, and escapes at length with much difficulty.

Now manifest the wrath divine appear'd,
And nature through the world the war declar'd;
Seeming with monsters, sacred law she broke,
And dire events in all her works bespoke,
Thou Jove, who dost in heaven supremely reign,
Why does thy providence these signs ordain,
And give us presence to increase our pain!
Doubly we bear thy dread-inflicting doom,
And feel our miseries before they come.
Whether the great creating parent soul,
When first from Chaos rude he form'd the whole,
Dispos'd futurity with certain hand,
And bade the necessary causes stand;
Made one decree for ever to remain,
and bound himself in fate's eternal chain;
Or whether fickle fortune leads the dance,
Nothing is fix'd, but all things come by chance;
Whate'er thou shalt ordain, thou ruling power,
Unknown and sudden be the dreadful hour:
Let mortals to their future fate be blind,
and hope to relieve the miserable mind.

While thus the wretched citizens behold
What certain ills the faithful gods foretold;
Justice suspends her course in mournful Rome,
and all the noisy courts at once are dumb;

No honours shine in the distinguish'd weed,
No rods the purple magistratè precede:
A dismal silent sorrow spreads around,
No groan is heard, nor one complaining sound.
So when some generous youth resigns his breath,
And parting sinks in the last pangs of death;
With ghastly eyes, and many a lit-up hand,
Around his bed the still attendants stand;
No tongue as yet presumes his fate to tell,
Nor speaks aloud the solemn last farewell;
As yet the mother by her darling lies;
Nor breaks lamenting into frantic cries;
And though he stiffens in her fond embrace,
His eyes are set, and livid pale his face;
Horror a while prevents the swelling tear,
Nor is her passion grief, as yet, but fear;
In one fix'd posture motionless she keeps,
And wonders at her woe before she weeps.
The matrons sad, their rich attire lay by,
And to the temples madly crowding fly:
Some on the shrines their gushing sorrows pour,
Some dash their breasts against the marble floor,
Some on the sacred thresholds rend their hair,
And howling seek the gods with horrid
prayer.

Nor Jove receiv'd the wailing suppliants all,
 In various fancies on various powers they call.
 No altar then, no god was left alone;
 Unvex'd by some impatient parent's moan.
 Of these, one wretch her grief, above the rest,
 With visage torn, and mangled arms conceit.
 Ye mothers! beat (she cry'd) your bosoms now,
 Now tear the curling honours from your brow;
 The present hour ev'n all your tears demands,
 While doubtful fortune yet suspended stands.
 When one shall conquer, then for joy prepare,
 The victor chief, at least, shall end the war.
 Thus, from renew'd complaints they seek relief,
 And only find fresh causes out for grief.

The men too, as to different camps they go,
 Join their sad voices to the public woe;
 Impatient to the gods they raise their cry,
 And thus expostulate with those on high:

Oh hapless times! oh that we had been born,
 When Carthage made our vanquish'd country mourn!

Well had we then been number'd with the slain
 On Trebia's banks, or Cannæ's fatal plain.
 Nor ask we peace; ye powers, nor soft repose;
 Give us new wars, and multitudes of foes;
 Let every potent city arm for fight,
 And all the neighbour nations round unite;
 From Median Susa let the Parthians come,
 And Massagetes beyond their Ister roam;
 Let Elbe and Rhine's unconquer'd springs send forth

The yellow Suevi from the farthest north:
 Let the conspiring world in arms engage,
 And save us only from domestic rage.
 Here let the hostile Dacian inroads make,
 And there his way the Gete invader take:
 Let Cæsar in Iberia tame the foe;
 Let Pompey break the deadly eastern bow,
 And Rome no hand warm'd for battle know. }
 But if Hesperia stand condemn'd by fate,
 And ruin on our name and nation wait;
 Now dart thy thunder, dread almighty fire,
 Let all thy flaming heavens descend in fire;
 On chiefs and parties hurl thy bolts alike,
 And, ere their crimes have made them guilty,
 strike.

Is it a cause so worthy of our care,
 That power may fall to this, or that man's
 share?

Do we for this the gods and conscience brave,
 That one may rule, and make the rest a slave?
 When thus ev'n liberty we scarce should buy,
 But think a civil war a price too high.

Thus groan they at approaching dire events,
 And thus expiring pities lament.
 Meanwhile the hoary fire his years deploras,
 And age that former miseries restores:
 He hates his weary life prolong'd for woe,
 Worse days to see, more impious rage to know.
 Then fetching old examples from afar,
 'Twas thus (he cries) fate usher'd in the war:
 When Cimbrians fierce, and Libya's swarthy
 lord,

Had fall'n before triumphant Marius' sword;
 Yet to Minturnæ's marsh the victor fled,
 And hid in oozy flags his exil'd head.
 The faithless soil the hunted chief reliev'd,
 And sedge waters fortune's pledge receiv'd.

Deep in a dungeon plung'd at length he lay,
 Where gyves and rankling fetters eat their way,
 And noisome vapours on his vitals prey.
 Ordain'd at ease to die in wretched Rome,
 He suffer'd then, for wickedness to come.
 In vain his foes had arm'd the Cimbrian's hand,
 Death will not always wait upon command;
 About to strike, the slaves with horror shook.
 The useless steel his loosening gripe forsook;
 Thick flashing flames a light unusual gave,
 And sudden shone around the gloomy cave;
 Dreadful the gods of guilt before him stood,
 And Marius' terrible in future blood;
 When thus a voice began: Rash man forbear,
 Nor touch that head which fate resolves to spare
 Thousands are doom'd beneath his arm to bleed,
 And countless deaths before his own decreed;
 Thy wrath and purpose to destroy is vain:
 Would'st thou avenge thee for thy nation slain?
 Preserve this man; and in some coming day
 The Cimbrian slaughter well he shall repay.
 No pitying god, no power to mortals good,
 Could save a savage wretch who joy'd in blood:
 But fate reserv'd him to perform its doom,
 And be the minister of wrath to Rome.
 By swelling seas too favourably tost,
 Safely he reach'd Numidia's hostile coast;
 There, driven from man, to wilds he took his
 way;

And on the earth, where once he conquer'd, lay
 There in the lone unpeopled desert field,
 Proud Carthage in her ruins he beheld;
 Amidst her ashes pleas'd he sat him down,
 And joy'd in the destruction of the town.
 The genius of the place, with mutual hate,
 Rear'd its sad head, and smil'd at Marius' fate;
 Each with delight survey'd their fallen foe,
 And each forgave the gods, that laid the other low
 There with new fury was his soul possess'd,
 And Libyan rage collected in his breast.
 Soon as returning fortune own'd his cause,
 Troops of revolting bend-men forth he draws;
 Cut-throats and slaves resort to his command,
 And arms were given to every baser hand.
 None worthily the leader's standard bore,
 Unstain'd with blood or blackest crimes before:
 Villains of fame, to fill his bands, were sought,
 And to his camp increase of crimes they brought.
 Who can relate the horrors of that day,
 When first these walls became the victor's prey!
 With what a fride devouring slaughter pass,
 And swept promiscuous orders in her haste!
 O'er noble and plebeian rang'd the sword;
 Nor pity or remorse one pause afford.
 The sliding streets with blood were clotted o'er,
 And sacred temples stood in pools of gore.
 The ruthless steel, impatient of delay,
 Forbade the fire to linger out his day:
 It struck the bending father to the earth,
 And crott the wailing infant at his birth.
 (Can innocents the rage of parties know,
 And they who ne'er offended find a foe?)
 Age is no plea, and childhood no defence,
 To kill is all the murderer's pretence.
 Rage stays not to inquire who ought to die,
 Numbers must fall, no matter which, or why;
 Each in his hand a grievous visage bears,
 And as the trophy of his virtue wears,

Who wants a prize, straight rushes thro' the streets,
 And undistinguish'd mows the first he meets;
 The trembling crowd with fear officious strive,
 And those who kiss the tyrant's hand survive.
 Oh could you fall so low, degenerate race!
 And purchase safety at a price so base?
 What though the sword was master of your doom,
 Though Marius could have given you years to
 Can Romans live by infamy so mean? [come,
 But soon your changing fortune shifts the scene;
 Short is your date: you only live to mourn
 Your hopes deceiv'd, and Sylla's swift return.
 The vulgar falls, and none laments his fate,
 Sorrow has hardly leisure for the great.
 What teats could Bæbius' hasty death deplore!
 A thousand hands his mangled carcase tore;
 His scatter'd entrails round the streets were tost,
 And in a moment all the man was lost.
 Who wept, Antonius' murder to behold,
 Whose moving tongue the mischief oft foretold?
 Spite of his age and eloquence he bled;
 The barbarous soldier snatch'd his hoary head;
 Dropping he bore it to his joyful lord,
 And while he feasted plac'd it on the board.
 The Crassi both by Fimbria's hand were slain,
 And bleeding magistrates the pulpit stain.
 Then did the doom of that neglecting hand,
 Thy fate, O holy Scævola, command;
 In vain for succour to the gods he flies,
 The priest before the vestal altar dies:
 A feeble stream pour'd forth the exhausted fire,
 And spar'd to quench the everliving fire.
 The seventh returning faces now appear,
 And bring stern Marius' latest destin'd year:
 Thus the long toils of changing life o'erpass,
 Hoary and full of days he breath'd his last.
 While fortune frown'd, her fiercest wrath he bore,
 And while she smil'd enjoy'd her amplest power:
 All various turns of good and bad he knew,
 And prov'd the most that chance or fate could do.
 What heaps of slain the Colline gate did yield!
 What bodies strew'd the Sacriportan field,
 When empire was ordain'd to change her seat,
 To leave her Rome, and make Præneste great!
 When the proud Samnite's troops the state defy'd,
 In terms beyond their Caudine treaty's pride.
 Nor Sylla with less cruelty returns,
 With equal rage the fierce avenger burns:
 What blood the fæble city yet retain'd,
 With too severe a healing hand he drain'd!
 Too deeply was the searching steel employ'd,
 What maladies had hurt, the leach destroy'd.
 The guilty only were of life bereft:
 Alas! the guilty only then were left.
 Diffembled hate and rancour rang'd at will,
 All as they pleas'd took liberty to kill;
 And while revenge no longer fear'd the laws,
 Each private murder was the public cause.
 The leader bade destroy: and at the word,
 The master fell beneath the servant's sword.
 Brothers on brothers were for gifts bestow'd,
 And sons contended for their father's blood.
 For refuge some to caves and forests fled;
 Some to the lonely mansions of the dead;
 Some, to prevent the cruel victor, die;
 These strangled hang from fatal beams on high;
 While those, from tops of lofty turrets thrown,
 Came headlong on the dashing pavement down.

Some for their funerals the wood prepare,
 And build the sacred pile with hasty care:
 Then bleeding to the kindling flames they press,
 And Roman rites, while yet they may, possess.
 Pale heads of Marian chiefs are borne on high,
 And heap'd together in the forum lie;
 There join the meeting slaughters of the town,
 There each performing villain's deeds are known.
 No sight like this the Thracian stables knew,
 Antæus' Libyan spoils to these were few:
 Nor Greece beheld so many suitors fall,
 To grace the Pisan tyrant's horrid hall.
 At length, when putrid gore, with foul disgrace,
 Hid the distinguish'd features of the face,
 By night the miserable parents came,
 And bore their sons to some forbid'n flame.
 Well I remember, in that woful reign,
 How I my brother sought among the slain;
 Hopeful by stealth his poor remains to burn,
 And close his ashes in a peaceful urn;
 His visage in my trembling hand I bore,
 And turn'd pacific Sylla's trophies o'er;
 Full many a mangled trunk I try'd, to see
 Which carcase with the head would best agree.
 Why should my grief to Catulus return,
 And tell the victim offer'd at his urn?
 When, struck with horror, the relenting shade
 Beheld his wrongs too cruelly repaid?
 I saw where Marius' hapless brother stood,
 With limbs all torn, and cover'd o'er with blood;
 A thousand gaping wounds increas'd his pain,
 While weary life a passage fought in vain;
 That mercy still his ruthless foes deny,
 And, whom they mean to kill, forbid to die.
 This from the wrist the suppliant hands divides,
 That hews his arms from off his naked sides;
 One crops his breathing nostrils, one his ears,
 While from the roots his tongue another tears;
 Panting a while upon the earth it lies,
 And with mute motion trembles ere it dies:
 Last, from the sacred caverns where they lay,
 The bleeding orbs of sight are rent away
 Can late posterity believe, when'er
 This tale of Marius and his foes they hear,
 They could inflict so much, or he could bear?
 Such is the broken carcase seen to lie,
 Cras'd by some tumbling turret from on high;
 Such to the shore the shipwreck'd corse is borne,
 By rending rocks and greedy monsters torn.
 Mistaken rage! thus mangling to disgrace,
 And blot the lines of Marius' hated face!
 What joy can Sylla take, unless he know
 And mark the features of his dying foe?
 Fortune beheld, from her Prænestine fane,
 Her helpless worshippers around her slain:
 One hour of fate was common to them all,
 And like one man she saw a people fall.
 I then dy'd the lusty youth in manly bloom,
 Hesperia's flower, and hope for times to come;
 Their blood, Rome's only strength, dainties the fold,
 Ordain'd th' assembling centuries to hold.
 Numbers have oft been known, on sea and land,
 To sink of old by death's destructive hand;
 Battles with multitudes have thrown the plain,
 And many perish on the stormy main:
 Earthquakes destroy, malignant vapours blast,
 And plagues and famines lay whole nations waste;

But justice, sure, was never seen, till now,
 To massacre her thousands at a blow.
 Satiety of death the victors prove,
 And slowly through th' encumbering ruin move:
 So many fall, there scarce is room for more,
 The dying nod on those who fell before;
 Crowding in heaps their murderers they aid,
 And, by the dead, the living are o'erlaid.
 Meanwhile the stern dictator, from on high,
 Beholds the slaughter with a fearless eye;
 Nor sighs to think his dread commands ordain
 So many thousand wretches to be slain.
 Amidst the Tiber's waves the load is thrown,
 The torrent rolls the guilty burden down;
 Till rising mounds obstruct his watery way,
 And carcasses their gliding vessels stay.
 But soon another stream to aid him rose,
 Swift o'er the fields a crimson deluge flows:
 The Tuscian river swells above his shores,
 And floating bodies to the land restores:
 Struggling at length he drives his rushing flood,
 And dyes the Tyrrhene ocean round with blood.
 Could deeds like these the glorious style demand
 Of prosperous, and favour of the land?
 Could this renown, could these achievements build
 A tomb for Sylla in the Martian field?
 Again behold the circling woes return,
 Again the curse of civil wars we mourn;
 Battles and blood, and vengeance shall succeed,
 And Rome once more by Roman hands shall bleed.
 Or if, for hourly thus our fears preface, <sup>[rage,</sup>
 With wrath more fierce the present chiefs shall Mankind shall some unheard-of plagues deplore,
 And groan for miseries unknown before.
 Marius an end of exile only sought;
 Sylla to crush a hated faction fought;
 A larger reconence these leaders claim,
 And higher is their vast ambition's aim:
 Could these be satisfied with Sylla's power;
 Nor, all he had possessing, ask for more;
 Neither had force and impious arms employed,
 Or fought for that which guiltless each enjoy'd.
 Thus wept lamenting age o'er hapless Rome, Remembering evils past, and dreading those to
 come.

But Brutus' temper fail'd not with the rest,
 Nor with the common weakness was oppress'd;
 Safe and in peace he kept his manly breast.
 'Twas when the solemn dead of night came on,
 When bright Calisto with her shining son
 Now half their circle round the pole had run;
 When Brutus, on the busy times intent,
 To virtuous Cato's humble dwelling went.
 Waking he found him, careful for the state,
 Grieving and fearing for his country's fate;
 For Rome, and wretched Rome, along he fear'd;
 Secure within himself, and for the worst prepar'd.

To him thus Brutus spoke: O thou, to whom Forsaken virtue flies, as to her home,
 Driv'n out, and by an impious age oppress'd,
 She finds no room on earth but Cato's breast;
 There, in her one good man, she reigns secure;
 Fearless of vice, or fortune's hostile power.
 Then teach my soul, to doubt and error prone,
 Teach me a resolution like thy own.
 Let partial favour, hopes, or interest guide,
 By various motives, all the world beside,
 To Pompey's, or ambitious Cæsar's side;

Thou, Cato, art my leader. Whether peace
 And calm repose amidst these storms shall please:
 Or whether war thy ardour shall engage,
 To gratify the madness of this age,
 Herd with the factious chiefs, and urge the people's rage.

The ruffian, bankrupt, loose adulterer,
 All who the power of laws and justice fear,
 From guilt learn specious reasons for the war.
 By starving want and wickedness prepar'd,
 Wisely they arm for safety and reward. <sup>[find?</sup>
 But, oh! what cause, what reason, canst thou
 Art thou to arms for love of arms inclin'd?
 Hast thou the manners of this age withstood,
 And for so many years been singly good,
 To be repay'd with civil wars and blood?
 Let those to vice inur'd for arms prepare,
 In thee 'twill be impiety to dare;
 Preserve at least, ye gods, these hands from war.
 Nor do thou meanly with the rabble join,
 Nor grace their cause with such an arm as thine.
 To thee, the fortune of the fatal field
 Inclining, un auspicious fame shall yield;
 Each to thy sword should press, and wish to be Imputed as thy crime, and charg'd on thee.
 Happy thou wert, if with retirement blest,
 Which noise and faction never should molest,
 Nor break the sacred quiet of thy breast;
 Where harmony and order ne'er should cease,
 But every day should take its turn in peace.
 So, in eternal steady motion, roll
 The radiant spheres around the stary pole:
 Fierce lightnings, meteors, and the winter's storm,
 Earth and the face of lower heav'n deform,
 Whilst all by nature's laws is calm above;
 No tempest rages in the court of Jove.
 Light particles and idle atoms fly,
 Toss'd by the winds, and scatter'd round the sky,
 While the more solid parts the force resist,
 And fix'd and stable on the centre rest.
 Cæsar shall hear with joy, that thou art join'd
 With fighting factions, to disturb mankind:
 Though sworn his foe, he shall applaud thy choice,
 And think his wicked war approv'd by Cato's
 voice.

See! how to swell their mighty leader's state
 The consuls and the servile senate wait:
 Ev'n Cato's self to Pompey's yoke must bow,
 And all mankind are slaves but Cæsar now.
 If war, however, be at last our doom,
 If we must arm for liberty and Rome:
 While undecided yet their fate depends,
 Cæsar and Pompey are alike my friends;
 Which party I shall choose, is yet to know,
 That let the war decide; who conquers is my foe.

Thus spoke the youth. When Cato thus express'd
 The sacred counsels of his inmost breast:
 Brutus! with thee, I own the crime is great;
 With thee, this impious civil war I hate;
 But virtue blindly follows, led by fate.
 Answer yourselves, ye gods, and set me free;
 If I am guilty, 'tis by your decree.
 If yon fair lamps above should lose their light,
 And leave the wretched world in endless night;
 If chaos should in heaven and earth prevail,
 And universal nature's frame should fail:
 What Stoic would not the misfortune share,
 And think that desolation worth his care?

inces and nations whom wide seas divide,
 here other stars far distant heavens do guide,
 we brought their ensigus to the Roman side, forbid it, gods! when barbarous Scythians come from their cold north, to prop declining Rome, at I should see her fall, and sit secure at home.
 some unhappy fire by death undone,
 ob'd of his age's joy, his only son,
 tends the funeral with pious care,
 to pay his last paternal office there;
 makes a sad pleasure in the crowd to go,
 to be himself part of the pompous woe;
 when waits till every ceremony past,
 his own fond hand may light the pile at last.
 fix'd, so faithful to thy cause, O Rome,
 with such a constancy and love I come,
 resolv'd for thee and liberty to mourn,
 and never! never from your sides be torn;
 resolv'd to follow still your common fate,
 and on your very names, and last remains to wait.
 thus let it be, since thus the gods ordain;
 see hecatombs of Romans must be slain,
 to list the sacrifice with every hand,
 and give them all the slaughter they demand.
 were the gods contented with my fall,
 Cato's life could answer for you all,
 to see the devoted Decius would I go,
 to force from either side the mortal blow,
 and for my country's sake wish to be thought her foe.
 me, ye Romans, all your rage confine,
 me, ye nations from the barbarous Rhine,
 to all the wounds this war shall make be mine.
 on my vital streams, and let them run,
 to let the purple sacrifice atone for all the ills offending Rome has done.
 slavery be all the faction's end,
 to chain the prize for which the fools contend,
 to me convert the war, let me be slain;
 to, only me, who fondly strive, in vain,
 for useles laws and freedom to maintain:
 may the tyrant safely mount his throne,
 and rule his slaves in peace, when I am gone.
 we'er, since free as yet from his command,
 to Pompey and the commonwealth we stand.
 to her, if fortune should attend his arms,
 to roe against ambition's fatal charms;
 to, urg'd with greatness, and desire of sway,
 to, y dare to make the vanquish'd world his prey.
 to, en, lest the hopes of empire swell his pride,
 to, to him remember I was on his side;
 to, to think he conquer'd for himself alone,
 to, to make the harvest of the war his own,
 to, were half the toil was ours. So spake the sage.
 to, to words the listening eager youth engage to, to so much to love of arms, and heat of civil rage.
 to, Now 'gan the sun to lift his dawning light,
 to, to fore him fled the colder shades of night;
 to, to then lo! the sounding doors are heard to turn,
 to, to haste Martia comes from dead Hortensius' urn.
 to, to cease to a better husband's happier bed,
 to, to with bridal rites, a virgin was she led:
 to, to then, every debt of love and duty paid,
 to, to and thrice a parent by Lucina made,
 to, to the teeming matron, at her lord's command,
 to, to glad Hortensius gave her plighted hand;
 to, to with a fair stock his barren house to grace;
 to, to and mingle by the mother's side the race.

At length this husband in his ashes laid,
 And every rite of due religion paid,
 Forth from his monument the mournful dame,
 With beaten breasts, and locks dishevell'd, came:
 Then with a pale dejected rueful look,
 Thus pleasing, to her former lord she spoke:
 While nature yet with vigour fed my veins,
 And made me equal to a mother's pains,
 To thee obedient, I thy house forsook,
 And to my arms another husband took:
 My powers at length with genial labours worn,
 Weary to thee, and wasted, I return.
 At length a barren wedlock let me prove,
 Give me the name, without the joys of love;
 No more to be abandon'd, let me come,
 That Cato's wife may live upon my tomb.
 So shall my truth to latest times be read,
 And none shall ask if guiltily I fled,
 Or thy command estrang'd me from thy bed.
 Nor ask I now thy happiness to share,
 I seek thy days of toil, thy nights of care:
 Give me, with thee, to meet my country's foe,
 Thy weary marches and thy camps to know;
 Nor let posterity with shame record,
 Cornelia follow'd, Martia left her lord.
 She said: The hero's manly heart was mov'd,
 And the chaste matron's virtuous suit approv'd.
 And though the times far differing thoughts demand,
 Though war differs from Hymen's holy band;
 In plain unsolemn wife his faith he plights,
 And calls the gods to view the lonely rites.
 Nor garlands gay the cheerful portal crown'd,
 Nor woolly fillets wove the posts around;
 No genial bed with rich embroidery grac'd,
 On ivory steps in lofty state was plac'd;
 No Hymeneal torch preceding shone,
 No matron put the towery frontlet on,
 Nor bade her feet the sacred threshold shun.
 No yellow veil was loosely thrown to hide
 The rising blushes of the trembling bride;
 No glittering zone her flowing garments bound,
 Nor sparkling gems her neck encompass'd round;
 No silken scarf, nor decent winding lawn,
 Was o'er her naked arms and shoulders drawn:
 But, as she was, in funeral attire,
 With all the sadness sorrow could inspire,
 With eyes dejected, with a joyless face,
 She met her husband's, like a son's embrace.
 No Sabine mirth provokes the bridegroom's ears,
 Nor sprightly wit the glad assembly cheers.
 No friends, not ev'n their children grace the feast,
 Brutus attends, their only nuptial guest:
 He stands a witness of the silent rite,
 And sees the melancholy pair unite.
 Nor he, the chief, his sacred visage cheer'd,
 Nor smooth'd his matted locks, or horrid beard;
 Nor deigns his heart one thought of joy to know,
 But met his Martia with the same stern brow.
 (For when he saw the fatal factions arm,
 The coming war, and Rome's impending harm;
 Regardless quite of every other care,
 Unharm he left his loose neglected hair;
 Rude hung the hoary honours of his head,
 And a foul growth his mournful cheeks o'er-spread,
 No stings of private hate his peace infest,
 Nor partial favour grew upon his breast:

But, safe from prejudice, he kept his mind
 Free, and at leisure to lament mankind).
 Nor could his former love's returning fire,
 The warmth of one connubial wish inspire,
 But strongly he withstood the just desire.
 These were the stricter manners of the man,
 And this the stubborn course in which they ran;
 The golden mean unchanging to pursue,
 Constant to keep the purpos'd end in view;
 Religiously to follow nature's laws,
 And die with pleasure in his country's cause,
 To think he was not for himself design'd,
 But born to be of use to all mankind.
 To him 'twas feasting, hunger to repress;
 And home-spun garments were his costly dress:
 No marble pillars rear'd his roof on high,
 'Twas warm, and kept him from the winter sky:
 He sought no end of marriage, but increase,
 Nor wish'd a pleasure, but his country's peace:
 That took up all the tenderest parts of life,
 His country was his children and his wife.
 From justice's righteous lore he never swerv'd,
 But rigidly his honesty preserv'd.
 On universal good his thoughts were bent,
 Nor knew what gain, or self-affection meant;
 And while his benefits the public share,
 Cato was always last in Cato's care.

Meantime, the trembling troops, by Pompey led,
 Hasty to Phrygian Capua were fled.
 Resolving here to fix the moving war,
 He calls his scatter'd legions from afar;
 Here he decrees the daring foe to wait,
 And prove at once the great event of fate;
 Where Apennine's delightful shades arise,
 And lift Hesperia lofty to the skies.
 Between the higher and inferior sea,
 The long extended mountain takes his way;
 Pisa and Ancon bound his sloping sides,
 Wash'd by the Tyrrhene and Dalmatic tides;
 Rich in the treasure of his watery stores,
 A thousand living springs and streams he pours,
 And seeks the different seas by different shores.
 From his left falls Crustumium's rapid flood,
 And swift Metaures red with Punic blood;
 There gentle Sapis with Isaurus joins,
 And Sena there the Senones confines;
 Rough Ausidus the meeting ocean braves,
 And lashes on the lazy Adria's waves;
 Hence vast Eridanus with matchless force,
 Prince of the streams, directs his regal course;
 Proud with the spoils of fields and woods he flows,
 And drains Hesperia's rivers as he goes.
 His sacred banks, in ancient tales renown'd,
 First by the spreading poplar's shade were crown'd:
 When the sun's fiery steeds forsook their way,
 And downward drev to earth the burning day:
 When every flood and ample lake was dry,
 The Po alone his channel could supply.
 Hither rash Phaeton was headlong driven,
 And in these waters quench'd the flames of heaven.

Nor wealthy Nile a fuller stream contains,
 Though wide he spreads o'er Ægypt's flatter
 Nor Ister rolls a larger torrent down, [plains;
 Sought he the sea with waters all his own;
 But meeting floods to him their homage pay,
 And leave the blendid river on his way.

These from the left; while from the right the
 The Rutuba and Tiber dear to Rome; [con
 Hence slides Vulturinus' swift descending flood,
 And Sarnus hid beneath his misty cloud;
 Thence Lyris, whom the Vestin fountains aid,
 Winds to the sea through close Marica's shade;
 Thence Siler through Salernian pastures falls,
 And shallow Macra creeps by Luna's walls.
 Bordering on Gaul the loftiest ridges rise,
 And the low Alps from cloudy heights despise:
 Thence his long back the fruitful mountain bow
 Beneath the Umbrian and the Sabine ploughs;
 The race primæval, natives all of old,
 His woody rocks within their circuit hold;
 Far as Hesperia's utmost limits pass,
 The hilly father runs his mighty mass;
 Where Juno rears her high Lacinian fane,
 And Scylla's raging dogs molest the main.
 Once, farther yet ('tis said) his way he took Till through his side the seas conspiring broke;
 And still we see on fair Sicilia's sands
 Where, part of Apennine, Pelorus stands.

But Cæsar for destruction eager burns,
 Free passages and bloodless ways he scorns;
 In fierce conflicting fields his arms delight,
 He joys to be oppos'd, to prove his might,
 Resolute through the widening breach to go,
 To burst the gate, to lay the bulwark low,
 To burn the villages, to waste the plains,
 And massacre the poor laborious swains.
 Abhorring law, he chooses to offend,
 And blushes to be thought his country's friend.
 The Latian cities now, with busy care,
 As various they inclin'd, for arms prepare.
 Though doom'd before the war's first rage to yield
 Trenches they dig, and ruin'd walls rebuild;
 Huge stone and darts their lofty towers supply,
 And guarded bulwarks menace from on high.
 To Pompey's part the prouder people lean,
 Though Cæsar's stronger terrors stand between.
 So when the blasts of sounding Auster blow,
 The waves obedient to his empire flow;
 And though the stormy god fierce Eurus frees,
 And sends him rushing cross the swelling seas;
 Spite of his force, the billows yet retain
 Their former course, and that way roll the main.
 The lighter clouds with Eurus driving sweep,
 While Auster still commands the watery deep.
 Still fear too sure o'er vulgar minds prevails,
 And faith before successful fortune fails.
 Etruria vainly trusts in Libo's aid,
 And Umbria by Thermus is betray'd;
 Sylla, unmindful of his father's fame,
 Fleed at the dreadful sound of Cæsar's name.
 Soon as the horse near Auximon appear,
 Retreating Varus owns his abject fear,
 And with a coward's haste neglects his rear;
 On flight alone intent, without delay,
 Though rocks and devious woods he wings his way
 Th' Eiculean fortress Lentulus forsakes,
 A swift pursuit the speedy victor makes;
 All arts of threats and promises apply'd,
 He wins the faithless cohorts to his side.
 The leader with his ensigns fled alone,
 So Cæsar fell the soldier, and the town.
 How, Scipio, too doist for retreat prepare,
 I thou leav'st Luceria, trusted to thy care;

ough troops well try'd attend on thy command,
 he Roman power can boast no braver band)
 'gainst the hardy Parthians were they sent;
 t their first chief the legion now obeys,
 d Pompey thus the Gallic lofs repays;
 l to his foe too freely he affords,
 d lends his hostile father Roman swords.
 But in Corfinium bold Domitius lies,
 d from his walls th' advancing power desies;
 cure of heart, for all events prepar'd,
 heads the troops once bloody Milo's guard.
 on as he sees the cloudy dust arise,
 d glittering arms reflect the sunny skies:
 ay, companions of my arms! he cry'd,
 d haste to guard the river's sedge side:
 eak down the bridge. And thou that dwell'st
 below,
 ou watery god, let all thy fountains go, d rushing bid thy foamy torrent flow;
 ell to the utmost brink thy rapid stream,
 ar down the planks, and every floating beam;
 on thy banks the ling'ring war delay,
 re let the headlong chief be taught to stay;
 s victory to stop the victor's way.
 He ceas'd; and, shooting swiftly cross the plain,
 ew down the soldier to the flood in vain.
 r Caesar early from the neighbouring field,
 e purpose to obstruct his march beheld:
 nilling to wrath, oh basest fear! (he cries)
 o whom nor towers, nor sheltering walls suffice,
 e these your coward stratagemis of war?
 pe you with brooks my conquering arms to bar?
 hat Nile and Ister should my way control,
 ough swelling Ganges should to guard you roll,
 hat streams, what floods foe'er athwart me fall,
 ho pass'd the Rubicon shall pass them all.
 iste to the passage then, my friends. He said;
 'r'ist as a storm the nimble horie obey'd;
 ross the stream their deadly darts they throw,
 d from their station drive the yielding foe:
 id victors at their ease the ford explore,
 id pass the undefended river o'er.
 ie vanquish'd to Corfinium's strength retreat,
 here warlike engines round the ramparts threat.
 oie to the wall the creeping vinea lies,
 id mighty towers in dread approaches rise.
 But see the stain of war! the soldier's shame!
 id vile dishonour of the Latian name!
 ie faithless garrison betray the town,
 id captive drag their valiant leader down.
 ie noble Roman, tearless, though in bands,
 fore his haughty fellow-subject stands,
 ith looks erect, and with a daring brow,
 each he provokes, and courts the fatal blow:
 u Caesar's arts his inmost thoughts descry,
 is fear of pardon, and desire to die.
 om me thy forfeit life (he said) receive,
 nd, though repining, by my bounty live;
 ha all, by thy example taught, may know,
 ow Caesar's mercy treats a vanquish'd foe:
 ill arm against me, keep thy hatred still,
 nd if thou conquer it, nie thy conquest, kill.
 eturns of love, or favour, seek I none;
 or give thy life to bargain for my own.
 o saying, on the instant he commands
 o looke the galling letters from his hands.

Oh fortune! better were it, he had dy'd,
 And spar'd the Roman shame, and Cæsar's pride.
 What greater grief can on a Roman seize,
 Than to be forc'd to live on terms like these!
 To be forgiven fighting for the laws,
 And need a pardon in his country's cause!
 Struggling with rage, undaunted he repress't
 The swelling passions in his labouring breast;
 Thus murmuring to himself: wilt thou to Rome,
 Base as thou art, and seek thy lazy home?
 To war, to battle, to destruction fly,
 And haite, as it becomes thee well, to die;
 Provoke the worst effects of deadly strife,
 And rid thee of this Cæsar's gift, this life.

Meanwhile, unknowing of the captivated chief,
 Pompey prepares to march to his relief.
 He means the scattering forces to unite,
 And with increase of strength expect the fight.
 Resolving with the following sun to move,
 First he decrees the soldier's heart to prove:
 Then into words like these, rever'd, he broke,
 The silent legions listening while he spoke:

Ye brave avengers of your country's wrong,
 You who to Rome and liberty belong;
 Whose breasts our fathers virtue truly warms,
 Whose hands the senate's sacred order arms;
 With cheerful ardour meet the coming fight,
 And pray the gods to smile upon the right.
 Behold the mournful view Hesperia yields,
 Her flaming villages and wasted fields!
 See where the Gauls a dreadful deluge flow,
 And scorn the boundaries of Alpine snow.
 Already Cæsar's sword is stain'd in blood,
 Be that, ye gods, to us an omen good;
 That glory still be his peculiar care,
 Let him begin, while we sustain the war.
 Yet call it not a war to which we go;
 We seek a malefactor, not a foe;
 Rome's awful injur'd majesty demands
 The punishment of traitors at our hands.
 If this be war, then war was wag'd of old,
 By curst Cethegus, Cataline the bold,
 By ev'ry villain's hand who durst conspire
 In murder, robbery, or midnight fire.
 Oh wretched rage! thee, Cæsar, fate design'd
 To rank amongst the patrons of mankind;
 With brave Camillus to enroll thy fame,
 And mix thee with the great Metelli's name:
 While to the Cinna's thy fierce soul inclines,
 And with the slaughter loving Marii joins.
 Since then thy crimes, like theirs, for justice call,
 Beneath our axe's vengeance shalt thou fall:
 Thee rebel Carbo's sentence, thee the fate
 Of Lepidus and bold Sertorius wait.
 Believe me yet (if yet I am believ'd),
 My heart is at the talk unpleasing griev'd:
 I mourn to think that Pompey's hand was chose,
 His Julia's hostile father to oppose,
 And mark thee down amongst the Roman foes. }
 O that, return'd in safety from the east,
 This province victor Crassus had possess't;
 New honours to his name thou might'st afford,
 And die like Spartacus beneath his sword:
 Like him had fall'n a victim to the laws,
 The same th' avenger, and the same the cause.
 But since the gods do otherwise decree,
 And give thee, as my lateft palm, to me;

Again my veins confess the fervent juice,
 Nor has my hand forgot the javelin's use.
 And thou shalt learn, that those who humbly know
 To peace and just authority to bow,
 Can, when their country's cause demands their care,
 Resume their ardour, and return to war.
 But let him think my former vigour fled;
 Distrust not, you, your general's hoary head;
 The marks of age and long declining years,
 Which I your leader, his whole army wears:
 Age still is fit to counsel, or command,
 But faulters in an unperforming hand.
 Whate'er superior power a people free
 Could to their fellow-citizens decree,
 All lawful glories have my fortunes known,
 And reach'd all heights of greatness but a crown;
 Who to be more, than Pompey was, desires,
 To kingly rule, and tyranny aspires.
 Amidst my ranks, a venerable band,
 The conscript fathers and the consuls stand.
 And shall the senate and the vanquish'd state
 Upon victorious Cæsar's triumph wait?
 Forbid it, gods, in honour of mankind!
 Fortune is not so shameless, nor so blind.
 What fame-atchiev'd, what unexampled praise,
 To these high hopes the daring hero raise?
 Is it his age of war, for trophies calls
 His two whole years spent on the rebel Gauls?
 Is it the hostile Rhine forsook with haste?
 Is it the shoaly channel which he past,
 That ocean huge he talks of? does he boast
 His sight on Britain's new-discover'd coast?
 Perhaps abandon'd Rome new pride supplies,
 He views the naked town with joyful eyes,
 While from his rage an armed people flies. }
 But know, vain man, no Roman fled from thee;
 They left their walls, 'tis true; but 'twas to follow me,
 Me, who ere twice the moon her orb renew'd,
 The pirates formidable fleet subdu'd:
 Soon as the sea my shining ensigns bore,
 Vanquish'd they fled, and fought the safer shore;
 Humbly content their forsook lives to save,
 And take the narrow lot my bounty gave.
 By me the mighty Mithridates chas'd
 Through all the windings of his Pontus pass'd.
 He who the fate of Rome delay'd so long,
 While in suspense uncertain empire hung;
 He who to Sylla's fortune scorn'd to yield,
 To my prevailing arms resign'd the field:
 Driv'n out at length, and press'd where'er he fled,
 He fought a grave to hide his vanquish'd head.
 O'er the wide world my various trophies rise,
 Beneath the vast extent of distant skies;
 Me the cold Bear, the northern climates know,
 And Phæis' waters through my conquests flow;
 My deeds in Egypt and Syene live,
 Where high meridian lines no shadow give.
 Hesperian Bætis my commands obeys,
 Who rolls remote to seek the western seas.
 By me the captive Arabs hands were bound,
 And Colchians for their ravish'd fleece renown'd;
 O'er Asia wide my conquering ensigns spread,
 Armenia me, and lofty Taurus dread;
 To me submit Cilicia's warlike powers,
 And proud Sophene veils her wealthy towers:

The Jews I tam'd, who with religion bow
 To some mysterious name, which none beside them know.

Is there a land, to sum up all at last,
 Through which my arms with conquest have not pass'd?

The world, by me, the world is overcome,
 And Cæsar finds no enemy but Rome.

He said. The crowd in dull suspension hung,
 Nor with applauding acclamations rung;
 No cheerful ardour waves the lifted hand,
 Nor military cries the fight demand.
 The chief perceiv'd the soldier's fire to fail,
 And Cæsar's fame forerunning to prevail;
 His eagles he withdraws with timely care,
 Nor truits Rome's fates to such uncertain war.
 As when, with fury stung and jealous rage,
 Two mighty bulls for sovereignty engage;
 The vanquish'd far to banishment removes,
 To lonely fields and unfrequented groves;
 There, for a while, with conscious shame he
 burns,

And tries on every tree his angry horns:
 But when his former vigour stands confess'd,
 And larger muscles shake his ample breast,
 With better chance he seeks the fight again,
 And drives his rival bellowing o'er the plain;
 Then uncontroll'd the subject herd he leads,
 And reigns the master of the fruitful meads.
 Unequal thus to Cæsar, Pompey yields.
 The fair dominion of Hesperia's fields:
 Swift through Apulia march his flying powers,
 And seek the safety of Brundisium's towers.
 This city a Dictæan people hold,
 Here plac'd by tall Athenian barks of old;
 When with false omens from the Cretan shore,
 Their sable sails victorious Theseus bore.
 Here Italy a narrow length extends,
 And in a scanty slip projected ends.
 A crooked mole around the waves the winds,
 And in her folds the Adriatic binds.
 Nor yet the bending shores could form a bay,
 Did not a barrier isle the winds delay, }
 And breaks the seas tempestuous in their way.
 Huge mounds of rocks are plac'd by Nature's
 hand,

To guard around the hospitable strand;
 'To turn the storm, repulse the rushing tide,
 And bid the anchoring bark securely ride.
 Hence Nereus wide the liquid main displays,
 And spreads to various ports his watery ways;
 Whether the pilot from Corcyra stand,
 Or for Illyrian Epidamnus' strand.
 Hither when all the Adriatic roars,
 And thundering billows vex the double shores;
 When sable clouds around the welkin spread,
 And frowning storms involve Cæraunia's head;
 When white with froth Calabrian Sæon lies,
 Hither the tempest-beaten vessel flies.
 Now Pompey, on Hesperia's utmost coast
 Sadly survey'd how all behind was lost;
 Nor to Iberia could he force his way;
 Long interposing Alps his passage stay.
 At length amongst the pledges of his bed,
 He chose his eldest-born; and thus he said:
 Haste thee, my son! to every distant land,
 And bid the nations rouse at my command!

Where fam'd Euphrates flows, or where the Nile
 Where muddy waves improves the fattening soil;
 Where'er diffus'd by victory and fame,
 The father's arms have borne the Roman name.
 Bid he the Cilician quit the shore again,
 Or stretch the swelling canvas on the main:
 Bid Ptolemy with my Tigranes come,
 Or bold Pharnaces lend his aid to Rome,
 Though each Armenia spread the loud alarm,
 Or bid the cold Riphean mountains arm.
 Poles and Scythia's wandering tribes explore,
 The Euxine and Mæotis' icy shore;
 Where heavy-loaded wains slow journeys take,
 Or print with groaning wheels the frozen lake.
 But wherefore should my words delay thy haste?
 Scier my wars around through all the east.
 Summon the vanquish'd world to share my fate,
 Ad let my triumphs on my ensigns wait.
 Buyon whose names the Roman annals bear,
 Yet who distinguish the revolving year;
 Ye consuls! to Epirus straight repair,
 Where the first northern winds that wing the air;
 From thence the powers of Greece united raise,
 While yet the wintery year the war delays.
 I spoke the chief; his bidding all obey;
 The ships forsake the port without delay,
 As speed their passage o'er the yielding way.
 Not at Cæsar, never patient long in peace,
 Not trusting in his fortune's present face;
 Closely pursues his flying fan behind,
 While yet his fate continued to be kind.
 Such towns, such fortresses, such hostile force,
 Such in the torrent of one rapid course;
 Such trains of long success attending still,
 As Rome herself abandon'd to his will;
 Role, the contending parties noblest prize,
 The very wish but Cæsar's might suffice.
 Behold with empire fir'd and vast desires,
 Till, and nothing less than all, aspires;
 He reckons not the past, while aught remain'd
 That to be done, or mighty, to be gain'd.
 Though Italy obey his wide command,
 Though Pompey linger on the farthest strand,
 He grieves to think they tread one common
 land;
 His heart disdains to brook a rival power,
 Even on the utmost margin of the shore;
 Nor would he leave, or earth, or ocean free;
 The foe he drives from lands, he bars from sea.
 Where moles the opening flood he would restrain,
 Would block the port, and intercept the main;
 Beyond deep-devouring seas his toil deride,
 The plunging quarries sink beneath the tide,
 As yielding sands the rocky fragments hide.
 Thus, if huge Gaurus headlong should be thrown,
 Inathomless Avernus' deep to down;
 Or from fair Sicilia's distant strand,
 Ex uprooted by some giant hand,
 It ponderous with his rocks, the mountain vast,
 Amidst the wide Ægean should be cast;
 The rolling waves o'er either main would flow,
 All each be lost within the depths below.
 Even no firm basis for his work he found,
 For still it fail'd in ocean's faithless ground,
 Hence trees and barks in massy chains he
 bound.

For planks and beams he ravages the wood,
 And the tough boom extends across the flood.
 Such was the road by haughty Xerxes made,
 When o'er the Hellepont his bridge he laid.
 Vast was the task, and daring the design,
 Europe and Asia's distant shores to join,
 And make the world's divided parts combine. }
 Proudly he pass'd the flood tumultuous o'er,
 Fearless of waves that beat, and winds that roar:
 Then spread his sails, and bid the land obey,
 And through mid Athos find his fleet a way.
 Like him bold Cæsar yok'd the swelling tide,
 Like him the boisterous elements defy'd;
 This floating bank the fraitening entrance bound,
 And rising turrets trembled on the mound.
 But anxious cares revolve in Pompey's breast,
 The new surrounding shores his thoughts molest;
 Secret he meditates the means, to free
 And spread the war wide-ranging o'er the sea.
 Oft driving on the work with well-fill'd sails,
 The cordage stretching with the freshening gales;
 Ships with a thundering shock the mole divide,
 And through the watery breach securely glide.
 Huge engines oft by night their vengeance pour,
 And dreadful shoot from far a fiery shower;
 Through the black shade the darting flame de- }
 scends,
 And kindling o'er the wall extends.
 At length arriv'd with the revolving night,
 The chosen hour appointed for his flight;
 He bids his friends prevent the seamen's roar,
 And still the deafening clamours on the shore;
 No trumpets may the watch by hours renew,
 Nor sounding-signals call aboard the crew.
 The heavenly maid her course had almost run,
 And Libra waited on the rising sun;
 When hush'd in silence deep they leave the } land: [mand, }
 No loud-mouth'd voices call with hoarse com- }
 To heave the stooky anchors from the sand. }
 Lowly the careful master's orders pass,
 To brace the yards, and rear the lofty mast;
 Silent they spread the sails, and cables haul,
 Nor to their mates for aid tumultuous call.
 The chief himself to fortune breath'd a prayer;
 At length to take him to her kinder care;
 That swiftly he might pass the liquid deep,
 And lose the land which she forbade to keep.
 Hardly the boon his piggard fate allow'd,
 Unwillingly the murmuring seas were plow'd;
 The foamy furrows roar'd beneath his prow,
 And sounding to the shore alarm'd the foe.
 Straight through the town their swift pursuit
 they sped,
 (For wide her gates the faithless city spread)
 Along the winding port they took their way,
 But griev'd to find the fleet had gain'd the sea.
 Cæsar with rage the lessening sails descries,
 And thinks the conquest mean, though Pompey
 flies.
 A narrow pass the horned mole divides, }
 Narrow as that where Eurippus' strong tides }
 Beat on Eubæan Chalcis' rocky sides: }
 Here two tall ships become the victor's prey:
 Just in the strait they stuck; the foes belay:
 The crooked grappling's iteely hold they cast,
 Then drag them to the hostile shore with haste.

Here civil slaughter first the sea profanes,
 And purple Nereus blush'd in guilty stains.
 The rest pursue their course before the wind,
 These of the rear-most only left behind.
 So when the Pegaſæan Argo bore
 The Grecian heroes to the Colchian ſhore;
 Earth her Cyanean iſlands floating ſent,
 The bold adventurers paſſage to prevent;
 But the ſam'd bark a fragrant only loſt,
 While ſwiftly o'er the dangerous gulf the croſt:
 Thundering the mountains met, and ſhook the
 main,
 But move no more, ſince that attempt was vain.
 Now through night's ſhade the early dawning
 broke,
 And changing ſkies the coming ſun beſpoke;
 As yet the morn was dreſt in duſky white,
 Nor purpled o'er the eaſt with ruddy light;
 At length the Pleiads fading beams gave way,
 And dull Boötes languish'd into day;
 Each larger ſtar withdrew his fainting head,
 And Lucifer from ſtronger Phœbus fled;
 When Pompey, from Heſperia's hoſtile ſhore
 Eſcaping for the azure offing bore.

O hero, happy once, once ſtyl'd the Great!
 What turns prevail in thy uncertain fate!
 How art thou chang'd ſince ſovereign of
 main,
 Thy natives cover'd o'er the liquid plain!
 When the fierce pirates fled before thy prow,
 Wherever waves could waſt, or winds cou
 blow!
 But fortune is grown weary of thee now.
 With thee, thy ſons, and tender wife, prepare
 The toils of war and baniſhment to bear;
 And holy houſehold-gods thy ſorrows ſhare.
 And yet a mighty exile ſhalt thou go,
 While nations follow to partake thy woe.
 Far lies the land in which thou art decreed,
 Unjuſtly, by a villain's hand to bleed.
 Nor think the gods a death ſo diſtant doom,
 To rob thy aſhes of an urn in Rome:
 But fortune favourably remov'd the crime,
 And forc'd the guilt on Egypt's curſed clime;
 The pitying powers to Italy were good,
 And ſav'd her from the ſtain of Pompey
 blood.

B O O K III.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE third book begins with the relation of Pompey's dream in his voyage from Italy. Cæſar, who had driven him from thence, after ſending Curio to provide corn in Sicily, returns to Rome: the diſdaining the ſingle oppoſition of L. Metellus, then tribune of the people, he breaks open the temple of Saturn, and ſeizes on the public treaſure. Then follows an account of the ſeveral diſſent nations that took part with Pompey. From Rome Cæſar paſſes into Gaul, where the Maſſiliaſes, who were inclinable to Pompey, ſend an embaſſy to propoſe a neutrality; this Cæſar reſuſes, and beſieges the town. But meeting with more difficulties than he expected, he leaves C. Trebonius his lieutenant before Maſſilia, and marches himſelf into Spain, appointing at the ſame time Brutus admiral of a navy which he had built and fitted out with great expedition. The Maſſiliaſes likewiſe ſend out their fleet, but are engaged and beaten at ſea by Brutus.

Through the mid ocean now the navy fails,
 Their yielding canvas ſtretch'd by ſouthern gales.
 Each to the vaſt Ionian turns his eye,
 Where ſea and ſkies the proſpect wide ſupply:
 But Pompey backward ever bent his look,
 Nor to the laſt his native coaſt forſook.
 His watery eyes the leſſening objects mourn,
 And parting ſhores that never ſhall return;
 Still the lov'd land attentive they purſue,
 Till the tall hills are veil'd in cloudy blue,
 Till all is loſt in air, and vaniſh'd from his view. }
 At length the weary chieftain funk to reſt,
 And creeping ſlumbers ſooth'd his anxious breaſt:
 When, lo! in that ſhort moment of repoſe,
 His Julia's ſhade a dreadful viſion roſe;
 Through gaping earth her ghawly head ſhe
 rear'd,
 And by the light of livid flames appear'd.
 Thy impious arms (ſhe cry'd) my peace infeſt,
 And drive me from the manſions of the bleſt:
 No more Elyſium's happy fields I know,
 Dragg'd to the guilty Stygian ſhades below:

I ſaw the Fury's horrid hands prepare
 New rage, new flames to kindle up thy war.
 The fire no longer truſts his ſingle boat,
 But navies on the joyleſs river float.
 Capacious hell complains for want of room,
 And ſeeks new plagues for multitudes to come:
 Her nimble hands each fatal ſiſter plies,
 The ſiſters ſcarcely to the talk ſuffice. [hear
 When thou wert mine, what laurels crown'd thee
 Now thou haſt chang'd thy fortune with thy bed
 In an ill hour thy ſecond choice was made,
 To ſlaughter thou, like Craſſus, art betray'd.
 Death is the dower Cornelia's love affords,
 Ruin ſtill waits upon her potent lords:
 While yet my aſhes glow'd, ſhe took my place,
 And came a harlot to thy looſe embrace.
 But let her partner of thy warfare go,
 Let her by land and ſea thy labours know;
 In all thy broken ſleeps I will be near,
 In all thy dreams ſad Julia ſhall appear.
 Your loves ſhall find no moment for delight,
 The day ſhall all be Cæſar's, mine the night.

 T murmurs of the many to prevent,
 C o to fruitful Sicily is sent.
 O ld the swelling seas impetuous tide
 T e fair island from Hesperia's side:
 S o foamy wars the jealous waves maintain,
 F ear the neighbouring lands should join again.
 S linia too, renown'd for yellow fields,
 W h Sicily her bounteous tribute yields;
 N lands a glebe of richer tillage boast,
 N wast more plenty to the Roman coast:
 N Libya more abounds in wealthy grain,
 N with a fuller harvest feeds the plain;

Though northern winds their cloudy treasures }
 bear,
 To temper well the foil and sultry air,
 And fattening rains increase the prosperous year. }
 This done, to Rome his way the leader took:
 His train the rougher shows of war forlook;
 No force, no fears their hands unarmed bear,
 But looks of peace and gentleness they wear.
 Oh! had he now his country's friend return'd,
 Had none but barbarous foes his conquest mourn'd;
 What swarming crowds had issued at the gate,
 On the glad triumph's lengthening train to wait!
 How might his wars in various glories shine,
 The ocean vanquish'd, and in bonds the Rhine!
 How would his lofty chariot roll along,
 Through loud applauses of the joyful throng!
 How might he view from high his captive thralls,
 The beauteous Britons, and the noble Gauls;
 But, oh! what fatal honours has he won!
 How is his fame by victory undone!
 No cheerful citizens the victor meet,
 But hush'd with awful dread his passage greet.
 He too the horrors of the crowd approv'd,
 Joy'd in their fears, and wish'd not to be lov'd.
 Now steepy Anxur past, and the moist way,
 Which o'er the faithless Pontine marshes lay;
 Through Scythian Dian's Aricinia grove,
 Cæsar approach'd the sanc of Alban Jove.
 Thither with yearly rites the consuls come,
 And thence the chief survey'd his native Rome:
 Wondering a while, he view'd her from a'ar,
 Long from his eyes withheld by distant war.
 Fled they from thee, thou feat of gods! (he cry'd)
 Ere yet the fortune of the fight was try'd?
 If thou art left, what prize can earth afford,
 Worth the contention of the warrior's sword?
 Well for thy safety now the gods provide,
 Since Parthian inroads spare thy naked side;
 Since yet no Scythians and Pannonians join,
 Nor warlike Daci with the Getes combine;
 No foreign armies are against thee led,
 While thou art curs'd with such a coward head.
 A gentler fate the heavenly powers bestow,
 A civil war, and Cæsar for thy foe.
 He said; and straight the frighted city sought:
 The city with confusion wild was fraught,
 And labouring shook with every dreadful }
 thought.
 They think he comes to ravage, sack, and burn;
 Religion, gods, and temples to o'erturn.
 Their fears suggest him willing to pursue
 Whatever ill's unbounded power can do.
 Their hearts by one low passion only move,
 Nor dare show hate, nor can dissemble love.
 The lurking fathers, a dishearten'd band,
 Drawn from their houses forth, by proud command,
 In Pælatine Apollo's temple meet,
 And sadly view the consul's empty seat;
 No rods, no chairs curule, adorn the place,
 Nor purple magistrates th' assembly grace.
 Cæsar is all things in himself alone,
 The silent court is but a looker-on;
 With humble votes obedient they agree,
 To what their mighty subject shall decree:
 Whether as king or god, he will be fear'd.
 If royal thrones, or altars, shall be rear'd.

Ready for death, or banishment, they stand,
 And wait their doom from his disposing hand;
 But he, by secret shame's reproaches staid,
 Blush'd to command, what Rome would have
 Yet liberty; thus slighted and betray'd, [obey'd.
 One last effort with indignation made;
 One man she chose to try th' unequal fight,
 And prove the power of justice against might.
 While with rude uproar armed hands essay
 To make old Saturn's treasuring fane their prey;
 The bold Metellus, careless of his fate.
 Rush'd through, and stood to guard the holy gate.
 So daring is the fordid love of gold!
 So fearless death and dangers can behold!
 Without a blow defenceless fell the laws;
 While wealth, the basest, most inglorious cause,
 Against oppressing tyranny makes head,
 Finds hard to fight, and eloquence to lead.
 The bustling tribune, struggling in the crowd,
 Thus warns the victor of the wrong aloud:
 Through me, thou robber! force thy horrid way,
 My sacred blood shall stain thy impious prey.
 But there are gods, to urge thy guilty fate;
 Sure vengeance on thy sacrilege shall wait.
 Remember, by the tribunes curie pursued,
 Crassus, too late, the violation rued. [please,
 Pierce then my breast, nor shall the crime dis-
 This crowd is us'd to spectacles like these.
 In a forsaken city are we left,
 Of virtue, with her noblest sons bereft.

Why seek'st thou ours? Is there not foreign Towns to be sack'd, and people to be sold? [gold?
 With those reward the ruffian's soldier's toil;
 Nor pay him with thy ruin'd country's spoil.
 Hast thou not war? Let war thy wants provide.
 He spoke. The victor, high in wrath, reply'd:
 Sooth not thy soul with hopes of death to vain,
 No blood of thine my conq'ring sword shall stain.
 Thy titles and thy popular command,
 Can never make thee worthy Cæsar's hand.
 Art thou thy country's sole defender! thou!
 Can liberty and Rome be fall'n so low!
 Nor time, nor chance breed such confusions yet,
 Nor are the mean fo rais'd, nor sunk the great;
 But laws themselves would rather choose to be Suppress'd by Cæsar, than preserv'd by thee.

He said. The stubborn tribune kept his place,
 While anger redd'n'd on the warrior's face;
 His wrathful hand descending, grasp'd his blade,
 And half forgot the peaceful part he play'd.
 When Cotta, to prevent the kindling fire,
 Thus sooth'd the rash Metellus to retire:

Where kings prevail, all liberty is lost,
 And none but he who reigns can freedom boast;
 Some shadow of the bliss thou shalt retain,
 Choosing to do what sovereign powers ordain:
 Vanquish'd and long accusom'd to submit,
 With patience underneath our load we sit;
 Our chains alone our slavish fears excuse,
 While we bear ill, we know not to refuse.
 Far hence the fatal treasures let him bear,
 The seeds of mischief, and the cause of war.
 Free states might well a loss like this deplore;
 In servitude none miss the public store,
 And 'tis the curse of kings for subjects to be poor.

The tribune with unwilling steps withdrew,
 While impious hands the rude assault renew:

The brazen gates with thundering strokes ref
 And the Tarpeian mountain rings around.
 At length the sacred store-houfe, open laid,
 The hoarded wealth of ages past display'd;
 There might be seen the fums proud Car
 Her long impending ruin to prevent.
 There heap'd the Macedonian treasures stor
 What great, Flaminius and Æmilius won
 From vanquish'd Philip, and his hapless son.
 There lay, what flying Pyrrhus lost, the gold
 Scorn'd by the patriot's honesty of old:
 Whate'er our parsimonious fires could save,
 What tributary gifts rich Syria gave;
 The hundred Cretan cities ample spoil;
 What Cato gathered from the Cyprian isle.
 Riches of captive kings by Pompey borne,
 In happier days his triumph to adorn,
 From utmost India and the rising morn;
 Wealth infinite, in one rapacious day,
 Became the needy soldiers lawless prey:
 And wretched Rome, by robbery laid low,
 Was poorer than the bankrupt Cæsar now.

Meanwhile the world, by Pompey's alarm'd,
 Nations ordain'd to share his fall had arm'd.
 Greece first with troops the neighbouring supply'd,
 And sent the youth of Phocis to his side;
 From Cyrrha and Amphisa's towers they mo
 And high Parnassus by the muse belov'd;
 Cephæsus' sacred flood assistance lends,
 And Dirce's spring his Theban leaders sends,
 Alphæus too affords his Pifa's aid:
 By Pifa's wall the stream is first convey'd,
 Then seeks through seas the lov'd Sicilian mai
 From Mænalus Arcadian shepherds swarm,
 And warriors in Herculean Trachyn arm;
 The Dryopes Chaonia's hills forsook,
 And Sellæ left Dodona's silent oak.
 Though Athens now had drain'd her naval sto
 And the Phæbean arsenal was poor,
 Three ships of Salamis to Pompey came,
 To vindicate their ile's contested name,
 And justify the ancient Attic claim.
 Jove's Cretan people hastening to the war,
 The Grossian quiver and the shaft prepare;
 The bending bow they drew with deadly art,
 And rival ev'n the flying Parthian's dart.
 With Athamans who in the woods delight,
 With Dardan Oriconians unite;
 With these th' Enchelze who the name parta
 Since Theban Cadmus first became a snake:
 The Colchians planted on Illyrian shores,
 Where rushing down Abyrtos foamy roars;
 With those where Peneus runs, and hardy swa
 Whose ploughs divide Iolcos' fruitful plains.
 From thence, ere yet the seaman's art was tau Rude Argo through the deep a passage fough
 She first explor'd the distant foreign land,
 And show'd her strangers to the wondering fra
 Then nations nations knew, in leagues v
 join'd,
 And universal commerce mix'd mankind.
 By her made bold, the daring race defy'd
 The winds tempestuous, and the swelling tide
 Much the enlarg'd destruction's ample power,
 And open'd ways to death unknown before.

 falls:

All his lamenting progeny deplore
 Enerva's tuneful gift, and Phœbus' power;
 While through steep banks his torrent swift he ange in their habit, manners, and their food.

With saffron dyes their dangling locks they stain,
 With glittering gems their flowing robes con-
 strain,

And quaff rich juices from the luscious cane.
 On their own funerals and death they smile,
 And living leap amidst the burning pile;
 Heroic minds! that can ev'n fate command,
 And bid it wait upon a mortal hand;
 Who full of life forsake it as a feast,
 Take what they like and give the gods the rest.
 Descending then fierce Capadocian ivains,
 From rude Amanus' mountains fought the plains,
 Armenians from Niphates' rolling stream,
 And from their lofty woods Coastrians came.

Then wondering Arabs from the sultry line
 For ever northward saw the shade incline.
 Then did the madness of the Roman rage
 Carmanian and Olostrian chiefs engage:
 Beneath far distant southern heavens they lie,
 Where half the setting Bear forsakes the sky,
 And swift our slow Boötes seems to fly.

These furies to the sun-burn'd Æthiops spread,
 And reach the great Euphrates' rising head.
 One spring the Tigris and Euphrates know,
 And join'd awhile the kindred rivers flow;
 Scarce could we judge between the doubtful claim,
 If Tigris, or Euphrates, give the name:

But soon Euphrates' parting waves divide,
 Covering like fruitful Nile the country wide;
 While Tigris, sinking from the sight of day,
 Through subterranean channels cuts his way;
 Then from a second fountain springs again,
 Shoots swiftly on, and rushing seeks the main.
 The Parthian powers, to neither chief a friend,
 The doubtful issue in suspense attend;
 With neutral ease they view the strife from far,
 And only lend occasion to the war.

Not to the Scythians where cold Bactros flows,
 Or where Hircania's wilder forest grows,
 Their baneful shafts they dip, and string their deadly bows.

Th' Heniochi of Sparta's valiant breed,
 Skillful to press, and rein the fiery steed.
 Sarmatians with the fiercer Moschi join'd,
 And Colchians rich where Phasis' waters wind,
 To Pompey's side their aid assembling bring,
 With Halys, fatal to the Lydian king;
 With Tanais falling from Riphæan fnows,
 Who forms the world's division as he goes:
 With noblest names his rising banks are crown'd,
 This stands for Europe's, that for Asia's bound;
 While, as they wind, his waves with full command,

Diminish, or enlarge th' adjacent land.
 Then arm'd the nations on Cimmerian shores,
 Where through the Bosphorus Mæotis roars,
 And her full lake amidst the Euxine pours.

This strait, like that of Hercules, supplies
 The midland seas, and bids th' Ægean rise,
 Sithonians fierce, and Arimaspians bold,
 Who bind their plaited hair in shining gold.
 The Genon nimble, and the Areian strong,
 March with the hardy Massagete along:
 The Massagete, who at his savage feast
 Feeds on the generous steed which once he prest.

Not Cyrus when he spread his eastern reign,
 And hid with multitudes the Lydian plain;

Not haughty Xerxes, when, his power to boast,
By shafts he counted all his mighty host;
Not he who drew the Grecian chiefs along,
Bent to revenge his injur'd brother's wrong;
Or with such navies plow'd the foamy main,
Or led so many kings, amongst their warlike train.
Sure in one cause such numbers never yet,
Various in countries, speech, and manners, met;
But fortune gather'd o'er the spacious hall,
These spoils, to grace her once-lov'd favourite's
Nor then the Lybian Moor witheld his aid, [fall.
Where sacred Ammon lifts his horned head:
All Afric, from the western ocean's bound;
To eastern Nile, the cause of Pompey own'd.
Mankind assembled for Pharsalia's day,
To make the world at once the victor's prey.

Now trembling Rome forsook, with swiftest
Cæsar the cloudy Alpine hills had past. [haste,
But while the nations, with subjection tame,
Yield to the terrors of his mighty name;
With faith uncommon to the changing Greeks,
What duty bids, Massilia bravely seeks:
And, true to oaths, their liberty and laws,
To stronger fate prefer the juster cause,
But first to move his haughty soul they try,
Entreaties and persuasion oft apply;
Their brows Minerva's peaceful branches wear,
And thus in gentlest terms they greet his ear:

When foreign wars molest the Roman state,
With ready arms our glad Massilians wait,
To share your dangers, and partake your fate. }
This our unshaken friendship vouches well,
And your recording annals best can tell.
Ev'n now we yield our still devoted hands,
On foreign foes to wreak your dread commands;
Would you to worlds unknown your triumphs
spread?

Behold! we follow wheresoe'er you lead.
But if you roue at discord's baleful call,
If Romans fatally on Romans fall;
All we can offer is a pitying tear,
And constant refuge for the wretched here.
Sacred to us you are: oh, may no stain
Of Lucian blood our innocence profane!
Should heaven itself be rent with civil rage,
Should giants once more with the gods engage;
Officious piety would hardly dare
To proffer Jove assistance in the war.
Man unconcern'd and humble should remain,
Nor seek to know whose arms the conquest gain,
Jove's thunder will convince them of his reign. }
Nor can your horrid discords want our swords,
The wicked world its multitudes affords;
Too many nations at the call will come,
And gladly join to urge the fate of Rome.
Oh, had the rest like us their aid deny'd,
Yourself must then the guilty strife decide;
Then, who but should withhold his lifted hand,
When for his foe he saw his father stand?
Brothers their rage had mutually repress'd,
Nor driven their javelins on a brother's breast.
Your war had ended soon; had you not chose
Hands for the work, which nature meant for foes:
Who, strangers to your blood, in arms delight,
And rush remorseless to the cruel sight.
Briefly, the sum of all that we request
Is, to receive thee as our honour'd guest;

Let those thy dreadful ensigns shine afar,
Let Cæsar come, but come without the war.
Let this one place from impious rage be free;
That, if the gods the peace of Rome decree,
If your relenting angers yield to treat,
Pompey and thou, in safety, here may meet.
Then, wheresoe'er dost thou quit thy purpos'd way
Why, thus, Iberia's nobler wars delay?
Mean, and of little consequence we are,
A conquest much unworthy of thy care.
When Phocis' towers were laid in ashes low,
Hither we fled for refuge from the foe;
Here, for our plain integrity renown'd,
A little town in narrow walls we bound:
No name in arms nor victories we boast,
But live poor exiles on a foreign coast.
If thou art bent on violence at last,
To burst our gates, and lay our bulwarks waste,
Know we are equally resolv'd, whate'er
The victor's fury can inflict, to bear.
Shall death destroy, shall flames the town o'er-
turn?

Why—let our people bleed, our buildings burn.
Wilt thou forbid the living stream to flow?
We'll dig, and search the watery fiores below.
Hunger and thirst with patience will we meet,
And, what offended nature nauseates, eat.
Like brave Saguntum daring to be free,
Whate'er they suffer'd, we'll expect from thee.
Babes, ravish'd from the fainting mother's breast,
Shall headlong in the burning pile be cast.
Matrons shall bare their bosoms to their lords,
And beg destruction from their pitying swords;
The brother's hand the brother's heart shall wound,
And universal slaughter rage around.
If civil wars must waste this hapless town,
No hands shall bring that ruin but our own.

Thus said the Grecian messengers. When lo!
A gathering cloud involv'd the Roman's brow;
Much grief, much wrath, his troubled visage
spoke;

Then into these disdainful words he broke:
This trusting in our speedy march to Spain,
These hopes, this Grecian confidence is vain;
Whate'er we purpose, leisure will be found
To lay Massilia level with the ground:
This bears, my valiant friends, a found of joy;
Our useless arms, at length, shall find employ,
Winds lose their force, that unresisted fly,
And flames, unfed by fuel, sink and die.
Our courage thus would soften in repose,
But fortune and rebellion yield us foes.
Yet mark! what love their friendly speech express!
Uparm'd and single, Cæsar is their guest.
Thus, first they dare to stop me on my way,
Then seek with fawning treason to betray.
Anon, they pray that civil rage may cease:
But war shall scourge them for those hopes of
peace;

And make them know the present times afford,
At least while Cæsar lives, no safety like the sword.

He said; and to the city bent his way:
The city, fearless all, before him lay,
With armed hands her battlements were crown'd,
And lusty youth the bulwarks mann'd around.

Near to the walls, a rising mountain's head
Flat with a little level plain is spread:
Upon this height the wary chief designs
His camp to strengthen with surrounding lines—

 Who, terrible to fight, at that fix'd hour,
 Still treads the round about his dreary bower.

This wood near neighb'ring to th' encompass'd
 town

Untouch'd by former wars remain'd alone;
 And ſince the country round it naked ſtands,
 From hence the Latian chief ſupplies demands.
 But lo! the bolder hands, that ſhould have ſtruck,
 With ſome unuſual horror trembling ſhook:
 With ſilent dread and reverence they ſurvey'd
 The gloom majestic of the ſacred ſhade.
 None dares with impious ſteel the bark to rend,
 Left on himſelf the deſtin'd ſtroke deſcend.
 Cæſar perceiv'd the ſpreading fear to grow,
 Then, eager, caught an axe, and aim'd a blow,
 Deep funk within a violated oak
 The wounding edge, and thus the warrior ſpoke.
 Now, let no doubting hand the taſk decline;
 Cut you the wood, and let the guilt be mine.
 The trembling bands unwillingly obey'd;
 Two various illſ were in the balance laid,
 And Cæſar's wrath againſt the gods was } weigh'd.

Then Jove's Dodonian tree was forc'd to bow;
 The loſty aſh and knotty holm lay low;
 The floating alder by the current borne,
 The cypreſs by the noble mourner worn,
 Veil their aerial ſummits, and diſplay
 Their dark reſceſs to the golden day;
 Crowding they fall, each o'er the other lies,
 And heap'd on high the leafy piles ariſe.
 With grief, and fear, the groaning Gauls beheld
 Their holy grove by impious ſoldiers fell'd;
 While the Maſſilians, from th' encompass'd wall,
 Rejoic'd to ſee the ſylvan honours fall:
 They hope ſuch power can never proſper long,
 Nor think the patient gods will bear the wrong.
 But, ah! too oft ſucceſs to guilt is given,
 And wretches only ſtand the mark of heaven.
 With timber largely from the wood ſupply'd,
 For wains the legions ſearch the country wide;
 Then from the crooked plough unyoke the ſteer,
 And leave the ſwain to mourn the fruitleſs year.

Meanwhile, impatient of the lingering war,
 The chieftain to Iberia bends aſar,
 And gives the ieaquer to Trebonius' care. }
 With diligence the deſtin'd taſk he plies;
 Huge works of earth with ſtrengthening beams
 ariſe:

High tottering towers, by no fix'd baſis bound,
 Roll nodding on along the ſtable mound.
 The Greeks with wonder on the movement look,
 And fancy earth's foundations deep are ſhook;
 Fierce winds they think the belldame's entrails tear,
 And anxious for their walls and city fear:
 The Roman from the loſty top looks down,
 And rains a winged war upon the town.
 Nor with leſs active rage the Grecians burn,
 But larger ruin on their foes return;
 Nor hands alone the miſſile deaths ſupply,
 From nervous croſs-bows whiſtling arrows fly;
 The ſteely corſlet and the bone they break,
 Through multitudes their fatal journeys take;
 Nor wait the lingering Parce's ſlow delay,
 But wound, and to new ſlaughter wing their way.

Now by some vast machine a ponderous stone,
 Pernicious, from the hostile wall is thrown;
 At once, on many, swift the shock descends,
 And the crush'd carcasses confounding blends.
 So rolls some falling rock by age long worn,
 Loose from its root by raging whirlwinds torn,
 And thundering down the precipice is born,
 O'er crashing woods the mass is seen to ride,
 To grind its way, and plain the mountain's side:
 Gall'd with the shot from far, the legions join,
 Their bucklers in the warlike shell combine;
 Compact and close the brazen roof they bear,
 And in just order to the town draw near:
 Safe they advance, while with unweary'd pain
 The wrathful engines waste their stores in vain;
 High o'er their heads the destin'd deaths are tost,
 And far behind in vacant earth are lost;
 Nor sudden could they change their erring aim,
 Slow and unwieldy moves the cumbersome frame.

This seen, the Greeks their brawny arms employ,
 And hurt a stony tempest from on high:

The clattering shower the sounding fence assails;
 But vain, as when the stormy winter hails,
 Nor on the solid marble roof prevails:

Till tir'd at length the warriors fall their shields;
 And spent with toil, the broken phalanx yields.
 Now other stratagems the war supplies,
 Beneath the Vinea close the assailant lies.

The strong machine, with planks and turf bespread,
 Moves to the walls its well-defended head;

Within the covert safe the miners lurk,
 And to the deep foundation urge their work.
 Now justly pois'd the thundering ram they sling,
 And drive him forceful with a launching spring;
 Haply to loose some yielding part at length,
 And shake the firm cemented bulwark's strength.
 But from the town the Grecian youth prepare
 With hardy vigour to repel the war:

Crowding they gather on the rampart's height,
 And with tough flaves and spears maintain the
 fight;

Darts, fragments of the rock, and flames they
 And rear the planky shelter fix'd below;
 Around by all the warring tempest beat,
 The baffled Romans sullenly retreat.

Now by success the brave Missilians fir'd,
 To fame of higher enterprise aspir'd;
 Nor longer with their walls defence content,
 In daring sallies they the foe prevent.

Nor arm'd with swords, nor pointed spears they go,
 Nor aim the shaft, nor bend the deadly bow:
 Fierce Mulciber supplies the bold design,
 And for their weapons kindling torches shine.

Silent they issue through the gloomy night,
 And with broad shields restrain the beamy light:
 Sudden the blaze on every side began,

And o'er the Latian works resistless ran;
 Catching, and driving with the wind it grows,
 Fierce through the shade the burning deluge glows;
 Nor earth, nor greener planks its force delay,
 Swift o'er the hissing beams it rolls away:

Embrown'd with smoke the wavy flames ascend,
 Shiver'd with heat the crackling quarries rend;
 Till with a roar at last, the mighty mound, Towers, engines, all, come thundering to the
 ground.

Wide spread the discontinuous ruins lie,
 And vast confusion fills the gazer's eye.

Vanquish'd by land, the Romans seek the main
 And prove the fortune of the watery plain:

Their navy, rudely built, and rigg'd in haste,
 Down through the rapid Rhone descending pass
 No golden gods protect the shining prow,
 Nor silken streamers lightly dancing flow;

But rough in stable floorings lies the wood,
 As in the native forest once it stood.

Rearing above the rest her towery head,
 Brutus' tall ship the floating squadron led.

To sea soon wafted by the hasty tide,
 Right to the Stæchades their course they guide

Resolv'd to urge their fate, with equal cares,
 Massilia for the naval war prepares;

All hands the city for the task requires,
 And arms her striplings young, and hoary fires

Vessels of every sort and size the fits,
 And speedy to the briny deep commits

The crazy hulk, that, worn with winds and tides,

Safe in the dock, and long neglected, rides,
 She planks anew, and calks her leaky sides:

Now rose the morning, and the golden fun
 With beams refracted on the ocean shone;

Clear was the sky, the waves from murmur cease
 And every ruder wind was hush'd in peace:

Smooth lay the glassy surface of the main,
 And offer'd to the war its ample plain:

When to the destin'd stations all repair
 Here Cæsar's powers, the youth of Phocis there

Their brawny arms are bard, their oars they Swift o'er the water glides the nimble ship;

Feels the strong blow the well-compacted oak,
 And trembling springs at each repeated stroke.

Crooked in front the Latian navy stood,
 And wound a bending crescent o'er the flood.

With four full banks of oars advancing high,
 On either wing the larger vessels ply,

While in the centre safe the lesser galliots lie.
 Brutus the first, with eminent command,

In the tall admiral is seen to stand;
 Six rows of lengthening pines the billows sweep

And heave the burden o'er the groaning deep.
 Now prow to prow advance each hostile fleet

And want but one concurring stroke to meet,
 When peals of shouts and mingling clamor

And drown the brazen trump and plunging oar
 The brushing pine the frothy surface plies,

While on their banks the lusty rowers rise:
 Each brings the stroke back on his ample chest

Then firm upon his seat he lights repress.
 With clashing beaks the launching vessels meet

And from the mutual shock alike retreat.
 Thick clouds of flying shafts the welkin hit,

Then fall, and floating strow the ocean wide.
 At length the stretching wings their order leave

And in the line the mingling foe receive:
 Then might be seen, how, dash'd from side to side

Before the stemming vessel drove the tide;
 Still as each keel her foamy furrow plows,

Now back, now forth, the surge obedient flows
 Thus warring winds alternate rule maintain,

And this, and that way roll the yielding main
 Massilia's navy, nimble, clean, and light,

With best advantage seek or shun the fight;
 With ready ease all answer to command,
 Obey the helm, and feel the pilot's hand:

ot to the Romans; cumbrous hulks they lay,
 nd slow and heavy hung upon the sea;

 o fill his place be! Gyareus eſſay'd, ut paſſing from a neighbouring ſhip was ſlay'd:

Swift through his loins a flying javelin ſtruck,
 And nail'd him to the veſſel he forſook.
 Friendlike, and ſide by ſide, two brethren fought,
 Whom, at a birth, their fruitful mother brought.
 So like the lines of each reſembling face,
 The ſame the features, and the ſame the grace,
 That fondly erring off their parents look,
 And each, for each, alternately miſtook:
 But death, too ſoon, a dire diſtinction makes,
 While one, untimely ſnatch'd, the light forſakes.
 His brother's form the ſad ſurvivor wears,
 And ſtill renews his hapleſs parents tears:
 Too ſure they ſee their ſingle hope remain,
 And while they bleſs the living, mourn the ſlain.
 He, the bold youth, as board and board they
 ſtand,
 Fix'd on a Roman ſhip his daring hand;
 Full on his arm a mighty blow deſcends,
 And the torn limb from off the ſhoulder rends;
 The rigid nerves are cramp'd with ſtiffening cold,
 Convulſive graſp, and ſtill retain their hold.
 Nor ſunk his valour by the pain depreſt,
 But nobler rage inflam'd his mangled breaſt:
 His left remaining hand the combat tries,
 And fiercely forth to catch the right he flies;
 The ſame hard deſtiny the left demands,
 And now a naked helpleſs trunk he ſeems.
 Nor deigns he, though defenceleſs to the foe,
 To ſeek the ſafety of the hold below;
 For ever coming javelin's point prepar'd,
 He ſteps between, and ſtands his brother's guard;
 Till fix'd, and horrid with a wood of ſpears,
 A thouſand deaths at others aim'd he wears.
 Reſolv'd at length his utmoſt force to exert,
 His ſpirits gather'd to his fainting heart,
 And the laſt vigour rous'd in every part;
 Then nimble from the Grecian deck he roſe,
 And with a leap ſprung fierce amidſt his foes:
 And when his hands no more could wreak his hate,
 His ſword no more could miniſter to fate,
 Dying he preſt them with his hoſtile weight.
 O'ercharg'd the ſhip with carcaſes and blood,
 Drunk ſalt at many a leak the briny flood;
 Yielding at length the waters wide gave way,
 And fold her in the boſom of the ſea;
 Then o'er her head returning rolls the tide,
 And covering waves the ſinking hatches hide.
 That fatal day was ſlaughter ſeen to reign,
 In wonders varicus, on the liquid plain.
 On Lycidas ſteely grappling ſtruck;
 Struggling he drags with the tenacious hook;
 And deep had drown'd beneath the greedy wave,
 But that his fellows ſtrove their mate to ſave;
 Cling to his legs, they claſp him all they can,
 The grappling tugs, aſunder flies the man.
 No ſingle wound the gaping rupture ſeems,
 Where trickling crimſon wells in ſlender ſtreams;
 But from an opening horrible and wide,
 A thouſand veſſels pour the burſting tide:
 At once the winding channel's courſe was broke,
 Where wandering life her mazy journey took:
 At once the currents all forgot their way,
 And loſt their purple in the azure ſea.
 Soon from the lower parts the ſpirits fled,
 And motionleſs th' exhauleſt limbs lay dead:
 Not ſo the nobler regions, where the heart
 And heaving lungs their vital powers exert;

There lingering late, and long conflicting, life,
Rose against fate, and still maintain'd the strife:
Driven out at length, unwillingly and slow,
She left her mortal house, and fought the shades
below.

While, eager for the fight, an hardy crew
To one sole side their force united drew,
The bark, unapt the unequal poise to bear,
Turn'd o'er, and rear'd her lowest keel in air;
In vain his active arms the swimmer tries,
No aid the swimmers uselefs art supplies;
The covering vast o'erwhelming flouts them down,
And helpless in the hollow hold they drown.

One slaughter terrible above the rest,
The fatal horror of the fight express.
As o'er the crowded surface of the flood
A youthful swimmer swift his way pursued;
Two meeting ships, by equal fury prest,
With hostile prows transfix'd his ample breast;
Suspended by the dreadful shock he hung;
The brazen beaks within his bosom rung;
Blood, bones and entrails, mashing with the blow,
From his pale lips a hideous mixture flow.
At length the backing oars the fight restrain,
The lifelefs body drops amidst the main;
Soon enter at the breach the rushing waves,
And the salt stream the mangled carcase laves:

Around the watery champain wide dispread,
The living shipwrecks float amidst the dead:
With active arms the liquid deep they ply,
And panting to their mates for succour cry:
Now to some social vessel press they near,
Their fellows pale the crowding numbers fear;
With ruthlefs hearts their well-known friends withstand,

And with keen faulchions lop each grasping hand;
The dying fingers cling and clench the wood,
The heavy trunk sinks helpless in the flood.

Now spent was all the warriors steely store,
New darts they seek, and other arms explore,
'This yields a flag-staff, that a ponderous oar.
Wrath's ready hands are never at a loss:
The fragments of the shatter'd ship they tofs.
The uselefs rower from his seat is cast,
Then fly the benches and the broken mast.
Some seizing, as it sinks, the breathlefs corse,
From the cold grasp the blood-stain'd weapon force.
Some from their own fresh bleeding bosoms take,
And at the foe the dropping javelin shake:
The left-hand stays the blood, and soothes the pain,
The right sends back the reeking spear again.

Now gods of various elements conspire;
To Nereus, Vulcan joins his hostile fire;
With oils and living sulphur, darts they frame,
Prepar'd to spread afar the kindling flame;
Around the catching mischiefs swift succeed,
The floating hulks their own destruction feed;
The sneary wax the bright'ning blaze supplies,
And wavy fires from pitchy planks arise:
Amidst the flood the ruddy torrent strays,
And fierce upon the scattering shipwrecks preys.
Here one with haste a flaming vessel leaves:
Another, spent and beaten by the waves,
As eager to the burning ruin cleaves,
Amidst the various ways of death to kill,
Whether by seas, by fires, or wounding steel,
The dreadfulest is that, whose present force we feel.

Nor valour less her fatal rage maintains,
In daring breaths that swim the liquid plains:
Some gather up the darts that floating lie,
And to the combatants new deaths supply.
Some struggling in the deep the war provoke,
Rise o'er the surge, and aim a languid stroke.
Some with strong grasp the foe conflicting join,
Mix limbs with limbs, and hostile wreathings
twine,

Till plunging, pressing to the bottom down,
Vanquish'd, and vanquishers, alike they drown.
One, chief above the rest, is mark'd by fame,
For watery fight, and Phoeus was his name:
The heaving breath of life he knew to keep;
While long he dwelt within the lowest deep;
Full many a fathom down he had explor'd,
For treasures lost, old ocean's oozy hoard;
Oft when the flooky anchor stuck below,
He sunk, and bade the captive vessel go.
A foe he seiz'd close cleaving to his breast,
And underneath the tumbling billows prest:
But when the skilful victor would repair
To upper seas, and fought the freer air;
Helpless beneath the crowding keels he rose,
The crowding keels his wonted way oppose;
Back beaten, and astonish'd with the blow,
He sinks, to bide for ever now below.

Some hang upon the oars with weight
force,
To intercept the hostile vessel's course;
Some to the last the cause they love defend,
And valiant lives by useful deaths would end;
With breasts oppos'd the thundering beaks the brave.

And what they fought for living, dying save.
As Tyrrhen, from a Roman poop on high,
Ran o'er the various combat with his eye;
Sure aiming, from his Balearic thong,
Bold Ligdamus a ponderous bullet flung;
Through liquid air the ball shrill whistling flies,
And cuts its way through haplefs Tyrrhen's eyes:
Th' astonish'd youth stands struck with sudden
night,

While bursting start the bleeding orbs of sight.
At first he took the darkness to be death,
And thought himself amidst the shades beneath;
But soon recovering from the stunning found,
He liv'd, unhappily he liv'd, he found.
Vigour at length, and wanted force returns,
And with new rage his valiant bosom burns:
To me, my friends (he cry'd), your aid supply,
Nor uselefs let your fellow soldier die;
Give me, oppos'd against the foe to stand,
While 'like some engine you direct my hand.
And thou, my poor remaining life, prepare
To meet each hazard of the various war;
At least my mangled carcase shall pretend
To interpose, and shield some valiant friend:
Plac'd like a mark their darts I may sustain;
And, to preserve some better man, be slain.

Thus said, unaiming he a javelin threw,
The javelin wing'd with sure destruction flew;
In Argus the descending steel takes place,
Argus, a Grecian of illustrious race.
Deep sinks the piercing point, where to the loim
Above the navel high the belly joins:
The staggering youth falls forward on his fate,
And helps the goring weapon with his weight.

It chanc'd, to ruthless destiny design'd,
 O the same ship his aged fire was join'd :
 While young, for high achievements was he
 His first in fair Maffilia for renown; [known,
 Now an example merely, and a name,
 Willing to rouse the younger fort he came,
 And fire their souls to emulate his fame.
 When from the prow, where distant far he stood,
 He saw his son lie weltering in his blood,
 On to the poop, oft stumbling in his haste,
 With faltering steps the feeble father past.
 O falling tears his wrinkled cheeks bedew,
 O stiffening cold and motionless he grew:
 Deep night and deadly shades of darkness rise,
 And hide his much-lov'd Argus from his eyes.
 As to the dizzy youth the fire appears,
 Is dying, weak, unyielding head he rears;
 With lifted eyes he cast a mournful look,
 His pale lips mov'd, and fain he would have spoke;
 Yet unexpress'd th' imperfect accent hung,
 Oft in his falling jaws and murmuring tongue:
 As in his speechless visage seems express'd,
 That, had he words, would be his last request,
 Had aged hand to seal his closing eye,
 And in his father's fond embrace to die;
 But he, when grief with keenest sense revives,
 With nature's strongest pangs conflicting strives;
 As yet not lose this hour of death, he cries,
 Which my indulgent destiny supplies;
 And thou forgive, forgive me, oh my son,
 Thy dear lips and last embrace I shun.
 From thy wound the purple current flows,
 And vital breath yet heaving comes and goes:

Yet my sad eyes behold thee yet alive,
 And thou shalt, yet, thy wretched fire survive,
 He said, and fierce, by frantic sorrow prest,
 Plung'd his sharp sword amidst his aged breast:
 And though life's gushing streams the weapon
 Headlong he leaps amidst the greedy main; [stain,
 While this last wish ran ever in his mind,
 To die, and leave his darling son behind;
 Eager to part, his soul disdain'd to wait,
 And trust uncertain to a single fate.

And now Maffilia's vanquish'd force gives way,
 And Cæsar's fortune claims the doubtful day.
 The Grecian fleet is all dispers'd around,
 Some in the bottom of the deep lie drown'd;
 Some, captives made, their haughty victors bore, While some, but those a few, fled timely to the shore.

But, oh! what verse, what numbers, can express,
 The mournful city, and her sore distress!
 Upon the beach lamenting matrons stand,
 And wailings echo o'er the lengthening strand;
 Their eyes are fix'd upon the waters wide,
 And watch the bodies driving with the tide.
 Here a fond wife, with pious error, prest
 Some hostile Roman to her throbbing breast;
 There to a mangled trunk two mothers run,
 Each grasps, and each would claim it for her son;
 Each, what her boding heart persuades, believes,
 And for the last sad office fondly strives.

But Brutus, now victorious on the main,
 To Cæsar vindicates the watery plain;
 First to his brow he binds the naval crown,
 And bids the spacious deep the mighty master own.

B O O K I V.

THE ARGUMENT.

CÆSAR having joined Fabius, whom he had sent before him to Spain, encamps upon a rising ground near Ilerda, and not far from the river Sicoris; there, the waters being swollen by great rains, endanger his camp; but the weather turning fair, and the floods abating, Pompey's lieutenants, Afranius and Petreius, who lay over against him, decamp suddenly. Cæsar follows, and encamps so as to cut off their passage, or any use of the river Iberus. As both armies lay now very near to each other, the soldiers on both sides knew, and saluted one another; and forgetting the opposite interests and factions they were engaged in, ran out from their several camps, and embraced one another with great tenderness. Many of Cæsar's soldiers were invited into the enemy's camp, and feasted by their friends and relations. But Petreius apprehending this familiarity might be of ill consequence to his party, commanded them all (though against the rules of humanity and hospitality) to be killed. After this, he attempts in vain to march back towards Ilerda; but is prevented, and enclosed by Cæsar: to whom, both himself and Afranius, after their army had suffered extremely for want of water and other necessaries, are compelled to surrender, without asking any other conditions than that they might not be compelled to take-on in his army; this Cæsar, with great generosity, grants, and dismisses them. In the mean while, C. Antonius, who commanded for Cæsar near Salonæ, on the coast of Dalmatia being shut up by Octavius, Pompey's admiral, and destitute of provisions, had attempted, by help of some vessels, or floating machines of a new invention, to pass through Pompey's fleet: two of them by advantage of the tide found means to escape, but the third, which carried a thousand Opitergians commanded by Vulteius, was intercepted by a boom laid under the water. Those, when they found it impossible to get off, at the persuasion, and by the example of their leader, ran upon one another's swords and died. In Africa the poet introduces Curio inquiring after the story of Hercules and Antæus, which is recounted to him by one of the natives, and afterwards relates the particulars of his being circumvented, defeated, and killed by Juba.

But Cæsar in Iberian fields afar,
 Ev'n to the western ocean spreads the war;
 And though no hills of slaughter heap the plain,
 No purple deluge leaves a guilty stain,
 Vast is the prize, and great the victor's gain.
 For Pompey, with alternative command,
 The brave Petreius and Afranius stand:
 The chiefs in friendship's just conditions join,
 And, cordial to the common cause, combine;
 By turns they quit, by turns resume the sway,
 The camp to guard, or battle to array;
 To these their aid the nimble Vectons yield,
 With those who till Asturia's hilly field;
 Nor wanted then the Celtiberians bold,
 Who draw their long descent from Celtic Gauls of old.

Where rising grounds the fruitful champain end,
 And unperceiv'd by soft degrees ascend;
 An ancient race their city chose to found,
 And with Ilerda's walls the summit crown'd.
 The Sicoris, of no ignoble name,
 Fast by the mountain pours his gentle stream.
 A stable bridge runs croos from side to side,
 Whole spacious arch transmits the passing tide,
 And jutting piers the wintery floods abide.
 Two neighbouring hills their heads distinguish'd raise;

The first great Pompey's ensigns high displays;
 Proud Cæsar's camp upon the next is seen;
 The river interposing glides between.
 Wide spread beyond, an ample plain extends,
 Far as the piercing eye its prospect sends;
 Upon the spacious level's utmost bound,
 The Cinga rolls his rapid waves around.
 But soon in full Iberus' channel lost,
 His blended waters seek Iberia's coast;
 He yields to the superior torrent's fame,
 And with the country takes his nobler name.

Now 'gan the lamp of heaven the plains to gild,
 When moving legions hide th' embattled field;
 When front to front oppos'd in just array,
 The chieftians each their hostile powers display:
 But whether conscious shame their wrath repress,
 And soft reluctance rose in every breast;
 Or virtue did a short liv'd rule resume,
 And gain'd one day for liberty and Rome;
 Suspended rage yet linger'd for a space,
 And to the west declin'd the sun in peace.
 Night rose, and black'ning shades involv'd the sky,
 When Cæsar, bent war's wily arts to try,
 Through his extended battle gives command,
 The foremost lines in order fixt shall stand;
 Meanwhile the last, low lurking from the foe,
 With secret labour sink a trench below:
 Successful they the destin'd talk pursue,
 While closing files prevent the hostile view.

Soon as the morn renew'd the dawning gray,
 He bids the soldier urge his speedy way,
 To seize a vacant height that near Ilerda lay.
 This saw the foe, and wing'd with fear and shame,
 Through secret paths with swift prevention came.
 Now various motives various hopes afford,
 To these the place, to those the conquering sword:
 Oppress'd beneath their armour's cumbrous weight,
 Th' assailants labouring tempt the steep height;
 Half bending back they mount with panting pain,
 The following crowd their foremost mates sustain;

Against the shelving precipice they toil,
 And prop their hands upon the steeply pile:
 On cliffs and shrubs, their steps, some climb
 stay,

With cutting swords some clear the woody wa
 Nor death, nor wounds, their enemies annoy,
 While other uses now their arms employ.
 Their chief the danger from afar survey'd,
 And bade the horse fly timely to their aid.
 In order just the ready squadrons ride,
 Then wheeling to the right and left divide,
 To flank the foot, and guard each naked side.
 Safe in the middle space retire the foot,
 Make good the rear, and scorn the foe's pursuit;
 Each side retreat, though each disdain to yield,
 And claim the glory of the doubtful field.

Thus far the cause of Rome by arms was try'd
 And human rage alone the war supply'd;
 But now the elements new wrath prepare,
 And gathering tempests vex the troubled air.
 Long had the earth by wintery frosts been boun
 And the dry north had numb'd the lazy ground.
 No furrow'd fields were drench'd with drizzly ra
 Snow hid the hills, and hoary ice the plain.
 All desolate the western climes were seen,
 Keen were the blasts, and sharp the blue serene,
 To parch the fading herb, and dip the springing
 green.

At length the genial heat began to shine,
 With stronger beams in Aries' vernal sign;
 Again the golden day resum'd its right,
 And rul'd in just equation with the night:
 The moon her monthly course had now begun,
 And with increasing horns forsook the sun;
 When Boreas, by night's silver empress driven,
 To softer airs resign'd the western heaven.
 Then with warm breezes gentler Eurus came,
 Glowing with India's and Arabia's flame.
 The sweeping wind the gathering vapours press'd
 From every region of the farthest east;
 Nor hang they heavy in the midway sky,
 But speedy to Hesperia driving fly:
 To Calpe's hills the sluicy rains repair,
 From north, and south, the clouds assemble there,
 And darkening storms lour in the sluggish air.
 Where western skies the utmost ocean bound,
 The watery treasures heap the welkin round;
 Thither they crowd, and, scant'd in the space,
 Scarce between heaven and earth can find a plac
 Condens'd at length the spouting torrents pour,
 Earth smokes, and rattles with the gushing shower
 Jove's forked fires are rarely seen to fly,
 Extinguish'd in the deluge soon they die;
 Nor e'er before did dewy Iris show
 Such sady colours, or so maim'd a bow;
 Unvary'd by the light's refracting beam,
 She stoop'd to drink from oceans briny stream;
 Then to the dropping sky restor'd the rain:
 Again the falling waters fought the main.
 Then first the covering snows began to flow
 From off the Pyrenean's hoary brow;
 Huge hills of frost, a thousand ages old,
 O'er which the summer suns had vainly roll'd,
 Now melting, rush from every side amain,
 Swell every brook, and deluge all the plain.
 And now o'er Cæsar's camp the torrents sweep,
 Bear down the works, and fill the trenches deep.

ere men and arms in mix'd confusion swim,
and hollow tents drive with th' impetuous stream;
soft in the spreading floods the land-marks lie,
nor can the forager his way deſcry.

To beaſts for food the floating paſtures yield,
nor herbage riles in the watery field.
And now, to fill the meaſure of their fears,
fer baleful viſage meagre famine rears:
eldom alone, the troops among the fiends,
and ſtill on war and peſtilence attends.
Impreſ'd, unſtraiten'd by beſieging foes,
All miſeries of want the ſoldier knows.
Gladly he gives his little wealth, to eat,
And buys a morſel with his whole eſtate.
Curſ'd merchandiſe! where life itſelf is ſold,
And avarice conſents to ſtarve for gold!
No rock, no riſing mountain, rears his head,
No ſingle river winds along the mead,
But one vaſt lake o'er all the land is ſpread.
No ſofty grove, no foreſt haunt is found,
But in his den deep lies the ſavage drown'd:
With headlong rage reſtleſs in its courſe,
The rapid torrent whirls the ſnorting horſe;
High o'er the ſea the foamy freſhes ride,
While backward Tethys turns her yielding tide.
Meantime continued darkneſs veils the ſkies,
And ſuns with unavailing ardour riſe;
Nature no more her various face can boaſt,
But form is huddled up in night and loſt.
Such are the climes beneath the frozen zone,
Where cheerleſs winter plants her dreary throne;
No golden ſtars their gloomy heavens adorn,
Nor genial ſeaſons to their earth return:
But everlaſting ice and ſnows appear,
Bind up the ſummer ſigns, and curſe the barren
year.

Almighty Sire who doſt ſupremely reign,
And thou great ruler of the raging main!
Ye gracious gods! in mercy give command,
This deſolation may for ever ſtand.
Thou Jove! for ever cloud thy ſtormy ſky;
Thou Neptune! bid thy angry waves run high:
Heave thy huge trident for a mighty blow,
Strike the ſtrong earth, and bid her fountains flow;
Bid every river god exhauſt his urn,
Nor let thy own alternate tides return;
Wide let their blended waters waſte around,
Theſe regions, Rhine, and thoſe of Rhone conſound.
Melt, ye hoar mountains of Riphæan ſnow;
Brooks, ſtreams, and lakes, let all your ſources go;
Your ſpreading floods the guilt of Rome ſhall
ſpare,

And ſave the wretched world from civil war.

But fortune ſtay'd her ſhort diſpleaſure here,
Nor urg'd her minion with too long a fear;
With large increaſe her favours full return'd,
As if the gods themſelves his anger mourn'd;
As if his name were terrible to heaven,
And Providence could ſue to be forgiven.

Now 'gan the welkin clear to ſhine ſerene,
And Phœbus potent in his rays was ſeen.
The ſcattering clouds diſcloſ'd the piercing light,
And hung the firmament with fleecy white;
The troublous ſtorm had ſpent his wrathful ſtore,
And clattering rains were heard to ruſh no more.
Again the woods their leaty honours raiſe,
And herds upon the riſing mountains graze.

Day's genial heat upon the damps prevails,
And ripens into earth the ſlimy vales.
Bright glittering ſtars adorn night's ſpangled air,
And ruddy evening ſkies foretel the morning fair.
Soon as the falling Sicoris begun

A peaceful ſtream within his banks to run,
The bending willow into barks they twine,
Then line the work with ſpoils of ſlaughter'd kine:
Such are the floats Venetian fiſhers know,
Where in dull marſhes ſtands the ſettling Po;
On ſuch to neighbouring Gaul, allur'd by gain,
The bolder Britons croſs the iſwelting main;
Like theſe, when fruitful Egypt lies afloat,
The Memphian artiſt builds his reedy boat,
On theſe embarking bold with eager haite,
Acroſs the ſtream his legions Cæſar paſt:
Straight the tall woods with ſounding ſtrokes are fell'd,

And with ſtrong piles a beamy bridge they build;
Then, mindful of the flood fo lately ſpread,
They ſtretch the lengthening arches o'er the mead.
And, left his bolder waters riſe again,
With numerous dikes they canton out the plain,
And by a thouſand ſtreams the ſuffering river
drain.

Petreus now a fate ſuperior ſaw,
While elements obey proud Cæſar's law;
Then ſtraight Herda's lofty walls forſook,
And to the fartheſt weſt his arms betook;
The nearer regions faithleſs all around,
And baſely to the victor bent, he found.
When with juſt rage and indignation fir'd,
He to the Celtiberians fierce retir'd;
There fought, amidſt the world's extremelt parts,
Still daring hands, and ſtill unconquer'd hearts.

Soon as he view'd the neighbouring mountain's
head

No longer by the hoſtile camp o'erſpread,
Cæſar commands to arm. Without delay
The ſoldier to the river bends his way;
None then with cautious care the bridge explor'd,
Or fought the ſhallows of the ſater ford;
Arm'd at all points, they plunge amidſt the flood,
And with ſtrong ſinews make the paſſage good:
Dangers they ſcorn that might the bold aſright,
And ſtop ev'n panting cowards in their flight.
At length the farther bank attaining ſafe, [chaſe:
Chill'd by the ſtream, their dropping limbs they
Then with freſh vigour urge the foes purſuit,
And in the ſprightly chaſe the powers of life recruit.

Thus they; till half the courſe of life was run,
And leſſening ſhadows own'd the noon-day fun;
The ſiegers now a doubtful fight maintain,
While the fleet horſe in ſquadrons ſcour the plain;
The ſtragglers ſcattering round they force to yield,
And gather up the gleanings of the field.

'Midſt a wide plain two lofty rocks ariſe,
Between theſe cliffs an humble valley lies;
Long rows of ridgy mountains run behind,
Where ways obſcure and ſecret paſſes wind.
But Cæſar, deep within his thought, foreſees
The foes attempt the covert ſtrong to ſeize:
So may their troops at leiſure range aſar,
And to the Celtiberians lead the war
Be quick (he cries) nor minding juſt array,
Swift, to the combat, wing your ſpeedy way.

See! where yon cowards to the fastness haste,
 But let your terrors in their way be plac'd:
 Pierce not the fearful backs of those that fly,
 But on your meeting javelins let them die.
 He said. The ready legions took the word,
 And hastily obey their eager lord;
 With diligence the coming foe prevent,
 And stay their marches, to the mountains bent.
 Near neighbouring now the camps intrench'd are seen,

With scarce a narrow interval between.

Soon as their eyes o'erhoo't the middle space,
 From either host, fires, sons, and brothers trace }
 The well-known features of some kindred face. }
 Then first their hearts with tenderness were struck,
 First with remorse for civil rage they shook;
 Stiffening with horror cold, and dire amaze,
 A while in silent interviews they gaze:
 Anon with speechless signs their swords salute,
 While thoughts conflicting keep their masters mute.

At length, disdainful still to be repress,
 Prevailing passion rose in every breast,
 And the vain rules of guilty war transgress'd.
 As at a signal both their trenches quit,
 And spreading arms in close embraces knit:
 Now friendship runs o'er all her ancient claims,
 Guest and companion are their only names;
 Old neighbourhood they fondly call to mind,
 And how their boyish years in leagues were join'd.
 With grief each other mutually they know,
 And find a friend in every Roman foe.
 Their falling tears their steely arms bedew,
 While interrupting sighs each kiss pursue;
 And though their hands are yet upstain'd by guilt,
 They tremble for the blood they might have spilt.
 But speak, unhappy Roman! speak thy pain,
 Say for what woes thy streaming eyes complain?
 Why dost thou groan? why beat thy sounding breast?

Why is this wild fantastic grief express'd?
 Is it, that yet thy country claims thy care?
 Dost thou the crimes of war unwilling share?
 Ah! whither art thou by thy fears betray'd?
 How canst thou dread that power thyself hast
 made?

Do Cæsar's trumpets call thee? scorn the sound.
 Does he bid, march? dare thou to keep thy
 ground.

So rage and slaughter shall to justice yield,
 And hence Erinny's quit the fatal field:
 Cæsar in peace a private state shall know,
 And Pompey be no longer call'd his foe.

Appear, thou heavenly Concord! blest appear!
 And shed thy better influences here.
 Thou who the warring elements dost bind,
 Life of the world, and safety of mankind,
 Infuse thy sovereign balm, and heal the wrathful mind. }

But if the same dire fury rages yet,
 Too well they know what toes their swords shall
 meet;

No blind pretence of ignorance remains,
 The blood they shed must flow from Roman veins.
 Oh! fatal truce! the brand of guilty Rome!
 From thee worse wars and redder slaughters
 come.

See! with what free and unsuspecting love,
 From camp to camp the jocund warriors rove;
 Each to his turfy table bids his guest,
 And Bacchus crowns the hospitable feast.
 The grassy fires resplendent lend their light,
 While conversation sleepless wastes the night:
 Of early feats of arms, by turns they tell,
 Of fortunes that in various fields besell,
 With well-becoming pride their deeds relate,
 And now agree, and friendly now debate:
 At length their unassuming hands are join'd,
 And sacred leagues with faith renew'd they bind.
 But oh! what worse could cruel fate afford!
 The furies smil'd upon the curst accord,
 And dy'd with deeper stains the Roman sword.
 By busy fame Petreius soon is told,
 His camp, himself, to Cæsar all are sold;
 When straight the chief indignant calls to arm,
 And bids the trumpet spread the loud alarm.
 With war encompass'd round he takes his way,
 And breaks the short-liv'd truce with fierce a fray;

He drives th' unarm'd and unsuspecting guest,
 Amaz'd, and wounded, from th' unfinished feast;
 With horrid steel he cuts each fond embrace,
 And violates with blood the new-made peace.
 And left the fainting flames of wrath expire,
 With words like these he fans the deadly fire:
 Ye herd! unknowing of the Roman worth,
 And lost to the great cause which led you forth;
 Though victory and captive Cæsar were
 Honours too glorious for your swords to share;
 Yet something, abject as you are, from you,
 Something to virtue and the laws is due:
 A second praise ev'n yet you may partake!
 Fight, and be vanquish'd for your country's sake
 Can you, while fate as yet suspends our doom,
 While you have blood and lives to lose for Rome
 Can you with tame submission seek a lord;
 And own a cause by men and gods abhorr'd?
 Will you in lowly wife his mercy crave?
 Can soldiers beg to wear the name of slave?
 Would you for us your suit to Cæsar move?
 Know we disdain his pardoning power to prove!
 No private bargain shall redeem this head:
 For Rome, and not for us, the war was made.
 Though peace a specious poor pretence afford,
 Baseness and bondage lurk beneath the word.
 In vain the workmen search the steely mine
 To arm the field, and bid the battle shine;
 In vain the fortress lifts her towery height;
 In vain the warlike steed provokes the fight;
 In vain our oars the foamy ocean sweep;
 In vain our floating castles hide the deep;
 In vain by land, in vain by sea we fought,
 If peace shall e'er with liberty be bought.
 See! with what constancy, what gallant pride,
 Our steadfast foes defend an impious side!
 Bound by their oaths, though enemies to good,
 They scorn to change from what they once have vow'd.

While each vain breath your slackening faith
 withdraws,
 Yours! who pretend to arm for Rome and laws,
 Who find no fault, but justice in your cause,
 And yet, methinks, I would not give you o'er,
 A brave repentance still is in your power:

While Pompey calls the utmost east from far,
And leads the Indian monarchs on to war,
Shall we (oh shame!) prevent his great success,
And bind his hands by our inglorious peace?

He spoke; and civil rage at once returns,
Each breath the fonder thought of pity scorns,
And ruthless with redoubled fury burns.
So when the tyger, or the spotted pard,
Long from the woods and savage haunts debar'd,

From their first fierceness for a while are won,
And seem to put a gentler nature on;
Patient their prison, and mankind they bear,
Fawn on their lords, and looks less horrid wear:
But let the taste of slaughter be renew'd,
And their fell jaws again with gore imbrud;
Then dreadfully their wakening furies rise,
And glaring fires rekindle in their eyes;
With wrathful roar their echoing dens they tear,

And hardly ev'n the well-known keeper spare;
The shuddering keeper shakes, and stands aloof for fear.

From friendship freed, and conscious nature's tie,
To undistinguish'd slaughters loose they fly;
With guilt avow'd their daring crimes advance,
And scorn th' excuse of ignorance and chance.
Those whom so late their fond embraces prest,
The bosom's partner, and the welcome guest;
Now at the board unhopitable bleed,
While streams of blood the flowing bowl succeed,

With groans at first each draws the glittering
And lingering death stops in th' unwilling hand:
Till urg'd at length returning force they feel,
And catch new courage from the murdering steel:

Vengeance and hatred rise with every blow,
And blood paints every visage like a foe.
Uproar and horror through the camp abound,
While impious sons their mangled fathers wound,
And, lest the merit of the crime be lost,
With dreadful joy the parricide they boast;
Proud to their chiefs the cold pale heads they
bear,

The gore yet dropping from the silver hair.
But thou, O Cæsar! to the gods be dear!
Thy pious mercy well becomes their care;
And though thy soldier falls by treacherous
peace,

Be proud, and reckon this thy great success.
Not all thou ow'st to bounteous Fortune's smile,
Not proud Mæflia, nor the Pharian Nile;
Not the full conquest of Pharsalia's field,
Could greater fame, or nobler trophies yield;
Thine and the cause of justice now are one,
Since guilty slaughter brands thy foes alone.

Nor dare the conscious leaders longer wait,
Or trust to such unhallow'd hands their fate:
Astonish'd and dismay'd they flun the fight,
And to Herda turn their hasty flight.
But, ere their march achieves its destin'd course,
Preventing Cæsar sends the winged horse:
The speedy squadrons seize th' appointed ground,
And hold their foes on hills encompass'd round.
Pent up in barren heights, they strive in vain
Refreshing springs and flowing streams to gain;

Strong hostile works their camp's extension stay,
And deep-funk trenches intercept their way.

Now deaths in unexpected forms arise,
Thirst and pale famine stalk before their eyes.
Shut up and close besieg'd, no more they need
The strength or swiftness of the warlike steed;
But doom the generous couriers all to bleed.
Hopeless at length, and barr'd around from
flight,

Headlong they rush to arms, and urge the fight:
But Cæsar, who with wary eyes beheld,
With what determin'd rage they sought the field,
Restrain'd his eager troops. Forbear, he cry'd,
Nor let your sword in madmen's blood be dy'd.
But, since they come devoted by despair,
Since life is grown unworthy of their care,
Since 'tis their time to die, 'tis our's to spare.
Those naked bosoms that provoke the foe,
With greedy hopes of deadly vengeance glow;
With pleasure shall they meet the pointed steel,
Nor smarming wounds, nor dying anguish feel,
If, while they bleed, your Cæsar shares the pain,
And mourns his gallant friends among the slain.
But wait awhile, this rage shall soon be past,
This blaze of courage is too fierce to last;
This ardour for the fight shall faint away,
And all this fond desire of death decay.

He spoke; and at the word the war was stay'd,

Till Phœbus fled from night's ascending shade.
Ev'n all the day, embattled on the plain,
The rash Petreians urge to arms in vain:
At length the weary ire began to cease,
And wasting fury languish'd into peace;
Th' impatient arrogance of wrath declin'd,
And slackening passions cool'd upon the mind.
So when, the battle roaring loud around,
Some warrior warm receives a fatal wound;
While yet the griding sword has newly past,
And the first pungent pains and anguish last:
While full with life the turgid vessels rise,
And the warm juice the spiritid nerve supplies;
Each sinewy limb with fiercer force is prest,
And rage redoubles in the burning breast:
But if, as conscious of th' advantage gain'd,
The cooler victor stays his wrathful hand;
Then sinks his thrall with ebbing spirits low,
The black blood stiffens and forgets to flow;
Cold damps and numbness close the deadly fount,
And stretch him pale and fainting on the ground;

For water now on every side they try,
Alike the sword and delving spade employ;
Earth's bosom dark, laborious they explore,
And search the sources of her liquid store;
Deep in the hollow hill the well descends,
Till level with the moister plain it ends.
Not lower down from cheerful day decline
The pale Assyrians, in the golden mine.
In vain they toil, no secret streams are found
To roll their murmuring tides beneath the
ground.

No burring springs repay the workman's stroke,
Nor glittering gulf from out the wounded rock;
No sweating caves in dewy droppings stand,
Nor smallest rills run gurgling o'er the sand.
Spent and exhausted with the fruitless pain,
The fainting youth ascend to light again.

And now less patient of the drought they grow,
Than in those cooler depths of earth below;
No favoury viands crown the cheerful board,
Ev'n food for want of water stands abhorrd;
To hunger's neagre refuge they retreat,
And, since they cannot drink, refuse to eat.
Where yielding clods a moister clay consents,
With gripping hands the clammy glebe they
press;

Where'er the standing puddle loathsome lies,
Thither in crowds the thirsty soldier flies;
Horrid to sight, the miry filth they quaff,
And drain with dying jaws the deadly draff.
Some seek the bestial mothers for suppy,
And draw the herds extended udders dry;
Till thirst, unfast with the milky store,
With labouring lips drinks in the putrid gore.
Some strip the leaves, and suck the morning
dews;

Some grind the bark, the woody branches
And squeeze the sapling's unconcocted juice.

Oh happy those, to whom the barbarous kings
Left their envenom'd floods, and tainted springs!
Cæsar be kind, and every bane prepare,
Which Cretan rocks, or Lybian serpents bear:
The Romans to thy poisonous streams shall fly,
And, conscious of the danger, drink, and die.
With secret flames their withering entrails burn,
And fiery breathings from their lungs return;
The shrinking veins contract their purple flood,
And urge, laborious, on the beating blood;
The heaving sighs through frailer passages blow,
And scorch the painful palate as they go;
The parch'd rough tongue night's humid vapours
draws,

And restless rolls within the clammy jaws;
With gaping mouths they wait the falling rain,
And want those floods that lately spread the plain.

Vainly to heaven they turn their longing eyes,
And fix them on the dry relentless skies.
Nor here by sandy Afric are they cur'd,
Nor Cancer's sultry line inflames their thirst;
But to enhance their pain, they view below,
Where lakes stand full, and plenteous rivers flow;
Between two streams expires the panting host,
And in a land of water are they lost.

Now prest by pinching want's unequal weight,
The vanquish'd leaders yield to adverse fate:
Rejecting arms, Atreus seeks relief,
And sues submissive to the hostile chief.
Foremost himself, to Cæsar's camp he leads
His famish'd troops, a fainting band succeeds.
At length, in presence of the victor plac'd,
A sitting dignity his gesture grac'd,
That spoke his present fortunes, and his past.
With decent mixture in his manly mien,
The captive and the general were seen:
Then, with a free, secure, undaunted breast,
For mercy thus his pious suit he prest.

Had Fate and my ill fortune laid me low,
Beneath the power of some ungenerous foe;
My sword hung ready to protect my fame,
And this right-hand had sav'd my soul from
shame:

But now with joy I bend my suppliant knee,
Life is worth asking, since 'tis given by thee.

No party-zeal our factious arms inclines,
No hate of thee, or of thy bold designs,
War with its own occasions came unfought,
And found us on the side for which we fought:
True to our cause as best becomes the brave;
Long as we could, we kept that faith we gave.
Nor shall our arms thy stronger fate delay,
Behold! our yielding paves thy conquering way:
The western nations all at once we give,
Securely these behind thee shalt thou leave;
Here while thy full dominion stands contest,
Receive it as an earnest of the east.
Nor this thy easy victory disdain,
Bought with no fears of blood, nor hills of
slain;

Forgive the foes that spare thy sword a pain.
Nor is the boon for which we sue too great,
The weary soldier begs a last retreat;
In some poor village, peaceful at the plough,
Let them enjoy the life thou dost bestow.
Think, in some field, among the slain we lie,
And lost to thy remembrance cast us by.
Mix not our arms in thy successful war,
Nor let thy captives in thy triumph share.
These unprevailing bands their fate have try'd,
And prov'd that fortune fights not on their side.
Guiltless to cease from slaughter we implore,
Let us not conquer with thee, and we ask no more.

He said. The victor, with a gentler grace,
And mercy softening his severer face,
Bade his attending toes their fears dismiss,
Go free from punishment, and live in peace.
Be true on equal terms at length agreed,
The waters from the watchful guard are freed:
Eager to drink, down rush the thirsty crowd,
Hang o'er the banks, and trouble all the flood.
Some, while too fierce the fatal draughts they
drain,

Forget the gasping lungs that heave in vain;
No breathing airs the choking channels fill,
But every spring of life at once stands still.
Some drink, nor yet the fervent pest assuage,
With wonted fires their bloated entrails rage;
With bursting sides each bulk enormous heaves,
While still for drink th' insatiate fever craves.
At length returning health dispers'd the pain,
And lusty vigour string the nerves again.

Behold! ye sons of luxury, behold!
Who scatter in excess your lavish gold;
You who the wealth of frugal ages waste,
I' indulge a wanton supercilious taste:
For whom all earth, all ocean are explor'd,
To spread the various proud voluptuous board:
Behold! how little thrifty nature craves,
And what a cheap relief the lives of thousands saves!

No costly wines these fainting legions know,
Mark'd by old consuls many a year ago;
No waiting slaves the precious juices pour,
From myrrhine goblets, or the golden ore:
But with pure draughts they cool the boiling
blood,

And seek their succour from the crystal flood.
Who, but a wretch, would think it worth his care,
The toils and wickedness of war to share,
When all we want thus easily we find?
The field and river can supply mankind.

Dismiss'd, and safe from danger and alarms,
 The vanquish'd to the victor quits his arms;
 Guiltless from camps, to cities he repairs,
 And in his native land forgets his cares.
 There in his mind he runs, repenting o'er
 The tedious toils and perils once he bore;
 His spear and sword of battle stand accurst,
 He hates the weary march, and parching thirst;
 And wonders much that e'er with pious pain
 He pray'd so oft for victory in vain:
 For victory! the curse of those that win,
 The fatal end where still new woes begin.
 Let the proud masters of the horrid field
 Count all the gains their dire successies yield;
 Then let them think what wounds they yet must feel,

Ere they can fix revolving fortune's wheel,
 As yet th' imperfect task by halves is done,
 Blood, blood remains, more battles must be won,
 And many a heavy labour undergone:
 Still conquering, to new guilt they shall succeed,
 Wherever restless fate and Cæsar lead.
 How happier lives the man to peace assign'd,
 Amidst this general storm that wrecks mankind!

In his own quiet house ordain'd to die,
 He knows the place in which his bones shall lie.
 No trumpet warns him 'put his harness on,
 Though faint, and all with weariness foredone;
 But when night falls he lies securely down,
 And calls the creeping slumber all his own.
 His kinder fates the warrior's hopes prevent,
 And ere the time, the wish'd dismissal sent;
 A lowly cottage, and a tender wife,
 Receive him in his early days of life;
 His boys, a rustic tribe, around him play,
 And homely pleasures wear the vacant day.
 No factious parties here the mind engage,
 Nor work th' imbitter'd passions up to rage;
 With equal eyes the hostile chiefs they view,
 To this their faith, to that their lives are due:
 To both oblig'd alike, no part they take,
 Nor vows for conquest, nor against it, make.
 Mankind's misfortunes they behold from far,
 Pleas'd to stand neuter, while the world's at war.

But fortune, bent to check the victor's pride,
 In other lands forsook her Cæsar's side;
 With changing cheer the sickle goddess frown'd,
 And for a while her favourite cause disown'd.
 Where Adria's swelling surge Salonæ laves,
 And warm Iader rolls his gentle waves,
 Bold in the brave Curictan's warlike band,
 Antonius camps upon the utmost strand:
 Begirt around by Pompey's floating power,
 He braves the navy from his well-fenc'd shore.
 But while the distant war no more he fears,
 Famine, a worse, restless, foe, appears:
 No more the meads their grassy pasture yield,
 Nor waving harvests crown the yellow field.
 On every verdant leaf the hungry feed,
 And snatch the forage from the fainting steed;
 Then ravenous on their camp's defence they fall,
 And grind with greedy jaws the turfy wall.
 Near on the neighbouring coast at length they spy
 Where Bassius with social faith draws nigh;
 While, led by Dolabella's bold command,
 Their Cæsar's legions spread th' Illyrian strand:

Straight with new hopes their hearts recovering beat,

Aim to elude the foe, and meditate retreat.

Of wondrous form a vast machine they build,
 New, and unknown upon the floating field.
 Here, nor the keel its crooked length extends,
 Nor o'er the waves the rising deck ascends:
 By beams and grappling chains compacted strong,
 Light skiffs, and calks, two equal rows prolong:
 O'er these, of solid oak securely made,
 Stable and tight a flooring firm is laid;
 Sublime, from hence, two planks towers run
 high,

And nodding battlements the foe defy.
 Securely plac'd, each rising range between,
 The luty rower plies his talk unseen.
 Meanwhile nor oars upon the sides appear,
 Nor swelling sails receive the driving air;
 But living seems the mighty mass to sweep,
 And glide self-mov'd athwart the yielding deep.
 Three wondrous floats of this enormous size,
 Soon by the skilful builder's craft arise;
 The ready warriors all aboard them ride,
 And wait the turn of the retiring tide.
 Backward at length revolving Tethys flows,
 And ebbing waves the naked sands disclose:
 Straight by the stream the launching piles are borne,
 Shields, spears, and helms, their nodding towers adorn;

Threatening they move in terrible array,
 And to the deeper ocean bend their way.

Octavius now, whose naval powers command
 Adria's rude seas, and wide Illyria's strand,
 Full in their course his fleet advancing stays,
 And each impatient combatant delays:
 To the blue offing wide he seems to bear,
 Hopeful to draw th' unwary vessels near;
 Aloof he rounds them, eager on his prey,
 And tempts them with an open roomy sea.
 Thus, when the wily huntsman spreads his nets,
 And with his ambient toil the woods besets;
 While yet his buty hands, with skilful care,
 The meshy hayes and forky props prepare;
 Ere yet the deer the painted plumage spy,
 Snuff the strong odour from afar, and fly;
 His mates, the Cretan hound and Spartan bind,
 And muzzle all the loud Molossian kind;
 The quæstor only to the wood they loose,
 Who silently the tainted track pursues:
 Mute signs alone the conscious haunt betray,
 While fix'd he points, and trembles to the prey.

'Twas at the season when the fainting light,
 Just in the evening's close brought on the night:
 When the tall towery floats their isle forsook,
 And to the sea their course, adventurous, took.
 But now the fam'd Sicilian pirates, skill'd
 In arts and and warfare of the liquid field,
 Their wonted wiles and stratagems provide,
 To aid their great acknowledg'd victor's side.
 Beneath the glassy surface of the main,
 From rock to rock they stretch a ponderous chain;
 Loosely the flacker links suspended flow,
 T' enwrap the driving fabrics as they go.
 Urg'd from within, and waded by the tide,
 Smooth o'er the boom the first and second glide;
 The third the guileful latent chain enfolds,
 And in his steely grasp entwining holds:

From the tall rocks the shouting victors roar,
 And drag the resty captive to the shore.
 For ages past an ancient cliff there stood, [flood ;
 Whose bending brow hung threatening o'er the
 A verdant grove was on the summit plac'd,
 And o'er the waves a gloomy shadow cast ;
 While near the base wild hollows sink below,
 There roll huge seas, and bellowing tempests
 blow :

Thither whate'er the greedy waters drown,
 The shipwreck, and the driving corpse are thrown:
 Anon the gaping gulf the spoil restores,
 And from his lowest depths loud-sputting pours.
 Not rude Charybdis roars in sounds like these,
 When thundering, with a burst, she spews the foamy seas.

Hither, with warlike Opitergians fraught,
 The third ill-fated prisoner float was brought ;
 The foe, as at a signal, speed their way,
 And haste to compass in the destin'd prey ;
 The crowding sails from every station press,
 While armed bands the rocks and shores possess.
 Too late the chief, Vulteius, found the snare,
 And strove to burst the toil with fruitless care :
 Driv'n by despair at length, nor thinking yet
 Which way to fight, or whither to retreat,
 He turns upon the foe ; and though distress,
 By wiles entangled, and by crowds oppress,
 With scarce a single cohort to his aid,
 Against the gathering host a stand he made.
 Fierce was the combat fought, with slaughter
 great,

Though thus an odds unequally they meet,
 One with a thousand match'd, a ship against a fleet.

But soon on dusky wings arose the night,
 And with her friendly shade restrains the fight ;
 The combatants from war consenting cease,
 And pass the hours of darkness o'er in peace.

When to the soldier, anxious for his fate,
 And doubtful what succeeds the dawn might wait,
 The brave Vulteius thus his speech address'd,
 And thus compos'd the cares of every beating breast. [cree,

My gallant friends ! whom our hard fates de-
 This night, this short night only, to be free ;
 Think what remains to do, but think with haste,
 Ere the brief hour of liberty be past.
 Perhaps, reduc'd to this so hard extreme,
 Too short, to some, the date of life may seem ;
 Yet know, brave youths, that none untimely fall,
 Whom death obeys, and comes but when they call.
 'Tis true, the neighbouring danger waits us
 nigh ;

We meet but that from which we cannot fly ;
 Yet think not but with equal praise we die. }
 Dark and uncertain is man's future doom,
 If years, or only moments, are to come :
 All is but dying ; he who gives an hour, [power.
 Or he who gives an age, gives all that's in his
 Sooner, or late, all mortals know the grave,
 But to choose death distinguishes the brave.
 Behold, where waiting round, yon hostile band,
 Our fellow-citizens, our lives demand.
 Prevent we then their cruel hands, and bleed ; }
 'Tis but to do what is too sure decreed,
 And where our fate would drag us on, to lead. }

A great conspicuous slaughter shall we yield,
 Nor lie the carnage of a common field :
 Where one ignoble heap confounds the slain,
 And men, and beasts, promiscuous strow the plain.
 Plac'd on this float by some diviner hand,
 As on a stage, for public view we stand.
 Illyria's neighbouring shores, her isles around,
 And every cliff, with gazers shall be crown'd ;
 The seas, and earth, our virtue shall proclaim,
 And stand eternal vouchers for our fame ;
 Alike the foes and fellows of our cause,
 Shall mark the deed, and join in vast applause.
 Blest be thou, fortune, that has mark'd us forth,
 A monument of unexampled worth ;
 To latest times our story shall be told,
 Ev'n rais'd beyond the noblest names of old.
 Distinguish'd praise shall crown our daring youth,
 Our pious honour, and unshaken truth.
 Mean is our offering, Cæsar, we confess :
 For such a chief, what soldier can do less ?
 Yet oh ! this faithful pledge of love receive !
 Take it, 'tis all that captives have to give.
 Oh ! that to make the victim yet more dear,
 Our aged fires, our children had been here :
 Then with full horror should the slaughter rise,
 And blast our paler foes astonish'd eyes ;
 Till, aw'd beneath that scorn of death we wear,
 They blest the time our fellows 'scap'd their snare :

Till with mean tears our fate the cowards mourn,
 And tremble at the rage with which we burn.
 Perhaps they mean our constant souls to try,
 Whether for life and peace we may comply.
 Oh ! grant, ye gods ! their offers may be great,
 That we may gloriously disdain to treat,
 That this last proof of virtue we may give,
 And show we die not now, because we could not live.

That valour to no common heights must rise,
 Which he, our godlike chief himself shall prize,
 Immortal shall our truth for ever stand,
 If Cæsar thinks this little faithful band
 A loss, amidst the host of his command. }
 For me, my friends, my fix'd resolve is ta'en,
 And fate, or chance, may proffer life in vain ;
 I scorn whatever safety they provide,
 And cast the worthless trifling thought aside.
 The sacred rage of death devours me whole,
 Reigns in my heart, and triumphs in my soul :
 I see, I reach the period of my woe,
 And taste those joys the dying only know.
 Wisely the gods conceal the wondrous good,
 Left man no longer should endure his load ;
 Left every wretch like me from life should fly,
 Seize his own happiness himself, and die.

He spoke. The band his potent tongue confess'd,
 And generous ardour burn'd in every breast.
 No longer now they view, with watery eyes,
 The swift revolving circle of the skies ;
 No longer think the setting stars in haste,
 Nor wonder slow Bœotes moves so fast ;
 But with high hearts exulting all, and gay,
 They wish for light, and call the tardy day.
 Yet, nor the heavenly axis long delays,
 To roll the radiant signs beneath the seas ;
 In Leda's twins now rose the warmer sun,
 And near the lofty Crab exalted shone ;

Swiftly night's shorter shades began to move,
 And to the west Thessalian Chiron drove.
 At length the morning's purple beams disclose
 The wide horizon cover'd round with foes;
 Each rock and shore the crowding Isthmians keep,
 While Greeks and fierce Liburnians spread the
 When yet, ere fury lets the battle loose, [deep:
 Octavius woes them with the terms of truce;
 If haply Pompey's chains they choose to wear,
 And captive life to instant death prefer.
 But the brave youth, regardless of his might,
 Fierce in the scorn of life, and hating light,
 Fearless, and careless of what'er may come,
 Resolv'd, and self-determin'd to their doom;
 Alike disdain the threatening of the war,
 And all the flattering wiles their foes prepare.
 Calmly the numerous legions round they view,
 At once by land and sea the fight renew;
 Relief, or friends, or aid, expect they none,
 But fix one certain truth in death alone.
 In opposition firm awhile they stood,
 But soon were satisfy'd with hostile blood.
 Then turning from the foe, with gallant pride.
 Is there a generous youth (Vulturnus cry'd)
 Whose worthy sword may pierce your leader's side?

He said; and at the word, from every part,
 A hundred pointed weapons reach'd his heart;
 Dying he prais'd them all, but him the chief,
 Whose eager duty brought the first relief:
 Deep in his breast he plung'd his deadly blade,
 And with a grateful stroke the friendly gift re-pay'd.

At once all rush, at once to death they fly,
 And on each others sword alternate die,
 Greedy to make the mischief all their own,
 And arrogate the guilt of war alone.
 A fate like this did Cadmus' harvest prove,
 When mortally the earth-born brethren strove;
 When by each other's hands of life bereft,
 An omen dire to future Thebes they left.
 Such was the rage inspir'd the Colchian foes,
 When from the dragon's wondrous teeth they rose;
 When urg'd by charms, and magic's mystic power,
 They dy'd their native field with streaming gore;
 Till ev'n the fell enchantress stood dismay'd,
 And wonder'd at the mischiefs which she made.
 Furies more fierce the dying Romans feel,
 And with brave breasts provoke the lingering
 steel;

With fond embraces catch the deadly darts,
 And press them plunging to their panting hearts.
 No wound imperfect, for a second call;
 With certain aim the sure destruction falls.
 This last best gift, this one unerring blow,
 Sires, sons, and brothers, mutually bestow;
 Nor piety, nor fond remorse prevail,
 And if they fear, they only fear to fail. [stain,
 Here with red streams the blushing waves they
 Here dash their mingled entrails in the main.
 Here with a last disdain they view the skies,
 Shut out heaven's hated light with scornful eyes,
 And, with insulting joy, the victor foe despise. }
 At length the heapy slaughter rose on high,
 The hostile chiefs the purple pile defcry;
 And while the last accustom'd rites they give,
 Scarcely the unexampl'd deed believe:

Much they admire a faith by death approv'd,
 And wonder lawless power could e'er be thus be-lov'd.

Wide through mankind eternal fame displays
 This happy crew, this single vessel's praife.
 But, oh! the story of the godlike rage
 Is lost, upon a vile, degenerate age;
 The base, the slavish world will not be taught,
 With how much ease their freedom may be bought.

Still arbitrary power on thrones commands,
 Still liberty is gall'd by tyrants bands,
 And swords in vain are trusted to our hands. }
 Oh! death! thou pleasing end of human woe,
 Thou cure for life, thou greatest good below;
 Still may'st thou fly the coward and the slave,
 And thy soft slumbers only blefs the brave.

Nor war's pernicious god less havoc yields,
 Where swarthy Lybia spreads her sun-burnt fields.

For Curio now the stretching canvas spread,
 And from Sicilian shores his navy led;
 To Afric's coast he cuts the foamy way,
 Where low the once victorious Carthage lay.
 There landing, to the well-known camp he hies,
 Where from afar the distant seas he spies;
 Where Bagrada's dull waves the sands divide,
 And slowly downward roll their sluggish tide.
 From thence he seeks the heights reconov'd by
 fame,

And hallow'd by the great Cornelian name:
 The rocks and hills which long, traditions say,
 Were held by huge Antæus' horrid sway.
 Here, as, by chance, he lights upon the place,
 Curious he tries the reverend tale to trace.
 When thus, in short, the ruder Libyans tell,
 What from their fires they heard, and how the case befel:

The teeming earth, forever fresh and young,
 Yet, after many a giant son, was strong;
 When labouring, here, with the prodigious birth,
 She brought her youngest-born Antæus forth.
 Of all the dreadful brood which erst he bore,
 In none the fruitful beldame glory'd more:
 Happy for those above he brought him not,
 Till after Phiegra's doubtful field was fought.
 That this, her darling, might in force excel,
 A gift she gave: whence'er to earth he fell,
 Recruited strength he from his parent drew,
 And every slackening nerve was strung anew.
 You gave his den he made; where oft for food,
 He snatch'd the mother lion's horrid brood.
 Nor leaves, nor sraggy hides, his couch prepar'd,
 Torn from the tiger, or the spotted pard;
 But stretch'd along the naked earth he lies:
 New vigour still the native earth supplies.
 What'er he meets, his ruthless hands invade
 Strong in himself, without his mother's aid.
 The strangers that unknowing seek the shore,
 Soon a worse shipwreck on the land deplore.
 Dreadful to all, with matchless might he reigns, }
 Robs, spoils, and massacres the simple swains, }
 And all unpeopled lie the Lybian plains.
 At length, around the trembling nations spread,
 Fame of the tyrant to Alcides fled,
 The godlike hero, born, by Jove's decree,
 To fet the seas, and earth, from monsters free;

Hither in generous pity bent his course,
And fet himself to prove the giant's force.

Now met, the combatants for fight provide,
And either doffs the lion's yellow hide.
Bright in Olympic oil Alcides shone,
Antæus with his mother's dust is frown,
And seeks her friendly force to aid his own. }
Now seizing fierce their grasping hands they mix,
And labour on the swelling throat to fix;
'Their fiery arms are wreth'd in many a fold,
And, front to front, they threaten stern and bold.
Unmatch'd before, each bends a fullen frown,
To find a force thus equal to his own.
At length the godlike victor Greek prevail'd,
Nor yet the foe with all his force assail'd,
Faint dropping sweats bedew the monster's brows,
And panting thick with heaving sides he blows;
His trembling head the slackening nerves con-fets'd,

And from the hero shrunk his yielding breast.
The conqueror pursues, his arms entwine,
Infoling gripe, and strain his crashing chine, }
While his broad knee bears forceful on his groin:
At once his faulteting feet from earth he rends,
And on the sands his mighty length extends.
The parent earth her vanquish'd son deplores,
And with a touch his vigour lost restores:
From his faint limbs the clammy dew she drains,
And with fresh streams recruits his ebbing veins;
The muscles swell, the hardening sinews rise,
And bursting from th' Herculean grasp he flies.
Astonish'd at the sight Alcides stood:
Nor more he wonder'd, when in Lerna's flood
The dreadful snake her falling heads renew'd. }
Of all his various labours, none was seen
With equal joy by heav'n's unrighteous queen;
Pleas'd the beheld, what toil, what pains he prov'd,

He who had borne the weight of heaven unmov'd.
Sudden again upon the foe he flew,
'The falling foe to earth for aid withdrew;
The earth again her fainting son supplies,
And with redoubled forces bids him rise:
Her vital powers to succour him she sends,
And earth herself with Hercules contends.
Conscious at length of such unequal fight,
And that the parent touch renew'd his might,
No longer shalt thou fall, Alcides cry'd,
Henceforth the combat standing shall be try'd;
If thou wilt lean, to me alone incline,
And rest upon no other breast but mine.
He said; and as he saw the monster stoop,
With mighty arms aloft he rears him up:
No more the distant earth her son supplies,
Lock'd in the hero's strong embrace he lies;
Nor thence dismiss'd, nor trusted to the ground,
Till death in every frozen limb was found.

Thus, fond of tales, our ancestors of old
The story to their children's children told;
From thence a title to the land they gave,
And call'd this hollow rock Antæus' cave.
But greater deeds this rising mountain grace,
And Scipio's name ennobles much the place;
While, fixing here his famous camp, he calls
Fierce Hannibal from Rome's devoted walls.
As yet the mauldering works remain in view,
Where dreadful once the Latian eagles flew.

Fond of the prosperous victorious name,
And trusting fortune would be still the same,
Hither his hapless ensigns Curio leads,
And here his inauspicious camp he spreads.
A fierce superior foe his arms provoke,
And rob the hills of all their ancient luck.
O'er all the Roman pow'rs in Libya's land,
Then Atius Varus bore supreme command;
Nor trusting in the Latian strength alone,
With foreign force he fortify'd his own;
Summon'd the swarthy monarchs all from far,
And call'd remotest Juba forth to war.
O'er many a country runs his wide command;
To Atlas huge, and Gades' western strand;
From thence to horned Ammon's fane renown'd,
And the waste Syrts unhopitable bound:
Southward as far he reigns, and rules alone
The sultry regions of the burning zone.
With him, unnumber'd nations march along,
Th' Autololes with wild Numidians throng;
The rough Getulian, with his ruder steed;
The Moor, resembling India's swarthy breed;
Poor Nafames, and Garamantines join'd,
With swift Marmaridans that match'd the wind;

The Mazax, bred the trembling dart to throw,
Sure as the shaft that leaves the Parthian bow;
With these Masilia's nimble horsemen ride,
They, not the bit, nor curbing rein provide,
But with light rods the well-taught courser
guide.
From lonely cots the Libyan hunters came,
Who still unarm'd invade the savage game,
And with spread mantles tawny lions tame.

But not Rome's fate, nor civil rage alone,
Incite the monarch Pompey's cause to own;
Stung by resenting wrath, the war he fought,
And deep displeasures past by Curio wrought.
He, when the tribune's sacred power he gain'd,
When justice, laws, and gods were all profan'd;
At Juba's ancient sceptre aim'd his hate,
And strove to rob him of his royal fate:
From a just prince would tear his native right,
While Rome was made a slave to lawless might.
The king, revolving causes from afar,
Looks on himself as party to the war.
That grudge, too well remembering, Curio knew;
To this he joins, his troops to Cæsar new,
None of those old experienc'd faithful bands,
Nurs'd in his fear, and bred to his commands;
But a loose, neutral, light, uncertain train,
Late with Corfinium's captive fortrefs ta'en,
That waving pause, and doubt for whom to strike,

Sworn to both sides, and true to both alike,
The careful chief beheld, with anxious heart,
The faithless centinels each night desert:
Then thus, resolving, to himself he cry'd,
By daring shows our greatest fears we hide:
Then let me haste to bid the battle join,
And lead my army, while it yet is mine;
Leisure and thinking still to change incline.
Let war, and action, busy thought controul,
And find a full employment for the soul.
When with drawn swords determin'd soldiers
stand,
When shame is lost, and fury prompts the hand,

What reason then can find a time to pause,
To weigh the differing chiefs; and juster cause?
That cause seems only just for which they fight,
Each likes his own, and all are in the right.
On terms like these, within th' appointed space,
Bold gladiators, gladiators face:
Unknowing why, like fiercest foes they greet,
And only hate, and kill, because they meet.
He said; and rang'd his troops upon the plain,
While Fortune met him with a semblance vain,
Covering her malice keen, and all his future pain.

Before him Varus' vanquish'd legions yield,
And with dishonest flight forsake the field;
Expos'd to shameful wounds their backs he views,
And to their camp the fearful rout pursues.

Juba with joy the mournful news receives,
And haughty in his own success believes.
Careful his foes in error to maintain,
And still preserve them confident, and vain;
Silent he marches on in clost fort,
And keeps his numbers close from loud report.

Saburra, great in the Numidian race,
And second to their swarthy king in place,
First with a chosen slender band precedes,
And seemingly the force of Juba leads:
While hidden he, the prince himself, remains,
And in a secret vale his host constrains.

Thus oft th' ichneumon, on the banks of Nile,
Invades the deadly asp by a wile;
While artfully his slender tail is play'd,
The serpent-darts upon the dancing shade;
Then turning on the foe with swift surprize,
Full at his throat the nimble feizer flies:
The gasping snake expires beneath the wound,
His guthing jaws with poisonous floods abound,
And shed the fruitless mischief on the ground.

Nor fortune fail'd to favour his intent,
But crown'd the fraud with prosperous event.
Curio, unknowing of the hostile power,
Commands his horse the doubtful plain to scour,
And ev'n by night the regions round explore.

Himself, though oft forewarn'd by friendly care,
Of Punic frauds, and danger to beware,
Soon as the dawn of early day was broke,
His camp, with all the moving foot, forsook.
It seem'd, necessity inspir'd the deed,And fate requir'd the daring youth should bleed.

War, that curst war which he himself begun,
To death and ruin drove him headlong on.
O'er devious rocks, long time, his way he takes,
Through rugged paths, and rude encumbering brakes;

Till, from afar, at length the hills disclose,
Assembling on their heights, his distant foes.
Oft hasty flight with swift retreat they feign,
To draw th' unwary leader to the plain.

He, rash and ignorant of Libyan wiles,
Wide o'er the naked champain spreads his files;
When, sudden, all the circling mountains round
With numberless Numidians thick are crown'd;
At once the rising ambush stands confess'd,
And dread strikes cold on every Roman breast.

Helpless they view th' impending danger nigh,
Nor can the valiant fight, nor coward fly.
The weary horse neglects the trumpet's sound,
Nor with impatient ardour paws the ground;

No more he champs the bit, nor tugs the rein,
Nor pricks his ears, nor shakes his flowing mane:
With foamy sweat his smoking limbs are spread,
And all o'erlabour'd hangs his heavy head;
Hoarse, and with pantings thick, his breath he draws,

While rosy silt begrimes his clammy jaws;
Careless the rider's heartening voice he hears,
And motionless the wounding spur he bears.
At length, by swords and goading darts compell'd,

Dronish he drags his load across the field;
Nor once attempts to charge but drooping goes,
To bear his dying lord amidst his foes.

Not for the Libyans fierce their onset make;
With thundering hoofs the sandy soil they shake;
Thick o'er the battle wavy clouds arise,
As when through Thrace, Bitonian Boreas flies, Involves the day in dust, and darkens all the skies.

And now the Latian foot encompass'd round,
Are massacred, and trodden to the ground;
None in resistance vainly prove their might,
But death is all the business of the fight.
Thicker than hail the steeley showers descend;
Beneath the weight the falling Romans bend;
On every side the shrinking front grows less,
And to the centre madly all they press:
Fear, uproar, and dismay, increase the cry,
Crushing, and crush'd, an armed crowd they die;
Ev'n thronging on their fellows swords they run,
And the foe's business by themselves is done.
But the fierce Moors disdain a crowd should share
The praise of conquest, or the task of war:
Rivers of blood they wish, and hills of slain,
With mangled carcases to strow the plain.

Genius of Carthage! rear thy drooping head,
And view thy fields with Roman slaughter spread.
Behold, oh Hannibal, thou hostile shade!
A large amends by fortune's hand is made,
And the lost Punic blood is well repaid.

Thus do the gods the cause of Pompey bless?
Thus, is it thus they give our arms success?
Take, Afric, rather take the horrid good,
And make thy own advantage of our blood.

The dust, at length, in crimson floods was laid,
And Curio now the dreadful field survey'd.
He saw 'twas lost, and knew in vain to strive,
Yet bravely scorn'd to fly, or to survive;
And though thus driven to death, he met it well,
And in a crowd of dying Romans fell.

Now what avail thy popular arts and fame,
Thy reflex mind that shook thy country's frame;
Thy moving tongue that knew so well to charm,
And urge the madding multitude to arm?
What boots it, to have sold the senate's right,
And driven the furious leaders on to fight?

Thou the first victim of thy war art slain,
Nor shalt thou fee Pharsalia's fatal plain.
Behold ye potent troublers of the state,
What wretched ends on curst ambition wait!

See! where a prey, unburied Curio lies,
To every fowl that wings the Libyan skies.
Oh! were the gods as gracious as severe,
Were liberty, like vengeance, still their care;
Then, Rome! what days, what people, might'st thou see,

If Providence would equally decree,
To punish tyrants, and preserve thee free.

Nor yet, oh generous Curio! shall my verse
 Forget, thy praise, thy virtues, to rehearse:
 Thy virtues which with envious time shall strive,
 And to succeeding ages long survive.
 In all our pregnant mother's tribe's, before,
 A son of nobler hope she never bore:
 A soul more bright, more great, she never knew,
 While to thy country's interest thou wert true.
 But thy bad fate o'er-rul'd thy native worth,
 And in an age abandon'd brought thee forth;
 When vice in triumph through the city pass'd,
 And dreadful wealth and power laid all things waste.

The sweeping stream thy better purpose cross'd,
 And in the headlong torrent wert thou lost.
 Much to the ruin of the state was done,
 When Curio by the Gallic spoils was won;
 Curio, the hope of Rome, and her most worthy son.
 Tyrants of old whom former times record,
 Who rul'd, and ravag'd with the murdering sword
 Sylla whom such unbounded power made proud;
 Marius, and Cinna, red with Roman blood;
 Ev'n Cæsar's mighty race who lord it now,
 Before whose throne the subject nations bow,
 All bought that power which lavish Curio sold,
 Curio, who barter'd liberty for gold.

THE ARGUMENT.

IN Epirus the consuls assemble the senate, who unanimously appoint Pompey general of the war against Cæsar, and decree public thanks to the several princes and states who assisted the commonwealth Appius, at that time prætor of Achaia, consults the oracle of Delphos, concerning the event of the civil war. And, upon this occasion, the poet goes into a digression concerning the origin, the manner of the delivery, and the present silence of that oracle. From Spain, Cæsar returns into Italy where he quells a mutiny in his army, and punishes the offenders. From Placentia, where this disorder happened, he orders them to march to Brundisium; where, after a short turn to Rome, an assuming the consulship, or rather the supreme power, he joins them himself. From Brundisium though it was then the middle of winter, he transports part of his army by sea to Epirus, and land at Palæste. Pompey who then lay about Candavia, hearing of Cæsar's arrival, and being in pain for Dyrrachium, marched that way: on the banks of the river Apfus, they met and encamped close together. Cæsar was not yet joined by that part of his troops which he had left behind him at Brundisium, under the command of Mark Anthony; and, being uneasy at his delays, leaves his camp by night, and ventures over a tempestuous sea in a small bark to hasten the transport. Upon Cæsar joining his forces together, Pompey perceived that the war would now probably be soon decided by a battle; and upon that consideration, resolv'd to send his wife to expect the event at Lesbos. Their parting, which is extremely moving, concludes this book.

Thus, equal fortune holds awhile the scale,
 And bids the leading chiefs by turns prevail;
 In doubt the goddess, yet, their fate detains,
 And keeps them for Emathia's fatal plains.
 And now the setting Pliades grew low,
 The hills stood hoary in December's snow;
 The solemn season was approaching near,
 When other names renew'd the Fasti wear,
 And double Janus leads the coming year.
 The consuls, while their rods they yet retain'd,
 While yet some show of liberty remain'd,
 With missives round the scatter'd fathers greet,
 And in Epirus bid the senate meet.
 There the great rulers of the Roman state,
 In foreign seats, consulting meanly fate.
 No face of war the grave assembly wears,
 But civil power in peaceful pomp appears:
 The purple order to their place resort,
 While waiting listers guard the crowded court.
 No faction these, nor party, seem to be,
 But a full senate, legal, just, and free.
 Great, as he is, here Pompey stands confest
 A private man, and one among the rest. [cease,
 Their mutual groans, at length, and murmurs
 And every mournful sound is hush'd in peace:
 When from the consular distinguish'd throne,
 Sublimely rais'd, thus Lentulus begun.

If yet our Roman virtue is the same,
 Yet worthy of the race from which we came,
 And cumulates our great forefathers name,
 Let not our thoughts, by sad remembrance led,
 Bewail those captive walls from whence we fled.
 This time demands that to ourselves we turn,
 Nor, fathers, have we leisure now to mourn;
 But let each early care, each honest heart,
 Our senate's sacred dignity assert.
 To all around proclaim it, wide, and near,
 That power which kings obey, and nations fear,
 That only legal power of Rome, is here.
 For whether to the northern Bear we go,
 Where pale she glitters o'er eternal snow;
 Or whether in those sultry climes we burn,
 Where night and day with equal hours return;
 The world shall still acknowledge us its head.
 And empire follow wheresoe'er we lead.
 When Gallic flames the burning city felt,
 At Veia Rome with her Camillus dwelt.
 Beneath forsaken roofs proud Cæsar reigns,
 Our vacant courts, and silent laws constrains;
 While slaves obedient to his tyrant will,
 Outlaws, and profligates, his senate fill;
 With him a banish'd guilty crowd appear,
 All that are just and innocent are here.

Differs'd by war, though guiltless of its crimes,
 Our order yielded to these impious times;
 At length returning each from his retreat,
 In happy hour the scatter'd members meet.
 The gods and fortune greet us on the way,
 And with the world loil Italy repay.
 Upon Illyria's favourable coast,
 Vulteius with his furious band are lost;
 While in bold Curio, on the Libyan plain,
 One half of Cæsar's senators lie slain.
 March then, ye warriors! second fate's design,
 And to the leading gods your ardour join,
 With equal constancy to battle come,
 As when you shun'd the foe, and left your native
 Rome.

The period of the consuls power is near,
 Who yield our faces with the ending year:
 But you, ye fathers, whom we still obey,
 Who rule mankind with undetermin'd sway,
 Attend the public weal, with faithful care,
 And bid our greatest Pompey lead the war.

In loud applause the pleas'd assembly join,
 And to the glorious task the chief assign:
 His country's fate they trust to him alone,
 And bid him fight Rome's battles and his own.
 Next, to their friends their thanks are dealt around,
 And some with gifts, and some with praise are
 crown'd;

Of these the chief are Rhodes, by Phœbus lov'd,
 And Sparta rough, in virtue's lore approv'd.
 If Athens much they speak; Massilia's aids with her parent Phocis' freedom paid.
 Deiotarus his truth they much commend,
 Their still unshaken faithful Asian friend.
 Brave Cotys and his valiant fon they grace,
 With bold Rhasipolis from stormy Thrace.
 While gallant Juba justly is decreed
 To his paternal sceptre to succeed.

And thou too, Ptolomy (unrighteous fate!)
 Wert rais'd unworthy to the regal state;
 The crown upon thy perjurd temples shone,
 That once was borne by Philip's godlike fon.
 D'er Egypt shakes the boy his cruel sword:
 Oh! that he had been only Egypt's lord!
 But the dire gift more dreadful mischiefs wait,
 While Lago's sceptre gives him Pompey's fate:
 Preventing Cæsar's and his sister's hand,
 He seiz'd his parricide, and her command.

Th' assembly rose, and all on war intent
 Bustle to arms, and blindly wait th' event.
 Appius alone, impatient to be taught [fraught,
 With what the threaten'g future times were
 With busy curiosity explores
 The dreadful purpose of the heavenly powers.
 So Delphos straight he flies, where long the god
 in silence had possess'd his close abode;
 His oracles had long been known to cease
 And the prophetic virgin liv'd in peace.

Between the ruddy west and eastern skies,
 In the mid-earth Parnassus' tops arise:
 So Phœbus, and the cheerful god of wine,
 In sacred common stands the hill divine.
 Still as the third revolving year comes round,
 The Mænades, with leafy chaplets crown'd,
 The double deity in solemn songs resound.
 When, o'er the world, the deluge wide was
 spread,

This only mountain rear'd his lofty head;

Vol. XII.

One rising rock, preserv'd, a bound was given,
 Between the vasty deep, and ambient heaven.
 Here, to revenge long-vex'd Latona's pain,
 Python by infant Pœan's darts, was slain,
 While yet the realm was held by Themis' righteous reign.

But when the god perceiv'd, how from below
 The conscious caves diviner breathings blow,
 How vapours could unfold th' inquirer's doom,
 And talking winds could speak of things to come;
 Deep in the hollows plunging he retir'd,
 There, with foretelling fury first inspir'd,
 From thence the prophet's art and honours he acquir'd.

So runs the tale. And oh! what god indeed
 Within this gloomy cavern's depth is hid?
 What power divine forsakes the heaven's fair light,
 To dwell with earth, and everlasting night?
 What is this spirit, potent, wise, and great,
 Who deigns to make a mortal fame his seat;
 Who the long chain of secret causes knows,
 Whose oracles the years to come disclose;
 Who through eternity at once foresees,
 And tells that fate which he himself decrees?
 Part of that soul, perhaps, which moves in all,
 Whose energy informs the pendent ball,
 Through this dark passage seeks the realms above,
 And strives to re-unite itself to Jove.
 Whate'er the demon, when he stands confess'd
 Within his raging priestless' panting breast,
 Dreadful his godhead from the virgin breaks,
 And thundering from her foamy mouth he speaks.
 Such is the burst of bellowing Ætina's sound,
 When fair Sicilia's pastures shake around;
 Such from Inarime Typhœus roars,
 While rattling rocks bestrew Campania's shores.

The listening god, still ready with replies,
 To none his aid, or oracle, denies;
 Yet, wise and righteous ever, scorns to hear
 The fool's fond wishes, or the guilty's prayer;
 Though vainly in repeated vows they trust,
 None e'er find grace before him, but the just.
 Oft to a banish'd, wandering, houseless race,
 The sacred dictates have assign'd a place.
 Oft from the strong he saves the weak in war:
 This truth, ye Salaminian seas, declare!
 And heals the barren land, and pestilential air.
 Of all the wants with which this age is curst,
 The Delphic silence surely is the worst.
 But tyrants, justly fearful of their doom,
 Forbid the gods to tell us what's to come.
 Meanwhile, the prophets may well rejoice,
 And bless the ceasing of the sacred voice:
 Since death too oft her holy task attends,
 And immature her dreadful labour ends.
 Torn by the fierce distracting rage the springs,
 And dies beneath the god for whom she sings.

These silent caves, these tripods long unmov'd,
 Anxious for Rôme, inquiring Appius prov'd:
 He bids the guardian of the dread abode
 Send in the trembling priestless to the god.
 The reverend sire the Latian chief obey'd;
 And sudden seiz'd the unsuspecting maid,
 Where careless in the peaceful grove she stray'd.
 Dismay'd, aghast, and pale, he drags her on;
 She stops, and strives the fatal task to shun:
 Subdu'd by force, to fraud and art she flies,
 And thus to turn the Roman's purpose tries:

What curious hopes thy wandering fancy move,
The silent Delphic oracle to prove?

In vain, Aufonius Appius, art thou come:
Long has our Phœbus and his cave been dumb.
Whether, disdainous us, the sacred voice
Has made some other distant land its choice;
Or whether, when the fierce barbarians' fires
Low in the dust had laid our lofty spires,
In heaps the mouldering ashes heavy red,
And chok'd the channels of the breathing god:
Or whether heaven no longer gives replies,
But bids the Sibyls mystic verse suffice;
Or, if he deigns not this bad age to bear,
And holds the world unworthy of his care;
Whate'er the cause, our god has long been mute,
And answers not to any suppliant's suit.

But, ah! too well her artifice is known,
Her fears confess the god, whom they disown.
Howe'er each rite she seemingly prepares;
A fillet gathers up her foremost hairs;
While the white wreath and bays her temples bind,
And knit the looser locks which flow behind.
Sudden, the stronger priest, though yet she strives,
The lingering maid within the temple drives:
But still she fears, still shuns the dreadful shrine,
Lags in the outer space, and feigns the rage divine.
But far unlike the god, her calmer breast
No strong enthusiastic throes confess;
No terrors in her starting hairs were seen
'To cast from off her brow the wreathing green;
No broken accents half obstructed hung,
Nor swelling murmurs roll her labouring tongue.
From her fierce jaws no founding horrors come,
No thunders bellow through the working foam.
'To rend the spacious cave, and shake the vaulted dome.

Too plain, the peaceful groves and fane betray'd
The wily, fearful, god-diffembling maid.
The furious Roman soon the fraud espy'd,
And, hope not thou to 'scape my rage, he cry'd;
Sore shalt thou rue thy fond deceit, profane,
(The gods and Appius are not mock'd in vain)
Unless thou cease thy mortal sounds to tell,
Unless thou plunge thee in the mystic cell,
Unless the gods themselves reveal the doom,
Which shall befall the warring world and Rome.

He spoke, and, aw'd by the superior dread,
The trembling priests to the tripod fled:
Close to the holy breathing vent the cleaves,
And largely the unwonted god receives.
Nor age the potent spirit had decay'd,
But with full force he fills the heaving maid;
Nor e'er so strong inspiring Pæan came,
Nor stretch'd, as now, her agonizing frame?
The mortal mind driv'n out forsook her breast,
And the sole godhead every part possess'd.
Now swell her veins, her turgid sinews rise,
And bounding frantic through the cave she flies;
Her bristling locks the wreathy fillet scorn.
And her fierce feet the tumbling tripods spurn.
Now wild the dances o'er the vacant fane, [pain.
And whirls her giddy head, and bellows with the Nor yet the less th' avenging wrathful god
Pours in his fires, and shakes his founding rod:
He lashes now, and goads her on amain;
And now she checks her stubborn to the rein,
Curbs in her tongue, just labouring to disclose,
And speak that fate which in her bosom glows.

Ages on ages throng, a painful load,
Myriads of images, and myriads crowd;
Men, times, and things, or present, or to come,
Work labouring up and down, and urge fit
room.

Whatever is, shall be, or e'er has been,
Rolls in her thought, and to her sight is seen.
The ocean's utmost bounds her eyes explore,
And number every sand on every shore;
Nature, and all her works, at once they see,
Know when the first begun, and when her end shall be.

And as the Sibyl once in Cumæ's cell,
When vulgar fates she proudly ceas'd to tell,
The Roman destiny distinguish'd took,
And kept it careful in her sacred book;
So now, Phemonœ, in crowds of thought,
The single doom of Latian Appius sought.
Nor in that mass, where multitudes abound,
A private fortune can with ease be found.
At length her foamy mouth begins to flow,
Groans more distinct, and plainer murmurs go:
A doleful howl the roomy cavern shook,
And thus the calmer maid in fainting accents
spoke:

While guilty rage the world tumultuous rend
In peace for thee, Eubœa's vale attends;
Thither, as to thy refuge shalt thou fly,
There find repose, and unmolested lie.
She said; the god her labouring tongue suppress'd
And in eternal darkness veil'd the rest,

Ye sacred tripods, on whose doom we wait!
Ye guardians of the future laws of fate!
And thou, oh! Phœbus, whose prophetic skill Reads the dark counsels of the heavenly will;
Why did your wary oracles refrain,
To tell what kings, what heroes must be slain,
And how much blood the blushing earth should stain?

Was it that, yet, the guilt was undecree'd?
That yet our Pompey was not doom'd to bleed?
Or chose you wisely, rather, to afford
A just occasion to the patriot's sword?
As if you fear'd t' avert the tyrant's doom,
And hinder Brutus from avenging Rome?

Through the wide gates at length by force
play'd,
Impetuous sallies the prophetic maid;
Nor yet the holy rage was all suppress'd,
Part of the god still heaving in her breast:
Urg'd by the demon, yet she rolls her eyes,
And wildly wanders o'er the spacious skies.
Now horrid purple flushes in her face,
And now a livid pale supplies the place;
A double madness paints her cheeks by turns,
With fear she freezes, and with fury burns:
Sad breathing sighs with heavy accent go,
And doleful from her fainting bosom blow.
So when no more the storm sonorous sings,
But noisy Boreas hangs his weary wings;
In hollow groans the falling winds complain,
And murmur o'er the hoarse-resounding main
Now by degrees the fire ethereal fail'd,
And the dull human sense again prevail'd;
While Phœbus sudden, in a murky shade,
Hid the past vision from the mortal maid.
Thick clouds of dark oblivion rise between;
And snatch away at once the wondrous scene:

Stretch'd on the ground the fainting priestless lies,
While to the tripod, back, th' informing spirit flies.

Meanwhile, fond Appius, erring in his fate,
Dream'd of long safety, and a neutral state;
And, ere the great event of war was known,
Fix'd on Eubœan Chalcis for his own.
Fool! to believe that power could ward the blow,
Or snatch thee from amidst the general woe!
In times like these, what god but death can save?
The world can yield no refuge, but the grave.
Where struggling seas Charybdis rude constrains,
And, dreadful to the proud, Rhannusia reigns;
Where by the whirling current barks are tost
From Chalcis to unlucky Aulis' coast;
There shalt thou meet the gods appointed doom,
A private death, and long remember'd tomb.

To other wars the victor now succeeds,
And his proud eagles from Iberia leads:
When the chang'd gods his ruin seem'd to threaten,
And cross the long successful course of fate.
Amidst his camp, and fearless of his foes,
Sudden he saw where inborn dangers rose,
He saw those troops that long had faithful stood,
Friends to his cause, and enemies to good,
Grown weary of their chief, and satiated with blood.

Whether the trumpet's sound too long had ceas'd,
And laughter slept in unaccustomed rest:
Or whether, arrogant by mischief made,
The soldier held his guilt but half repay'd:
Whilst avarice and hope of bribes prevail,
Turn against Cæsar, and his cause; the scale,
And set the mercenary sword to sale.

Nor, e'er before, so truly could he read
What dangers flow those paths the mighty tread.
Then, first he found, on what a faithless base
Their nodding towers ambition's builders place:
He who fo late, a potent faction's head,
Drew in the nations, and the legions led;
Now stript of all, beheld in every hand
The warriors weapons at their own command;
Nor service now, nor safety they afford,
But leave him single to his guardian sword.
Nor is this rage the grumbler's of a crowd,
That shun to tell their discontents aloud;
Where all with gloomy looks suspicious go,
And dread of an informer chokes their woe:
But, bold in numbers, proudly they appear,
And scorn the bashful mean restraints of fear.
For laws, in great rebellions, lose their end,
And all go free, when multitudes offend.

Among the rest, one thus: At length 'tis time
To quit thy cause, oh Cæsar! and our crime:
The world around for foes thou hast explor'd,
And lavishly expos'd us to the sword;
To make thee great, a worthless crowd we fall,
Scatter'd o'er Spain, o'er Italy, and Gaul;
In every clime beneath the spacious sky,
Our leader conquers, and his soldiers die.
What boots our march beneath the frozen zone,
Or that lost blood which stains the Rhine and Rhone?

When scar'd with wounds, and worn with labours hard,
We come with hopes of recompence prepar'd,
Thou giv'st us war, more war, for our reward.
I though purple rivers in thy cause we spilt,
And stain'd our horrid hands in every guilt;

With unavailing wickedness we toil'd,
In vain the gods, in vain the senate spoil'd;
Of virtue, and reward, alike bereft,
Our pious poverty is all we've left.
Say to what height thy daring arms would rise?
If Rome's too little, what can e'er suffice?
Oh, see at length! with pity, Cæsar, see These withering arms, these hairs grown white for thee.

In painful wars our joyless days have past,
Let weary age lie down in peace at last:
Give us, on beds, our dying limbs to lay,
And sigh, at home, our parting souls away.
Nor think it much we make the bold demand,
And ask this wondrous favour at thy hand:
Let our poor babes and weeping wives be by,
To close our drooping eyelids when we die.
Be merciful, and let disease afford
Some other way to die, beside the sword;
Let us no more a common carnage burn,
But each be laid in his own decent urn.
Still wilt thou urge us, ignorant and blind,
To some more monstrous mischief yet behind?
Are we the only fools, forbid to know
How much we may deserve by one sure blow?
Thy head, thy head is ours, whene'er we please;
Well has thy war inspir'd such thoughts as these:
What laws, what oaths, can urge their feeble bands,
To hinder these determin'd daring hands?
That Cæsar, who was once ordain'd our head,
When to the Rhine our lawful arms he led,
Is now no more our chieftain, but our mate;
Guilt equal, gives equality of state.
Nor shall his foul ingratitude prevail,
Nor weigh our merits in his partial scale;
He views our labours with a scornful glance,
And calls our victories the works of chance:
But his proud heart, henceforth, shall learn to
own,

His power, his fate, depends on us alone.
Yes, Cæsar, spite of all those rods that wait,
With mean obsequious service, on thy state;
Spite of thy gods, and thee, the war shall cease,
And we thy soldiers will command a peace.

He spoke, and fierce tumultuous rage inspir'd,
The kindling legions round the camp were fir'd,
And with loud cries their absent chief requir'd.

Permit it thus, ye righteous gods, to be;
Let wicked hands fulfil your great decree;
And, since lost faith and virtue are no more,
Let Cæsar's hands the public peace restore.
What leader had not now been chill'd with fear,
And heard this tumult with the last despair?
But Cæsar, form'd for perils hard and great,
Headlong to drive, and brave opposing fate,
While yet with fiercest fires their furies flame,
Secure, and scornful of the danger, came.
Nor was he wroth to see the madness rise,
And mark the vengeance threatening in their eyes;
With pleasure could he crown their curs'd designs,
With rapes of matrons and the spoils of shrines;
Had they but ask'd it, well he could approve
The waste and plunder of Tarpeian Jove:
No mischief he, no sacrilege, denies,
But would himself bestow the horrid prize.
With joy he sees their souls by rage possess'd,
Sooths and indulges every frantic breast,
And only fears what reason may suggest.

Still, Cæsar, wilt thou tread the paths of blood?
Wilt thou, thou singly, hate thy country's good?
Shall the rude soldier first of war complain,
And teach thee to be pitiful in vain?
Give o'er at length, and let thy labours cease,
Nor vex the world, but learn to suffer peace.
Why shouldst thou force each, now, unwilling
hand,

And drive them on to guilt, by thy command?
When ev'n relenting rage itself gives place,
And fierce Enyo seems to shun thy face.

High on a turfy bank the chief was rear'd,
Fearless, and therefore worthy to be fear'd;
Around the crowd he cast an angry look,
And dreadful, thus with indignation spoke:

Ye noisy herd! who in so fierce a strain
Against your absent leader dare complain;
Behold! where naked and unarm'd he stands,
And braves the malice of your threatening hands
Here find your end of war, your long-fought
rest,

And leave your useless swords in Cæsar's breast.
But wherefore urge I the bold deed to you?
To rail is all your feeble rage can do.
In grumbling factions are you bold and loud,
Can flow sedition, and increase a crowd;
You! who can lothe the glories of the great,
And poorly meditate a base retreat.
But, hence, be gone from victory and me,
Leave to me what my better fates decree:
New friends, new troops, my fortune shall afford,
And find a hand for every vacant sword.
Behold, what crowds on flying Pompey wait,
What multitudes attend his abject state!
And stali success, and Cæsar, droop the while!
Shall I want numbers to divide the spoil,
And reap the fruits of your forgotten toil?
Legions shall come to end the bloodless war,
And shouting follow my triumphal car.
While you, a vulgar, mean, abandon'd race,
Shall view our honours with a downward face,
And curse yourselves in secret as we pass.
Can your vain aid, can your departing force,
Withhold my conquest, or delay my course?
So trickling brooks their waters may deny,
And hope to leave the mighty ocean dry;
The deep shall still be full, and scorn the poor supply.

Nor think such vulgar souls as yours were given,
To be the task of fate, and care of heaven:
Few are the lordly, the distinguish'd great,
On whom the watchful gods, like guardians, wait:
The rest for common use were all design'd,
An unregarded rabble of mankind.
By my auspicious name, and fortune, led,
Wide o'er the world your conquering arms were
spread,

But say, what had you done, with Pompey at Vast was the fame by Labienus won,
When, rank'd amidst my warlike friends, he shone:
Now mark what follows on his faithful change,
And see him with his chief new-chosen range;
By land, and sea, where'er my arms he spies,
An ignominious runnagate he flies.
Such shall you prove. Nor is it worth my care,
Whether to Pompey's aid your arms you bear:
Who quits his leader, whereso'er he go,
Flies like a traitor, and becomes my foe.

Yes, ye great gods! your kinder care I own,
You made the faith of these false legions known
You warn me well to change these coward bands
Nor trust my fate to such betraying hands.
And thou too, fortune, point it me out the way,
A mighty debt, thus, cheaply to repay;
Henceforth my care regards myself alone,
War's glorious gain shall now be all my own.
For you, ye vulgar herd, in peace return,
My ensigns shall by manly hands be borne.
Some few of you my sentence here shall wait,
And warn succeeding factions by your fate.
Down! groveling down to earth, ye traitor
band,

And with your prostrate necks, my doom attend
And you, ye younger striplings of the war,
You, whom I mean to make my future care;
Strike home! to blood, to death, inure your hands
And learn to execute my dread commands.

He spoke; and, at the impious sound dismay
The trembling unresisting crowd obey'd:
No more their late equality they boast,
But bend beneath his frown a suppliant host.
Singly secure, he stands confess'd their lord,
And rules, in spite of him, the soldier's sword.
Doubtful, at first, their patience he surveys,
And wonders why each haughty heart obeys;
Beyond his hopes he sees the stubborn bow,
And bare their breasts obedient to the blow;
Till ev'n his cooler thoughts the deed disclaim,
And would not find their fiercer souls so tame.
A few, at length, selected from the rest,
Bled for example; and the tumult ceas'd;
While the consenting host the victims view'd,
And, in that blood, their broken faith renew'd.

Now to Brundisium's walls he bids them turn
Where ten long days their weary marches end
There he commands assembling barks to meet,
And furnish from the neighbouring shores his fleet
Thither the crooked keels from Leuca glide,
From Taras old, and Hydrus' winding tide:
Thither with swelling sails their way they take
From lowly Sipus, and Salapia's lake;
From where Apulia's fruitful mountains rise,
Where high along the coast Garganus lies,
And beating seas and fighting winds defies.

Meanwhile the chief to Rome directs his way
Now fearful, aw'd, and fashion'd to his sway.
There, with mock prayers, the suppliant vail
And urge on him the great dictator's state. [w
Obedient he, since thus their wills ordain,
A gracious tyrant condescends to reign.
His mighty name the joyful Fasti wear,
Worthy to usher in the curst Pharalian year.
Then was the time, when scyophants began
To heap all titles on one lordly man;
Then learn'd our fires that fawning lying strain
Which we, their slavish sons, so well retain:
Then, first, were seen to join, an ill-match'd pair
The axe of justice with the sword of war;
Faces, and eagles, mingling, march along,
And in proud Cæsar's train promiscuous throng
And while all powers in him alone unite,
He mocks the people with the shows of right.
The Martian field th' assembling tribes receive
And each his unregarded suffrage gives;
Still with the same solemnity of face,
The reverend augur seems to fill his place:

Though now he hears not when the thunders roll,
Nor sees the flight of the ill-boding owl.
Then sunk the state and dignity of Rome,
Thence monthly consuls nominally come:
Just as the sovereign bids, their names appear,
To head the calendar, and mark the year.
Then too, to finish out the pageant show,
With formal rites to Alban Jove they go;
By night the festival was huddled o'er,
Nor could the god, unworthy, ask for more;
He who look'd on, and saw such foul disgrace,
Such slavery befall his Trojan race.

Now Cæsar, like the flame that cuts the skies,
And swifter than the vengeful tigers, lies
Where waste and overgrown Apulia lies;
O'er-passing soon the rude abandon'd plains,
Brundisum's crooked shores, and Cretan walls he Loud Boreas there his navy close confines, [gains.
While wary seamen dread the wintery signs.
But he, th' impatient chief disdains to spare
Those hours that better may be spent in war:
He grieves to see his ready fleet withheld,
While others boldly plow the watery field.
Eager to rouse their sloth, behold (he cries)
The constant wind that rules the wintery skies,
With what a settled certainty it flies!
Unlike the wanton sickle gales that bring
The cloudy changes of the faithless spring.
Nor need we now to sniit, to tack, and veer:
Steady the friendly north commands to steer.
Oh! that the fury of the driving blast
May swell the sail, and bend the lofty mast!
So shall our navy soon be wafted o'er,
E'er yon Phœcian galleys dip the oar,
And intercept the wish'd-for Grecian shore.
Cut every cable then, and haste away;
The waiting winds and seas upbraid our long delay.

Low in the west the setting sun was laid,
Up rose the night in glittering stars array'd,
And silver Cynthia cast a lengthening shade;
When loosing from the shore the moving fleet,
All hands at once unsurl the spreading sheet;
The slacker tacklings let the canvas flow,
To gather all the breath the winds can blow.
Swift for a while they scud before the wind,
And leave Hesperia's lessening shores behind;
When, lo! the dying breeze begins to fail,
And flutters on the mast the flagging sail:
The daller waves with slower heavings creep,
And a dead calm benumbs the lazy deep.
As when the winter's potent breath constrains
The scythian Euxine in her icy chains;
No more the Bosphori their streams maintain,
Nor rushing Ister heaves the languid main:
Each keel enclos'd, at once forgets its course, While o'er the new-made champaign bounds the
horse:

Bold on the crystal plains the Thracians ride,
And print with founding keels the stable tide.
So still a form th' Ionian waters take,
Dull as the muddy marsh and standing lake:
No breezes o'er the curling surface pass,
Nor sun-beams tremble in the liquid glass;
No usual turns revolving Tethys knows,
Nor with alternate rollings ebbs and flows:
But sluggish ocean sleeps in stupid peace,
And weary nature's motions seem to cease.

With differing eyes the hostile fleets beheld
The falling winds, and uselefs watery field.
There Pompey's daring powers attempt in vain
To plow their passage through th' unyielding
main;
While, pinch'd by want, proud Cæsar's legions
The dire distress of meagre famine fear.
With vows unknown before they reach the skies,
That waves may dash, and mounting billows rise;
That storms may with returning fury reign,
And the rude ocean be itself again.
At length the still, the sluggish darkness fled,
And cloudy morning rear'd its lowering head.
The rolling flood the gliding navy bore,
And hills appear'd to pass upon the shore.
Attending breezes waft them to the land,
And Cæsar's anchors bite Palæste's strand.

In neighbouring camps the hostile chiefs sit
down,
Where Genusus the swift and Apfus run;
Among th' ignobler crowd of rivers, these
Soon lose their waters in the mingling seas:
No mighty streams nor distant springs they know,
But rise from muddy lakes and melting snow.
Here meet the rivals, who the world divide,
Once by the tenderest bands of kindred ty'd.
The world with joy their interview beheld,
Now only parted by a single field.
Fond of the hopes of peace, mankind believe,
Whene'er they come thus near, they must forgive.
Vain hopes! for soon they part to meet no more,
Till both shall reach the curst Egyptian shore;
Till the proud father shall in arms succeed,
And see his vanquish'd son untimely bleed;
Till he beholds his ashes on the strand,
Views his pale head within a villain's hand;
Till Pompey's fate shall Cæsar's tears demand.

The latter yet his eager hand restrains,
While Antony the lingering troops detains.
Repining much, and griev'd at war's delay,
Impatient Cæsar often chides his stay,
Oft he is heard to threaten, and humbly oft to pray:
Still shall the world (he cries) thus anxious wait?
Till wilt thou stop the gods, and hinder fate?
What could be done before was done by me:
Now ready fortune only stays for thee. [stand,
What holds thee then? Do rocks thy course with-
Or Lybian Syrts oppose their faithless strand?
Or dost thou fear new dangers to explore?
I call thee not, but where I pass'd before.
For all those hours thou lovest, I complain,
And sue to heaven for prosperous winds in vain.
My soldiers (often has their faith been try'd),
If not withheld, had hasten'd to my side.
What toil, what hazards will they not partake?
Each seas and shipwrecks scorn for Cæsar's sake?
Nor will I think the gods so partial are,
To give thee fair Ausonia for thy share;
While Cæsar, and the senate, are forgot,
And in Epirus bound their barren lot.

In words like these, he calls him oft in vain,
And thus the hasty missives oft complain.
At length the lucky chief, who oft had found
What vast success his rasher darings crown'd;
Who saw how much the favouring gods had done,
Nor would be wanting, when they urg'd him on;
Fierce, and impatient of the tedious stay,
Resolves by night to prove the doubtful way:

Bold, in a single skiff he means to go,
And tempt those seas that navies dare not plow.
'Twas now the time when cares and labour cease,

And ev'n the rage of arms was hush'd to peace:
Snatch'd from their guilt, and toil, the wretched lay,

And slept the founder for the painful day.
Through the still camp the night's third hour re-sounds,

And warns the second watches to their rounds;
When through the horrors of the murky shade,
Secret the careful warriors footsteps tread.

His train unknowing, slept within his tent,
And fortune only follow'd where he went.
With silent anger he perceiv'd around,

The sleepy centinels bestrew the ground:
Yet, unproving, now, he pass'd them o'er,
And fought with eager haste the winding shore.
There through the gloom his searching eyes ex-
plor'd,

Where to the mouldering rock a bark was moor'd.
The mighty master of this little boat
Securely slept within a neighbouring cot;

No maffy beams support his humble hall,
But reeds and marshy rushes wove the wall;
Old shatter'd planking for a roof was spread,

And cover'd in from rain the needy shed.
Thrice on the feeble door the warrior struck,
Beneath the blow the trembling dwelling shook.

What wretch forlorn (the poor Amyclas cries)
Driven by the raging seas, and stormy skies,
To my poor lowly roof for shelter flies?

He spoke; and hasty left his homely bed,
With oozy flags and withering sea-weed spread.
Then from the hearth the smoking match he takes,

And in the tow the drowsy fire awakes;
Dry leaves, and chips, for fuel he supplies,
Till kindling sparks and glittering flames arise.

O happy poverty! thou greatest good,
Bestow'd by heaven, but seldom understood!
Here nor the cruel spoiler seeks his prey,

Nor ruthless armies take their dreadful way:
Security thy narrow limits keeps,
Safe are thy cottages, and sound thy sleeps.

Behold! ye dangerous dwellings of the great,
Where gods and godlike princes choose their seat;
Sec in what peace the poor Amyclas lies,

Nor starts, though Cæsar's call commands to rise.
What terrors had you felt, that call to hear!
How had your towers and ramparts shook with

fear,
And trembled, as the mighty man drew near!
The door unbarr'd: Expect (the leader said)

Beyond thy hopes, or wishes, to be paid;
If in this instant hour thou wast me o'er,
With speedy haste to yon Hesperian shore.

No more shall want thy weary hand constrain,
'To work thy bark upon the boisterous main;
Henceforth good days and plenty shall betide;

The gods and I will for thy age provide.
A glorious change attends thy low estate,
Sudden and mighty riches round thee wait;

Be wise, and use the lucky hour of fate.
Thus he; and though in humble vestments
drest, d,

Spite of himself, his words his power express'd,
And Cæsar in his bounty stood confest d.

To him the wary pilot thus replies:

A thousand omens threaten from the skies;
A thousand boding signs my soul affright,
And warn me not to tempt the seas by night.

In clouds the setting sun obscur'd his head,
Nor painted o'er the ruddy west with red:
Now north, now south, he shot his parted beams.

And tippe'd the fullen black with golden gleams:
Pale shone his middle orb with faintish rays,
And suffer'd mortal eyes at ease to gaze.

Nor rose the silver queen of night serene,
Supine and dull her blunted horns were seen,
With foggy stains and cloudy blots between.

Dreadful a while she shone all fiery red,
Then flicken'd into pale, and hid her drooping head.
Nor less I fear from that hoarse hollow roar,

In leafy gooves, and on the sounding shore.
In various turns the doubtful dolphins play,
And thwart, and run across, and mix their way.

The cormorants the watery deep forsake,
And soaring hems avoid the plathy lake;
While waddling on the margin of the main,

The crow hews her, and prevents the rain.
Howe'er, if some great enterprise demand,
Behold, I proffer thee my willing hand:

My venturesome bark the troubled deep shall try,
'To thy wish'd port her plunging prow shall ply,
Unless the seas resolve to beat us by.

He spoke; and spread his canvas to the wind,
Unmoor'd his boat, and left the shore behind.
Swift flew the nimble keel; and as they pass,

Long trails of light the shooting meteors cast;
Ev'n the fix'd fires above in motion seem,
Shake through the blast, and dart a quivering beam;

Black horrors on the gloomy ocean brood,
And in long ridges rolls the threatening flood;

While loud and louder murmuring winds arise,
And growl from every quarter of the skies.
When thus the trembling master, pale with fear,

Behold what wrath the dreadful gods prepare;
My art is at a loss; the various tide
Beats my unstable bark on every side:

From the north-west the setting current swells,
While southern storms the driving rack foretells.
Howe'er it be, our purpos'd way is lost,

Nor can one relie of our wreck be tost
By winds, like these, on fair Hesperia's coast.
Our only means of safety is to yield,

And measure back with haste the foamy field;
To give our unsuccessful labour o'er, } shore.
And reach, while yet we may, the neighbouring

But Cæsar, still superior to distress,
Fearless, and confident of sure success,
Thus to the pilot loud—The seas despise,

And the vain threatening of the noisy skies.
Though gods deny thee yon Ausonian strand;
Yet, go, I charge thee, go at my command.

Thy ignorance alone can cause thy fears,
Thou know'st not what a freight thy vessel bears;
Thou know'st not I am he, to whom 'tis given

Never to want the care of watchful heaven.
Obedient fortune waits my humble thrall,
And always ready comes before I call.

Let winds, and seas, loud wars at freedom wage,
And waste upon themselves their empty rage;
A stronger, mightier demon is thy friend,

Thou, and thy bark, on Cæsar's fate depend.

Thou stand'st amaz'd to view this dreadful scene ;
 And wonder'st what the gods and fortune mean !
 But artfully their bounties thus they raise,
 And from my dangers arrogate new praise ;
 Amidst the fears of death they bid me live,
 And still enhance what they are sure to give.
 Then leave yon shore behind with all thy haste ;
 Nor shall this idle fury longer last.
 Thy keel auspicious shall the storm appease,
 Shall glide triumphant o'er the calmer seas,
 And reach Brundisium's safer port with ease.
 Nor can the gods ordain another now,
 'Tis what I want, and what they must bestow.

Thus while in vaunting words the leader spoke ;
 Full on his bark the thundering tempest struck ;
 Off rips the rending canvas from the mast,
 And whirling flits before the driving blast ;
 In every joint the groaning alder sounds,
 And gapes wide-opening with a thousand wounds.
 Now, rising all at once, and unconfin'd,
 From every quarter roars the rushing wind :
 First from the wide Atlantic ocean's bed
 Impetuous Corus rears his dreadful head ;
 Th' obedient deep his potent breath controls,
 And, mountain-high, the foamy flood he rolls.
 Him the north-east encountering fierce defy'd,
 And back rebuffed the yielding tide.
 The curling furies loud conflicting meet,
 Dash their proud heads, and bellow as they beat ;
 While piercing Boreas, from the Scythian strand,
 Plows up the waves, and scoops the lowest sand.
 Nor Eurus then, I ween, was left to dwell,
 Nor showery Notus in th' Æolian cell ;
 But each from every side, his power to boast,
 Rang'd his proud forces, to defend his coast.
 Equal in might, alike they strive in vain,
 While in the midst the seas unmov'd remain :
 In lesser wars they yield to stormy heaven,
 And captive waves to other deeps are driven ;
 The Tyrrhene billows dash Ægean shores,
 And Adria in the mix'd Ionian roars.
 How then must earth the swelling ocean dread,
 When floods ran higher than each mountain's head !
 Subject and low the trembling beldame lay,
 And gave herself for lost, the conquering water's prey.

What other worlds, what seas unknown before,
 Then drove their billows on our beaten shore !
 What distant deeps, their prodigies to boast,
 Heav'd their huge monsters on th' Ausonian coast !
 So when avenging Jove long time had hurl'd,
 And tir'd his thunders on a harden'd world ;
 New wrath, the god, new punishment display'd,
 And call'd his watery brother to his aid :
 Offending earth to Neptune's lot he join'd,
 And bade his floods no longer stand confin'd ;
 At once the surges o'er the nations rise,
 And seas are only bounded by the skies.
 Such now the spreading deluge had been seen,
 Had not th' Almighty Ruler stood between ;
 Proud waves the cloud-compelling fire obey'd,
 Confess'd his hand suppressing, and were stay'd.

Nor was that gloom the common shade of night,
 The friendly darkness that relieves the light ;
 But fearful black and horrible to tell,
 A murky vapour breath'd from yawning hell ;
 So thick the mingling seas and clouds were hung,
 Scarce could the struggling lightning gleam along.

Through nature's frame the dire convulsion struck,
 Heav'n groan'd, the labouring pole and axis
 shook :

Uproar, and Chaos old, prevail'd again,
 And broke the sacred elemental chain :
 Black fiends, unhallow'd, fought the best abodes,
 Profan'd the day, and mingled with the gods.
 One only hope when every other fail'd,
 With Cæsar, and with nature's self, prevail'd ;
 The storm that fought their ruin, prov'd them
 strong,

Nor could they fall who stood that shock so long.
 High as Leucadia's lessening cliffs arise,
 On the tall billow's top the vessel flies ;
 While the pale master, from the surge's brow,
 With giddy eyes surveys the depth below.
 When straight the gaping main at once divides,
 On naked sands the rushing bark subsides,
 And the low liquid vale the topmast hides.
 The trembling shipman all distraught with fear,
 Forgets his course, and knows not how to steer ;
 No more the useless rudder guides the prow,
 To meet the rolling swell or shun the blow.
 But, lo ! the storm itself assistance lends,
 While one assault, another wave defends :
 This lays the sidelong alder on the main,
 And that restores the leaning bark again.
 Obedient to the mighty winds the plies,
 Now seeks the depths, and now invades the skies ;
 There born aloft, she apprehends no more,
 Or shoaly Saron, or Thessalia's shore ;
 High hills the dreads, and promontories now,
 And fears to touch Ceraunia's airy brow.

At length the universal wreck appear'd,
 To Cæsar's self, ev'n worthy to be fear'd.
 Why all these pains, this toil of fate (he cries)
 This labour of the seas, and earth, and skies ?
 All nature, and the gods, at once alarm'd,
 Against my little boat and me are arm'd.
 If, oh ye Powers Divine ! your will decrees
 The glory of my death to these rude seas ;
 If warm, and in the fighting field to die,
 If that, my first of wishes, you deny ;
 My soul no longer at her lot repines,
 But yields to what your providence assigns.
 Though immature I end my glorious days,
 Cut short my conquest, and prevent new praise ;
 My life, already, stands the noblest theme,
 To fill long annals of recording fame.

Far northern nations own me for their lord,
 And envious factions crouch beneath my sword ;
 Inferior Pompey yields to me at home,
 And only fills a second place in Rome.
 My country has my high benefits obey'd,
 And at my feet her laws obedient laid ;
 All sovereignty, all honours are my own,
 Consul, dictator, I am all alone.
 But thou, my only goddess, and my friend,
 Thou, on whom all my secret prayers attend,
 Conceal, oh fortune ! this inglorious end.
 Let none on earth, let none beside thee, know
 I sunk thus poorly to the shades below.
 Dispose, ye gods ! my carcass as you please,
 Deep let it drown beneath these raging seas ;
 I ask no urn my ashes to infold,
 Nor marble monuments, nor shrines of gold
 Let but the world, unknowing of my doom,
 Expect me still, and think I am to come ;

So shall my name with terror still be heard,
And thy return in every nation fear'd.

He spoke, and sudden, wondrous to behold,
High on a tenth huge wave his bark was roll'd;
Nor sunk again, alternate as before,
But rushing, lodg'd, and fix'd upon the shore.
Rome and his fortune were at once restor'd,
And earth again receiv'd him for her lord.

Now, through the camp his late arrival told,
The warriors crowd, their leader to behold;
In tears, around, the murmuring legions stand,
And welcome him, with fond complaints, to land.

What means too-daring Cæsar (thus they cry)
To tempt the ruthless seas, and stormy sky!
What a vile helpless herd had we been left,
Of every hope at once in thee bereft?

While on thy life to many thousands wait,
While nations live dependent on thy fate,
While the whole world on thee, their head, rely,
'Tis cruel in thee to consent to die.

And couldst thou not one faithful soldier find,
One equal to his mighty master's mind,
One that deserv'd not to be left behind?

While tumbling billows tost thee on the main,
We slept at ease, unknowing of thy pain.

Were we the cause, oh shame! unworthy we,
That urg'd thee on to brave the raging sea?
Is there a slave whose head thou hold'st so light,
To give him up to this tempestuous night?

While Cæsar, whom the subject earth obeys,
To seasons such as these, his sacred self betrays.
Still wilt thou weary out indulgent heaven,
And scatter all the lavish gods have given?

Dost thou the care of Providence employ,
Only to save thee when the seas run high?
Auspicious Jove thy wishes would promote;

Thou ask'st the safety of a leaky boat:
He proffers thee the world's supreme command;
Thy hopes aspire no farther than to land,
And cast thy shipwreck on th' Hesperian strand.

In kind reproaches thus they waste the night,
Till the gray east disclos'd the breaking light:
Serene the sun his beamy face display'd,

While the tir'd storm and weary waves were laid.
Speedy the Latian chiefs unfurl their sails,
And catch the gently-rising northern gales:

In fair appearance the tall vessels glide,
The pilots and the wind conspire to guide,
And waft them fitly o'er the smoother tide:

Decent they move, like some well-order'd band,
In rang'd battalions marching o'er the land.
Night fell at length, the winds the sails forsook,
And a dead calm the beauteous order broke.

So when, from Strymon's wintry banks, the cranes,

In feather'd legions cut th' ethereal plains;
To warmer Nile they bend their airy way,
Form'd in long lines, and rank'd in just array:

But if some rushing storm the journey cross,
The wingy leaders all are at a loss:
Now close, now loose, the breaking squadrons fly,
And scatter in confusion o'er the sky.

The day return'd, with Phæbus Auster rose,
And hard upon the straining canvas blows.
Scudding afore him Swift the fleet he bore,
O'er-passing Lyffus, to Nymphæum's shore;

There safe from northern winds, within the port they moor.

While thus united Cæsar's arms appear,
And fortune draws the great decision near;
Sad Pompey's soul uneasy thoughts infel,
And his Cornelia pines his anxious breast.
To distant Lesbos fain he would remove,
Far from the war, the partner of his love.
Oh, who can speak, what numbers can reveal,
The tenderness which pious lovers feel?
Who can their secret pangs and sorrows tell,
With all the crowd of cares that in their bosoms dwell?

See what new passions now the hero knows,
Now first he doubts success, and fears his foes;
Rome and the world he hazards in the strife,
And gives up all to fortune, but his wife.
Oft he prepares to speak, but knows not how,
Knows they must part, but cannot bid her go;
Defers the killing news with fond delay,
And, lingering, puts off fate from day to day.
The fleeting shades began to leave the sky,
And slumber soft forsook the drooping eye:
When, with fond arms, the fair Cornelia prest
Her lord, reluctant, to her snowy breast:
Wondering, she found he shunn'd her just embrace,

And felt warm tears upon his manly face.
Heart-wounded with the sudden woe, she griev'd,
And scarce the weeping warrior yet believ'd,
When, with a groan, thus he: My truest wife,
To say how much I love thee more than life,
Poorly expresses what my heart would show,
Since life, alas! is grown my burden now;
That long, too long delay'd, that dreadful doom,
That cruel parting hour at length is come.
Pierce, haughty, and collect'd in his might,
Advancing Cæsar calls me to the fight.

Haste then, my gentle love, from war retreat;
The Lesbian isle attends thy peaceful seat:
Nor seek, oh! seek not to increase my cares,
Seek not to change my purpose with thy prayers;

Myself, in vain, the fruitless suit have try'd,
And my own pleading heart has been deny'd.
Think not, thy distance will increase thy fear:

Ruin, if ruin comes, will soon be near,
Too soon the fatal news shall reach thy ear.

Nor burns thy heart with just and equal fires,
Not dost thou love as virtue's law requires;
If those soft eyes can ev'n thy husband bear,
Red with the stains of blood, and guilty war.

When horrid trumpets sound their dire alarms,
Shall I indulge my sorrows with thy charms,
And rise to battle from these tender arms?

Thus mournful, from thee, rather let me go,
And join thy absence to the public woe.
But thou be hid, be safe from every fear,
While kings and nations in destruction share:

Shun thou the crush of my impending fate,
Nor let it fall on thee with all its weight.
Then if the gods my overthrow ordain,
And the fierce victor chase me o'er the plain,

Thou shalt be left me still, my better part,
To soothe my cares, and heal my broken heart;
Thy open arms I shall be sure to meet,
And fly with pleasure to the dear retreat.

Stunn'd and astonish'd at the deadly stroke,
All sense, at first, the matron sad forsook,
Motion, and life, and speech, at length returns,
And thus in words of heaviest woe she mourns:

No, Pompey! 't is not that my lord is dead,
 'Tis not the hand of fate has robb'd my bed;
 But like some base plebeian I am curs'd,
 And by my cruel husband stand divorc'd.
 But Cæsar bids us part! thy father comes!
 And we must yield to what that tyrant dooms!
 Thy Cornelia's faith so poorly known,
 What thou shouldst think her safer whilst alone?
 Are not our loves, our lives, our fortunes one?
 Dost thou, inhuman, drive me from thy side,
 And bid my single head the coming storm abide?
 Do I not read thy purpose in thy eye!
 Dost thou not hope, and wish, ev'n now to die?
 And can I then be safe? Yet death is free,
 That last relief is not deny'd to me;
 Though banish'd by thy harsh command I go,
 Yet I will join thee in the realms below.
 Thou bid'st me with the pangs of absence strive,
 And, till I hear thy certain loss, survive.
 My vow'd obedience, what it can, shall bear;
 But, oh! my heart's a woman, and I fear.
 If the good gods, indulgent to my prayer,
 Should make the laws of Rome, and thee, their
 In distant climes I may prolong my woe, [care;
 And be the last thy victory to know.
 On some bleak rock that frowns upon the deep,
 A constant watch thy weeping wife shall keep;
 There from each fail misfortune shall I guess,
 And dread the bark that brings me thy success.
 Nor shall those happier tidings end my fear,
 The vanquish'd foe may bring new danger near;
 Defenceless I may still be made a prize,
 And Cæsar snatch me with him as he flies:
 With ease my known retreat he shall explore,
 While thy great name distinguishes the shore:
 Soon shall the Lesbian exile stand reveal'd,
 The wife of Pompey cannot live conceal'd.
 But if th' o'er-ruling powers thy cause forsake,
 Grant me this only last request I make;
 When thou shalt be of troops and friends bereft,
 And wretched flight is all thy safety left;
 Oh! follow not the dictates of thy heart,
 But choose a refuge in some distant part.

Where'er thy unsuspecting bark shall steer,
 Thy sad Cornelia's fatal shore forbear,
 Since Cæsar will be sure to seek thee there. }
 So saying, with a groan the matron fled,
 And wild with sorrow, left her holy bed:
 She sees all lingering, all delays are vain,
 And rushes headlong to possess the pain;
 Nor will the hurry of her griefs afford
 One last embrace from her forsaken lord.
 Uncommon cruel was the fate for two, }
 Whose lives had lasted long, and been so true,
 To lose the pleasure of one last adieu. }
 In all the woeful days that cross'd their bliss,
 Sure never hour was known so sad as this;
 By what they suffer'd now, inur'd to pain,
 They met all after-sorrows with disdain, }
 And fortune shot her envious shafts in vain. }
 Low on the ground the fainting dame is laid;
 Her train officious hasten to her aid:
 Then gently rearing, with a careful hand,
 Support her, slow-descending, o'er the strand.
 There, while with eager arms the grasp'd the
 shore,
 Scarcely the mourner to the bark they bore.
 Not half this grief of heart, these pangs, she knew,
 When from her native Italy she flew:
 Lonely and comfortless she takes her flight.
 Sad seems the day, and long the sleepless night.
 In vain her maids the downy couch provide,
 She wants the tender partner of her side.
 When weary oft in heaviness she lies,
 And dozy slumber steals upon her eyes;
 Fain, with fond arms, her lord she would have prest,
 But weeps to find the pillow at her breast.
 Though raging in her veins a fever burns,
 Painful she lies, and restless oft she turns.
 She thuns his sacred side with awful fear,
 And would not be convinc'd he is not there.
 But, oh! too soon the want shall be supply'd,
 The gods too cruelly for that provide:
 Again the circling hours bring back her lord,
 And Pompey shall be fatally restor'd.

B O O K VI.

THE ARGUMENT.

CÆSAR and Pompey lying now near Dyrrhachium, after several marches and counter-marches, the former with incredible diligence runs a vast line, or work, round the camp of the latter. This, Pompey, after suffering for want of provisions, and a very gallant resistance of Scæva, a centurion of Cæsar's, at length breaks through. After this, Cæsar makes another unsuccessful attempt upon a part of Pompey's army, and then marches away into Thessaly: And Pompey, against the persuasion and counsel of his friends, follows him. After a description of the ancient inhabitants, the boundaries, the mountains, and rivers of Thessaly; the poet takes occasion, from this country being famous for witchcraft, to introduce Sextus Pompeius, inquiring the event of the civil war from the forerets Erictho.

Now, near encamp'd, each on a neighbouring
 The Latian chiefs prepare for sudden fight, [height,
 The rival pair seem hither brought by fate,
 As if the gods would end the dire debate, }
 And here determine of the Roman state. }
 Cæsar, intent upon his hostile son,
 Demands a conquest here, and here alone;
 Neglects what laurels captive towns must yield,
 And scorns the harvest of the Grecian field.
 Impatient he provokes the fatal day,
 Ordain'd to give Rome's liberties away, }
 And leave the world the greedy victor's prey. }
 Eager, that last, great chance of war he waits,
 Where either's fall determines both their fates.

Thrice, on the hills, all drawn in dread array,
 His threatening eagles wide their wings display;
 Thrice, but in vain, his hostile arms he show'd,
 His ready rage, and thirst of Latian blood.
 But when he saw, how cautious Pompey's care,
 Sa'e in his camp, declin'd the proffer'd war;
 Through woody paths he bent his secret way,
 And meant to make Dyrrhachium's towers his
 This Pompey saw; and swiftly shot before, [prey.
 With speedy marches on the sandy shore:
 Till on Taulantian Petra's top he stay'd,
 Sheltering the city with his timely aid.
 This place, nor walls, nor trenches deep can boast,
 The works of labour, and expensive cost.
 Vain prodigality! and labour vain!
 Lost is the lavish wealth, and lost the fruitless pain!
 What walls, what towers loe'er they rear sublime,
 Must yield to wars, or more destructive time;
 While fences like Dyrrhachium's fortrefs made,
 Where nature's hand the sure foundation laid,
 And with her strength the naked town array'd,
 Shall stand secure against the warrior's rage,
 Nor fear the ruinous decays of age.
 Guarded, around, by steepy rocks it lies,
 And all access from land, but one, denies.
 No venturous vessel there in safety rides,
 But foaming surges break, and swelling tides
 Roll roaring on, and wash the craggy sides:
 Or when contentious winds more rudeley blow,
 Then mounting o'er the topmast cliff they flow,
 Burst on the lofty domes, and dash the town
 below.

Here Cæsar's daring heart vast hopes conceives,
 And high with war's vindictive pleasures heaves;
 Much he revolves within his thoughtful mind,
 How, in this camp, the foe may be confin'd,
 With ample lines from hill to hill design'd.
 Secret and swift he means the talk to try,
 And runs each distance over with his eye.
 Vast heaps of fod and verdant turf are brought,
 And stones in deep laborious quarries wrought;
 Each Grecian dwelling round the work supplies,
 And sudden ramparts from their ruins rise.
 With wond'rous strength the stable mound they rear,
 Such as th' impetuous ram can never fear,
 Nor hostile might o'erturn, nor forceful engine
 rear.

Through hills, restless, Cæsar plains his way,
 And makes the rough unequal rocks obey.
 Here deep, beneath, the gaping trenches lie,
 There forts advance their airy turrets high.
 Around vast tracts of land the labours wind,
 Wide fields and forests in the circle bind,
 And hold as in a toil the savage kind.
 Nor ev'n the foe too strictly pent remains,
 At large he forages upon the plains;
 The vast enclosure gives free leave around,
 Oit to decamp, and shift the various ground.
 Here, from far fountains, streams their channels
 trace, [space,
 And, while they wander through the tedious
 Run many a mile their long-extended race:
 While some, quite worn and weary of the way,
 Sink, and are lost before they reach the sea:
 Ev'n Cæsar's self, when through the works he goes,
 Tires in the midst, and stops to take repose.

Let fame no more record the walls of Troy,
 Which gods alone could build, and gods destroy;
 Nor let the Parthian wonder, to have seen
 The labours of the Babylonian queen:
 Behold this large, this spacious tract of ground!
 Like that, which Tigris or Orontes bound;
 Behold this land! that majesty might bring,
 And form a kingdom for an eastern king;
 Behold a Latian chief this land enclose,
 Amidst the tumult of impending foes: [rose.
 He bade the walls arise, and as he bade they
 But ah! vain pride of power! ah! fruitless boast!
 Ev'n these, these mighty labours are all lost!
 A force like this what barriers could withstand?
 Seas must have fled, and yielded to the land;
 The lovers shores united might have stood,
 Spite of the Hellespont's opposing flood;
 While the Ægean and Ionian tide,
 Might meeting o'er the vanquish'd Isthmus ride,
 And Argive realms from Corinth's walls divide;
 This power might change unwilling nature's face,
 Unfix each order, and remove each place.
 Here, as if clos'd within a list, the war
 Does all its valiant combatants prepare;
 Here ardent glows the blood, which fate ordains
 To dye the Libyan and Emathian plains;
 Here the whole rage of civil discord join'd,
 Struggles for room, and scorns to be confin'd.
 Nor yet, while Cæsar his first labours try'd,
 The warlike toil by Pompey was descry'd.
 So, in mid Sicily's delightful plain,
 Safe from the horrid sound, the happy swain
 Dreads not loud Scylla barking o'er the main.
 So, northern Britons never hear the roar
 Of seas, that break on the far Cantian shore.
 Soon as the rising ramparts hostile height,
 And towers advancing, struck his anxious sight,
 Sudden from Petra's safer camp he led,
 And wide his legions on the hills dispread;
 So, Cæsar, forc'd his numbers to extend,
 More feebly might each various strength defend.
 His camp far o'er the large enclosure reach'd,
 And guarded lines along the front were stretch'd;
 Far as Rome's distance from Aricia's groves,
 (Aricia which the chaste Diana loves)
 Far as from Rome old Tiber seeks the sea,
 Did he not wander in his winding way.
 While yet no signals for the fight prepare,
 Unbidden, some the javelin dart from far,
 And, skirmishing, provoke the lingering war.
 But deeper cares the thoughtful chiefs distress,
 And move, the soldiers ardour to repress.
 Pompey, with secret anxious thought, beheld,
 How trampling hoofs the rising grass repell'd;
 Waste lie the ruffet fields, the generous feed
 Seeks on the naked soil, in vain, to feed:
 Loathing from racks of hulky straw he turns,
 And, pining, for the verdant pasture mourns.
 No more his limbs their dying load sustain,
 Aiming a stride, he falters in the strain,
 And sinks a ruin on the withering plain.
 Dire maladies upon his vitals prey,
 Dissolve his frame, and melt the mass away.
 Thence deadly plagues invade the lazy air,
 Reek to the clouds, and hang malignant there.
 From Nefis fuch, the Stygian vapours rise,
 And with contagion taint the purer skies;

ich do Typhæus' steamy caves convey,
 nd breathe blue poisons on the golden day.
 Hence liquid streams the mingling plague rend deadly potions to the thirsty give: [ceive,
 o man the mischief spreads, the fell disease fatal draughts does on his entrails seize.
 Rugged scurf, all loathsome to be seen,
 reads, like a bark, upon his silken skin; alignant flames his swelling eye-balls dart,
 nd seem with anguish from their seats to start;
 res o'er his glowing cheeks and visage stray,
 nd mark, in crimson streaks, their burning way;
 ow droops his head, declining from its height,
 nd nods, and totters with the fatal weight.
 With winged haste the swift destruction flies,
 nd scarce the soldier sickens ere he dies;
 ow falling crowds at once resign their breath,
 nd doubly taint the noxious air with death.
 Careless their putrid carcases are spread; [bed, nd on the earth, their dank unwholesome
 he living rest in common with the dead.
 ere none the last funereal rites receive;
 o be cast forth the camp, is all their friends can give.

At length kind heaven their sorrows bade to cease, nd staid the pestifential foe's increase;
 resh breezes from the sea begin to rise,
 While Boreas through the lazy vapour flies, nd sweeps, with healthy wings, the rank polluted skies.

Arriving vessels now their freight unload,
 nd furnish plenteous harvests from abroad:
 low sprightly strength, now cheerful health,
 returns,

And life's fair lamp, rekindled, brightly burns.
 But Cæsar, unconfin'd, and camp'd on high,
 feels not the mischief of the sluggish sky:
 On hills sublime he breathes the purer air,
 nd drinks no damps, nor poisonous vapours, there.
 et hunger keen an equal plague is found;
 amine and meagre want besiege him round:
 he fields, as yet, no hopes of harvest wear,
 For yellow stems disclose the bearded ear.
 he scatter'd vulgar search around the fields,
 nd pluck what'er the doubtful herbage yields;
 ome strip the trees in every neighbouring wood,
 nd with the cattle share their grassy food.
 What'er the softening flame can pliant make,
 What'er the teeth, or labouring jaws, can break;
 What flesh, what roots, what herbs foe'er they get,

Though new, and strange to human taste as yet,
 At once the greedy soldiers seize and eat.
 What want, what pain foe'er they undergo,
 till they persist in arms, and cloie beset the foe.

At length, impatient longer to be held
 Within the bounds of one appointed field,
 D'er every bar which might his passage stay,
 Pompey resolves to force his warlike way;
 Wide o'er the world the ranging war to lead,
 And give his loosen'd legions room to spread.
 Nor takes he mean advantage from the night,
 Nor steals a passage, oor declines the fight;
 But bravely dares, disdainful of the foe, [to go.
 Through the proud towers and ramparts breach
 Where shining spears, and crested helms are seen,
 Embattled thick to guard the walls within;

Where all things death, where ruin all afford,
 There Pompey marks a passage for his sword.
 Near to the camp a woody thicket lay, [way
 Cloie was the shade, nor did the greenward }
 With smoky clouds of dust, the march betray.
 Hence, sudden they appear in dread array,
 Sudden their wide-extended ranks display;
 At once the foe beholds with wondering eyes
 Where on broad wings Pompeian eagles rise; }
 At once the warriors shouts and trumpet-sounds surprize.

Scarce was the sword's destruction needful here,
 So swiftly ran before preventing fear;
 Some fled amaz'd, while vainly valiant some Stood, but to meet in arms a nobler doom.
 Where'er they stood, now scatter'd lie the slain,
 Scarce yet a few for coming deaths remain,
 And clouds of flying javelins fall in vain.
 Here swift consuming flames the victors throw,
 And here the ram impetuous aims a blow;
 Aloft the nodding turrets feel the stroke,
 And the vast rampart groans beneath the shock.
 And now propitious fortune seem'd to doom
 Freedom and peace, to Pompey, and to Rome;
 High o'er the vanquish'd works his eagles tower,
 And vindicate the world from Cæsar's power.

But (what nor Cæsar, nor his fortune cou'd)
 What not ten thousand warlike hands withstood,
 Scæva resists alone; repels the force,
 And stops the rapid victor in his course.
 Scæva! a name erewhile to fame unknown,
 And first distinguish'd on the Gallic Rhone;
 There seen in hardy deeds of arms to shine,
 He reach'd the honours of the Latian vine.

Daring and bold, and ever prone to ill,
 Inur'd to blood, and active to fulfil
 The dictates of a lawless tyrant's will;
 Nor virtue's love, nor reason's laws he knew,
 But, careless of the right, for hire his sword he
 Thus courage by an impious cause is curst, [draw.
 And he that is the bravest, is the worst.
 Soon as he saw his fellows slun the fight,
 And seek their safety in ignoble flight,
 Whence does, he said, this coward's terror grow,
 This shame, unknown to Cæsar's arms till now?
 Can you, ye slavish herd, thus tamely yield?
 Thus fly, unwounded, from the bloody field?
 Behold, where pil'd in slaughter'd heaps on high,
 Firm to the last, your brave companions lie;
 Then blush to think what wretched lives you save,
 From what renown you fly, from what a glorious grave.

Though sacred fame, though virtue yield to fear,
 Let rage, let indignation, keep you here.
 We! we the weakest, from the rest are chose,
 To yield a passage to our scornful foes!
 Yet, Pompey, yet, thou shalt be yet withstood,
 And stain thy victor's laurel deep in blood,
 With pride, 'tis true, with joy I should have }
 If haply I had fall'n by Cæsar's side; [dy'd,
 But fortune has the noble death deny'd.
 Then Pompey, thou, thou on my fame shall wait,
 Do thou be witness, and applaud my fate.
 Now push we on, disdain we now to fear,
 A thousand wounds let every bosom bear,
 Till the keen sword be blunt, be broke the pointed spear.

And see the clouds of dusty battle rise! [skies!
Hark how the shout runs rattling through the
The distant legions catch the sounds from far,
And Cæsar listens to the thundering war.
He comes, he comes, yet ere his soldier dies,
Like lightning swift the winged warrior flies:
Haste then to death, to conquest haste away;
Well do we fail, for Cæsar wins the day. [found,
He spoke, and straight, as at the trumpet's
Rekindled warmth in every breast was found;
Recall'd from flight, the youth admiring wait,
To mark their daring fellow-soldier's fate,
To see if haply virtue might prevail,
And, ev'n beyond their hopes, do more than greatly fail.

High on the tottering wall he rears his head,
With slaughter'd carcasses around him spread;
With nervous arms uplifting these he throws,
These rolls oppressive, on ascending foes.
Each where materials for his fury lie,
And all the ready ruins arms supply:
Even his fierce self he seems to aim below,
Headlong to shoot, and dying dart a blow.
Now his tough staff repels the fierce attack,
And tumbling, drives the bold assailants back:
Now heads, now hands he lops, the carcase falls,
Whilst the clench'd fingers gripe the topmost walls:
Here stones he heaves; the mass descending full,
Crushes the brain, and shivers the frail skull.
Here burning pitchy brands he whirls around;
Infix'd, the flames hiss in the liquid wound,
Deep drench'd in death, in flowing crimson drown'd.

And now the swelling heaps of slaughter'd foes,
Sublime and equal to the torrens rose;
Whence, forward, with a leap, at once he sprung,
And shot himself amidst the hostile throng.
So daring, fierce with rage, so void of fear,
Bounds forth the spotted pard, and scorns the hunter's spear.

The closing ranks the warrior straight unfold,
And, compass'd in their steely circle, hold.
Undaunted still, around the ring he roams,
Fights here and there, and every where o'ercomes;
Till, clogg'd with blood, his sword obeys but ill
The dictates of its vengeful master's will:
Edgeless it falls, and though it pierce no more,
Still breaks the batter'd bones, and bruises fore.
Meantime, on him the crowding war is bent,
And darts from every hand to him are sent;
It look'd as torture did in odds delight,
And had in cruel sport ordain'd the fight;
A wondrous match of war the seem'd to make,
Her thousands here, and there her one to stake;
As if on nightly terms in lists they ran,
And armies were but equal to the man.
A thousand darts upon his buckler ring,
A thousand javelins round his temples ring;
Hard bearing on his head, with many a blow,
His steely helm is inward taugth to bow,
The missile arms, fix'd all around he wears,
And ev'n his safety in his wounds he bears,
Fenc'd with a fatal wood, a deadly grove of spears. }
Cease, ye Pompeian warriors! cease the strife, }
Nor, vainly, thus attempt this single life;
Your darts, your idle javelins cast aside,
And other arms for Scæva's death provide:

he forceful rams resistless horns prepare,
With all the ponderous vast machines of war;
Let dreadful flames, let massy rocks be thrown,
With engines thunder on, and break him down,
And win this Cæsar's soldier, like a town.
At length, his fate disdainful to delay,
He hurls his shield's neglected aid away,
Resolves no part whatever from death to hide,
But stands unguarded now on every side.
Encumber'd fore with many a painful wound,
Tardy and stiff he treads the hostile round;
Gloomy and fierce his eyes the crowds survey,
Mark where to fix, and single out the prey.
Such, by Getulian hunters compass'd in,
The vast unwieldy elephant is seen:
All cover'd with a steely shower from far,
Roufing he shakes, and sheds the scatter'd war;
In vain the distant troops the fight renew,
And with fresh rage the stubborn foe pursue;
Unconquer'd still the mighty savage stands,
And scorns the malice of a thousand hands.
Not all the wounds a thousand darts can make,
Though all find place, a single life can take.
When lo! address with some successful vow,
A shaft, sure flying from a Cretan bow,
Beneath the warrior's brow was seen to light,
And sunk, deep piercing the left orb of sight:
But he (so rage inspir'd, and mad disdain)
Remorseless tell, and senseless of the pain,
Tore forth the bearded arrow from the wound,
With stinging nerves besmear'd and wrapp'd a-
round,

And stamp'd the gory jelly on the ground.
So in Pannonian woods the growling bear,
Transfix'd, grows fiercer for the hunter's spear,
Turns on her wound, runs madding round with
And catches at the flying shaft in vain. [pai
Down from his eyeless hollow ran the blood,
And hideous o'er his mangled visage flow'd;
Deform'd each awful, each severer grace,
And veil'd the manly terrors of his face.
The victors raise their joyful voices high,
And with loud triumph strike the vaulted sky:
Not Cæsar thus a general joy had spread,
Though Cæsar's self like Scæva thus had bled.
Anxious, the wounded soldier, in his breast,
The rising indignation deep repress't,
And thus, in humble vein his haughty foes ad-dress't:

Here let your rage, ye Romans, cease, he said,
And lend your fellow-citizen your aid;
No more your darts nor useless javelins try,
These, which I bear, will deaths enow supply,
Draw forth your weapons, and behold I die.
Or rather bear me hence, and let me meet
My doom beneath the mighty Pompey's feet:
'Twere great, 'twere brave, to fall in arms,
true,

But I renounce that glorious fate for you.
Fain would I yet prolong this vital breath,
And quit ev'n Cæsar, so I fly from death.

The wretched Aulus listen'd to the wile,
Intent and greedy of the future spoil;
Advancing fondly on, with heedless ease,
He thought the captive and his arms to seize,
When, ere he was aware, his thundering sword
Deep in his throat the ready Scæva gor'd.

Warm'd with the slaughter, with fresh rage he burrs,

And vigour with the new success returns.

So may they fall (he said) by just deceit,
Such be their fate, such as this fool has met,
Who dare believe that I am vanquish'd yet!
If you would stop the vengeance of my sword,
From Cæsar's mercy be your peace implor'd,
There let your leader kneel, and humbly own his lord.

Me! could you meanly dare to fancy me

Base, like yourselves, and fond of life to be!

But know, not all the names which grace your
cause,

Your reverend senate, and your boasted laws,
Not Pompey's self, not all for which you fear,
Were e'er to you, like death to Scæva, dear.

Thus while he spoke, a rising dust betray'd
Cæsar's legions marching to his aid.

Now Pompey's troops with prudence seem to yield,

And to increasing numbers quit the field;

Dissembling shame, they hide their foul defeat,
Nor vanquish'd by a single arm retreat.

Then fell the warrior, for till then he stood;
His manly mind supply'd the want of blood.

It seem'd as rage had kindled life anew,

And courage to oppose, from opposition grew.

But now, when none were left him to repel,
Fainting for want of foes, the victor fell.

Straight with officious haste his friends draw near,

And, raising, joy the noble lord to bear:

To reverence and religious awe inclin'd,

Admiring, they adore his mighty mind,

That god within his mangled breast enshrin'd.

The wounding weapons, stain'd with Scæva's
blood,

Like sacred relics to the gods are vow'd:

Forth are they drawn from every part with care,

And kept to dress the naked god of war.

Oh, happy soldier! had thy worth been try'd,

In pious daring, on thy country's side!

Oh! had thy sword Iberian battles known,

Or purple with Cantabrian slaughter grown;

How had thy name in deathless annals shone!

But now no Roman Præan shalt thou sing,

Nor peaceful triumphs to thy country bring,

Nor loudly blest in solemn pomp shalt move,

Through crowding streets, to Capitolian Jove,

The laws defender, and the people's love:

Oh, hapless victor thou! oh, vainly brave!

How hast thou fought, to make thyself a slave!

Nor Pompey, thus repuls'd, the fight declines,

Nor rests encompass'd round by Cæsar's lines;

Once more he means to force his warlike way,

And yet retrieve the fortune of the day.

So when fierce winds with angry ocean strive,

Full on the beach the beating billows drive;

Stable a while the lofty mounds abide.

Check the proud surge, and stay the swelling
tide:

Yet restless still the waves unwear'd roll,

Work underneath at length, and sap the sinking mole.

With force renew'd the baffled warrior bends,

Where to the shore the jutting wall extends:

There proves, by land and sea, his various might,

And wins his passage by the double fight.

Wide o'er the plains diffus'd his legions range,
And their close camp for freer fields exchange.

So, rais'd by melting streams of Alpine snow,

Beyond his utmost margin swells the Po,

And loosely lets the spreading deluge flow:

Where'er the weaker banks oppress retreat,

And sink beneath the heavy waters weight,

Forth gushing at the breach, they burst their way,

And wafeful o'er the drowned country fray:

Far distant fields and meads they wander o'er,

And visit lands they never knew before;

Here, from its seat the mouldering earth is torn,

And by the flood to other masters borne;

While gathering there it heaps the growing soil,

And loads the peasant with his neighbour's spoil.

Soon as ascending high, a rising flame,

To Cæsar's fight, the combat's signal came,

Swift to the place approaching near, he found

The ruins scatter'd by the victor round,

And his proud labours humbled to the ground.

Thence to the hostile camp his eyes he turns,

Where for their peace, and sleep secure, he mourns,

With rancorous despite, and envious anguish,

At length resolv'd (so rage inspir'd his breast)

He means to break the happy victor's rest:

Once more to kindle up the fatal strife,

And dash their joys with hazard of his life.

Straight to Torquatus fierce he bends his way

(Torquatus near a neighbouring castle lay),

But he, by prudent caution taught to yield,

Trusts to his walls, and quits the open field;

There, safe within himself, he stands his ground,

And lines the guarded ramparts strongly round.

So when the seamen from afar descry

The clouds grow black upon the lowering sky,

Hear the winds roar, and mark the seas run high,

They furl the fluttering sheet with timely care,

And wisely for the coming storm prepare.

But now the victor, with resolute haste,

Proud o'er the ramparts of the fort had past;

When swift descending from the rising grounds,

Pompey with lengthening files the foe surrounds.

As when in Ætna's hollow caves below,

Round the vast furnace kindling whirlwinds
blow;

Rous'd in his baleful bower the giant roars,

And with a burst the burning deluge pours:

Then pale with horror shrieks the slaudering swain,

To see the fiery ruin spread the plain.

Nor with less horror Cæsar's bands behold

Huge hostile dusty clouds their rear infold;

Unknowing whom to meet, or whom to shun,

Blind with their fear, full on their fates they run.

Well, on that day, the world repose had gain'd,

And bold rebellion's blood had all been drain'd,

Had not the pious chief the rage of war restrain'd.

Oh, Rome, how free, how happy hadst thou been!

Thy own great mistress, and the nations queen!

Had Sylla then thy great avenger stood,

And dy'd his thirty sword in traitors blood.

But, oh! for ever shalt thou now bemoan

The two extremes, by which thou wert undone,

The ruthless father, and too tender son.

With fatal pity, Pompey, hast thou par'd,

And given the blackest crime the best reward:

How had that one, one happy day, withheld
The blood of Utica, and Munda's field!
The Pharian Nile had known no crime more great

Than some vile Ptolemy's untimely fate;
Nor Afric then, nor Juba had bemoan'd,
Nor Scipio's blood the Punic ghosts aton'd;
Cato had for his country's good surviv'd,
And long in peace a hoary patriot liv'd;
Rome had not worn a tyrant's hated chain,
And fate had undecreed Pharfalia's plain.

But Cæsar, weary of th' unlucky land,
Swift to Æmathia leads his shatter'd band;
While Pompey's wary friends, with caution wise,
To quit the baffled foe's pursuit advise.

To Italy they point his open way,
And bid him make the willing land his prey.
Oh! never (he replies) shall Pompey come,
Like Cæsar arm'd, and terrible to Rome;
Nor need I from those sacred walls have fled,
Could I have borne our streets with slaughter red,
And seen the Forum pil'd with heaps of dead,
Much rather let me pine in Scythia's frost;
Or burn on swarthy Libya's sultry coast;
No clime, no distant region, is too far,
Where I can banish, with me, fatal war.
I fled, to bid my country's sorrows cease;
And shall my victories invade her peace?
Let her but safe and free from arms remain,
And Cæsar still shall think he wears his chain.

He spoke, and castward fought the forest wide,
That rising clothes Candavia's shady side;
Thence to Æmathia took his destin'd way,
Reserv'd by fate for the deciding day.

Where Eurus blows, and wintry furs arise,
Thessalia's boundary proud Ossa lies;
But when the god protracts the longer day,
Pelion's broad back receives the dawning ray.
Where through the Lion's fiery sign he flies,
Othrys his leafy groves for shades supplies.
On Pindus strikes the sady western light,
When glittering Vesper leads the starry night.
Northward, Olympus hides the lamps, that roll
Their paler fires around the frozen pole.
The middle space, a valley low depress'd,
Once a wide, lazy, standing lake possess'd;
While growing still the heapy waters stood,
Nor down through Tempe ran the rushing flood:
But when Alcides to the task apply'd,
And cleft a passage through the mountains wide;
Gulfing at once the thundering torrent slow'd,
While Nereus groan'd beneath th' increasing load.
Then rose (oh, that it still a lake had lain!)
Above the waves Pharfalia's fatal plain,
Once subject to the great Achilles' reign,
Then Phylace was built, whose warriors boast
Their chief first landed on the Trojan coast;
Then Pteleos ran her circling wall around,
And Dorion, for the muses' wrath renown'd:
Then Trachin high, and Melibœa stood,
Where Hercules his fatal shafts bestow'd;
Larissa strong arose, and Argos, now
A plain, submitted to the labouring plough.
Here stood the town, if there be truth in fame,
That from Eceotian Thebes receiv'd its name.
Here sad Agave's wandering sense return'd,
Here for her murder'd son the mother mourn'd;

With streaming tears she wash'd his ghastly head,
And on the funeral pile the precious relic laid.

The gushing waters various soon divide,
And every river rules a separate tide;
The narrow Æas runs a limpid flood,
Evenos blushes with the Centaur's blood;
That gently mingles with th' Ionian sea,
While this through Caledonia cuts his way.
Slowly fair Io's aged father falls,
And in hoarse murmurs his lost daughter calls.
Thick Achelous rolls his troubled waves,
And heavily the neighbour isles he laves;
While pure Amphyrys winds along the mead,
Where Phœbus once was wont his flocks to feed:

Of on the banks he sat a shepherd swain,
And watch'd his charge upon the grassy plain.
Swift to the main his course Sperchios bends,
And, sounding, to the Malian gulf descends.
No breezy air near calm Anauros flies,
No dewy mists, nor fleecy clouds arise.
Here Phœnix, Melas, and Afopus run,
And strong Apidanus drives slow Enipeus on.
A thousand little brooks, unknown to fame,
Are mix'd, and lost in Peneus' nobler name:
Bold Titaresus scorns his rule, alone,
And, join'd to Peneus, still himself is known:
As o'er the land his haughty waters glide,
And roll, unmingling, a superior tide.
'Tis said, through secret channels winding forth,
Deep as from Styx he takes his hallow'd birth:
Thence, proud to be rever'd by gods on high,
He scorns to mingle with a mean ally.

When rising grounds uprear'd at length their heads,

And rivers shrunk within their oozy beds;
Bebrycians first are said, with early care,
In furrows deep to sink the shining share.
The Lelegians next, with equal toil,
And Dolopes, invade the mellow soil.
To these the bold Æolidæ succeed;
Magnetes, taught to reign the fiery steed,
And Minyæ, to explore the deep decreed.
Here pregnant by Ixion's bold embrace,
The mother cloud disclos'd the Centaur's race:
In Pelethronian caves he brought them forth,
And fill'd the land with many a monstrous birth.
Here dreadful Monychus first saw the light,
And prov'd on Phœoi's rending rocks his might;
Here tallest trees uprooting Rhœens bore,
Which baffled storms had try'd in vain before.
Here Pholus, of a gentler human breast,
Receiv'd the great Alcides for his guest.
Here, with brute-fury, lustful Nessus try'd
To violate the hero's beautiful bride,
'Tis justly by the fatal shaft he dy'd.
This parent land the pious leach confess,
Chiron, of all the double race the best:
'Midst golden stars he stands resplendent now,
And threatens the Scorpion with his bended bow.
Here love of arms and battle reign'd of old,
And form'd the first Thessalians fierce and bold:
Here, from rude rocks, at Neptune's potent
stroke,
Omen of war, the neighing courser broke;
Here, taught by skilful riders to submit,
He champ'd indignant on the foamy bit.

From fair Theſſalia's Pegafæan ſhore,
The fiſt bold pine the daring warriors bore,
And taught the ſons of earth wide oceans to explore.

Here, when Itonus held the regal feat,
The ſtubborn ſteel he fiſt ſubdu'd with heat,
And the tough bars on ſounding anvils beat :
In furnaces he ran the liquid braſs,
And caſt in curious works the molten maſs :

He taught the ruder artiſt to refine,
Explor'd the ſilver and the golden mine,
And ſtamp'd the coſtly metal into coin.
From that old era avarice was known,
Then all the deadly ſeeds of war was fown ;
Wide o'er the world, by tale, the miſchief ran,
And thoſe curſt pieces were the bane of man.
Huge Pythos, here, in many a ſcaly fold,
To Cyrrha's cave a length enormous roll'd :
Hence, Pythian games the hardy Greeks renown,
And laurel wreaths the joyful victor crown.
Here proud Alæus durſt the gods deſy,
And taught his impious brood to ſcale the ſky :
While mountains pil'd on mountains interfere
With heaven's bright orbs, and ſtop the circling ſphere.

To this curſt land, by fate's appointed doom,
With one conſent the warring leaders come ;
Their camps are fix'd, and now the vulgar fear,
To ſee the terrible event fo near.

A few, and but a few, with ſouls ſerene,
Wait the diſcloſing of the dubious ſcene.
But Sextus, mix'd among the vulgar herd,
Like them was anxious, and unmanly fear'd :
A youth unworthy of the hero's race,
And born to be his nobler fire's diſgrace.

A day ſhall come, when this inglorious ſon
Shall ſtain the trophies all by Pompey won :
A thief, and ſpoiler, ſhall he live confeſs'd,
And act thoſe wrongs his father's arm redreſs'd,
Vex'd with a coward's fond impatience now,
He cries into that fate he fears to know ;
Nor ſeeks he, with religious vows, to move
The Delphic tripod, or Dodonian Jove ;
No prieſtly Augur's arts employ his cares,
Nor Babylonian ſeers, who read the ſtars ;
He not by fibres, birds, or lightning's fires,
Nor any juſt, though ſecret, rites inquires ;
But horrid altars, and infernal powers,
Dire myſteries of magic he explores,
Such as high heaven and gracious Jove abhors.

He thinks, 'tis little thoſe above can know,
And ſeeks accuſt' affiſtance from below.
The place itſelf the impious means ſupplies,
While near Hæmonian hags incamp'd he lies ;
All dreadful deeds, all monſtrous forms of old,
By fear invented, and by falſehood told,
Whate'er tranſcends belief, and reaſon's view,
Their art can furniſh, and their power make true.

The pregnant fields a horrid crop produce,
Noxious, and fit for witchcraft's deadly uſe :
With baleful weeds each mountain's brow is
hung,

And liſtning rocks attend the charmer's fong.
There, potent and myſterious plants ariſe,
Plants that compel the gods, and awe the ſkies ;
There, leaves unfolded to Medea's view,
Such as her native Colchos never knew.

Soon as the dread Hæmonian voice aſcends,
Through the whole vaſt expanſe, each power at-
Ev'n all thoſe fullen deities, who know [tends ;
No care of heaven above, or earth below,
Hear and obey. Th' Aſſyrian then, in vain,
And Memphian prieſts, their local gods detain ;
From every altar looſe at once they fly,
And with the ſtronger foreign call comply,

The coldeſt hearts Theſſalian numbers warm,
And ruthleſs boſoms own the potent charm ;
With monſtrous power they rouse perverſe deſire,
And kindle into luſt the wint'ry fire :

Where noxious cups, and poiſonous philtres fail,
More potent ſpells and myſtic verſe prevail.
No draughts ſo ſtrong the knots of love prepare,
Cropt from her younglings by the parent marc.
Oft, ſullen bridegrooms, who unkindly fled
From blooming beauty, and the genial bed,
Melt, as the thread runs on, and ſighing, feel
The giddy whirling of the magic wheel.

Whene'er the proud enchantreſs gives command,
Eternal motion ſtops her active hand ;
No more heaven's rapid circles journey on,
But univerſal nature ſtands foredone :

The lazy god of day forgets to riſe,
And everlaſting night pollutes the ſkies.

Jove wonders, to behold her ſhake the pole,
And, unconſenting, hears his thunders roll.
Now, with a word, he hides the ſun's bright face,
And blots the wide ethereal azure ſpace ;
Looſely, anon, ſhe ſhakes her flowing hair,
And ſtraight the ſtormy lowering heavens are fair :
At once, ſhe calls the golden light again,
The clouds fly ſwift away, and ſtops the drizly rain.
In ſilence calms, ſhe bids the waves run high, [ſky ;
And ſmooths the deep, though Boreas ſhakes the
When winds are hush'd, her potent breath prevails,

Wafts on the bark, and fills the ſtagging ſails.
Streams have run back at murmurs of her tongue,
And torrents from the rock ſuſpended hung.
No more the Nile his wonted ſeaſons knows,
And in a line the ſtraight Mæander flows.
Arar has ruſh'd with headlong waters down,
And driven unwillingly the ſluggiſh Rhone.
Huge mountains have been level'd with the plain,
And far from heaven has tall Olympus lain.

Riphæan cryſtal has been known to melt,
And Scythian ſnows a ſudden ſummer felt.
No longer preſt by Cynthia's moiſter beam,
Alternate Tethys heaves her ſwelling ſtream ;
By charms forbid, her tides revolve no more,
But thruſt the margin of the guarded ſhore.

The ponderous earth, by magic numbers ſtruck,
Down to her inmoſt centre deep has ſhook ;
Then ending with a yawn, at once made way,
To join the upper, and the nether day ;
While wondering eyes, and dreadful cleft between,
Another ſtarry firmament have ſeen.

Each deadly kind, by nature form'd to kill,
Fear the dire hags, and execute their will.
Lions, to them their nobler rage ſubmit,
And ſawning tigers couch beneath their feet ;
For them, the ſnake foregoes her wintery hold,
And on the hoary froſt untwines her fold :
The poiſonous race they ſtrike with ſtronger death,
And blaſted vipers die by human breath.

What law the heavenly natures thus constrains,
And binds ev'n godheads in resistless chains?
What wondrous power do charms and herbs imply,

And force them thus to follow, and to fly?
What is it can command them to obey?
Does choice incline, or awful terror sway?
Do secret rites their deities atone,
Or mystic piety to man unknown?
Do strong enchantments all immortals brave?
Or is there one determin'd god their slave?
One, whose command obedient nature awes,
Who, subject still himself to magic laws,
Acts only as a servile second cause?
Magic the starry lamps from heaven can tear,
And shoot them gleaming through the dusky air;
Can blot fair Cynthia's countenance serene,
And poison with foul spells the silver queen:
Now pale the ghastly goddess shrinks with dread,
And now black smoky fires involve her head;
As when earth's envious interposing shade
Cuts off her beamy brother from her aid;
Held by the charming song, she strives in vain,
And labours with the long pursuing pain;
Till down, and downward still, compell'd to come,
On hallow'd herbs she slides her fatal foam.

But these, as arts too gentle, and too good,
Nor yet with death, or guilt enough embued,
With haughty scorn the fierce Erietho view'd.
New mischief she, new monsters durst explore,
And dealt in horrors never known before.
From towns and hospitable roofs she flies,
And every dwelling of mankind desies;
Through unfrequented deserts lonely roams,
Drives out the dead, and dwells within their tombs.

Spite of all laws, which heaven or nature know,
The rule of gods above, and man below;
Grateful to hell the living hag descends,
And sits in black assemblies of the fiends.
Dark matted elf-locks dangling on her brow,
Filthy, and foul, a loathsome burden grow;
Ghastly, and frightful-pale her face is seen,
Unknown to cheerful day, and skies serene:
But when the stars are veil'd, when storms arise,
And the blue forky flame at midnight flies,
Then, forth from graves, she takes her wicked
way,

And thwarts the glancing lightnings as they play.
Where'er she breathes, blue poisons round her
spread.

The withering grass avows her fatal tread.
And drooping Ceres hangs her blasted head.
Nor holy rites, nor suppliant prayer she knows,
Nor seeks the gods with sacrifice, or vows:
Whate'er she offers is the spoil of urns,
And funeral fire upon her altars burns;
Nor needs she send a second voice on high,
Scar'd at the first, the trembling gods comply.

Oft in the grave the living has she laid,
And bid reviving bodies leave the dead:
Oft at the funeral pile she seeks her prey,
And bears the smoking ashes warm away;
Snatches some burning bone, or flaming brand,
And tears the torch from the sad father's hand;
Seizes the shroud's loose fragments as they fly,
And picks the coal where clammy juices fry.

But when the dead in marble tombs are plac'd,
Where the moist carcase by degrees shall waste,
There, greedily on every part she flies,
Strips the dry nails, and digs the gory eyes.
Her teeth from gibbets gnaw the strangling noose
And from the cross dead murderers unloose:
Her charms the use of sun-dry'd marrow find,
And husky entrails wither'd in the wind;
Oft drops the rosy gore upon her tongue,
With corny sinews oft her jaws are strung,
And thus suspended oft the filthy hag has hung.
Where'er the battle bleeds, and slaughter lies;
Thither, preventing birds and beasts, she hies;
Nor then content to seize the ready prey,
From their fell jaws she tears their food away:
She marks the hungry wolf's pernicious tooth,
And joys to rend the morsel from his mouth.
Nor ever yet remorse could stop her hand,
When human gore her curst rites demand.
Whether some tender infant, yet unborn,
From the lamenting mother's side is torn;
Whether her purpose asks some bolder shade,
And by her knife, the ghost she wants, is made;
Or whether, curious in the choice of blood,
She catches the first gushing of the flood;
All mischief is of use, and every murder good.
When blooming youths in early manhood die,
She stands a terrible attendant by;
The downy growth from off their cheeks she tear
Or cuts left-handed some selected hairs.
Oft when in death her gasping kindred lay,
Some pious office would the feign to pay;
And while close hovering o'er the bed she hung
Bit the pale lips, and cropt the quivering tongu
Then, in hoarse murmurs, ere the ghost could go
Mutter'd some message to the shades below.

A fame like this around the region spread,
To prove her power, the younger Pompey led.
Now half her table course the night had run,
And low beneath us roll'd the beamy sun;
When the vile youth in silence cross'd the plain,
Attended by his wonted worthless train.
Through ruins waste and old, long wanderi
round,

Lonely upon a rock, the hag they found.
There, as it chanc'd, in fullen mood she fate,
Pondering upon the war's approaching fate:
At that same hour, she ran new numbers o'er,
And spells unheard by hell itself before;
Fearful, lest wavering destiny might change,
And bid the war in distant regions range.
She charm'd Pharsalia's field with early care,
To keep the warriors and the slaughter there.
So may her impious arts in triumph reign,
And riot in the plenty of the slain:
So, many a royal ghost she may command,
Mangle dead heroes with a ruthless hand,
And rob of many an urn Hesperia's mourning
land.

Already she enjoys the dreadful field,
And thinks what spoils the rival chiefs shall yield.
With what fell rage each corse she shall invade,
And fly rapacious on the prostrate dead.

To her, a lowly suppliant, thus begun
The noble Pompey's much unworthy son:
Hail! mighty mistress of Hæmonian arts,
To whom stern fate her dark decrees imparts;

At thy approving, bids her purpose stand,
Or alters it at thy rever'd command.
From thee, my humbler awful hopes presume
To learn my father's, and my country's doom:
Nor think this grace to one unworthy done,
When thou shalt know me for great Pompey's son;
With him all fortunes am I bound to share,
His ruin's partner, or his empire's heir.
Let not blind chance for ever wavering stand,
And awe us with her unresolving hand:
Own my mind unequal to the weight,
Nor can I bear the pangs of doubtful fate:
Let it be certain what we have to fear,
And then—no matter—Let the time draw near.
Oh let thy charms this truth from heaven compel,
Or force the dreadful Stygian gods to tell.
All death, all pale and meagre, from below,
And from herself her fatal purpose know;
Unstrain'd by thee, the phantom shall declare
Whom she decrees to strike and whom to spare.
Nor ever can thy skill divine foresee,
Through the blind maze of long futurity,
Events more worthy of thy arts, and thee.

}

Pleas'd that her magic fame diffusely flies,
Thus, with a horrid smile, the hag replies:
Hast thou, oh noble youth, my aid implor'd,
For any less decision of the sword;
The gods, unwilling, should my power confess,
And crown thy wishes with a full success.
Hast thou desir'd some single friend to save,
Whom had my charms withheld him from the grave:

Or would thy hate for me for this instant doom,
Ie dies, though heaven decrees him years to come.
But when effects are to their causes chain'd,
From everlasting, mightily, ordain'd;
When all things labour for one certain end,
And on one action centre and depend:
Then far behind we own our arts are cast,
And magic is by fortune's power surpass'd.
Low'er, if yet thy soul can be content,
Only to know that undisclos'd event;
My potent charms o'er nature shall prevail,
And from a thousand mouths extort the tale:
His truth the fields, the floods, the rocks, shall tell:

He thunder of high heaven, or groans of hell:
Though, still, more kindly oracles remain,
Among the recent deaths of yonder plain.
Of these a corse our mystic rites shall raise,
As yet unshrunk by Titan's parching blaze;
Or shall no maim the vocal pipes confound,
But the sad shade shall breathe, distinct in human
found.

While yet the spoke, a double darkness spread,
Dark clouds and murky fogs involve her head,
While o'er th' unbury'd heaps her footsteps tread,
Volves howl'd, and fled where'er she took her way,
And hungry vultures left the mangled prey:
The savage race, abash'd, before her yield,
And while she culls her prophet, quit the field.
So various carcases by turns she flies,
And, gripping with her gory fingers, tries;
Still one of perfect organs can be found,
And fibrous lungs uninjur'd by a wound.
Of all the flitting shadows of the slain,
Late doubts which ghost shall turn to life again.

VOL. XII.

At her strong bidding (such is her command)
Armies at once had left the Stygian strand;
Hell's multitudes had waited on her charms,
And legions of the dead had ris'n to arms.
Among the dreadful carnage strew'd around,
One, for her purpose fit, at length she found;
In his pale jaws a rusty hook she hung,
And dragg'd the wretched lifeless load along:
Anon, beneath a craggy cliff she laid,
And in a dreary delve her burden laid;
There evermore the wicked witch delights,
To do her deeds accurs'd, and practice hellish rites.

Low as the realms where Stygian Jove is
crown'd,
Subsides the gloomy vale within the ground;
A downward grove, that never knew to rise,
Or shoot its leafy honours to the skies.
From hanging rocks declines its drooping head,
And covers in the cave with dreadful shade;
Within dismay, and fear, and darkness dwell,
And silt obscene besmears the baleful cell.
There, lasting night no beamy dawning knows,
No light but such as magic flames disclose;
Heavy, as in Tænarian caverns, there
In dull stagnation sleeps the lazy air.
There meet the boundaries of life and death,
The borders of our world, and that beneath;
Thither the rulers of th' infernal court
Permit their airy vassals to resort;
Thence with like ease the forcerers could tell,
As if descending down, the deeds of hell.

And now she for the solemn talk prepares,
A mantle patch'd with various threads she wears,
And binds with twining snakes her wilder hairs,
All pale, for dread, the dastard youth she spy'd,
Heartless his mates stood quivering by his side.
Be bold! (he cries) dismiss this abject fear;
Living and human shall the form appear, [hear,
And breathe no sounds but what even you may How had your vile, your coward souls been quell'd,

Had you the livid Stygian lakes beheld;
Heard the loud floods of rolling sulphur roar,
And burst in thunder on the burning shore?
Had you survey'd yon prison-house of woe,
And giants bound in adamant below?
Seen the vast dog with curling vipers swell,
Heard screaming furies, at my coming, yell,
Double their rage, and add new pains to hell?

This said, she runs the mangled carcase o'er,
And wipes from every wound the crusty gore;
Now with hot blood the frozen breast she warms,
And with strong lunar dews confirms her charms.
Anon she mingles every monstrous birth,
Which nature, wayward and perverse, brings forth.
Nor entrails of the spotted lynx she lacks,
Nor bony joints from fell hyænas' backs;
Nor deer's hot marrow, rich with snaky food;
Nor foam of raging dogs that fly the flood.
Her store the tardy Remora supplies,
With stones from eagles warm and dragon's eyes;
Snakes that on pinions cut their airy way,
And nimble o'er Arabian deserts prey;
The viper bred in Erythræan streams,
To guard in costly shells the growing gems;

3 E

The slough by Libya's horned serpent cast,
 With ashes by the dying phoenix plac'd
 On odorous altars in the fragrant east.
 To these she joins dire drugs without a name,
 A thousand poisons never known to fame:
 Herbs, o'er whole leaves the hag her spells had sung,

And wet with curst spittle as they sprung;
 With every other mischief most abhorr'd,
 Which hell, or worse Erichtho, could afford.

At length, in murmurs hoarse her voice was heard,

Her voice, beyond all plants, all magic fear'd,
 And by the lowest Stygian gods rever'd.
 Her gabbling tongue a muttering tone confounds,
 Discordant, and unlike to human sounds:

It seem'd, of dogs the bark, of wolves the howl,
 The doleful screeching of the midnight owl;
 The hiss of snakes, the hungry lion's roar,
 The bound of billows beating on the shore;
 The groan of winds amongst the leafy wood,
 And burst of thunder from the rending cloud:
 'Twas these, all these in one. At length she breaks

Thus into magic verse, and thus the gods bespeaks:

Ye furies! and thou black accur'd hell!
 Ye woes! in which the damn'd for ever dwell;
 Chaos, the world, and form's eternal foe!

And thou sole arbiter of all below,
 Pluto! whom ruthless fates a god ordain,
 And doest to immortality of pain;

Ye fair Elysian mansions of the blest,
 Where no Thessalian charmer hopes to rest;
 Styx! and Persephone, compell'd to fly
 Thy fruitful mother, and the cheerful sky!

Third Hecate! by whom my whispers breathe

My secret purpose to the shades beneath;
 Thou greedy dog, who at th' infernal gate,
 In everlasting hunger, still dost wait!

And thou old Charon, horrible and hoar!
 For ever labouring back from shore to shore:
 Who murmuring dost in weariness complain,

That I so oft demand thy dead again;
 Hear, all ye powers! If e'er your hell rejoice
 In the lov'd horrors of this impious voice;

If still with human flesh I have been fed,
 If pregnant mothers have, to please you, bled;
 If from the womb these ruthless hands have torn Infants, mature, and struggling to be born;

Hear and obey! nor do I ask a ghost,
 Long since receiv'd upon your Stygian coast;
 But one that, new to death, for entrance waits,
 And loiters yet before your gloomy gates.

Let the pale shade these herbs, these numbers
 hear,

And in his well-known warlike form appear.

Here let him stand, before his leader's son,
 And say what dire events are drawing on:
 If blood be your delight, let this be done.

Foaming she spoke: then rear'd her hateful
 head,

And hard at hand beheld th' attending shade.
 Too well the trembling sprite the carcase knew,
 And fear'd to enter into life anew;

Fain from those mangled limbs it would have run,

And, lothing, strove that house of pain to shun.

Ah! wretch! to whom the cruel fates deny
 That privilege of human kind, to die!
 Wroth was the hag at lingering death's delay;
 And wonder'd hell could dare to disobey;
 With curling snakes the senseless trunk the beats,
 And curses dire, at every lash, repeats;
 With magic numbers cleaves the groaning ground
 And, thus, barks downwards to th' abyss profound

Ye fiends hell-born, ye sisters of despair!
 Thus? is it thus my will becomes your care?
 Still sleep those whips within your idle hands,
 Nor drive the loitering ghost this voice demands
 But mark me well! my charms, in fate's despite Shall prag you forth, ye Stygian dogs, to light;
 Through vaults and tombs, where now secure you roam,

My vengeance shall pursue, and chace you home
 And thou, oh! Hecate! that dar'st to rise,
 Various and alter'd to immortal eyes,
 No more shalt veil thy horrors in disguise;

Still in thy form accur'd shalt thou dwell,
 Nor change the face that nature made for hell.
 Each mylery beneath I will display,
 And Stygian loves shall stand confess'd to day.

Thou, Persephone! thy fatal feat I'll show,
 What leagues detain thee in the realms below,
 And why thy once-fond mother lothes thee now.

At my command, earth's barrier shall remove,
 And piercing Titan vex infernal Jove;
 Full on his throne the blazing beams shall beat,
 And light abhorr'd afflict the gloomy seat.

Yet, am I yet, ye fallen fiends, obey'd?
 Or must I call your master to my aid?
 At whose dread name the trembling furies quake
 Hell stands abash'd, and earth's foundations shake

Who views the Gorgons with intrepid eyes,
 And your unviolable flood defies?
 She said; and, at the word, the frozen blood
 Slowly began to roll its creeping flood;

Through the known channels stole the purple tide
 And warmth and motion through the members
 glide;

The nerves are stretch'd, the turgid muscles swell
 And the heart moves within its secret cell;
 The haggard eyes their stupid lights disclose,
 And heavy by degrees the corpse arose.

Doubtful and faint th' uncertain life appears,
 And death, all-o'er, the livid visage wears.
 Pale, stiff, and mute, the ghastly figure stands,
 Nor knows to speak, but at her dread command

When thus the hag: Speak what I wish to know
 And endless rest attends thy shade below;
 Reveal the truth, and to reward thy pain,
 No charms shall drag thee back to life again;

Such hallow'd wood shall feed thy funeral fire,
 Such numbers to thy last repose conspire,
 No sister of our art thy ghost shall wrong,
 Or force thee listen to her potent song.

Since the dark gods in mystic tripods dwell,
 Since doubtful truths ambiguous prophets tell;
 While each event aright and plain is read,
 To every bold inquirer of the dead:

Do thou unfold what end these wars shall wait,
 Persons, and things, and time, and place relate,
 And be the just interpreter of fate.

She spoke, and, as the spoke, a spell she made,
 That gave new presence to th' unknowing shade

When thus the spectre, weeping all for woe:
 Ask not from me the Parcæ's will to know,
 I know not what their dreadful looms ordain,
 So soon recall'd to hated life again;
 Recall'd, ere yet my waiting ghost had pass'd
 The silent stream, that waits us all to rest.
 All I could learn, was from the loose report
 Of wandering shades, that to the banks resort,
 Of broar, and discord, never known till now,
 Of stract the peaceful realms of death below;
 Of blissful plains of sweet Elysium some,
 Others from doleful dens, and torments, come;
 While in the face of every various shade,
 The woes of Rome too plainly might be read.
 Tears lamenting, ghosts of patriots stood,
 And mourn'd their country in a falling flood;
 And were the Decii, and the Curii seen,
 And heavy was the great Camillus' mien:
 A fortune loud indignant Sylla rail'd,
 And Scipio his unhappy race bewail'd;
 And Censor sad foresaw his Cato's doom,
 Resolv'd to die for liberty, and Rome.
 All the shades that haunt the happy field,
 See only, Brutus! smiling I beheld;
 See, thou first consul, haughty Târquin's
 Dread,
 Whom whose just wrath the conscious tyrant fled,
 When freedom first uprear'd her infant head.
 Meanwhile the damn'd exult amidst their pains,
 And Catiline audacious breaks his chains,
 And here the Cæthegan naked race I view'd,
 And Marii fierce, with human gore imbrued,
 And Gracchi, fond of mischief-making laws,
 And Drusi, popular in faction's cause;
 All clapp'd their hands in horrible applause.
 In crash of brazen fetters rung around,
 And hell's wide caverns trembled with the
 found.
 To more the bounds of fate their guilt constrain,
 At proudly they demand th' Elysian plain.
 Thus they, while dreadful Dis, with busy cares,
 Sew torments for the conquerors prepares;
 Sew chains of adamant he forms below,
 And opens all his deep reserves of woe:
 And are the pains for tyrants kept in store,
 And flames yet ten times hotter than before.

But thou, oh noble youth! in peace depart,
 And sooth, with better hopes, thy doubtful heart;
 Sweet is the rest, and blissful is the place,
 That wait thy fire, and his illustrious race.
 Nor fondly seek to lengthen out thy date,
 Nor envy the surviving victor's fate;
 The hour draws near when all alike must yield,
 And death shall mix the fame of every field.
 Hasten then, with glory, to your destin'd end,
 And proudly from your humbler urns descend;
 Bold in superior virtue shall you come,
 And trample on the demigods of Rome.
 Ah! what shall it import the mighty dead,
 Or by the Nile or Tiber to be laid?
 'Tis only for a grave your wars are made.
 Seek not to know what for thyself remains,
 That shall be told in fair Sicilia's plains;
 Prophetic there, thy father's shade shall rise,
 In awful vision to thy wondering eyes:
 He shall thy fate reveal; though doubting yet,
 Where he may best advise thee to retreat.
 In vain to various climates shall you run,
 In vain pursuing Fortune strive to shun,
 In Europe, Afric, Asia; still undone.
 Wide as your triumphs shall your ruins lie,
 And all in distant regions shall you die.
 Ah, wretched race! to whom the world can yield
 No safer refuge, than Emathia's field.
 He said, and with a silent, mournful look,
 A last dismissal from the bag bespoke.
 Nor can the sprite, discharg'd by death's cold
 hand,
 Again be subject to the same command;
 But charms and magic herbs must lend their aid,
 And render back to rest the troubled shade.
 A pile of hollow'd wood Erictho builds,
 The soul with joy its mangled carcase yields;
 She bids the kindling flames ascend on high,
 And leaves the weary wretch at length to die.
 Then, while the secret dark their footsteps hides,
 Homeward the youth, all pale for fear, she guides;
 And, for the light began to streak the east,
 With potent spells the dawning she repress'd;
 Commanded night's obedient queen to stay,
 And, till they reach'd the camp, withheld the rising day.

B O O K VII.

THE ARGUMENT.

The seventh book is told, first, Pompey's dream the night before the battle of Pharsalia; after that, the impatient desire of his army to engage, which is reinforced by Tully. Pompey, though against his own opinion and inclination, agrees to a battle. Then follows the speech of each general to his army, and the battle itself: the flight of Pompey; Cæsar's behaviour after his victory; and an invective against him, and the very country of Thessaly, for being the scene (according to this and other authors) of so many misfortunes to the people of Rome.

ATE, and unwilling, from his watery bed,
 Apear'd the mournful sun his cloudy head;
 He lick'n'd to behold Emathia's plain,
 And would have fought the backward east
 again:

Full oft he turn'd him from the destin'd race,
 And wish'd some dark eclipse might veil his radian face.

Pompey, meanwhile, in pleasing visions past
 The night, of all his happy nights the last.

If seem'd, as if, in all his former state,
 In his own theatre secure he fate:
 About his side unnumber'd Romans crowd,
 And, joyful, shout his much-lov'd name aloud:
 The echoing benches seem to ring around,
 And his charm'd ears devour the pleasing sound.
 Such both himself, and such the people seem,
 In the false prospect of the feigning dream;
 As when in early manhood's beardless bloom,
 He stood the darling hope and joy of Rome.
 When fierce Sertorius by his arms suppress'd,
 And Spain subdu'd the conqueror confess'd:
 When rais'd with honours never known before,
 The consuls purple, yet a youth, he wore:
 When the pleas'd senate sat with new delight,
 To view the triumph of a Roman knight.

Perhaps, when our good days no longer last,
 The mind runs backward, and enjoys the past:
 Perhaps, the riddling visions of the night
 With contrarieties delude our sight;
 And when fair scenes of pleasure they disclose,
 Pain they foretell, and sure ensuing woes.
 Or was it not, that, since the fates ordain
 Pompey should never see his Rome again,
 One last good office yet they meant to do,
 And gave him in a dream this parting view?

Oh, may no trumpet bid the leader wake!
 Long, let him long the blissful slumber take!
 Too soon the morrow's sleepless night will come,
 Full fraught with slaughter, misery, and Rome;
 With horror, and dismay, those shades shall rise,
 And the lost battle live before his eyes.

How blest his fellow-citizens had been,
 Though but in dreams, their Pompey to have seen!
 Oh! that the gods, in pity, would allow,
 Such long-try'd friends their destiny to know;
 So each to each might their sad thoughts convey,
 And make the most of their last mournful day.
 But now, unconscious of the ruin nigh,
 Within his native land he thinks to die:
 While her fond hopes with confidence presume,
 Nothing so terrible from fate can come,
 As to be robb'd of her lov'd Pompey's tomb.
 Had the sad city fate's decree foreknown,
 What floods, fast falling, should her loss bemoan!
 Then should the lusty youth, and fathers hoar,
 With mingling tears, their chief renown'd deplore;

Maids, matrons, wives, and babes, a helpless train,
 As once for godlike Brutus, should complain;
 Their tresses should they tear, their bosoms beat,
 And cry loud-wailing in the doleful street.
 Nor shalt thou, Rome, thy gushing sorrows keep,
 Though aw'd by Cæsar, and forbid to weep;
 Though, while he tells thee of thy Pompey dead,
 He shakes his threatening falchion o'er thy head.
 Lamenting crowds the conqueror shall meet,
 And with a peal of groans his triumph greet;
 In sad procession, sighing shall they go,
 And stain his laurels with the streams of woe.

But now, the fainting stars at length give way,
 And hid their vanquish'd fires in heavy day;
 When round the leader's tent the legions crowd,
 And, urg'd by fate, demand the fight aloud.
 Wretches! that long their little life to waste,
 And hurry on those hours that fly too fast!
 Too soon, for thousands, shall the day be done,
 Whose eyes no more shall see the setting sun.

Tumultuous speech th' impulsive rage confess,
 And Rome's bad genius rose in every breast.
 With vile disgrace they blot their leader's name,
 Pronounce ev'n Pompey fearful, slow, and tame,
 And cry, He sinks beneath his father's fame.
 Some charge him with ambition's guilty views,
 And think 'tis power and empire he pursues;
 That, fearing peace, he practices delay,
 And would, for ever, make the world obey.
 While eastern kings of lingering wars complain,
 And wish to view their native realms again.
 Thus when the gods are pleas'd to plague mankind,

Our own rash hands are to the task assign'd;
 By them ordain'd the tools of fate to be,
 We blindly act the mischief's decree,
 We call the battle, we the sword prepare,
 And Rome's destruction is the Roman prayer.

The general voice, united, Tully takes,
 And for the rest the sweet persuader speaks;
 Tully, for happy eloquence renown'd,
 With every Roman grace of language crown'd;
 Beneath whose rule and government rever'd,
 Fierce Catiline the peaceful axes fear'd:
 But now, detain'd amidst an armed throng,
 Where lost his arts, and useless was his tongue,
 The orator had borne the camp too long.
 He to the vulgar side his pleading draws,
 And thus enforces much their feeble cause:

For all that fortune for thy arms has done,
 For all thy fame acquir'd, thy battles won;
 This only boon her suppliant vows implore,
 That thou wouldst deign to use her aid once more:
 In this, O Pompey! kings and chiefs unite,
 And, to chastise proud Cæsar, ask the fight.
 Shall he, one man against the world combin'd,
 Protract destruction, and embroil mankind?
 What will the vanquish'd nations murmuring say,
 Where once thy conquests cut their winged way;
 When they behold thy virtue lazy now,
 And see thee move thus languishing and slow?
 Where are those fires that warm'd thee to be great?
 That stable soul, and confidence in fate?
 Canst thou the gods ungratefully mistrust?
 Or think the senate's sacred cause unjust?
 Scarce are th' impatient ensigns yet withheld:
 Why art thou thus to victory compell'd?
 Dost thou Rome's chief, and in her cause, appear!
 'Tis hers to choose the field, and she appoints it
 Why is this ardor of the world withstood, [here
 The injur'd world, that thirsts for Cæsar's blood?
 See! where the troops with indignation stand,
 Each javelin trembling in an eager hand,
 And wait, unwillingly, the last command.
 Resolve the senate then, and let them know,
 Are they thy servants, or their servant thou?

Sore sigh'd the listening chief, who well could
 Some dire delusion by the gods decreed; [read
 He saw the fates malignantly inclin'd,
 To thwart his purpose and perplex his mind.

Since thus (he cry'd) it is by all decreed,
 Since my impatient friends and country need
 My hand to fight, and not my head to lead;
 Pompey no longer shall your fate delay,
 But let pernicious fortune take her way,
 And waste the world on one devoted day.
 But, oh, be witness thou, my native Rome,
 With what a sad foreboding heart I come;

'o thy hard fate unwillingly I yield,
 While thy rash sons compel me to the field.
 How easily had Cæsar been subdu'd,
 And the best victory been free from blood!
 'ut the fond Romans cheap renown disdain,
 'hey wish for deaths to purple o'er the plain,
 and reeking gore their guilty swords to stain.
 riv'n by my fleets, behold the flying foe
 at once the empire of the deep forego;
 here by necessity they seem to stand,
 loop'd up within a corner of the land.
 'y famine to the last extremes compell'd,
 'hey snatch green harvests from th' unripen'd and with me may this only grace afford, [field;
 'o let them die like soldiers, by the sword.
 'is true, it seems an earnest of success,
 'hat thus our bolder youth for action press:
 ut let them try their inmost hearts with care,
 and judge betwixt true valour and rash fear;
 et them be sure this eagerness is right,
 and certain fortitude demands the fight.
 I war, in dangers, oft it has been known,
 'hat fear has driven the headlong coward on.
 ive me the man, whose cooler soul can wait,
 With patience for the proper hour of fate.
 ee what a prosperous face our fortunes bear!
 Why should we trust them to the chance of war?
 Why must we risk the world's uncertain doom,
 and rather choos't to fight than overcome?
 'hou goddesses Chance! who to my careful hand fast given this wearisome supreme command;
 f I have, to the task of empire just,
 enlarg'd the bounds committed to my trust;
 be kind, and to thyself the rule resume,
 and in the fight defend the cause of Rome:
 'o thy own crowns the wreath of conquest join:
 Nor let the glory, nor the crime, be mine.
 But see! thy hopes, unhappy Pompey! fail:
 We fight; and Cæsar's stronger vows prevail.
 Oh, what a scene of guilt this day shall show!
 What crowds shall fall, what nations be laid low!
 ed shall Enipeus run with Roman blood,
 And to the margin swell his foamy flood.
 Oh! if our cause my aid no longer need,
 Oh! may my bosom be the first to bleed:
 Me let the thrilling javelin foremost strike,
 since death and victory are now alike.
 To-day, with ruin shall my name be join'd,
 Or stand the common curse of all mankind;
 By every woe the vanquish'd shall be known,
 And every infamy the victor crown.
 He spoke; and yielding to th' impetuous crowd,
 The battle to his frantic bands allow'd.
 'o, when long vex'd by stormy Corus' blast,
 The weary pilot quits the helm at last;
 He leaves his vessel to the winds to guide,
 And drive unsteady with the tumbling tide.
 Loud through the camp the rising murmurs
 And one tumultuous hurry runs around; [sound, sudden their busy hearts began to beat,
 And each pale visage wore the marks of fate.
 Anxious, they see the dreadful day is come,
 That must decide the destiny of Rome.
 This single vast concern employs the host,
 And private fears are in the public lost.
 should earth be rent, should darkness quench the sun,
 should swelling seas above the mountains run,

Should universal nature's end draw near,
 Who could have leisure for himself to fear?
 With such consent his safety each forgot,
 And Rome and Pompey took up every thought.
 And now the warriors all, with busy care,
 Whet the dull sword, and point the blunted spear;
 With tougher nerves they string the bended bow,
 And in full quivers steely shafts bestow;
 The horseman sees his furniture made fit,
 Sharpens the spur, and burnishes the bit;
 Fixes the rein, to check or urge his speed,
 And animates to fight the snorting steed.
 Such once the busy gods employments were,
 If mortal men to gods we may compare,
 When earth's bold sons began their impious war. }
 The Lemnian power, with many a stroke, restor'd
 Blue Neptune's trident, and stern Mars's sword;
 In terrible array, the blue-ey'd maid
 The horrors of her Gorgon shield display'd;
 Phœbus his once victorious shafts renew'd,
 Difus'd, and rusty with the Python's blood;
 While, with unweary'd toil, the Cyclops strove
 To forge new thunders for imperial Jove.
 Nor wanted then dire omens, to declare
 What curst events Thessalia's plains prepare;
 Black storms oppos'd against the warriors lay,
 And lightnings thwarted their forbidden way;
 Full in their eyes the dazzling flashes broke,
 And with amaze their troubled senses stroke:
 Tall fiery columns in the skies were seen,
 With watery Typhons interwove between.
 Glancing along the bands swift meteors shoot,
 And from the helm the plummy honours cut;
 Sudden the flame dissolves the javelin's head,
 And liquid runs the shining steely blade.
 Strange to behold! their weapons disappear,
 While sulphurous odour taints the smoking air.
 The standard, as unwilling to be borne,
 With pain from the tenacious earth is torn:
 Anon, black swarms hang clustering on its height,
 And press the bearer with unwonted weight.
 Big drops of grief each sweating marble wears,
 And Parian gods and heroes stand in tears.
 No more th' auspicious victim tamely dies,
 But furious from the hallow'd sanc he flies;
 Breaks off the rites with prodigies profane,
 And bellowing seeks Emathia's fatal plain:
 But who, O Cæsar! who were then thy gods?
 Whom didst thou summon from their dark abodes?
 The furies listen'd to thy grateful vows,
 And dreadful to the day the powers of hell arose.
 Did then the monsters, fame records, appear?
 Or were they only phantoms form'd by fear?
 Some saw the moving mountains meet like foes,
 And rending earth new gaping caves disclose.
 Others beheld a sanguine torrent take
 Its purple course through fair Bœbeis' lake;
 Heard each returning night, portentous, yield
 Loud shouts of battle on Pharsalia's field.
 While others thought they saw the light decay,
 And sudden shades oppress the fainting day;
 Fancy'd wild horrors in each other's face,
 And saw the ghosts of all their bury'd race;
 Beheld them rise and glare with pale affright,
 And stalk around them, in the new-made night.
 Whate'er the cause, the crowd, by fate decreed,
 To make their brothers, sons, and fathers bleed, }
 Consenting, to the prodigies agreed;

And, while they thirst impatient for that blood,
Bless these nefarious omens all as good

But wherefore should we wonder, to behold
That death's approach by madness was foretold?
Wild are the wandering thoughts which last survive;

And these had not another day to live.
These shook for what they saw; while distant climes,

Unknowing, trembled for Emathia's crimes.
Where Tyrian Gades sees the setting sun,
And where Araxes' rapid waters run,
From the bright orient to the glowing west,
In every nation, every Roman breast
The terrors of that dreadful day confess.

Where Aponus first springs in smoky steam;
And full T' imavus rolls his nobler stream;
Upon a hill that day, if fame be true,
A learned augur sat the skies to view:

'Tis come, the great event is come (he cry'd)
Our impious chiefs their wicked war decide.
Whether the fear observ'd Jove's forked flame,
And mark'd the firmament's discordant frame;
Or whether, in that gloom of sudden night,
The struggling sun declar'd the dreadful fight:
From the first birth of morning in the skies,
Sure never day like this was known to rise;
In the blue vault, as in a volume spread,
Plain might the Latian destiny be read.

Oh Rome! oh people, by the gods assign'd
To be the worthy masters of mankind!
On thee the heavens with all their signals wait,
And suffering nature labours with thy fate.
When thy great name's to latest times convey'd,
By fame, or by my verse immortal made,
In free-born nations justly shall prevail,
And rouse their passions with this noblest tale;
How shall they fear for thy approaching doom,
As if each past event were yet to come!
How shall their bosoms swell with vast concern,
And long the doubtful chance of war to learn!
E'en then the favouring world with thee shall join,
And every honest heart to Pompey's cause incline.

Descending, now, the hands in just array,
From burnish'd arms reflect the beamy day;
In an ill hour they spread the fatal field;
And with portentous blaze, the neighbouring mountains gild.

On the left wing, bold Lentulus, their head,
The first and fourth selected legions led:
Luckless Domitius, vainly brave, in war,
Drew forth the right with unauspicious care.
In the mid battle daring Scipio fought,
With eight full legions from Cilicia brought.
Submissive here to Pompey's high command,
The warrior undistinguish'd took his stand,
Reserv'd to be the chief on Lybia's bursting sand.

Near the low marshes and Enipeus' flood.
The Pontic horse and Cappadocian stood.
While kings and tetrarchs proud, a purple train,
Liegemen, and vassals to the Latian reign,
Possess'd the rising grounds and drier plain.
Here troops of black Numidians scour the field,
And bold Iberians narrow bucklers wield;
Here twang the Syrian and the Cretan bow,
And the fierce Gauls provoke their well-known foe.

Go, Pompey, lead to death th' unnumber'd host
Let the whole human race at once be lost.
Let nations upon nations, heap the plain,
And tyranny want subjects for its reign.

Cæsar, as chance ordain'd, that morn decreed
The spoiling bands of foragers to lead;
When, with a sudden, but a glad surprize,
The foe descending struck his wondering eyes.
Eager, and burning for unbounded sway,
Long had he borne the tedious war's delay;
Long had he struggled with protracting time,
That sav'd his country, and deferr'd his crime:
At length he sees the wish'd-for day is come:
To end the strife for liberty and Rome:
Fate's dark mysterious threatenings to explain,
And ease th' impatience of ambition's pain.
But, when he saw the vast extent so high,
Unusual horror damp'd his impious joy;
For one cold moment sunk his heart suppress'd,
And doubt hung heavy on his anxious breast.
Though his past fortunes promise now success,
Yet Pompey, from his own, expects no less.
His changing thoughts revolve with various cheer
While these forbid to hope and those to fear.
At length his wonted confidence returns,
With his first fires his daring bosom burns;
As if secure of victory, he stands,
And fearless thus bespeaks the listening bands:

Ye warriors! who have made your Cæsar great
On whom the world, on whom my fortunes wait
To-day, the gods, whate'er you wish, afford,
And fate attends on the deciding sword.
By your firm aid alone your leader stands,
And trusts his all to your long-faithful hands.
This day shall make our promis'd glories good,
The hopes of Rubicon's distinguish'd flood.
For this blest morn we trusted long to fate,
Deferr'd our fame, and bade the triumph wait.
This day, my gallant friends, this happy day,
Shall the long labours of your arms repay;
Shall give you back to every joy of life,
To the lov'd offspring and the tender wife;
Shall find my veteran out a safe retreat,
And lodge his age within a peaceful seat.
The long dispute of guilt shall now be clear'd,
And conquest shall the juster cause reward.
Have you for me, with sword and fire laid waste
Your country's bleeding bosom as you pass?
Let the same swords as boldly strike to-day,
And the last wounds shall wipe the first away.
Whatever faction's partial notions are,
No hand is wholly innocent in war.
Yours is the cause to which my vows are join'd,
I seek to make you free, and masters of mankind
I have no hopes, no wishes of my own,
But well could hide me in a private gown:
At my expence of fame exalt your powers,
Let me be nothing, so the world be yours.
Nor think the task too bloody shall be found,
With easy glory shall our arms be crown'd:
You host come learn'd in academic rules,
A band of disputants from Grecian schools.
To these, luxuriant eastern crowds are join'd,
Of many a tongue, and many a different kind:
Their own first shouts shall fill each soul with fears
And their own trumpets shock their tender ears.
Unjustly this, a civil war, we call,
Where none but foes of Rome, barbarians, fall.

In them, my friends, and end it at a blow;
Lay these soft, lazy, worthless nations low.
Show Pompey, that subdu'd them, with what ease
Your valour gains such victories as these:
Show him, if justice still the palm confers,
One triumph was too much for all his wars.
From distant Tigris shall Armenians come,
To judge between the citizens of Rome?
Will fierce barbarian aliens waste their blood,
To make the cause of Latian Pompey good?
Believe me, no. To them we are all the same,
They hate alike the whole Aufonian name;
But most those haughty masters whom they know,
Who taught their servile vanquish'd necks to bow.
Meanwhile, as round my joyful eyes are roll'd,
None but my try'd companions I behold;
For years in Gaul we made our hard abode,
And many a march in partnership have trod,
S'their a soldier to your chief unknown?
A sword, to whom I trust not, like my own?
Could I not mark each javelin in the sky,
And say from whom the fatal weapons fly?
Ev'n now I view auspicious furies rise,
And rage redoubled flashes in your eyes.
With joy those omens of success I read,
And see the certain victory decreed;
I see the purple deluge float the plain,
Huge piles of carnage, nations of the slain:
Dead chiefs, with mangled monarchs, I survey,
And the pale senate crowns the glorious day.
But, oh! forgive my tedious lavish tongue,
Your eager virtue I withhold too long;
My soul exults with hopes too fierce to bear,
I feel good fortune and the gods draw near.
All we can ask, with full consent they yield,
And nothing bars us but this narrow field.
The battle o'er what boon can I deny?
The treasures of the world before you lie.
Oh, Thebais! what fars, what powers divine,
To thy distinguish'd land this great event assign?
Between extremes to-day our fortune lies,
The vilest punishment, and noblest prize.
Consider well the captive's lost estate,
Chains, racks, and crosses, for the vanquish'd wait.
My limbs are each allotted to its place,
And my pale head the rostrum's height shall grace:
But that's a thought unworthy Cæsar's care,
More for my friends than for myself I fear.
On my good sword securely I rely,
And, if I conquer not, am sure to die.
But, oh! for you my anxious soul foresees,
Pompey shall copy Sylla's curst decrees;
The Martian field shall blush with gore again,
And massacres once more the peaceful Septa stain.
Hear, oh! ye gods, who in Rome's strugglings
share,
Who leave your heaven, to make our earth your
care;
Hear, and let him the happy victor live,
Who shall with mercy use the power you give;
Whose rage for slaughter with the war shall cease,
And spare his vanquish'd enemies in peace.
Nor is Dyrhachium's fatal field forgot,
Nor what was then our brave companions' lot;
When, by advantage of the straiter ground,
Successful Pompey compass'd us around;
When quite disarm'd your useless valour stood,
Till his fell sword was satiated with blood.

But gentler hands, but nobler hearts you bear,
And, oh! remember 'tis your leader's prayer,
Whatever Roman flies before you, spare. }
But, while oppos'd and menacing they stand,
Let no regard withhold the lifted hand;
Let friendship, kindred, all remorse, give place,
And mangling wounds deform the reverend face:
Still let resistance be repaid with blood,
And hostile force by hostile force subdued;
Stranger, or friend, whatever be the name,
Your merit, still, to Cæsar, is the same.
Fill then the trenches, break the ramparts round,
And let our works lie level with the ground;
So shall no obstacles our march delay,
Nor stop one moment our victorious way.
Nor spare your camp; this night we mean to lie
In that from whence the vanquish'd foe shall fly.
Scarce had he spoke, when, sudden at the word,
They seize the lance, and draw the shining sword:
At once the turfy fences all lie waste, } swift;
And through the breach the crowding legions
Regardless all of order and array
They stand, and trust to fate alone the day.
Each had propos'd an empire to be won,
Had each once known a Pompey for his son;
Had Cæsar's soul inform'd each private breast,
A fiercer fury could not be express'd.
With sad prefaces, Pompey, now, beheld
His foes advancing o'er the neighbouring field:
He saw the gods had fix'd the day of fate,
And felt his heart hang heavy with new weight.
Dire is the omen when the valiant fear, } cheer.
Which yet he strove to hide with well-dissembled
High on his warrior-steed the chief o'eran
The wide array, and thus at length began:
The time to ease your groaning country's pain,
Which long your eager valour fought in vain;
The great deciding hour at length is come,
To end the strivings of distracted Rome:
For this one last effort exert your power,
Strike home to-day, and all your toils are o'er.
If the dear pledges of conjugal love, } move,
Your household gods, and Rome, your souls can Hither by fate they seem together brought,
And for that prize, to-day, the battle shall be fought.
Let none the favouring gods' assistance fear;
They always make the juster cause their care.
The flying dart to Cæsar shall they guide,
And point the sword at his devoted side:
Our injur'd laws shall be on him made good,
And liberty establish'd in his blood.
Could heaven, in violence of wrath, ordain
The world to groan beneath a tyrant's reign,
It had not spar'd your Pompey's head so long,
Nor lengthen'd out my age to see the wrong.
All we can wish for, to secure success,
With large advantage, here, our arms possess:
See, in the ranks of every common band,
Where Rome's illustrious names for soldiers stand.
Could the great dead revisit life again,
For us, once more, the Decii would be slain;
Thè Curii, and Camilli, might we boast,
Proud to be mingled in this noblest host.
If men, if multitudes, can make us strong,
Behold what tribes unnumber'd march along!
Where'er the Zodiac turns its radiant round,
Wherever earth, or people can be found;

To us the nations issue forth in swarms,
 And in Rome's cause all human nature arms.
 What then remains, but that our wings enclose,
 Within their ample folds our shrinking foes?
 Thousands, and thousands, useleſs may we spare;
 Yon handful will not half employ our war.
 Think, from the summit of the Roman wall,
 You hear our loud lamenting matrons call;
 Think with what tears, what lifted hands they sue,

And place their laſt, their only hopes in you.
 Imagine kneeling age before you ſpread,
 Each hoary reverend majestic head;
 Imagine, Rome herſelf your aid implor'd,
 To ſave her from a proud imperious lord.
 Think how the preſent age, how that to come,
 What multitudes, from you expect their doom:
 On your ſucceſs dependant all rely:
 Theſe to be born in freedom thoſe to die.
 Think (if there be a thought can move you more,
 A pledge more dear than thoſe I nam'd before)
 Think you behold (were ſuch a poſture meet)
 Ev'n me, your Pompey, proſtrate at your feet.
 Myſelf, my wife, my ſons, a ſuppliant band,
 From you our lives and liberties demand;
 Or conquer you, or I, to exile borne,
 My laſt diſhonourable years ſhall mourri,
 Your long reproach, and my proud father's ſcorn.

From bonds, from infamy, your general ſave,
 Nor let his hoary head deſcend to earth a ſlave.

Thus while he ſpoke, the faithful legions round,
 With indignation caught the mournful ſound;
 Faſtly, they think, his fears thoſe dangers view,
 But vow to die, ere Cæſar proves them true.
 What diſſering thoughts the various hoſts incite,
 And urge their deadly ardour for the fight!
 Thoſe bold ambition kindles into rage,
 And theſe their fears for liberty engage.
 How haſt this day the peopled earth deſace,
 Prevent mankind, and rob the growing race!
 Though all the years to come ſhould roll in peace,
 And future ages bring their whole increaſe;
 Though nature all her genial powers employ,
 All ſhall not yield what theſe curſt hands deſtroy.
 Soon ſhall the greatneſs of the Roman name,
 To unbelieving ears, be told by fame;
 Low ſhall the mighty Latian towers be laid,
 And ruins crown our Alban mountain's head;
 While yearly magiſtrates, in turns compell'd
 To lodge by night upon th' uncover'd field,
 Shall at old doting Numa's laws repine,
 Who could to ſuch bleak wilds his Latine rites aſſign.
 Ev'n now behold! where waſte Heſperia lies,
 Where empty cities ſhock our mournful eyes;
 Untouch'd by time, our infamy they ſtand,
 The marks of civil diſcord's murderous hand.
 How is the ſtock of human-kind brought low!
 Walls want inhabitants, and hands the plow.
 Our fathers fertile fields by ſlaves are till'd,
 And Rome with dregs of foreign lands is fill'd:
 Such were the heaps, the millions of the ſlain,
 As't were the purpoſe of Emathia's plain,
 That none for future miſchiefs ſhould remain.
 Well may our annals leſs miſfortunes yield,
 Mark Allia's flood, and Cannæ's fatal field;
 But let Pharfalia's day be ſtill forget,
 Be raz'd at once from every Roman thought.

'Twas there, that fortune, in her pride, diſplay'd
 The greatneſs her own mighty hands had made;
 Forth in array the powers of Rome ſhe drew,
 And ſet her ſubject nations all to view;
 As if ſhe meant to ſhow the haughty queen,
 Ev'n by her ruins, what her height had been.
 Oh countleſs loſs! that well might have ſupply'd
 The deſolation of all deaths befide.

Though famine with blue peſtilence conſpire,
 And dreadful earthquakes with deſtroying fire;
 Pharfalia's blood the gaping wounds had join'd,
 And built again the ruins of mankind.
 Immortal gods! with what reſtleſs force,
 Our growing empire ran its rapid courſe!
 Still every year with new ſucceſs was crown'd,
 And conquering chiefs enlarge the Latian bound:
 Till Rome ſtood miſtreſs of the world confeſs'd,
 From the gray orient to the ruddy weſt;
 From pole to pole, her wide dominions run
 Where'er the itars, or brighter Phœbus ſhone;
 As heaven and earth were made for her alone.

But now, behold, how fortune tears away
 The gift of ages in one fatal day!
 One day ſhakes off the vanquiſh'd Indians chain,
 And turns the wandering Dææ looſe again:
 No longer ſhall the victor conſul now
 Trace our Sarmatian cities with the plow:
 Exulting Parthia ſhall her ſlaughters boaſt,
 Nor feel the vengeance due to Craſſus gholt.
 While liberty long wearied by our crimes,
 Forſakes us for ſome better barbarous climes;
 Beyond the Rhine and Tanais ſhe flies,
 To ſnowy mountains and to frozen ſkies;
 While Rome, who long purſu'd that chiefſt good
 O'er fields of ſlaughter, and through ſeas of blood
 In ſlavery her abject ſtate ſhall mourn,
 Nor dare to hope the goddeſs will return.
 Why were we ever free? Oh why has heaven
 A ſhort-liv'd tranſitory bleſſing given?
 Of thee, firſt Brutus, juſtly we complain! [chain
 Why didſt thou break thy groaning country
 And end the proud laſcivious tyrant's reign?
 Why did thy patriot hand on Rome beſtow
 Laws, and her conſuls righteous rule to know?
 In ſervitude more happy had we been,
 Since Romulus firſt wall'd his refuge in,
 Ev'n ſince the twice fix vultures bade him build,
 To this curſt period of Pharfalia's field.
 Medes and Arabians of the ſlavish Eaſt
 Beneath eternal bondage may be bleſt;
 While, of a differing mold and nature, we,
 From fire to ſon accuſtom'd to be free,
 Feel indignation riſing in our blood,
 And blun to wear the chains that make them proud,

Can there be gods, who rule yon azure ſky?
 Can they behold Emathia from on high,
 And yet forbear to bid their lightnings fly?
 Is it the buſineſs of a thundering Jove,
 To rive the rocks, and blaſt the guiltleſs grove
 While Caſſius holds the balance in his ſtead,
 And wreaks due vengeance on the tyrant's head.
 The ſun ran back from Atræus' monſtrous feaſt,
 And his fair beams in murky clouds ſuppreſs'd;
 Why ſhines he now? why lends his golden light
 To theſe worſe pericides, this more accuſed fight
 But chance guides all; the gods their talk forego
 And providence no longer reigns below.

Yet are they just, and some revenge afford While their own heavens are humbled by the sword,
And the proud victors, like themselves, ador'd :
With rays adorn'd, with thunders arm'd they stand,
And incense, prayers, and sacrifice demand ;
While trembling, slavish, superstitious Rome,
Swears by a mortal wretch, that moulders in a tomb.

Now either host the middle plain had pass'd,
And front to front in threatening ranks were plac'd ;
Then every well-known feature flood to view,
Brothers their brothers, sons their fathers knew.
Then first they feel the curse of civil hate,
Mark where there mischiefs are assign'd by fate,
And see from whom themselves destruction wait. }
Stupid a while, and at a gaze, they stood,
While creeping horror froze the lazy blood :
Some small remains of piety withstand,
And stop the javelin in the lifted hand ;
Remorse for one short moment stepp'd between,
And motionless as statues all were seen.
And oh ! what savage fury could engage,
While lingering Cæsar yet suspends his rage ?
For him, ye gods ! for Crastinus, whose spear }
With impious eagerness began the war,
Some more than common punishment prepare ;
Beyond the grave long lasting plagues ordain,
Surviving sense, and never ceasing pain.
Straight, at the fatal signal, all around
A thousand sifes, a thousand clarions, found ;
Beyond where clouds, or glancing lightnings fly,
The piercing clangors strike the vaulted sky.
The joining battles shout, and the loud peal
Bounds from the hill, and thunders down the vale ;
Old Pelion's caves the doubling roar return,
And Oeta's rocks and groaning Pindus mourn ;
From pole to pole the tumult spreads afar,
And the world trembles at the distant war.

Now flit the thrilling darts through liquid air,
And various vows from various masters bear :
Some seek the noblest Roman heart to wound,
And some to err upon the guiltless ground ;
While chance decrees the blood that shall be spilt,
And blindly scatters innocence and guilt.
But random shafts too scanty death afford,
A civil war is business for the sword :
Where face to face the parricides may meet,
Know whom they kill, and make the crime complete.

Firm in the front, with joining bucklers clos'd,
Stood the Pompeian infantry dispos'd ;
So crowded was the space, it scarce affords
The power to toss their pikes, or wield their swords.
Forward, thus thick embattled though they stand,
With headlong wrath rush furious Cæsar's band ;
In vain the lifted shield their rage retards,
Or plaited mail devoted bosoms guards ;
Through shields, through mail, the wounding weapons go,
And to the heart drive home each deadly blow ;
Oh rage ill match'd ! Oh much unequal war,
Which those wage proudly, and these tamely bear !
These, by cold, stupid piety disarm'd ; [warm'd.
Those by hot blood, and smoking slaughter
Nor in suspense uncertain fortune hung,
But yields, o'ermafter'd by a power too strong,
And borne by fate's impetuous stream along.

From Pompey's ample wings, at length the horse
Wide o'er the plain extending take their course ;
Wheeling around the hostile line they wind,
While lightly arm'd the shot succeed behind.
In various ways the various bands engage,
And hurl upon the foe the missile rage :
There fiery darts and rocky fragments fly,
And heating bullets whistle through the sky :
Of feather'd shafts, a cloud thick shading goes,
From Arab, Mede, and Ituræan bows :
But driven by random aim they seldom wound ;
At first they hide the heaven, then strew the
ground ;

While Roman hands unerring mischief send,
And certain deaths on every pile attend.
But Cæsar, timely careful to support
His wavering front against the first effort,
Had plac'd his bodies of reserve behind,
And the strong rear with chosen cohorts lin'd.
There, as the careless foe the fight pursue,
A sudden band and stable forth he drew ;
When soon, oh shame ! the loose barbarians yield,
Scattering their broken squadron's o'er the field,
And slow, too late, that slaves attempt in vain,
The sacred cause of freedom to maintain.
The fiery steeds impatient of a wound,
Hurl their neglected riders to the ground ;
Or on their friends with rage unprovok'd turn,
And trampling o'er the helpless foot are borne.
Hence foul confusion and dismay succeed,
The victors murder, and the vanquish'd bleed :
Their weary hands the tir'd destroyers ply,
Scarce can these kill, so fast as those can die.
Oh, that Emathia's ruthless guilty plain
Had been contented with this only stain ;
With these rude bones had strewn her verdure
o'er,

And dy'd her springs with none but Asian gore !
But if so keen her thirst for Roman blood,
Let none but Romans make the slaughter good ;
Let not a Mede nor Cappadocian fall,
No bold Iberian, or rebellious Gaul :
Let these alone survive for times to come,
And be the future citizens of Rome.
But fear on all alike her powers employ'd,
Did Cæsar's business, and like fate destroy'd.

Prevailing still the victors held their course,
Till Pompey's main reserve oppos'd their force ;
There, in his strength, the chief unshaken stood,
Repell'd the foe, and made the combat good ;
There in suspense th' uncertain battle hung,
And Cæsar's favouring goddess dotted long ;
There no proud monarchs led their vassals on,
Nor eastern bands in gorgeous purple shone ;
There the last force of laws and freedom lay,
And Roman patriots struggled for the day.
What parricides the guilty scene affords !
Sires, sons, and brothers, rush on mutual swords !
There every sacred bond of nature bleeds ;
There met the war's worst rage, and Cæsar's blackest deeds.

But, oh ! my muse, the mournful theme forbear,
And stay thy lamentable numbers here ;
Let not my verse to future times convey
What Rome committed on this dreadful day ;
In shades and silence hide her crimes from fame,
And spare thy miserable country's shame.

But Cæsar's rage shall with oblivion strive,
And for eternal infamy survive.
From rank to rank, unwearied, still he flies,
And with new fires their fainting wrath supplies.
His greedy eyes each sign of guilt explore,
And mark whose sword is deepest dy'd in gore,
Observe where pity and remorse prevail,
What arm strikes faintly, and what cheek turns pale.

Or while he rides the slaughter'd heaps around,
And views some foe expiring on the ground,
His cruel hands the gushing blood restrain,
And strive to keep the parting soul in pain.
As when Bellona drives the world to war,
Or Mars comes thundering in his Thracian car;
Rage horrible darts from his Gorgon shield,
And gloomy terror broods upon the field;
Hate, fell and fierce, the dreadful gods impart,
And urge the vengeful warrior's heaving heart;
The many shout, arms clash, the wounded cry,
And one promiscuous peal groans upwards to the Nor furious Cæsar, on Emathia's plains [sky.
Less terribly the mortal strife sustains:
Each hand unarm'd he fills with means of death,
And cooling wrath rekindles at his breath:
Now with his voice, his gesture now, he strives,
Now with his lance the lagging soldier drives:
The weak he strengthens, and confirms the strong,
And hurries war's impetuous stream along,
Strike home, he cries, and let your swords erase
Each well-known feature of the kindred face:
Nor waste your fury on the vulgar band;
See! where the hoary dotting senate stand;
There laws and right at once you may confound,
And liberty shall bleed at every wound.

The curs'd destroyer spoke: and, at the word,
The purple nobles sunk beneath the sword:
The dying patriots groan upon the ground,
Illustrious names, for love of laws renown'd.
The great Metelli and Torquati bleed,
Chiefs worthy, if the state had so decreed,
And Pompey were not there, mankind to lead.

Say thou! thy sinking country's only prop,
Glory of Rome, and liberty's last hope;
What helm, oh Brutus! could, amidst the crowd,
Thy sacred undistinguish'd visage shroud?
Where fought thy arm that day! But ah! forbear!
Nor rush unwary on the pointed spear;
Seek not to hasten on untimely fate,
But patient for thy own Emathia wait:
Nor hunt fierce Cæsar on this bloody plain,
To-day thy steel pursues his life in vain.
Somewhat is wanting to the tyrant yet,
To make the measure of his crimes complete;
As yet he has not every law defy'd,
Nor reach'd the utmost heights of daring pride.
Ere long thou shalt behold him Rome's proud lord,
And ripen'd by ambition for thy sword; [mand,
Then, thy griev'd country vengeance shall de-
And ask the victim at thy righteous hand.

Among huge heaps of the patricians slain,
And Latian chiefs who strew'd that purple plain,
Recording story has distinguish'd well,
How brave, unfortunate Domitius fell.
In every loss of Pompey still he shar'd,
And dy'd in liberty, the best reward;
Though vanquish'd oft by Cæsar ne'er enslav'd,
E'en to the last, the tyrant's power he brav'd:

Mark'd o'er with many a glorious streaming
wound,

In pleasure sunk the warrior to the ground;
No longer forc'd on vilest terms to live,
For chance to doom, and Cæsar to forgive.
Him, as he pass'd insulting o'er the field,
Roll'd in his blood, the victor proud beheld:
And can, he cry'd, the fierce Domitius fall,
For sake his Pompey, and expecting Gaul?
Must the war lose that still successful sword,
And my neglected province want a lord?
He spoke; when, lifting slow his closing eyes,
Fearless the dying Roman thus replies:
Since wickedness stands unrewarded yet,
Nor Cæsar's arms their wish'd success have met;
Free and rejoicing to the shades I go,
And leave my chief still equal to his foe;
And if my hopes divine thy doom aright,
Yet shalt thou bow thy vanquish'd head ere night.
Dire punishments the righteous gods decree,
For injur'd Rome, for Pompey, and for me;
In hell's dark realms thy tortures I shall know,
And hear thy ghost lamenting loud below.

He said; and soon the leaden sleep prevail'd,
And everlasting night his eyelids seal'd.

But, oh! what grief the ruin can deplore;
What verse can run the various laughter o'er!
For lesser woes our sorrows may we keep,
No tears suffice, a dying world to weep.
In differing groups ten thousand deaths arise,
And horrors manifold the soul surprize.
Here the whole man is open'd at a wound,
And gushing bowels pour upon the ground:
Another through the gaping jaws is gor'd,
And in his utmost throat receives the sword:
At once, a single blow a third extends;
The fourth a living trunk dismember'd stands.
Some in their breasts erect the javelin bear,
Some cling to earth with the transfixing spear.
Here, like a fountain, springs a purple flood,
Spouts on the foe, and stains his arms with blood.
There horrid brethren on their brethren prey;
One starts, and hurls a well-known head away.
While some detested son, with impious ire,
Lops by the shoulders close his hoary fire:
E'en his rude fellows damn the cursed deed,
And bastard-born the murderer aread.

No private house its loss lamented then,
But count the slain by nations, not by men.
Here Grecian streams, and Asiatic run,
And Roman torrents drive the deluge on.
More than the world at once was given away,
And late posterity was lost that day:
A race of future slaves receiv'd their doom,
And children yet unborn were overcome.
How shall our miserable sons complain,
That they are born beneath a tyrant's reign?
Did our base hands, with justice shall they say,
The sacred cause of liberty betray?
Why have our fathers given us up a prey?
Their age, to ours, the curse of bondage leaves;
Themselves were cowards, and begot us slaves.

'Tis just; and fortune, that impos'd a lord,
One struggle for their freedom might afford;
Might leave their hands their proper cause to fight,
And let them keep, or lose themselves, their right.
But Pompey, now, the fate of Rome deserv'd,
And saw the changing gods forsake her side.

Hard to believe, though from a rising ground
 He view'd the universal ruin round,
 In crimson streams he saw destruction run,
 And in the fall of thousands felt his own.
 Nor with'd he, like most wretches in despair,
 The world one common misery might share :
 But with a generous, great, exalted mind,
 Besought the gods to pity poor mankind,
 To let him die, and leave the rest behind :
 This hope came smiling to his anxious breast,
 For this his earnest vows were thus address'd :
 Spare man, ye gods ! oh, let the nations live !
 Let me be wretched, but let Rome survive.
 Or if this head suffices not alone,
 My wife, my sons, your anger shall atone :
 If blood the yet uniated war demand,
 Behold my pledges left in fortune's hand !
 Ye cruel powers, who urge me with your hate,
 At length behold me crush'd beneath the weight :
 Give then your long pursuing vengeance o'er,
 And spare the world since I can lose no more.

So saying, the tumultuous field he cross'd,
 And warn'd from battle his despairing host.
 Gladly the pains of death he had explor'd,
 And fall'n undaunted on his pointed sword :
 Had he not fear'd th' example might succeed,
 And faithful nations by his side would bleed,
 Or did his swelling soul disdain to die,
 While his intuiting father stood for nigh ?
 Fly where he will, the gods shall still pursue,
 Nor his pale head shall 'scape the victor's view.
 Or else, perhaps, and fate the thought approv'd,
 For her dear sake he fled, whom best he lov'd :
 Malicious fortune to his wish agreed,
 And gave him in Cornelia's sight to bleed.
 Borne by his winged steed at length away,
 He quits the purple plain and yields the day.
 Fearless of danger, still secure and great,
 His daring soul supports his lost estate ;
 Nor groans his breast, nor swell his eyes with tears,

But still the same majestic form he wears.
 An awful grief sat decent in his face,
 Such as became his loss, and Rome's disgrace :
 His mind, unbroken, keeps her constant frame,
 In greatness and misfortune still the same ;
 While fortune, who his triumphs once beheld,
 Unchanging sees him leave Pharsalia's field.
 Now, disentangled from unwieldy power,
 O Pompey ! run thy former honours o'er :
 At leisure now review the glorious scene,
 And call to mind how mighty thou hast been.
 From anxious toils of empire turn thy care,
 And from thy thoughts exclude the murd'rous
 war :

Let the just gods bear witness on thy side,
 Thy cause no more shall by the sword be try'd.
 Whether sad Afric shall her loss bemoan,
 Or Munda's plains beneath their burden groan,
 The guilty bloodshed shall be all their own.
 No more the much-lov'd Pompey's name shall charm

The peaceful world, with one consent, to arm ;
 Nor for thy sake, nor aw'd by thy command,
 But for themselves, the fighting ignate stand :
 The war but one distinction shall afford,
 And liberty, or Cæsar, be the word.

Nor, oh ! do thou thy vanquish'd lot deplore,
 But fly with pleasure from those seas of gore :
 Look back upon the horror, guiltless thou,
 And pity Cæsar, for whose sake they flow.
 With what a heart, what triumph shall he come,
 A victor, red with Roman blood, to Rome ?
 Though misery thy banishment attends,
 Though thou shalt die, by thy false Pharian
 friends ;

Yet trust securely to the choice of heaven,
 And know thy loss was for a blessing giv'n :
 Though flight may seem the warrior's shame and curse ;

To conquer, in a cause like this, is worse.
 And, oh ! let every mark of grief be spar'd.
 May no tear fall, no groan, no sigh be heard ;
 Still let mankind their Pompey's fate adore,
 And reverence thy fall, ev'n as thy height of power,
 Meanwhile survey th' attending world around.
 Meanwhile survey th' attending world around.
 Cities by thee possess'd, and monarchs crown'd :
 On Afric, or on Asia, cast thy eye,
 And mark the land where thou shalt choose to die.

Larissa first the constant chief beheld,
 Still great, though flying from the fatal field :
 With loud acclaim her crowds his coming greet,
 And, sighing, pour their presents at his feet.
 She crowns her altars, and proclaims a feast ;
 Would put on joy to cheer her noble guest ;
 But weeps, and begs to share his woes at least.
 So was he lov'd ev'n in his lost estate,
 Such faith, such friendship, on his ruins wait ;
 With ease Pharsalia's loss might be supply'd,
 While eager nations hasten to his side ;
 As if misfortune meant to bless him more,
 Than all his long prosperity before.
 In vain, he cries, you bring the vanquish'd aid ;
 Henceforth to Cæsar be your homage paid,
 Cæsar, who triumphs o'er your heaps of dead.
 With that, his courser urging on to flight,
 He vanish'd from the mournful city's sight.

With cries, and loud laments, they fill the air,
 And curse the cruel gods, in fierceness of despair,
 Now in huge lakes Hesperian crimson stood,
 And Cæsar's self grew fatiated with blood.
 The great patricians fall'n, his pity spar'd
 The worthless, unresisting, vulgar herd.

Then, while his glowing fortune yet was warm,
 And scattering terror spread the wild alarm,
 Straight to the hostile camp his way he bent,
 C. remi to seize the hasty fiercer tent,
 The leisure of a night, and thinking to prevent.
 Nor reck'd he much the weary soldiers toil
 But led them prone and greedy to the spoil,
 Behold, he cries, our victory complete,
 The glorious recompence attends you yet :
 Much have you done to-day, for Cæsar's sake ;
 'Tis mine to show the prey, 'tis yours to take.
 'Tis yours, whate'er the vanquish'd foe has left ;
 'Tis what your valour gain'd, and not my gift.
 Treasures immense, yon wealthy tents unfold,
 The gems of Asia, and Hesperian gold ;
 For you the once-great Pompey's store attends,
 With regal spoils of his barbarian friends :
 Haste then, prevent the foe, and seize that good,
 For which you paid so well with Roman blood.
 He said ; and with the rage of rapine stung,
 The multitude tumultuous rush along,

On swords and spears, on fires and sons they tread,
And all remorseless spurn the gory dead.

What trench can intercept, what fort withstand
The brutal soldier's rude rapacious hand;
When eager to his crime's reward he flies,
And, bath'd in blood, demands the horrid prize?

There wealth collected from the world around,
The destin'd recompence of war they found.

But, oh! not golden Arimaspus' store,
Nor all the Tagus or rich Iber pour,
Can fill the greedy victors griping hands:
Rome, and the capitol, their pride demands;
All other spoils they scorn, as worthless prey,
And count their wicked labours robb'd of pay.
Here, in patrician tents, plebeians rest,
And regal couches are by ruffians press'd:
There impious parricides the bed invade,
And sleep where late their slaughter'd fires were laid.

Meanwhile the battle stands in dreams renew'd,
And Stygian horrors o'er their slumbers brood.
Astonishment and dread their souls infect,
And guilt sits painful on each heaving breast.

Arms, blood, and death, work in the labouring brain,
They sigh, they start, they strive, and fight it o'er
again.

Ascending fiends infect the air around,
And hell breathes baleful through the groaning
ground:

Hence dire affright distracts the warriors souls,
Vengeance divine their daring hearts controuls,
Snakes hiss, and livid flame tormenting rolls,
Each, as his hands in guilt have been imbrued,
By some pale spectre flies all night pursued.
In various forms the ghosts unnumber'd groan,
The brother, friend, the father, and the son:
To every wretch his proper phantom fell,
While Cæsar sleeps the general care of hell.
Such were his pangs as mad Orestes felt,
Ere yet the Scythian altar purg'd his guilt.
Such horrors Pentheus, such Agave knew;
He when his rage first came, and she when her's withdrew.

Present and future swords his bosom bears,
And feels the blow that Brutus now desers.
Vengeance, in all her pomp of pain, attends:
To wheels the binds him, and with vultures
rends,
With rack of conscience, and with whips of fiends.

But soon the visionary horrors pass,
And his first rage with day resumes its place:
Again his eyes rejoice to view the slain,
And run unweary'd o'er the dreadful plain.
He bids his train prepare his impious board,
And feasts amidst the heaps of death abhorr'd.
There each pale face at leisure he may know,
And still behold the purple current flow.
He views the woeful wide horizon round,
Then joys that earth is no where to be found,
And owns, those gods he serves, his utmost wish have crown'd:

Still greedy to possess the curs'd delight,
To glut his soul, and gratify his sight,
The last funereal honours he denies,
And poisons with the stench Emathia's flies.

Not thus the sworn inveterate foe of Rome,
Refus'd the vanquish'd consul's bones a tomb:
His pious the country round beheld,
And bright with fires shone Cannæ's fatal field.
But Cæsar's rage from fiercer motives rose;
These were his countrymen, his worst of foes.

But, oh! relent, forget thy hatred past,
And give the wandering shades to rest at last.
Nor seek we single honours for the dead,
At once let nations on the pile be laid:
To feed the flame, let heapy forests rise,
Far be it seen to fret the ruddy skies,
And grieve despairing Pompey where he flies.
Know too, proud conqueror, thy wrath in-
vain

Strews with unbury'd carcases the plain.
What is it to thy malice, if they burn,
Rot in the field, or moulder in the urn?
The forms of matter all dissolving die,
And lost in nature's blending bloom lie.
Though now thy cruelty denies a grave,
These and the world one common lot shall have;
One last appointed flame, by fate's decree,
Shall waste yon azure heavens, this earth, and sea;
Shall knead the dead up in one mingled mass,
Where stars and they shall undistinguish'd pass.
And though thou scorn their fellowship, yet
know,

High as thy own can soar these souls shall go;
Or find, perhaps, a better place below.
Death is beyond thy godde's fortune's power,
And parent earth receives whate'er the bore.
Nor will we mourn those Romans fate, who lie
Beneath the glorious covering of the sky;
That starry arch for ever round them turns,
A nobler shelter far than tombs or urns.
But wherefore parts the loathing victor hence?
Does slaughter strike too strongly on thy sense?
Yet stay, yet breathe the thick infectious stream,
Yet quaff with joy the blood-polluted steam,
But see, they fly! the daring warriors yield!
And the dead heaps drive Cæsar from the field!

Now to the prey, gaunt wolves, a howling
train,
Speed hungry from the far Bistonian plain;
From Pholoe the tawny lion comes,
And growling bears forsake their darksome homes:
With these, lean dogs in herds obscene repair,
And every kind that snuffs the tainted air.
For food the cranes their wonted flight delay,
That erst to warmer Nile had wing'd their way:
With them the feather'd race convene from far,
Who gather to the prey, and wait on war.
Ne'er were such flocks of vultures seen to fly,
And hide with spreading plumes the crowded sky:
Gorging on limbs in every tree they sat,
And dropp'd raw morsels down, and gory fat:
Oft their tir'd talons, loosening as they fled,
Rain'd horrid ossals on the victor's head.
But while the slain supply'd too full a feast,
The plenty bred satiety at last;
The ravenous feeders riot at their ease,
And single out what dainties best may please.
Part borne away, the rest neglected lie,
For noon-day suns, and parching winds, to dry;
Till length of time shall wear them quite away,
And mix them with Emathia's common clay.

Oh fatal Theſſaly! Oh land abhorr'd!
 How have thy fields the hate of heaven incurr'd;
 What thus the gods to thee deſtruction doom,
 And load thee with the curſe of falling Rome!
 Till to new crimes, new horrors, doſt thou haſte,
 When yet thy former miſchiefs ſcarce were paſt.
 What rolling years, what ages, can repay
 The multitudes thy wars have ſwept away!
 How high tombs and urns their numerous ſtore
 ſhould ſpread,
 And long antiquity yield all her dead;
 Hy guilty plains more ſlaughter'd Romans hold,
 Than all thoſe tombs, and all thoſe urns, inſold.
 Where bloody ſpots ſhall ſtain thy graſſy green,
 And crimſon drops on bladed corn be ſeen:
 Each plowſhare ſome dead patriot ſhall moleſt,
 And ſturb his bones, and rob his gholt of reſt.

Oh! had the guilt of war been all thy own,
 Were civil rage confin'd to thee alone;
 No mariner his labouring bark ſhould moor,
 In hopes of ſafety, on thy dreadful ſhore;
 No ſwain thy ſpectre-haunted plain ſhould know, Nor turn'd thy blood-ſtain'd fallow with his
 plough:
 No ſhepherd e'er ſhould drive his flock to feed,
 Where Romans ſlain enrich the verdant mead:
 All deſolate ſhould lie the land and waſte,
 As in fome ſcorch'd or frozen region plac'd.
 But the great gods forbid our partial hate
 On Theſſaly's diſtinguiſh'd land to wait;
 New blood, and other ſlaughters, they decree,
 And others ſhall be guilty too, like thee.
 Munda and Mutina ſhall boaſt their ſlain,
 Pachynus' waters ſhare the purple ſtain,
 And Actium juſtify Pharſalia's plain. }

B O O K VIII.

THE ARGUMENT.

FROM Pharſalia, Pompey flies, firſt to Lariffa, and after to the ſea-ſhore: where he embarks upon a ſmall veſſel for Leſbos. There, after a melancholy meeting with Cornelia, and his reſuſal of the Mityleneſians invitations, he embarks with his wife for the coaſt of Aſia. In the way thither he is joined by his ſon Sextus, and ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, who had fled likewise from the late battle; and among the reſt by Deiotarus, king of Gallo-Græcia. To him he recommends the ſoliciting of ſupplies from the king of Parthia, and the reſt of his allies in Aſia. After coaſting Cilicia for ſome time, he comes at length to a little town called Syedra or Syedra, where great part of the ſenate meet him. With theſe, he deliberates upon the preſent circumſtances of the commonwealth, and propoſes either Mauritania, Ægypt, or Parthia, as the proper places where he may hope to be received, and from whoſe kings he may expect aſſiſtance. In his own opinion he inclines to the Parthians; but this Lentulus, in a long oration, oppoſes very warmly; and, in conſideration of young Ptolemy's perſonal obligations to Pompey, prefers Ægypt. This advice is generally approved and followed, and Pompey ſets ſail accordingly for Ægypt. Upon his arrival upon that coaſt, the king calls a council, where, at the inſtigating of Pothinus, a villanous miniſter, it is reſolved to take his life; and the execution of this order is committed to the care of Achilles, formerly the king's governor, and then general of the army. He, with Septimius, a renegado Roman ſoldier, who had formerly ſerved under Pompey, upon ſeveral frivolous pretences, perſuades him to quit his ſhip, and come into their boat; where, as they make towards the ſhore, he treacherouſly murders him, in the ſight of his wife, his ſon, and the reſt of his fleet. His head is cut off, and his body thrown into the ſea. The head is fixed upon a ſpear, and carried to Ptolemy; who, after he had ſeen it, commands it to be embalmed. In the ſucceeding night, one Cordus, who had been a follower of Pompey, finds the trunk floating near the ſhore, brings it to land with ſome difficulty: and, with a few planks that remained from a ſhip-wrecked veſſel, burns it. The melancholy deſcription of this mean funeral, with the poet's inveſtive againſt the gods, and fortune, for their unworthy treatment of ſo great a man, concludes this book.

Now through the vale, by great Alcides made,
 And the ſweet maze of Tempe's pleaſing ſhade,
 Heerleſs, the flying chief renew'd his ſpeed,
 And urg'd, with gory ſpurs, his fainting ſteed.
 All'n from the former greatneſs of his mind,
 He turns where doubtful paths obſcurely wind.
 He fellows of his flight increaſe his dread,
 While hard behind the trampling horſemen tread:
 He ſtarts at every ruſtling of the trees,
 And fears the whiſpers of each murmuring breeze.
 He feels not yet, alas! his loſt eſtate;
 And, though he flies, believes himſelf ſtill great:

Imagines millions for his life are bid,
 And rates his own, as he would Cæſar's head.
 Where'er his fear explores untrodden ways,
 His well-known viſage ſtill his flight betrays.
 Many he meets unknowing of his chance,
 Whoſe gathering forces to his aid advance.
 With gaze aſtoniſh'd, theſe their chief behold,
 And ſcarce believe what by himſelf is told.
 In vain, to covert, from the world he flies,
 Fortune ſtill grieves him with purſuing eyes:
 Still aggravates, ſtill urges his diſgrace,
 And galls him with the thoughts of what he was.

His youthful triumph fall'y now returns,
His Pontic and piratic wars he mourns,
While stung with secret shame and anxious care
he burns.

Thus age to sorrows oft the great betrays.
When loss of empire comes with length of days.
Life and enjoyment still one end shall have,
Left early misery prevent the grave.

The good, that lasts not, was in vain bestow'd,
And ease once past becomes the present load:
Then let the wise, in fortune's kindest hour,
Still keep one safe retreat within his power;
Let death be near, to guard him from surprize,
And free him, when the sickle goddess flies.

Now to those shores the hapless Pompey came,
Where hoary Peneus rolls his ancient stream:
Red with Emathian slaughter ran his flood,
And dy'd the ocean deep in Roman blood.
There a poor bark, whose keel perhaps might glide

Safe down some river's smooth descending tide,
Receiv'd the mighty master of the main,
Whose spreading navies hide the liquid plain.
In this he braves the winds and stormy sea,
And to the Lesbian isle directs his way.
There the kind partner of his every care,
His faithful, lov'd Cornelia, languish'd there:
At that sad distance more unhappy far,
Thau in the midst of danger, death, and war.
There on her heart, ev'n all the live-long day,
Foreboding thought a weary burden lay:
Sad visions haunt her slumbers with affright,
And Theffaly returns with every night.
Soon as the ruddy morning paints the skies,
Swift to the shore the pensive mourner flies;
There, lonely sitting on the cliff's bleak brow,
Her sight she fixes on the seas below;
Attentive marks the wide horizon's bound,
And kens each sail that rises in the round; [near,
Thick beats her heart, as every prow draws
And dreads the fortunes of her lord to hear.

At length, behold! the fatal bark is come!
See! the swoln canvas labouring with her
doom.

Preventing fame, misfortune lends him wings,
And Pompey's self his own sad story brings.
Now bid thy eyes, thou lost Cornelia, flow,
And change thy fears to certain sorrows, now.
Swift glides the woeful vessel on to land;
Forth flies the headlong matron to the strand.
There soon she found what worst the gods could
do,

There soon her dear much-alter'd lord she }
Though fearful all and ghastly was his hue. }
Rude, o'er his face, his hoary locks were grown,
And dust was cast upon his Roman gown.
She saw, and, fainting, sunk in sudden night;
Grief stopp'd her breath, and shut out loathsome
light;

The loosening nerves no more their force exert,
And motion ceas'd within the freezing heart;
Death kindly seem'd her wishes to obey,
And, stretch'd upon the beach, a corse the lay.

But now the mariners the vessel moor,
And Pompey, landing, views the lonely shore.
The faithful maids their loud lamentings ceas'd,
And reverently their ruder grief suppress'd.

Straight, while with duteous care they kneel a-
round,

And raise their wretched mistress from the ground,
Her lord infolds her with a strict embrace,
And joins his cheek close to her lifeless face:
At the known touch, her failing sense returns,
And vital warmth in kindling blushes burns.
At length, from virtue thus he seeks relief,
And kindly chides her violence of grief:

Canst thou then sink, thou daughter of the great,

Sprung from the noblest guardians of our state;
Canst thou thus yield to the first shock of fate?

Whatever deathless monuments of praise
Thy sex can merit, 'tis in thee to raise.
On man alone life's ruder trials wait,
The fields of battle, and the cares of state;
While the wife's virtue then is only try'd,
When faithless fortune quits her husband's side.
Arm then thy soul, the glorious task to prove,
And learn, thy miserable lord to love.

Behold me of my power and pomp bereft,
By all my kings, and by Rome's fathers left:
Oh make that loss thy glory; and be thou
The only follower of Pompey now.

This grief becomes thee not, while I survive;
War wounds not thee, since I am still alive:
These tears a dying husband should deplore,
And only fall when Pompey is no more.

'Tis true, my former greatness all is lost;
Who weep for that, no love for me can boast,
But mourn the loss of what they valued most.

Mov'd at her lord's reproof, the matron rose;
Yet, still complaining, thus avow'd her woes:

Ah! wherefore was I not much rather led,
A fatal bride, to Cæsar's hated bed?
To thee unlucky, and a curse, I came,
Unblest by yellow Hymen's holy flame:
My bleeding Crassus, and his fire, stood by,
And fell Erynnis shook her torch on high.
My fate on thee the Parthian vengeance draws,
And urges heaven to hate the juster cause.

Ah, my once greatest lord! ah, cruel hour!
Is thy victorious head in fortune's power?
Since miseries my baneful love pursue,
Why did I wed thee, only to undo?
But see, to death my willing neck I bow;
Atone the angry gods by one kind blow.
Long since, for thee, my life I would have given;
Yet, let me, yet prevent the wrath of heaven.

Kill me, and scatter me upon the sea,
So shall propitious tides thy fleets convey, }
Thy kings be faithful, and the world obey. }
And thou, where'er thy lullen phantom flies,
Oh, Julia! let thy rival's blood suffice;
Let me the rage of jealous vengeance bear,
But him, thy lord, thy once-lov'd Pompey spare.

She said, and sunk within his arms again;
In streams of sorrow melt the mournful train:
Ev'n his, the warrior's eyes, were forc'd to yield,
That saw, without a tear, Pharfalia's field.

Now to the strand the Mitylenians press'd,
And humbly thus bespoke their noble guest:

If, to succeeding times, our isle shall boast
The pledgè of Pompey left upon her coast,
Disdain not, if thy presence now we claim,
And vain would consecrate our walls to fame,

Take thou this place in future story great,
 Where pious Romans may direct their feet,
 Or view with adoration thy retreat.
 His may we plead, in favour of the town;
 That, while mankind the prosperous victor own,
 Ready, Cæsar's foes avow'd, are we,
 Or add new guilt, by duty paid to thee.
 Some safety too our ambient seas secure:
 Cæsar wants ships, and we defy his power.
 Ere may Rome's scatter'd fathers well unite,
 And arm against a second happier fight.
 O Lesbian youth with ready courage stands,
 Or man thy navies, or recruit thy bands.
 Or gold, whate'er to sacred use is lent,
 Ake it, and the rapacious foe prevent.
 His only mark of friendship we entreat,
 Seek not to shun us in thy low estate;
 Let our Lesbian, in thy ruin, prove,
 As in thy greatness, worthy of thy love.
 Much was the leader mov'd, and joy'd to find
 A path had not quite abandon'd human-kind.
 O me (he cry'd) for ever were you dear;
 Witness the pledge committed to your care:
 Here in security I plac'd my home,
 My household gods, my heart, my wife, my
 Rome.

Know what ransom might your pardon buy,
 And yet I trust you, yet to you I fly.
 Ah, too long my woes you singly bear;
 Leave you, not for lands which I prefer,
 Or that the world the common load may share.
 Espos! for ever sacred be thy name;
 Lay late posterity thy truth proclaim!
 Whether thy fair example spread around,
 Or whether, singly, faithful thou art found:
 Or 'tis resolv'd, 'tis fix'd within my mind,
 Or try the doubtful world, and prove mankind.
 Oh grant, good heaven! if there be one alone,
 No gracious power so lost a cause to own,
 Grant, like the Lesbians, I my friends may find;
 Each who, though Cæsar threaten, dare be kind:
 Who, with the same just hospitable heart,
 Lay leave me free to enter, or depart.
 He ceas'd; and to the ship his partner bore,
 While loud complainings fill the sounding shore.
 Seem'd as if the nation with her pass'd,
 And banishment had laid their island waste.
 Their second sorrows they to Pompey give,
 Or her, as for their citizen, they grieve.
 I'ven though glad victory had call'd her thence,
 And her lord's bidding been the just pretence;
 Her Lesbian matrons had in tears been drown'd,
 Had brought her weeping to the watery bound.
 She was the lov'd, so winning was her grace,
 Which lowly sweetness dwelt upon her face;
 Such humility her life she led,
 I'ven while her lord was Rome's commanding
 head,
 As if his fortune were already fled.
 Half hid in seas descending Phœbus lay,
 And upwards half, half downwards shot the day;
 When wakeful cares revolve in Pompey's soul,
 And run the wide world o'er, from pole to pole.
 Each realm, each city, in his mind are weigh'd,
 Where he may fly, from whence depend on aid.
 Fear'd at length beneath the load of woes,
 And those sad scenes his future views disclose,

In conversation for relief he sought,
 And exercis'd on various themes his thought.
 Now sits he by the careful pilot's side,
 And asks what rules their watery journey
 guide;

What lights of heaven his arts attend to most,
 Bound by the Libyan or the Syrian coast.
 To him, intent upon the rolling skies,
 The heaven-instructed shipman thus replies:
 Of all your multitude of golden stars,
 Which the wide rounding sphere incessant bears,
 The cautious mariner relies on none,
 But keeps him to the constant pole alone.
 When o'er the yard the lesser Bear appears,
 And from the topmast gleam its paly fires,
 Then Bosphorus near-neighbouring we explore,
 And hear loud billows beat the Scythian shore:
 But when Calisto's shining son descends,
 And the low Cynosure towards ocean bends,
 For Syria straight we know the vessel bears,
 Where first Canopo's southern sign appears.
 If still upon the left those stars thou keep,
 And, passing Pharos, plow the foamy deep,
 Then right a-head thy luckless bark shall reach
 The Libyan shoals, and Syr's unfaithful beach.
 But say, for lo! on thee attends my hand,
 What course dost thou assign? what seas, what
 land?

Speak, and the helm shall turn at thy command.
 To him the chief, by doubts uncertain tost;
 Oh, fly the Latian and Thessalian coast:
 Those only lands avoid. For all beside Yield to the driving winds, and rolling tide;
 Let fortune, where the please, a port provide.
 Till Lesbos did my dearest pledge restore,
 That thought determin'd me to seek that shore:
 All ports, all regions, but those fatal two,
 Are equal to unhappy Pompey now.

Scarce had he spoke, when straight the master
 veer'd,
 And right for Chios, and for Asia steer'd.
 The working waves the course inverted feel,
 And dash and foam beneath the winding keel.
 With art like this, on rapid chariots borne,
 Around the column skilful racers turn:
 The nether wheels bear nicely on the goal,
 The farther, wide in distant circles roll.

Now day's bright beams the various earth disclose,
 And o'er the fading stars the sun arose;
 When Pompey gathering to his side, beheld
 The scatter'd relics of Pharsalia's field.
 First from the Lesbian isle his son drew near,
 And soon a troop of faithful chiefs appear.
 Nor purple princes, yet, disdain to wait
 On vanquish'd Pompey's humbler low estate.
 Proud monarchs, who in eastern kingdoms reign,
 Mix in the great illustrious exile's train.
 From these, apart, Deiotarus he draws,
 The long-approv'd companion of his cause:
 Thou best (he cries) of all my royal friends!
 Since with our loss Rome's power and empire ends;

What yet remains, but that we call from far
 The eastern nations to support the war?
 Euphrates has not own'd proud Cæsar's side,
 And Tigris rolls a yet unconquer'd tide.

Let it not grieve thee, then, to seek for aid
 From the wild Scythian, and remotest Mede.
 To Parthia's monarch my distress declare,
 And at his throne speak this my humble prayer.
 If faith in ancient leagues is to be found,
 Leagues by our altars and your Magi bound,
 Now string the Getic and Armenian bow,
 And in full quivers feather'd shafts bestow.
 If when o'er Caspian hills my troops I led,
 'Gainst Allans, in eternal warfare bred,
 I fought not once to make your Parthians yield,
 But left them free to range the Persian field.
 Beyond th' Assyrian bounds my eagles flew,
 And conquer'd realms, that Cyrus never knew;
 Ev'n to the utmost east I urg'd my way,
 And ere the Persian, saw the rising day:
 Yet while beneath my yoke the nations bend,
 I fought the Parthian only as my friend.
 Yet more; when Carræ blusth'd with Crassus' blood,
 And Latium her severest vengeance vow'd;
 When war with Parthia was the common cry,
 Who stopp'd the fury of that rage, but I?
 If this be true, through Zeugma take your way,
 Nor let Euphrates' stream the march delay;
 In gratitude to my assistance come:
 Fight Pompey's cause, and conquer willing Rome.
 He said; the monarch cheerfully obey'd,
 And straight aside his royal robes he laid;
 Then bid his slaves their humbler vestments
 bring:

And in that servile veil conceals the king.
 Thus majesty gives its proud trappings o'er,
 And humbly seeks for safety from the poor:
 The poor, who no disguises need, nor wear;
 Unblest with greatness, and unweav'd with fear.
 His princely friend now safe convey'd to land,
 The chief o'erpass'd the fam'd Ephesian strand,
 Icaria's rocks, with Colophon's smooth deep,
 And foamy clefts which rugged Samos keep.
 From Coan shores soft breathes the western wind,
 And Rhodes and Gndos soon are left behind.
 Then crossing o'er Telmessos' ample bay,
 Right to Pamphilia's coast he cuts his way.
 Suspicious of the land, he keeps the main,
 Till poor Phaelis, first, receives his wandering
 train.

There, free from fears, with ease he may com-
 Her citizens, scarce equal to his band.
 Nor lingering there, his swelling sails are spread,
 Till he discerns proud Taurus' rising head:
 A mighty mass it stands, while down his side
 Descending Dipas rolls his headlong tide.
 In a slight bark he runs securely o'er
 The pirates once-infested dreadful shore.
 Ah! when he set the watery empire free,
 And swept the fierce Cilician from the sea,
 Could the successful warrior have forethought
 'Twas for his future safety, then, he fought!
 At length the gathering fathers of the state,
 In full assembly, on their leader wait:
 Within Syedra's walls their senate meets,
 Whom, sighing, thus th' illustrious exile greets.
 My friends! who with me fought, who with me fled,

And now are to me in my country's stead;
 Though quite defenceless and unarm'd we stand,
 On this Cilician, naked, foreign strand;

Though every mark of fortune's wrath we bear,
 And seem to seek for counsel in despair;
 Preserve your souls undaunted, free, and great,
 And know I am not fall'n entirely, yet,
 Spite of the ruins of Emathia's plain,
 Yet can I rear my drooping head again.
 From Afric's dust abandon'd Marius rofe,
 To seize the Fæces, and insult his foes.
 My loss is lighter, less is my disgrace;
 Shall I despair to reach my former place?
 Still on the Grecian seas my navies ride,
 And many a valiant leader owns my side.
 All that Phœralia's luckless field could do,
 Was to disperse my forces, not subdue.
 Still safe beneath my former fame I stand,
 Dear to the world, and lov'd in every land.
 'Tis yours to counsel and determine, whom
 We shall apply to, in the cause of Rome;
 What faithful friend may best assistance bring;
 The Libyan, Parthian, or Ægyptian king,
 For me, what course my thoughts incline to take,

Here freely, and at large, I mean to speak.
 What most dislike me in the Pharian prince,
 Are his raw years, and yet unpractic'd sense:
 Virtue, in youth, no stable footing finds,
 And constancy is built on manly minds.
 Nor, with less danger, may our trust explore
 The faith uncertain of the crafty Moor!
 From Carthaginian blood he draws his race,
 Still mindful of the vanquish'd town's disgrace;
 From thence Numidian mischiefs he derives;
 And Hannibal in his false heart survives:
 With pride he saw submissive Varus bow,
 And joys to hear the Roman power lies low.
 To warlike Parthia therefore let us turn,
 Where stars unknown in distant azure burn;
 Where Caspian hills to part the world arise,
 And night and day succeed in other skies;
 Where rich Assyrian plains Euphrates laves,
 And seas discolour'd roll their ruddy waves.
 Ambition, there, delights in arms to reign,
 There rushing squadrons thunder o'er the plain:
 There young and old the bow promiscuous bend,
 And fatal shafts with aim unerring fend.
 They first the Macedonian phalanx broke,
 And hand to hand repell'd the Grecian stroke;
 They drove the Mede and Bactrian from the field,

And taught aspiring Babylon to yield;
 Fearless against the Roman pile they stood,
 And triumph'd in our vanquish'd Crassus' blood.
 Nor trust they to the points of piercing darts,
 But furnish death with new improving arts,
 In mortal juices dipt their arrows fly,
 And if they taste the blood, the wounded die.
 Too well their powers and favouring gods we
 know,

And wish our fate much rather would allow
 Some other aid against the common foe.
 With unapprecious succour shall they come,
 Nurs'd in the hate and rivalry of Rome.
 With these, the neighbouring nations round
 shall arm,

And the whole east rouse at the dire alarm.
 Should the barbarian race their aid deny,
 Yet would I choose in that strange land to die:

Here let our shipwreck'd poor remains be thrown,
 Our loss forgotten, and our names unknown :
 Securely there ill-fortune would I brave,
 For meanly sue to kings, whose crowns I gave :
 From Cæsar free, enjoy my latest hour,
 And scorn his anger's and his mercy's pow'r.
 Till, when my thoughts my former days restore,
 With joy, methinks, I run those regions o'er ;
 'Here, much the better parts of life, I prov'd, Ever'd by all, applauded, and belov'd ;
 Wide o'er Mæotis spread my happy name,
 And Tanais ran consfious of my fame ;
 My vanquish'd enemies my conquests mourn'd,
 And cover'd still with laurels, I return'd.
 Approve then, Rome, my present cares for thee ;
 'Hine is the gain, whate'er th' event shall be.
 What greater boon canst thou from heaven demand,

than in thy cause to arm the Parthian's hand ?
 Barbarians thus shall wage thy civil war,
 And those that hate thee in thy ruin share.
 When Cæsar and Phraates battle join,
 'hey must revenge, or Crassus' wrongs, or mine.

The leader ceas'd ; and straight a murmuring
 sound
 ran through the disapproving fathers round.
 With these, in high pre-eminence, there sat distinguish'd Lentulus, the consul late :
 Join with more generous indignation stung,
 Or nobler grief, beheld his country's wrong,
 Udden he rose, rever'd, and thus began,
 In words that well became the subject, and the
 man :

Can then Pharsalia's ruins thus controul
 'he former greatness of thy Roman soul ?
 Lust the whole world, our laws and country,
 yield

'o one unlucky day, one ill-fought field ?
 Hast thou no hopes of succour, no retreat,
 ut mean prostration at the Parthian's feet ?
 art thou grown weary of our earth and sky,
 hat thus thou seek'st a fugitive to fly ;
 few stars to view, new regions to explore,
 o learn new manners, and new gods adore ?
 Vilt thou before Chaldean altars bend
 'orship their fires, and on their kings depend ?
 Why didst thou draw the world to arms around ?
 Why cheat mankind with liberty's sweet sound ?
 Why on Emathia's plain fierce Cæsar brave,
 When thou canst yield thyself a tyrant's slave ?
 hall Parthia, who with terror shook from far,
 o hear thee nam'd, to head the Roman war,
 Tho saw thee lead proud monarchs in thy chain,
 rom wild Hyrcania and the Indian main ;
 hall she, th' very Parthia, see thee now,
 poor, dejected, humble suppliant bow ?
 hen haughtily with Rome her greatness mate,
 and scorn thy country, for thy groveling fate ?
 'hy tongue, in eastern languages untaught, hall want the words that should explain thy thought :

'ears, then, unmanly, must thy suit declare ;
 nd suppliant hands, uplifted, speak thy prayer.
 hall Parthia (shall it to our shame be known) evenge Rome's wrongs, ere Rome revenge her own ?

Vol. XII.

Our war no interfering kings demands,
 Nor shall be trusted to barbarian hands :
 Among ourselves our bonds we will deplore,
 And Rome shall serve the rebel son she bore.
 Why would'st thou bid our foes transgress their
 bound,

And teach their feet to tread Hesperian ground ?
 With ensigns, torn from Crassus, shall they come,
 And, with his ravish'd honours, threaten Rome ;
 His fate those blood-stain'd eagles shall recall,
 And hover dreadful o'er their native wall.
 Canst thou believe the monarch, who withheld
 His only forces from Emathia's field,
 Will bring his succours to the waining state,
 And bravely now defy the victor's hate ?
 No eastern courage forms a thought so great.
 In cold laborious climes the wintery north
 Brings her undaunted hardy warriors forth,
 In body and in mind untaught to yield,
 Stubborn of soul, and steady in the field ;
 While Asia's softer climate, form'd to please,
 Dissolves her sons in indolence and ease.
 Here silken robes invest unmanly limbs,
 And in long trains the flowing purple streams
 Where no rude hills Sarmatia's wilds restrain,
 Or rushing Tigris cuts the level plain,
 Swifter than winds along the champain borne,
 At liberty they fly, or fight, or turn,
 And, distant still, the vain pursuer scorn.
 Nor with like ease they force their warlike way,
 Where rough unequal grounds their speed delay.
 Whene'er the thicker shades of night arise,
 Unaim'd the shaft, and unavailing, flies.
 Nor are they form'd with contancy to meet
 Those toils, that make the panting soldier
 sweat :

To climb the heights, to stem the rapid flood,
 To make the dusty noon-day battle good,
 Horrid with wounds, and cruised o'er in blood.
 Nor war's machines they know, nor have the skill
 To shake the rampire, or the trench to fill :
 Each fence that can their winged shafts endure,
 Stands, like a fort impregnable, secure.
 Light are their skirmishes, their war is flight,
 And still to wheel their wavering troops delight.
 To faint their coward darts, is all their care,
 And then to trust them to the sitting air.
 Whene'er their bows have spent their feather'd
 store,

The mighty business of their war is o'er :
 No manly strokes they try, nor hand to hand
 With cleaving swords in sturdy combat stand.
 With swords the valiant still their foes invade ;
 These call in drugs and poison to their aid.
 Are these the powers to whom thou bidst us fly ?
 Is this the land in which thy bones would lie ?
 Shall these barbarian hands for thee provide
 The grave, to thy unhappy friend deny'd ?
 But be it so ! that death shall bring thee peace,
 That here thy sorrows and thy toils shall cease.
 Death is what man should wish. But, oh ! what fate

Shall on thy wife, thy sad survivor, wait !
 For her, where lust with lawless empire reigns,
 Somewhat more terrible than death remains.
 Have we not heard, with what abhorr'd desires
 The Parthian Venus feeds her guilty fires ?

How their wild monarch, like the bestial race,
Spreads the pollution of his loud embrace?
Unaw'd by reverence of connubial rites,
In multitudines, luxurious, he delights:
When gorg'd with feasting, and inflam'd with wine,

No joys can fate him, and no laws confine;
Forbidding Nature, then, commands in vain,
From sisters and from mothers to abstain.
The Greek and Roman with a trembling ear,
Th' unwilling crime of Oedipus may hear;
While Parthian kings like deeds, with glory, own,
And boast incestuous titles to the throne.
If crimes like these they can securely brave,
What laws, what power, shall thy Cornelia save?
Think, how the helpless matron may be led,
The thousandth harlot, to the royal bed.
Though when the tyrant clasps his noble slave,
And hears to whom her plighted hand she gave,
Her beauties oft in scorn he shall prefer,
And choose t' insult the Roman name in her.
These are the powers to whom thou would'st submit,

And Rome's revenge and Crassus' quite forget.
Thy cause, preferr'd to his, becomes thy shame,
And blots, in common, thine and Cæsar's name.
With how much greater glory might you join,
To drive the Daci, or to free the Rhine!
How well your conquering legions might you lead,
'Gainst the fierce Bactrian and the haughty Mede!
Level proud Babylon's aspiring domes,
And with their spoils enrich our slaughter'd leaders tombs?

No longer, Fortune! let our friendship last,
Our peace, ill-omen'd, with the barbarous East;
If civil strife with Cæsar's conquest end,
To Asia let his prosperous arms extend:
Eternal wars there let the victor wage,
And on proud Parthia pour the Roman rage.
There I, there all his victories may bless,
And Rome herself make vows for his success.
Whene'er thou pass the cold Araxes o'er,
An aged shade shall greet thee on the shore, Transfix'd with arrows, mournful, pale, and hoar.

And art thou (shall he cry, complaining) come
In peace and friendship, to these foes of Rome?
Thou! from whose hand we hop'd revenge in
vain,

Poor naked ghosts, a thin unbury'd train,
That sit, lamenting, o'er this dreary plain?
On every side new objects shall disclose
Some mournful monument of Roman woes;
On every wall fresh marks thou shalt descry,
Where pale Hesperian heads were fix'd on high:
Each river, as he rolls his purple tide,
Shall own his waves in Latian slaughter dy'd.
If sights like these thou canst with patience bear,
What are the horrors which thy soul would fear?
Ev'n Cæsar's self with joy may be beheld,
Enthron'd on slaughter in Emathia's field.
Say then, we grant, thy cautions were not vain,
Of Punic frauds and Juba's faithless reign;
Abounding Egypt shall receive thee yet,
And yield, unquestion'd, a secure retreat.
By nature strengthen'd with a dangerous strand,
Her Syrtes and untry'd channels guard the land.

Rich in the fatness of her plenteous soil,
She plants her only confidence in Nile.
Her monarch, bred beneath thy guardian cares,
His crown, the largess of thy bounty, wears.
Nor let unjust suspicious brand his truth;
Candour and innocence still dwell with youth.
Trit not a power accustom'd to be great,
And vers'd in wicked policies of state.
Old kings, long harden'd in the regal trade,
By interest and by craft alone are sway'd,
And violate with ease the leagues they made:
While new ones still make conscience of the trust
True to their friends, and to their subjects just.

He spoke; the listening fathers all were mov'd
And with concurring votes the thought approv'd
So much ev'n dying Liberty prevail'd,
When Pompey's suffrage, and his counsel fail'd.

And now Cilicia's coast the fleet forsake,
And o'er the watery plain for Cyprus make.
Cyprus to love's ambrosial goddess dear,
For ever grateful smoke the altars there:
Indulgent still she hears the Paphian vows,
And loves the favourite seas from whence she rose
So Fame reports, if we may credit Fame,
When her fond tales the birth of gods proclaim,
Unborn, and from eternity the same.

The craggy cliffs of Cyprus quickly part,
The chief runs southward o'er the ocean vast.
Nor views he, through the murky veil of night,
The Casian mountains far distinguish'd height,
The high-hung lantern, or the beamy light.
Haply at length the labouring canvas bore.
Full on the farthest bounds of Ægypt's shore,
Where near Pelusium parting Nile descends,
And in her utmost eastern channel ends.

'Twas now the time, when equal Jove on high
Had hung the golden balance of the sky:
But, ah! not long such just proportions last,
The righteous season soon was chang'd and pass'd
And Spring's encroachment, on the shorteni'd siade,

Was fully to the wintery nights repaid:
When to the chief from thore they made report
That, near high Cæsum, lay the Pharian court
This known, he thither turns his ready sail,
The light yet lasting with the favouring gale.
The fleet arriv'd, the news flies swiftly round,
And their new guests the troubled court confound
The time was short; howe'er the council met,
Vile ministers, a monstrous motley set.
Of these, the chief in honour, and the best,
Was old Achorus the Memphian priest:
In his and Osiris he believ'd,
And reverend tales from fire to son receiv'd:
Could mark the swell of Nile's increasing tide,
And many an Apis in his time had dy'd;
Yet was his age with gentlest manners fraught
Humbly he spoke, and modestly he taught.
With good intent the pious seer arose,
And told how much their state to Pompey owe
What large amends their monarch ought to make
Both for his own, and for his father's sake.
But fate had plac'd a subtler speaker there,
A tongue more fitted for a tyrant's ear,
Pothinus, deep in arts of mischief read,
Who thus, with false persuasion, blindly led
The easy king, to doom his guardian dead:

To strictest justice many ills belong,
 And honesty is often in the wrong :
 Chiefly when stubborn rules her zealots push,
 To favour those whom fortune means to crush.
 But thou, oh royal Ptolemy, be wife ;
 Change with the gods, and fly whom fortune flies.
 Not earth, from yon high heavens which we admire,

Not from the watery element the fire,
 Are sever'd by distinction half so wide,
 As interest and integrity divide.

The mighty power of kings no more prevails,
 When justice comes with her deciding scales,
 Freedom for all things, and a lawless sword,
 Alone support an arbitrary lord.

He that is cruel must be bold in ills,
 And find his safety from the blood he spills.
 For piety, and virtue's starving rules,
 To mean retirements let them lead their fools :
 There, may they still ingloriously be good ;
 None can be safe in courts, who blush at blood.
 Nor let this fugitive despise thy years,
 Or think a name, like his, can cause thy fears :
 Exert thyself, and let him feel thy power,
 And know, that we dare drive him from our
 shore.

But if thou wish to lay thy greatness down,
 To some more just succession yield thy crown ;
 Thy rival sister willingly shall reign,
 And save our Ægypt from a foreign chain.
 As now, at first, in neutral peace we lay,
 Nor would be Pompey's friends, nor Cæsar's prey.
 Vanquish'd, where'er his fortune has been try'd,
 And driv'n, with scorn, from all the world beside,
 By Cæsar chac'd, and left by his allies,
 To us a baffled vagabond he flies.
 The poor remaining senate loath his sight,
 And ruin'd monarchs curse his fatal flight ;
 While thousand phantoms from th' unbury'd
 flain,

Who feed the vultures of Emathia's plain,
 Disastrous still pursue him in the rear,
 And urge his soul with horror and despair.
 To us for refuge now he seeks to run,
 And would once more with Egypt be undone.
 Rouse then, oh Ptolemy ! repress the wrong ;
 He thinks we have enjoy'd our peace too long :
 And therefore kindly comes, that we may share
 The crimes of slaughter, and the woes of war.
 His friendship shewn to thee suspicions draws,
 And makes us seem too guilty of his cause :
 Thy crown bestow'd, the victor may impute ;
 The senate gave it, but at Pompey's suit.
 Nor, Pompey ! thou thyself shall think it hard,
 If from thy aid, by fate, we are debar'd.
 We follow where the gods, constraining, lead ;
 We strike at thine, but wish 'twere Cæsar's head.
 Our weakness this, this fate's compulsion call ;
 We only yield to him who conquers all.
 Then doubt not if thy blood we mean to spill ;
 Power awes us ; if we can, we must, and will.
 What hopes thy fond mistaken soul betray'd,
 To put thy trust in Ægypt's feeble aid ?
 Our slothful nation, long disus'd to toil,
 With pain suffice to till their slimy soil ;
 Our idle force due modesty shou'd teach,
 Nor dare to aim beyond its humble reach,

Shall we resist where Rome was forc'd to yield,
 And make us parties to Pharsalia's field ?
 We mix'd not in the fatal strife before :
 And shall we, when the world has given it o'er ?
 Now ! when we know th' avenging victor's
 power ?

Nor do we turn, unpitiful, from distress ;
 We fly not Pompey's woes, but seek success.
 The prudent on the prosperous still attends,
 And none but fools choose wretches for their friends.

He said ; the vile assembly all assent,
 And the boy-king his glad concurrence lent,
 Fond of the royalty his slaves bestow'd,
 And by new power of wickedness made proud.

Where Cæsium high o'erlooks the shoaly
 strand,
 A bark with armed ruffians straight is mann'd,
 And the task trusted to Achilles' hand.

Can then Ægyptian souls thus proudly dare :
 Is Rome, ye gods ! thus fall'n by civil war !
 Can you to Nile transfer the Roman guilt,
 And let such blood by cowards hands be spilt ?
 Some kindred murderer at least afford,
 And let him fall by Cæsar's worthy sword.
 And thou, inglorious, feeble, beardless boy !
 Dar'st thou thy hand in such a deed employ ?
 Does not thy trembling heart, with horror, dread
 Jove's thunder, grumbling o'er thy guilty head ?
 Had not his arms with triumphs oit been crown'd ;
 And ev'n the vanquish'd world his conquest
 own'd ;

Had not the reverend senate call'd him head,
 And Cæsar given fair Julia to his bed,
 He was a Roman still : a name should be
 For ever sacred to a king, like thee.
 Ah, fool ! thus blindly by thyself undone,
 Thou seek'st his ruin, who upheld thy throne :
 He only could thy feeble power maintain,
 Who gave thee first o'er Ægypt's realm to reign'd.

The seamen now advancing near to shore,
 Strike the wide sail, and ply the plunging oar ;
 When the false miscreants the navy meet,
 And with dissembled cheer the Roman greet.
 They feign their hospitable land address'd,
 With ready friendship, to receive her guest ;
 Excusing much an inconvenient shore,
 Where shoals lie thick, and meeting currents roar :
 From his tall ship, unequal to the place,
 They beg him to their lighter bark to pass.

Had not the gods, unchangeably, decreed
 Devoted Pompey in that hour to bleed,
 A thousand signs the danger near foretel,
 Seen by his sad presaging friends too well.
 Had their low fawning justly been design'd,
 If truth could lodge in an Ægyptian mind,
 Their king himself with all his fleet had come,
 To lead, in pomp, his benefactor home.
 But thus fate will'd ; and Pompey chose to bear
 A certain death before uncertain fear.

While now aboard the hostile boat he goes,
 To follow him the frantic matron vows,
 And claims her partnership in all his woes.
 But, oh ! forbear (he cries) my love, forbear ;
 Thou and my son remain in safety here.
 Let this old head the danger first explore,
 And prove the faith of yon suspected shore.

He spoke ; but she, unmov'd at his commands,
Thus loud exclaiming, stretch'd her eager hands :
Whither, inhuman ! whither art thou gone ?
Still must I weep our common griefs alone ?
Joy still, with thee, forsakes my boding heart ;
And fatal is the hour whene'er we part.
Why did thy vessel to my Lesbos turn ?
Why was I from the faithful island borne ?
Must I all lands, all shores, alike forbear,
And only on the seas thy sorrows share ?
Thus, to the winds, loud plain'd her fruitless
tongue,

While eager from the deck on high she hung ;
Trembling with wild astonishment and fear,
She dares not while her parting lord they bear,
Turn her eyes from him once, or fix them there. }
On him his anxious navy all are bent,
And wait, solicitous, the dire event.
No danger aim'd against his life they doubt ;
Care for his glory only fills their thought :
They wish he may not stain his name renown'd,
By mean submission to the boy he crown'd.
Just as he enter'd o'er the vessel's side,
Hail, general ! the curs'd Septimius cry'd,
A Roman once in generous warfare bred,
And oft in arms by mighty Pompey led ;
But now (what vile dishonour must it bring)
The Russian slave of an Egyptian king.
Fierce was he, horrible, inur'd to blood,
And ruthless as the savage of the wood.
Oh, fortune ! who but would have call'd thee
kind,

And thought thee mercifully now inclin'd,
When thy o'er-ruling providence withheld
This hand of mischief from Pharsalia's field ?
But, thus, thou scatter'st thy destroying swords,
And every land thy victims thus affords.
Shall Pompey at a tyrant's bidding bleed !
Can Roman hands be to the task decreed !
E'en Cæsar, and his gods, abhor the deed.
Say you ! who with the stain of murder brand
Immortal Brutus's avenging hand,
What monstrous title, yet to speech unknown,
To latest times shall mark Septimius down !

Now in the boat defenceless Pompey fate,
Surrounded and abandoned to his fate,
Nor long they hold him in their power, aboard,
Ere every villain drew his ruthless sword :
The chief perceiv'd their purpose soon, and
spread

His Roman gown, with patience, o'er his head :
And when the curs'd Achilles pierc'd his breast,
His rising indignation close repress'd.
No sighs, no groans, his dignity profan'd ;
No tears his still unfully'd glory stain'd :
Unmov'd and firm he fix'd him on his seat,
And dy'd, as when he liv'd and conquer'd, great.
Meanwhile, within his equal parting soul,
These latest pleasing thoughts revolving roll.
In this my strongest trial, and my last,
As in some theatre I here am plac'd :
The faith of Ægypt, and my fate, shall be
A theme for present times, and late posterity.
Much of my former life was crown'd with praise,
And honours waited on my early days :
Then, fearless, let me this dread period meet,
And force the world to own the scene complete

Nor grieve, my heart ! by such base hands to bleed ;

Whoever strikes the blow, 'tis Cæsar's deed.
What, though this mangled carcase shall be torn,
These limbs be toss'd about for public scorn ;
My long prosperity has found its end,
And death comes opportunely like a friend :
It comes, to set me free from fortune's power,
And gives, what the can rob me of no more.
My wife and son behold me now, 'tis true ;
Oh ! may no tears, no groans, my fate pursue !
My virtue rather let their praise approve,
Let them admire my death, and my remembrance
love.

Such constancy in that dread hour remain'd,
And, to the last, the struggling soul sustain'd.
Not so the matron's feebler powers repress'd
The wild impatience of her frantic breast :
With every stab her bleeding heart was torn,
With wounds much harder to be seen than borne.
'Tis I, 'tis I have murder'd him ! (she cries)
My love the sword and ruthless hand supplies.
'Twas I allur'd him to my fatal isle,
That cruel Cæsar first might reach the Nile ;
For Cæsar sure is there, no hand but his
Has right to such a parricide as this.
But whether Cæsar, or whoever thou art,
Thou hast mistook the way to Pompey's heart :
That sacred pledge in my sad bosom lies,
There plunge thy dagger, and he more than dies.
Me too, most worthy of thy fury know,
The partner of his arms, and sworn your foe.
Of all our Roman wives, I singly bore
The camp's fatigue, the sea's tempestuous roar :
No dangers, not the victor's wrath, I fear'd ;
What mighty monarchs durst not do, I dar'd.
These costly arms did their glad refuge yield,
And clasp'd him, flying from Pharsalia's field.
Ah, Pompey ! dost thou thus my faith reward ?
Shalt thou be doom'd to die, and I be spar'd ?
But fate shall many means of death afford,
Nor want th' assistance of a tyrant's sword.
And you, my friends, in pity, let me leap
Hence headlong, down amidst the tumbling deep
Or to my neck the strangling cordage tie ;
If there be any friend of Pompey nigh,
Transfix me, stab me, do but let me die.
My lord ! my husband !—Yet thou art not dead
And tee ! Cornelia is a captive led :
From thee their cruel hands thy wife detain,
Reserv'd to wear th' insulting victor's chain.
She spoke ; and stiffening sunk in cold despair ;
Her weeping maids the lifeless burden bear ;
While the pale mariners the bark unmoor,
Spread every sail, and fly the faithless shore.
Nor agonies, nor livid death, disgrace
The sacred features of the hero's face ;
In the cold visage, mournfully serene,
The same indignant majesty was seen ;
There virtue still unchangeably abode,
And scorn'd the spite of every partial god.
The bloody business now complete and done,
New furies urge the fierce Septimius on.
He rends the robe that veil'd the hero's head,
And to full view expos'd the recent dead ;
Hard in his horrid gripe the face he press'd,
While yet the quivering muscles life confess'd :

He drew the dragging body down with haste,
Then cross a rower's feat the neck he plac'd;
There, awkward, haggling, he divides the bone
(The headsmen's art but then was rudely known).
Straight on the spoil his Pharian partner flies,
And robs the heartless villain of his prize.
The head, his trophy, proud Achilles bears;
Septimius an inferior drudge appears,
And in the meaner mischief poorly shares.
Caught by the venerable locks, which grow
In hoary ringlets, on his generous brow,
To Ægypt's impious king that head they bear,
That laurels us'd to bind, and monarchs fear.
Those sacred lips, and that commanding tongue,
On which the listening forum oft has hung;
That tongue which could the world with ease re-fram,

And ne'er commanded war or peace in vain;
That face, in which success came smiling home,
And doubled every joy it brought to Rome:
Now pale, and wan, is fix'd upon a spear,
And borne, for public view, aloft in air.
The tyrant, pleas'd, beheld it; and decreed
To keep this pledge of his detested deed.
His slaves straight dram the ferous parts away,
And arm the waiting flesh against decay;
Then drugs and gums through the void vessels pass,
And for duration fix the stiffening mass.

Inglorious boy! degenerate and base!
Thou last and worst of the Lægæan race!
Whose feeble throne, ere long, shall be compell'd
To thy lascivious sister's reign to yield;
Canst thou, with altars, and with rites divine,
The rash vain youth of Macedon insrine:
Can Ægypt such stupendous fabrics build;
Can her wide plains with pyramids be fill'd;
Canst thou, beneath such monumental pride,
The worthless Ptolemæan fathers hide;
While the great Pompey's headless trunk is tosf'd
In scorn, unbury'd, on thy barbarous coast?
Was it so much? Could not thy care suffice,
To keep him whole, and glut his father's eyes?
In this, his fortune ever held the same,
Still wholly kind, or wholly cross, the came.
Patient, his long prosperity she bore,
But kept his death, and this sad day, in store.
No meddling god did e'er his power employ,
To ease his sorrows, or to damp his joy;
Unmingled came the bitter and the sweet,
And all his good and evil was complete.
No sooner was he struck by fortune's hand,
But, see! he lies unbury'd on the sand;
Rocks tear him, billows toss him up and down.
And Pompey by a headless trunk is known.

Yet ere proud Cæsar touch'd the Pharian Nile,
Chance found his mangled foe a funeral pile;
In pity half, and half in scorn, he gave
A wretched, to prevent a nobler grave.
Cordus, a follower long of Pompey's fate,
(His quæstor in Idalian Cyprus late)
From a cloist cave, in covert where he lay,
Swift to the neighbouring shore betook his way:
Safe in the shelter of the gloomy shade,
And by strong ties of pious duty sway'd,
The fearless youth the watery strand survey'd.
'Twas now the thickest darkness of the night,
And waning Phœbe lent a feeble light;

Yet soon the glimmering goddess plainly show'd
The paler corse, amidst the dusky flood.
The plunging Roman flies to its relief,
And with strong arms infolds the floating chief.
Long strove his labour with the tumbling main,
And dragg'd the sacred burden on with pain.
Nigh weary now, the waves instruct him well,
To seize th' advantage of th' alternate swell:
Borne on the mounting surge, to shore he flies,
And on the beach in safety lauds his prize.
There o'er the dead he hangs with tender care,
And drops in every gaping wound a tear:
Then, liting to the gloomy skies his head,
Thus to the stars, and cruel gods, he pray'd:
See, fortune! where thy Pompey lies! and oh!
In pity, one, last little boon bestow.

He asks no heaps of frankincense to rise,
No eastern odours to perfume the skies;
No Roman necks his patriot corse to bear,
No reverend train of statues to appear;
No pageant shows his glories to record,
And tell the triumphs of his conquering sword;
No instruments in plaintive notes to found,
No legions sad to march in solemn round;
A bier, no better than the vulgar need,
A little wood the kindling flame to feed,
With some poor hand to tend the homely fire,
Is all, these wretched relics now require.
Your wrath, ye powers! Cornelia's hand denies;
Let that, for every other loss, suffice;
She takes not her last leave, she weeps not here,
And yet she is, ye gods! she is too near.

Thus while he spoke he saw where through the shade

A slender flame its gleaming light display'd;
There, as it chanc'd, abandon'd and unmourn'd,
A poor neglected body lonely burn'd.
He seiz'd the kindled brands; and oh! (he said)
Whoe'er thou art, forgive me, friendless shade;
And though unpy'd and forlorn thou lie,
Thyself a better office shalt supply.
If there be sense in souls departed, thine
To my great leader shall her rites resign:
With humble joy shall quit her meaner claim,
And blush to burn, when Pompey wants the
flame.

He said; and, gathering in his garment, bore
The glowing fragments to the neighbouring shore.
There soon arriv'd, the noble trunk he found,
Half wash'd into the flood, half resting on the
ground.

With diligence his hands a trench prepare,
Fit it around, and place the body there.
No cloyen oaks in lofty order lie,
To lift the great patrician to the sky:
By chance a few poor planks were hard at hand,
By some late shipwreck cast upon the strand;
These pious Cordus gathers where they lay,
And plants about the chief, as best he may.

Now while the blaze began to rise around,
The youth sat mournful by upon the ground:
And ah! (he cry'd) if this unworthy flame
Disgrace thy great, majestic, Roman name;
If the rude outrage of the stormy seas
Seem better to thy ghost, than rites like these;
Yet let thy injur'd shade the wrong forget,
Which duty and officious zeal commit,

Fate seems itself, in my excuse to plead,
 And thy hard fortune justifies my deed.
 I only wish'd, nor is that wish in vain,
 To save thee from the monsters of the main;
 From vultures claws, from lions that devour,
 From mortal malice, and from Cæsar's power.
 No longer, then, this humbler flame withstand;
 'Tis lighted to thee by a Roman hand.
 If e'er the gods permit unhappy me,
 Once more, thy lov'd Hesperian land to see,
 With me thy exil'd ashes shall return,
 And chaste Cornelia give thee to thy urn.
 Meanwhile, a signal thall thy care provide,
 Some future Roman votary to guide;
 When with due rites thy fate he would deplore,
 And thy pale head to these thy limbs restore:
 Then shall he mark the witness of my stone,
 And taught by me, thy sacred ghost atone.

He spoke; and straight, with busy pious hands,
 Heap'd on the smoking corse the scatter'd brands:
 Slow sunk amidst the fire the wasting dead,
 And the faint flame with dropping marrow fed.
 Now 'gan the glittering stars to fade away,
 Before the rosy promise of the day,
 When the pale youth th' unfinished rites forsook,
 And to the covert of his cave betook.

Ah! why thus rashly would thy fears disclaim
 That only deed, which must record thy name?
 Ev'n Cæsar's self shall just applause bestow,
 And praise the Roman that inters his foe.
 Securely tell him where his son is laid,
 And he shall give thee back his mangled head.

But soon behold! the bolder youth returns,
 While, half consum'd, the smouldering carcase
 burns;

Ere yet the cleansing fire had melted down
 The fleshy muscles, from the firmer bone.
 He quench'd the relics in the briny wave,
 And hid them, hasty, in a narrow grave:
 Then with a stone the sacred dust he binds,
 To guard it from the breath of scattering winds:
 And lest some heedless mariner should come,
 And violate the warrior's humble tomb;
 Thus with a line the monument he keeps,
 "Beneath this stone the once great Pompey sleeps."
 Oh fortune! can thy malice swell so high?
 Caus't thou with Cæsar's every wish comply?
 Must he, thy Pompey once, thus meanly lie?
 But oh! forbear, mistaken man, forbear!
 Nor dare to fix the mighty Pompey there:
 Where there are seas, or air, or earth, or skies,
 Where'er Rome's empire stretches, Pompey lies:
 Far be the vile memorial then convey'd!
 Nor let this stone the partial gods upbraid.
 Shall Hercules all Oeta's heights demand,
 And Nyssa's hill, for Bacchus only, stand;
 While one poor pebble is the warrior's doom,
 That fought the cause of liberty and Rome!
 If fate decrees he must in Ægypt lie,
 Let the whole fertile realm his grave supply:
 Yield the wide country to his awful shade,
 Nor let us bear on any part to tread,
 Fearful to violate the mighty dead.
 But if one stone must bear the sacred name,
 Let it be fill'd with long records of fame.
 There let the passenger, with wonder, read,
 The pirates vanquish'd, and the ocean freed;

Sertorius taught to yield; the Alpine war;
 And the young Roman knight's triumphal car.
 With these, the mighty Pontic king be plac'd,
 And every nation of the vanquish'd east:
 Tell with what loud applause of Rome, he drove Thrice his glad wheels to Capitolian Jove:
 Tell too, the patriot's greatest, best renown,
 Tell, how the victor laid his empire down,
 And chang'd his armour for the peaceful gown.
 But ah! what marbles to the task suffice.
 Instead of these, turn, Roman, turn thy eyes;
 Seek the known name our Fasts us'd to wear,
 The noble mark of many a glorious year;
 The name that wont the trophy'd arch to grace
 And ev'n the temples of the gods found place:
 Decline thee lowly, bending to the ground,
 And there that name, that Pompey may be found

Oh fatal land! what curse can I bestow,
 Equal to those, we to thy mischiefs owe?
 Well did the wise Cumæan maid of yore
 Warn our Hesperian chiefs to shun thy shore.
 Forbid, just heavens! your dews to bless the soil
 And thou, withhold thy waters, fruitful Nile!
 Like Ægypt, like the land of Æthiops, burn,
 And her fat earth to sandy deserts turn.
 Have we, with honours, defeat Oïris crown'd,
 And mourn'd him to the tinkling timbrel's sound
 Receiv'd her Isis to divine abodes,
 And rank'd her dogs deform'd with Roman gods
 While, in despite of Pompey's injur'd shade,
 Low in her dust his sacred bones are laid!
 And thou, oh Rome! by whose forgetful hand
 Altars and temples, rear'd to tyrants, stand,
 Canst thou neglect to call thy hero home,
 And leave his ghost in banishment to roam?
 What though the victor's frown, and thy ba-
 fear,

Bad thee, at first, the pious task forbear;
 Yet now, at least, oh let him now return,
 And rest with honour in a Roman urn.
 Nor let mistaken superstition dread,
 On such occasions, to disturb the dead;
 Oh! would commanding Rome my hand employ
 The impious task should be perform'd with joy:
 How would I fly to tear him from the tomb,
 And bear his ashes in my bosom home!
 Perhaps, when flames their dreadful ravage make
 Or groaning earth shall from the centre shake;
 When blasting dews the rising harvest seize,
 Or nations sicken with some dire disease:
 The gods, in mercy to us, shall command
 To fetch our Pompey from th' accursed land.
 Then, when his venerable bones draw near,
 In long processions shall the priests appear,
 And their great chief the sacred relics bear.
 Or if thou still possess the Pharian shore,
 What traveller but shall thy grave explore;
 Whether he tread Syene's burning soil,
 Or visit sultry Thebes, or fruitful Nile:
 Or if the merchants, drawn by hopes of gain,
 Seek rich Arabia, and the ruddy main;
 With holy rites thy shade shall he atone,
 And bow before thy venerable stone.
 For who but shall prefer thy tomb above
 The meauer fane of an Ægyptian Jove?
 Nor envy thou, if abject Romans raise Statues and temples, to their tyrant's praise;

ough his proud name on altars may preside, d thine be walt'h'd by every rolling tide;
 y grave shall the vain pageantry despise,
 y grave, where that great god, thy fortune, lies.
 n those who kneel not to the gods above,
 or offer sacrifice or prayer to Jove,
 the Bidental bend their humble eyes,
 and worship where the bury'd thunder lies.

Perhaps fate wills, in honour to thy fame,
 No marble shall record thy mighty name.
 So may thy dust, ere long, be worn away,
 And all remembrance of thy wrongs decay:
 Perhaps a better age shall come, when none
 Shall think thee ever laid beneath this stone;
 When Ægypt's boast of Pompey's tomb shall prove
 As Unbeliev'd a tale, as Crete relates of Jove.

B O O K IX.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE poet having ended the foregoing book with the death of Pompey, begins this with his Apotheosis; from thence, after a short account of Cato's gathering up the relics of the battle of Pharsalia, and transporting them to Cyrene in Africa, he goes on to describe Cornelia's passion upon the death of her husband. Amongst other things, he informs his son Sextus of his father's last commands, to continue the war in defence of the commonwealth. Sextus sets sail for Cato's camp, where he meets his elder brother Cn. Pompeius, and acquaints him with the fate of their father. Upon this occasion the poet describes the rage of the elder Pompey, and the disorders that happened in the camp, both which Cato appeases. To prevent any future inconvenience of this kind, he resolves to put them upon action, and in order to that to join with Juba. After a description of the Syrts, and their dangerous passage by them, follows Cato's speech to encourage the soldiers to march through the deserts of Libya; then an account of Libya, the deserts, and their march. In the middle of which is a beautiful digression concerning the temple of Jupiter-Ammon, with Labienus's persuasion to Cato to inquire of the oracle concerning the event of the war, and Cato's famous answer. From thence, after a warm eulogy upon Cato, the author goes on to the account of the original of serpents in Afric; and this, with the description of the various kinds, and the several deaths of the soldiers by them, is perhaps the most poetical part of this whole work. At Leptis he leaves Cato, and returns to Cæsar, whom he brings into Egypt, after having shown him the ruins of Troy, and from thence taken an occasion to speak well of poetry in general, and himself in particular. Cæsar, upon his arrival on the coast of Egypt, is met by an ambassador from Ptolemy with Pompey's head. He receives the present (according to Lucan) with a feigned abhorrence, and concludes the book with tears, and a seeming grief for the misfortune of so great a man.

For in the dying embers of its pile
 ept the great soul upon the banks of Nile.
 or longer, by the earthy parts refrain'd,
 midst its wretched relics was detain'd;
 at, active and impatient of delay, [its way.
 ot from the mouldering heap, and upwards urg'd
 r in those azure regions of the air hich border on the rolling starry sphere, yond our orb, and nearer to that height,
 here Cynthia drives around her silver light;
 heir happy seats the demi-gods possess,
 esin'd by virtue, and prepar'd for bliss;
 f life unblam'd, a pure and pious race,
 orthly that lower heaven and stars to grace, ivine, and equal to the glorious place. }
 here Pompey's soul, adorn'd with heavenly light, on shone among the rest, and as the rest was bright.
 ew to the blest abode, with wonder fill'd,
 he stars and moving planets he beheld;
 hen looking down on the sun's feeble ray,
 rvey'd our dusky, faint, imperfect day, nd under what a cloud of night we lay. } ut when he saw, how on the shore forlorn his headless trunk was cast for public scorn;
 hen he beheld, how envious fortune, still,
 ook pains to use a senseless carcase ill,
 e smil'd at the vain malice of his foe,
 nd pity'd impotent mankind below.

Then lightly passing o'er Emathia's plain,
 His flying navy scatter'd on the main,
 And cruel Cæsar's tents; he fix'd at last
 His residence in Brutus' sacred breast:
 There brooding o'er his country's wrongs he fate,
 The state's avenger, and the tyrant's fate;
 There mournful Rome might still her Pompey
 find,
 There, and in Cato's free unconquer'd mind.
 He, while in deep suspense the world yet lay,
 Anxious and doubtful whom it should obey,
 Hatred avow'd to Pompey's self did bear,
 Though his companion in the common war.
 Though by the senate's just command, they stood Engag'd together for the public good;
 But dread Pharsalia did all doubts decide,
 And firmly fix'd him to the vanquish'd side.
 His helpless country, like an orphan left,
 Friendless and poor, of all support bereft,
 He took and cherish'd with a father's care,
 He comforted, he bade her not to fear;
 And taught her feeble hands once more the } trade of war.
 Nor lust of empire did his courage sway,
 Nor hate, nor proud repugnance to obey:
 Passions and private interest he forgot;
 Not for himself, but liberty he fought.
 Straight to Corcyra's port his way he bent,
 The swift advancing victor to prevent;

Who, marching sudden on to new success,
 The scatter'd legions might with ease oppress.
 There, with the ruins of Æmathia's field,
 The flying host, a thousand ships he fill'd.
 Who that from land, with wonder, had descri'd
 The passing fleet, in all its naval pride,
 Stretch'd wide, and o'er the distant ocean spread,
 Could have believ'd those mighty numbers fled?
 Malca o'erpass, and the Tanarian shore,
 With swelling sails he for Cythera bore:
 Then Crete he saw, and with a northern wind
 Soon left the fam'd Di&æan isle behind.
 Urg'd by the bold Phycuntines churlish pride,
 (Their shores, their haven, to his fleet deny'd)
 The chief reveng'd the wrong, and as he pass'd,
 Laid their unhopitable city waste.
 Thence wafted forward, to the coast he came
 Which took of old from Palinure its name.
 (Nor Italy this monument alone
 Can boast, since Libya's Palinure has shown
 Her peaceful shores were to the Trojan known.)
 From hence they soon descri'd with doubtful pain,
 Another navy on the distant main.
 Anxious they stand, and now expect the foe,
 Now their companions in the public woe:
 The victor's haste inclines them most to fear:
 Each vessel seems a hostile face to wear,
 And every sail they spy, they fancy Cæsar there.
 But oh, those ships a different burden bore,
 A mournful freight they wafted to the shore:
 Sorrows that might tears, ev'n from Cato, gain,
 And teach the rigid Stoic to complain.

When long the sad Cornelia's prayers, in vain,
 Had try'd the flying navy to detain,
 With Sextus long had strove, and long implor'd,
 To wait the relics of her murder'd lord; [shore,
 The waves, perchance, might the dear pledge re-
 And waft him bleeding from the faithless shore:
 Still grief and love their various hopes inspire,
 Till she beholds her Pompey's funeral fire,
 Till on the land she sees th' ignoble flame
 Ascend, unequal to the hero's name;
 Then into just complaints at length she broke,
 And thus with pious indignation spoke:
 Oh fortune! doist thou then disdain t' afford
 My love's last office to my dearest lord?
 Am I one chaste, one last embrace deny'd?
 Shall I not lay me by his clay-cold side,
 Nor tears to bathe his gaping wounds provide?
 Am I unworthy the sad torch to bear,
 To light the flame, and burn my flowing hair?
 To gather from the shore the noble spoil,
 And place it decent on the fatal pile?
 Shall not his bones and sacred dust be borne,
 In this sad bosom to their peaceful urn?
 What'er the last consuming flame shall leave,
 Shall not this widow'd hand by right receive,
 And to the gods the precious relics give?
 Perhaps, this last respect, which I should show,
 Some vile Egyptian hand does now bestow,
 Injurious to the Roman shade below.
 Happy, my Crassus, were thy bones, which lay
 Expos'd to Parthian birds and beasts of prey!
 Here the last rites the cruel gods allow,
 And for a curse my Pompey's pile bestow.
 For ever will the same sad fate return?
 Still an unpuried husband must I mourn,
 And weep my sorrows o'er an empty urn?

But why should tombs be built, or urns be made
 Does grief like mine require their feeble aid?
 Is he not lodg'd, thou wretch! within thy heart,
 And fix'd in every dearest vital part?
 O'er monuments surviving wives may grieve,
 She ne'er will need them, who disdain to live.
 Eut oh! behold where yon malignant flames
 Cast feebly forth their mean inglorious beams:
 From my lov'd lord, his dear remains, they rise,
 And bring my Pompey to my weeping eyes;
 And now they sink, the languid lights decay,
 The cloudy smoke all eastward rolls away,
 And wafts my hero to the rising day.
 Me too the winds demand, with freshening gales
 Envious they call, and stretch the swelling sails.
 No land on earth seems dear as Egypt now,
 No land that crowns and triumphs did bestow,
 And with new laurels bound my Pompey's brow.

That happy Pompey to my thoughts is lost,
 He that is left, lies dead on yonder coast;
 He, only he, is all I now demand,
 For him I linger near this cursed land;
 Endear'd by crimes, for horrors lov'd the more,
 I cannot, will not, leave the Pharian shore.
 Thou Sextus, thou shalt prove the chance of
 war,

And through the world thy father's ensigns bear,
 Then hear his last command, intrusted to my care.
 "Whene'er my last, my fatal hour shall come,
 "Arm you, my sons, for liberty and Rome;
 "While one shall of our free-born race remain,
 "Let him prevent the tyrant Cæsar's reign.
 "From each free city round, from every land,
 "Their warlike aid in Pompey's name demand
 "These are the parties, these the friends he leave
 "This legacy your dying father gives.
 "If for the sea's wide rule your arms you bear,
 "A Pompey ne'er can want a navy there,
 "Heirs of my fame, my sons, shall wage my war.
 "Only be bold, unconquer'd in the fight,
 "And, like your father, still defend the right.
 "To Cato, if for liberty he stand,
 "Submit, and yield you to his ruling hand,
 "Be brave, just, and only worthy to command."
 At-length to thee, my Pompey, I am just,
 I have surviv'd, and well discharg'd my trust;
 Through Chaos now, and the dark realms below
 To follow thee, a willing shade I go:
 If longer with a lingering fate I strive,
 'Tis but to prove the pain of being alive,
 'Tis to be curs'd for daring to survive.
 She, who could bear to see thy wounds, and live
 New proofs of love, and fatal grief, shall give.
 Nor need she fly for succour to the sword,
 The steep precipice, and deadly cord:
 She from herself shall find her own relief,
 And scorn to die of any death but grief.

So said the matron; and about her head
 Her veil she draws, her mournful eyes to shade.
 Resolv'd to shroud in thickest shades her woe,
 She seeks the ship's deep darksome hold below:
 There lonely left, at leisure to complain,
 She hugs her sorrows, and enjoys her pain:
 Still with fresh tears the living grief would feed
 And fondly loves it, in her husband's stead.
 In vain the beating surges rage aloud,
 And swelling Eurus granbles in the shroud;

ler, nor the waves beneath, nor winds above,
for all the noisy cries of fear can move;
A fullen peace compos'd for death she lies,
And, waiting, longs to hear the tempest rise;
When hopes the seamen's vows shall all be crost,
Trays for the storm, and wishes to be lost.

Soon from the Pharian coast the navy bore,
And fought through foamy seas the Cyprian shore;
Of eastern gales prevailing thence alone,
To Cato's camp and Libya waft them on.

With mournful looks from land (as o'er, we know,
A sad prophetic spirit waits on woe),
Pompey his brother and the fleet beheld,

Now near advancing o'er the watery field:
Straight to the beach with headlong haste he flies:
Where is our father, Sextus, where? he cries:

Do we yet live? Stands yet the sovereign state?
Or does the world, with Pompey, yield to fate?

Sink we at length before the conquering foe?
And is the mighty head of Rome laid low?

He said; the mournful-brother thus reply'd;
O happy thou! whom lands and seas divide
From woes, which did to these sad eyes betide:

These eyes! which of their horror still complain,
Since they beheld our godlike father slain.

Nor did his fate an equal death afford,
Nor suffer'd him to fall by Cæsar's sword.

Trusting in vain to hospitable gods,
He dy'd, oppress'd by vile Egyptian odds:

By the curs'd monarch of Nile's slimy wave
He fell, a victim to the crown he gave.

Yes, I beheld the dire, the bloody deed;
These eyes beheld our valiant father bleed:

Amaz'd I look'd, and scarce believ'd my fear,
Nor thought th' Egyptian could so greatly dare;

But still I look'd, and fancy'd Cæsar there.
But, oh! not all his wounds so much did move,
Pierc'd my sad soul, and struck my filial love,
As that his venerable head they bear,
Their wanton trophy, fix'd upon a spear;

Through every town 'tis shown the vulgar's sport,
And the lewd laughter of the tyrant's court.

'Tis said that Ptolemy preserves this prize,
Proof of the deed, to glut the victor's eyes.

The body, whether rent, or borne away,
By foul Egyptian dogs, and birds of prey:

Whether within their greedy maws entomb'd,
Or by those wretched flames, we saw, consum'd;

Its fate as yet we know not, but forgive:
That crime unpunish'd, to the gods we leave,

'Tis for the part preserv'd alone we grieve.
Scarce had he ended thus, when Pompey, warm
With noble fury, calls aloud to arm;
Nor seeks in sighs and helpless tears relief,
But thus in pious rage expresses his grief.

Hence all aboard, and haste to put to sea,
Urge on against the winds our adverse way;

With me let every Roman leader go,
Since civil wars were ne'er so just as now.

Pompey's unbury'd relics ask your aid,
Call for due rites and honours to be paid.

Let Egypt's tyrant pour a purple flood,
And loath the ghost with his inglorious blood.

Not Alexander shall his priests defend,
Forc'd from his golden shrine he shall descend:

In Marcotis deep I'll plunge him down,
Deep in the sluggish waves the royal carcase
drown.

From his proud pyramid Amasis torn,
With his long dynasties my rage shall mourn,
And floating down their muddy Nile be borne.

Each stately tomb and monumental stone,
For thee, unburied Pompey, shall atone.

Ifs no more shall draw the cheated crowd,
Nor God Osiris in his linen shroud;

Strip of their shrines, with scorn they shall be
To be by ignominious hands defac'd;

Their holy Apis, of diviner breed,
To Pompey's dust a sacrifice shall bleed,

While burning deities the flame shall feed.
Waste shall the land be laid, and never know
The tiller's care, nor feel the crooked plough:

None shall be left for whom the Nile may flow:
Till, the gods banish'd, and the people gone,
Egypt to Pompey shall be left alone.

He said; then hasty to revenge he flew,
And seaward out the ready navy drew;

But cooler Cato did the youth assuage,
And praising much, comprit his filial rage.

Meantime the shores, the seas, and skies around,
With mournful cries for Pompey's death resound.

A rare example have their sorrows shown,
Yet in no age beside, nor people known.

How falling power did with compassion meet,
And crowds deplor'd the ruins of the great.

But when the sad Cornelia first appear'd,
When on the deck her mournful head she rear'd,

Her locks hang rudely o'er the matron's face,
With all the pomp of grief's disorder'd grace;

When they beheld her, waked quite with woe,
And spent with tears that never ceas'd to flow,

Again they feel their loss, again complain,
And heaven and earth ring with their cries again.

Soon as she landed on the friendly strand,
Her lord's last rites employ her pious hand;

To his dear shade she builds a funeral pile,
And decks it proud with many a noble spoil.

There thence his arms with antic gold inlaid,
To his dear riches which she herself had made,

Robes to imperial Jove in triumph erst display'd:
The relics of his past victorious days,
Now this his latest trophy serve to raise,
And in one common flame together blaze.

Such was the weeping matron's pious care:
The soldiers, taught by her, their fires prepare;

To every valiant friend a pile they build,
That fell for Rome in curs'd Pharsalia's field:

Stretch'd wide along the shores, the flames extend,
And, grateful to the wandering shades, ascend.

So when Apulean hinds, with art, renew
The wintry pastures to their verdant hue,

That flowers may rise, and springing grafs return,
With spreading flames the wither'd fields they Garganus then and lofty Vultur blaze,

And draw the distant wandering swains to gaze;
Far are the glittering fires descri'd by night,
And gild the dusky ikies around with light.

But, oh! not all the sorrows of the crowd,
That spoke their free impatient thoughts aloud,
That tax'd the gods, as authors of their woe,
And charg'd them with neglect of things below;

Not all the marks of the wild people's love,
The hero's soul, like Cato's praise, could move;
Few were his words, but from an honest heart,
Where faction and where favour had no part,
But truth made up for passion and for art.

We've lost a Roman citizen (he said:)

One of the noblest of that name is dead;
 Who, though not equal to our fathers found
 Nor by their strictest rules of justice bound,
 Yet from his faults this benefit we draw,
 He, for his country's good, transgress'd her law,
 To keep a bold licentious age in awe.
 Rome held her freedom still, though he was great;
 He iway'd the senate, but they rul'd the state.
 When crowds were willing to have worn his
 He chose his private station to retain, [chain,
 That all might free, and equal all remain.
 War's boundless power he never fought to use,
 Nor ask'd, but what the people might refuse.
 Much he possess'd, and wealthy was his store,
 Yet still he gather'd but to give the more, [poor.
 And Rome, while he was rich, could ne'er be
 He drew the sword, but knew its rage to charm,
 And lov'd peace best, when he was forc'd to
 arm;

Unmov'd with all the glittering pomp of power,
 He took with joy, but laid it down with more:
 His chaster household and his frugal board,
 Nor lewdness did, nor luxury afford,
 Ev'n in the highest fortunes of their lord.
 His noble name, his country's honour grown,
 Was venerated round the nations known, [shone.
 And as Rome's fair-est light and brightest glory
 When betwixt Marius and fierce Sylla tost,
 The commonwealth her ancient freedom lost,
 Some shadow yet was left, some shew of power;
 Now ev'n the name with Pompey is no more:
 Senate and people all at once are gone,
 Nor need the tyrant blush to mount the throne.
 Oh, happy Pompey! happy in thy fate,
 Happy by falling with the falling state,
 Thy death a benefit the gods did grant, [want.
 Thou might'st have liv'd those Pharian swords to Freedom, at least, thou dost by dying gain,
 Nor liv'st to see thy Julia's father reign; [slain.
 Free death is man's first bliss, the next is to be Such mercy only I from Juba crave,
 (If fortune should ordain me Juba's slave)
 To Cæsar let him show, but show me dead,
 And keep my carcase, so he takes my head.

He said, and pleas'd the noble shade below,
 More than a thousand orators could do;
 Though Tully too had lent his charming tongue,
 And Rome's full forum with his praise had rung.

But discord now infects the fullen crowd,
 And now they tell their discontents aloud:
 When Tarchon first his flying ensigns bore,
 Call'd out to march, and hasten'd to the shore;
 Him Cato thus, pursuing as he mov'd,
 Sternly bespoke, and justly thus reprov'd:

Oh, restless author of the roving war,
 Dost thou again piratic arms prepare?
 Pompey, thy terror and thy scourge is gone,
 And now thou hop'st to rule the seas alone.

He said, and bent his frown upon the rest,
 Of whom one bolder thus the chief address'd,
 And thus their weariness of war confess'd:

For Pompey's sake (nor thou disdain to hear)
 The civil war we wage, these arms we bear;
 Him we prefer'd to peace: but, Cato, now,
 That cause, that master of our arms lies low.
 Let us no more our absent country mourn,
 But to our homes and household gods return;

To the chaste arms from whose embrace we fled,
 And the dear pledges of the nuptial bed.
 For, oh! what period can the war attend. [end:
 Which nor Pharsalia's field nor Pompey's death can
 The better times of flying life are past,
 Let death come gently on in peace at last.
 Let age at length with providential care
 The necessary pile and urn prepare,
 All rites the cruel civil war denies,
 Part ev'n of Pompey yet unbury'd lies.
 Though vanquish'd, yet by no barbarian hand,
 We fear not exile in a foreign land,
 Nor are our necks by fortune now bespoke,
 To bear the Scythian or Armenian yoke;
 The victor still a citizen we own,
 And yield obedience to the Roman gown.
 While Pompey liv'd, he bore the sovereign sway
 Cæsar was next, and him we now obey;
 With reverence be the sacred shade ador'd,
 But war has given us now another lord:

To Cæsar and superior chance we yield:
 All was determin'd in Emathia's field.
 Nor shall our arms on other leaders wait,
 Nor for uncertain hopes molest the state, [fate.
 We follow'd Pompey once, but now we follow
 What terms, what safety, can we hope for now,
 But what the victor's mercy shall allow?
 Once Pompey's presence justify'd the cause,
 Then fought we for our liberties and laws;
 With him the honours of that cause lie dead,
 And all the sanctity of war is fled.
 If, Cato, thou for Rome these arms dost bear,
 If still thy country only be thy care,
 Seek we the legions where Rome's ensigns fly,
 Where her proud eagles wave their wings on high
 No matter who to Pompey's power succeeds,
 We follow where a Roman consul leads.

This said, he leap'd aboard; the youthful fort
 Join in his flight, and haste to leave the port;
 The senseless crowd their liberty disdain,
 And long to wear victorious Cæsar's chain.
 Tyrannic power now sudden seem'd to threaten
 The ancient glories of Rome's free-born state,
 Till Cato spoke, and thus deserv'd her fate:

Did then your vows and servile prayers conspire
 Nought but a haughty master to desire?
 Did you, when eager for the battle, come
 The slaves of Pompey, not the friends of Rome?
 Now, weary of the toil, from war you fly,
 And idly lay your useless armour by;
 Your hands neglect to wield the shining sword,
 Nor can you fight but for a king and lord.
 Some mighty chief you want, for whom to
 sweat;

Yourself you know not, or at least forget,
 And fondly bleed, that others may be great:
 Meanly you toil, to give yourselves away;
 And die, to leave the world a tyrant's prey.
 The gods and fortune do at length afford
 A cause most worthy of a Roman sword.
 At length 'tis safe to conquer. Pompey now
 Cannot, by your success, too potent grow;
 Yet now, ignobly, you withhold your hands,
 When nearer liberty your aid demands.
 Of three who durst the sovereign power invade,
 Two by your fortune's kinder doom lie dead;
 And shall the Pharian sword and Parthian bow
 Do more for liberty and Rome, than you?

As you are, in vile subjection go,
 And scorn what Ptolemy did ill bestow.
 Nobly innocent, and meanly good,
 In durst not stain your hardy hands in blood;
 E'er while you fought, but soon did yield,
 And fled the first from dire Pharsalia's field;
 Then secure, for Cæsar will be good,
 Will pardon those who are with ease subdu'd;
 The pitying victor will in mercy spare
 The wretch, who never durst provoke his war.
 O, fordid slaves! one lordly master gone,
 The heirlooms go from father to the son.
 All to enhance your servile merit more,
 Or sad Cornelia weeping from the shore;
 Early for hire expose the matron's life,
 Metellus' daughter sell, and Pompey's wife;
 Like too his sons: let Cæsar find in you
 Retches that may ev'n Ptolemy out-do.
 It let not my devoted life be spar'd,
 Nor tyrant greatly shall that deed reward;
 Which is the price of Cato's hated head,
 That all your former wars shall well be paid;
 Kill me, and in my blood do Cæsar right,
 'Tis mean to have no other guilt but flight.
 He said, and fopp'd the flying naval power;
 They return'd, repenting, to the shore.
 As when the bees their waxen town forsake,
 Unwilling in air their wandering way they take;
 So more in clustering swarms condens'd they fly,
 It fleet uncertain through the various sky;
 So more from flowers they suck the liquid sweet,
 It all their care and industry forget.
 As when at length the tinkling brasses they hear,
 Their swift amaze their flight they soon forbear;
 Adden their flowery labours they renew,
 Sing on the thyme, and sip the balmy dew.
 So cantime, secure on Hybla's fragrant plain,
 With joy exults the happy shepherd swain;
 Proud that his art had thus preserv'd his store,
 He scorns to think his homely cottage poor.
 With such prevailing force did Cato's care
 So fierce impatient soldiers' minds prepare,
 To learn obedience, and endure the war.
 And now their minds, unknowing of repose,
 With busy toil to exercise he chose;
 Still with successive labours are they ply'd,
 And off in long and weary marches try'd.
 Before Cyrene's walls they now sit down;
 And here the victor's mercy well was shown,
 He takes no vengeance of the captive town;
 Content he spares, and bids the vanquish'd live,
 Like Cato, who could conquer, could forgive.
 Hence, Libyan Juba's realms they mean to explore,
 Whose borders on the swarthy moor;
 It nature's boundaries the journey stay,
 The Syrtes are fix'd athwart the middle way;
 It led by daring virtue on they press,
 In open opposition, and still hope success.
 When nature's hand the first formation try'd,
 She first from lands she did at first divide,
 The Syrtes, not quite of sea nor land bereft,
 A mingled mass uncertain still the left;
 Or nor the land with seas is quite o'erspread,
 Or sink the waters deep their oozy bed, [head.
 Or earth defends its shore, nor lifts aloft its
 The site with neither, and with each complies,
 Doubtful and inaccessible it lies;

Or 'tis a sea with shallows bank'd around,
 Or 'tis a broken land with waters drown'd;
 Here shores advanc'd o'er Neptune's rule we find,
 And there an inland ocean lags behind.
 Thus nature's purpose by herself destroy'd,
 Is useless to herself and unemploy'd,
 And part of her creation still is void.
 Perhaps, when first the world and time began,
 Her swelling tides and plenteous waters ran;
 But long confining on the burning zone,
 The sinking seas have felt the neighbouring sun:
 Still by degrees we see how they decay,
 And scarce resist the thirsty god of day.
 Perhaps, in distant ages, 'twill be found,
 When future suns have run the burning round,
 These Syrtes shall all be dry and solid ground;
 Small are the depths their scanty waves retain,
 And earth grows daily on the yielding main.

And now the loaden fleet with active oars
 Divide the liquid plain, and leave the shores,
 When cloudy skies a gathering storm preface,
 And Aufter from the south began to rage.
 Full from the land the founding tempest roars,
 Repels the swelling surge, and sweeps the shores;
 The wind pursues, drives on the rolling sand,
 And gives new limits to the growing land.
 'Tis spite of the seaman's toil, the storm prevails;
 In vain with skilful strength he hands the sails,
 In vain the cordy cables bind them fast,
 At once it rips and rends them from the mast;
 At once the winds the fluttering canvas tear,
 Then whirl and whisk it through the sportive air.
 Some, timely for the rising rage prepar'd,
 Furl the loose sheet, and lash it to the yard:
 In vain their care; sudden the furious blast
 Snaps by the beard, and bears away the mast;
 Of tackling, sails, and masts, at once bereft,
 The ship a naked helpless hull is left.
 Forc'd round and round, she quits her purpos'd
 way,

And bounds uncertain o'er the swelling sea.
 But happier some a steady course maintain,
 Who stand far out, and keep the deeper main.
 Their masts they cut, and driving with the tide,
 Safe o'er the surge beneath the tempest ride:
 In vain did, from the southern coast, their foc,
 All black with clouds, old stormy Aufter blow;
 Lowly secure amidst the waves they lay, [way.
 Old ocean heav'd his back, and roll'd them on their
 Some on the shallows strike, and doubtful stand,
 Part beat by waves, part fix'd upon the sand.
 Now pent amidst the shoals the billows roar,
 Dash on the banks, and scorn the new-made shore:
 Now by the wind driven on in heaps they swell,
 The steadfast banks both winds and waves repel:
 Still with united force they rage in vain,
 The sandy piles their station fix'd maintain,
 And lift their heads secure amidst the watery
 plain.

There 'scap'd from seas, upon the faithless strand,
 With weeping eyes the shipwreck'd seaman stand,
 And, cast ashore, look vainly out for land.
 Thus some were lost: but far the greater part,
 Preserv'd from danger by the pilot's art,
 Keep on their course, a happier fate partake,
 And reach in safety the Tritonian lake.
 These waters to the tuneful god are dear,
 Whose vocal shell the sea-green Nereids hear;

These Pallas loves, so tells reporting fame,
Here first from heaven to earth the goddess came (Heaven's neighbourhood the warmer clime betrays,

And speaks the nearer sun's immediate rays),
Here her first footsteps on the brink she staid,
Here in the watery glass her form survey'd,
And call'd herself from hence the chaste Tritonnian maid.

Here Lethe's streams, from secret springs below,
Rise to the light; here heavily, and slow,
The silent dull forgetful waters flow.

Here by the wakeful dragon kept of old,
Hesperian plants grew rich with living gold;
Long since, the fruit was from the branches torn,
And now the gardens their lost honours mourn.
Such was in ancient times the tale receiv'd
Such by our good forefathers was believ'd;
Nor let inquirers the tradition wrong,

Or dare to question, now, the poet's sacred song.
Then take it for a truth, the wealthy wood
Here under golded boughs low bending stood;
On some large tree his folds the serpent wound,
The fair Hesperian virgins watch'd around,
And join'd to guard the rich forbidden ground }
But great Alcides came to end their care,
Strip'd the gay grove, and left the branches bare;
Then back returning fought the Argive shore,
And the bright spoil to proud Eurytheus bore.

These famous regions and the Syrts o'erpass'd,
They reach'd the Garamantian coast at last;
Here, under Pompey's care the navy lies,
Beneath the gentlest clime of Libya's skies.

But Cato's soul, by dangers unrestrain'd,
Eafe and a full inactive life disdain'd,
His daring virtue urges to go on,
Through desert lands, and nations yet unknown;
To march and prove th' inhospitable ground;
To shun the Syrts, and lead the soldier round.
Since now tempestuous seasons vex the sea,
And the declining year forbids the watery way;
He sees the cloudy drizzling winter near,
And hopes kind rains may cool the sultry air:
So haply may they journey on secure,
Nor burning heats. nor killing frosts endure;
But while cool winds the winter's breach supplies,

With gentle warmth the Libyan sun may rise,
And both may join and temper well the skies.

But ere the toilsome march he undertook,
The hero thus the listening host bespoke:

Fellows in arms! whose bliss, whose chiefest good,
Is Rome's defence, and freedom bought with
blood;

You, who, to die with liberty, from far
Have follow'd Cato in this fatal war,
Be now for virtue's noblest task prepar'd,
For labours many, perilous, and hard.
Think through what burning climes, what wilds we go,

No leafy shades the naked deserts know, [flow.
Nor silver streams through flowery meadows
But horrors there, and various deaths abound,
And serpents guard th' inhospitable ground.

Hard is the way; but thus our fate demands;
Rome and her laws we seek amidst these sands.
Let those who, glowing with their country's love,
Resolve with me these dreadful plains to prove,

Nor of return nor safety once debate,
But only dare to go, and leave the rest to fate,
Think not I mean the dangers to disguise,
Or hide them from the cheated vulgar's eyes.
Those, only those, shall in my fate partake,
Who love the daring for the danger's sake;
Those who can suffer all the worst can come,
And think it what they owe themselves and Rome
If any yet shall doubt, or yet shall fear;
If life be, more than liberty, his care;
Here, ere we journey farther, let him slay,
Inglorious let him, like a slave, obey,
And seek a master in some safer way.
Foremost, behold, I lead you to the toil,
My feet shall foremost print the dusty soil:
Strike me the first, thou flaming god of day,
First let me feel thy fierce, thy scorching ray;
Ye living poisons all, ye snaky train,
Meet me the first upon the fatal plain.

In every pain, which you my warriors fear,
Let me be first, and teach you how to bear.
Who sees me pant for drought, or fainting first,
Let him upbraid me, and complain of thirst.

If e'er for shelter to the shades I fly,
Me let him curse, me, for the sultry sky.
If while the weary soldier marches on;
Your leader by distinguish'd ease be known,
Forfake my cause, and leave me there alone.

The sands, the serpents, thirst, and burning heat
Are dear to patience, and to virtue sweet;
Virtue, that scorns on cowards terms to please,
Or cheaply to be bought, or won with ease:
But then the joys, then smiles upon her state,
Then fairest to herself, then most complete,
When glorious danger makes her truly great.
So Libya's plains alone shall wipe away
The foul dishonours of Phartalia's day;
So shall your courage now transcend that fear;
You fled with glory there, to conquer here.

He said; and hardy love of toil inspir'd,
And every breast with godlike ardour fir'd.
Straight, carelefs of return, without delay
Through the wide waste he took his pathlefs way
Libya, ordain'd to be his last retreat,
Receives the hero, fearless of his fate;
Here the good gods his last of labours doom,
Here shall his bones and sacred dust find room,
And his great head be hid within an humble
tomb.

If this large globe be portion'd right by fame
Then one third part shall sandy Libya claim:

But if we count, as suns descend and rise,
If we decide by east and west the skies,
Then, with fair Europe, Libya shall combine,
And both to make the western half shall join.
While wide-extended Asia fills the rest,
Of all from Tanais to Nile possess'd,
And reigns sole empress of the dawning east.
Of all the Libyan soil, the kindest found
Far to the western seas extends its bound;
Where cooling gales, where gentle zephyrs fly,
And setting suns adorn the gaudy sky:
And yet ev'n here no liquid fountain's vein
Wells through the soil, and gurgles o'er the plain
But from our northern clime, our gentler heaven
Refreshing dews and fruitful rains are driven;
All bleak, the god, cold Boreas, spreads his wing
And with our winter gives the Libyan spring.

wicked wealth infects the simple soil,
 or golden ores disclose their shining spoil:
 here is the glebe, 'tis earth, and earth alone,
 guilty pride and avarice unknown:
 here citron groves, the native riches, grow,
 here cool retreats and fragrant shades below,
 and hospitably screen their guests below.
 here by their leafy office, long they stood sacred, old, unviolated wood,
 all Roman luxury to Afric past,
 and foreign axes laid their honours waste.
 thus utmost lands are ransack'd, to afford the far-fetch'd dainties, and the costly board.
 it rude and wasteful all those regions lie at border on the Syrtes, and feel too nigh their sultry summer sun, and parching sky.
 to harvest, there, the scatter'd grain repays,
 it withering dies, and ere it shoots decays:
 here never loves to spring the mantling vine,
 or wanton ringlets round her elm to twine:
 the thirsty dust prevents the swelling fruit,
 sinks up the generous juice, and kills the root;
 through secret veins no tempering moistures pass,
 to bind with viscous force the mouldering mass;
 it genial Jove, averse, disdains to smile,
 and curses the neglected soil.
 hence lazy nature droops her idle head,
 hence every vegetable sense were dead;
 hence the wide dreary plains one visage wear,
 like in summer, winter, spring appear,
 or feel the turns of the revolving year.
 in herbage here (for some ev'n here is found)
 the Nafamonian hinds collect around;
 naked race, and barbarous of mind,
 that live upon the losses of mankind:
 the Syrtes supply their wants and barren soil,
 and strow th' inhospitable shores with spoil.
 here they have none, but ready still they stand,
 spacious, to invade the wealthy strand,
 and hold a commerce, thus, with every distant
 land.
 Through this dire country Cato's journey lay,
 ere he pursu'd, while virtue led the way.
 ere the bold youth, led by his high command, armies of storms and raging winds, by land repeat the dangers of the swelling main,
 and strive with storms and raging winds again.
 ere all at large, where nought restrains his force,
 impetuous Auseter runs his rapid course;
 or mountains here, nor steadfast rocks resist,
 it free he sweeps along the spacious list.
 to stable groves of ancient oaks arise,
 to tire his rage, and catch him as he flies;
 it wide, around, the naked plains appear,
 ere fierce he drives unbounded through the air,
 bars and exerts his dreadful empire here.
 the whirling dust, like waves in eddies wrought,
 sing aloft, to the mid-heaven is caught;
 here hangs a fullen cloud; nor falls again,
 or breaks, like gentle vapours, into rain.
 razing, the poor inhabitant deseries,
 here high above his land and cottage flies;
 next, he sees his lost possessions there,
 from earth transported, and now fix'd in air.
 not rising flames attempt a bolder flight;
 he smokes by rising flames upstaid, light he sands ascend, and stain the heavens with
 night.

But now his utmost power and rage to boast,
 The stormy god invades the Roman host;
 The soldier yields, unequal to the shock,
 And staggers at the wind's stupendous stroke.
 Amaz'd he sees that earth, which lowly lay,
 Forc'd from beneath his feet and torn away.
 Oh Lybia! were thy pliant surface bound,
 And form'd a solid, close-compacted ground;
 Or hadst thou rocks, whose hollows deep below
 Would draw those raging winds that loosely blow;
 Their fury, by thy firmer mass oppos'd,
 Or in those dark infernal caves inclos'd,
 Thy certain ruin wou'd at once complete,
 Shake thy foundations, and unfix thy feat:
 But well thy flitting plains have learn'd to yield;
 Thus, not contending, thou thy pace hast held,
 Unfix'd art fix'd, and flying keep'st the field.
 Helms, spears, and shields, snatch'd from the warlike host,
 Through heaven's wide regions far away were tost;
 While distant nations, with religious fear,
 Beheld them, as some prodigy in air,
 And thought the gods by them denounc'd a war.
 Such haply was the chance which first did raise
 The pious tale, in priestly Numa's days;
 Such were those shields, and thus they came from heaven,
 A sacred charge to young patricians given;
 Perhaps, long since, to lawless winds a prey,
 From far barbarians were they forc'd away;
 Thence through long airy journeys safe did come,
 To cheat the crowd with miracles at Rome.
 Thus, wide o'er Libya, rag'd the stormy south,
 Thus every way assail'd the Latian youth:
 Each several method for defence they try, [lie:
 Now wrap their garments tight, now close they
 Now sinking to the earth, with weight they press,
 Now clasp it to them with a strong embrace,
 Scarce in that posture safe; the driving blast
 Bears hard, and almost heaves them off at last.
 Meantime a sandy flood comes rolling on,
 And swelling heaps the prostrate legions down:
 New to the sudden danger, and dismay'd,
 The frighted soldier haity calls for aid,
 Heaves at the hill, and struggling rears his
 head.
 Soon shoots the growing pile, and rear'd on high,
 Lifts up its lofty summit to the sky:
 High sandy walls, like forts, their passage stay,
 And rising mountains intercept their way:
 The certain bounds which should their journey
 guide,
 The moving earth and dusty deluge hide:
 So landmarks sink beneath the flowing tide.
 As through mid seas uncertainly they move,
 Led only by Jove's sacred lights above:
 Part ev'n of them the Libyan clime denies,
 Forbids their native northern stars to rise,
 And shades the well-known lustre from their
 eyes.
 Now near approaching to the burning zone,
 To warmer, calmer skies they journey'd on.
 The slackening storms the neighbouring sun confess, [less,
 The heat strikes fiercer, and the winds grow
 Whilst parching thirst and fainting sweats increase.

As forward on the weary way they went,
Panting with drought, and all with labour spent,
Amidst the desert, desolate and dry,
One chanc'd a little trickling spring to spy:
Proud of the prize he drain'd the scanty store,
And in his helmet to the chieftain bore.

Around, in crowds, the thirsty legions stood,
Their throats and clammy jaws with dust be-strew'd,

And all with wishful eyes the liquid treasure
Around the leader cast his careful look,
Sternly the tempting envy'd gift he took,

Held it, and thus the giver fierce bespoke:
And think'st thou then that I want virtue's moss!

Am I the meanest of this Roman host!
Am I the first soft coward that complains!

That shrinks, unequal to these glorious pains!
Am I in ease and infamy the first!

Rather be thou, base as thou art, accurs'd,
Thou that dar'st drink, when all beside thee thirst.

He said; and wrathful stretching forth his hand,
Pour'd out the precious draught upon the sand.

Well did the water thus for all provide,
Envy'd by none, while thus to all deny'd,
A little thus the general want supply'd.

Now to the sacred temple they draw near,
Whose only altars Libyan lands revere;

There, but unlike the Jove by Rome ador'd,
A form uncouth, stands heaven's Almighty Lord.

No regal ensigns grace his potent hand,
Nor shakes he there the lightning's flaming brand.

But, ruder to behold, a horned ram
Belies the god, and Ammon is his name.

There, though he reigns unrival'd and alone,
O'er the rich neighbours of the torrid zone;

Though swarthy Æthiops are to him confin'd,
With Araby the blest, and wealthy Inde;

Yet no proud domes are rais'd, no gems are seen,
To blaze upon his shrines with costly sheen;

But plain and poor, and unprofan'd he stood,
Such as, to whom our great forefathers bow'd:

A god of pious times, and days of old,
That keeps his temples safe from Roman gold.

Here, and here only, through wide Libya's
space,

Tall trees, the land, and verdant herbage grace;
Here the loose sands by plenteous springs are bound,

Knit to a mass, and moulded into ground:
Here smiling nature wears a fertile dress,

And all things here the present god confess.
Yet here the sun to neither pole declines,
But from his zenith vertically shines:

Hence, ev'n the trees no friendly shelter yield,
Scarce their own trunks the leafy branches shield;

The rays descend direct, all round embrace,
And to a central point the shadow chase.

Here equally the middle line is found,
To cut the radiant zodiac in its round:

Here unoblique the bull and scorpion rise,
Nor mount too swift, nor leave too soon the skies;

Nor libra does too long the ram attend,
Nor bids the maid the sly sign descend.

The boys and centaur justly time divide,
And equally their several seasons guide:

Alike the crab and wintery goat return,
Alike the lion and the flowing urn.

If any farther nations yet are known,
Beyond the Libyan fires, and scorching zone;
Northward from them the sun's bright course
made,

And to the southward strikes the leaning shade:
There slow Boötes, with his lazy wain

Descending, seems to reach the watery main.
Of all the lights which high above they see,

No star whate'er from Neptune's waves is free,
The whirling axle drives them round, and plunges in the sea.

Before the temple's entrance, at the gate,
Attending crowds of eastern pilgrims wait:

These from the horned god expect relief:
But all give way before the Latian chief.

His host (as crowds are superstitious still)
Curious of fate, of future good and ill,

And fond to prove prophetic Ammon's skill,
Intreat their leader to the god would go,

And from his oracle Rome's fortunes know:
But Labienus chief the thought approv'd,

And thus the common suit to Cato mov'd:
Chance, and the fortune of the way, he said,

Have brought Jove's sacred counsels to our aid:
This greatest of the gods, this mighty chief,

In each distress shall be a sure relief;
Shall point the distant dangers from afar,

And teach the future fortunes of the war.
To thee, O Cato! pious! wife! and just!

To thee dark decrees the cautious gods shall trust:
To thee their fore-determin'd will shall tell:

Their will has been thy law, and thou hast kept
well.

Fate bids thee now the noble thought improve;
Fate brings thee here to meet and talk with Jove

Inquire betimes, what various chance shall come
To pious Cæsar, and thy native Rome;

Try to avert, at least, thy country's doom.
Ask if these arms our freedom shall restore:

Or else if laws and right shall be no more.
Be thy great breast with sacred knowledge fragrant

To lead us in the wandering maze of thought:
Thou, that to virtue ever wert inclin'd,

Learn what it is, how certainly defin'd,
And leave some perfect rule to guide mankind.

Full of the god that dwelt within his breast,
The hero thus his secret mind express'd,

And in-born truths reveal'd; truths which might well

Become ev'n oracles themselves to tell.
Where wouldst thou fond, thy vain inquiry go

What mystic fate, what secret, wouldst thou know
Is it a doubt if death should be my doom,

Rather than live till kings and bondage come,
Rather than see a tyrant crown'd in Rome?

Or wouldst thou know if, what we value here,
Life, be a trifle hardly worth our care?

What by old age and length of days we gain,
More than to lengthen out the sense of pain,

Or if this world, with all its forces join'd,
The universal malice of mankind,

Can shake or hurt the brave and honest mind?
If stable virtue can her ground maintain,

Whilst fortune feebly threatens and frowns in vain
If truth and justice with uprightnefs dwell,
And honestly consist in meaning well?

If right be independent of success,
And conquest cannot make it more or less?

re these, my friends, the secrets thou wouldst know,
 whose doubts for which to oracles we go?
 'tis known, 'tis plain, 'tis all already told,
 nor horned Ammon can no more unfold.
 From God deriv'd, to God by nature join'd,
 he act the dictates of his mighty mind:
 And though our priests are mute, and temples still,
 he never wants a voice to speak his will.
 When first we from the teeming womb were brought,
 With in-born precepts then our souls were
 And then the maker his new creatures taught.
 When he form'd, and gave us to be men,
 he gave us all our useful knowledge then.
 And thus thou believ'st, the vast eternal mind
 As e'er to Syrtes and Libyan sands confin'd?
 That he would choose this waste, this barren ground,
 To teach the thin inhabitants around,
 And leave his truth in wilds and deserts drown'd?
 Is there a place that God would choose to love
 Beyond this earth, the seas, yon heaven above,
 And virtuous minds, the noblest throne for Jove?
 Why seek we farther then? behold around,
 How all thou seest does with the god abound,
 Jove is alike to all, and always to be found.
 Let those weak minds, who live in doubt and fear,
 To juggling priests for oracles repair;
 One certain hour of death to each decreed,
 My fix'd, my certain foul from doubt has freed.
 The coward and the brave are doom'd to fall;
 And when Jove told this truth, he told us all.
 He spoke the hero; and, to keep his word,
 For Ammon, nor his oracle explor'd;
 But left the crowd at freedom to believe,
 And take such answers as the priest should give.
 Foremost on foot he treads the burning sand,
 Bearing his arms in his own patient hand;
 Cornicing another's weary neck to press,
 Or in a lazy chariot loll at ease:
 The panting soldier at his toil succeeds,
 Where no command, but great example leads.
 Tiring of sleep, still for the rest he wakes,
 And at the fountain, last, his thirst he slakes;
 Whene'er by chance some living stream is found,
 He stands, and sees the cooling draughts go round.
 It stays till the last and meanest drudge be past,
 And, till his slaves have drunk, disdains to taste.
 True good men deserve immortal fame,
 If virtue, though distress'd, be still the same;
 Whate'er our fathers greatly dar'd to do,
 Whate'er they bravely bore, and wisely knew,
 Their virtues all are his, and all their praise is due.
 Whoe'er, with battles fortunately fought,
 Whoe'er with Roman blood, such honours bought?
 This triumph, this, on Libya's utmost bound,
 With death and desolation compass'd round,
 Go all thy glories, Pompey, I prefer,
 Thy trophies and thy third triumphal car,
 Go Marius' mighty name, and great Jugurthine war.
 His country's father here, O Rome, behold,
 Worthy thy temples, priests and shrines of gold!
 If e'er thou break't thy lordly master's chain,
 If liberty be e'er restor'd again,

Him shalt thou place in thy divine abodes, [Gods.
 Swear by his holy name and rank him with thy
 Now to those sultry regions were they past,
 Which Jove to stop inquiring mortals plac'd,
 And as their utmost, southern, limits cast.
 Thirstily, for springs they search the desert round,
 And only one, amidst the sands, they found.
 Well stor'd it was, but all access was barr'd:
 The stream ten thousand noxious serpents guard:
 Dry Apices on the fatal margin stood,
 And Dipas thirsted in the middle flood.
 Back from the stream the frighted folder flies,
 Though parch'd, and languishing for drink, he dies:
 The chief beheld, and said, You fear in vain,
 Vainly from safe and healthy draughts abstain,
 My soldier, drink, and dread not death or pain.
 When urg'd to rage, their teeth the serpents fix,
 And venom with our vital juices mix;
 The pest infus'd through every vein runs round,
 Infects the mass, and death is in the wound.
 Harmless and safe, no poison here they shed:
 He said; and first the doubtful draught essay'd;
 He, who through all their march, their toil, their thirst,
 Demanded, here, alone, to drink the first.
 Why plagues, like these, infect the Libyan air,
 Why deaths unknown in various shapes appear;
 Why, fruitful to destroy the cursed land
 Is temper'd thus, by nature's secret hand;
 Dark and obscure the hidden cause remains,
 And still deludes the vain inquirer's pains;
 Unless a tale for truth may be believ'd,
 And the good-natur'd world be willingly deceiv'd.
 Where western waves on farthest Libya beat,
 Warm'd with the setting sun's descending heat,
 Dreadful Medusa fix'd her horrid seat.
 No leafy shade, with kind protection, shields
 The rough, the squalid, unfrequented fields:
 No mark of shepherds, or the ploughman's toil,
 To tend the flocks, or turn the mellow soil:
 But rude with rocks, the region all around
 Its mistress, and her potent visage, own'd.
 'Twas from this monster to afflict mankind,
 That nature first produc'd the snaky kind:
 On her, at first their forked tongues appear'd;
 From her, their dreadful hissings first were heard.
 Some wreath'd in folds upon her temples hung;
 Some backwards to her waist depended long;
 Some with their rising crests her forehead deck;
 Some wouton play, and lash her swelling neck:
 And while her hands the curling vipers comb,
 Poisons distil around, and drops of livid foam.
 None, who behold the fury, could complain;
 So swift their fate preventing death and pain:
 Ere they had time to fear, the change came on,
 And motion, sense, and life, were lost in stone.
 The soul itself, from sudden flight debarr'd,
 Congealing, in the body's fortune shar'd.
 The dire Eumenides could rage inspire,
 But could no more; the tuneful Thracian lyre
 Infernal Cerberus did soon assuage,
 Lull'd him to rest, and sooth'd his triple rage;
 Hydra's seven heads the bold Alcides view'd,
 Safely he saw, and what he saw, subdu'd:
 Of these in various terrors each excell'd;
 But all to this superior fury yield.

Phorcus and Ceto, next to Neptune he,
 Immortal both, and rulers of the sea,
 This monster's parent's did their offspring dread;
 And from her sight her sister Gorgons fled.
 Old ocean's waters and the liquid air,
 The universal world her power might fear:
 All nature's beauteous works she could invade,
 Through every part a lazy numbness shed,
 And over all a stony surface spread.
 Birds in their flight were stopt, and ponderous
 grown,

Forgot their pinions, and fell senseless down.
 Beasts to the rocks were fix'd, and all around
 Were tribes of stone and marble nations found.
 No living eyes so fell a sight could bear; [were,
 Her snakes themselves, all deadly though they Shot backward from her face, and shrunk away for fear.

By her, a rock Titanian Atlas grew,
 And heav'n by her the giants did subdue:
 Hard was the fight, and Jove was half dismay'd,
 Till Pallas brought the Gorgon to his aid:
 The heavenly nation laid aside their fear,
 For soon she finish'd the prodigious war;
 To mountains turn'd, the monster race remains,
 The trophies of her power on the Phlegraean
 plains.

To seek this monster, and her fate to prove,
 The son of Danaë and golden Jove,
 Attempts a flight through airy ways above.
 The youth Cylenian Hermes' aid implor'd;
 The god assisted with his wings the sword,
 His sword which late made watchful Argus bleed,
 And Iö from her cruel keeper freed.
 Unwedded Pallas lent a sister's aid;
 But ask'd, for recompence, Medusa's head.
 Eastward she warns her brother bend his flight,
 And from the Gorgon realms avert his sight;
 Then arms his left with her resplendent shield,
 And shows how there the foe might be beheld.
 Deep slumbers had the drowsy fiend possess'd,
 Such as drew on, and well might seem, her last:
 And yet she slept not whole; one half her snakes
 Watchful to guard their horrid mistress, wakes;
 The rest dishevell'd, loosely round her head,
 And o'er her drowsy lids and face were spread.
 Backward the youth draws near, nor dares to look,
 But blindly, at a venture, aims a stroke:
 His faltering hand the virgin goddess guides,
 And from the monster's neck her snaky head divides.

But oh! what art, what numbers, can express
 The terrors of the dying Gorgon's face!
 Whan clouds of poison from her lips arise,
 What death, what vast destruction, threaten'd in her eyes!

'Twas somewhat that immortal gods might fear,
 More than the warlike maid herself could bear.
 The victor Perseus still had been subdu'd,
 Though, wary still, with eyes averse he stood:
 Had not his heavenly sisters timely care
 Veil'd the dread visage with the hissing hair.
 Seis'd of his prey, heavenwards, uplifted light,
 On Hermes' nimble wings, he took his flight.
 Now thoughtful of his course he hung in air,
 And meant through Europe's happy clime to steer;
 Till pitying Pallas warn'd him not to blast
 Her fruitful fields, nor lay her cities waste.

For who could not have upwards cast their sight
 Curious to gaze at such a wondrous flight?
 Therefore by gales of gentle zephyrs borne.
 To Libya's coast the hero minds to turn.
 Beneath the sultry lite, expos'd it lies
 To deadly planets, and malignant skies.
 Still, with his fiery steeds, the god of day Drives through that heaven, and makes his burning way.

No land more high crests its lofty head,
 The silver moon in dim eclipse to shade;
 If through the summer signs direct she run,
 Nor bends obliquely, north or south to shun
 The envious earth that hides her from the sun.
 Yet could this soil accurst, this barren field,
 Increase of deaths, and poisonous harvests yield.
 Where'er sublime in air the victor flew,
 The monster's head distill'd a deadly dew;
 The earth receiv'd the seed, and pregnant grew.
 Still as the putrid gore dropt on the sand,
 'Twas temper'd up by nature's forming hand;
 The glowing climate makes the work complete,
 And broods upon the mass, and lends it genia
 heat.

First of those plagues the drowsy asp appear'd,
 Then first her crest and swelling neck she rear'd;
 A larger drop of black congealing blood
 Distinguish'd her amid the deadly brood.
 Of all the serpent race are none so fell, [Iwell
 None with so many deaths such plebeous venor
 Chill in themselves, our colder climes they shun,
 And choose to bask in Afric's warmer sun;
 But Nile no more confines them now: [Wha
 Can for insatiate avarice be found! [bout
 Freight'd with Libyan deaths our merchants come
 And poisonous asps are things of price at Rome.

Her scaly folds th' Hæmorrhoids unbends,
 And her vast length along the sand extends;
 Where'er she wounds, from every part the blood
 Gushes resistless in a crimson flood.

Amphibious some do in the Syrts abound,
 And now on land, in waters now are found.
 Slimy Chelyders the parch'd earth disdain,
 And trace a reeking furrow on the plain.

The spotted cæcylis, rich in various dyes,
 Shoots in a line, and forth directly flies:
 Not Theban marbles are so gaily dress'd,
 Nor with such party colour'd beauties grac'd
 Safe in his earthly hue and dusky skin,
 Th' Amudites lurks in the sands unseen:
 The swimmer there the crystal stream pollutes;
 And swift through air the flying javelin shoots.
 The scytale, ere yet the spring returns,
 There casts her coat; and there the Dipias burm
 The Amphihæna doubly arm'd appears,
 At either end a threatening head she rears
 Rais'd on his active tail the pæras stands,
 And, as he passes furrows up the sands.
 The prester by his forming jaws is known;
 The seps invades the flesh and firmer bone,
 Dissolves the mass of man, and melts his fabric
 down.

The basilisk, with dreadful hissings heard,
 And from afar by every serpent fear'd,
 To distance drives the vulgar, and remains
 The lonely monarch of the desert plains.

And you, ye dragons of the scaly race,
 Whom glittering gold and shining armours grace

other nations harmless are you found, his guardian genii and protectors own'd;
Afric only are you fatal; there,
wide-expanded wings, sublime you rear your dreadful forms, and drive the yielding air, he lowing kine in droves you chase, and cull me master of the herd, some mighty bull:
round his stubborn sides your tails you twist,
force compress, and burst his brawny chest.
or elephants are by their larger size cure, but, with the rest, become your prize.
iffles in your might, you all invade,
ad for destruction need not poison's aid.
Thus, though a thousand plagues around them
spread,

wearry march the hardy soldiers tread, [led,
rough thirst, through toil and death, by Cato their chief with pious grief and deep regret, ch moment mourns his friends untimely fate;
ondering, he sees some small, some trivial wound,
tend a valiant Roman on the ground.

ulus, a noble youth of Tyrrhene blood,
ho bore the standard, on a Dipfas trode;
ackward the wrathful serpent bent her head,
ad, fell with rage, th' unheeded wrong repay'd.
arce did some little mark of hurt remain,
ad scarce he found some little sense of pain;
or could he yet the danger doubt, nor fear
at death, with all its terrors, threaten'd there.
hen lo! unseen, the secret venom spreads,
ad every nobler part at once invades;
rft flames consume the marrow and the brain,
ad the scorch'd entrails rage with burning pain;
on his heart the thirsty poisons prey,
ad drain the sacred juice of life away.

o kindly floods of moisture bathe his tongue,
t cleaving to the parched roof it hung;
o trickling drops distil, no dewy sweat,
o ease his weary limbs, and cool the raging heat.
or could he weep; ev'n grief could not supply
reams for the mournful office of his eye, ie never-failing source of tears was dry.
antic he flies, and with a careless hand
rils the neglected eagle on the sand.
or hears, nor minds, his pitying chief's command.

r springs he seeks, he digs, he proves the ground,
r springs in vain, explores the desert round,
r cooling draughts, which might their aid im-
part,

ad quench the burning venom in his heart.
ng'd in the Tanais, the Rhone, or Po, Nile, whose wandering streams, o'er Egypt
flow,

ll would he rage, still with the fever glow.
ie scorching climate to his fate conspires,
ad Libya's sun assists the Dipfas' fires.
w everywhere for drink, in vain he pries,
ow to the Syrtes and briny seas he flies;
ie briny seas delight, but seem not to suffice.
or yet he knows what secret plague he nurs'd,
or found the poison, but believ'd it thirst.
thirst, and thirst alone, he still complains,
ving for thirst, he tears his swelling veins;
om every vessel drains a crimson flood,
ad quaffs in greedy draughts his vital blood.
This Cato saw, and straight, without delay,
mmands his legions on to urge their way;

Nor give th' inquiring soldier time to know
What deadly deeds a fatal thirst could do.

But soon a fate more sad, with new surprize,
From the first object turns their wondering eyes.
Wretched Sabellus by a seps was stung;
Fix'd to his leg, with deadly death, it hung:
Sudden the soldier shook it from the wound,
Transfix'd and nail'd it to the barren ground.
Of all the dire destructive serpent race,
None have so much of death, though none are less.
For straight, around the part, the skin withdrew,

The flesh and shrinking sinews backward flew,
And left the naked bones expos'd to view.
The spreading poisons all the parts confound,
And the whole body sinks within the wound.
The brawny thighs no more their muscles boast,
But, melting, all in liquid filth are lost;
The well-knit groin above, and ham below,
Mix'd in one putrid stream, together flow;
The firm peritonæum, rent in twain,
No more the pressing entrails could sustain,
It yields, and forth they fall, at once they gush
again.

Small relics of the mouldering mass were left,
At once of substance, as of form bereft;
Dissolv'd the whole in liquid poison ran,
And to a nauseous puddle shrunk the man.
Then burst the rigid nerves, the manly breast,
And all the texture of the heaving chest;
Resistless way the conquering venom made,
And secret nature was at once display'd;
Her sacred privacies all open lie
To each profane, inquiring, vulgar eye.
Then the broad shoulders did the pest invade,
Then o'er the valiant arms and neck it spread;
Last sunk, the mind's imperial seat, the head.
So snows dissolv'd by southern breezes run,
So melts the wax before the noon-day sun.
Nor ends the wonder here; though flames are known

To waste the flesh, yet still they spare the bone:
Here none were left, no least remains were seen;
No marks to show, that once the man had been.
Of all the plagues which curse the Libyan land,
(If death and mischief may a crown demand)
Serpent, the palm is thine. Though others may

Boast of their power to force the soul away,
Yet soul and body both become thy prey.

A fate of different-kind Nasidius found,
A burning pester gave the deadly wound;
And straight a sudden flame began to spread,
And paint his visage with a glowing red.
With swift expansion swells the bloated skin,
Nought but an undistinguish'd mass is seen,
While the fair human form lies lost within.
The puffy poison spreads, and leaves around,
Till all the man is in the monster drown'd.
No more the steely plate his breast can stay,
But yields, and gives the bursting poison way.
Not waters so, when fire the rage supplies,
Bubbling on heaps, in boiling cauldrons rise:
Nor swells the stretching canvas half so fast,
When the sails gather all the driving blast,
Strain the tough yards, and bow the lofty mast.

The various parts no longer now are known,
 One healess formless heap remains alone ;
 The feather'd kind avoid the fatal feast,
 And leave it deadly to some hungry beast ;
 With horror seiz'd, his sad companions too,
 In haste from the nubbury'd carcass flew ;
 Look'd back, but fled again, for still the monster grew.

But fertile Libya still new plagues supplies,
 And to more horrid monsters turns their eyes.
 Deeply the fierce hæmorrhoids impress
 Her fatal teeth on Tullus' valiant breast :
 The noble youth, with virtue's love inspir'd,
 Her, in her Cato, follow'd and admir'd ;
 Mov'd by his great example, vow'd to share,
 With him, each chance of that disastrous war.
 And as when mighty Rome's spectators meet
 In the full theatre's capacious seat,
 At once, by secret pipes and channels fed,
 Rich tinctures gush from every antique head ;
 At once ten thousand saffron currents flow,
 And rain their odours on the crowd below :
 So the warm blood at once from every part
 Ran purple poison down, and drain'd the fainting heart.

Blood falls for tears, and o'er his mournful face
 The ruddy drops their tainted passage trace :
 Where'er the liquid juices find a way,
 There streams of blood, there crimson rivers stray :
 His mouth and gushing nostrils pour a flood,
 And ev'n the pores ooze out the trickling blood ;
 In the red deluge all the parts lie drown'd,
 And the whole body seems one bleeding wound.

Lævus, a colder aspic bit, and straight
 His blood forgot to flow, his heart to beat ;
 Thick shades upon his eye-lids seem'd to creep,
 And lock him fast in everlasting sleep :
 No sense of pain, no torment did he know,
 But sunk in slumbers to the shades below.

Not swifter death attends the noxious juice,
 Which dire Sabæan acenites produce.
 Well may their crafty priests divine, and well
 The fate which they themselves can cause, foretel.

Fierce from afar a darting javelin shot,
 (For such, the serpent's name has Afric taught)
 And through unhappy Paulus' temples flew ;
 Nor poison, but a wound, the soldier flew.
 No flight so swift, so rapid none we know,
 Stones for the sounding sling, compar'd, are slow.

And the shaft loiters from the Scythian bow.
 A basifick bold Murrus kill'd in vain,
 And nail'd it dying to the sandy plain ;
 Along the spear the sliding venom ran,
 And sudden, from the weapon, seiz'd the man :
 His hand first touch'd, ere it his arm invade,
 Soon he divides it with his shining blade :
 The serpent's force by sad example taught,
 With his lost hand, his ransom'd life he bought.

Who that the scorpion's insect form surveys,
 Would think that ready death his call obeys ?
 Threatening, he rears his knotty tail on high ;
 The vast Orion thus he doom'd to die,
 And fix'd him, his proud trophy in the sky.

Or could we the salpuga's anger dread,
 Or fear upon her little cell to tread ?

Yet she the fatal threads of life commands,
 And quickens oft the Stygian sisters' hands.

Pursu'd by dangers, thus they pass'd away
 The restless night, and thus the cheerless day ;
 Ev'n earth itself they fear'd, the common bed,
 Where each lay down to rest his weary head :
 There no kind trees their leafy couches strow,
 The sands no turf nor mossy beds bestow ;
 But tir'd, and fainting with the tedious toil,
 Expos'd they sleep upon the fatal soil.
 With vital heat they brood upon the ground,
 And breathe a kind attractive vapour round.
 While chill, with colder night's ungentle air,
 To man's warm breast his snaky foes repair,
 And find, ungrateful guests, a shelter there.
 Thence fresh supplies of poisonous rage return
 And fiercely with recruited deaths they burn.

Restore, thus sadly oft the soldier said,
 Restore Emathia's plains, from whence we fled
 This grace, at least, ye cruel gods afford,
 That we may fall beneath the hostile sword.
 The Dipsa's here in Cæsar's triumph share,
 And fell Cerafæe wage his civil war.
 Or let us haste away, press farther on,
 Urge our bold passage to the burning zone,
 And die by those ethereal flames alone.
 Afric, thy deserts we accuse no more,
 Nor blame, oh nature ! thy creating power :
 From man thou wisely didst these wilds divide
 And for thy monsters here alone provide ;
 A region waste and void of all beside.
 Thy prudent care forbade the barren field
 The yellow harvest's ripe increase to yield ;
 Man and his labours well thou didst deny,
 And bad'st him from the land of poisons fly.
 We, impious we, the bold irruption made ;
 We, this the serpent's world, did first invade.
 Take then our lives a forfeit for the crime,
 Whoe'er thou art, that rul'st this cursed clime
 What god soe'er, that only lov'st to reign,
 And dost the commerce of mankind disdain ;
 Who, to secure thy horrid empire's bound,
 Had fix'd the Syrts, and torrid realms around Here the wild waves, there the flames scoot
 breath,

And fill'd the dreadful middle space with de-behold, to thy retreats our arms we bear,
 And with Rome's civil rage profane thee here
 Ev'n to thy inmost seats we strive to go,
 And seek the limits of the world to know.
 Perhaps more dire events attend us yet ;
 New deaths, new monsters, still we go to meet
 Perhaps to those far seas our journey bends,
 Where to the waves the burning sun descends
 Where, rushing headlong down heaven's side
 All red he plunges in the hissing deep.
 Low sinks the pole, declining from its height
 And seems to yield beneath the rapid weight

Nor farther lands from fame herself are
 But Mauritanian Juba's realms alone.
 Perhaps, while, rashly daring, on we pass,
 Fate may discover some more dreadful place
 Till, late repenting, we may wish in vain
 To see these serpents, and these sands again
 One joy at least do these sad regions give,
 Ev'n here we know 'tis possible to live :
 That, by the native plagues, we may perce

Or ask we now for Asia's gentler day,
 Or now for European suns we pray;
 See, Africa, now, thy absence we deplore,
 And sadly think we ne'er shall see thee more.
 Why, in what part, what climate, art thou lost?
 Here have we left Cyrene's happy frost?
 Old skies we felt, and frosty winter there,
 More vile than summer suns are raging here,
 And break the laws of the well-order'd year.
 Southward, beyond earth's limits, are we pass'd,
 And Rome, at length, beneath our feet is plac'd.
 Ours are ye gods, one pleasure ere we die,
 To our harder fate this only joy,
 That Cæsar may pursue, and follow where we fly.

Impatient, thus the soldier oft complains,
 And seems, by telling, to relieve his pains.
 And most the virtues of their matchless chief
 Inspire new strength, to bear with every grief;
 I night, with careful thoughts and watchful
 eyes,

On the bare sands expos'd the hero lies;
 Every place alike, in every hour,
 Ours his ill fortune, and defies her power.
 Sweary'd still, his common care attends
 Every fate, and cheers his dying friends:
 Ith ready haste at each sad call he flies,
 And more than health, or life itself, supplies;
 Ith virtue's noblest precepts arms their souls,
 And ev'n their sorrows, like his own, controuls.
 Here'er he comes, no signs of grief are shown;
 Ith, an unmanly weakness, they disown,
 And scorn to sigh, or breathe one parting
 groan.

Ill urging on his pious cares, he strove
 To sense of outward evils to remove;
 And, by his presence, taught them to disdain
 The feeble rage and impotence of pain.
 It now, so many toils and dangers past,
 His fortune grew kind, and brought relief at last.
 To all who scorning Africa's sun endure,
 One like the swarthy Pfyllians are secure.
 He'll'd in the lore of powerful herbs and charms,
 And tem, nor the serpent's tooth, nor poison
 harms;

Or do they thus in arts alone excel,
 That nature too their blood has temper'd well,
 And taught with vital force the venom to repel.

Ith healing gifts, and privileges grac'd,
 Still in the land of serpents were they plac'd;
 And with the dreadful tyrant's death, they have,

And border safely on his realm, the grave.
 Which is their confidence in true-born blood,
 That oft with aips they prove their doubtful
 brood;

When wanton wives their jealous rage inflame,
 A new-born infant clears or damns the dame;
 Subject to the wrathful serpent's wound,
 The mother's shame is by the danger found;
 That if unhurt the fearless infant laugh;
 The wife is honest, and the husband safe.

When Jove's bird, on some tall cedar's head,
 As a new race of generous eaglets bred,
 Hile yet unplum'd, within the nest they lie,
 A cry she turns them to the eastern sky;

Then if, unequal to the god of day,
 Abash'd they shrink, and shun the potent ray.
 She spurns them forth, and casts them quite
 away;

But if with daring eyes unmov'd they gaze,
 Withstand the light, and bear the golden blaze;
 Tender the broods them with a parent's love,
 The future servants of her master Jove.
 Nor safe themselves, alone, the Pfyllians are,
 But to their guests extend their friendly care.
 First, where the Roman camp is mark'd, around Circling they pass, then chanting, charm the
 ground,

And chafe the serpents with the mystic sound.
 Beyond the farthest tents rich fires they build,
 That healthy medicinal odours yield;
 There foreign galbanum dissolving fries,
 And crackling flames from humble wall-wort
 rise;

There tamarisk, which no green leaf adorns,
 And there the spicy Syrian cistus burns.
 There centory supplies the wholesome flame,
 That from Thessalian Chiron takes its name;
 The gummy larch-tree, and the thapso there,
 Wound-wort and maiden-weed perfume the air.
 There the large branches of the long-liv'd hart,
 With southern-wood, their odours strong impart.
 The monsters of the laud, the serpents fell,
 Fly far away, and shun the hostile smell.
 Securely thus they pass the nights away;

And if they chance to meet a wound by day,
 The Pfyllian artists straight their skill display.
 Then strives the leach the power of charms to
 show,

And bravely combats with the deadly foe:
 With spittle first, he marks the part around,
 And keeps the poison prisoner in the wound;
 Then sudden he begins the magic song,
 And rolls the numbers hafty o'er his tongue;
 Swift he runs on; nor pauses once for breath,
 To stop the progress of approaching death:
 He fears the cure might suffer by delay,
 And life be lost but for a moment's stay.

Thus oft, though deep within the veins it lies,
 By magic numbers chas'd, the mischief flies:
 But if it hear too slow, if still it stay,
 And scorn the potent charmer to obey;
 With forceful lips he fastens on the wound,
 Drains out, and spits the venom to the ground.
 Thus, by long use and oft experience taught,
 He knows from whence his hurt the patient got:
 He proves the part through which the poison pass'd,
 And knows each various serpent by the taste.

The warriors thus reliev'd, amidst their pains,
 Held on their passage through the desert plains:
 And now the silver empress of the night
 Had lost, and twice regain'd her borrow'd light,
 While Cato, wandering o'er the wasteful field,
 Patient in all his labours, beheld.
 At length condens'd in clods the sands appear,
 And show a better soil and country near:
 Now from afar thin tufts of trees arise,
 And scattering cottages delight their eyes.

But when the soldier once beheld again
 The raging lion shake his horrid mane,
 What hopes of better lands his soul possess?
 What joys he felt, to view the dreadful beast!

Leptis at last they reach'd, that nearest lay,
There free from storms, and the sun's parching
ray,

At ease they pass'd the wintery year away.

When fated with the joys which slaughters yield,
Retiring Cæsar left Emathia's field;

His other cares laid by, he sought alone

To trace the footsteps of his flying son.

Led by the guidance of reporting fame,

First to the Thracian Hellespont he came.

Here young Leander perish'd in the flood,

And here the tower of mournful Hero stood:

Here, with a narrow stream, the flowing tide,

Europe, from wealthy Asia, does divide.

From hence the curious victor passing o'er,

Admiring sought the fam'd Sigæan shore.

There might he tombs of Grecian chiefs behold,

Renown'd in sacred verse by bards of old.

There the long ruins of the walls appear'd,

Once by great Neptune, and Apollo, rear'd:

There stood old Troy, a venerable name;

For ever consecrate to deathless fame.

Now blasted mossy trunks with branches fear,

Brambles and weeds, a loathsome forest rear;

Where once, in palaces of regal state,

Old Priam and the Trojan princes sat.

Where temples once, on lofty columns borne,

Majestic, did the wealthy town adorn,

All rude, all waste, and desolate is laid,

And even the ruin'd ruins are decay'd.

Here Cæsar did each story'd place survey,

Here saw the rock, where, Neptune to obey,

Hesione was bound the monster's prey.

Here, in the covert of a sacred grove,

The blest Anchises clasp'd the queen of love:

Here fair Oenone play'd, here stood the cave

Where Paris once the fatal judgment gave;

Here lovely Ganymede to heaven was borne,

Each rock, and every tree, recording tales adorn.

Here all that does of Xanthus' stream remain,

Creeps a small brook along the dusty plain.

Whilst careless and securely on they pass,

The Phrygian guide forbids to press the grass;

'This place, he said, for ever sacred keep,

For here the sacred bones of Hector sleep.

Then warns him to observe, where, rudely cast,

Disjointed stones lay broken and defac'd:

Here his last fate, he cries, did Priam prove;

Here, on this altar of Hercæan Jove.

O poetry divine! O sacred song!

To thee, bright fame and length of days belong;

Thou, goddess! thou eternity canst give,

And bid secure the mortal hero live.

Nor, Cæsar, thou disdain, that I rehearse

Thee, and thy wars, in no ignoble verse;

Since, if in aught the Latian muse excel,

My name, and thine, immortal I foretell;

Eternity our labours shall reward,

And Lucan flourish, like the Grecian bard;

My numbers shall to latest times convey

The tyrant Cæsar, and Pharsalia's day.

When long the chief his wondering eyes had cast

Of ancient monuments of ages past;

Of living turf an altar straight he made,

Then on the fire rich gums and incense laid,

And thus, successful in his vows, he pray'd.

Ye shades divine! who keep this sacred place,
And thou, Æneas, author of my race!

Ye powers, whoe'er from burning Troy did come

Domestic gods of Alba, and of Rome,

Who still preserv'd your ruin'd country's name,

And on your altars guard the Phrygian flame:

And thou, bright maid, who art to men deny'd;

Pallas, who dost thy sacred privilege confide

To Rome, and in her inmost temple hide;

Hear, and auspicious to my vows incline,

To me, the greatest of the Julian line:

Prosper my future ways; and, lo! I vow

Your ancient state and honours to bestow;

Ausonian hands shall Phrygian walls restore,

And Rome repay what Troy conferr'd before.

He said; and hastened to his fleet away,

Swift to repair the loss of this delay.

Up sprung the wind, and with a freshening gale

The kind north-west fill'd every swelling sail;

Light o'er the foamy waves the navy flew,

Till Asia's shores and Rhodes no more they view

Six times the night her fable round had made,

The seventh now passing on, the chief survey'd

High Pharos shining through the gloomy shade;

The coast descri'd, he waits the rising day,

Then safely to the port directs his way.

There wide with crowds o'erspread he sees the
shore,

And echoing hears the loud tumultuous roar.

Diffident of his fate, he gives command

To stand aloof, nor trust the doubted land.

When lo! a messenger appears, to bring

A fatal pledge of peace from Ægypt's king:

Hide in a veil, and closely cover'd o'er,

Pompey's pale visage in his hand he bore.

An impious orator the tyrant sends,

Who thus, with fitting words, the monstrous commends.

Hail, first and greatest of the Roman name!

In power most mighty, most renown'd in fame

Hail! rightly now, the world's unrivall'd lord!

That benefit thy Pharian friends afford.

My king bestows the prize thy arms have fought

For which Pharsalia's field in vain was fought.

No task remains for future labours now;

The civil wars are finish'd at a blow.

To heal Thessalia's ruins, Pompey fled

To us for succour, and by us lies dead.

Thee, Cæsar, with this costly pledge we buy,

Thee to our friendship, with this victim, tie.

Ægypt's proud sceptre freely then receive,

Whate'er the fertile flowing Nile can give:

Accept the treasures which this deed has spar'd

Accept the benefit, without reward.

Deign, Cæsar! deign to think my royal lord

Worthy the aid of thy victorious sword:

In the first rank of greatness shall he stand;

He, who could Pompey's destiny command

Nor frown disdainful on the proffer'd spoil,

Because not dearly bought with blood and toil

But think, oh think, what sacred ties were brot

How friendship pleaded, and how nature spok

That Pompey, who restor'd Auletes' crown,

The father's ancient guest was murder'd by son.

Then judge thyself, or ask the world and fame,

If services like these deserve a name.

gods and men the daring deed abhor,
think, for that reason, Cæsar owes the more;
his blood for thee, though not by thee, was spilt;

thou hast the benefit, and we the guilt.

He said, and straight the horrid gift unveil'd,
and stedfast to the gazing victor held.
hang'd was the face, deform'd with death all
o'er,

pale, ghastly, wan, and stain'd with clotted gore,
unlike the Pompey Cæsar knew before.

He, nor at first disdain'd the fatal boon,
nor started from the dreadful sight too soon.

While his eyes the murderous scene endure, doubting they view; but shun it, when secure.

At length he stood convinc'd, the deed was done;
he saw 'twas safe to mourn his lifeless son:

And straight the ready tears, that said till now,
wift at command with pious semblance flow:

As if detesting, from the fight he turns,
and groaning with a heart triumphant mourns.

He fears his impious thought should be descry'd,
and seeks in tears the swelling joy to hide.

Thus the curst Pharian tyrant's hopes were crost,
thus all the merit of his gift was lost;

Thus for the murder Cæsar's thanks were spar'd;
he chose to mourn it, rather than reward.

He who, relentless, through Pharsalia rode,
and on the senate's mangled fathers trode;

He who, without one pitying sigh, beheld
The blood and slaughter of that woeful field;

Thee, murder'd Pompey, could not ruthless see,
but pay'd the tribute of his grief to thee.

Oh mystery of fortune, and of fate!
Oh ill-conforted piety and hate!

And canst thou, Cæsar, then thy tears afford
To the dire object of thy vengeful sword?

Didst thou, for this, devote his hostile head,
'urive him living, to bewail him dead?

Could not the gentle ties of kindred move?
Wert thou not touch'd with thy sad Julia's love?

And weep'st thou now? dost thou these tears provide

To win the friends of Pompey to thy side?

Perhaps, with secret rage thou dost repine,
That he should die by any hand but thine:

Hence fall thy tears, that Ptolemy has done
A murder, due to Cæsar's hand alone.

What secret springs foe'er these currents know,
They ne'er, by piety, were taught to flow.

Or didst thou kindly, like a careful friend,
'urive him flying, only to defend?

Well was his fate deny'd to thy command!
Well was he snatch'd by fortune from thy hand!

Fortune withheld this glory from thy name, forbade thy power to save, and spar'd the Roman
shame.

Still he goes on to vent his griefs aloud,
And artful, thus, deceives the easy crowd.

Hence from my sight, nor let me see thee
more;

Haste, to thy king his fatal gift restore.

At Cæsar have you aim'd the deadly blow,

And wounded Cæsar worse than Pompey now;

The cruel hands by which this deed was done,

Have torn away the wreaths my sword had won.

That noblest prize this civil war could give,
The victor's right to bid the vanquish'd live.

Then tell your king, his gift shall be repaid;

I would have sent him Cleopatra's head;

But that he wishes to behold her dead.

How has he dar'd, this Ægypt's petty lord,

To join his murders to the Roman sword?

Did I, for this, in heat of war, disdain

With noblest blood Emathia's purple plain,

To license Ptolemy's pernicious reign?

Did I with Pompey scorn the world to share?

And can I an Ægyptian partner bear?

In vain the warlike trumpet's dreadful sound

Has rous'd the universe to arms around;

Vain was the shock of nations, if they own,

Now, any power on earth but mine alone.

If hither to your impious shores I came,

'Twas to assert at once my power and fame;

Left the pale fury envy should have said,

Your crimes I damn'd not, or your arms I fled.

Nor think to fawn before me and deceive;

I know the welcome you prepare to give.

The Pharsalia's field preserves me from your hate,

And guards the victor's head from Pompey's
fate.

What ruin, gods! attended on my arms,

What dangers unforeseen! what waiting harms!

Pompey, and Rome, and exile, were my fear;

See yet a fourth, see Ptolemy appear!

The boy-king's vengeance loiters in the rear.

But we forgive his youth, and bid him know

Pardon and life's the most we can bestow.

For you, the meaner herd, with rites divine,

And pious cares, the warrior's head enshrine:

Atone with penitence the injur'd shade,

And let his ashes in their urn be laid;

Pleas'd, let his ghost lamenting Cæsar know,

And feel my presence here, ev'n in the realms
below.

Oh, what a day of joy was lost to Rome,

When hapless Pompey did to Ægypt come!

When, to a father and a friend unjust,

He rather chose the Pharian boy to trust.

The wretched world that loss of peace shall rue,

Of peace, which from our friendship might ensue:

But thus the gods their hard decrees have
made;

In vain, for peace, and for repose, I pray'd;

In vain implor'd, that wars and rage might end,

That, suppliant-like, I might to Pompey bend,

Beg him to live, and once more be my friend.

I then had my labours met their just reward,

And, Pompey, thou in all my glories shar'd;

Then, jars and enmities all past and gone,

In pleasure had the peaceful years roll'd on;

All should forgive, to make the joy complete;

Thou shouldst thy harder fate, and Rome my wars forget.

Fast falling still the tears, thus spoke the chief,
But found no partner in the specious grief.

Oh, glorious liberty! when all shall dare
A face, unlike their mighty lord, to wear!

Each in his breast the rising sorrow kept,
And thought it safe to laugh, though Cæsar wept.

B O O K X.

THE ARGUMENT.

CÆSAR, upon his arrival in Ægypt, finds Ptolemy engaged in a quarrel with his sister Cleopatra whom, at the instigation of Photinus, and his other evil counsellors, he had deprived of her share in the kingdom, and imprisoned: she finds means to escape, comes privately to Cæsar, and puts herself under his protection, Cæsar interposes in the quarrel, and reconciles them. They in return entertain him with great magnificence and luxury at the royal palace in Alexandria. At this feast Cæsar, who at his first arrival had visited the tomb of Alexander the Great, and whatever else was curious in that city, inquires of the chief priest, Achoreus, and is by him informed of the course of the Nile, its stated increase and decrease, with the several causes that had been till that time assigned for it. In the meantime Photinus writes privately to Achilles, to draw the army to Alexandria and surprize Cæsar; this he immediately performs, and besieges the palace. But Cæsar, having seen the city and many of the Ægyptian ships on fire, escapes to the island and tower of Pharos, carrying the young king and Photinus, whom he still kept in his power, with him; there having discovered the treachery of Photinus, he puts him to death. At the same time Arsinoë, Ptolemy's younger sister, having by the advice of her tutor, the eunuch Ganymedes, assumed the regal authority, orders Achilles to be killed likewise, and renews the war against Cæsar. Upon the mole between Pharos and Alexandria he is encompassed by the enemy, and very near being slain, but at length breaks through, leaps into the sea, and with his usual courage and good fortune swims in safety to his own fleet.

Soon as the victor reach'd the guilty shore,
 Yet red with stains of murder'd Pompey's gore,
 New toils his still prevailing fortune met,
 By impious Ægypt's genius hard beset.
 The strife was now, if this detested land
 Should own imperial Rome's supreme command,
 Or Cæsar bleed beneath some Pharian hand. }
 But thou, oh Pompey! thy diviner shade,
 Came timely to this cruel father's aid;
 Thy influence the deadly sword withstood, [blood.
 Nor suffer'd Nile, again, to blust' with Roman Safe in the pledge of Pompey, slain so late,
 From Cæsar, enters Alexandria's gate:
 Eris on high the long procession lead;
 The warrior and his armed train succeed.
 Meanwhile, loud-murmuring, the nois'd throng
 Behold his faces borne in state along;
 Of innovations fiercely they complain,
 And scornfully reject the Roman reign.
 Soon saw the chief th' untoward bent they take,
 And found that Pompey fell not for his sake.
 Wisely, howe'er, he did his secret fear,
 And held his way with well-dissembled cheer.
 Careless, he runs their gods and temples o'er,
 The monuments of Macedonian power;
 But neither god, nor shrine, nor mystic rite,
 Their city, nor her walls, his soul delight:
 Their caves beneath his fancy chiefly led,
 To search the gloomy mansions of the dead:
 Thither with secret pleasure he descends,
 And to the guide's recording tale attends,
 There the vain youth who made the world his
 That prosperous robber, Alexander, lies. [prize,
 When pitying death, at length, and freed mankind,
 To sacred rest his bones were here consign'd:
 His bones, that better had been toss'd and hurl'd,
 With just contempt, around the injur'd world,
 But fortune spar'd the dead; and partial fate,
 For ages fix'd his Pharian empire's date.
 If ere our long-lost liberty return,
 That carcase is reserv'd for public scorn:

Now, it remains a monument to confest,
 How one proud man could lord it o'er the rest.
 To Macedon, a corner of the earth,
 The vast ambitious spoiler ow'd his birth:
 There, soon, he scorn'd his father's humbler reign
 And view'd his vanquish'd Athens with disdain.
 Driv'n headlong on, by fate's resistless force,
 Through Asia's realms he took his dreadful
 course:

His ruthless sword laid human nature waste,
 And desolation follow'd where he pass'd.
 Red Ganges blust'rd, and fam'd Euphrates' flood,
 With Persian this, and that with Indian blood.
 Such is the bolt which angry Jove employs,
 When, undistinguishing, his wrath destroys:
 Such to mankind, portentous meteors rise,
 Trouble the gazing earth, and blast the skies.
 Nor flame, nor flood, his restless rage withstand,
 Nor Syrtis unfaithful, nor the Libyan sand:
 O'er waves unknown he meditates his way,
 And seeks the boundless empire of the sea;
 Ev'n to the utmost west he would have gone,
 Where Tethys' lap receives the setting fun;
 Around each pole his circuit would have made,
 And drunk from secret Nile's remotest head,
 When nature's hand is wild ambition stay'd.
 With him, that power his pride had lov'd so well
 His monstrous universal empire, fell:
 No heir, no just successor left behind,
 Eternal wars he to his friends assign'd,
 To tear the world, and scramble for mankind.
 Yet still he dy'd the master of his fame,
 And Parthia to the last rever'd his name:
 The haughty East from Greece receiv'd her doom,
 With lower homage than the pays to Rome.
 Though from the frozen pole our empire run,
 Far as the journeys of the southern fun;
 In triumph though our conquering eagles fly,
 Where'er soft zephyrs fan the western sky;
 Still to the haughty Parthian must we yield,
 And mourn the loss of Carræ's dreadful field;

I'll shall the race untam'd their pride avow,
 And lift those heads aloft which Pella taught to bow,
 From Casium now the beardless monarch came
 To quench the kindling Alexandria's flame.
 'Unwarlike rabble soon the tumult cease,
 And he, their king, remains the pledge of peace;
 When veil'd in secrecy, and dark disguise,
 Mighty Cæsar Cleopatra flies.
 Won by persuasive gold, and rich reward,
 Her keeper's hand her prison-gates unbarr'd,
 And a light galley for her flight prepar'd,
 O fatal form! thy native Ægypt shame!
 O lewd perdition of the Latian name!
 How wert thou doom'd our furies to increase,
 And be what Helen was to Troy and Greece!
 When with an host, from vile Canopus led,
 Thy vengeance aim'd at great Augustus' head;
 When thy shrill timbrel's sound was heard from far,
 And Rome herself shook at the coming war;
 When doubtful fortune, near Leucadias' strand,
 Pended long the world's supreme command,
 And almost gave it to a woman's hand.
 With daring courage swells her wanton heart,
 While Roman lovers Roman fires impart:
 Growing alike with greatness and delight,
 She rose still bolder from each guilty night.
 She blames me, hapless Anthony, no more,
 But and undone by fatal beauty's power;
 Cæsar, long injur'd to rage and arms,
 Omits his stubborn heart to those soft charms;
 Seeking from Emathia's dreadful plain,
 And horrid with the blood of thousands slain,
 Sinks lascivious in a lewd embrace,
 While Pompey's ghastly spectre haunts the place:
 Julia's chasteest name he can forget,
 And raise her, brethren of a bastard set;
 Indolently he permits, from far,
 And Cato to revive the fainting war;
 He can give away the fruits of blood,
 And fight to make a strumpet's title good.
 To him disdaining, or to feign a tear,
 Spread her artfully dishevell'd hair,
 Comely sorrow's decent garb array'd,
 And trusting to her beauty's certain aid,
 Words like these began the Pharian maid:
 O loyal-birth and the Lagæan name,
 Thy favouring pity, greatest Cæsar, claim,
 Myself my wrongs, thus humbly I implore,
 And to her state an injur'd queen restore.
 I shed thy juster influence, and rise
 Thy star auspicious to Ægyptian skies.
 'Tis it strange for Pharos to behold
 A woman's temples bound with regal gold:
 My laws our softer sex's powers restrain,
 And undistinguish'd equally we reign.
 Unchaste my royal father's will to read,
 I learn what dying Ptolemy decreed;
 My just pretensions stand recorded there,
 My brother's empire and his bed to share.
 'Tis would the gentle boy his love refuse,
 My curs'd Photinus leave him free to choose;
 'Tis now in vassalage he holds his crown,
 And acts by power and passions not his own.
 'Tis my soul on empire fondly set,
 'Tis could with ease my royal rights forget;
 'Tis thou the throne from vile dishonour save,
 'Tis store the master, and depose the slave,

What scorn, what pride, his haughty bosom swell
 Since, at his bidding, Roman Pompey fell;
 (Ev'n now, which oh! ye righteous gods avert,
 His sword is level'd at thy noble heart)
 Thou and mankind are wrong'd, when he shall
 Or in thy prize, or in thy crime to share. [dare,
 In vain her words of warrior's ears assail'd,
 Had not her face beyond her tongue prevail'd;
 From thence resistless eloquence she draws,
 And with the sweet persuasion gains her cause.
 His stubborn heart dissolves in loose delight,
 And grants her suit, for one lascivious night.
 Ægypt and Cæsar, now, in peace agreed,
 Riot and feasting to the war succeed:
 The wanton queen displays her wealthy store,
 Excess unknown to frugal Rome before.
 Rich, as some fane by javin's zealots rear'd,
 For the proud banquet, stood the hall prepar'd:
 Thick golden plates the latent beams infold,
 And the high roof was fretted o'er with gold:
 Of solid marble all, the walls were made,
 And onyx ev'n the meaner floor inlay'd;
 While porphyry and agat, round the court,
 In massy columns, rose a proud support.
 Of solid ebony each post was wrought,
 From swarthy Meroë profusely brought:
 With ivory was the entrance crusted o'er,
 And polish'd tortoise hid each shining door:
 While on the cloudy spots enchas'd was seen
 The lively emerald's never-fading green.
 Within, the royal beds and couches stonè,
 Beamy and bright with many a costly stone.
 In glowing purple rich the coverings lie;
 Twice had they drunk the noblest Tyrian dye;
 Others, as Pharian artists have the skill
 To mix the party-colour'd web at will,
 With winding trails of various silks were made,
 Where branching gold set off the rich brocade.
 Around, of every age, and choicer form,
 Huge crowds, whole nations of attendants swarm:
 Some wait in yellow rings of golden hair,
 The vanquish'd Rhine show'd Cæsar none so fair:
 Others were seen with swarthy woolly heads,
 Black as eternal night's unchanging shades,
 Here squealing eunuchs, a dismember'd train,
 Lament the loss of genial joys in vain:
 There nature's noblest work, a youthful band,
 In the full pride of blooming manhood stand.
 All duteous on the Pharian princes wait,
 The princes round the board recline in state,
 With mighty Cæsar, more than princes great. }
 On ivory feet the citron board was wrought,
 Richer than those with captive Juba brought.
 With every wile ambitious beauty tries
 To fix the daring Roman's heart her prize.
 Her brother's meaner bed and crown the scorns,
 And with fierce hopes for nobler empire burns;
 Collects the mischiefs of her wanton eyes,
 And her faint cheeks with deeper roses dyes,
 Amidst the braidings of her flowing hair,
 The spoils of orient rocks and shells appear;
 Like midnight stars, ten thousand diamonds deck:
 The comely rising of her graceful neck;
 Of wondrous work, a thin transparent lawn
 O'er each soft breast in decency was drawn:
 Where still by turns the parting threads withdrew,
 And all the panting bosom rote to view.

Her robe, her every part, her air, confess
 The power of female skill exhausted in her dress.
 Fantastic madness of unthinking pride,
 To boast that wealth, which prudence strives to
 In civil wars such treasures to display, [hide!
 And tempt a soldier with the hopes of prey!
 Had Cæsar not been Cæsar, impious, bold,
 And ready to lay waste the world for gold,
 But just as all our frugal names of old; }
 This wealth could Curius or Fabricius know,
 Or ruder Cincinnatus from the plough,
 As Cæsar, they had seiz'd the mighty spoil,
 And to enrich their Tiber robb'd the Nile.
 Now, by a train of slaves, the various feast
 In massy gold magnificent was plac'd:
 Whatever earth, or air, or seas afford,
 In vast profusion crowns the labouring board.
 For dainties, Ægypt every land explores,
 Nor spares those very gods her zeal adores.
 The Nile's sweet wave capacious crystals pour,
 And gems of price the grapes delicious store;
 No growth of Mareotis' marshy fields,
 But such as Meroë maturer yields;
 Where the warm sun the racy juice refines,
 And mellows into age the infant wines.
 With wreaths of nard the guests their temples
 And blooming roses of immortal kind; [bind,
 Their dropping locks with oily odours flow,
 Recent from near Arabia, where they grow:
 The vigorous spices breathe their strong perfume,
 And the rich vapour fills the spacious room.

Here Cæsar Pompey's poverty disdain'd, [gain'd
 And learn'd to waste that world his arms had
 He saw th' Ægyptian wealth with greedy eyes,
 And wish'd some fair pretence to seize the prize.
 Sated at length with the prodigious feast,
 Their weary appetites from riot ceas'd;
 When Cæsar, curious of some new delight,
 In conversation sought to wear the night:
 Then gently thus address the good old priest,
 Reclining decent in his linen vest:
 O wife Achoreus! venerable seer!
 Whose age bespeaks thee heaven's peculiar care,
 Say from what origin thy nation sprung,
 What bounderies to Ægypt's land belong?
 What are thy people's customs, and the modes,
 What rites they teach, what forms they give their
 Each ancient sacred mystery explain, [gods?
 Which monumental sculptures yet retain.
 Divinity disdains to be confin'd,
 Fain would be known, and reverenc'd by mankind.
 'Tis said thy holy predecessors thought
 Cecropian Plato worthy to be taught:
 And sure the sages of your schools have known
 No soul more form'd for science than my own.
 Fame of my potent rival's flight, 'tis true,
 To this your Pharian shore my journey drew; }
 Yet know the love of learning led me too.
 In all the hurries of tumultuous war,
 The stars, the gods, and heavens, were still my
 Nor shall my skill to fix the rolling year [care.
 Inferior to Eudoxus' art appear.
 Long has my curious soul, from early youth,
 Toil'd in the noble search of sacred truth:
 Yet still no views have urg'd my ardour more,
 Than Nile's remotest fountain to explore.
 Then say what source the famous stream supplies,
 And bids it at revolving periods rise;

Show me that head from whence, since time b
 The long succession of his waves has run; [gu
 This let me know, and all my toils shall cease,
 The sword be sheath'd, and earth be blest wi
 peace.

The warrior spoke; and thus the seer reply'd
 Nor shalt thou, mighty Cæsar, be deny'd.
 Our fires forbade all, but themselves, to know,
 And kept with care profaner laymen low:
 My soul, I own, more generously inclin'd,
 Would let in daylight to inform the blind.
 Nor would I truth in mysteries restrain, [plain
 But make the gods, their power, and precept
 Would teach their miracles, would spread the praise,
 And well-taught minds to just devotion raise.
 Know then, to all those stars, by nature driven
 In opposition to revolving heaven,
 Some one peculiar influence was given.
 The sun the seasons of the year supplies,
 And bids the evening and the morning rise;
 Commands the planets with superior force,
 And keeps each wandering light to his appointe
 course.

The silver moon o'er briny seas presides,
 And heaves huge ocean with alternate tides.
 Saturn's cold rays in icy climes prevail;
 Mars rules the winds, the storm, and rattling hail
 Where Jove ascends, the skies are still serene;
 And fruitful Venus is the genial queen:
 While every limpid spring, and falling stream,
 Submits to radiant Hermes' reigning beam.
 When in the Crab the humid ruler shines,
 And to the sultry Lion near inclines,
 There fix'd immediate o'er Nile's latent source,
 He strikes the watery stores with ponderous force
 Nor can the flood bright Maia's son withstand,
 But heaves, like ocean, at the moon's command.
 His waves ascend, obedient as the seas,
 And reach their destin'd height by just degrees.
 Nor to its bank returns th' enormous tide,
 Till Libra's equal scales the days and nights d
 Antiquity, unknowing and deceiv'd, [vid
 In dreams of Ethiopian snows believ'd:
 From hills they taught, how melting currents ra
 When the first swelling of the flood began.
 But, ah, how vain the thought! no Boreas there
 In icy bonds constrains the wintery year,
 But sultry southern winds eternal reign,
 And scorching suns the swarthy natives stain.
 Yet more, whatever flood the frost congeals,
 Melts as the genial spring's return he feels:
 While Nile's redundant waters never rise,
 Till the hot Dog inflames the summer skies;
 Nor to his banks his shrinking stream confines,
 Till high in heaven th' autumnal balance shines
 Unlike his watery brethren presides,
 And by new laws his liquid empire guides.
 From dropping seasons no increase he knows,
 Nor feels the fleecy showers of melting snows.
 His river swells not idly, ere the land
 The timely office of his waves demand;
 But knows his lot, by Providence assign'd,
 To cool the season, and refresh mankind.
 Whene'er the Lion sheds his furs around,
 And Cancer burns Syene's parching ground;
 Then, at the prayer of nations, comes the Nile,
 And kindly tempers up the mouldering soil.

Nor from the plains the covering god retreats,
 Till the rude fervour of the skies abates;
 Still Phœbus into milder autumn fades,
 And Meroë projects her lengthening shades.
 Nor let inquiring sceptics ask the cause,
 'Tis Jove's command, and these are nature's laws,

Others of old, as vainly too, have thought
 By western winds the spreading deluge brought;
 While at fix'd times, for many a day, they last,
 Possess the skies, and drive a constant blait;
 Collected clouds united Zephyrs bring,
 And shed huge rains from many a dropping wing, (Spring.)

 To heave the flood, and swell th' abounding }
 Or when the airy brethren's steadfast force
 Resists the rushing current's downward course.
 Backward he rolls indignant, to his head:
 While o'er the plains his heapy waves are spread.

Some have believ'd, that spacious channels go
 Through the dark entrails of the earth below;
 Through these, by turns, revolving rivers pass,
 And secretly pervade the mighty maïs;
 Through these the sun, when from the north he
 And cuts the glowing Ethiopic skies, (flies,
 From distant streams attracts their liquid stores,
 And through Nile's spring th' assembled waters
 pours:

Till Nile, o'er-burden'd, disembogues the load,
 And spew the foamy deluge all abroad.

Sages there have been too, who long maintain'd,
 That ocean's waves through porous earth are drain'd;

'Tis thence their saltness they no longer keep,
 By slow degrees still fresh'ning as they creep:
 Till at a period, Nile receives them all,
 And pours them loosely spreading, as they fall,

The stars, and sun himself, as some have said,
 By exhalations from the deep are fed;
 And when the golden ruler of the day
 Through Cancer's fiery sign pursues his way,
 His beams attract too largely from the sea;
 The refuse of his draughts the nights return,
 And more than fill the Nile's capacious urn.

Were I the dictates of my soul to tell,
 And speak the reasons of the watery swell,
 To Providence the task I should assign,
 And find the cause in workmanship divine.
 Less streams we trace, unerring, to their birth,
 And know the parent earth which brought them
 While this, as early as the world begun, (orth:
 Ran thus, and must continue thus to run;
 And still, unfatom'd by our search, shall own
 No cause, but Jove's commanding will alone.

Nor, Cæsar, is thy search of knowledge strange;
 Well may thy boundless soul desire to range,
 Well may the strive Nile's fountain to explore;
 Since mighty kings have fought the same before;
 Each for the first discoverer would be known,
 And hand, to future times, the secret down;
 But still their powers were exercis'd in vain,
 While latent nature mock'd their fruitless pain.
 Philip's great son, whom Memphis still records,
 The chief of her illustrious scepter'd lords,
 Sent, of his own, a chosen number forth,
 To trace the wondrous stream's mysterious birth.
 Through Æthiopia's plains they journey'd on,
 Till the hot sun oppos'd the burning zone:

There, by the god's resistless beams repell'd,
 An unbeginning stream they still beheld.
 Fierce came Scythians from the eastern dawn;
 On his proud car by captive monarchs drawn;
 His lawless will, impatient of a bound,
 Commanded Nile's hid fountain to be found:
 But sooner much the tyrant might have known,
 Thy fam'd Hesperian Po, or Gallic Rhone, Cambyses too, his daring Persians led,
 Where hoary age makes white the Ethiop's head;
 Till fore distress'd and destitute of food,
 He stain'd his hungry jaws with human blood;
 Till half his host the other half devour'd,
 And left the Nile behind them unexplor'd.

Of thy forbidden head, thou sacred stream,
 Nor fiction dares to speak, nor poets dream.
 Through various nations roll thy waters down,
 By many seen, though fill'd by all unknown;
 No land presumes to claim thee for her own. }
 For me, my humble tale no more shall tell,
 Than what our just records demonstrate well;
 Than God, who bade thee thus mysterious flow,
 Permits the narrow mind of man to know.

Far in the south the daring waters rise,
 As in disdain of Cancer's burning skies;
 Thence, with a downward course, they seek the Direct against the lazy northern wain: (main,
 Unless when, partially, thy winding tide
 Turns to the Libyan or Arabian side.

The distant Seres first behold thee flow;
 Nor yet thy spring the distant Seres know.
 'Midst footy Ethiops, next, thy current roams;
 'The footy Ethiops wonder whence it comes;
 Nature conceals thy infant stream with care,
 Not lets thee, but in majesty, appear.
 Upon thy banks astonish'd nations stand,
 Nor dare assign thy rise, to one peculiar land.
 Exempt from vulgar laws thy waters run,
 Nor take their various seasons from the sun:
 Though high in heaven the fiery solstice stand,
 Obedient winter comes at thy command.
 From pole to pole thy boundless waves extend;
 None ever knows thy rise, nor one thy end.

By Meroë thy stream divided roves,
 And winds encircling round her ebony groves;
 Of fable hue the costly timbers stand,
 Dark as the swarthy natives of the land:
 Yet, though tall woods in wide abundance spread,
 Their leafy tops afford no friendly shade;
 So vertically shine the solar rays,
 And from the lion dart the downward blaze.
 From thence, through deserts dry, thou jour-ney'st on,

Nor shrink'st, diminish'd by the Torrid Zone,
 Strong in thyself, collected, full, and one. }
 Anon, thy streams are parcel'd o'er the plain.
 Anon the scatter'd currents meet again;
 Jointly they flow, where Philæ's gates divide
 Our fertile Ægypt from Arabia's side;
 Thence, with a peaceful, soft descent, they creep,
 And seek, insensibly, the distant deep;
 Till through seven mouths, the famous flood is lost,
 On the last limits of our Pharian coast;
 Where Gaza's isthmus rises, to restrain
 The Erythraean from the midland main.
 Who that beholds thee, Nile! thus gently flow,
 With scarce a wrinkle on thy glassy brow,

Can gulfs thy rage, when rocks resist thy force,
 And hurl thee headlong in thy downward course;
 When spouting cataracts thy torrent pour,
 And nations tremble at the deafening roar;
 When thy proud waves with indignation rise,
 And dash their foamy fury to the skies?
 These wonders reedy Abatos can tell,
 And the tall cliffs that first declare thy swell;
 The cliffs with ignorance of old believ'd
 Thy parent veins, and for thy spring receiv'd.
 From thence huge mountains nature's hand pro-
 To bank thy too luxurious river's sides; [vides,
 As in a vale thy current the restrains,
 Nor suffers thee to spread the Libyan plains:
 At Memphis, first, free liberty she yields,
 And lets thee loose to float the thirsty fields.

In unsuspected peace securely laid,
 Thus waste they silent night's declining shade.

Meanwhile accustom'd furies still infect,
 With usual rage, Photinus' horrid breast;
 Nor can the ruffian's hand from slaughter rest.
 Well may the wretch, disdain'd with Pompey's
 Think every other dreadful action good. [blood,
 Within him still the snaky sister's dwell,
 And urge his soul with all the powers of hell.
 Can fortune to such hands such mischief doom,
 And let a slave revenge the wrongs of Rome!
 Prevent th' example, preordain'd to stand
 The great renown of Brutus' righteous hand!
 Forbid it, gods! that Cæsar's hallow'd blood,
 To liberty by fate a victim vow'd,
 Should on a less occasion e'er be spilt,
 And prove a vile Ægyptian eunuch's guilt.
 Harden'd by crimes, the bolder villain, now,
 Avows his purpose with a daring brow;
 Scorns the mean aids of falsehood and surprize,
 And openly the victor chief defies.

Vain in his hopes, nor doubting to succeed,
 He trusts that Cæsar must, like Pompey, bleed.

The feeble boy to curs'd Achillas' hand
 Had, with his army, given his crown's command;
 To him, by wicked sympathy of mind,
 By leagues and brotherhood of murder join'd,
 To him, the first and fittest of his friends,
 Thus, by a trusty slave, Photinus sends:

While stretch'd at ease, the great Achillas lies,
 And sleep sits heavy on his slothful eyes,
 The bargain for our native land is made,
 And the dishonest price already paid.
 The former rule no longer now we own,
 Usurping Cleopatra wears the crown.

Dost thou alone withdraw thee from her state,
 Nor on the bridal's of thy mistress wait?
 To-night at large she lavishes her charms,
 And riots in luxurious Cæsar's arms.
 Ere long her brother may the wanton wed,
 And reap the refuse of the Roman's bed;
 Doubly a bride, then doubly shall the reign,
 While Rome and Ægypt wear, by turns, her chain.
 Nor trust thou to thy credit with the boy, [ploy.
 When arts and eyes, like hers, their powers em-
 Mark with what ease her fatal charms can mould
 The heart of Cæsar, ruthless, hard and old;
 Were the soft king his thoughtless head to rest,
 But for a night, on her inciteous breast:
 His crown and friends he'd barter for the bliss,
 And give thy head and mine for one lewd kiss;

On crosses, or in flames, we should deplore
 Her beauty's terrible resistless power.
 On both, her sentence is already pass'd,
 She dooms us dead, because we kept her chaste.
 What potent hand shall then assistance bring?
 Cæsar's her lover, and her husband king.
 Haste, I adjure thee by our common guilt,
 By that great blood which we in vain have spilt,
 Haste, and let war, let death, with thee return,
 And the funeral torch for Hymen's burn.
 Whate'er embrace the hostile charmer hold,
 Find, and transfix her in the luscious fold.
 Nor let the fortune of this Latian lord
 Abash thy courage, or restrain thy sword;
 In the same glorious guilty paths we tread,
 That rais'd him up, the world's imperious head.
 Like him, we seek dominion for our prize,
 And hope, like him, by Pompey's fall to rise.
 Witness the stains of yonder blushing wave,
 Yon bloody shore, and you inglorious grave.
 Why fear we then to bring our wish to pass?
 This Cæsar is not more than Pompey was.
 What though we boast no birth, nor noble name
 Nor kindred with some purple monarch claim?
 Conscious of fate's decree, such aid we scorn,
 And know we were for mighty mischief born.
 See, how kind fortune, by this offer'd prey,
 Finds means to purge all past offence away:
 With grateful thanks Rome shall the deed approve
 And this last merit the first crime remove.
 Stripp'd of his titles, and the pomp of power,
 Cæsar's a single soldier and no more.
 Think then how easily the task were done,
 How soon we may an injur'd world atone:
 Finish all wars, appease each Roman shade,
 By sacrificing one devoted head.
 Fearless, ye dread united legions, go;
 Rush, all undaunted, on your common foe:
 This right, ye Romans! to your country do;
 Ye Pharians! this your king expects from you.
 But chief, Achillas! may the praite be thine:
 Haste thou, and find him on his bed supine,
 Weary with toiling lust, and gorg'd with wine.
 Then strike, and what their Cato's prayers demand
 The gods shall give to thy more favour'd hand.
 Nor fail'd the message, fitted to persuade;
 But, prone to blood, the willing chief obey'd.
 No noisy trumpets sound the loud alarm,
 But silently the moving legions arm:
 All unperciv'd, for battle they prepare,
 And bustle through the night with busy care.
 The mingled bands who form'd this mongrehoit,
 To the disgrace of Rome were Romans most;
 A herd, who had they not been lost to shame,
 And long forgetful of their country's name,
 Had bluish'd to own ev'n Ptolemy their head:
 Yet now were by his meaver vassal led.
 Oh! mercenary war, thou slave of gold!
 How is thy faithless courage bought and sold?
 For base reward thy hiring hands obey;
 Unknowing right or wrong, they fight for pay,
 And give their country's great revenge away.
 Ah, wretched Rome! for whom thy fate prepares,
 In every nation, new domestic wars;
 The fury, that from pale Thessalia fled,
 Rears on the banks of Nile her baleful head,

What could protecting Ægypt more have done,
Had she receiv'd the haughty victor's son?
But thus the gods our sinking state confound,
Thus tear our mangled empire all around:

In every land fit instruments employ,
And suffer ruthless slaughter to destroy.
Thus ev'n Ægyptian parricides presume
To meddle in the sacred cause of Rome;
Thus, had not fate those hands of murder ty'd,
Success had crown'd the vile Achilla's side,
Nor wanted fit occasion for the deed;
Timely the traitors to the place succeed,
While in security the careless guest,
Ling'ring as yet, his couch supinely prest:
No gates, no guards, forbade their open way
But all dissolv'd in sleep and surfeits lay;
With ease the victor at the board had bled,
And lost in riot his defenceless head;
But pious caution now their rage withstands,
And care for Ptolemy withholds their hands:
With reverence and remorse, unknown before,
They dread to spill their royal master's gore;
Left, in the tumult of the murderous night,
Some erring mischief on his youth may light.
Way'd by this thought, not doubting to succeed,
They hold it fitting to defer the deed.

Gods! that such wretches should so proudly dare!
Can such a life be theirs to take, or spare!
Till dawn of day the warrior stood reviev'd,
And Cæsar at Achilla's bidding liv'd.

Now o'er aspiring Casium's eastern head
The rosy light by Lucifer was led; [borne,
Wist through the land the piercing beams were
And glowing Ægypt felt the kindling morn:
When from proud Alexandria's walls afar,
The citizen's behold the coming war.
The dreadful legion's shine in just array,
And firm, as to the battle, hold their way.
Omniscious, meanwhile, of this unequal force,
Traight to the palace Cæsar bends his course:
For in the lofty bulwarks dares confide,
Their ample circuit stretching far too wide:
To one fix'd part his little band retreats,
Here mans the walls and towers, and bars the gates.

Here fear, there wrath, by turns, his bosom tears;
He fears, but still with indignation fears.
His daring soul, restrain'd, more fiercely burns,
And proudly the ignoble refuge scorns.
The captive lion thus, with generous rage,
Elastick foams, and roars, and bites his cage.
Thus, if some power could Mulciber inflame,
And bind him down in Ætna's smoky cave,
With fires more fierce th' imprison'd god would
Nod below in the dreadful deeps below. [glow.
He who so lately, with undaunted pride,
The power of mighty Pompey's arms defy'd, }
With justice and the senate on his side; }
Who, with a cause which gods and men must hate,
Rood up, and struggled for success with fate;
Now object foes and slaves insulting fears,
And shrinks beneath a shower of Pharian spears.
The warrior who diddain'd to be confin'd
By Tyrian Gades, or the eastern Inde, }
Now in a narrow house conceals that head, }
From which the fiercest Scythians once had fled,
And horrid Moors beheld with awful dread.

From room to room irresolute he flies,
And on some guardian bar or door relies.
So boys and helpless maids, when towns are won,
To secret corners for protection run.
Still by his side the beardless king he bears,
Ordain'd to share in every ill he fears:
If he must die, he dooms the boy to go,
Alike devoted to the shades below;
Resolves his head a victim first shall fall,
Hurl'd at his slaves from off the lofty wall.
So from Æetes fierce Medea fled,
Her sword still aim'd at young Abyrtos' head;
Whene'er she sees her vengeful fire draw nigh,
Ruthless she dooms the wretched boy should die.
Yet ere these cruel last extremes he proves,
By gentler steps of peace the Roman moves;
He sends an envoy, in the royal name,
To chide their fury, and the war disclaim.
But impious they nor gods nor kings regard,
Nor universal laws, by all rever'd;
No right of sacred characters they know,
But tear the olive from the hallow'd brow;
To death the messenger of peace pursue,
And in his blood their horrid hands embue.

Such are the palms which curs'd Ægyptians
Such prodigies exalt their nation's name. [claim,
Nor purple Theffaly's destructive shore,
Nor dire Pharnaces, nor the Libyan Moor,
Nor every barbarous land, in every age,
Equal a lost Ægyptian eunuch's rage.

Incessant still the roar of war prevails,
While the wild host the royal pile assails.
Void of device, no thundering rams they bring,
Nor kindling flames with spreading mischief ring:
Bellowing around they run with fruitless pain,
Heave at the doors, and thrust and strive in vain:
More than a wall, great Cæsar's fortune stands,
And mocks the madness of their feeble hands.

On one proud side the lofty fabric stood
Projected bold into th' adjoining flood;
There, fill'd with armed bands, their barks draw
near,

But find the same defending Cæsar there:
To every part the ready warrior flies,
And with new rage the fainting fight supplies;
Headlong he drives them with his deadly blade,
Nor seems to be invaded, but t' invade.
Against the ships Phalaric darts he aims;
Each dart with pitch and livid sulphur flames.
The spreading fire o'er-runs their unctuous sides,
And, nimble mounting, on the top-mast rides:
Planks, yards and cordage, feed the dreadful blaze;
The drowning vessel hilles in the seas;
While floating arms and men, promiscuous strow'd,
Hide the whole surface of the azure flood.
Nor dwells destruction on their fleet alone, [town;
But, driven by winds, invades the neighbouring
On rapid wings the sheety flames they bear,
In wavy lengths, along the reddening air.
Not much unlike, the shooting meteors fly,
In gleamy trails, athwart the midnight sky.

Soon as the crowd behold their city burn,
Thither, all headlong, from the siege they turn.
But Cæsar, prone to vigilance and haste,
To snatch the just occasion ere it pass'd,
Hid in the friendly night's involving shade,
A safe retreat to Pharos timely made.

In elder times of holy Proteus' reign,
 An isle it stood, incompass'd by the main :
 Now by a mighty mole the town it joins,
 And from wide seas the safer port confines.
 Of high importance to the chief it lies,
 To him brings aid, and to the foe denies :
 In close restraint the captive town is held,
 While free behind he views the watery field.
 There safe, with curs'd Photinus in his power,
 Cæsar defers the villain's doom no more.
 Yet, ah ! by means too gentle he expires ;
 No gnashing knives he feels, no scorching fires ;
 Nor were his limbs by grinning tigers torn,
 Nor pendent on the horrid crooks ar borne :
 Beneath the sword the wretch resigns his breath,
 And dies too gloriously by Pompey's death.

Meanwhile, by wily Ganymede convey'd,
 Arsinœ, the younger royal maid,
 Fled to the camp ; and with a daring hand
 Assumes the sceptre of supreme command :
 And, for her feeble brother was not there,
 She calls herself the sole Lagæan heir.
 Then, since he dares dispute her right to reign,
 She dooms the fierce Achilles to be slain.
 With just remorse, repenting fortune paid
 This second victim to her Pompey's shade.
 But oh ! nor this, nor Ptolemy, nor all
 The race of Lagos doom'd at once to fall,
 Not hetacombs of tyrants shall suffice,
 Till Brutus strikes, and haughty Cæsar dies.

Nor yet the rage of war was hush'd in peace,
 Nor would that storm, with him who rais'd it,
 cease.

A second eunuch to the task succeeds,
 And Ganymede the power of Ægypt leads :
 He cheers the drooping Pharians with success,
 And urg'd the Roman chief with new distress.
 Such dangers did one dreadful day afford,
 As annals might to latest times record,
 And consecrate to fame the warrior's sword.

While to their barks his faithful band de-
 scends,

Cæsar, the mole's contracted space defends.
 Part from the crowded key aboard were pass'd,
 The careful chief remain'd among the last ;
 When sudden Ægypt's furious powers unite,
 And fix on him alone th' unequal fight.
 By land the numerous foot, by sea the fleet,
 At once surround him, and prevent retreat.
 No means for safety or escape remain,
 To fight, or fly, were equally in vain :
 A vulgar period on his wars attends,
 And his ambitious life obscurely ends.
 No seas of gore, no mountains of the slain,
 Renown the fight on some distinguish'd plain :
 But meanly in a tumult must he die,
 And, over-borne by crowds, inglorious lie :
 No room was left to fall as Cæsar should,
 So little were the hopes his foes and fate allow'd.
 At once the place and danger he surveys,
 The rising mound, and the near neighbouring seas :
 Some fainting struggling doubts as yet remain :
 Can he, perhaps, his navy still regain ?
 Or shall he die, and end th' uncertain pain ?
 At length, while madly thus perplex'd he burns.
 His own brave Scæva to his thought returns ;
 Scæva, who in the breach undaunted stood,
 And singly made the dreadful battle good ;

Whose arm advancing Pompey's host repell'd,
 And, coop'd within a wall the captive leader held
 Strong in his soul the glorious image rose,
 And taught him, sudden, to disdain his foes ;
 The force oppos'd in equal scales to weigh,
 Himself was Cæsar, and Ægyptians they ;
 To trust that fortune, and those gods, once more
 That never fail'd his daring hopes before.
 Threatening, aloft his flaming blade he shook,
 And through the throng his course resistless took Hands, arms, and helmed heads before him fly,
 While mingling screams and groans ascend the sky
 So winds, imprison'd, force their furious way,
 Tear up the earth, and drive the foamy sea.
 Just on the margin of the mount he stay'd,
 And for a moment, thence, the flood survey'd ;
 Fortune divine ! be present now, he cry'd ;
 And plung'd, undaunted, in the foamy tide.
 Th' obedient deep, at fortune's high command,
 Receiv'd the mighty master of the land ;
 Her servile waves officious Tethys spread,
 To raise with proud support his awful head.
 And, for he scorn'd th' inglorious race of Nile
 Should pride themselves in aught of Cæsar's spoil.
 In his left hand, above the water's power,
 Papers and scrolls of high import he bore ;
 Where his own labours faithfully record
 The battles of ambition's ruthless sword :
 Safe in his right, the deadly steel he held,
 And plow'd, with many a stroke, the liquid field
 While his fix'd teeth tenaciously retain
 His ample Tyrian robe's imperial train :
 Th' encumber'd folds the curling surface sweep
 Come slow behind, and drag along the deep.
 From the high mole, from every Pharian prow,
 A thousand hands a thousand javelins throw :
 The thrilling points dip bloodless in the waves,
 While he their idle wrath securely braves.
 So when some mighty serpent of the main
 Rolls his huge length athwart the liquid plain,
 Whether he range voracious for the prey,
 Or to the sunny shore directs his way,
 Him if by chance the fishers view from far,
 With flying darts they wage a distant war :
 But the fell monster, unappall'd with dread,
 Above the seas exerts his poisonous head ;
 He rears his livid crest and kindling eyes,
 And, terrible, the feeble foe defies ;
 His swelling breast a foamy path divides,
 And, careless, o'er the murmuring flood he glide

Some looser Muse, perhaps, who lightly tread:
 The devious paths where wanton fancy leads,
 In heaven's high court, would feign the queen
 Kneeling in tears before the throne of Jove, [lov
 Imploring, sad, th' almighty father's grace,
 For the dear offspring of her Julian race.
 While to the just recording Romans eyes,
 Far other forms, and other gods arise ;
 The guardian furies round him rear their heads,
 And Nemesis the shield of safety spreads ;
 Justice and fate the floating chief convey,
 And Rome's glad genius waits him on his way ;
 Freedom and laws the Pharian darts withstand,
 And save him for avenging Brutus' hand.
 His friends, unknowing what the gods decree,
 With joy receive him from the swelling sea ;
 In peals on peals their shouts triumphant rise,
 Roll o'er the distant flood, and thunder to the skies

THIS translation of the Hymn to Ceres was undertaken at the particular request of the gentleman, who favoured the world with a criticism on that most valuable fragment of antiquity, in the appendix to the 63d vol. of the Monthly Review; and to whose assistance the author acknowledges himself to have been greatly indebted.

The following extract from that criticism will, apprehend, be sufficient to give the reader some general idea of the poem itself; and at the same time it will afford entertainment to the curious, to be informed of the extraordinary and unexpected circumstances which contributed to its publication.

The author of the criticism introduces his remarks with observing, that "the discovery of this ancient and truly beautiful Greek poem was no less singular than interesting; and that the admirers of classic literature will think themselves under great obligations to the learned and ingenious editor * for the pains he hath taken to gratify their curiosity, not only by an elegant edition of the poem itself, but by his very valuable notes and observations, which tend to illustrate its beauties, and to throw a light on some of its obscurities.

"Ruhnkenius informs us that nothing was more distant from his expectations than the discovery of this Hymn to Ceres. He knew, indeed, that a poem, bearing that title, and ascribed to Homer, existed in the second century: but as it had long been considered as irretrievably lost, he had formed no hopes of ever seeing it rescued from the obscurity to which it had been consigned:—at least he could not have flattered himself, that on the discovery of so unexpected a treasure, the charge of presenting it to the public, would have been intrusted to him.

"For the satisfaction of our readers, it is necessary to mention the most interesting particulars that relate to this singular and valuable discovery.

"Some years since, a German, Christian Frederic Matthæi, who had been educated by the learned Ernesti, and credited the discipline of that celebrated master, by his skill and erudition, was invited to settle at Moscow, and to assist in a plan of literature, for which his abilities and acquirements most eminently qualified him. On his arrival at that city, he was informed, equally to his astonishment and satisfaction, that a very copious treasure of Greek manuscript was deposited in the library of the Holy Synod, which no person in that country had either the abilities to make use of, or the curiosity to examine. Struck with the relation of a circumstance so unexpected, and at the same time so peculiarly flattering to the taste of this learned man, he immediately seized the opportunity that was luckily offered him, to explore this repository of hidden treasure. After having examined several curious books, he discovered a manuscript copy of the works of Homer, written about the conclusion of the 14th century, but evidently a transcript from a very ancient and most valuable copy, which, besides the Iliad and the Odyssey, contained also sixteen of the hymns, which had been long published under the name of Homer.—But this was not all. Twelve lines of a lost hymn to Bacchus, and the hymn to Ceres, were preserved in this curious and long unnoticed manuscript. Exulting, as indeed he well might, in an acquisition so unexpected, and at the same time so valuable, he, with singular disinterestedness, communicated it to our editor, that he might present it to the world without those delays, which would, in all probability, have retarded the publication of it at Moscow.

"Matthæi, indeed, was well acquainted with the talents and extraordinary erudition of Ruhnkenius; and as he knew too that his learned friend had been particularly engaged in the study of the hymns of Homer, in order to give the public a complete edition of them, he could not have intrusted this poem to the charge of a person more qualified to do justice to its publication than our editor. With this hymn many various readings, tending to illustrate and explain some obscure passages in those already published, were also communicated to Ruhnkenius.

"The editor observes, that as there was only one copy of this hymn to Ceres, to which he could have recourse, he was frequently obliged to call in the aid of conjecture, in order to determine the reading, or guess at the sense, of some obscure passages. And when an editor makes so good a use of his * ingenuity as Ruhnkenius, the most scrupulous and fastidious critic will scarcely be disposed to find fault with him.

"The editor declines the hazardous task of translation. We are sorry, that his scruples on this head should have deprived us of a pleasure, which we are sure he could have given us by a Latin version of this hymn. It is certain, that translations have been (as our editor says) the source of contentions; and we may add, that they have frequently been made the refuge of indolence. Nevertheless, they have their peculiar uses; and we hope ere long to see a translation of this poem executed with correctness and taste by some learned and ingenious hand. Such a translation would insure its own success; and would be as acceptable to the learned, as to those who are incapable of reading the poem with ease and fluency in the original.

“Having given a general account of the discovery of this hymn to Ceres, the editor examines with what propriety it may lay claim to the muse of Homer for its birth.

* “Pausanias hath asserted more than once, and that not accidentally, but by design, that Homer had written such a hymn: and the old Scholiast on the Alexipharmics of Nicander speaks of hymns that were attributed to Homer, in which a circumstance relating to Ceres is mentioned. † But this hymn records no such circumstance; and therefore the editor conjectures, that the critic, through forgetfulness or inadvertence, mistook Homer for Orpheus: or else he must have seen another hymn ascribed to Homer different from the present.

“As to Pausanias, our editor hints, that his judgment with respect to the subject of Homer’s * “Homerum hymni auctorem edit. testis idoneus, Pausanias, nec semel, et quasi praterendo, sed quatuor locis, et constanter, Attic. 38. his. Messen. 30. Corinth. 14.”—See Rubenkenius’s preface, page 6. N. B. The lines quoted by Pausanias from this hymn have but a slight verbal variation (together with the transposition of a line), easy enough to be accounted for from the inadvertence of some copyist; unless he himself made the mistake by having quoted from memory.

† The old Scholiast, in the passage referred to above, says, “That the goddess laughed at the ludicrous speeches of Iambe, as is related in the hymns ascribed to Homer.” Now since Rubenkenius can discover no trace of such a circumstance in this hymn, he suspects that the old critic, through forgetfulness, had confounded it with one of the hymns of Orpheus; or else that he had read some other hymn besides the present, which bore the name of Homer, and recorded this incident of Ceres and Iambe.

And yet it is by no means certain but that this may be the very hymn referred to by the Scholiast on Nicander; for it is worthy of observation, that immediately after Iambe is introduced by the poet, as accommodating the goddess with a seat, there is undoubtedly an omission of some lines, which are necessary to connect one passage with another. In its present state, it is abrupt and disjointed; from whence this question naturally arises:—May it not be presumed, that the incident above mentioned occurred in the lines which are lost in the present copy?

hymns is not to be implicitly followed. He allows this writer great merit, as a critic; but thinks, that the splendour of the subject too much dazzled his understanding to permit him to decide with impartiality.

“He ingeniously acknowledgeth, that he hath some doubts, with respect to the high and illustrious origin ascribed to this hymn: But as no positive external evidence can be produced to determine the point, he chooses to rest his argument on, what appears to him, the more certain ground of internal proof; and observes, that though it be exquisitely beautiful, yet that it is evidently deficient in some of Homer’s more striking and predominant characteristics. It wants his energy and spirit:—that vigour, that inspiration, which animates and gives an irresistible power, as well as an enchanting beauty, to the poems of that sublime and inimitable bard.

“But though this poem be, dispossessed of the claim ascribed to it in the old manuscript of Moscow, viz. as the production of Homer, yet the editor hesitates not to give it the honour of very high antiquity. He is of opinion, that it was written immediately after Homer; or at least in the age of Hesiod. The Χρυσὸν αἰχμαλωτῆρος—the venerable wrinkles of hoary age are deeply marked on the very face of it. This will be visible to all that are skilled in the Greek classics. Such will perceive, and as it were feel, its antiquity, by a sensation that cannot be communicated or explained to the reader who hath not been particularly conversant in those studies.

“The editor congratulates the age on the discovery of this curious poem,—rescued by mere accident from the darkest retreats of oblivion; and perhaps, but at a slight distance from inevitable perdition.—He deems it to be an acquisition, not only calculated to gratify the curiosity of the connoisseurs in classic antiquity, or to entertain those lovers of Greek poetry whose studies are made subservient to a refined and elegant species of amusement; but he also esteems it, as of particular use to the critic, as it tends to illustrate some obscure passages both in the Greek and Latin poets.

“He closes his preface with observing, that, content with the honour of publishing this hymn, he leaves the farther comparison of it with the other poets of antiquity, for the sake of mutual illustration, to the skill and industry of other critics.”

To the preceding remarks it may not be improper to add, that the account, which Apollodorus hath given of Ceres, agrees with such peculiar exactness (a few incidents excepted) with the essential and leading circumstances of this hymn, that I imagine the curious reader would be pleased to see it entire; and at the same time it may be considered as a general argument to the hymn itself.

• “Pluto, being inflamed with a violent love for Proserpine, carries her off secretly by the assistance of Jupiter.—Ceres traverses the earth

* The lines marked with inverted commas perfectly agree with the story of the poem.

ay and night with lighted torches in quest of her: Having learned from some skilled in divination, that she was conveyed away by Pluto—enraged at the gods, she forsakes heaven, and assumes the form of a woman." She goes to Eleusina, and sits down at first on a stone called Agelaston, from the grief she then suffered, in far from the fountain Callichorus;—from whence she proceeds to the house of Cereus, at that time king of Eleusis, and is introduced to the females of his family, by whom being requested to sit down, an old woman called Iambe, excites her by reviling the goddess. On which account it is said, a licence of speech is allowed to women when performing the mystical rites of Ceres.

Cereus at that time had a son by Metanira, whom Ceres undertook to nurse, and being willing to make him immortal, she placed the child by night in the midst of the fire, by that means to take from him the corruptible part of his nature.

The child who was called Demophon, grew and flourished daily beyond belief.—Metanira watched the actions of the goddess, and cried aloud, when she saw him covered with fire.—In this, the child was instantly taken out, and Ceres revealed herself." She then prepared a riot for Triptolemus, Metanira's eldest son, and gave him winged dragons, that he should travel all over the world, and instruct mankind in sowing wheat, which she gave him for that purpose.

"In the meantime Jupiter commanded Pluto to restore Proserpine: But he, fearing she would stay a long time with her mother, gave her the seed of the pomegranate to eat; which she did in obedience to his commands, not foreseeing the consequence."—Ceres placed a heavy stone over Alcathous the son of Acheron and Gorgyra in the infernal regions, for bearing false testimony against her. "At last Proserpine was compelled to stay with Pluto one third of the year, and the other part she spent with the gods."—This is what they relate of Ceres. Ap. L. 1. C. 5.

I shall not enter into a particular discussion of the nature or merits of the Hymn to Ceres—in the following attempt to translate it, I equally wished to avoid the extremes of a servile version, and a diffuse imitation. How far I have succeeded in adhering to the sense of the poet, without abridging the privilege of a free translator, must be left to the determination of the candid reader.

* Ποιός ἴδως φάλεν ποικίον, are literally the words made use of by the poet in this hymn.

Cum matre est totidem, totidem cum conjugum- mensis. Metam. lib. v.

—But the account of Apollodorus agrees, in this respect, with the hymn; and the general similarity is so striking, that one would imagine he had copied from it.

HOMER'S HYMN TO CERES.

CERES, to thee belongs the votive lay,
Thy locks in radiance round thy temples play,
Al Proserpine, whom, distant from thy sight,
Flee Pluto bore to realms of endless night.
Thus decreed the god, whose piercing eyes
See every act, whose thunder shakes the skies,
Let she, whose hands the golden sickle bear,
A choicest product of the circling year,
In fruits, and fragrant-breathing flowers, should
Be known
Thy tender conflicts of maternal woe,
In Nyssia's vale, with nymphs a lovely train,
Sang from the hoary father of the main,
Flee Proserpine consum'd the fleeting hours
In pleasing sports, and pluck'd the gaudy flowers.
Around them wide the flamy crocus glows,
Through leaves of verdure blooms the opening
Rose;
Thy hyacinth declines his fragrant head,
Al purple violets deck th' enamell'd mead.
The fair Narcissus far above the rest,
In magic form'd, in beauty rose content.
Sove, t' enslave the virgin's thoughtless mind,
Al please the ruler of the shades design'd.
Fears'd it from the opening earth to rise,
Set to the scent, alluring to the eyes.

Never did mortal, or celestial power,
Behold such vivid tints adorn a flower.
From the deep root an hundred branches sprung,
And to the winds ambrosial odours flung,
Which lightly wafted on the wings of air,
The gladden'd earth, and heaven's wide circuit
Share.
The joy-dispensing fragrance spreads around,
And ocean's briny swell with smiles is crown'd.
Pleas'd at the sight, nor deeming danger nigh,
The fair beheld it with desiring eye:
Her eager hand she stretch'd to seize the flower,
(Beauteous illusion of th' ethereal power!)
When, dreadful to behold, the rocking ground
Disparted—widely yawn'd a gulf profound:—
Forth-rushing from the black abyss, arose
The gloomy monarch of the realm of woes,
Pluto, from Saturn sprung—The trembling maid
He seiz'd, and to his golden car convey'd.
Borne by immortal steeds the chariot flies:
And thus she pours her supplicating cries—
Assist, protect me, thou who reign'st above
Supreme and best of gods, paternal Jove!
But ah! in vain the hapless virgin rears
Her wild complaint—nor god nor mortal hears!—

Not to the white-arm'd nymphs with beauty crown'd,

Her lov'd companions, reach'd the mournful
Pale Hecate, who in the cell of night

Misery's youthful pleasure's rapid flight;

And bright Hyperion's son, who decks the skies

With splendour, only heard the virgin's cries

Invoke the father of th' ethereal powers—

But he, at distance from their airy bowers,

Sits in his hallow'd fane;—his votaries hears,

Accepts their offerings; and rewards their prayers

While hell's dread ruler in his car convey'd
To realms of darkness the reluctant maid.

Long as the view'd the star-bespangled skies,

And ocean's many-teeming waters rife;

While earth's gay verdure fled not from her view,

Nor Phœbus yet his cheerful light withdrew;

So long the ray of hope illum'd her breast,

Nor sunk her soul, undaunted though distress'd.

Her mother still the thought would meet her sight,

And friendly powers who dwell in realms of
light.—

E'en ocean's depth resounded to her cry,

And lofty mountains towering to the sky!

At length, the shrieks of woe her mother
hears—

Her heavenly breast the shaft of anguish tears.

The blooming wreath she from her brow unbinds;

Rends her bright locks, and gives them to the winds:

Then (mournful emblem of her inward woes!)

A fable veil athwart her shoulders throws.

As some fond bird her ravish'd young deplores,

And every secret shade in vain explores;

To seek the fair the flies o'er sea and land,

The burning torches waving in her hand,

Nor gods, nor men the author of her woes

Unfold—no birds of omen'd flight disclose.

Nine tedious days in vain the queen ador'd

The various regions of the earth explor'd;

Nor did the taste, while the her course pursued,

The balmy nectar, or ambrosial food;

Nor ever in the cool translucent wave,

Toil's sweet relief, her form of beauty lave,

On the tenth morn, as chafing night's dull
gloom,

Aurora's beams the purpled east illum'd,

Pale Hecate before her view appear'd,

Her hand the faintly-gleaming taper rear'd,

And thus began: Oh thou! to whom we owe

Those joys, the season's circling flight bestow;

What god, what mortal dar'd the impious deed,

That makes a heavenly breast with sorrow bleed?

I heard thy daughter's voice implore relief;

Unknown to me the author of her grief—

She ceas'd; nor did the goddess make reply,

But sudden wav'd the flaming torch on high,

And fought the ruler of the day; whose light

From the pure regions of unclouded light

All actions views.—Before his car they came;

The burning car, and horses breathing flame,

Stopp'd sudden. Ceres thus: Oh Phœbus hear!

My fame, my ancient dignity revere!

If e'er my blessings gave thy soul delight,

Those blessings now by friendship's act requite,

A daughter late was mine of beauteous form—
(Sweet tender plant, uprooted by a storm!)

Distant I heard her loud-lamenting cries;

But late severe denied her to my eyes.

Oh thou! who crown'd with ether's purest light,
Through earth and ocean dart'it thy boundless
flight,

Tell me what god, what mortal has convey'd

Reluctant from these arms my darling maid?

Daughter of Rhea! he replied, I hear

With grief thy wrongs, and dignity revere.

Blame not th' ethereal race—from heaven's dread
king,

Who dwells mid' black'ning clouds, thy sorrow:
spring.

Pluto, by his decree the virgin bore,

Where darkly-frowning on th' infernal shore,

His lofty palace stands—no more repine;

No cause for anguish, nor for shame is thine.

He, brother to the god who rules on high,

Now hails her empress of the lower sky:

For Saturn's awful race superior reign

O'er heaven, o'er hell, and earth-encircling main

He said; and then (his course no more delay'd)

Spoke to his fiery steed—his steeds obey'd.

Whirl'd rapid onwards through th' illum'd
skies,

The flame-rob'd chariot kindles as it flies:

Swift, as when rushing through the blaze of day,

Darts the fierce eagle on his distant prey.

But deeper anguish rends the mother's soul,

And thoughts of vengeance in her bosom roll;

She shuns th' imperious power who rules on high,

And quits th' immortal synod of the sky.

Then, furious from Olympus' air height

To earth precipitates her rapid flight.

There mingling with the race of man, she shares

Their various toil—consum'd with grief appears

Her beauteous form;—unknown from shore to

She roves; till Cereus hospitable door

Receives her steps—He in Eleusis reign'd,

Where still her rites, and honours are maintain'd.

Befide a path, while o'er her drooping head

His grateful shade the verdant olive spread;

As by her feet Parthenius' waters flow,

She sits, a pallid spectacle of woe.

Her faded cheeks no more with beauty bloom'd,

But now the form of wrinkled age assum'd.

She seem'd like those whom each attractive grace

Forfeats, when time with wrinkles marks th'
face;

From whom the Cyprian power indignant flies,

Her gifts refuses, and her charms denies;

Who, in some regal dome, by fate severe,

Are doom'd to nurse, and serve another's heir.

Four gentle nymphs light-moving o'er the pla

Approach; four brazen urns their arms fu

tain—

Great Cereus was their fire—he bade them bring

The limpid water from Parthenius spring.

Lovely they seem'd as heaven's immortal powers

Youth's purple light, and beauty's opening flower

Glow'd on their cheeks—Callidice the fair,

And meek Clansdice with pensive air;

Then Demo, and Callithoe's riper grace

Appear'd, the eldest of the lovely race.

They hail the power unknown—(For mort
eyes

How hard to penetrate a god's disguise!)

Who, and whence art thou, Dame! whose brow appears

Mark'd by the traces of revolving years?

Why dost thou flun yon peopled town? in grief

Why lonely sit?—there thou wilt find relief:

There, inatrons, like thyself, who long the load

Of life have borne, and traced its rugged road,

Employ'd in labours, such as best engage

The pleas'd attention of declining age,

With tender maids thy sorrows shall condole,

And acts of friendship cheer thy drooping soul!

Hail nymphs unknown! the goddess thus re-
join'd, 181

Accept the tribute of a grateful mind.

Would you the story of my sorrows know,

Attend to no fictitious tale of woe.

Reluctant from the Cretan coast I came;

Dear native land! and Doris is my name.

To ruffians' force who plough the wat'ry way,

I fell an helpless, unresisting prey.

The bark bounds swiftly o'er the liquid main,

And soon the coast of Thericus we gain. 190

The vessel safely moor'd,---a female band 191

Prepare the banquet on the neighb'ring strand;

Whilst wide around us eve's gray vapours rise,

And her dim shades roll slowly through the skies.

But, deeply-musing on my woes, I pine,

Nor share the feast, nor taste the cheerful wine.

When through the sky night's deeper gloom was
spread,

Unnotic'd, trembling o'er the beach I fled.

The spoilers' lust of gold I rendered vain;

Unransom'd, thus escap'd the galling chain 200

Of servitude---long time from shore to shore

I wander'd---various toils and perils bore.

To me e'en now unknown, ere you unfold,

The land I tread, the people I behold.

To you, ye virgins! may th' ethereal powers,

Who o'er Olympus dwell in airy bowers,

Shed choicest favours! may your consorts prove

Of lovely form, deserving of your love!

And be your children with such beauty blest,

As hope can image in a parent's breast! 210

Then gentle maids, in pity to my woes,

How best I can obtain relief, disclose,

In yonder town---with pleasure I'll engage

In talks best suited to my feeble age.

Well-skill'd in household toils, to please my lord

The couch I'll spread, and crown his festive board.

Or should a child be trusted to my care,

These arms shall nurse him, and these knees shall bear.

She ceas'd:---the loveliest of a lovely line,

Callidice replied; no more repine! 220

But know, whate'er th' immortal gods ordain,

It is our part to suffer, not complain---

Enough for us that justice rules their mind,

Whose wisdom, like their power, is unconfin'd,

The chiefs, who here supreme dominion hold,

Be it my talk, O stranger! to unfold:

Through whom, Eleus's hostile rage desies;

Beneath whose care you guardian ramparts rise;

From whom protecting law derives its force,

And awful justice holds its steady course.

Triptolemus, of deep-revolving mind,

Diocles noble, Polyxenas kind;

With every milder grace Eumolpus crown'd,

And stately Dolichus in arms renown'd,

Superior to the rest, o'er these domains,

Our honour'd sire, the mighty Celus reigns---

Each chief a lovely consort boasts, who guides

Domestic labours, and at home presides:

Not one of them who would thy suit reject,

But sooth thy sorrows, and thy age respect: 248

For sure, thou seem'st of more than mortal race,

Though time with wrinkles marks thy pallid face,

But if thou here wilt rest, without delay

We'll to our mother's ears thy tale convey,

If she approves, accept a welcome there---

An only child, an unexpected heir,

Born to his parents in declining age,

Our darling pleasure, will thy cares engage.

Should'st thou preserve him (kindly thus employ'd) 249

Till ripening manhood make thy labours void,

Such gifts hereafter he'll on thee bestow,

As those will envy most, who best shall know.

The virgin ceas'd; nor aught the goddess said,

But bow'd submissive her assenting head.

The liquid crystal fills their polish'd urns;

Each nymph exulting to the town returns.

Arriv'd at Celus' dome, they quick disclose

The stranger's humble suit, and tale of woes

To * Metanira---pleas'd at the request,

Maternal fondness glowing in her breast, 260

She bids them to the matron thus declare,

That ample treasures should reward her care.

Like the kine's lowing race, that sportive bound

Along the plain with flowery verdure crown'd;

Or the sleek fawn, when he at first perceives

Spring's genial warmth, and crops the budding leaves;

Thus joyful through the beaten road they pass,

With robes collected to promote their haste.

Their tresses, like the crocus' flamy hue, 269

In waving radiance round their shoulders flew.

Now to the place, where sat the heavenly dame

Beside the murmuring stream, the virgins came.

Their mother's suit they urge, nor she denies---

While thoughts of sorrow in her bosom rise,

Wrapt in the fable veil her course she bends;

The robe dark-flowing to her feet descends.

Soon they approach to Celus' stately gate;

Within the lofty hall the † mother sat

Beside the threshold---frequent to her breast

The child, the darling of her soul the prest. 288

Each nymph to greet her much-lov'd parent flies,

While Ceres distant stands in humble guise.

Lo! suddenly before their wond'ring sight

Her form increasing, to the temple's height

Ascends---her head with circling rays is crown'd,

And wide th' ethereal splendour spreads around:

Awe, veneration, seiz'd the mother's breast,

And pallid fear was on her cheeks impress---

Upstarting from her couch she'd fain resign

The seat resplendent to her guest divine: 298

With looks unwilling she the suit denies,

And fixes on the ground her radiant eyes.

But kind lambe with a modest mien

A seat provided for the season's queen:

* The wife of Celus.

† Metanira.

A lambkin's snowy fleece she o'er it spread;—
Still deeply musing nought the goddess said:
But round her head the dusky mantle drow,
To hide her deep-felt anguish from their view.

Be it thy care to nurse this lovely boy,
Child of my age, an unexpected joy 300
By favouring gods bestow'd!—should through thy
care,

My Demophon arrive at manhood's years;
Others shall at thy happier state repine,
Such high rewards, such treasure shall be thine!

Oh woman! favour'd by the powers of heaven,
To whom the gods this beautiful child have given,
Ceres replied, I take with joy thy heir—
No nurse unskill'd receives him to her care:
Nor magic spell, nor roots of mighty power, 309
From earth's dark bosom torn at midnight hour,
Shall hurt thy offspring—to defeat each charm,
And herb malignant of its power disarm,
Full well I know.—She said, and to her breast
The infant clasp'd, and tenderly caress'd.

Thus Ceres nurs'd the child—exulting joy
Reign'd in his parents hearts—meanwhile the boy
Grew like an offspring of ethereal race;
Health crown'd his frame, and beauty deck'd his face.

No mortal food he ate:—the queen ador'd
Around him oft ambrosial odours pour'd; 320
Oft as the child was on her bosom laid,
She heavenly influence to his soul convey'd.
At night, to purge from earthly dross his frame,
She kindled on the earth th' annealing flame;
And like a brand, unmark'd by human view,
Amid the fire wide-blazing frequent threw
Th' unconscious child—his parents wond'ring trace
Something divine, a more than mortal grace
Shine in his form;—and she design'd, the boy
To chance superior, and to time's annoy, 330
Crown'd with unceasing joys in heaven should reign—

Those thoughts a mother's rashness render'd vain!

One fatal night, neglectful of repose,
Her couch forsaking, Metanira rose;
And from her secret stand beheld the flame
Receive the infant.—Terror shakes her frame!
She shrieks in agony—she smites her thighs;
And thus she pours her loud-lamenting cries.—

Oh Demophon, my child! this stranger guest,
What causeless rage, what frenzy has possess'd? 340
Consuming flames around thy body roll,
And anguish rends thy mother's tortur'd soul!

Wrath seiz'd the goddess; her immortal hands
Sudden she plung'd amid the fiery brands;
And full before th' afflicted mother's view,
On the cold floor the blameless infant threw,
And furious thus began: Oh mortals! vain!
Whose folly counteracts what gods ordain!
Who lost in error's maze, will never know
Approaching blessings from impending woe! 350
Lo! for the rashness that thy soul possess'd,
Shall keen reflection agonize thy breast.
For, by that oath which binds the powers supreme
I swear! by fable Styx, infernal stream!
Ere had thy son in youth's perpetual prime Har'd heavenly joys, and mock'd the rage of time.
Eut now 'tis past! from fate he cannot fly!—
Man's common lot is his—he breathes to die!—

But since a goddess on her knees caress'd 359
Thy child—since oft he slumber'd on her breast,
Fame shall attend his steps, and bright renown
With wreathes unfading shall his temples crown.
In future times, torn by discordant rage,
Eleusis' sons conunatural war shall wage;
(I then Demophon)

Know then that Ceres, from whose bounty flow
Those blessings the revolving years bestow,
Who, both from gods and man's fruit race demands
Her honours due, before thy presence stands.
Away, and let Eleusis' sons unite, 370
Where steep Callichorus projecting height
Frowns o'er the plain, a stately sanc to rear:
Her awful rites its goddess shall declare.

I here with pure hearts upon the hallow'd shrine
Your victims slay, and sooth a power divine!
This said; the front of age to late assum'd
Dissolv'd—her face with charms celestial bloom'd.
The sacred vulture that around her flew,
Through the wide air ambrosial odours threw:
Her lovely form with sudden radiance glow'd: 380
Her golden locks in wreaths of splendour flow'd.
Through the dark palace stream'd a flood of light,
As cloud-engender'd fires illum'd the night
With dazzling blaze—then swiftly from their view,
Urg'd by indignant rage, the goddess flew.

In Metanira's breast amazement reign'd:—
Silent the flood; nor long her knees sustain'd
Their tottering weight—the sunk in grief profound.
The child neglected, shrieking on the ground
Beside her lay: his agonizing cries 390
The sisters hear, and from their couches rise:
They snatch him from the floor—the fire suppress
One lights anew—one fondly to her breast
The infant folds—by filial duty sway'd,
Another hastes to Metanira's aid.
And now they gather'd round th' afflicted child,
And bath'd his beautiful form with dust desil'd:
With broken sobs he ceas'd not to complain;
A different nurse he sought, but sought in vain.

To sooth the goddess' rage, with awe impress'd,
In deep consult they pass the hours of rest; 400
Till night her dreary shadows roll'd away,
And bright Aurora brought the cheerful day:
Then, as she bade, around whose brow divine,
The blooming flowers, a lovely wreath, entwine,
They, to the ruler of Eleusis' state,
The wonders of th' eventful night relate.

The fates of the land conven'd, his will
He thus unfolds; that on th' impending hill
Of steep Callichorus, to the bright-hair'd power 410
An altar rise, and stately temple tower.
Gladly the chiefs assent—with busy care
The people soon the splendid fabric rear.
A power superior aids their warm desire:—
They hail the omen, and with joy retire.

There Ceres, distant from the powers divine,
Sits deeply musing in her hallow'd shrine.
The eager wish to view her daughter's face,
Again to fold her with a fond embrace,
Consumes her beautiful form—alternate roll 420
The tides of grief and vengeance in her soul.
She to the earth her genial power denies:
The corn unfruitful in its bosom lies:
The oxen draw the crooked plough in vain
No waving verdure decks the blasted plain

Calypso's charming form, Urania's grace,
 And Galaxaure's love-inspiring face:
 Pallas, who bids the rage of battle glow,
 And chaste Diana with her founding bow.
 In pleasing sports the fleeting hours we wear, 560
 And pluck the blushing honours of the year.
 Lilies and hyacinths the air perfume;
 'The crocus glows, th' expanding roses bloom:
 But lovelier far I view with joyful eyes
 'The fair Narcissus from the earth arise. [pride,
 'This wondrous flower, the meadow's blooming
 I rush'd to seize.—The rent earth opening wide
 A dreary gulf disclos'd: from thence appear'd
 'The mighty king in Tartarus rever'd,
 And bore me to his golden car—in vain 570
 I weep, resist, and to the gods complain.
 Swift flies his chariot to the realms below,
 And still my bosom bleeds at former woe!

With mutual joy they now sweet converse hold,
 And now each other in their arms enfold;
 And, all the live-long day, the transports prove
 That flow from filial and maternal love.
 No thoughts of vengeance Ceres' soul infect;
 But harmony and pleasure rule her breast.

Soon Hecate approach'd, and hail'd the fair, 580
 A splendid filet bound her flowing hair:
 To Proserpine her breast with friendship glow'd,
 And all her acts a kind attention show'd.

And now th' all-seeing god whose thunders shake
 Th' aerial regions, thus to Rhea spake:
 Around whose form her robes in darkness flew;
 From whom her birth the queen of seasons drew.
 Let Ceres hasten to th' ethereal plain,
 And every honour she desires, obtain.

Her Proserpine, with heavenly powers shall share
 In joy, two parts of the revolving year, 591
 The rest in realms of night.—The thunderer said:
 'The willing goddesses his commands obey'd;
 And from Olympus' cloud-encircled height
 Bends to Callicorus her lofty flight:
 O'er the drear region desolation crown'd,
 So late with fruits, and waving verdure crown'd.

But soon the earth its wonted power regains;
 Again the harvest clothes th' extended plains;
 Increasing ploughshares turn the grateful soil, 600
 And weighty sheaves reward the lab'ers toil.

Through air's ungenial void the goddess bends
 Her flight sublime, and now on earth descends.
 Each kindred power to hail the other flies,
 Joy rules their hearts, and sparkles in their eyes.
 At length sage Rhea, 'round whose awful head
 The wreath of splendour glow'd, to Ceres said.

Jove calls my daughter to th' ethereal plain;
 Such honours as thy soul desires, obtain.
 He wills, two parts of the revolving year, 610
 Thy Proserpine shall heavenly pleasures share;
 The rest in realms of night.—His sacred nod
 Confirm'd the promise of th' all-ruling god.
 Hasten then—no more oppose with wrathful mind
 Heaven's mighty lord mid dark'ning clouds enshrin'd:

But thy kind influence to the earth impart,
 And with thy blessings cheer man's drooping heart.

The power, whose brow the flowery wreath enobeys her word—her anger she resigns. [twines,
 Th' extended plains with fruits and flowers are
 crown'd, 620

And plenty reigns, and nature smiles around.
 Then to the chiefs, who o'er Eleusis sway'd,
 Whose righteous laws the grateful realm obey'd,
 Eumolpus, and Triptolemus the sage,
 Diocles skill'd to tame the courser's rage,
 Kind Polyxenus, and the king who reign'd
 Supreme, great Celeus, she her rites explain'd;
 Those sacred mysteries, for the vulgar ear
 Unmeet; and known, most impious to declare!
 Oh! let due reverence for the gods restrain 630
 Discourses rash, and check inquiries vain!

Thrice happy he among the favour'd few,
 To whom 'tis given those glorious rites to view!
 A fate far different the rejected share;
 Unblest, unworthy her protecting care,
 They'll perish; and with chains of darkness bound,
 Be plung'd for ever in the gulf profound!

Her laws establish'd, to the realms of light,
 With Proserpine she wings her towering flight:
 The sacred powers assume their seat on high, 640
 Beside the god, whose thunders shake the sky.

Happy, thrice happy he of human race,
 Who proves deserving their benignant grace!
 Plutus, who from his unexhausted stores
 To favour'd mortals boundless treasure pours,
 Th' auspicious deities to him shall fend;
 And prosperous fortune shall his steps attend.

And now, O Ceres! at thy hallow'd shrine
 Submissive bow the Eleusian line:
 Antron's dark rocks re-echo with thy praise, 650
 And sea-furrowed Paros thee obeys.
 Goddess! through whom the season's circling flight
 Successive blessings pours, and new delight;
 And thou, O lovely Proserpine, reward
 With honour'd age, and tranquil joys, the bard
 Who sings your acts; and soon his voice he'll raise
 And other strains shall celebrate your praise.

NOTES ON THE HYMN TO CERES.

Ver. 32. "And ocean's briny swell with smiles is crown'd."

The same figure is used by the Psalmist somewhat heightened.—"The vallies shall stand so thick with corn that they shall laugh and sing."
 Psal. lxx. 14.

Ver. 49. "Not to the white-arm'd nymphs with beauty crown'd,"

Her lov'd companions reach'd the mournful sound."
 The original is, ἡ ἀγλαοκκετος ελαιαι; "neither did the beautiful fruited olives hear her.

 This passage Ruhnkenius gives up as unintelligible
 Probably ελαιαι should be read instead of ελαιαι and in that case it would signify; "Neither did he
 "beautiful-wristed (white-arm'd) companion
 "hear her voice." Αγλαοκκετος is used by Piri-dar in that sense, and applied to Thetis in his thir-Nemæan Ode.

Ver. 56. "But he, at distance from their air
 Sits in his hallow'd fanc"—— [bowet

This idea is very consistent with the imperfect stem of heathen polytheism in the earlier ages of reece, when it was supposed Jupiter himself would know nothing of any transaction, unless loudly present. Thus Thetis advises Achilles to save the army, and retire to his ships; and promises that, when Jupiter returned from a feast in Ithopia, she would request him to favour their use. This passage is thus elegantly translated by Fr. Pope—

The fire of gods, and all th' ethereal train,
In the warm limits of the farthest main,
Shall mix with mortals, nor disdain to grace
The feast of Ethiopia's blameless race.
Twelve days, the powers indulge the genial rite;
Turning with the twelfth revolving light,
When will I mount, &c."

II. Lib. i. l. 554.

er. 76. "A fable veil athwart her shoulders
"throws."

Ceres is said to have worn a black veil by the Grecian poets, either as a sign of sorrow for the loss of Proserpine, or to conceal her grief from observation. But it was used as an ornamental part of dress, richly embroider'd and transparent, in very early ages. Homer describes a beautiful one offered by the Trojan matrons at the altar of Minerva: (II. Lib. 6. l. 293.) And Penelope's is thus described by Pope, in his translation of the eighteenth book of his Odyssey.

"A veil translucent o'er her brow display'd,
Her beauty seems, and only seems to shade."

We find Rebecca makes use of one, on being informed that Isaac was approaching to meet her. (Gen. xxiv. 65.) When Judah meets Thamar likewise, she is described, as covering herself with a veil, (Gen. xxxviii. 14.) This phrase is rather remarkable, as Judah, on that account possibly, supposed her to be a courtesan; and it is said, that slaves formerly in Greece wore larger veils than other people. Euripides makes Andromache complain in his play of that name—"I was conducted from my husband's bed to the strand, my face covered with the veil of a captive." It is well known, that the veil of female slaves in the Levant, at present, covers the whole body, and that the Greeks have been more tenacious of their old customs, than most other nations. May not this account for the daughters of Celeus, though struck with the venerable appearance of Ceres, proposing an employment to her, on seeing her wear a veil appropriated to women of inferior rank, which otherwise would have scarcely been consistent with their amiable characters? (See l. 275.)

Ver. 98. "Unknown to me the author of her
"grief."

Some part of Hecate's speech appears to have been lost. She relates nothing more to Ceres, than what she knew before; and yet, from what follows, one would suppose that her information had convey'd to the goddess some additional cause of grief and vexation.

Ver. 159. "Four gentle nymphs light-moving
"o'er the plain approach."

This circumstance is mentioned by Pausanias, and bears some resemblance to that beautiful passage in Genesis, which gives so pleasing an idea to the simplicity and artless benevolence of the primitive times:—When Rebecca went with her pitcher to the well, and found there the servant of Abraham—"He ran to meet her and said, Let me I pray thee drink a little water of thy pitcher—And she said, Drink, my Lord: and she hasted and let down her pitcher upon her hand, and gave him drink: and when she had done giving him drink, she said; I will draw water for thy camels also, until they have done drinking. And she hasted, and emptied her pitcher into the trough, and ran again unto the well to draw water, and drew for all his camels." Gen. xxiv. 17. Can modern politeness exceed the humanity of the action, or refinement in language improve the description of it!

Ver. 184. "Attend to no fictitious tale of woe'
Reluctant from the Cretan coast I came."

This affirmation of truth by way of proem to a fabulous relation, seems to reflect no great credit on the integrity of Ceres, or judgment of the bard. It is, however, no uncommon mode of beginning a narrative story among the Grecian poets, and Proserpine uses nearly the same expression when she acquaints Ceres with the manner in which she was carried off by Pluto. Ulysses, in giving a false account of himself to Minerva, begins with assuring her that he would speak merely what was true, and then says he was of Cretan extraction. (Od. B. 14. l. 192.) What is rather remarkable, in giving two other feigned accounts of himself, he declares that he was born in Crete. (Od. B. 13. l. 256. and B. 19. l. 131.) From these concurrent circumstances, may not * Cretan falsehood have been a proverbial expression long before the days of Epimenides, and glanced at both in the Odyssey and in this poem?

It is somewhat strange that people of suspected characters in regard to truth, generally preface their speeches with some compliment to their own veracity, or with expressing a detestation of falsehood: and, if they mean to deceive, begin with protesting that they had no such design; though true policy would suggest to them the expediency of avoiding the slightest insinuation which might lead even to a suspicion of deceit. But the language of falsehood has been similar in all ages, and the Roman poet, with great judgment, makes Sinon, after having mentioned the only true circumstance of his story, proceed in this manner—

—"nec si miserum fortuna Sinonem Finxit, vanum etiam mendacemq; improba finget."
Æn. L. 2.

"Wretch as he is, yet Sinon can defy
The frowns of fortune, and abhors a lie."—PITT.
Vigil is perhaps more conspicuous for his intimate acquaintance with the minute recesses of the human heart, than for the extent of his knowledge, or the sublimity of his genius.

Ver. 297.—"the dusky mantle drew
To hide her deep-felt anguish from their view."

Here probably should follow the lines which the Scholiasit on Nicander alludes to,—(See Preface,) and likewise some explanation of the miraculous appearance assumed by Ceres, which induced them not to look on her as a goddess, but to consider it as a sign of her being favoured by some deity, or an omen of divine approbation in regard to her taking charge of Demophon.—Something of this kind seems to be wanting, for by the few lines of Metanira's speech that are preserved, and immediately follow, we find her impressed with no veneration for Ceres, but speaking to her with the greatest freedom.

Ver. 337. "She shrieks in agony—she smites her thighs."

This was a common method among the ancients of expressing grief, or any violent emotion of the mind.—Plutarch in his life of Fabius, says, "That he struck his thigh on seeing his troops flying from their enemies"—probably through shame and vexation. Aïus expresses rage and indignation in the same manner.—II. Lib. 12. l. 162. And Achilles his surprize and anger.—II. Lib. 15. l. 125.—In the holy scripture it is represented as a sign of sorrow and unfeigned repentance. Thus Jeremy xxxi. 19. "Surely after that I was turned, I repented; and after that I was instructed, I smote upon my thigh." And Ezekiel much to the same purport says, xii. 12. "Cry and howl, son of man! for it shall be upon my people: it shall be upon all the princes of Israel—terrors by reason of the sword shall be upon my people; smite therefore upon thy thigh!"—i. e. in token of grief and contrition.

Ver. 528. "In transport from the mountain's brow she flies."

It is evident from the few and imperfect words preserved in the original Greek manuscript, that an affectionate dialogue between Ceres and Proserpine took place, after this line.—There is great reason to regret the frequent defects of the Moscow MS. in this part of the poem.

Ver. 535. "One tedious third of the revolving year."

See an observation on this passage at the end of the preface.—Some few lines of the original seem to have been lost, where the vacancy is left in the page, from the abruptness of Ceres' question to Proserpine.

Ver. 548. "I ate reluctant the pernicious seed."

Here appears to be an omission, unless the speech of Proserpine has been transposed through some mistake. It should probably have begun with the following line—

"Joyful I wander'd through the Nyssian plain."

And after that which now concludes the speech, should follow the account of Mercury's coming to her in the palace of Pluto, with which it now begins. As it stands at present, Proserpine concludes her narrative with telling Ceres, that she is still sorrowful, and the lines that immediately follow, describe their mutual joy at meeting each other.

Ver. 586. "Soon Hecate approach'd."

This passage is rather obscure in the original—she seems indeed both here and in other two places to have been introduced very needlessly, unless something allegorical was intended. The interview between Rhea and Ceres, which almost immediately follows, appears plainly to be so.

Ver. 628. "Thofe sacred mysteries for the vulgar ear
Unmeet; and known most impious to declare."

Diodorus observes of the religious rites prescribed by Orpheus, meaning the Eleusinian mysteries, that it was unlawful for those not initiated to inquire into their meaning; and there was a law at Athens, which condemned those to death who divulged any thing concerning them.

Ver. 638. "Her laws established."

Herodotus, in the second book of his history, relates that the mystic rites of Isis were originally carried from Egypt to Greece by the daughters of Danaus; and that the Pelagic women were instructed by them in the nature, design, and forms of their celebration. From the same authority, strengthened by that of Apollodorus, it hath been supposed that these mysteries, disguised under other names and other forms, were afterwards celebrated at Eleusis in honour of Ceres; and obtained the name of Thesmophoria.

The Eleusinian mysteries were, however, divided into two distinct classes. The Thesmophoria were in the subordinate class.

A striking similitude hath been frequently observed, by the curious inquirers into ancient customs, between the mysteries of Isis and Ceres: and the supposition, that the latter were borrowed from the former, is supported by the strongest analogy, as well as by the most respectable authority.

Many of the learned indeed have conjectured that Greece was indebted to Orpheus for their introduction into that country: and that this ancient bard had an eye to the Egyptian mysteries in their institution; and accommodated the general plan of the one, to the particular genius and design of the other. Some have even conjectured that the hymns which have been transmitted to the present times, under the name of Orpheus, were the same that were originally sung at the celebration of the rites of Ceres. This honour, Pausanias remarks, had never been conferred on the hymns of Homer; who, probably, by indulging his fancy in fictions of its own creation, and departing with too bold a licence from the established traditions of the gods, had rendered his hymns unfit for their worship. It was for this unwarrantable stretch of poetic liberty that his works were proscribed by Plato.

The Egyptian priests threw an awful and ambiguous veil over their religious rites; and, having enjoined silence and secrecy, as indispensable terms of initiation, gave an air of pomp and solemnity to institutions that were trifling, and doctrines that were absurd. The simplest truths were lost in the crowd of mystic rites which gathered thick upon them; and, while historical facts were veiled beneath the dress of allegory, it was difficult to distinguish the real from the fictitious; or to tell, with certainty, where the annalist ended his record, and where the mythologist took up his fable.

The Grecians changed the names, but retained and exaggerated the stories of Egypt; they sometimes debased, at other times they improved and embellished them. That which amused the fancy, length was admitted as the truth; and what at first was meant to be figurative, was, in process of time, believed to be literal.

If this hymn should not be supposed to allude to the Egyptian Isis, figured under the character of Ceres, and to Proserpine, as an emblem of the corn being hid part of the year beneath the earth; may not the story on which it is founded be simply this?—The conjecture is vague, but it is not excusable, as many instances occur of the Greek poets blending history with allegory.

Pluto, probably king of the Molossians, wages war against the Eleusinians, wastes their country, and carries off their corn—a famine ensues—Jupiter, his brother, ruler over great part of Greece, who had connived at the invasion, thinks proper at length to obtain a peace for them, on their paying to Pluto one third of their tillage by way of tribute. They again cultivate their country, and Rhea, Ceres, and Jupiter are reconciled; i. e. the earth produces corn, and the people are under the protection of their neighbouring king.

Ver. 644. "Pluto, who from his unexhausted stores."

The conclusion of the story seems evidently allegorical, and intended to convey this plain and excellent moral. "That those people shall grow rich who apply diligently to agriculture, and the cultivation of their lands. Plutus probably was called the son of Ceres on that account.

SIX OLYMPIC ODES,

OF

P I N D A R.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GREEK,

BY HENRY JAMES PYE, ESQ.

---

P R E F A C E.

---

It is surprising, that while the prince of Roman poetry has been either imitated or translated by every dabbler in Helicon, his Grecian archetype should have remained almost unattempted. Horace it is true, sets forth in strong terms, the danger attending such an attempt; while Cowley, by his ill success, has but too truly verified his prediction. But the regularity and confinement of Latin versification by no means suited the Pindaric use, used to the more extended licence, and varied dialects, of the Greek: And the failure of Cowley must be imputed to the great liberties he took in altering, not only the expressions, but the apparent meaning of the poet he professed to imitate; and, to use his own phrase, being determined not to fall into the common error of other translators, by fearing to shoot beyond his mark; he has but too often shot far wide of it.

The English is, of all languages, most calculated to copy the lyric compositions of Greece; witness the Elfrida and Caractacus of Mason, and the incomparable odes of Gray. And how well Mr. West has employed that language in the translation of Pindar, and how happily he has avoided the danger, foretold by Horace, and experienced by Cowley, is too well known to require any repetition.

That translations of the ancient poets, if faithfully executed, and the connection of their thoughts properly preserved, are of use even to the learned reader, is asserted by one of the best critics this country ever produced. The author of Polymetis informs us, that he never perfectly understood the satires and epistles of Horace, till he read Pope's imitations of them. How necessary, then, must such assistance be to the explanation of a poet, of all others the most daring in his flights; and whose meaning has been so much perplexed by fanciful and tasteless commentators!

Of my own attempt I shall only say, that I have studiously endeavoured to give the sense of the original as exactly as possible; not taking too great a liberty in paraphrasing, on one hand; nor on the other, suffering the spirit of the poet to escape me, by adhering too closely to his letter. I have added notes on some obscure passages, in which I often refer to Mr. West's dissertation on the Olympic games; with whose performances I never mean to interfere, my utmost ambition being only to follow his steps, though I fear, laud passibus æquis.

O D E IV.

TO PSAUMIS OF CAMARINA, ON HIS VICTORY IN THE CHARIOT RACE.

ARGUMENT.

The poet, after an invocation to Jupiter, extols Psauimis for his victory in the chariot race, and his desire to honour his country. From thence he takes occasion to praise him for his skill in training horses, his hospitality, and his love of peace; and mentioning the history of Erginus, excuses the early whiteness of his hair.

STROPHE.

THOU who o'er the realms above!
Beh' the unwearied thunder borne,
Uest thy shining car! immortal Jove!
Ain in the circling hours return
Aakes my lyre, and sends me forth
Ainefs of heroic worth.
Set to the virtuous ever found the lays
Wh'ch tell a friend's success, or chant his praise.
O n of Saturn! who on Atna's brow,
T woody load of Typhon's giant breast,
H'ft thy abode; O let the graces now
L're thee to assist the strain, address'd

To greet the victor in the Olympic strife;
Of every virtuous deed, the lustre, and the life.

ANTI-STROPHE.

Triumphant on his conquering car
With Pila's sacred olive crown'd,
Lo! Psauimis comes; the echoing shores afar
Fair Camarina's praise resound;
For to his own illustrious name
The patriot joins his country's fame. 29
O may the immortal gods propitious hear
His future vows, and grant each pious prayer!
Well is he skill'd to train the generous steed,
Fair plenty crowns his hospitable gate,

With breast sincere he courts the placid meed
Of peace, the guardian power of every state.
No hues fallacious tinge my honest lay,
Experience to the world will every truth display.

EPODE.

Experience taught each Lemnian maid
No more to scorn * Clymenus' valiant son, 30
What time in brazen arms array'd

* Ergenes.

In the long course the envied prize he won,
When, taking from Hypsipyle the crown,
He thus the royal maid address'd:
Behold the man! nor great in speed alone!
My hand unvanquish'd, undismay'd my breast,
These silver tresses lo! are spread
Untimely, on a youthful head;
For oft capricious nature's rage,
Gives to the vigorous brow, the hoary tint of age.

NOTES ON ODE FOURTH.

Pfaumis of Camarina was, according to the Scholiast, the son of Acron; and got the victory in the chariot race in the eighty-second Olympiad, about the time that Rome was governed by the Decemviri. Camarina was a city of Sicily, now called Camarana

Ver. 1. Who o'er the realms above
By the unwearied thunder borne,
Urgest thy shining car,——

I find the word Ελαίη rendered in most of the Latin interpretations vibrator, or impulsor. And in Sudorius's poetical version, printed at the end of the Oxford Pindar, it is thus translated:

O qui coruscâ fulgura dextrâ
Fulmenque torques.——

The word Ελαίη in this sense, when connected with ἀκαμαϊστόδος, strikes me, as occasioning a confusion of images; but, by considering it as derived from a very usual sense of Ελαίω, viz. equito, this confusion is removed. My opinion is favoured by the elder Scholiast, who says, την βροχὴν ὁ Πίνδαρος ὡς ἵππον ὑφίσταται τῷ Διὸς διὸ καὶ ἀκαμαϊστόδα αὐτὴν ἵππον: And the more modern Scholiast, though he afterwards rather inclines to the other interpretation, says first, Ἐλαίη ὑπέταίς βροντας. ὡς ἐπὶ ἵππῳ χεῖνται, τῷ λόγῳ.

Ver. 28. Experience to the world will every truth display.] I own this transition seems to me the most abrupt and confused of any in Pindar and the story of Erginus appears to be brought in without any apparent reason, as the poet himself makes no mention of Pfaumis's gray hairs, though all his scholiasts and commentators do.

Ver. 33.—Hypsipyle]—She was daughter Thoas, king of Lemnos, and instituted funeral games in honour of her father: to which the Argonauts were invited; amongst whom was Erginus, the son of Clymenus, who, having white hair was ridiculed by the Lemnian women, as unfit to contend for the prize; but beating Zetus and Cleis, sons of Boreas, in the race, their contempt was changed into admiration. The learned reader must forgive my accenting the penultimate Clymenus, which he will call making a false quantity. I shall shelter myself from his indignation, by pleading our common pronunciation of many Greek names; for example, Cleomenes, Eumenes, &c. though I could defend myself on more safe principles, viz. the different effects of accent and quantity, the subject is amply treated of, as far as it relates to the Greek language, by the late master of Eton school, in his answer to Dr. Galley; and is brought home to English versification in an excellent treatise just published, entitled, “An Essay on the Harmony of Human Speech;” to both which ingenious performances I refer the reader who is desirous of information on this much-disputed point.

O D E VI.

TO AGESIAS, OF SYRACUSE, ON HIS VICTORY GAINED BY THE ATHENE, OR CHARIOT DRAWN BY MULES.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE poet, after comparing the opening of his ode to the beautiful portico of a palace built by a skillful architect, celebrates Agesias on account of his Olympic victory, his being guardian of the altar of Jupiter, and being admitted to the rights of a citizen at Syracuse; and from these circumstances compares him to Amphiaras. Then he mentions his ancestors; and speaking of Pitana, and Evadne, has a long digression on the birth of Iamus. The poet then returns to Agesias, and declares himself to be some measure of the same country; and exhorts Æneas, the leader of the chorus, to exert himself directing him to celebrate Ageſias, for his being an inhabitant of Sicily, and for his friendship with Hiero, king of Syracuſe: And congratulating him on his good fortune in having two countries, concludes with a prayer to Neptune for his proſperity.

STROPHE I.

THE ſkilful architect whoſe dædal hand
Overtives the far-replendent dome to raiſe,
Riſes the bright porch on ſhapely columns ſtand,
That rich with gold and poliſh'd marble, blaze.—
So we ſuperbly pour along
A conſcious dignity the opening ſong.
To him Olympia's wreath who wears,
Who guards the thunderer's ſacred fane,
And every ſocial bleſſing ſhares,
With Syracuſa's happy train; 10
Each friendly voice ſhall notes of triumph blow,
And each unenviſous hand, a votive wreath beſtow.

ANTISTROPHE I.

In this thrice honour'd ſtate by fortune plac'd
The happy ſon of Soſtratus behold!
For is the warrior, or the ſeaman graced
By ſloth: 'Tis toil muſt every worth unfold.
Honour and endleſs fame await
The man, who ſeeks through danger to be great.
To thee, Ageſias, ſhall belong
The worthy praiſes, which of old 20
Adrastus with no flattering tongue.
On Amphiarus, ſacred ſeer! beſtow'd:
What time the fatal earth with yawning womb,
Him and his fiery ſteeds cloſed living in the tomb.

EPODE I.

Now ſeven funeral pyres begun
To ſhed a lurid blaze around,
When * Talauſ's forrowing ſon
Pour'd to the Theban hoſt this mournful ſound:
O how I languiſh to behold
The braveſt of my warrior train, 30
Well ſkill'd the deep beſtets of fate to unfold,
Or ſpread deſtruction o'er the embattl'd plain!"
To him, the Syracuſan youth, belong
Such praiſe, to whom I tune the Olympic ſong.
No ſon of diſcord, I proclaim
His worths, his triumphs are the ſame:
And with an oath confirm the unerring ſtrain,
Form'd by the favouring help of all Aonia's train.

STROPHE II.

Come then, O Phintis! to the ſhining car
With ſpeed, with ſpeed, the foaming courſers join;
That whirling o'er the pureſt paths aſar.
We reach his anceſtors high-honour'd line.
Above the reſt my courſers know
When Piſa's olive decks the hero's brow,
To bear him o'er the founding road
Where, far from dark oblivion's cell,
Bright honour holds her high abode,
And fame and glory ever dwell.
Now wide the gates of harmony diſplay, 49
For to Eurota's ſhores I guide the founding lay.

ANTISTROPHE II.

To fair Pitana ſing, who whilom bore
Evadne, beauteous in her hair that flows.
Compreſs'd by Neptune on the ſilent ſhore,
With ſtrictest care ſhe hid her virgin throes;
But when the circling moons her pain
Maturely brought, ſhe bade her female train,

* Adraſtus,

To Æpytus' parental hands
With ſilent care the child convey;
Phafana's turrets who commands,
Where Alpheus pours his ſilver-winding way: 60
On whoſe enamell'd brink ſhe learn'd to prove,
In great Apollo's arms, the bluſhing rites of love,

EPODE II.

As o'er heaven's eternal field
Roll'd the hours in circling pace,
Time to Epytas reveal'd
The produce of the ſtolen embrace;
Now to Pytho's ſacred ſhrine
Eager flies the anxious king.
To try the aſſiſtance of the powers divine,
And to his labouring boſom quiet bring. 70
Evadne in his abſence, left alone,
With trembling hands unloos'd her purple zone;
And, wandering far from human aid,
Beneath the wood's impervious ſhade,
Laid her young offspring on the foſtering earth;
Smil'd for Lucina's power on his auſpicious birth.

STROPHE III.

Not long, Iamus, on the lonely glade
Unnotic'd, unprotected, didſt thou lie:—
For by the gods command, lo through the ſhade!
Two watchful dragons dart with azure eye.
And from the bees transparent hoard
A little breas't with dulcet nurture ſtor'd. 80
Meanwhile from Pytho's rocky ſhore
The wandering king, return'd again,
With anxious care now tried to explore
The fruit of fair Evadne's plain;
For ſhining Phœbus from his ſacred ſhrine Proclaim'd Evadne's love, and own'd the boy divine.

ANTISTROPHE III.

And openly proclaim'd his future worth
Above mankind in myſtic lore to ſhine, 90
And ne'er be wanting in the happy birth
Of glorious ſons:—thus ſpake the voice divine!
Five days were paſs'd the mother's pain,
Unſound the infant by the careful train.
Far from the reach of every eye,
Deep in the irriguous ruſhes laid,
While purple violets growing by,
With dewy leaves his body ſhade:
His mother's voice at length the place proclaim'd,
And from his fragrant couch the heavenly infant
nam'd. 100

EPODE III.

As the gently circling hours
Still their foſtering influence ſhed,
And opening manhood's roſeate flowers
Kindly crown'd his blooming head;
Deſcending then to Alpheus' ſhores,
While round his head the night-winds blow,
He calls the god who rules where ocean roars,
And Phœbus dreadful with his ſilver bow:
Deſiring public fame, and fair renown,
Might with their verdant wreaths his temples
crown.— 110
Soon each paternal voice divine
Own'd him as ſprung from heavenly line;

"Rife, son, and this propitious found pursue,
Till Pisa's crowded plains rife to thy raptur'd view."

STROPHE IV.

The hero straight the voice obey'd; and now
Cronius, thy cliffs and rocky heights they scale;
There the kind gods the twofold art bestow
Of augury, that never knew to fail;
There, many a dreadful labor done,
At length when great Alcmena's son
Arriv'd, and bade the awful shrine
Sacred to potent Jove arise,
And first began those rites divine,
Where courage wins the Olympic prize;
He rais'd the crowded fane's prophetic fame,
Whilst Græcia's shouting sons iamus worth proclaim.

ANTISTROPHE IV.

Hence endless fame, and happy fortunes wait
On the Iamida's exulting race.—
Those who in virtue's rugged ways are great
The most conspicuous paths of life shall grace,
Still glorious deeds the hero speak
Though envy burst her venom'd cheek,
And teach her offspring to despise
The man, on Pisa's trophied plain Whose coursers know th' Olympic prize
In the twelve-turn'd course to gain.—
Nor have the gods, Agefias, given to air
Thy fire's propitious vows, and every pious prayer.

EPODE IV.

Who beneath the sacred shade
Which Cyllene's mountains shed,
Honours due for ever paid
To Hermes' venerable head;
To him who cleaves the yielding skies,
The herald of the ethereal train,
Who in the Olympic strife appoints the prize,
And guards Arcadia's happy-peopled plain.
He and his thundering fire to thee decreed,
O son of Sosttratus! the glorious meed.—
A sudden thought I raptur'd feel,
Which, as the whetstone points the steel,
Brightens my sense, and bids me warbling raise
To the soft breathing flute, the kindred notes of praise.

STROPHE V.

From fair Arcadia too my line I bring,
From Stymphalus the bright Metopa came,
Mother of warlike Thebes, whose silver spring
I drink, and votive songs of triumph frame.
Æneas, bid your friends now raise.
Their voices to Parthenian Juno's praise;
Then shall be known if we avoid
Of dullness the long-borne disgrace
Which ancient malice has employ'd
To stigmatize Bæotia's race;
To thee the secrets of the muse belong,
And well thou know'st to guide the far resounding song.

ANTISTROPHE V.

To Syracusa's and Orygia's praise,
Tell them aloud to swell the exulting strain:
Whose plains with blameless sceptre Hiero sways,
Performing sacred rites to Ceres' fane,
To her loved daughter, Pluto's love;
And him the king of gods, Ætnean Jove.
Him the sounding lyre and song,
Know and honour as their friend;
Ne'er may time that rolls along
To his blessings give an end,
Still may he, fortune's friend, with cheerful
voice

In bold Agefias' worth and votive hymns rejoice.

EPODE V.

Stymphalus' maternal vales,
And Arcadia's fleecy glades
Leaving:—here his fortune calls
To Sicilia's fragrant shades;
Either country claims him now;—
When the midnight tempests roar,
And raging loud the stormy whirlwinds blow,
Two anchors best the shatter'd vessel moor.
On each may heaven its guardian care bestow!
And thou who rulest where ocean's torrent
flow,
Amphitrite's honour'd mate,
Through the rocks and shoals of fate
Propitious guide Agefias' bark along,
And grace with livelier flowers my rapture-breathing song.

NOTES ON ODE SIXTH.

Agefias, the son of Sosttratus, is sometimes called of Syracuse, sometimes of Stymphalus, a city of Arcadia; and the opinion of most of the commentators seems to be, that, of his father's side, he was a Syracusan, of his mother's an Arcadian: but from the tenor of the ode itself, I rather incline to think he was a native of Stymphalus, and afterwards inhabited Syracuse: most likely drawn thither by the friendship of Hiero; and this idea I have followed in my translation. Συνοικισθῆσε τῶν κλεινῶν Συρακῶσαν, seems, I think, to intimate his being admitted to a participation of the rights of the Syracusans, rather than his being a citizen himself. And where the poet makes use of the expression μάτρωσις ἀνδρῶσις, it may only mean that his maternal ancestors lived in the part of Arcadia contiguous to the mountain Cyllene, and were priests of Mercury. But I can see no reason to infer from this that his paternal ancestors were not Arcadians; or to imagine from any other part of the ode, that they were inhabitants of Sicilia. One of the Greeks who accompanied the young Cyrus in his expedition, near a century after this was of the same name and country, and is oft mentioned by Xenophon, who had a particular friendship for him.

Mr. West, in his learned dissertation on the Olympic games, gives the following account of the ἀπόνη. "The Apene was a chariot drawn by two mules, after the manner of the synoris*, as Ptolemaeus tells us; and was introduced into the Oly-

* The synoris was a chariot drawn by two full-grown horses.

ic games by one Afandraſtus, as we learn from Pindar's Scholiaſt. I have called it a chariot, though, if it reſembled the apené deſcribed by Homer in the 24th Iliad, it ſhould more properly be called a waggon: And indeed that account of it agrees beſt with what Pauſanias ſays, who obſerves, that the race of the apené could pretend to neither antiquity, nor beauty; and that mules were held in ſuch deteſtation by the Eleans, that they permitted none of thoſe animals to be bred in their country."

The original is

To ſtand in a perſon's ſhoes, is a well-known Engliſh proverbial expreſſion. This is a ſtriking inſtance of the different genius of languages; what ſo ſublime in the Greek would be the height of ridicule in Engliſh.

Ver. 21. Adraſtus with no flattering tongue
On Amphiaræus, ſacred ſeer! beſtow'd:

Adraſtus, ſon of Talaus, was king of the Argives: Polyneices, ſon of Oedipus, married his daughter; who being killed, Adraſtus made war with the Thebans in behalf of his ſon Therſander; where he loſt a battle before each of the ſeven gates of the city; and being unable to recover the dead bodies of his ſoldiers, he applied to Theſeus, who prevailed on the Thebans to permit him to erect a funeral pile before each gate. Amphiaræus, ſon of Oicleus, was a celebrated augur that accompanied him, and was ſwallowed up by the earth, at the command of Jupiter.

Ver. 33. Come then, O Phintia! — Φίνης, Dorice for Φάλης, anima. I have choſen to keep the Greek word as a proper name. Sudorius does the ſame in his Latin verſion; only he puts Phintia.

This is an advantage the Latin tranſlators have over thoſe who attempt to give the ſenſe of an ancient poet in their native language. If the Greek is rendered faithfully, without offending the rules either of concord or quantity, it is ſufficient. The reader may find out the meaning if he can. There are numberleſs inſtances of this in Sudorius's verſion. The paraphraſe of this paſſage in the Oxford Pindar is as follows—Atque interim illa, ſolutâ virginâ zonâ, parturiendo præcurs prænunciatque aquas, & ſanguinem cum fœtu fundens, &c.—Another Commentator ſays, Eſt autem verrecunda partûs deſcriptio, αργυρεία κάλπις, Argentæa Amphora, eſt aqua fœtum præcurrens, zona Φοινικέστρος eſt ſanguineus humor, et involucrem in quo fœtus uterum maternum egreditur. ## O D E VIII.

TO ALCIMEDON, ON HIS OLYMPIC VICTORY; TIMOTHENES, ON HIS NEMEAN VICTORY; AND MELESIAS, THEIR PRECEPTOR.

THE ARGUMENT.

Though this is called an Olympic Ode, the poet does not confine himſelf to Alcimedon, who won the prize in thoſe games; but celebrates his brother Timotheſenes, for his ſucceſs at Nemæa, and Meleſias, their inſtructor. The ode opens with an invocation to the place where the games were held. Pindar then, after praifing Timotheſenes for his early victory in the Nemean games, mentions Alcimedon, and extols him for his dexterity, and ſtrength; his beauty, and his country Ægina; which he celebrates for its hospitality, and for its being under the government of the Dorians after the death of Æacus; on whom he has a long digression, giving an account of his assisting the gods in the building of Troy. Then, returning to his subject, he mentions Meleſias as skilled himself in the athletic exercises, and therefore proper to instruct others; and, enumerating his triumphs, congratulates him on the success of his pupil Alcimedon; which, he says, will not only give satisfaction to his living relations, but will delight the ghosts of those deceased. The poet then concludes with a wish for the prosperity of him and of his family.

STROPHE I.

OLYMPIA! mother of heroic games!
Queen of true prophecy! beneath whose grove
While the red victims pile the aspiring flames,
The augurs search the high behests of Jove:
Thence try to know on whom he'll deign to smile
Of those, who, by the means of glorious toil,
Seek on the dusty cirque with generous pain, Virtue's immortal meed, and honour'd rest to gain.

ANTISTROPHE I.

For to the supplications of the good
He ever deigns a favouring ear to give, IO
O Pifa's woody shades, o'er Alpheus flood
That wave, my wreath-bestowing song receive;
Eternal fame, and endless honours shine,
On him whose brows thy sacred leaves entwine.—
For different pleasures, different bosoms glow;
And various ways to bliss the indulgent gods be-flow.

EPODE I.

Timosthenes, what fair renown
Was on your almost infant actions shed,
When genial Jove resolv'd with fame to crown
Thine and thy brother's youthful head! 20
What time Nemea shouts thy conquering name,
And Pifa's groves Alcimedon proclaim:
Lively shone his form, and face;
Nor did his deeds that form disgrace,
When, victor in the glorious strife,
He bade the listening woods around
Ægina's sea-girt shores resound;
Whose regions gave him life.

STROPHE II.

There sacred Themis sits, beloved of Jove,
Her favourite people's ever-watchful guard. 30
The crowded coasts where various nations move
To judge with skill, and sway in peace, is hard;
By heaven's decree, amidst the briny flood
This isle, to every stranger sacred, stood
A column firm. O ne'er may rolling time,
Or black misfortune, change the hospitable clime!

ANTISTROPHE II.

Here Doria's warlike race their reign begun;
Here, after Æacus, their empire rose,
Whom potent Neptune, and Latona's son,
The friend, and partner of their labor, chose, 40
What time with social care, those heavenly powers Crown'd Iliion's sacred feat, with strengthen'd
towers:
For even then the hostile fates decreed
Her ample fanes should fall, her hardy warriors
bleed.

EPODE II.

When the massy work was raised,
Three azure dragons on the new-made wall
With fury sprung—the people saw amazed
Two on the ground expiring fall;
The third with horrid roars the summit gain'd:
When Phæbus thus the fatal sign explain'd: 50

“ O Æacus, the insulting foe
Shall lay the haughty turrets low,
Which thou hast rear'd with mortal hands:
Iliion, I see thy fate decreed;
And in this omen plainly read
Immortal Jove's commands.

STROPHE III.

“ Nor shall without thy race these bulwark
fall,
Thy sons at first shall shake the new-form'd state
The hostile gods thy grandson's offspring call,
To seal its doom, and close the work of fate.” 6
Thus spoke the god, and straight o'er Xanthus
tide
His skilful hands the heavenly coursers guide,
Till midst the warrior race his chariot stood
Of Amazonian dames, by Ithier's frozen flood.

ANTISTROPHE III.

Immortal Neptune's golden horses now
To sea-beat Isthmus bear his rapid car:
There Æacus on Corinth's lofty brow
They leave, spectator of the sportive war.—
No bliss alike charms all.—The votive lays Shall envy blast, that chant Meleſias' praise?
Whose infant sinews, courting fair renown, Obtain'd Nemea's wreath, and fam'd Olympic crown.

EPODE III.

After, with manly sinews strong,
He in the great pancratiun won the prize:—
To teach, must surely to the skill'd belong,
Experience fools alone despise:
Full well the hero knows above the rest
To form with precepts sage the manly breast;
To point the surest path that leads
To glorious acts, and daring deeds,
And future wreaths of fame prepare;
And well his * pupil's fair renown,
Who now has won the thirtieth crown,
Reward's his teacher's care.

STROPHE IV.

By fortune favour'd, nor by manhood less,
Four striplings in the strife he overcame,
Bade infancy their vanquish'd limbs oppress,
And sent them home with forehead's veil'd
flame;
While to his grandfire's hoary head he brings Triumphant joy, whence health, whence vig-springs;
For he whom fortune fans with prosperous breeze
Forgets the pains of age, and near approach
death.

ANTISTROPHE IV.

Mnemosyne, awake the silver lyre,
Tune to Blespiadæ the sounding song:
Well their brave brows the flowery bands
quire,
To whom now six Olympic crowns belong.

* Alcimedon.

Nor will the muse forget the honour'd head
Though sunk to earth, and number'd with the dead.
The virtuous actions of the good and brave,
Shall rouse the sleeping dust, and pierce the silent grave. 100

EPODE IV.

Iphion 'midst the infernal seats
The pleasing news from Hermes' daughter hears;
He to Callimachus the tale repeats,
Who drinks it with exulting ears :

That Jov's supreme behest had deign'd to
grace
With Pity's sacred meet their happy race ,
Still may he good on good bestow,
No pallid sickness let them know,
Nor Nemesis their focal band
By cur'd discord e'er disjoin ;
But happy may they ever shine,
To blest their native land ! 110

NOTES ON ODE EIGHTH.

Ver. 17. Timosthenes, what fair renown.
Though this, as an Olympic ode, should belong chiefly to Alcimedon, the poet here first mentions his brother, and addresses himself particularly to him.

Ver. 31. The crowded coasts where various nations move
To judge with skill, and sway in peace, is hard.

The president Montesquieu, has the following observation in his Spirit of Laws: * Platon dit que sans une ville où il n'y a point de Commerce Maritime, il faut la Moitié moins de Loix Civiles. Et cela est très vrai, le Commerce introduit dans une même Pays différent sortes de peuples, un grand nombre de conventions, d'Espéces de biens, et de manières d'acquérir.

Ainsi dans une ville commerçante il y a moins de Juges et plus de Loix. Esprit de Loix, Liv. xx. 18.

There is the following passage in the fourth book of Plato de Legibus, near the beginning.
Εἰ μὲν γὰρ ἐπιθλαστία τε ἐμελλεν εἶναι καὶ εὐλίανος, καὶ μὴ κάμφορος, ἀλλ' ἐπιδοῖς πολλῶν, σὺγάλα τινὸς ἔδει σπῆνός τε αὐτῆ, καὶ νομοθεσίῳν ἰσίων τιῶν, εἰ μὴ πολλά ἐμελλεν ἦεν, καὶ τοικίλα καὶ φαῦλα ἔξεν τοιαύτη φύσει, γενοῖσιν.

Ægina was an island in the Ægean sea; and according to the Scholiast, had four hundred and eighty thousand inhabitants.

Ver. 37. Here Dorias' warlike race their reign begun. The scholiast informs us, that Peleus and Telamon, having killed their half-brother Phocus, led, one to Theffalia, the other to Salamis; and Eacus dying in Ægina without a successor, Triasus, an Argive, assembling some of his country men who were of the race of the Dorians, invaded the land, and took possession of it.

Ver. 57. Nor shall without thy race her bulwarks fall. It is in the original,

Οὐκ ἄντερ παιδῶν σθέν' ἀλ' λ' ἄμα πρώτοις ἀγέλαι
καὶ τείχεσσι.

This is one of the passages of Pindar that is rather obscure. I have followed the common opinion of the Commentators, who suppose πρώτος to allude to Peleus and Telamon, who assisted Hercules in his war against Laomedon: And τείχεσσι to mean Pyrrhus; who, according to Virgil, slew Priam, and was great grandson to Æacus. Sudorius does the same:

—Natus at impias
Invadet arces hæque multa
Cæde madens pronepos cremabit.

Ver. 69. No bliss alike charms all. This is rather an abrupt sentence, and does not seem to arise naturally out of the subject. Which, after all that has been said concerning the irregularity of Pindar, is seldom the case with our poet, perhaps never, when he is rightly understood. The original is,

Τερπνὸν δ' ἴν' ἀνθρώποις ἴσον ἔσσειαι ἔδν.

And Sudorius's version,

Res nulla cunctos æque homines juvat.

The Scholiast says, the ancients were much divided in their opinions concerning this passage; some supposing it to relate to the several ways Neptune, Apollo, and Æacus went when they parted; some to the different exploits of Alcimedon, Timosthenes, and Melesias.

Ver. 74. He in the great Pancratium won the prize.

The Pancratium from παν and κράτος, was the most laborious of the Athletic exercises. Some writers have improperly confounded it with the Pentathlon. There is a most accurate account of it in Welt's dissertation on the Olympic games; to which I refer the reader who desires fuller information on the subject.

Ver. 94. Tune to Blepsiadæ the sounding song.

According to the Scholiast, the Blepsiadæ were a particular tribe in Ægina, to which Alcimedon belonged; all of whom the poet imagines to be interested in the glory of his hero.

Ver. 101. Iphion midst the infernal seats
The pleasing news from Hermes' daughter hears.

In the original it is

Ἐμοῦ δὲ θυγατρὸς ἀκέρως Ἰφίων Ἀγγελίας.

* De Legibus, Lib. 3.

There is a singular beauty in personifying Ἀγγελία, and making her daughter to Mercury, which it is impossible to translate, as I know no English word capable of rendering Ἀγγελία. Sudorius did not find his Latin more happy.

○ Iphio ut illic Angelliam audit
Natam volantis Mercuris alitem.

I could also have used the Greek word; but I think it has not at all the happy effect which strikes me so much in the original. The Scholiast says, some suppose Iphion and Callimachus to be simply relations to Alcimedon; and others, that they were his father and uncle. I think this passage in the ode strongly favours the latter opinion:

Παῖρι δὲ πατρὸς ἐπέπνευσεν μῖνος
Γέρας ἀνίπαλλον.

The address to the grandfather supporting the supposition of his father being dead.

O D E IX.

TO EPHARMOSTUS OF OPUS, ON HIS OLYMPIC AND PYTHIAN VICTORIES.

THE ARGUMENT.

PINDAR begins the ode with mentioning the hymn composed by Archilochus, and indiscriminate sung before such of the Olympic victors as were not fortunate enough to have a poet to celebrate their particular exploits. He then invokes the Muses, to assist him in praising Epharmostus for his success at Olympia and Pythia, and tells them it requires no common share of genius. He then speaking of his country, commends him for raising its honour by his skill and success in athletic exercises, and implores the assistance of the Graces; asserting, that no glory can be expected without the aid of the superior Powers,—by whose help, he says, Hercules was able to oppose Neptune, Apollo, and Pluto. Here he checks himself, reflecting, that it is wrong to sing of any thing that may cast dishonour on the gods; and, describing Deucalion's flood, addresses Epharmostus and the citizens of Opus, as being descendants from him and Pyrrha, by means of their daughter Protogeni who was carried away by Jupiter, and had a son by him named Opus, who founded the city that name. Him he celebrates for his hospitality, and, enumerating his friends, particularly mentions Menæctius. From thence he digresses to the story of his son Patroclus and Achilles attacked Telephus. The poet now, invoking again the Muses, desires to commemorate the victories gained by Epharmostus and his kinsman Lampromachus; and gives an account of their various triumphs and, asserting the superiority of native over acquired merit, and giving mental accomplishments preference to all others, he concludes with a compliment to his hero.

STROPHE I.

THE lay Archilochus prepared, the meed
Of every victor on Olympia's sand,
Might have sufficed thrice chanted, to proceed
Brave Epharmostus and his social band;
But from her bow let each Aonian maid
The glittering shafts of harmony prepare,
The heights of sacred Elis to invade,
Her shady forests, and her pastures fair;
Seats sacred still to thunder-bearing Jove,
Which Pelops gain'd, the dower of Hippodamia's
love. 10

ANTISTROPHE I.

To Pythia too one dulcet arrow send.—
Nor does that poet humble lays require
The chiefs who sing, for glory that contend.—
To princely Opus now the silver lyre
Awake, and chant her son's athletic worth.
Opus, where Themis, with her daughter, reigns,
Divine Eunomia.—Mindful of his birth,
He decks the capital of Locris' plains
With ev'ry flow'r on Alpheus' brink that grows,
And every blooming wreath Castalia's cirque bestows. 20

EPODE I.

My votive voice, in soothing lays,
Shall sing the much-loved city's praise;

And, swifter than the courser scours the plain,
Or the winged galley cleaves the yielding main,
Will send the messenger of Fame
Through all the admiring world, her honours proclaim.

If haply my assiduous hand
Shall cull the flowers that deck the Graces' la
For every hill that crowns mankind,
Must from the powers superior rise;
And every plan's by them design'd,
That forms the valiant or the wife.

STROPHE II.

Favoured by them, Alcides' nervous arm
Repelled the monarch of the briny flood;
Nor did the silver bow his heart alarm,
But, firmly, angry Phœbus' rage he stood;
Nor could stern Pluto's rod his breast dismay,
Which drives the dying to his drear abodes:—
Rash quse, desist! nor urge the impious lay;
Hateful's the wisdom that blasphemes the gods:
'Tis madness, strength absurdly thus to boast,
And mortal might compare with Heaven's tri-phant host.

ANTISTROPHE II.

Let war and discord, with the ill's
bring,
Be banished distant from the ethereal train:

Fair Protogenia's new-raised city sing,
Where, from Parnassus to the level plain,
Deucalion and his mate descending first,
By Jove's command the rising dome design'd;
While from the stones their living offspring burst,
To fill the nations, and renew mankind.-- 50
Let, strains like these their pleas'd defendants hear, [the ear.
Old wine delights the taste, new numbers charm

EPODE II.

Of old o'er earth's involved head,
The congregated waters spread,
And o'er the wasted country urged their course;
Till Jove, relenting, check'd their ruthless force,
And bade their native beds again
The raging waves absorb, and spare the ravaged
plain.

From Pyrrha and Deucalion then
Your fires arose, a hardy race of men. 60
Thence your honour'd lineage springs,
The offspring of a god's embrace;
And hence, for ever native kings,
With glory reigns the warlike race.

STROPHE III.

Opus, thy daughter erst Olympic Jove
To shady Mænalus from Elis bore;
And there compelling with impetuous love,
Restor'd her to her plighted * lord once more,
Her womb then teeming with the heavenly child;
Left fate his days without a son should claim. 70
The hero on the foster'd infant smil'd,
Pleas'd with his form, and gave his grandfire's
name,

And subjects brave bestow'd, and fair domains;
Whence Opus' lofty walls, and Locris' hardy swains.

ANTISTROPHE III.

Drawn by his virtues, to whose friendly towers,
From Argos' Thebes' and Pisa's fertile plain,
And fair Arcadia, crowd the social powers,
Menæctus, chief among the warrior train,
He lov'd, from Æctor and Ægina sprung: 79
Whose son, when wrong'd Atrides call'd to arms,
Was nobly found the vengeful train among;
Who, when the Greeks from Telephus' alarms
Found shameful safety on the friendly flood
With Peleus' godlike son, the threatening storm withstood.

* Locrus.

EPODE III.

From hence the skillful well might find
Th' impatience of Patroclus' mind:
Achilles, therefore, with parental care,
Advis'd him ne'er alone to tempt the war --
O could I soar on daring wings, 89
Where, in her rapid car, the muse exulting sings;
(For ample power, and eager will,
Attend with dutious care her footsteps still);
Thy social worth, and Isthmian prize,
Lampromachus, should grace my lay.
When fame beheld both trophies rise
Congeital, in one rolling day.

STROPHE IV.

Twice, Epharmostus, too, thy matchless might Fair Corinth saw, and twice Nemea's ground:
Argos, thy manly brows with glory dign'd,
And Attica thy youthful forehead crown'd: 100
What praise thou mett'st in Marathon's fam'd
course!
Now, scorning with the beardless youths to run,
Match'd with the veteran race, thy rapid force,
Temper'd with skill, the silver goblet won;
Shout with exulting voice the friendly train,
To see the loveliest youth the fairest trophies gain.

LOVETSTROPHE IV.

In Lycian Jove's high feast with wonder glow'd
Parrhasia's sons, thy valour to behold;
And fair Pellana on thy worth bestow'd
Her prize, a guard secure from winter's cold. 110
Iolau's tomb, and fair Eleusis' plain,
Wash'd by the briny wave, thy deeds attest.--
Though men by labour strive applause to gain,
Yet native merit ever shines the best;
Nor shall the wreaths attain'd by toil and care,
With heaven-defended might, and inborn wrath compare.

EPODE IV.

Not every path extends the fame,
But various are the roads to fame;
With different eyes the same pursuits we view,
Nor all one wish with equal zeal pursue; 120
But his great fame shall highest soar, [Iore,
Who climbs the arduous heights of science' sacred
By which inspir'd, I now proclaim
My hero's strength, his courage, and his fame;
Who, conqueror on Oilia's plain,
Bade the bright meed of victory twine,
Great Ajax, round thy votive fane,
And grac'd with wreaths the hallow'd shrine.

NOTES ON ODE NINTH.

Ver. 1. The Lady Archilochus prepared, &c. The Scholiast tells us, Archilochus composed an ode on the victory gained by Hercules and Iolau at Olympia, called Καλλινοικος from the first word in it. Its beginning being ὦ Καλλινοικε, χαῖρε Ζηνός Ἡράκλειε. This ode it was customary to sing before every person who gained the prize at Olympia, if he had no poet to compose one purposely for the occasion.

Ver. 5. But from her bow let each Aonian maid
The glittering shafts of harmony prepare.

This manner of expression is not uncommon with our poet; he uses it in the second Olympic ode:

Ἐπεχε νῦν σκοπᾶ τόξον
Ἄγε θυμέ τίνα βάλλομεν
Ἐκ μαλθακᾶς αὐτε φρε-
-νᾶς ἐυκλείας ὄϊσους
Ἴέντες; ἐπί τοι
Ἀκράγαντι ταύσσαις.

Come on, thy brightest shafts prepare,
And bend, O muse, thy sounding bow;

Say through what paths of liquid air
Our arrows shall we throw?
On Agrigentum fix thine eye;
Thither let all thy quiver fly.

WEST.

And a little before in the same ode :

Πολλὰ μοι ὑπαρχῶ-
-νος ἄνευ βέλη
Ἐνδὸν ἐπὶ Φαρέτραις
Φανῶντα συντοίσι.

It is surprising that a man of Cowley's genius could give so very puerile a turn as he has to the first quoted passage,

Leave, wanton muse, thy roving flight,
To thy loud string the well-fetched arrow put,
Let Agrigentum be the butt,
And Theron be the white.

Ver. 10. Hippodamia] The learned reader must again forgive me for sacrificing quantity to the genius of our verse and language. I have taken the same liberty afterwards with Protogenia. Iphigenia and Hyperion are commonly pronounced in the same manner.

Ver. 33. Favoured by them Alcides nervous arm.] The Scholiast gives the following account of this passage: "These were the causes which induced Hercules to make war with the gods. With Neptune, for assisting the Pylians, whom he attacked for this reason: Having killed one Trachinius, and flying on account of the murder, he came to Neleus for his aid in expiating the crime; which being refused him, he made war on the Pylians, whom Neptune assisted, being father to Neleus and Peleus. With Apollo, because, when he consulted his oracle at Pytho, he was told that the god was absent; which enraged him so much, that he carried away the tripod. And with Plato, on account of his bringing away Cerberus by the command of Eurystheus."

Ver. 45. Fair Protogenia's new raised city [sing.] The city of Opus is here called Protogenia from the daughter of Deucalion.

Ver. 49. While from the stones their living offspring burst,
To fill the nations, and renew mankind.

This is the original :

— ἀτιγ
Δ' εὐπῶς ὀρέδαμος
Κτισσέσθαι λίθινον γόνιον.
Ἄσαι δ' ὀνόμασθαι.

By this means, giving the etymology of the Greek word Ἄσας, populus. Sudorius in his version gives the exact sense of Pindar, by keeping the Greek work, which could not have been done with propriety in an English translation :

— Jactu lapidum dederunt
Alteram prolem, vocitant et inde
Ἄσας Achivi.

The story of Deucalion and Pyrrha renewing the race of mankind, by throwing stones over their heads, is thus told by Ovid :

Descendunt velantque caput, tunicaeque re-cingunt.

Et jussos lapides sua post vestigia mittunt :
Saxa, (quis hoc credat nisi fit pro teste vetustas?)
Ponere duritiem cœpere suumque rigorem
Molliri que morâ mollitaque ducere formam.

Ov. Met. l. I.

Ver. 50. Old wine delights the taste; new numbers charm the ear.

Perhaps the poet here means to hint to his patron, the advantage he has in having an ode purposely composed for him, instead of having only the old one, common to all the Olympic conquerors

Ver. 65. Opus, thy daughter, &c.] This means Protogenia, daughter of Deucalion, who is mentioned before; she was married to Locrus, from whom the country took its name. Opus and Deucalion are the same person.

Ver. 82. And when the Greeks from Telephus' alarms,] Telephus was son of Hercules, and, opposing the Greeks in their march to Troy, was dangerously wounded by Achilles, and afterwards healed by the rust of the same spear that gave the wound :

Telephus æternâ consumptus tabe perisset,
Si non quæ nocuit dextra tulisset opem.

Ov. Trist. l. v. el. ii.

As I have mentioned Achilles, I must beg the reader's indulgence for a short digression on the story of his being rendered invulnerable by bathing in the Styx; which appears to have no foundation in any classic author, and seems to be one of those additions which the Gothic writers were so fond of making to the fables of antiquity: but though the classic authors are silent on the subject themselves, all their commentators are full of it. The following half verse of Statius, — Ad Stygios iterum fero mergere fontes.

Stat. Achil. l. i. 134

is the only line of any ancient poet that can at a be supposed to allude to such a fable; but is not sufficient of itself, unsupported by any other authority, to make us conclude that it was current in his time, though perhaps it might give rise to it in the imagination of subsequent author Monsieur Boyle, in his Dictionary, says, speaking of Achilles, "Ou a dit que sa mere l'aient plongé dans les eaux du Styx pour le rendre invulnerable, ne put procurer cet avantage au talon parce qu'elle tenoit son fils par là, Fulgence chapitre 7 du livre 3, et le Scholiate d' Horace sur l'ode 13 du livre 5, marquent qu'elle le tira par le talon. Ceux qui disent qu'il mourut d'une blessure au talon, comme Hygin chapitre 107, et Quinte Calaber au vers 62 du livre 3, conviennent au fond avec les deux autres; Servius sur le vers 57 du 6 livre d' Ennius neide dit en general qu'il étoit invulnerable excepta parte qua a matre tentus est." Bay Dict. Ant. ACHIL.

Whatever Servius, Fulgentius, &c. may say I am, that there is no word of Achilles being invulnerable, or dying by a wound in his heel, ny ancient Greek poet, nor in Virgil, Horace, or vid; and almost every fable of antiquity is alluded to in some or other of the writings of the ft. Homer actually gives an account of his sing wounded in the hand by Aſteropæus, who wrew two darts together, one of which was innocent:

Τῷ δ' ἐτέρῳ, μιν πῆκυν ἐπιγράδων βάλε χειρός
Λεξιτερῆς, σὺτο δ' αἶμα κελαινεφές —
Iliad xxi. 166

One raz'd Achilles' hand; the spouting blood
Spun forth —

POPE.

Virgil says,

Dardana qui Paradis direxti tela manusque
Corpus in Æacidæ.

Æneis, l. vi. 57.

and whoever will take the trouble to read the count of the battle between Achilles and Cyccus, in the twelfth book of Ovid's Metamorphosis, will, I believe, be convinced that the poet ad never heard the story of Achilles being invul-nerable, as well as his antagonist.

Mr. Warton, in his History of English Poetry, mentions Statius as a great favourite of the Romantic writers; from that half line, therefore, of is above quoted, it is very probable, they borrowed this story, in every circumstance agreeing to well with the character of Gothic fiction. Cervantes informs us of a hero of romance, nearly in the same circumstance. Don Quixote, speaking of the various miraculous endowments of different knights, says: "One has the gift of never being

"enchanted; another to have such impenetrable
"flesh as never to be wounded, as was the case of "the famous Roldan, one of the twelve peers of "France, of whom it is reported, that he was inca"pable of receiving a wound except in the sole of "his left foot; and there it must be made with the "point of a large needle, and no other weapon
"whatever. Therefore, when Bernardo del Carpio
"killed him at Roncevalles, seeing it impossible
"to wound him with steel, he lifted him from
"the ground in his arms, and strangled him, re-
"collecting the death that Hercules gave to An"teus, that fierce giant, said to be a son of the "earth."

Don Quixote, Part III. Book iv. Chap. 32.

Ver. 93. Thy social worth and Isthmian prize,
Lamprömachus, shall grace my lay.

The Scholia make Lamprömachus a kinsman and fellow-citizen of Epharmöküs. The elder Scholiaſt says, that some were of opinion he won the Isthmian crown the same day that his friend did the Olympic; others, that they were both Isthmi-an prizes; the younger Scholiaſt only mentions the last opinion. Indeed it was not likely that the Olympic and Isthmian games should be celebrated at the same time.

O D E X.

TO AGESIDAMUS, SON OF ARCHESTRATUS, AN EPIZEPHYRIAN LOCRIAN, ON HIS VICTORY OBTAINED BY THE CÆSIUS.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE poet begins the ode, by apologizing to Ageſidamus, for having ſo long delayed composing it; after promoting to do it. He then compliments him upon his country, and conſoles him for being worſted at the beginning of the conteſt, till encouraged by Ilaſ, by relating the ſame circumſtance of Hercules and Patroclus. He then deſcribes the institution of the Olympic games, by Hercules, after the victory he had obtained over Augeas, and the ſons of Neptune and Molione; and enumerates thoſe who won the firſt prizes in the athletic exerciſes. He then, returning to Ageſidamus, and congratulating him on having a poet to ſing his exploits, though after ſome delay, concludes with praifing him for his ſtrength and beauty.

STROPHE I.

MUSE, awake the Olympic lay,
Which to Archestratus' brave Iun we owe;
The meed I promised to beſtow,
Oblivion's icy hand had wiped away:
And thou, O truth, the favourite maid
Of thundering Jove, vouchſafe thy aid,
To quell their ſlanderous falſehoods, who pretend e'er with wilful aim deceived a truſting friend.

ANTISTROPHE I.

Full many an hour has rolled away [glow,
ſince ſhame has made my cheeks with crimſon
ſo long the promiſed meed to owe: 11
But now the ſong, with intereſt, I'll repay;

And, as where ocean's billows roar,
They clear from ſtain the pebbled ſhore,
So ſhall the breath of this my friendly ſtrain,
To liſtning crowds aſſert my ſpotleſs faith again.

EPODE I.

Where, gently fann'd by Zephyr's balmy
breeze,
Fair truth o'er Locri's colony preſides;
Her guardian, ſweet Calliope the fees,
While warlike Mars the generous care divides —
Bold Cæſus, in the hard-fought field, 21
Forced Hercules at firſt to yield;
Ageſidamus, ſo thy might
Was wavering in the Olympic fight.

Till, as Achilles' friendly tongue
 Patroclus' fainting limbs new string;
 So Ias' words thy drooping spirits fire [inspire.
 Thy slumbering virtues rouse, and godlike deeds

STROPHE II.

When emulation warms the breast, [gain;
 The youth (heaven aiding) matchless fame shall
 But few the envied prize obtain 31
 By slothful luxury and inglorious rest;
 Now, custom bids my Muse proclaim
 Jove's festival and solemn game,
 With which Alcides honour'd Pelops' shrine,
 When Neptune's baffled sons confess'd his power
 divine.

ANTISTROPHE II.

When his triumphant arm had laid,
 O blameless Cteatus! thy glory low;
 And bold Eurytas felt the blow,
 O'ercome by stratagem in Cleon's glade; 40
 From proud Augéas, to obtain
 The promised meed of toil and pain;
 And wreak on Molion's sons the fatal day. [lay.
 When stretch'd on Elis' plains his slaughter'd army

EPODE II.

Soon did the * faithless king his fraud repay,
 He saw his country's fairest hopes expire:
 Saw his exulting cities fall a prey
 To vengeful slaughter, and consuming fire;
 Saw desolation's iron reign 50
 Extend o'er all his fair domain.—
 Vain are the endeavours to withstand
 The vengeance of a mightier hand;
 Awhile he rashly tried to oppose
 The forceful entry of his shouting foes;
 Till, seeing fell destruction round him wait,
 Amidst the press he sought a voluntary fate.

STROPHE III.

On Pifa's plains the son of Jove
 Assembled, with their spoils, his conquering band;
 And bade forever sacred stand
 To his eternal fire this hallow'd grove: 60
 Bade sacred fences straight surround
 The Altis' consecrated ground;
 Whilst round, the festive seats with splendor gleam,
 And crown the verdant brink of Alpheus' honour'd stream.

ANTISTROPHE III.

Alpheus, who, with the imperial train
 Of high Olympus, shares the sacrifice;
 Where the Saturnian summits rise,
 With site conspicuous from the trophied plain;—
 There, erst when Oenomaus swayed,
 In snow was wrapped the unnoticed glade. 70
 On the first rites propitious smiled the fates;
 And time, on whom even truth for confirmation
 waits;

EPODE III.

He, rolling on with never-ceasing course,
 To the succeeding race of men, declares,
 How the rich spoils of war's resistless force,
 The godlike hero 'midst his army shares;
 And bids the festive games still cheer
 Again each fifth-revolving year.—
 Who in the contests now ordained,
 The first Olympic wreath obtained? 80

* Augéas.

Whose couriers in the rattling car,
 Or limbs exerted in the sportive war,
 Or feet inured to urge the rapid race,
 Snatched from their baffled foes the matchless olive's grace?

STROPHE IV.

On the long stadium's even course.
 Oeonus, great Licymnius' valiant son,
 The prize with active footsteps won, [force:
 Who brought from Media's plains his friendly
 Resplendent with the wrestler's oil,
 Fair victory crown'd the * Tegean's toil: 90
 While brave Dorycleus, from Tyrnthe's shore,
 The cæstus' manly prize from all his rivals bore.

ANTISTROPHE IV.

Conspicuous on his conquering car,
 The Muse Mantinian Semus' couriers sings;
 Phrastor the merring javelin sings:
 While, by Eniceus' sinews hurl'd afar, 40
 Beyond the rest the discus flies.—
 Resound the shores with friendly cries;
 While lovely Luna pours her argent light
 Full-orb'd, and cheers with rays the gloomy shades of night. 100

EPODE IV.

The echoing woods, and vaulted temples round,
 Ring with the jocund shouts, and festive strain.
 Following their great example, we resound
 Their glories who the Olympic olive gain;
 And in the far-resounding verse
 I the many victor's praise rehearse,
 And tune the hymn to awful Jove;
 Who, 'midst the sapphire plains above,
 Bids the bright-gleaming lightning fly,
 And darts the thunder through the trembling sky.
 Breathed to soft flutes sweet sounds the lingering
 lay,
 Which, formed on Dirce's brink, though long deferred, we pay.

STROPHE V.

As grateful comes the long hoped air;
 As to the expecting fire whom age and pain
 To second child-hood bend again,
 The happy offspring of a legal heir;
 The joyful tidings straight impart
 New vigour to his sinking heart;
 For wealth itself the dying breast offends,
 When to a stranger's hand the envied gift descends. 120

ANTISTROPHE V.

So he who at dread Pluto's gate
 Arrives unsung;—though worth and fair renown
 His every word and action crown.
 What shining honour shall that worth await?
 Thy ears, the lyre, and dulcet flute,
 Agefidamus! shall salute;
 O'er thy fair fame distil mellifluous lays,
 And all Pieria's choir afford thee ample praise.

EPODE V.

And on his country too we must bestow
 The faithful tribute of a votive verse; 130
 On Locris' race the honied stream shall flow
 While their victorious son my lays rehearse;
 Whom, by Olympia's awful shrine,
 My eyes beheld, with strength divine,

The envied trophies of the day.
Lovely his form, while youth's soft grace
Shed smiling beauty o'er his face;

Youth's bloom divine, which, join'd to potent
love,
The ruthless arm of death, from Ganymedes drove.

NOTES ON ODE TENTH.

VER. 12. But now the song with interest I'll repay.

Pindar, having so long delayed sending the ode, according to his promise, accompanied it with another small one, to atone for his neglect: this is the eleventh ode; which is from thence intitled Ἰόνος, interest. It is translated by West.

Ver. 17. Where gently fanned by Zephyr's balmy breeze,

Fair truth o'er Locris' colony presides.

There was a colony of Locrians established in that part of Italy called Magna Græcia; who, from their western situation, were siled Epizephyrian Locrians. Agesidamus was of this colony: the ode being inscribed in the original, Ἀγισιδάμου, Ἰόνος Ἐπίζεφυριαν.

Ver. 21. Bold Cynus in the hard-fought field,
Forced Hercules at first to yield.

Hercules, making war with Cynus, the son of Mars (the Cynus slain by Achilles was a son of Neptune), on account of his cruelty, was at first defeated, though he afterwards overcame and killed him. From this circumstance, and from Patroclus being encouraged by the exhortations of Achilles at the siege of Troy, he consoles Agesidamus for being worsted at the beginning of the conflict, till he assumed fresh strength and spirits from the encouragement of Ias, his Ἄλυσπις, or anointer: whose business it was, not only to prepare the combatants for the contest, by anointing them, but also to instruct them in the athletic exercises; as appears from what is said of Meleſias in the eighth Olympic ode, who in the title of it is stilyed Ἄλυσπις, Unctor. This Ias the elder Scholiast calls Iolas; and the younger Scholiast, and after him Sudorius, Hylus. I have chosen to keep the name as it is in Pindar.

Ver. 35. Jove's festival and solemn game,
With which Alcides honoured Pelops' shrine.

The poet here gives an account of the first institution of the Olympic games, by Hercules, after the victory he had obtained over Augeas, and his allies Cteatus and Eurytus, sons of Neptune and Molione; with whom he made war, to obtain the reward promised him by Augeas: and to revenge the loss of his army, which had been before cut to pieces by Cteatus and Eurytus; in which were slain his brother Iphicles, and also Telamon and Calcedon.

Ver. 62. The Altis' consecrated ground.] The Altis was a grove near the Olympic stadium, sacred to Jupiter; in which were placed the statues of the Olympic conquerors. In West's dissertation there is a particular account of it.

Ver. 65. Who worshipp'd with imperial train
Of high Olympus, shares the sacrifice.
In the original it is,

Μετ' ἑ δὲ δὲ ἀνάκτορον θεῶν.

There were six altars erected by Hercules, to twelve of the principal gods: the first was dedicated to Jupiter and Neptune; the second, to Juno and Minerva; the third to Mercury and Apollo; the fourth, to Bacchus and the Graces; the fifth to Diana and Alpheus; the sixth to Saturn and Rhea.

Ver. 85. On the long Stadiums even course.] The poet here gives the names of the conquerors at the first institution of the Olympic games, in the six different exercises, viz. the foot race; the palé, or wrestling; the cæstus; the chariot race; darting; and throwing the discus; all of which, with other exercises added afterwards, are accurately described in West's dissertation on the Olympic games.

Ver. 112.—Formed on Dirce's brink.] Dirce was the name of a fountain near Thebes, supposed to have been wife to Lycus, king of Thebes, and transformed into a fountain by Jupiter, after having been torn to pieces by horses, for her cruelty to Antiope.

O D E XIII.

TO XENOPHON, OF CORINTH, ON HIS VICTORY IN THE STADIC COURSE, AND PENTATHLON, AT OLYMPIA.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE poet begins his ode, by complimenting the family of Xenophon, on their successes, in the Olympic games, and their hospitality; and then celebrates their country, Corinth, for its good government and for the quick genius of its inhabitants, in the invention of many useful and ornamental arts. He then implores Jupiter to continue his blessings on them, and to remain propitious to Xenophon; whose exploits he enumerates, together with those of Theſſalus and Ptoëdorus, his father, and grandfather. He then, launches out again in praise of Corinth and her citizens, and relates the story of Bellerophon. He then, checking himself for digressing so far, returns to his hero, relates his various successes in the inferior games of Greece, and concludes with a prayer to Jupiter.

STROPHE I.

WHILST I rehearse the illustrious house's praise,
Thrice victor in Olympia's sportive war;
To friends and strangers open; let my lays
The fame of happy Corinth bear afar:
Which as a gate to Neptune's Isthmus stands,
Proud of her blooming youth and manly bands;
There, fair Eunomia, with her sister train
Blest peace and justice, hold their sacred reign;
Who wealth and smiling ease on mortals shower,
From Themis' genial care, drawing their natal hour. 10

AN TISTROPHE I.

But bloated inulence and fell disdain
Far from their peaceful seats they drive away.
Now lovely deeds inspire my sounding strain,
And honest boldness swells my rising lay;
When native worth the generous bosoms feel,
'Tis hard the shining virtues to conceal.
Corinth, on thee the blooming hours bestow
The envied wreaths from many deeds that flow,
And teach thy dædal sons with careful heart,
First to explore the way of many a useful art. 20

EPODE I.

Who bade the bullock sacred bleed
To Bacchus in the Dithyrambic rite?
Who first with reins the generous steed
Directed in his rapid flight?
And bade the sculptured bird of Jove
The temple's massy roofs above,
For ever fixed on either end,
His ornamental wings extend?
While the sweet muse her silver sounds inspires,
And Mars with glorious flame the warriors bosom
fires. 30

STROPHE II.

Olympia's honour'd patron! potent Jove!
Whose sovereign mandates o'er the world extend,
O with propitious ear my strain approve,
And, to fair Corinth's virtuous sons a friend,
On Xenophon let gales propitious breathe,
And take with hand benign the victor wreath
He won: surpassing, when on Pisa's shore,
What mortal valor had perform'd before;
The Stadic course re-echoed his renown,
And with knit limbs he gained the Pentathletic
crown. 40

AN TISTROPHE II.

And twice conspicuous on the trophied course
The Isthmian parsley graced his victor brow;
Nor did Nemea's cirque contemn his force —
And where the sacred waves of Alpheus flow
His father Theſſalus the olive wore
By swiftness gain'd, and since on Pythia's shore,
One sun beheld his might, 'midst wondering eyes
Obtain the Stadic, and Diaulic prize;
And the same month, to grace his honour'd brow,
The third triumphal wreath did Attica bestow.

EPODE II.

Seven times with reflexive force 5 I
Did Theſſalus the Heliotian trophies gain,

With Ptoëdorus too, his fire,
He triumphed on the Isthmian plain.
The swelling joy, the founding song,
Still follow as they go along;
What wreaths! what honours! too, they bore
From Pythia's and Nemea's shore! —
He who recounts their various crowns, as well
May number all the sands where ocean's billows swell. 60

STROPHE III.

Some medium though will every praise beseech,
Which 'tis the first of wisdom still to know. —
While, with no alien voice, the much-lov'd theme
The fame of Corinth from my lips shall flow;
And I her chiefs, and prudent fires rehearse,
No sounds fallacious shall disgrace my verse:
There Sisyphus arose, whose wiles could thine
With matchless force and lustre near divine;
Medea there, whom Venus' flames inspire 69
The Grecian ship to save, and cheat her cruel fire.

AN TISTROPHE III.

When warred the Greeks on Phrygia's hostile
On either side her sons embattled stood, [strand,
Though to bear Helen from the ill-fated land,
Her warriors with the Attridæ crossed the flood;
Yet some, who those with vengeful spears repell'd
From Corinth's race their honour'd lineage held,
For Lycian Glaucus to the Achaian host
Trembling before his lance, would often boast
His fires' abode, and wealth, and wide domain,
Where fair Pirene's waves enrich the fertile plain.

STROPHE IV.

The Ægis-bearing maid Minerva spoke,
While midnight slumbers clos'd his heavy eyes;
Straight from the dull embrace of sleep he broke
And seiz'd with eager hand the glittering prize:
Caranus' son he sought, the neighbouring teer,
And pour'd the wonderous tidings in his ear;
That, as in awful Pallas' holy fane,
Sleep o'er his temples spread her leaden reign;
Before him stood confess'd the warlike maid,
And by his side at once the golden bride laid.

NOTES ON ODE THIRTEENTH.

ER. I. The illuſtrious houſe
Thrice victor in Olympia's ſportive war.

The poet here alludes to the ſeveral prizes gained by Xenophon, his father Theſſalus, and his grandfather Ptæodorus; all which are mentioned in the ode, and not to three prizes won by Xenophon one, as ſome commentators have imagined, aking Σταδίου δρόμου not to ſignify one exer-ciſe, but two. I leave the preciſe meaning of theſe words to be determined by thoſe who are more curious in theſe ſort of conjectures; but I think the poet's intention is to put out of all doubt, by the expreſſion οἶκον προῖουλοπιονίων; which plainly relates to Xenophon's family, and not to himſelf.

Ver. 25. And bade the ſculptured bird of Jove,
The temple's maſſy roofs above,
For ever fix'd on either end,
His ornamental wings extend.

This is rather an obſcure paſſage, and relates to a particular ornament of the Grecian temples, viz. the Aëtoma, or figure of an eagle placed here; the invention of which the poet here ac-ribes to the Corinthians. The Scholiaſt adds, it was called double, from its form; or rather from here being one placed on each end of the temple, διδυμον δὲ φησὶν ὅτι διπλῶτον ἀετῶμοιο τὰ ὄπισθεν καὶ ἔμπροσθεν. Sudorius only differs from me by placing it within the temple; and perhaps he is in the right, as the word in the original is ἐνθῆ;

—vel intra,
Templa aquilæ ſpeciem locavit?

I have ſeen a Latin comment on Pin-dar, which ſuppoſes ἀετῶμα to mean a part of the temple itſelf; and to be ſo called, from its extending on each ſide as an eagle does its wings. Sciendum eſt ἀετῶμα locum et partem templi fuiſſe, ita dictam quæ ἀετὸς etiam diſta eſt propterea quod in modum aquilæ extendentis alas formata eſſet. Comment.
in Pind. auctore Benedicto Aretio Bernenſi, p.
189.

Ver. 37. Surpaſſing, when on Piſa's ſhore,
What mortal valour had perform'd before;
The ſtadiac courſe re-echoed his renown,
And with knit limbs he gain'd the Pentathletic
crown.

The mention only of two prizes here, confirms, I think, my opinion of the paſſage ſpoken of in the full note. The Pentathlon conſiſted of five different exerciſes. viz. leaping, running, quoin-ting, darting, and wreſtling; thus expreſſed in a Greek epigram;

Ἴſθημα καὶ Πυθοῖ Διοφῶν ὁ Φίλωνος ἐνίκαι, Ἄλμα, Ποδοκείλην, Δίſκον, Ἀκρόβια, Πά-λην.

Anthologia, l. i. cap. I. epig. 8.

What made it ſo extraordinary for the Pentath-lete to ſucceed in any of the other exerciſes, was the great application, and ſtrict and peculiar regimen, neceſſary to be obſerved in the attaining perfection in any one of the Gymnastic exercises ; which care the Pentathlete was obliged to divide amongst so many. Plato confirms this in his Ερπασαι; where he makes Socrates answer to a person who affirms, philosophy to consist in a general knowledge: Δοκίμῃ γὰρ μοι λέγουσιν οἷον ἐν τῇ ἀγωνίᾳ εἰσὶν οἱ Πένταθλοι πρὸς τὰς δρακμίας, ἢ τὰς πεντασάσας, καὶ γὰρ ἐκεῖναι τέτων μὲν λείπονται κατὰ τὰ τέτων ἄλλα, καὶ δευτέραι εἰσὶ, πρὸς τὰς τῶν ὁ ἄλλων ἀθλητῶν, πρώται, καὶ νικῶσιν αὐτούς. "You seem to speak of a person like the Pentathlete; who, when matched with a runner, or darter in their own particular exercises, is always inferior, though he may be the first among the other Athlets (i. e. those of his own profession), and overcome them." Longinus has also a passage much to the same purpose; when, comparing Hyperides with Demosthenes, he mentions the various merits of the former, and says, "He bears the second rank in almost every thing, like a Pentathlete, who, though he may be inferior to those who hold the first estimation in their several particular exercises, yet excels all others of the same class with himself." Ὡς ὁ Πένταθλος, ὅς τε τῶν μὲν πρώτων ἐν ἅπασιν ἀλλων ἀγωνιστῶν λείπεται, πρῶτον δὲ τῶν ἰσθμίων.

Ver. 48. The Isthmian parsley crown'd his victor brow.

The prizes in the four sacred games are enumerated in the following line:

"Ἄλλα δὲ τῶν Κόνιτος, Μῆλα, Σέλινα, Πίτυς.

The latter of which, i. e. a garland made of the leaves of the wild pine, was the reward given in the Isthmian games. But Pindar's Scholiast informs us, that σίλινα, the parsley, was also sometimes given at the Isthmian games, as well as the Nemean; only with this difference, that the Isthmian parsley was dried, and the Nemean green. The third question of the fifth book of Plutarch's Symposiaca assigns the reasons for changing the pine branch for the parsley, and afterwards restoring the pine again.

Ver. 48. Dialutic prize.] The Dialutic was foot-race, twice the length of the Stadic, consisting of two Stadiums, as that did of one.

Ver. 77. For Lycian Glaucus to the Achaian h Trembling before his lance, would often bow: His fire's abode, and wealth, and wide domain Where fair Pirene's waves enrich the fertile plain.

Glaucus was king of Lycia, great great grand to Bellerophon; though Pindar says Πατρὸς ἀστὴρ x. σ. 2. He was an ally of Priam's at the siege of Troy. In Homer, he gives an account of his whole lineage, and the story of Bellerophon, large, in his speech to Diomedes, in the fifth Iliad. It is too long to insert here.

Ver. 121. While thus the shafts of harmony throw.

This is another instance of that manner of expression I have taken notice of in the note upon the fifth line of the ninth ode.

Ver. 124. To Oligæthidæ's triumphant ban The Oligæthidæ, were a tribe, or division of the people at Corinth, to which Xenophon belongs. The Scholiast says, the number of their prizes was equal in each of the games, viz. Thirty in the Isthmian, and Thirty in the Nemean. Ἐξήκοντες γὰρ ἀμφοτέρω τοῖς ἀγῶσιν Ἴσθμίοις καὶ Νεμείοις ἀνεκυρήθησαν οἱ Ολιγαίτιδες, τετράκω ἐν ἑκάστω ἀγῶνι.

Ver. 137. Of Parnassus' heights, &c The poet here, as in several of his other odes, numerates the exploits of his patron and his family, in those inferior festivals which were held in almost every city throughout Greece; where the same exercises were performed, though the prizes were not so honourable as in the three principal ones, viz. the Olympic, Pythian, and Nemean, and Isthmian; which were called, by way of eminence, sacred. A list of these festivals with the occasion of them, and the places where they were held, may be found in the twelfth chapter of the first volume of Potter's Grec Antiquities.
